Violent Crime Down Sharply In Providence, RI. The Providence Journal (1/21, Smith) reports, "With a crew of streetworkers calming gang feuds and a gun task force invading criminal haunts, the frequency of murder has fallen to a historic low in Rhode Island's capital city. … The number of slayings fell by half last year and violent crime overall declined sharply, Police Chief Dean M. Esserman said, as improved law enforcement strategy and tactics such as the streetworkers and gun task force had a cumulative effect." The Journal continues, "While 22 people were killed in 2005, that fell to 11 in 2006, which Esserman said last week is the fewest in 31 years. … Violent crimes decreased by 18.6 percent last year, according to preliminary figures in a police document obtained by The Providence Journal. The number of such crimes — homicide, rape, robbery and aggravated assault — fell from 1,145 to 932, a decrease of 213." The Journal adds, "Mayor David N. Cicilline and the chief are scheduled to announce final numbers for 2006 tomorrow, including figures for property crime and total crime. Excepting murders, the final figures for violent crime may vary slightly from the preliminary figures. … Killings in Providence, the second most-populated city in New England, peaked at 30 in 2000, then declined to 23 in 2001 and 2002, to 20 in 2003, and then to 18 in 2004. The next year there was a spike, to 22, but then the number plummeted last year. … Esserman has no explanation for what he called 'a blip' in killings and violent crime in 2005. But since he became chief in January 2003, he contends, a disciplined, dedicated and properly staffed Police Department has brought down both violent and property crimes."

Trial Casts Shadow Over DeVecchio's Retirement Years. The Sarasota Herald Tribune (1/21, Lee) reported, "By the time R. Lindley DeVecchio settled in Sarasota, his days at the FBI had become gangland lore. … Having sealed up a 33-year career with the FBI, DeVecchio bought a courtyard-style home set among hammocks of palms in virtually crime-free Palmer Ranch. … And then he got indicted for murder. The supervisory special agent who helped bring down the leaders of New York City's five organized crime families now faces four 25-years-to-life prison sentences in what a prosecutor at the Brooklyn District Attorney's Office has called 'one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the history of this country.'" The Herald Tribune notes, "DeVecchio, who declined to speak publicly about his pending trial or his life in Sarasota, pleaded not guilty to all four counts of second-degree murder at his March 30 arraignment in Brooklyn State Supreme Court. And a 1994 internal Justice Department investigation into similar accusations" that DeVecchio had leaked information to the mob "found he had done nothing wrong." The Herald details DeVecchio's career and the allegations of criminal activity and adds, "Here, he blends in as a typical retiree. … But for DeVecchio, the trial looms."

DOJ_NMG_0119401

ANTITRUST:

Black Seen As Potential Savior Of Seattle Post-Intelligencer. The Seattle Times (1/21, Pryne) reports, "Could David Black save the P-I? … With a decision looming in four months that might spell the beginning of the end for the smaller of Seattle's two daily newspapers, some speculate Black could ride to the Post-Intelligencer's rescue." The Times continues, "He kept an endangered daily alive before under similar circumstances, they note, in Honolulu. … Liz Brown, administrative officer for the Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild, said she mentioned the possibility to Don Kendall, who heads Black Press' new King County operations, at a meeting last month. … 'I told him, "You could save the day again," ' said Brown, whose union represents workers at both Seattle papers. … But Kendall said he's never discussed buying or printing the P-I with Black. What's more, he added, Seattle isn't Honolulu." The Times adds, "The P-I has pretty much been only a newsroom since 1983. That's when its owner, The Hearst Corp., entered into a federally sanctioned joint operating agreement (JOA) with The Seattle Times Co. … The Times prints, circulates and sells the advertising for both papers. In return, it gets most of the proceeds. But it has maintained in recent years that it is losing money under the arrangement and moved in 2003 to trigger an escape clause in the contract. … Hearst has said the P-I couldn't survive outside the JOA. It also says The Times' loss claims aren't valid. … After years of litigation, the companies agreed last spring to submit their dispute to binding arbitration. The arbitrator is scheduled to rule by May 31. … If The Times wins, the agreement calls for Hearst to shut down the P-I in six to 12 months. In return, it would get 32 percent of The Times' profits until 2083, when the JOA expires." The Times notes, "To comply with antitrust laws, however, the U.S. Justice Department or federal judges almost certainly would require Hearst to put the P-I up for sale before closing it. That's what happened in Hawaii in 2000."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Plans To Restore Yosemite End Up In Court. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/21, A1, Squatriglia) reports, "When the Merced River overran its banks and scoured Yosemite National Park a decade ago, many saw an unprecedented opportunity to restore the iconic park and cede more of the Yosemite Valley to nature. … A plan by the National Park Service to reinvent the valley and another to protect the Merced River drew broad support from environmentalists, the public and the government. Years of acrimonious debate over how to manage a crown jewel of America's national park system gave way to a consensus that the Park Service had finally gotten it right. … Yet 10 years after the flood, both plans remain tied up in court, challenged by a small but passionate group of activists who argue that the Park Service would render Yosemite an exclusive resort. A federal judge has rejected the river plan, the future of the valley plan is uncertain and, with several projects planned for the valley brought to a halt, frustrated park officials worry they'll be told to begin the planning process anew. … But many of the environmentalists who championed the plans have moved on to other issues. Public, not to mention governmental, priorities have shifted. There is mounting concern that the broad support for remaking Yosemite is gone." The Chronicle adds, "Californians, too, overwhelmingly approved of the plans, according to a statewide poll commissioned by the defense council shortly after the plans were announced. .. But two small environmental organizations, Friends of Yosemite Valley and Mariposans for Environmentally Responsible Growth, opposed the plans. They sued, arguing that the Merced River Plan was hastily written, used flawed data and favored development. … U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii agreed and rejected the plan in July. He ordered the Park Service to draft a new plan, a process the Park Service says will take 33 months. In October, Ishii shut down several construction projects until the new plan is drafted. … The U.S. Justice Department is expected to announce it will appeal Ishii's rulings, but now finds itself defending the Yosemite Valley Plan as well."

Families Concerned About Unsolved Tribal Cases. The Yakima (WA) Herald Republic (1/21, Ferolito) reports, "Authorities still have no clue about what happened to Donnie Sampson. … The 71-year-old Yakama tribal official left early Oct. 30, 1994, for the Wilson Charlie-Dry Creek area, one of his favorite hunting spots near Mount Adams." The Republic continues, "Three days later, authorities found his 1992 four-wheel drive pickup in more than a foot of snow near the mouth of Holdaway Meadows north of Mount Adams in the closed area of the Yakama reservation. … A rifle, pickup keys, extra clothing and a sack lunch were found inside his truck, but no trace of Sampson, a member of the Yakama Nation Code of Ethics Committee, a watchdog board of tribal government." The Republic adds, "His disappearance puzzled family and tribal authorities. A massive search involving helicopters, snowmobiles, dogs and nearly 100 people found no trace of him, and seven years later he was presumed dead, according to the Yakima County Coroner's Office. … His disappearance isn't the only grief his family suffers. Two years earlier, the body of Sampson's 30-year-old daughter, Shari Dee Sampson Elwell, was found strangled and sexually mutilated in an area not far from where her father later disappeared. … The family hadn't seen her for weeks before a group of hunters found her body." The Republic notes, "Her death, which remains unsolved, capped a decade-long string of mysterious deaths involving at least a dozen women -- all but two were tribal members -- on the 1.2-million-acre Yakama reservation. … Those cases are just two of an unknown number involving either unsolved deaths or missing tribal members here. … It's hard to say just how many unsolved cases exist because case files are dispersed among tribal, federal, state and county law enforcement agencies, says Yakama tribal police Chief Davis Washines. … How cases are classified on the reservation often determines which jurisdiction they fall under, he says. … If it's classified a homicide on tribal land, it goes to the FBI. If it's a missing tribal member or accidental death, tribal police take it. If it's a death caused by an auto accident, either the Washington State Patrol or Yakima County Sheriff's Office could take it."

DOJ_NMG_0119402

NYTimes Blasts Administration Over Failure To Finance Global Warming Research. The New York Times (1/21, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes, "At a time when concerns about global warming are rising, the Bush administration is sharply reducing the number of satellites that can measure the impact of rising temperatures and a host of other environmental trends. The administration's hypocrisy is stunning. For years, the president and top officials have justified their refusal to grapple seriously with global warming by insisting that more research is needed. Now, after pledging that such research would be the centerpiece of a new climate change strategy, the administration is underfinancing some of the most important efforts to gather data."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Officials Hail Extradition Of Mexican Drug Kingpins. The Washington Post (1/21, A15, Roig-Franzia, 690K) reports, "The extradition to the United States of four major drug traffickers, including Osiel Cardenas Guillen, head of the powerful Gulf cartel, was hailed Saturday by U.S. officials as a signal of a new era of cooperation." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "called the extraditions 'unprecedented.' … For years, U.S. officials have criticized Mexico as a sometimes-difficult partner in the war against drugs because of its reluctance to extradite top drug lords to the United States. Mexico has long refused to extradite suspects who might face the death penalty. In 2001, Mexico's Supreme Court also barred extraditions of suspects facing possible life sentences, which were considered 'cruel and unusual punishment' here. But the court reversed itself in November 2005, clearing the way for higher-profile extraditions. The ruling did not affect death penalty cases." The Washington Times (1/21, Adams, 88K) reports U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza "said the latest extradition demonstrated the 'courage and conviction' of Mexico's president, attorney general and law enforcement officers."

The New York Times (1/21, A15, McKinley, 1.16M) reports Cárdenas Guillén "was among the 21 people flown under heavy armed guard to the United States on Friday night and handed over to federal authorities. He is under indictment in Texas for trafficking in marijuana and threatening to kill three law enforcement agents. The Mexican government also turned over Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers who were high-ranking members of the Arellano-Félix cartel in Tijuana, as well as Hector Palma Salazar, a former leader in the Sinaloa cartel. All face racketeering and drug trafficking charges in Southern California.

The Dallas Morning News (1/21, Iliff, Corchado, 500K) reports, "In a prepared statement, the Mexico attorney general's office blamed the drug lords for 'generating a wave of violence and social decomposition in our country, in addition to damaging the health of thousands of Mexicans by turning them into prisoners of their drug addiction.'" The Los Angeles Times (1/21, Tobar, 850K) reports, "Even inside their Mexican prisons, the kingpins were known for outrageous behavior. Cardenas treated 17,000 people to a Day of the Child party at a baseball stadium in the border city of Reynosa last year."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/21, Hall) reports, "Mexico's extradition of 15 reputed drug lords and violent criminals, four of whom have ties to San Diego, drew praise from the U.S. attorney general yesterday and signaled its new determination to keep traffickers from running their cartels from inside prison walls. … 'The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance,' U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement yesterday." The Union-Tribune continues, "Osiel Cárdenas, the alleged Gulf cartel leader who was believed to be running his gang from prison in Mexico, was sent north late Friday along with 14 others wanted by the United States after their appeals against extradition ran out, the office of Mexico's attorney general said. … Four of those extradited had been indicted years ago in San Diego. They include the reputed former leader of the Sinaloa drug cartel and three men connected to the Arellano Félix drug cartel. They will be transported to San Diego 'relatively soon,' perhaps within weeks, to answer the charges against them, Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said." The Union-Tribune adds, "All of the suspects are being held in Houston and are expected to appear in court there early this week. .. Gonzales applauded 'the bold stance' of Mexican President Felipe Calderón and his government 'in targeting the drug-related violence and corruption that affects both our nations.'"

DOJ_NMG_0119403

The AP (1/21, Stevenson) reports, "Osiel Cardenas, the alleged Gulf cartel leader thought to be running his gang from prison in Mexico, was sent north late Friday along with 14 others wanted by the U.S. after their appeals against extradition ran out, the office of Mexico's attorney general said. … The Mexican attorney general's office said the extraditions were also aimed in part at cracking down on turf battles between Mexican drug cartels, which have cost hundreds of lives in recent months in states such as Michoacan, Guerrero, Baja California and Sinaloa." The AP adds, "Recently, the government has sent thousands of soldiers and police to try to stem the drugfueled violence. … 'This changes the rules, as far drug traffickers' impunity and the potential punishment they face,' said Oscar Aguilar, a political-science professor at Mexico City's Iberoamerican University. 'Before, the capos could say, "Well, if they ever do catch me, I'll be in Mexico, my family and associates can visit me whenever they want, and I can keep running the business" ' from prison. … Mexican officials have said that Cardenas and top members of the Tijuana cartel forged an alliance while locked up at a maximum-security prison just west of Mexico City, where they organized to fight turf wars against rival drug lords."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush State Of The Union Address To Focus On Health Care, Energy Policy. The Washington Times (1/21, Dinan, 88K) reports the White House "has told Republicans on Capitol Hill that Tuesday's address will make the most news on health care and energy policy. Aides have said the speech will forgo the usual laundry list of new programs and instead focus on those two areas and three others: the war on terrorism, immigration and education. 'President Bush will outline issues where he believes we can find common ground with the new Congress,' spokeswoman Dana Perino said."

Bush Health Care Initiative Includes New Tax On Some Insurance Plans. The Washington Post (1/21, A4, Fletcher, 690K) reports Bush "will propose a deep tax break for Americans who purchase their own medical insurance and would finance it with an unprecedented tax on a portion of high-priced health-care plans that workers receive from their employers, according to the White House. The initiative, which the president briefly previewed in his radio address yesterday, has a dual purpose: It would create a financial incentive for the estimated 46 million to 48 million Americans who lack health insurance to buy it. And it would rein in the soaring cost of health insurance by encouraging workers in high-priced plans to seek more modest coverage." According to the Post, the proposal "marks a sharp departure for a president who has been criticized for advocating tax cuts that disproportionately benefit higher-income Americans," though Administration officials "refuse to characterize the plan as a tax increase because it raises no new money for the federal government. Instead, it would add a new tax on employer-provided health-care plans worth more than $15,000 to subsidize those who buy modestly priced plans out of their pockets. In addition, they say, the plan is consistent with the president's idea of increasing access to health insurance through the private market while encouraging people to be more cost-conscious as they purchase medical-care coverage."

The Washington Times (1/21, Dinan, 88K) reports that in his weekly radio address Bush "said his plan will treat health insurance like a mortgage. … The changes will require congressional action and Mr. Bush, now facing a Democratic majority in Congress, ruled out raising taxes or 'creating a new federal entitlement program' as possible options for expanding health care." The AP (1/20) reports that "a Bush administration official familiar with the proposals" would not "disclose the amount of the proposed deduction or the top amount of coverage from employer-sponsored plans that would remain free of income and payroll taxes."

The Los Angeles Times (1/21, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "Bush's proposal is a combination of carrots and sticks — and, if enacted, would create new winners and losers in the health insurance arena. It is likely to run into opposition in the Democratic-led Congress but could serve as a key element of a broader package dealing with rising healthcare costs and shrinking coverage. The carrot in Bush's plan is the creation of a health insurance tax deduction that all taxpayers would receive — $7,500 a year for individuals and $15,000 for families. … Bush's plan may seem like a startling move from a president who has repeatedly vowed not to raise taxes. People with generous healthcare coverage would face the higher taxes, although they could avoid the hit by switching to a standard policy. Family coverage costs an average of $11,500 to $13,000 a year, according to industry surveys."

DOJ_NMG_0119404

Rangel Claims Bush Would Raise Taxes On Middle Class. The New York Times (1/21, Stolberg, Pear, 1.16M), in a front-page article titled, "Bush To Urge New Tax Plan For Health Care Coverage," describes Bush's plan as a "one-two punch: tax breaks to help low-income people buy health insurance and tax increases for some workers whose health plans cost significantly more than the national average. … The basic concept is that employer-provided health insurance, now treated as a fringe benefit exempt from taxation, would no longer be entirely tax-free." The proposed plan "is a startling move for a president who has repeatedly vowed not to raise taxes. And it is certain to run into opposition from business groups, labor unions and, most of all, the Democrats who now run Capitol Hill. … Critics say it would, in effect, tax people with insurance to provide coverage to those without it." Rep. Charles Rangel is quoted as saying, "It's a bad policy. …. We are trying to bring tax relief to the middle class. The president is trying to increase their tax liability."

Webb's State Of The Union Response Expected To Draw More Attention Than Usual. In an "Editorial Observer" piece for the New York Times (1/21, WK11, 1.16M) Francis X. Clines writes, "Normally, no one pays much attention to the opposition's rebuttal to a State of the Union address. But the capital's mood as the war spirals downward is palpably, if not desperately, expectant of some change, somehow. And in Washington, fresh rhetoric must be invested to feed any chance of change." Sen. Jim Webb, "whose upset victory was fueled by stinging, uninhibited criticism of the Bush administration's bungling of its war, clearly has something closer to a glinting riposte in mind than some boilerplate response for the record."

WPost Says "Independence" Ought Not Be Goal Of US Energy Policy. The Washington Post (1/21, 690K), in an editorial, notes that energy policy "is likely to be featured in President Bush's State of the Union address; a variety of energy bills have been proposed in Congress; and this year's reauthorization of the farm program may repackage agricultural handouts as ethanol-promoting energy policy. But there is a danger in the way political leaders are framing this issue. 'Energy independence' is more elusive and less rewarding than is commonly perceived. … If the United States replaced all oil imports with domestically produced fuel, how much more secure would it be? Well, a Venezuelan or Iranian oil embargo could still hurt U.S. motorists and oil-consuming industries. An embargo would create a global scarcity of oil, and fuel prices would jump -- including the price of fuel in the United States." The Post concludes, "Bush and Congress should focus their energy policy on mitigating climate change and accept security gains that may flow from that as a welcome byproduct."

LATimes Concerned By Bush's "Lack Of Stature" Internationally. The Los Angeles Times (1/21, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "Bush will be with us for another two years, and this Tuesday, with the State of the Union address, he will attempt to begin engineering a fourth-quarter comeback. Iraq will remain at the forefront, of course, but Bush desperately needs to find ways to remain relevant on the domestic front as well. Comprehensive immigration reform would be one way to do that, and perhaps Bush will embrace environmentalism in the same way that Ronald Reagan improbably embraced arms control in his last years in office. Regardless of the issue, the most worrisome aspect of the Bush administration at this point is the president's lack of stature. It sounds corny, but the president of the United States remains the leader of the free world, and it's essential for him to command respect and authority on the global stage. The unsettling question about Bush in his fourth quarter is whether anyone will take him seriously the next time he identifies a crisis — especially if, and when, it's a real crisis."

Bolten Credited With Creating More Pragmatic White House. In the New York Times (1/21, WK3, 1.16M) Jim Rutenberg writes about "an emerging pragmatism inside the West Wing." According to Rutenberg, "In the last few months, the new White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, has switched out longtime Bush loyalists with a handful of so-called policy realists — and their appointments have cast a famously ideological White House inner circle in a more pragmatic light. And they have expressed a willingness to deal with a new Democratic Congress. But Washington being Washington, there is skepticism. Just how pragmatic will they be on issues they hold dear? … In fact, the administration's decisions in the last few weeks could be seen as a move to compromise now to avoid more serious setbacks to his agenda later. In other words, it is pragmatism at gunpoint. Take, for instance, the administration's agreement last week to submit the wiretap program to judicial review. Opponents of the program said the administration had finally folded," however "the administration may also have deflated Congressional plans to move against the program. In effect, critics say, the White House was trying to duck for now a debate on a crucial balance of power question."

Parties Struggle To Find Common Ground On Social Security Reform. The New York Times (1/21, A21, Toner, 1.16M) reports President Bush "is renewing his call for a bipartisan effort on Social Security, but few other issues so clearly highlight the limits of bipartisanship these days, the mistrust and ideological division just barely below the surface. … Efforts have been made: Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has talked to crucial lawmakers, including" Rep. Charles Rangel, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, "'encouraging everyone to bring all their ideas to the table, and hoping that some kind of consensus can emerge,' as Michele Davis, the assistant Treasury secretary, puts it. Mr. Rangel said he had also been talking about the possibility of action on Social Security with the ranking Republican on his committee, Representative Jim McCrery. And in the Senate, [Sen. Judd] Gregg and Senator Kent Conrad, the chairman of the Budget Committee, have proposed a bipartisan working group to explore broad entitlement and fiscal issues. But the old fault lines have quickly re-emerged. Vice President Dick Cheney, in an interview with Fox News last week, said Mr. Paulson's openness to all ideas did not indicate that the administration was open to any increase in the payroll tax that supports Social Security." Sen. Conrad "said that after those comments, his effort to move forward with his working group 'is on life support.'"

DOJ_NMG_0119405

New Congress Seen As "Hostile" To Business Interests. The Washington Post (1/21, F2, 690K) reports, "For almost a year, business interests have had an inkling that their days of calling the shots in Washington were about to come to an end. But last week, as the clocked ticked down on the symbolic first 100 hours of the 110th Congress, it was becoming pretty clear how hostile the political environment had become after 12 years of Republican rule. It wasn't just that key business lobbyists were no longer invited to the weekly meeting to set the agenda, plan strategy and coordinate the talking points. Or that much of the promised legislation was hostile to their interests, such as House passage last week of an energy bill that wiped out tax breaks and raised royalty fees for the oil industry and cut subsidies to banks and others making college loans. Or that, in pushing through their first six bills, House Democrats were able to get an average of 62 votes from the once-united Republican caucus. More troubling for business interests was the fact that nearly every day seemed to bring news of some fresh new offensive -- a hostile hearing or a special new committee or some calculated retreat by the Bush administration, leaving them surprised and exposed."

Will Notes Frank's Views On Federal Reserve's Independence. In his Washington Post (1/21, B7, 690K) column, George Will writes that Rep. Barney Frank, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, "mildly says that Congress should 'pay a little more attention' to the seven governors of the Federal Reserve system, all of whom are confirmed by Congress. The Fed, says Frank less mildly, should not be considered 'above democracy': 'We can debate whether Terri Schiavo's life should be recognized as over' and other fundamental questions of existence, 'but God forbid anybody in elected office should talk about whether or not we need a 25-basis-point increase' in interest rates. 'Somehow that's sacrosanct. No, it isn't. It's public policy.'" Frank "wants the Fed to emphasize full employment as well as protect the currency as a store of value -- restraining inflation."

Congressional Democrats Approach Abortion Debate Cautiously. The Washington Post (1/21, A5, Murray, 690K) reports, "Eager to avoid a resumption of the culture wars, the new Democratic leaders are trying to tiptoe around the abortion issue by promoting legislation to encourage birth control and assist women who decide to proceed with unwanted pregnancies. Democrats acknowledge that they alienated many social conservatives and churchgoing voters during years of combat with Republicans over the explosive issue of reproductive rights, and they want to change their emphasis to woo some of those voters back into the fold." Democrats are reaching out to "religious moderates who support, in principle, the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide but who are morally squeamish about terminating pregnancies."

Sanders Continues To Embrace Socialism. The New York Times Magazine (1/21, Leibovich) profiles Sen. Bernie Sanders, noting that Sanders "has always been an easier fit in Vermont than in Washington. Being a Socialist in the seat of two-party orthodoxy will do that. While he has generally championed liberal Democratic positions over the years — and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee endorsed his Senate campaign — Sanders has strenuously resisted calling himself a Democrat. And he has clung to a mantle — socialism — that brings considerable stigma, in large part for its association with authoritarian communist regimes (which Sanders is quick to disavow). But he does little to airbrush the red 'S' from his political profile."

Brooks Offers Guarded Praise For New Congress. In his New York Times (1/21, WK12, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "We're in bipartisan nirvana. Bills are passing through the House 356 to 71 and through the Senate 96 to 2. Nancy Pelosi is aglow, and this week President Bush will trot out a State of the Union speech so conciliatory in tone it'll sound like Gandhi on Quaaludes. The question is, What is all this good cheer accomplishing? It's time to render judgments on the substance of all this legislation coursing through the Democratic Congress." According to Brooks, Congress "hasn't tried anything big. It has a weakness for showy symbolism and middle-class subsidies. Still, at least it hasn't humiliated the nation the way the last Congress did, and it looks set to do some modest good."

DOJ_NMG_0119406

Bush's SCOTUS Picks Examined. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/21, B1, 690K) Jan Crawford Greenburg, legal correspondent for ABC News, writes, "The departures of [Justices] O'Connor and Rehnquist produced a titanic conflict over their successors, one that turned allies into enemies, damaged reputations and reopened old wounds. Yet, after bizarre missteps and strategic brilliance at the highest levels, Bush engineered lasting change in the court, succeeding where past Republican presidents -- including his own father -- had failed. And in so doing, he provided some redemption for the conservative movement, so dismayed by watching Republicans in the political branches flout ethics laws, expand government and indulge in runaway spending. If nothing else, they would get their court.

OTHER NEWS:

States Get Ahead Of Congress With Populist Proposals. The Washington Post (1/21, A12, Russakoff, 690K) reports, "Paying heed to voters' economic anxieties, governors of both parties and in all regions opened legislative sessions with proposals such as eliminating sales taxes on groceries, providing public kindergarten for low-income children, targeting tax relief to low- and moderate-income families and investing state dollars in job training for a new economy. Stepping ahead of the Democratic-controlled House in attending to the growing gap between rich and poor, lawmakers in 17 states are moving to raise the minimum wage sooner or more than Congress proposes, or to tie it to inflation so it continues to rise. … And California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) was hardly the sole governor calling for universal health insurance. His counterparts in Kansas, Illinois and Colorado did the same, while governors in Arizona, New Mexico, Indiana, New York and elsewhere called for covering hundreds of thousands of low-income, uninsured families."

Clinton Says "I'm In" Race For Democratic Presidential Nomination. Sen. Hillary Clinton's formal entry into the 2008 presidential race dominates the news, leading all three broadcast network newscasts and appearing on the front page of newspapers across the US. The reports are generally laudatory, calling Clinton's candidacy history-making, as she becomes the most serious female presidential candidate to date, and the first spouse of a former president to seek the presidency. While Clinton announced the creation of an exploratory committee, most reports paint her candidacy as official, with many stories and headlines prominently noting that Clinton declared, "I'm in." Clinton's announcement came two years to the day before the next presidential inauguration.

ABC World News (1/20, lead story, 2:30, Berman, 8.78M) reported, "It was just two words, but they were two words that sent tremors across the political landscape: 'I'm in.' … A new ABC News/Washington Post poll just out tonight shows Sen. Clinton with a huge lead in her own party. Other polls show her running strongly against her likely Republican opponents. However you slice it, Sen. Clinton is shaping up as the woman to beat." But as ABC's Kate Snow added, "Even within her own campaign, there are concerns that some Democratic voters think Sen. Clinton is not electable. Critics are eager to exploit her husband's past and public life as First Lady. Some political watchers believe Clinton was under pressure to get in the race, particularly after Sen. Barack Obama's announcement this week. … Today, Senator Obama welcomed Clinton to the race, calling her a friend. Many Republicans say they would rather face Obama than Clinton. She has more experience with campaigns. She's a prolific fund-raiser." Following that lead report, George Stephanopoulos said on ABC World News (1/20, story 2, 2:10, 8.78M), "The Clinton people were going for the political equivalent of shock and awe. And that's exactly what they got. We've already seen she's way ahead in the Democratic primaries right now, but this is going to solidify it. The machine is behind it. She's going to dominate news coverage for the next several days around the President's State of the Union."

The CBS Evening News (1/20, lead story, 2:15, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "The pack of 2008 presidential hopefuls got even bigger today. After months, even years of speculation," Clinton "joined the Democratic race for the White House, while Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback announced his bid for the Republican nod." Clinton "threw her hat into the ring on line." CBS (Chen): "Not that there ever was much doubt, but today the waiting game ended. … In her Web-only announcement, Clinton revealed herself as a gracious on-line hostess with sharp political elbows. … As the first former presidential spouse to try to return to the White House on her own merits," Clinton's candidacy "was certainly going to draw a buzz, and let's remember, this is not just any former First Lady." The CBS Evening News (1/20, story 2, 3:25, Attkisson, 7.66M) also examined the race to date, with political correspondent Gloria Borger asked if "we assume one of those two candidates," Clinton or Obama, "will be the Democratic nominee." Borger said, "I don't think we can assume anything yet. … They're very well known, they're very attractive candidates, and they're sucking all the oxygen out of the room. But anything can happen in a presidential campaign, and there are lots of people who believe that these two could cancel each other out and eventually make room for a second-tier candidate like John Edwards or Joe Biden."

DOJ_NMG_0119407

NBC Nightly News (1/12, lead story, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) led by reporting, "Sen. Hillary Clinton made history today. She is running for president, the first First Lady to ever take that step." NBC (Reid): "In a webcast, Hillary says she is exploring a run for President but on the screen it says 'I am in. And I am in to win,' leaving little doubt that she is running directly at President Bush." Clinton: "After six years of George Bush, it is time to renew the promise of America." Political journalist John Harwood said on NBC Nightly News (1/20, story 2, 2:20, 9.87M), "She is the favorite, but not an overwhelming one. If neither one of the candidates make a mistake, Barack Obama will win, but her experience in Bill Clinton's campaign and presidency makes it much less likely she will make a mistake."

On CNN (1/20), correspondent Candy Crowley said, "It's amazing…that something so expected could generate excitement and a little bit of surprise. But nonetheless, there you have it. … We are told by some that she decided to get in at this point because she wanted to untie her hands. She was in that limbo of between everyone believing she was a candidate and yet every time she went up to the cameras, she would get asked the question. So, getting in now unties her hands, it also gives Barack Obama a little run for his money when it comes to marquee names in the race."

The Washington Post (1/21, Balz, 690K) says on its front page that Clinton made her Web announcement "early in the morning, and then spent the day at her Washington home making calls to supporters, donors and friends. Her announcement was deliberately timed to come shortly before President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday night, campaign advisers said, so she can draw a contrast with the administration's record and help focus attention on the office of the presidency." The New York Times (1/21, Healy, Zeleny, 1.16M), also on the front page, focused on the money race, saying Clinton is "immediately squaring off against" Obama and the rest of the field "in what is effectively the party's first primary, the competition for campaign donations." Another New York Times (1/21, A27, Healy, 1.16M) story says Clinton advisers "said that they chose Jan. 20 as the target date for an announcement during a meeting in mid-December, and that Mrs. Clinton was 'raring to go' on Friday."

The Los Angeles Times (1/21, Braun, Hook, 850K) called Clinton's move "long-anticipated," saying she is "aiming to make history as the first woman elected to the White House after an audacious and turbulent political journey from first lady to a New York Senate seat." Clinton "sets out with strong advantages -- national name recognition, a command of the major issues, a crack campaign staff and a brimming war chest. But she will also have to overcome her reputation for political calculation, an inconsistent stump presence and her intimate ties to the polarizing events of her husband's White House tenure." A Washington Times (1/21, Hurt, 88K) front-page report calls Clinton "a front-runner even before she entered the contest." This week's announcements "set up a historic race that will include Mrs. Clinton, who would be the first female president if elected; Mr. Obama, who would be the first black president;" and Gov. Bill Richardson, "who would become the first Hispanic president." The Dallas Morning News (1/21, 500K) says the "sizable field of candidates underscores the belief that, for all of Mrs. Clinton's experience and credentials, there are Democrats who question whether she can win a general election." The New York Daily News (1/21, DeFrank, 729K) says Republicans "have been lying in wait for Clinton for months, honing their attack strategy."

The Chicago Tribune (1/21, Zuckman, 617K) leads its report by saying Clinton called "for a national conversation to undo what she sees as the damage wrought by President Bush" in a "polished videotaped announcement. … With massive resources and a worldwide profile, she instantly became the most serious woman candidate ever to run for president." The Boston Globe (1/21, Milligan, 413K) says Clinton, "seated on a living room couch and speaking as though she were addressing a small gathering instead of millions of voters," promised to "begin a 'conversation' with Americans to solicit views on how to end the war in Iraq and deal with issues including energy independence, health care, and the federal deficit." Newsday (1/21, Thrush) calls the Clinton candidacy "a historic and hyped bid." The AP (1/20) said in New York, "Democrats in New York offered up whoopees while Republicans had scolding 'we-told-you-so' reminders" as Clinton got in the race.

One of the more negative headlines is on the front page of the San Francisco Chronicle (1/21, Marinucci, Wildermuth, 384K), which says "Candidate Clinton Faces Tough Battle For Nation's Favor." But the story's lead focuses on the fact that Clinton's entry "sets up a high-priced, high-profile political melee that could make California, working to move its primary up to February, the decisive contest in the campaign for the Democratic nomination." The New York Times/AP (1/21, A16) says California may move its primary to February 5.

The AP (1/20, Fouhy) called it the start of a "trailblazing campaign for the White House" by Clinton, and BBC.com (1/20, Greene) says "all thoughts will now turn to whether the New York Democrat really has what it takes to become the first woman president of the United States." CNN.com (1/20) and the Web site of The Hill (1/20, Marre) also reported on Clinton's entry.

Two major newspapers examine Clinton's use of the Internet to launch her campaign. The Washington Post (1/21, D1, Hornaday, 690K) says if a "Democratic primary were held on sheer production values," Clinton "would win in a landslide. … Unlike other candidates (coughBarack Obamacough), whose videos might have been produced by a guy with a cellphone camera, Clinton's announcement was a veritable showpiece of Hollywood-style set design, lighting and cinematography." The Los Angeles Times (1/21, Gosselin, 850K) says on its front page that "in choosing the Internet to announce she intends to run," Clinton "bowed to the burgeoning political power of the medium and offered a preview of how she hopes to harness it to her purposes." The Washington Post (1/21, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) also looks at how candidates "carefully craft first impressions."

DOJ_NMG_0119408

Additional stories examine variables that will impact Clinton's hopes. The Washington Post (1/21, A6, Romano, 690K) looks at the issue of gender -- the Washington Post (1/21, D3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) "Reliable Source" column calls Clinton the "first woman who maybe, kinda, has a chance of getting elected U.S. president," and the New York Post (1/21, 631K) says "feminist leaders" said a "successful Hillary Clinton campaign would not just be a win for her, but for women everywhere" -- while the Chicago Tribune (1/21, Tackett, 617K) examines the nation's strong feelings about Clinton and her husband. In addition, the Washington Post (1/21, A6, 690K) runs down the roster of the Clinton campaign team.

Clinton Said To See Nomination Contest As Bigger Challenge Than General Election. The New York Times (1/21, A27, Healy, 1.16M) says that of the Democratic contenders, Clinton "is the most battle-tested, has the biggest fund-raising network and can walk into the job with a unique set of skills and perspectives gleaned from eight years in the White House as first lady. Yet none of that guarantees Mrs. Clinton will steamroll her opponents, or manage and master the issues that have long vexed her, like the war in Iraq and universal health insurance. Far from it: she has told friends that she is more worried about winning the Democratic nomination than winning a general election against a Republican." A front-page Washington Post (1/21, Murray, Baker, 690K) story examines the "tough choices" top Democrats face in deciding whom to support, saying "Clinton, Obama and the other Democratic presidential contenders already are squaring off in what might be called the Rahm Primary, an early contest to win over the movers and shakers" of the party like Rep. Rahm Emanuel.

McAuliffe Predicts "Tough Campaign," But Says "Strong" Clinton Can Prevail. Clinton adviser Terry McAuliffe said on CNN (1/20, Whitfield), "We all know that she has all the characteristics to be a great president. She has character strength and she's strong. She can reach out to so many different people. … This is going to be a tough campaign. I think we have the best Democratic field that we have ever had in the history of our party. … And she's going to be in there with the rest of them, laying out their vision for the future of the country. But, as I say, this is historic and she is going to bring all her talents. And you look at her eight years as first lady and all of the people she knows all around the world, we're looking for new leadership in this country. And Hillary is going to provide us with that leadership." The Times of London (1/21, Baxter) headlines a report "Hillary Runs For The White House As 'New Thatcher,'" saying that McAuliffe compared Clinton and former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. McAuliffe said, "Their policies are totally different but they are both perceived as very tough."

Clinton Iowa-Bound Next Weekend. The AP (1/20) reports Clinton "will make her initial foray into Iowa next weekend, aides said Saturday. Details of the upcoming campaign swing were still being finalized."

Brownback Enters Race For GOP Presidential Nomination. Coverage of Sen. Sam Brownback's formal entry into the presidential race is in marked contrast to the coverage of Sen. Hillary Clinton's announcement. Brownback stories do not make the front pages, and some headlines do not even mention him by name. Under the headline "Kansas Senator Announces Bid For Presidency," the New York Times (1/21, A27, Swarns, 1.16M) reports Brownback, "declaring himself a proud conservative before a crowd of cheering supporters waving American flags," announced his candidacy in Topeka. Brownback, "an evangelical Protestant turned Roman Catholic and a former Kansas agriculture secretary, said he would focus on reviving faith and families in America; combating abortion, poverty and wasteful government spending; opposing same-sex marriage; and revamping Social Security and the federal tax system."

The Washington Post (1/21, A8, Mosk, 690K) says the "son of a rural Kansas farmer" has "become a leader among religious conservatives in Congress." He "acknowledged being little known beyond his home state. A Washington Post-ABC News poll released yesterday shows he is supported by 1 percent of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. He was also unlucky to announce his candidacy on the same day" as Clinton. The Los Angeles Times/AP(1/21) reports says the "favorite of the religious right" is "now in a battle against better-known rivals for the GOP nomination." CNN.com (1/20, Johnson) and the Web site of The Hill (1/20, Marre) also reported on Brownback's candidacy.

On CNN (1/20), correspondent Candy Crowley said, "Talking to locals around here and indeed talking to the senator, they said, look, he's been in some races where we have totally written him off, and the fact of the matter is he's come back, including 1996, when he ran for Bob Dole's seat. So he's seen uphill battles before. He sees this as just another one. He's a conservative. He says he believes most of the country is. He thinks this will be a competition of ideas. We all like to think that when we're starting out. So nonetheless, he is on the road, and believes he's got a shot at it."

DOJ_NMG_0119409

McCain Faces Trouble From Arizona Conservative Foes. The Arizona Republic (1/21, Nowicki) reports, "On the national stage, Sen. John McCain is a political star and a front-runner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. But back home, he faces some vocal critics in his own party who seem determined to derail his White House chances." McCain supporters such as Arizona GOP Chairman Matt Salmon "are fuming about the latest stunt to embarrass McCain: a presidential 'straw poll' that found McCain coming in fourth." Rep. Duncan Hunter, "a little-known congressman," won, followed by Mitt Romney and Newt Gingrich. Straw polls "at political events are a fairly common way to informally gauge support for a candidate or an idea. Some Republicans called this one a sham orchestrated to hurt McCain. Others acknowledged irregularities with the way the survey was conducted but defended it as a legitimate expression of grass-roots dissatisfaction with McCain."

Florida Journalist Says 2008 Jeb Bush Presidential Bid Still Possible. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/21, B1, 690K) S.V. Dáte, Tallahassee bureau chief for the Palm Beach Post and author of "Jeb: America's Next Bush," considers that if Jeb Bush has been elected president in 2000, "Tuesday would have marked his sixth State of the Union address -- and it might have been his best yet. The nation is in great shape, President Jeb Bush would have reported: record tax cuts propelling the economy to greater heights; a revolutionary school-vouchers program for the first time granting low-income parents real education choices; and, five years after the capture of Osama bin Laden, the final 20,000 U.S. troops returning home from Iraq." Dáte adds, "I've covered Jeb Bush for eight years as a state capital reporter, and I'm convinced that he remains the GOP conservative wing's best hope for a post-Iraq comeback. And his own political ambitions burn as brightly as ever. Perhaps 2012 or 2016 or -- why not? -- maybe even 2008, if things break right. … Should John McCain or Rudolph W. Giuliani or Mitt Romney fail to build a dominating presence by mid-summer, there is probably only one Republican who could come in at such a late date and still build an effective organization and a powerful fundraising machine in a matter of weeks: Jeb Bush."

Possible GOP Senate Retirements In 2008 Considered. The Washington Post (1/21, A2, 690K) takes a look at Republican senators in addition to Wayne Allard who are "contemplating calling it quits" in 2008. The Post says "the betting" is that Thad Cochran, Larry Craig, and Elizabeth Dole will run, and that Pete Domenici and Chuck Hagel will retire. On Sen. John Warner, the Post pegs the betting as "slight tilt to retire."

Clinton, Carter Establishing Alternative Baptist Coalition. The Washington Post (1/21, A3, Cooperman, 690K) reports former presidents Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton "are leading an effort to forge dozens of small and medium-size, black and white Baptist organizations into a robust coalition that would serve as a counterweight to the conservative Southern Baptist Convention. The giant SBC "has long dominated the political, theological and social landscape among Baptists" and "has also been closely aligned with the Republican Party. The new coalition, which is Carter's brainchild, would give moderate Baptists a stronger collective voice and could provide Democrats with greater entree into the Baptist community. But Carter and other organizers are trying to walk a fine line, insisting that the alliance is not directly political while touting its potential to recast the role of religion in the public square."

"Safe" Correspondents' Dinner Pick Provokes Minor Controversy. The Washington Post (1/21, D1, Farhi, 690K) reports, "The White House press corps last week found itself embroiled in controversy -- a controversy over its efforts to avoid controversy at an event whose guests include President Bush. Stung by criticism that comedian Stephen Colbert went too far last year in his remarks at the White House Correspondents' Association annual dinner, the group announced last week that it had lined up a different kind of entertainer for its next dinner on April 21: impersonator Rich Little. The choice elicited two general reactions: Who? And why?"

Ex-Senator Smathers Dies. The Washington Post (1/21, C7, 690K) reports, "George A. Smathers, 93, a former Democratic senator from Florida who forged friendships with presidents, waged war against communism, resisted civil rights legislation and was an early voice warning against Fidel Castro's rise to power in Cuba, died Jan. 20. … Mr. Smathers was among a new breed of congressmen -- including John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon -- who arrived on Capitol Hill in the late 1940s and were shaped by their experience in World War II. Mr. Smathers used his during more than two decades in Washington to focus on international issues and to fight communism."

Key Palestinian Unity Meeting Delayed. The AP (1/21, Karam) reports, "Key talks on forming a Palestinian unity government and ending deadly infighting were canceled Saturday night, dimming expectations for a planned meeting between" President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal. One Hamas leader "said further preliminary negotiations were needed to resolve differences over forming a coalition government before [Abbas and Mashaal] could meet. He did not elaborate." The AP says "there had been hopes that the meeting — the first between Abbas and Mashaal since July 2005 — could end the yearlong political deadlock," and adds, "The thorniest issues are control of the two factions' security forces and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist."

DOJ_NMG_0119410

"Charismatic" Fatah Lawmaker Profiled. Under the headline, "Lawmaker's Tough Talk Rouses Fatah Faithful, the Los Angeles Times (1/21, Ellingwood, 850K) profiles Mohammed Dahlan. "The former Palestinian security chief gained a reputation for having an iron hand during a crackdown against Hamas a decade ago. Now he again is at the forefront of his Fatah movement's conflict with the radical Islamist group." His "tough talk generated an exhilarating shiver among many members of the once-dominant Fatah movement, still struggling to regain its balance a year after losing parliamentary elections to Hamas, and renewed speculation among Palestinians over Dahlan's ambitions." He "dismisses" the "speculation" about seeking the presidency, "even though he has helped fuel it by assuming a higher profile after many months in the background. Poised and always impeccably groomed, Dahlan lately has appeared nearly inseparable from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, also of Fatah, with whom he has had an up-and-down relationship."

UN Boosts Protection In Kosovo For Today's Serbian Election. The Washington Times (1/21, Phillips, 88K) reports the US "has moved troops to northern Kosovo to protect the Serbian minority ahead of elections today in Serbia." Two American platoons, one Austrian, and one Georgian platoon "were deployed in late December for a month to a NATO camp at Leposavic, close to the border with Serbia." That "redeployment was part of NATO's plan for rapid intervention aimed at providing security for about 100,000 Serbs living in Kosovo." The Times adds, "After the election, Kosovo is expected to be offered limited independence from Belgrade."

Under the headline, "Kosovo Looms Over Serbian Vote," the Los Angeles Times (1/21, Rubin, 850K) links the impending UN decision on Kosovo's final status to today's vote. "The imminent loss of the province has been a central issue in the parliamentary campaign. Serbian politicians, intent on proving their loyalty to the country's traditional identity, have pulled out the stops to convince the world that the province should remain within their nation's borders." Describing modern Kosovo, the Times notes, "Landlocked, poor and now populated mostly by ethnic Albanians hostile to Serbs, it nonetheless has become a symbol of Serbia's image of itself as a righteous nation, a beacon of the Orthodox Christian world."

Czech Premier Says US Seeks Missile Defense Radar Base. The AP (1/20, Janicek) carries a statement by Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek that "the United States has asked the Czech Republic to host a radar base that would be part of a global missile defense system, drawing a warning from Russia of retaliatory actions." The Bush Administration "declined comment" on the remarks, but the US "has been negotiating with Poland and the Czech Republic, both former communist states now in NATO, as it explores setting up missile defense sites in Eastern Europe." The AP adds, "The U.S. request that the Czech Republic host only an X-band radar facility could indicate Washington is considering putting launchers for anti-missile missiles in Poland."

Arrest Made In Turkish Journalist's Murder. The New York Times (1/21, Arsu, 1.16M) and other media report the arrest of Ogun Samast, a Turkish teenager, in the Friday assassination of Turkish-Armenian newspaper editor Hrant Dink. Samast "was captured in Samsun, a Black Sea port, after his father recognized his images from the surveillance video and notified the police in Trabzon, their hometown." Police reports indicate Samast admitted murdering Dink. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan "praised the efforts of the security forces Saturday and expressed satisfaction that an arrest had been made before Mr. Dink's funeral on Tuesday."

Chinese Test Said To Embolden Critics, Supporters Of US Space Weapons. In its "Week in Review" section, the New York Times (1/21, WK3, Broad, 1.16M) analyzes domestic US reaction to China's test of an anti-satellite missile. "The nation's star warriors, frustrated that their plans to arm the heavens went nowhere for two decades despite more than $100 billion in blue-sky research, felt a shiver of hope last week with news" of the test. "Having long warned of the Chinese threat, they now said their fears were vindicated and expressed optimism for their own projects." However, the Times notes, "the prospect of a new arms race in space is also energizing an opposition, including arms control supporters and fiscal conservatives alarmed at the rising costs of the Iraq war." Opponents believe that "an unfettered arms race could hurt the United States more than any other nation," but "that logic has not persuaded the Star Wars advocates, who say the United States needs to protect its huge investment in space satellites by being ahead of anyone else in shooting such devices out of the sky."

Vatican's "Measured" Statement Said To Open Door To Chinese Relations. The New York Times

DOJ_NMG_0119411

(1/21, A8, Fisher, 1.16M) notes the Vatican "issued a measured statement on Saturday on its future relations with China, saying it wanted a 'respectful and constructive dialogue' to rebuild diplomatic ties but still noting the 'suffering' of Chinese Catholics." Vatican leaders have been engaged in "high-level talks…on rebuilding relations with China." The Times says Pope Benedict XVI and "Chinese officials have expressed a desire to restore diplomatic ties broken in 1951 when the Communist government took over. But any concrete steps were frozen after the official Chinese church, which answers to the government, appointed several bishops last year without the Vatican's consent." Yesterday's statement "was even in its tone," and the Times adds the "reconciliatory tone seemed aimed at encouraging more talks with the government." The Washington Times (1/21, Phillips, 88K) has a report on Vatican politics on its front page.

Hong Kong Acts To Stem Births By Mainland Chinese. The New York Times (1/21, A3, Bradsher, 1.16M) describes the impact of "an influx of mainland Chinese women who go to great lengths to make sure that their babies are born in Hong Kong." Beginning February 1, "pregnant women from the mainland will have to pay $5,000 for their hospital care before they are even allowed to enter Hong Kong… Under rules the government announced Tuesday evening, immigration officers will be instructed to turn back any mainlander who appears to be at least seven months pregnant and has not paid." The Times says that "policy is expected to produce tearful showdowns at border points, and is already provoking an acrimonious debate in Hong Kong over what it means to be a citizen of" the territory.

Thai Authorites Arrest 15 In Bombing Probe. The New York Times (1/21, A12, Mydans, Fuller, 1.16M) carries Thai police statements that authorities "detained 15 people, including some military officers, in connection with a string of bombings that killed three people and disrupted celebrations on New Year's Eve." The operation involved "nearly 100 police officers and soldiers" searching "18 locations in and around the capital," and the Times notes the "arrests were made under martial law imposed after a coup four months ago that ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra." Also yesterday, Thaksin "said that he did not want to return to Thailand if his presence would cause division or unrest and that he had no plans to become involved in politics."

Key Somali Warlord Backs Interim Government. The Washington Post (1/21, A21, 690K) notes "feared" Somali rebel leader Mohamed Dheere, "the last major warlord to withhold support from Somalia's government, surrendered his weapons and militiamen on Saturday -- a boost for a fledgling leadership that still faces threats of guerrilla attacks from the Islamic movement that fled the capital." Dheere "gave the army chief 23 trucks mounted with heavy weapons and ordered 220 of his fighters to report for training at government camps." The Post notes that "fears of an Islamic insurgency grew following an ambush Saturday morning on a convoy of Ethiopian troops in Mogadishu. The Ethiopians returned fire, killing a man and a woman on the side of the road."

Botswana Court Ruling Allows Bushmen To Live Inside Kalahari Reserve. The Washington Post (1/21, A15, Timberg, 690K) examines the initial impact of a Botswana court ruling that gives traditional Bushmen access to their ancestral homes within a protected game park. The "landmark court ruling" grants "the traditional hunter-gatherers rights to land they and their ancestors occupied for thousands of years." The government announced Friday "that all Bushmen, whether named in the suit or not, were free to enter the game reserve while the government developed a new permanent policy on the issue."

Paramilitary Alliance Scandal Could Implicate Colombia's Uribe. The New York Times (1/21, A15, Romero, 1.16M) reports the Colombian government, "the largest recipient of American aid outside the Middle East, has found itself ensnared in a widening scandal as revelations surface of a secret alliance" between some of President Alvaro Uribe's "most prominent political supporters and paramilitary death squads." Two recent revelations "have injected fresh detail into a slow-burning scandal that has caused Colombia's elite political class to shudder in recent weeks." Sen. Alvara Araujo, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo Araujo, is "under investigation for collaborating with militias," and one paramilitary leader's testimony claims "that militias pressured people to vote for the president in 2002, when Mr. Uribe was first elected." The Times adds, "Although the scandal has emerged as the most pressing political challenge to Mr. Uribe's presidency, his approval ratings remain high."

Brazilian Pipeline Projects Said To Seek Economic, Social Balance. The New York Times (1/21, A14, Rohter, 1.16M) examines the challenges of extracting gas and oil from Brazil's Amazon. "Over the years, Petrobras, Brazil's state-controlled oil company, has invested more than $7 billion in Amazon exploration and development, and in 1986 it made a major find here. But only now — after a seemingly endless sequence of geographic, logistical, environmental and political challenges were overcome — is the first in what is intended as a series of pipelines finally being constructed." Noting that "there was initially strong resistance to the pipeline from local people, environmental and indigenous groups and archaeologists," the Times says, "rather than steamrolling the opponents and skeptics," Petrobras "chose to woo them. The two million residents of Amazonas State have been promised economic benefits that have contributed to the project's $1.15 billion price, and scientists and environmentalists were consulted about how to minimize damage to the jungle that blankets the state." One pipeline project "is being built with a requirement that two-thirds of the labor force be hired from the population already in the region." Also, that pipeline "will include spurs to seven smaller towns on its way to" its terminus, meaning "diesel fuel will no longer have to be sent in by boat for local consumption, blackouts will diminish and businesses can be promised regular supplies of cheap, clean energy."

DOJ_NMG_0119412

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Copter Crash, Attacks Kill 19 U.S. Troops In Iraq."
"Web's Power To Shape Politics Grows."
"Interracial Attacks Worry L.A. Leaders."
"Diabetes For Fun And Profit."

New York Times:
"Pakistani Role Seen In Taliban Surge At Border."
"Clinton Enters '08 Field, Fueling Race For Money."
"Bush To Urge New Tax Plan For Health Care Coverage."
"Refugees Find Hostility And Hope On Soccer Field."
"Helicopter Crash Claims 13 On Deadly Day For U.S. In Iraq."
"New Orleans Of Future May Stay Half Its Old Size."

Washington Post:
"Hillary Clinton Opens Presidential Bid."
"20 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq."
"Influence Of Developers, Allies Runs Deep."
"Embattled, Bush Held To Plan To Salvage Iraq."
"For Democratic Advisers, A Season Of Tough Choices."
"D.C. Teen Is Killed At U Street Area Nightclub."

Washington Times:
"'I'm In To Win' White House, Hillary Says."
"Passport Prerequisite."
"Benedict Seen As Isolated At Vatican."
"O'Malley Holds Power To Alter Top Md. Court."
"U.S. Copter Crash Claims 13 In Iraq."

Detroit Free Press:
"Chilling At TigerFest."
"Plymouth Parties With Ice."
"Pistons Cruise As Artest, Kings Show Little Fight."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"'I'm In To Win' Clinton Says."
"What Is Too Much Child Support?"
"Fulton DA To Look Into '85 Rape."
"Making Millions From Scratch-Offs."
"13 Dead In U.S. Copter Crash."
"Report: Missing Boy Met Police."

Dallas Morning News:
"Dream Home Becomes Legal Nightmare."
"Horse Meat Ban Is Upheld."
"Cartel Leader Handed To U.S."
"FB Schools Have Different View Of Immigrants."
"Restaurants Thrive In Bishop District."
"Clinton Joins Race: 'I'm In To Win.'"
"6 Killed In Iraq Bus Bombing."
"Not-Quite-Dead Duck Rescued From Refrigerator."

Houston Chronicle:
"Bribery Sting Snares HPD Officer."
"Continental Pilot Dies After Falling Ill In Cockpit."
"Bp Workers Ill-Trained For Dangers, Report Says."
"Rockets Run Out Of Steam, Lose To Nuggets."
"Design-A-City Contest Sparks Career Aspirations."
"Upgrade Of HPD Radios May Wait 5 Years."
"Mars Platform Surpasses Pre-Katrina Oil Levels."
"Driver Charged In Needville Police Chief's Death."
"U.S. Loses 20 On One Of Deadliest Days In Iraq."
"Minnesota Man Plummets 16 Stories, Survives."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Clinton Presidential Race; Clinton Campaign Strategy; Violence In Iraq; Bush's War Plans In Iraq.
CBS: Clinton Presidential Race; Other Presidential Hopefuls; Violence In Iraq.
NBC: Clinton Presidential Race; Other Presidential Hopefuls; Violence In Iraq; Rare Meeting At White House.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:
PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule. President and Mrs. Bush will overnight at Camp David.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: O'CONNOR CONFERENCE _ The eighth annual Cardinal O'Connor Conference on Life will be held at Georgetown University. The event gathers more than 500 high school and college students from around the country in advance of the annual March for Life demonstration on the National Mall each January. Location: Healy Hall's Gaston

DOJ_NMG_0119413

Auditorium, Georgetown University. Contacts: Bridget Bowes, 412-965-4993

ROE V. WADE ANNIVERSARY EVENTS _ Highlights: 8 a.m. - 5 p.m. The American Life League holds a series of briefings with pro-life leaders. Holiday Inn on Capitol Hill. Contact: Amber Dolle, 540-903-9572 9 a.m. Prayer and demonstration. In front of the Supreme Court. Contact: Amber Dolle, 540-903-9572. 1:30 p.m. - 5 p.m. Second session of the March for Life Convention. Hyatt Regency Hotel on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW. Contact: 202-543-3377

TRANSPORTATION RESEARCH BOARD _ The Transportation Research Board holds its 86th Annual Meeting at three Washington hotels. Some 10,000 transportation professionals from around the world are expected to attend. Location: Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Road NW; Omni Shoreham, 2500 Calvert St. NW; and Washington Hilton, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW. Contacts: Russell Houston, 202-334-3252

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0119414

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 22, 2007 8:16 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, January 21, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070121.pdf; dojclips070121.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Help US Close Guantanamo, Say MPs (BBC) 4
U.K. Panel Urges Guantanamo Alternative (AP) 5
A Retreat On Wiretapping? (WP) 5
Retreat And Cheat (NYT) 6
Editorial: Legal Eavesdropping, Or Surveillance Gone Wild? (SACBEE) 7
Editorial: Judicious Change To Wiretapping (GRPRESS) 8
Our View Intelligence Oversight Should Confirm Judges' Role In Wiretap Orders (WILNJ) 8
Editorial: Legally Secret (HARTC) 9
Editorial: Unanswered Questions (HC) 9
Editorial: Balance Point (ABJ) 10
Editorial: Timing Raises Questions (LVS) 10
No More Warrantless Spying (OCR) 11
Preserving Civil Liberties (MH) 11
Steve Chapman: Never Mind What We Said About Spying (CHIT) 12

Homeland Response:

Passport Prerequisite (WT) 13
New Orleans Of Future May Stay Half Its Old Size (NYT) 15

War News:

Embattled, Bush Held To Plan To Salvage Iraq (WP) 17
Bush Administration, Under Criticism, Warns Iraq To Fulfill Its End Of The Bargain (NYT) 20
Vietnam Surfaces On Both Sides Of Iraq Debate (LAT) 21
Bush's History Lesson (BOS) 23
Lying Like It's 2003 (NYT) 24
A Chance For Unity On Iraq (WP) 26
20 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (WP) 27
Helicopter Crash Claims 13 On Deadly Day For U.S. In Iraq (NYT) 28
U.S. Copter Crash Claims 13 In Iraq (WT/AP) 29
At Least 19 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (LAT) 31
U.S.: Brigade Soon Ready For Baghdad (AP) 33
Kurdish Troops From North Deserting (BOS/MCT) 33
Taming Iraq's "Wild West" (LAT) 34
Army Says Improper Orders By Colonel Led To 4 Deaths (NYT) 36
Sunni-Shiite Fight Flares In Broadcasts (WP) 37
Banned Station Broadcasts Voice Of Rebels In Iraq (NYT) 38
Rice Rules Out Talks With Syria, Iran (AFP) 40
The Clock May Be Ticking On Iran's Fiery President (LAT) 40
Impatience On Iran Carries A Price (WP) 41
Hang Up! Tehran Is Calling (NYT) 42
Pakistani Role Seen In Taliban Surge At Border (NYT) 43
Pakistan Denies It Harbors Taliban (WP) 46
Afghan Women's Quiet Revolution Hangs By A Thread (LAT) 48

DOJ:

Editorial: A Case Of Justice That Stinks (ROT) 51

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutor In Apple Case Joins Law Firm (BLOOM) 52
Departures Could Slow Option Probe Two In U.S. Attorney's Office Were First To File Charges For Backdating Stock Grants (SFC) 53
Big Game? An Enron Survivor Hunts For Riches (NYT) 54
Why Backdated Options Might Be Contagious (NYT) 59

Criminal Law:

Calif. Zone Tops In Porn Arrests (FRESBEE) 60
Violent Crime Falls Sharply In Providence (PROJO) 61
WHO IS R. LINDLEY DeVECCHIO? (HTRIB) 62

Antitrust:

Some Speculate On Future Of P-I, Purchase By Black (SEATIMES) 65

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Blueprint To Beautify, Restore Yosemite Tangled Up In Court (SFC) 66

One Tribal Family Lost Two Members In Unsolved Cases (YHR) 69
Blinding Ourselves In Space (NYT) 70

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Officials Laud Transfer Of Mexican Drug Suspects (WP) 71
Reputed Drug Lords Extradited To U.S. (WT/AP) 72
Mexico Sends 4 Kingpins To Face Trial In The U.S. (NYT) . 72
Cartel Leader Handed To U.S. (DMN) 73
Mexico's Extraditions Make A Point (LAT) 75
Gonzales Lauds Mexico's Extradition Of 15 To U.S. (SDUT) 77
Extraditing Reputed Drug Lords Earns Mexico Praise From U.S. (AP) 77

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Announce Health Care Tax Incentives (WT) 78
Bush Seeks Shift In Health Coverage (WP) 79
Bush To Propose Health Insurance Changes (AP) 80
To Expand Health Coverage, Bush Pitches Tax Code Change (LAT) 82
Bush To Urge New Tax Plan For Health Care Coverage (NYT) 83
Senate Newcomer Is Designated To Encounter President Bush Yet Again (NYT) 85
Energy Independence (WP) 86
Bush's Fourth Quarter (LAT) 87
Pragmatic, Up To A Point (NYT) 88
Fragile Hopes For Bipartisan Rescue Of Social Security (NYT) 89
Business Faces New Pressures On The Hill (WP) 90
The Equality Engineer (WP) 91
Democrats Seek To Avert Abortion Clashes (WP) 92
The Socialist Senator (NYT) 94
Mr. Chips Goes To Congress (NYT) 101
The Cause Bush Did Justice To (WP) 102

Other News:

States Act On Congressional Goals (WP) 104
Hillary Clinton Opens Presidential Bid (WP) 106
Clinton Enters '08 Field, Fueling Race For Money (NYT) 108
Announcement Sends Race Into High Gear (NYT) 110
Clinton Joins 2008 Race For President (LAT) 111
"I'm In To Win" White House, Hillary Says (WT) 114
Clinton Joins Race: "I'm In To Win" (DMN) 115
Republicans Party Over Prospect Of Her As Nominee (NYDN) 116
Hillary Clinton Eyes Presidency (CHIT) 117
Clinton Gives Her Answer To Voters: I'm In (BOS) 119
Clinton Announces 2008 Presidential Bid (NSDY) 120
N.Y. Dems Cheer Clinton Announcement, GOP Says, "We Told You So" (AP) 121
Candidate Clinton Faces Tough Battle For Nation's Favor (SFC) 122
California Considers Moving Primary To February (NYT/AP) 124
Clinton: "I'm In To Win" White House (AP) 125
Can Hillary Clinton Win In 2008? (BBC) 127
Hillary Clinton Launches White House Bid: "I'm In" (CNN) 128
Sen. Clinton Throws Hat Into Ring (HILL) 129
Throwing Her Hat On The Web (WP) 129
Tops In Political Toolbox: Internet (LAT) 130
With Boots Or Suits, Candidates Carefully Craft First Impressions (WP) 131
Far From A Hindrance, Gender Could Be Key For Clinton (WP) 132
The Reliable Source (WP) 133
Hill's Bid Her-Storic: Feminists (NYPOST) 134
Race May Revolve Around Clintons (CHIT) 134
Clinton Assembles A Seasoned Team (WP) 135
In A Field Of Heavy Hitters, No Sure Thing (NYT) 136
For Democratic Advisers, A Season Of Tough Choices (WP) 138
Hillary Runs For The White House As "new Thatcher" (LONT) 139
Aides: Clinton Plans Weekend Swing Through Iowa (AP) 140
Kansas Senator Announces Bid For Presidency (NYT) 141
Brownback Announces Presidential Bid (WP) 141
Sen. Brownback Joins Presidential Race (LAT/AP) 142
Conservative Kansan Starts White House Run (CNN) 143
Brownback Formalizes White House Bid (HILL) 144
McCain Contends With Vocal Critics (AR) 144
What Would Jeb Do? (WP) 146
Gut Check (WP) 149
Carter, Clinton Seek To Bring Together Moderate Baptists (WP) 149
With Rich Little, Press Corps Is Assured A Nice Impression (WP) 151
George A. Smathers, 93; Former Florida Senator (WP/AP) .. 152
Talks On Palestinian Unity Postponed (AP) 153
Lawmaker's Tough Talk Rouses Fatah Faithful (LAT) 154
U.S. Troops To Protect Serbs In Kosovo (WT) 156
Kosovo Looms Over Serbian Vote (LAT) 157
PM: U.S. Wants Base In Czech Republic (AP) 158
Turkish Police Arrest Teenage Suspect In Editor's Killing (NYT) 159

DOJ_NMG_0119417

Look Up! Is It A Threat? Or A Plea For A Ban? (NYT) 160
Vatican Urges "Dialogue" With China To Rebuild Ties (NYT) 161
Benedict Seen As Isolated At Vatican (WT) 162
Hong Kong Tries To Stop Mainlander Baby Boom (NYT) ...163
Thai Army Officers Held In Bombings (NYT).....165
Major Warlord Surrenders Arms To Somali Government
(WP/AP) 166
Expelled Bushmen Return Home (WP).....166
Colombian Government Is Ensnared In A Paramilitary
Scandal (NYT).....167
Vast Pipelines In Amazon Face Challenges Over Protecting
Rights And Rivers (NYT) 169

DOJ_NMG_0119418

TERRORISM NEWS:

Help US Close Guantanamo, Say MPs (BBC)

BBC.com, January 21, 2007

MPs who have visited Guantanamo Bay have called on Britain and the international community to do more to help the US close the camp.

Seven Foreign Affairs Committee members visited the detention centre for "enemy combatants" in Cuba in September.

In a report they were critical of the conditions there, but said many inmates posed a threat and the world needed to find a "longer term solution".

Opposition MPs and human rights groups called the report "disappointing".

'Real threat'

The Guantanamo Bay facility was set up at a US base in Cuba after the invasion of Afghanistan in 2002.

The international community as a whole needs to shoulder its responsibility in finding a longer-term solution

MPs' report The camp once held 750 inmates, including several British citizens. A total of 395 prisoners are currently being held there, including nine British residents, whom the government says it is not obliged to try to bring home.

The report by the seven MPs said many of those detained presented a "real threat to public safety", and said all states were under an obligation to protect their citizens and others.

But at present only the US was doing so, and "the international community as a whole needs to shoulder its responsibility in finding a longer-term solution," it said.

The chairman of the committee, Mike Gapes, told BBC News: "The problem is if you closed it straight away what do you do with the people that are there?

"Some of them no doubt could be released - sent back to there country of origin and be of no threat to anyone. But there are people there that are dangerous people...

"The international community as a whole needs to look at finding a longer-term solution."

24-hour lighting

The MPs spent only one day at the camp and had no direct access to detainees.

Their report says food was plentiful, medical care good and the facilities broadly comparable with a British maximum security prison.

But they said the camp did not meet UK guidelines for recreation and education facilities nor for access to the media, lawyers and the outside world.

One area apparently was closed for repair after detainees had been found dismantling the plumbing to make weapons.

Electric lighting was kept on 24 hours a day. Some detainees were reported to be clinically obese; two were being force-fed and 20% had some psychiatric condition.

The MPs said prisoner abuse had "almost certainly" happened there but the added that this was "unlikely to be taking place now".

And they said the government was right to "stick to its established policy of not accepting consular responsibility for non-British nationals".

'Missed opportunity'

Liberal Democrat MP Sarah Teather, who represents a 10-year-old constituent whose father is being held at the camp, said the committee appeared to have been given "the VIP antiseptic tour".

"The committee were given no direct access to prisoners, and they do not appear to have taken evidence either from former detainees, or lawyers or families of current detainees," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0119419

Tory MP Andrew Tyrie, who chairs the all party Parliamentary group on extraordinary rendition, said the report did not address the main issue, "which is whether US detention policy, whether in Guantanamo or elsewhere, is making the US, UK and the West more secure or less".

Amnesty International said the report was a "missed opportunity".

"We would have liked to have seen the committee unequivocally backing Amnesty International's long-standing call for Guantanamo to be closed immediately," said the organisation's UK director Kate Allen.

"We do not share the committee's apparent confidence that abuse is unlikely to be taking place now," she added.

Clive Stafford Smith, legal director of charity Reprieve which represents 38 prisoners at the base, said the report was "full of factual errors" and largely based on a "show tour".

U.K. Panel Urges Guantanamo Alternative (AP)

By David Stringer, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 21, 2007

A panel of British lawmakers urged the government Sunday to work with the United States to develop an alternative to holding terror suspects at Guantanamo — aiming to speed up the closure of the much-criticized U.S. military prison.

The Commons Foreign Affairs Select Committee released a report that also called for an overhaul of the Geneva Conventions and suggesting Prime Minister Tony Blair lead efforts to update the international standards to reflect the challenge of terrorism.

"The international community as a whole needs to shoulder its responsibility in finding a longer-term solution" to the indefinite detention of terrorist suspects at Guantanamo.

"We recommend that the government engage actively with the U.S. administration and with the international community to assist the process of closing Guantanamo as soon as may be consistent with the overriding need to protect the public from terrorist threats," the report said.

About 395 foreign men currently held at Guantanamo are allegedly linked to al-Qaida or the Taliban. Human rights groups have condemned the U.S. for operating the prison, where most detainees have been held for years without being charged.

The U.S. government has blocked their access to U.S. courts, claiming it has the authority to detain them indefinitely to keep America safe. The military says many of those imprisoned provide interrogators with information about terror networks. The U.S. has operated the prison for five years.

Nine British nationals held at the facility had been released by January 2005, but the committee said it believed another nine former British residents remained at Guantanamo. Human rights lawyers have said they were aware of eight ex-British residents being detained.

Seven panel members visited Guantanamo in September. Though the image of inmates "kneeling in the dirt, shackled and hooded" was no longer accurate, the report said Guantanamo failed to achieve minimum British standards "on access to exercise and recreation, to lawyers, and to the outside world through educational facilities and the media."

In October, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said Guantanamo was "unacceptable in terms of human rights" and "ineffective in terms of counterterrorism."

Blair has gone no further than calling the camp an "anomaly" that sooner or later must end.

The committee called on Blair and his successor to help change the Geneva Convention that governs treatment of prisoners of war to "deal more satisfactorily with asymmetric warfare, with international combatants and with the status of irregular combatants."

President Bush has said the Geneva Conventions do not apply to Guantanamo detainees, who were classified as "enemy combatants" — a status that accords them fewer rights than prisoners of war.

Britain's Foreign Office said it would not comment on the report until a formal response had been sent to the committee.

A Retreat On Wiretapping? (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119420

WHEN THE Bush administration announced that it had belatedly put its warrantless wiretapping program under court supervision, its attitude was like that of a traffic officer trying to hurry along bystanders at an accident scene: "Move right along, folks, nothing to look at here." The administration would like Congress, under its new management, to abandon its efforts to dislodge details about the program's operations or to craft legislation to provide a legal framework. Lawmakers don't seem inclined to simply go away, nor should they.

It may be that the Justice Department has devised what Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called a "creative" way to bring the surveillance program under the procedures of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), one that preserves the "speed and agility" that the administration wants while ensuring adequate judicial review, not simply broad-brush, "programmatic" approval for warrantless wiretapping. If so, that would be good news. It's what we have been saying should happen since the program was revealed more than a year ago -- even as the administration insisted that such a move was neither practically feasible nor legally required.

But there is no way for lawmakers to make a determination about the program on the basis of information they have and every reason for them to be skeptical of the administration's assurances, given its previous intransigence. Those who've been briefed on the program have said they still have questions, and they expressed concerns. Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) said that it "doesn't have the protections for civil liberties" she believes necessary.

The special court that oversees the FISA law has said that it is willing, with the administration's approval, to provide a copy of the order under which it is operating. But Mr. Gonzales was anything but reassuring last week when members of the Senate Judiciary Committee pressed for access to the relevant documents. "Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us decisions that you've publicly announced?" said Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) "Are we a little 'Alice in Wonderland' here?"

A little? Traveling down the rabbit hole with Mr. Gonzales is an endlessly frustrating journey, light on details, heavy on unsubstantiated assurances. "So could you give us some idea of the breadth of these warrants?" Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) asked the attorney general. "What I can tell you, Senator, is that they meet the legal requirements under FISA," Mr. Gonzales replied. Maybe that kind of conclusory non-answer would suffice when Republicans were in the majority. In fact, no senator of either party should stand for it.

Retreat And Cheat (NYT)

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program was once deemed so vital to national security that it could not be subjected to judicial review. Last week, the White House said it was doing just that.

In 2005, the White House would not even comment on news reports about the C.I.A.'s prisons because Americans' safety depended on their being kept secret. In 2006, Mr. Bush held a photo-op to announce that he was keeping them open.

The administration has repeatedly insisted that it was essential to the American way of life for Mr. Bush to be able to imprison foreigners without trial or legal counsel. Now the administration claims it was trying to bring those detainees to trial all along but was stymied by white-shoe lawyers.

By now, this is a familiar pattern: First, Mr. Bush and his aides say his actions are so vital to national security that to even report on them — let alone question them — lends comfort to the terrorists. Then, usually when his decisions face scrutiny from someone other than a compliant Republican Congress, the president seems to compromise.

Behind this behavior are at least two dynamics, both of them disturbing.

The first is that the policies Mr. Bush is trying so hard to hide have little, if anything, to do with real national security issues — and everything to do with a campaign, spearheaded by Vice President Dick Cheney, to break the restraints on presidential power imposed after Vietnam and Watergate. And there is much less than meets the eye to Mr. Bush's supposed concessions.

Generally, they mask the fact that he either got what he wanted from Congress or found a way to add some other veneer of legitimacy to his lawless behavior. The campaign to expand presidential power goes on, at the expense of American values.

Mr. Bush's aides don't try very hard to hide it. The day the shift on domestic wiretapping was announced, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave a speech in which he sneered at the idea of allowing judges to review national security policies. The next day, he was in the Senate refusing to turn over the agreement that he said would provide judicial review for the wiretapping. And his lawyers were in court arguing that a lawsuit over the warrantless eavesdropping should be dropped because Mr. Bush said he would stop the operation.

We don't know exactly what agreement the White House made with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court about eavesdropping. But there is evidence that Mr. Bush got some broad approval for a wiretapping "program" rather than the individual warrants required by law. Because the court works in secret, the public may never know whether Mr. Bush really is complying with the law.

Nor is there likely to be an explanation of why the White House could not have sought the court's approval in the first place. The White House's claim that the process is too cumbersome doesn't ring true. The law already allows the government to wiretap first and then ask for a warrant within three days. The real reason is almost certainly that the imperial presidency had no desire to share power even with the most secret part of the judiciary.

Why else would the president have turned down more than one offer from Congress to amend the 1978 wiretapping law after 9/11 to make getting warrants easier and faster than the three-day rule?

For that matter, why did the White House initially refuse to work with senior Republican lawmakers to create a legal court system for the Guantánamo detainees? Instead, Mr. Bush ordered the creation of kangaroo courts, expanding presidential authority at the expense of Congress and the judiciary, and at the expense of justice.

The Republican-led Congress (with the help of cowed Democrats) refused to hold Mr. Bush and his presidency to account on any of these issues. The Military Commissions Act, passed by Congress just before the midterm elections last year, gave Mr. Bush a pass on what he had already done with the detainees outside the law, and did not stop him from jailing non-Americans indefinitely without due process. Congress absolved American intelligence agents of past abuses of prisoners and approved future abuses, and Mr. Bush happily announced that the C.I.A. prisons would stay open.

There are signs, from people like Senator Patrick Leahy, the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that the Democrats will be tougher than the Republicans on these issues. The eavesdropping program and Mr. Bush's secret deal with the surveillance court are a very good place to start.

Editorial: Legal Eavesdropping, Or Surveillance Gone Wild? (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, January 21, 2007

The Senate Judiciary Committee surely had something else in mind when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales dropped by last Thursday to talk about the state of affairs at the Justice Department.

Gonzales provided more details about the department's prosecution of the "Girls Gone Wild" video series than he did about warrantless surveillance. His testimony leaves more questions than it answers and should be considered only Round One of the oversight process on surveillance.

Nothing in the backdrop seems to have changed. While the administration now has gone to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court for warrants, it continues to say that the president has "inherent power" to eavesdrop on Americans and others inside the United States, to search for evidence of terrorist activity without court-approved warrants. In short, the decision to seek warrants could be temporary and applied only as the president chooses.

The earlier decision by Bush to monitor international phone calls and international e-mail messages of people inside the United States without warrants was a major shift in American intelligence-gathering practices -- and a major re-interpretation of the Fourth Amendment's requirements for warrants, based on probable cause, for searches and seizures. With that decision, the Bush administration decided to do an end run around the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. That, enacted in 1978, made it a crime to eavesdrop on Americans without judicial oversight.

After last week's hearing, we still don't know whether the warrants sought by the administration from the FISA court are for surveillance of known phone numbers or known persons, or for dragnet-style data-mining operations of hundreds or thousands of individuals. Normally, the government would seek a FISA warrant for surveillance of a particular suspect's phone calls or e-mails. A congressional staffer told the New York Times that the FISA approvals appear to be for a hybrid of individual warrants and broader approval, whatever that means. Gonzales offered no information or documents to clarify the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0119422

U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, presiding judge of the FISA court, told the Judiciary Committee in a letter that the court would be willing to give lawmakers copies of orders and opinions related to the surveillance program "if the executive and legislative branches reach agreement for access to this material." Gonzales said the decision would have to be the president's.

Clearly, Congress still has a lot to do to determine whether the spying program follows the 1978 law and the Constitution. And Congress and the president will have to be open to negotiating possible adjustments to the 29-year-old law to reflect developments in technology, surveillance and the new realities of terrorism. But this should be non-negotiable: Congress cannot let the president get away with disregarding or rewriting the law and the Constitution at his whim.

A senior administration official told the New York Times that "People ought to take yes for an answer" -- implying that Congress should just accept the executive branch's word that the spying program is all hunky dory now that it has been approved by the FISA court. That's not how checks and balances work.

Editorial: Judicious Change To Wiretapping (GRPRESS)

Grand Rapids Press (MI), January 21, 2007

After resisting for more than a year, the Bush administration is putting its controversial domestic wiretapping program under the jurisdiction of the secret court set up to govern such cases. It's a good course correction. Concerns about terrorism shouldn't give federal intelligence agencies license to eavesdrop on citizens' phone calls and e-mails without court approval or congressional oversight.

The administration now says it will comply with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) and seek warrants from the secret panel of 11 federal judges for its domestic surveillance program, which monitors communications to and from the United States of people with suspected terrorist ties. That is not an unreasonable or onerous requirement.

President Bush waived the warrant requirement shortly after 9/11 in a secret order that didn't become public knowledge until December 2005. The president chose not to seek authority from the special FISA court, contending he had power under other statutes and that the FISA review process is too slow and too cumbersome to meet the technical needs of the eavesdropping program.

The FISA law was a Cold War-era statute designed to track Soviet agents when communication essentially meant office or home telephones. Today's Islamist terrorists operate globally and not just with standard telephones but with the Internet, disposable cell phones, email and fiber-optic networks. But instead of agreeing to amend the surveillance act to meet today's technical challenges, the administration chose to simply ignore it. That was a bad decision.

Advocacy groups filed lawsuits challenging the legality of the surveillance program. U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled that the program was unconstitutional and should be halted. A federal appeals court is scheduled to hear the first appellate argument about the lawfulness of the program in two weeks. That may have prompted the government's about-face.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the Justice Department has worked out an "innovative" arrangement to bring the surveillance program under FISA jurisdiction. He wouldn't elaborate on the specifics to members of the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, so questions remain about what form the new compliance takes. Congressional leaders shouldn't be left in the dark about this new arrangement.

The operational details need not be made public, but congressional leaders or members of the House and Senate Intelligence committees should be thoroughly briefed. What has changed to make the process workable? Does the arrangement require the National Security Agency to seek individual warrants? Or did the court approve of the overall program and grant blanket wiretapping privileges to the NSA?

The issue is not about whether to monitor the communications of suspected terrorists but doing it legally and with proper checks and balances. We all should want that.

Our View Intelligence Oversight Should Confirm Judges' Role In Wiretap Orders (WILNJ)

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, January 21, 2007

So apparently there is a way to do surveillance of intelligence suspects with court oversight after all. For a year, the Bush administration insisted that wartime justified secrecy and executive privileges, regardless of a 1978 law setting up review through a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

DOJ_NMG_0119423

Now, after months of rebuffing congressional negotiations and the threat of investigation, the Justice Department has a method for going to designated judges when it wants to monitor international e-mail and telephone calls given a probably terrorism link.

Skepticism is rife in the Capitol and among civil libertarians, and rightly so. There is only a vague outline of what the new ground rules are that prompted the administration's turn-around.

The Justice Department also is to go before federal court in Cincinnati on Jan. 31 for more arguments on the constitutionality of the Bush's earlier policy.

Congress should look into exactly what is going on. Given this administration's resistance to judicial checks on presidential authority, this adaptation may well be too good to be true.

Editorial: Legally Secret (HARTC)

The Hartford Courant, January 21, 2007

President George W. Bush has substituted one controversial spying program with another.

The old program eavesdropped on American and foreign al-Qaida suspects without the legally required court oversight. The new program? Well, it eavesdrops on the same targets, but now with the required warrants.

Just how broad and loose those warrants are, however - whether they give blanket authority for spying on broad groups of people, for example - are among the important details that nobody outside a small, tight-lipped circle knows.

So much for quelling fears of Big Brother.

The 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act required a warrant from a special court before an American citizen could be wiretapped. The National Security Agency ignored that legality in the domestic wiretapping program it began in 2001. The program was itself a well-kept secret until it was exposed by The New York Times in late 2005.

On Wednesday, the Bush administration announced it had dismantled the fiercely criticized program and started applying for court approval for wiretaps - but under new orders and opinions issued by the FISA court. The administration's turnabout was supposed to be welcome news. But the new FISA orders are so wrapped in mystery that no one outside the Bush administration and the spy court knows what they say.

The presiding judge has no objection to releasing them, but the Justice Department refuses to do so or to give even the bare outlines on how the new program works.

Without those details, it's impossible for lawmakers to judge whether their 1978 law is protecting privacy rights as well as public safety.

Editorial: Unanswered Questions (HC)

Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 21, 2007

Decision by Bush administration to reinstate judicial oversight of domestic wiretaps a welcome step that needs clarification

After operating an electronic surveillance program for five years outside legally mandated oversight by a secret federal court, President George W. Bush has seemingly bowed to legal and congressional pressure. Justice Department officials have announced an arrangement with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court to obtain warrants for future spying inside the U.S.

While lawmakers and officials of civil liberties groups welcomed the development, they also want more information on whether the FISA court will review each surveillance request individually or whether it has simply given blanket approval for the activities by the National Security Agency.

Some suspect that the administration's action is simply a maneuver to derail several pending federal court cases challenging the constitutionality of the president's secretly authorized Terrorist Surveillance Program. The Justice Department added some credence to that view by immediately filing notice with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit that upcoming filings would address implications of the latest development.

Both Democratic and Republican lawmakers immediately expressed their concerns as to whether the new plan satisfies the requirements of existing law. One House Intelligence panel member, Rep. Heather A. Wilson, R-N.M., told reporters that she believed a single FISA judge had issued an unspecified order with blanket approval for surveillance rather than case-by-case warrants. Wilson is concerned that there are inadequate safeguards for civil liberties as provided by either the FISA legislation or a bill she proposed last year.

Other legislators wondered why the administration has taken so long to bring the surveillance program back under the supervision of the judiciary. The chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, D-W.Va., called the Justice Department announcement "confirmation that the administration's go-it-alone approach, effectively excluding Congress and the courts and operating outside the law, was unnecessary." Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., wondered why the administration took so long to bring an unlawful program back under the umbrella of the courts.

In a visit with the Chronicle Editorial Board last year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales justified the surveillance program as a legal extension of presidential authority in wartime and a congressional resolution supporting military action against terrorists.

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday, Gonzales refused to explain why the administration had reversed its previous position that court oversight was too restrictive to effectively combat terrorism.

The Judiciary Committee chairman, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., produced a letter from FISA court presiding judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly stating she was willing to give the panel the currently classified surveillance orders if the Justice Department agreed. Gonzales responded that he could not authorize the release because it was not his decision to make, indicating President Bush must make the call.

Americans need to be reassured that their constitutionally guaranteed rights against illegal government surveillance are being safeguarded as mandated by the FISA legislation.

If the chief jurist of the relevant court sees no harm in explaining how it will oversee the program, the administration should assent to providing a thorough explanation to lawmakers and the public.

Editorial: Balance Point (ABJ)

Akron (OH) Beacon Journal, January 21, 2007

The Bush White House says yes to judicial oversight

For more than a year, the Bush White House has publicly claimed the right to conduct electronic surveillance, without first seeking a court warrant, of Americans suspected of terrorist ties. It vigorously defended the program, which started after the Sept. 11 attacks, at congressional hearings and in legal briefs, denying it violated the constitutional protections of citizens. The president insisted the war on terrorism made speedy, warrantless wiretaps a national security imperative.

After all the contention, it is encouraging that the president has reversed course, the Justice Department announcing on Wednesday the program will be under the oversight of the court created by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. It is the right decision, a welcome return to checks and balances.

That said, it should not surprise the unexpected reversal has met with skepticism on Capitol Hill. On several anti-terrorism issues, including the interrogation and access of terror suspects to legal counsel, the Bush team has made extravagant claims of executive power, ignoring the roles Congress or the courts may play. The expansive assertion of authority earned a sharp rebuke in a 2004 Supreme Court ruling, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor scolding that ``a state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens."

The president has forfeited much good will, certainly the benefit of the doubt. He has invited questioning of his intentions and the timing of the about-face on the National Security Agency's wiretap program. In this instance, analysts noted the White House's penchant for riding a controversial policy hard and then shifting course without conceding error, just when the policy is about to be tested in the courts or in Congress. The federal appeals court in Cincinnati was due to hear a case on the legality of the wiretap program. Other lawsuits are pending.

In Senate hearings Thursday, a tight-lipped Attorney General Alberto Gonzales did little to ease worries whether the new ``innovative arrangements" with the FISA court would merely provide the program a blanket cover to conduct wiretaps. Congress would do well to press hard for clarification.

Editorial: Timing Raises Questions (LVS)

Las Vegas Sun, January 21, 2007

Suspicions persist in Bush's claim of changes to government's domestic spying program

One day before the Senate Judiciary Committee was to begin hearings on President Bush's warrantless domestic eavesdropping program, Bush administration officials announced that such surveillance would now be subject to judicial review.

The decision was a reversal for Bush, who has stubbornly insisted that forcing the National Security Agency to adhere to a 1970s-era law - which requires the agency to seek warrants in a secret court before monitoring Americans' communications - hindered the government's ability to track terrorist activity. Bush started domestic surveillance without warrants after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The New York Times revealed the program's existence in 2005. Bush has since been admonished by both Democratic and Republican lawmakers and federal appeals courts for what amounts to spying on Americans without any judicial oversight.

The timing of this apparent reversal in policy doesn't help to quell suspicions, as Bush often makes grand public promises to deflect criticism. And it is unclear how much the process will change. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, citing security concerns, refused to tell the Judiciary Committee whether eavesdropping requests will be reviewed one at a time or in groups.

The Bush administration's history of secrecy and deceit by omission runs deep, and it is hard to believe that this seeming change of heart is anything more than an attempt to avoid scrutiny by a Congress that is now run by Democrats.

No More Warrantless Spying (OCR)

Orange County (CA) Register, January 21, 2007

Bush defends the NSA domestic snooping even as he ends the program

The announcement last week that President Bush will not reauthorize the program of having the National Security Agency spy, eavesdrop or perform surveillance on U.S. residents suspected of having contact with terrorists overseas without a warrant being issued is welcome at first blush. It may prove to be an unalloyed benefit. But questions remain, and there are details the American people should be able to know about what government is doing in their name.

The program, revealed in December 2005 by the New York Times, has been controversial because it appears to be illegal. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 made a distinction between surveillance of Americans and intelligence surveillance of people in other countries. Americans can't have their phones tapped or be subject to certain other kinds of surveillance without probable cause and a warrant from a court.

The act set up a special secret court to consider requests to eavesdrop on Americans suspected of working for a foreign power. Over the years the court has disapproved only a handful of requests, and most of those were later approved with modifications. If there's a good reason to spy on Americans, the FISA court generally gives the government permission.

President Bush and other members of his administration have maintained that the program is legal as an extension of presidential powers in time of crisis or war. It was begun right after the attacks of 9/11, presumably because even the FISA procedures were considered too cumbersome in an era of cell phones, e-mail, instant messaging and more diverse threats.

An obvious question: If this program was considered legal and utterly essential a year ago, why is there no need to continue it? At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing last Thursday, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the administration had worked out procedures for more "swift and agile" consideration by the FISA court, but did not provide details.

It is also valid to wonder whether this switch was done to avoid judicial scrutiny in three cases challenging the program that are before the courts and might now be moot.

On balance, however, this is a welcome development. Checks and balances don't always prevent abuse, but they are essential to the American system.

Preserving Civil Liberties (MH)

The Miami Herald, January 21, 2007

It would be nice to believe that the Bush administration's reversal of policy on its secret wire tapping program -- allowing a measure of judicial oversight for the first time -- represents a change of attitude regarding the balance between civil liberties and executive power. But that's hardly the case.

DOJ_NMG_0119426

This administration has a consistent pattern of ignoring fundamental rights such as privacy and habeas corpus in order to extend the reach of the "unitary executive." Congress has a duty to find out more about the program and determine whether this change is merely a tactical shift designed to preserve the questionable authority of the president to decide which of those rights can be overlooked or denied in the name of national security.

A positive step

At issue is a vague White House announcement on Wednesday giving the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court jurisdiction over warrantless eavesdropping -- known as the "Terrorist Surveillance Program." This is a positive step to allow at least some monitoring of this unsupervised activity. But in an appearance before Congress Thursday, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a steadfast defender of the program, continued to withhold pertinent details. He also failed to give reassurances that the administration would not suddenly reverse itself once again and deny the courts proper jurisdiction.

In the past, the administration has been known to shift gears suddenly when facing a slapdown from the Supreme Court over dubious assertions of executive power. That was the case, for example, in the prosecution of Jose Padilla, held incommunicado as an "enemy combatant" for three years before the administration decided to charge him as a criminal.

This made the Padilla appeal before the court moot, hence averting a possible ruling that would have undermined the White House's claims of unfettered authority to designate U.S. citizens as enemy combatants. In the latest instance, a federal court in Cincinnati was on the verge of holding the first appellate hearing on the warrantless wiretapping program. By deciding to give the so-called FISA Court authority to monitor the program, the administration can argue that this case is also moot and thus can avoid a potentially embarrassing judicial spanking.

If civil liberties advocates are right -- and they have a strong case -- the administration has been operating outside the law for five years. FISA was created in the 1970s as a super-secret court to deal with sensitive national security eavesdropping. Why did it take 19 months following public disclosure of the secret wiretapping for the administration to agree that the court should monitor the program? Did the court surrender any of its authority in return for getting the program back under its jurisdiction?

Checks and balances

It is vital for Congress to learn the answers to these and other questions about who is secretly listening to the conversations of Americans and under what rules. Courts are supposed to determine when there is probable cause to suspect that the target of the wiretap is connected to terrorism. Without oversight, even the most well-intended prosecutor or federal agent can step across the line that protects our freedoms.

Whether the administration likes it or not, this is part of the bedrock system of checks and balances that has preserved the civil liberties that Americans cherish.

Steve Chapman: Never Mind What We Said About Spying (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, January 21, 2007

Is President Bush surrendering in the war on terror? For more than a year, the administration has insisted that preserving its "terrorist surveillance program," which involves unfettered and unauthorized wiretapping of Americans suspected of communicating with Al Qaeda operatives abroad, was, in the words of former White House press secretary Scott McClellan, "a vital tool" for us "to stay a step ahead of a deadly enemy that is determined to strike America again." Now, Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales says the program will not be renewed.

Before, we were told it was impossible to combat terrorism within the confines of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which places such investigations under the review of a special intelligence court--a process Gonzales portrayed as cumbersome and obsolete.

But that was in the past. "Any electronic surveillance that was occurring as part of the Terrorist Surveillance Program will now be conducted subject to the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court," wrote Gonzales in a letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week. Did we say impossible? We meant easy!

This about-face must be causing massive cognitive dissonance within the administration and among conservatives who regard any check on executive power as a favor to Al Qaeda. From the moment the secret National Security Agency program was revealed by The New York Times in 2005, Republicans treated its critics as foolish appeasers.

DOJ_NMG_0119427

Never mind that it apparently violated the law, and never mind that it let the government spy on Americans right here at home, without bothering to get the search warrants that are normally required. Issues of legality, constitutionality and privacy cut no ice with the administration and its supporters. Either you were for the program, or you preferred to expose us to catastrophe.

During last fall's campaign, Bush mercilessly ridiculed congressional critics. "They must not think we're at war," he charged. "When the Terrorist Surveillance Program was brought to a vote on the floor of the House of Representatives, the vast majority of Democrats voted against it." So when, exactly, did the war end?

Even stalwart administration allies are asking that question. An editorial in The Wall Street Journal, which defended the program from the start, declared itself "baffled by Mr. Bush's surrender" and warned that the "administration has some explaining to do--not least to its own officials who spent months saying FISA warrants were dangerously restrictive."

Contrary to the president's suggestions, critics were never against surveillance of Al Qaeda confederates in the United States. They only wanted the government to do what cops normally do when they want to eavesdrop: go to a judge and explain why the person targeted warrants investigation. In an emergency, FISA even allows the NSA to install the wire-tap first and seek approval within 72 hours. But that wasn't good enough for the administration.

The attorney general now says the NSA no longer has to operate as it did because the Justice Department worked with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to devise a faster, more flexible way to get a judge's approval of wiretaps. But if there is a way to do that, why did the administration wait five years to propose it?

Congress, after all, has amended FISA several times since it was enacted. Yet the White House chose to circumvent the law and create a secret program that, if the president had his way, would still be spying on Americans without our knowledge.

We don't know exactly how the program will operate under the court's supervision, because Gonzales refuses to say. But apparently the administration has succumbed to the once-intolerable burden of demonstrating to judges that certain people pose a danger before they are bugged.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, says Justice Department officials assured him the eavesdropping will proceed on the basis of old-fashioned individualized warrants, not simply a blanket court approval of what the NSA was doing. Other sources told The Washington Post that such warrants are one part of the new system. So apparently we can fight Al Qaeda without giving up our privacy protections.

Maybe we were misled before, or maybe we're being misled now. But the next time the president tries to sell us on the idea that some expansion of executive power is critical to fighting terrorism, I hope he'll throw in the Brooklyn Bridge.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Passport Prerequisite (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

Some travel-industry officials say they fear a passport bottleneck when new federal regulations take effect Tuesday requiring Americans to show a passport to re-enter the United States after traveling to countries in the Western Hemisphere.

But officials at the State and Homeland Security departments, which are implementing the changes, say most travelers who need passports to comply with the new rules already have them.

The first phase of the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative (WHTI) will require U.S. citizens traveling by air between the United States and Canada, Mexico, Central and South America, the Caribbean and Bermuda to present a valid passport. In the past, many of these destinations required only a valid U.S. driver's license or other official identification.

The changes in travel requirements do not affect trips to and from U.S.-controlled territories in the Caribbean, such as Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

The new rules were recommended by the September 11 commission and were passed into law as part of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004. The rules are aimed at reducing the threat of terrorism and creating a uniform system to identify travelers.

DOJ_NMG_0119428

Currently, a traveler "may make a verbal declaration of citizenship" or "produce 8,000 different documents" to try to show who they are as they try to cross the border, making authentication of identity both difficult and time-consuming, said Derwood Staeben, a senior adviser for the State Department's Consular Affairs Bureau, which oversees passports. "In fiscal 2005, our Customs Bureau intercepted 75,000 fraudulent documents."

A recent poll by Kayak.com, which provides travel information to about 2 million people a month, showed that "only a small percentage of those planning to get a passport" to comply with the new regulations "have even sent in their applications," said Steve Hafner, co-founder and chief executive officer of the firm, which has offices in New Jersey and Massachusetts.

"We think it could create a major backlog when the U.S. State Department starts processing all those applications, once they are in the system," Mr. Hafner said, noting that it already takes six weeks for applicants to obtain a passport.

In contrast, data from the Homeland Security Department show that 86 percent of Americans who have flown to the United States since Nov. 20 had passports, leading Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to say Thursday that he expects a "relatively seamless transition."

Overall, about 73 million Americans -- or 27 percent to 28 percent of the U.S. population -- have passports, Mr. Staeben said.

But Ileana Kerasidis, manager of Skyline Travel in Alexandria, said her clients are expressing "tremendous concern" about potential passport backlogs.

'Start very early'

Steve Dahlgren, manager of Ticket to Ride, a travel agency in the District, said he is "recommending that people start very early" in the passport-application process.

"For example, if someone is planning a trip in July and would usually wait until May to apply for a passport, we are advising them to apply now," Mr. Dahlgren said. "There is not much confidence the process will be smooth. I am not concerned that the State Department will be completely overwhelmed, but I think it's best to start early and be safe."

The State Department says it has "dedicated sufficient resources" to handle the nearly 4 million additional applications for passports it expects to receive this year as a result of the new requirements. It says it has hired 250 new employees to review passport applications.

"We've been preparing for this, and so we're not expecting a backlog," Mr. Staeben said. "We don't have a backlog now, even though applications are up 51 percent over last year. We process passports in a six-week period, and we expect that to continue."

However, Mr. Dahlgren said he's heard from some clients who already have waited at least eight weeks to get passports. "There is a backlog," he said.

The second phase of the WHTI, expected to begin as early as Jan. 1, 2008, will require citizens traveling back to the United States by land or sea -- including ferries -- to show passports.

About 86 million people fly to the United States each year. But about four times that number arrive in cars. As a result, many officials are expecting passport applications to rise dramatically next year. The State Department says it expects 18 million applications in 2008, up from 12.1 million last year and an anticipated 16 million this year.

A price to pay

Because the new passport requirements can add sharply to the cost of a trip -- especially for families -- there seems to be increased client interest in travel to places that will remain passport-free, said Drew Patterson, a vice president at Kayak.com.

In most cases, a passport costs $97, which includes a $30 execution fee. For children younger than 16, the cost is $82. Mr. Staeben said those prices will not rise under the new policy.

But a couple with three children who need passports to travel somewhere that passports formerly weren't necessary will pay another $440.

And if they need a passport in a hurry, they will have to pay $60 more per person -- or a total of $300 for a family of five -- for the faster service. Mr. Staeben said paying the "expedite fee" typically means applicants will receive passports in two weeks rather than six.

DOJ_NMG_0119429

Some hotel chains and tourism offices in parts of the Caribbean affected by the new rules, including Nassau and Paradise Island in the Bahamas, are offering promotions that reimburse travelers who suddenly need to get passports.

As for what will happen to U.S. citizens who attempt to re-enter the country without a passport, the government says the law allows the new documentation requirements to be waived under certain circumstances.

"These exceptions include individual cases of unforeseen emergency and individual cases based on 'humanitarian or national-interest reasons,' " the State Department says in a fact sheet.

Exempting 'snowbirds'

Mr. Chertoff said so-called "snowbirds" -- Canadians spending the winter in the United States -- are also exempt from the new passport requirements. "We will allow them to depart from the United States without having a passport for some significant period of time to avoid the problem of people who may have come here last year" before the requirement took effect, he told reporters last week.

There also will be exceptions for those with special cards issued for those who travel between the United States and Canada for work, merchant marines with Coast Guard documents and permanent residents with green cards.

In addition, the State Department says it "has processes to assist U.S. citizens overseas to obtain emergency travel documentation for those with lost or stolen passports."

Originally, the proposed date for implementation of the air phase of WHTI was Jan. 1, rather than Jan. 23. But it was postponed at the request of the airline industry "in order to facilitate holiday travel," the government said.

Later this year, the State Department will begin providing credit-card-size Passport Cards or PASS Cards, which can be used as ID for land and sea travel between the United States and Canada, Mexico, the Caribbean and Bermuda.

Passport applicants must appear in person at a passport acceptance center, found in post offices, federal courthouses, county clerk offices and even libraries in some communities. Full information about the application process can be obtained at the State Department's Web site (http://travel.state.gov/passport/passport_1738.html).

New Orleans Of Future May Stay Half Its Old Size (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 20 — The empty streets, deserted avenues and abandoned houses prompt a gnawing question, nearly 17 months after Hurricane Katrina: Is this what New Orleans has come to — a city half its old size?

Over and over, the city's leaders reassure citizens that better days and, above all, more people are in the future. Their destiny will not merely be to reside in a smaller city with a few good restaurants and curious local customs, the citizens are told.

But some economists and demographers are beginning to wonder whether New Orleans will top out at about half its prestorm population of about 444,000, already in a steep decline from its peak of 627,525 in the 1960 Census. At the moment, the population is well below half, and future gains are likely to be small.

"It will be a trickle based on what we know now," said Elliott Stonecipher, a consultant and demographer based in Shreveport, La. "Low tens of thousands, over three or four or five years, something in that range. I would say we could start losing people, especially if the crime problem doesn't get high visibility."

The new doubts, surprisingly, are largely not based on the widespread damage caused by the flood. Rather, crippling problems that existed long before Hurricane Katrina are mostly being blamed for the city's failure to thrive.

In this view, the storm was merely a grim exclamation point to conditions decades in the making. Before the storm, some economists say, New Orleans may have had more people than its economy could support, and the stalled repopulation is merely reflecting that.

Hurricane Katrina may have brutally recalibrated the city's demographics, setting New Orleans firmly on the path its underlying characteristics had already been leading it down: a city losing people at the rate of perhaps 1.5 percent a year before Hurricane Katrina, with a stagnant economy, more than a quarter of the population living in poverty, and a staggeringly high rate of unemployment, in which as many as one in five were jobless or not seeking work.

DOJ_NMG_0119430

Political leaders, worried about the loss of clout and a Congressional seat, press for people to return, but a smaller New Orleans may not be bad, some economists say. Most of those who have not returned — 175,000, by Mr. Stonecipher's count — are very poor, and can be more easily absorbed in places with vibrant job markets, they say.

Large-scale concentrations of deep poverty — as was the case in New Orleans before the storm — are inherently harmful to cities. The smaller New Orleans is almost certain to wind up with a far higher percentage of its population working than before Hurricane Katrina.

"Where there are high concentrations of poverty, people can't see a way out," said William Oakland, a retired economist from Tulane University who has studied the city's economy for decades. "Maybe the diaspora is a blessing."

Others, however, worry that permanently losing so many people threatens the city's culture — its unique way of talking, parading and eating.

"Culture is people," said Richard Campanella, a Tulane geographer who has written extensively about the city's neighborhoods. "If half the local people are dispersed and no longer living cohesively in those social networks, then half of local culture is gone."

The new doubts also take into account the current barriers to repopulation, including the well-documented failure of the state's Road Home aid program for homeowners, the loss of tens of thousands of jobs since the storm, the crime problem and delays in rebuilding moderately priced housing. Official efforts — local, state and federal — to rebuild the network of hospitals, schools and public housing projects that once served the city's huge poor population have been faltering. But they also look at what New Orleans was before the storm.

The low population figure, 191,000, which was reported by the Louisiana Recovery Authority in November last year in the most credible survey to date, was about half the 444,000 count in a Census estimate before Hurricane Katrina. The number was surprising, dashing expectations of a "big return," as one economist put it, and was hotly disputed by local officials. Still, upticks, if there are any, are imperceptible: the percentage of prehurricane gas and electric users who were getting service, for instance, remained the same between April and November 2006, the Brookings Institution reported last month.

"Our expectations were just wrong," said James A. Richardson, an economist who directs the Public Administration Institute at Louisiana State University. "I don't believe it will ever be 450,000 again. I think New Orleans did not need 450,000 people to support the economy you had at that time."

With no real place for the poorest of the evacuees in the economy before the storm, New Orleans may have permanently lost that part of its population. Supporting that notion is an unpublished analysis by Mr. Oakland, the former Tulane economist, which shows unusually low rates of participation in the labor force before Hurricane Katrina.

Thus, a frequent impression of prehurricane travelers to New Orleans — that there were "a lot of people hanging around, going nowhere," as the Nobel-winning Columbia University economist Edmund S. Phelps, a sometime-visitor, puts it — turns out to have a statistical basis.

The statistics, which compare the number of people actually working with the total working-age population, suggest "there are a lot of people out there not working," said Mr. Oakland, referring to the period before Hurricane Katrina. Or, he said, they were working in an underground economy, not measured by statistics. If not actually illegal, he said, it was not very profitable.

In New Orleans, before the storm, about 4 out of 10 men in the working-age population were out of a job or not looking for one, compared with less than 3 in 10 nationally.

Employment had dropped sharply in the city from 1969 to 1999, Mr. Oakland writes. More than half of young black men ages 16 to 24 were not in the labor force. Unemployment rates among young blacks were above 25 percent. "The data is showing New Orleans is really a basket case," Mr. Oakland said.

In the city's poorest areas, the numbers were even more discouraging. In places like the Lower Ninth Ward or Central City, half of all working-age people were not looking for work, Mr. Oakland wrote. The real unemployment rate in these impoverished, high-crime areas, which would include those not looking for work, would have been a "whopping" 32 percent, he wrote.

Compounding the city's difficulties, and, in effect, helping to stem the population loss, was a secondary factor: the direness of the city's poverty, and its concentration. Those conditions helped make the city's poor population exceptionally immobile. New Orleans was also poor not only in absolute terms, but also in relative terms. The poorest 30 percent of households had a lower share of the city's total income than the comparable slice in any other similar Southern city, Mr. Oakland found.

DOJ_NMG_0119431

"The job mobility was very low among the poor, so they just stay where they are, and the social welfare system shored them up," Mr. Oakland said.

The city's population was thus "out of equilibrium, if you would say that," Mr. Oakland added. "It's not normal to have that level of nonparticipation in the labor force."

Haunting the city's effort to repopulate, too, is the incalculable toll inflicted by ghosts from its past — a political legacy of corruption and patronage, and a deep racial division with a far more distressing passage toward integration than was experienced, say, in Atlanta.

Looking to the future, another 50,000 people might eventually be added to the city's population, Mr. Oakland suggested, but there are no guarantees.

There has been little to no construction of cheap housing that would enable the return of the largest category of those still displaced, Mr. Stonecipher noted.

A second category of people, 50,000 or more who have established themselves elsewhere but who could return, may be even harder to recapture, given the combination of past weaknesses and continuing present-day hurdles.

"The longer it lasts, the more likely it is that our population is plateauing, the longer the uncertainty continues," said Janet Speyrer, an economist at the University of New Orleans.

WAR NEWS:

Embattled, Bush Held To Plan To Salvage Iraq (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had a surprise for President Bush when they sat down with their aides in the Four Seasons Hotel in Amman, Jordan. Firing up a PowerPoint presentation, Maliki and his national security adviser proposed that U.S. troops withdraw to the outskirts of Baghdad and let Iraqis take over security in the strife-torn capital. Maliki said he did not want any more U.S. troops at all, just more authority.

The president listened intently to the unexpected proposal at their Nov. 30 meeting, according to accounts from several administration officials. Bush seemed impressed that Maliki had taken the initiative, but it did not take him long to reject the idea.

By the time Bush returned to Washington, the plan had already been picked through by his military commanders. At a meeting in the White House's Roosevelt Room, the president flatly told his advisers that the Maliki plan was not going to work. He had concluded that the Iraqis were not up to the task and that Baghdad would collapse into chaos, making a bad situation worse. And so the Americans would have to help them.

From that early December meeting on, Bush was headed down a path that would result in his defying critics and the seeming message of the November elections by ordering 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq. A reconstruction of the administration's Iraq policy review, based on more than a dozen interviews with senior advisers, Bush associates, lawmakers and national security officials, reveals a president taking the lead in driving the process toward one more effort at victory -- despite doubts along the way from his own military commanders, lawmakers and the public at large.

He never seriously considered beginning to withdraw U.S. forces, as urged by newly elected Democratic congressional leaders and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. And he had grown skeptical of his own military commanders, who were telling him no more troops were needed.

So Bush relied on his own judgment that the best answer was to try once again to snuff out the sectarian violence in Baghdad, even at the risk of putting U.S. soldiers into a crossfire between Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. When his generals resisted sending more troops, he seemed irritated. When they finally agreed to go along with the plan, he doubled the number of troops they requested.

DOJ_NMG_0119432

It was a signature moment for a president who seems uninfluenced by the electorate on Iraq and headed for a showdown with the new Democratic Congress. Presented with an opportunity to pull back, Bush instead chose to extend and, in some ways, deepen his commitment, gambling that more time and a new plan will finally bring success to the troubled U.S. military mission.

"The guy who is most committed to winning and finding a way to win is the president. He always has been; he's the only reason we are still in this fight," said Frederick W. Kagan, a military historian at the American Enterprise Institute whose advice to send more troops has been closely monitored by senior administration policymakers.

Yet in hindsight, some Bush advisers believe they misjudged the politics that would greet Bush's Jan. 10 unveiling of the new plan. They understood that many if not most Democrats would not welcome a troop increase but thought at least some would grudgingly go along -- not anticipating what ended up as near-universal opposition by Democrats and visceral anger even among some Republicans.

They had hoped more members of Congress would embrace the advice that Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) gave the president during one session in the Cabinet Room. "Mr. President, I have two words for you," Lieberman said, according to officials who were present. " 'Be bold.' "

That advice, at least, Bush would take to heart.Political Surprises

Bush's new Iraq plan traces its origin to last summer, after the second of two operations designed to quell spiking violence in Baghdad collapsed. For more than three years, Bush and his advisers had been leading the war on the fundamental belief that once they built a representative democratic government, the Sunni insurgency and sectarian violence would ebb.

By early fall, even as Bush was on the campaign trail accusing Democrats of defeatism, he and his senior advisers were coming to the conclusion that his core assumptions were wrong. The political process would not lead to security in Iraq. In fact, it would have to be the other way around. And they started to doubt the advice from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and senior commanders in Baghdad that troop levels were adequate to contain the violence.

"It was pretty clear when you started to look at our assumptions, many of them just weren't right," said a senior administration official, who like others discussed internal deliberations on the condition of anonymity.

Bush concluded by the run-up to the Nov. 7 congressional elections that to change course he would have to get rid of Rumsfeld, the senior figure in his administration most resistant to rethinking the Iraq strategy. At the same time, several agency reviews of Iraq policy were launched. But both decisions were kept secret until after the balloting.

In the meantime, Bush dispatched national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley to Iraq to bring back what White House officials called "ground truth." Hadley returned from his Oct. 29 to Nov. 5 trip profoundly disturbed by the Maliki government, uncertain whether the prime minister was capable of doing what was necessary to rein in Shiite militias.

The day after the election, Bush announced that he was removing Rumsfeld and replacing him with former CIA director Robert M. Gates. That same day, Hadley sent a five-page classified memo to the president that proposed bolstering Maliki's political and security capacities and raised the prospect of more U.S. troops.

On Nov. 14, Bush ordered that the various agency reviews be combined into a single process and declared that he would lead it himself. A group led by deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch II began a series of grueling seven- and eight-hour-a-day meetings.

Closeted in a conference room named for World War II-era secretary of state Cordell Hull, the Iraq team debated papers presented by senior officials throughout the government. State Department officials urged a more energetic outreach to Iraqis beyond Baghdad's Green Zone, to hedge against failure by the Maliki government. Other officials, including those in the office of Vice President Cheney, voiced concern that U.S. steps to reach out to disaffected Sunni Iraqis had not brought about a corresponding decrease in violence.

The president also heard from outside experts. In an early December Oval Office meeting, retired Army Gen. Jack Keane presented his own plan for an increase of tens of thousands of U.S. troops to restore security in Baghdad. Another retired Army general, Barry R. McCaffrey, said he told Bush that the idea was a "fool's errand" and argued that putting more troops on the ground would not change the underlying dynamic. Still, the administration was interested enough in a buildup that Keane had follow-up sessions with Cheney and Hadley.

DOJ_NMG_0119433

At the same time, White House officials called in scores of lawmakers to discuss Iraq with the president in the weeks leading up to Bush's Jan. 10 speech. While many Democrats dismissed such talks as a facade of consultation over a decision long since made, Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said when he told Hadley at a private meeting that the president needed to make clear that the U.S. commitment was not "open-ended," Hadley picked up the telephone and called an aide to make sure the speech included such language.

White House aides also debated how to respond to the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan, congressionally chartered commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a close friend of the president's father, and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (Ind.), a widely respected Democrat. At first, officials said, they hoped the group would prove a vehicle for bringing the two parties together after a bitter election.

But the panel advanced several key proposals that the White House quickly made clear were unacceptable to Bush, particularly a plan to withdraw U.S. combat forces by early 2008, open talks with Iraq's neighbors Iran and Syria, and condition U.S. assistance on the Maliki government meeting defined political benchmarks.Rejecting Plan B

A version of Maliki's surprise proposal during the Amman meeting turned out to be the major alternative considered by Bush, White House officials said. The plan called for ringing Baghdad with U.S. troops while Iraqi security forces fought the sectarian violence in the city. Other U.S. troops in the country would shift to the borders to keep Iranian and Syrian infiltrators out, leaving U.S. forces with one main combat mission -- attacking al-Qaeda elements in Anbar province in western Iraq.

The plan had the appeal of not pulling U.S. troops out of the country while still allowing Iraqis to settle their own differences. But Bush worried that such a move might mean losing the war.

"He became convinced that that was not sustainable," Hadley said in an interview. "Let's assume that the sectarian violence does escalate. Are the American military really going to stand outside the city while sectarian violence rages in Baghdad? I don't think so."

The Bush team concluded that the previous Baghdad security plans had failed for four reasons: The Iraqis never took ownership over security, Maliki placed political constraints on military operations, there were not enough reliable Iraqi and U.S. forces, and there was no serious effort to rebuild areas taken back from insurgents or militias.

Bush spent hours in conversation with Maliki, on the phone and in videoconference, probing to determine whether he could count on the prime minister. "The president decided we need to bring this issue to a head," one senior adviser said. "We need to clarify whether this government is really a partner or not."

Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, said Maliki's presentation of a new plan in Amman was a sign of his heightened interest in tackling Baghdad's security problems.

"We all recognized that it was too ambitious," he said. "What the president liked was the intent and the willingness to take on more responsibility."

Another problem for Bush was that the military did not necessarily want more troops. Army Gens. John P. Abizaid, the Middle East commander, and George W. Casey Jr., the commander in Iraq, opposed an influx of U.S. forces because they were unconvinced it would change the dynamics on the ground.

Resistance from Casey and the Joint Chiefs of Staff flared throughout the process. On Dec. 13, Bush went to the super-secure "tank" at the Pentagon to listen to his top generals, only to walk away convinced that some of them were trying to manage defeat rather than find a way to victory.

Bush decided to placate some of the concerns expressed by the generals about the overextended military and told The Washington Post six days later that he would expand the size of the Army and Marines. When Gates went to Baghdad that week, he came back with Casey's agreement for more troops based on the understanding that the commander would no longer be held back by the Iraqi government and that the United States would address the country's economic needs.

"He was not overriding his commanders," one Bush aide said of the president. "But he was pushing them to identify what went wrong and what do we need to change what happened."

Still, Bush and the military came at the plan from different perspectives. Casey asked for two more brigades for Baghdad, plus a third that would be stationed in Kuwait as a reserve and two others that would be put on call back in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0119434

Bush decided that was not enough. His advisers studied the experience in the northern Iraqi town of Mosul under Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who successfully undercut the insurgency there, and they decided they could not risk having too few troops. Bush had already decided to replace Casey with Petraeus, and through intermediaries the president reached out to Petraeus, who was supportive of more troops than Casey requested.

So the president reversed Casey's plan, deciding that all five brigades would go to Baghdad in a phased deployment. "The president came out and said, 'Let's err on the side of making sure they have everything they need,' " said a senior official.

Bush Administration, Under Criticism, Warns Iraq To Fulfill Its End Of The Bargain (NYT)

By Helene Cooper, David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20 — President Bush and his top advisers, after nine days of unrelenting criticism from Congress, are warning the Iraqi government that continuing funding for an American troop increase and other elements of Mr. Bush's new Iraq strategy will be contingent on Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's delivery on promises to quell violence, senior administration officials said in recent interviews.

"It's going to be a little bit pay-as-you-go, and it's going to depend a lot on Iraqis performing," Stephen J. Hadley, President Bush's national security adviser, said Friday.

"As Mr. Maliki's government follows through on its promises," Mr. Hadley said, the administration will "be in a much better position to resist any efforts to fence the funds" when the Iraq budget request goes before Congress.

The warning is coming despite President Bush's declaration, in an interview last weekend, that he had the sole authority to carry out the strategy, including an increase of about 18,000 troops to secure Baghdad. Now, administration officials, who have carefully avoided declaring outright that the American commitment in Iraq would be cut back if Mr. Maliki fails, are using the open hostility of most Democrats and the skepticism of many Republicans as a way to underscore to the prime minister that the White House plan represents a last chance for him.

In recent days, however, as Mr. Bush's plan has come under attack in both houses, White House officials are trying to head off both a vote condemning Mr. Bush's approach and a longer-term effort to restrict money or limit the number of troops that can be sent.

The White House has dismissed some of that criticism as partisan and "poisonous," the word it used in response to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's charge on Friday that Mr. Bush knows that "because the troops are in harm's way, that we won't cut off the resources." She went on to charge, "that's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way."

But even the ranking Republican member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, has declared deep concern about the wisdom of sending more troops, and one of the nation's most senior retired marines, Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that "the addition of 20,000 troops is too, little too late."

The result is that some members of the administration are already discussing what one called "Plan C," even as the administration publicly expresses support for Mr. Maliki. Some senior officials, insisting on anonymity, are discussing alternative leadership for the Iraqi government, including throwing American support behind another Shiite leader, Adel Abdul Mahdi. Mr. Mahdi is the deputy to Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Iranian-backed Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a party known as Sciri. Mr. Mahdi has long been a favorite of the White House to take the top job; he lost out last spring when the anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose family has long feuded with Mr. Hakim's, threw his support behind Mr. Maliki in a vote within the Shiite coalition.

Administration officials maintain that there is no American plan afoot to encourage a removal of Mr. Maliki from power, and several senior officials said that if Mr. Maliki does not follow through on his promise to deploy Iraqi Army and police brigades in Baghdad to quell sectarian violence, the Iraqis themselves will move to replace him as prime minister.

Some in the administration complain that backing a member of Mr. Hakim's party would quickly give Iran enormous influence over the Iraqi government; when American military forces picked up Iranian operatives in Baghdad late last month, the raid took place within Mr. Hakim's compound. Those operatives were later released after Iran and Iraq claimed they had diplomatic immunity; the Pentagon said one of the men was the chief of operations for an elite Iranian military unit.

DOJ_NMG_0119435

The conflicting signals here reflect doubt within the administration that Mr. Maliki will actually prove either willing or able to crack down on Shiite militia groups, which make up a large percentage of his support base.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's recent trip through the region to sell America's Sunni Arab allies on Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy, underscored just how much hostility there is among Sunni Arabs toward Mr. Maliki, administration officials said. "What she heard was that Maliki has failed completely, both politically and personally, and they don't trust him to crack down on the Shiites," one senior administration official said.

Mr. Hadley expressed concern about Mr. Maliki in a memorandum to Mr. Bush in November, which was later leaked. But his comments on Friday appeared to be the first time that any senior administration official had suggested that should those doubts grow, Congress could imperil Mr. Bush's new approach.

Administration officials, in interviews, said they were not conceding that Congress was heading toward making a troop increase contingent on Iraqi action. But by warning the Iraqis of the possibility, they are clearly both using Congress's dissatisfaction to gain leverage, and preparing for the possibility that the Democratic majority may impose conditions that Mr. Bush has resisted.

Last Sunday, on the CBS program "60 Minutes," Mr. Bush insisted that he has the authority as commander-in-chief to execute his strategy, no matter what kind of objections Congress raises. "In this situation, I do, yeah," he said. "Now, I fully understand they could try to stop me from doing it. But I made my decision, and we're going forward."

Interviews with senior administration officials, however, indicated that now that question is no longer viewed in such black-and-white terms. While Mr. Bush clearly has the money to keep his strategy afloat for a number of months, there is a growing realization that domestic pressure to place a "cap" on troop levels or begin withdrawal could become overwhelming. So, in an effort to turn a potential constraint into a negotiating tool, Mr. Bush's aides have begun to tell Iraqi politicians that Congress's patience with the pace of the war is just about exhausted.

"If they do perform in the next two months, we've probably bought ourselves another four months," said one senior administration official, referring to the Iraqi government.

The hedging under way reflects a continuing debate within the administration about how explicitly to make the proposed troop increase conditional on Iraqi performance, administration officials said. That debate was still on display even after Mr. Bush, in his speech to the nation on Jan. 10, praised the Maliki government's "strong commitment" to ending sectarian violence, and pledged that "America will change our strategy help the Iraqis carry out their campaign to put down sectarian violence—and bring security to the people of Baghdad."

But the next morning, both Ms. Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates struck a different note. "Among Americans and Iraqis, there is no confusion over one basic fact: It is the Iraqis who are responsible for what kind of country Iraq will be," Ms. Rice said during a news briefing at the White House. "The president has conveyed to the Iraqi leadership that we will support their good decisions, but that Americans' patience is limited."

Mr. Gates went further a week ago when he suggested that the United States had built "off-ramps" in case the troop reinforcement was not needed, and said that if they were used, "you don't necessarily have to go to the full extent of the buildup." At another point, he said, "We're going to know pretty early on whether the Iraqis are meeting their military commitments," he said.

But American officials have been cagey about how they would respond if they conclude Mr. Maliki is unwilling or unable to face down Shiite militias, or strike the deals necessary to reach a political accord with the minority Sunnis. American leverage over Mr. Maliki is limited, especially because he has never been enthusiastic about an increase of American troops, and has even suggested that he is not interested in remaining the country's leader for long.

"The baseline strategy is that we'll invest in good performance, not in things we consider foolish and destructive," said Philip D. Zelikow, the former counselor at the State Department who participated in the administration's Iraq strategy review. "Since the odds that the Iraqi government are genuinely going to adopt" the Iraqi part of the troop increase "are uncertain, recent events reinforce the need to underscore this baseline strategy, which may not seem to promise a big win but also doesn't seem to be placing such a big gamble," Mr. Zelikow said.

Vietnam Surfaces On Both Sides Of Iraq Debate (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0119436

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

Supporters and critics of Bush policies have invoked the conflict. But scholars say the two wars differ greatly.

WASHINGTON — As President Bush was preparing to announce plans to send more troops to Iraq earlier this month, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy chose to talk about another conflict.

"In Vietnam, the White House grew increasingly obsessed with victory, and increasingly divorced from the will of the people," the 74-year-old Massachusetts Democrat said in a speech to the National Press Club.

"We all know what happened, though," he continued.

"There was no military solution to that war.... In the end, 58,000 Americans died in the search for it. Echoes of that disaster are all around us today."

Kennedy mentioned Vietnam seven times in the speech, in which he outlined plans to challenge Bush's plan.

Other members of Congress would follow.

On the floors of the House and Senate, in committee hearings and news conferences since the president's Jan. 10 announcement, lawmakers on both sides of the aisle and both sides of the war debate have repeatedly invoked America's longest war.

Opponents use the vocabulary of the Vietnam War as they talk of opposing an escalation that they consider as divisive as those pushed by Presidents Johnson and Nixon in the 1960s and early 1970s. And supporters of the president warn of repeating other mistakes of that conflict by withdrawing support for American soldiers while they remain in harm's way.

Capitol Hill even witnessed the recent return of one of the Vietnam era's iconic figures when former Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota, the 1972 Democratic presidential nominee, came to Washington to offer lawmakers advice about ending this war.

Analogies between the two conflicts are as old as the Iraq war itself — and fraught with some peril, said Vassar College historian Robert K. Brigham, author of the recent book "Is Iraq Another Vietnam?"

"When you say 'escalation' like Vietnam, you are in a sense saying there is an escalation that has no end ... and 'phased withdrawal' rings of a retreat from Vietnam," Brigham said. "One thing we have to be careful of is that a lot of the references to Vietnam are intellectual shorthand.... Vietnam is a very complicated war to understand."

Just as Iraq and Vietnam are vastly different, the American military commitments in the two conflicts have striking differences.

At the peak of the Vietnam War, there were nearly 540,000 American troops in Vietnam, with more than 58,000 of them killed. In Iraq, troop levels have remained relatively stable at about 130,000, and more than 3,000 of them have died.

Nonetheless, the president's proposal seems to have rekindled a spirited debate on Capitol Hill about America's last prolonged war and what lessons can be drawn from it.

"You have a generation who grew up with Vietnam as the political issue of their time," said Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Sherman Oaks), who reminded Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at a recent hearing that the United States had withdrawn from Vietnam and had still won the Cold War.

For critics of the Bush plan, Vietnam has provided ammunition to bolster their calls for congressional intervention to end the current conflict and to push for a political rather than a military solution.

"If the lesson in Iraq teaches anything, it is that military might has very great limitations," Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) said on the floor of the Senate recently. "But then that is a lesson we should have learned many years ago from Vietnam."

Byrd, a longtime war opponent who has been in the Senate since 1959, is one of seven current senators who were elected before the end of the Vietnam War.

In the House, Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.) drew on her brother's experience in Vietnam to challenge the president's proposal.

"As the sister of a Vietnam veteran, I still remember vividly our escalation of that failed war.... ," Maloney said. "I remember vividly the worry I had for my brother and the feeling that our troops would be better-served if they were returned home rather than fighting in another country's civil war. Those are the same feelings I have today."

DOJ_NMG_0119437

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who joined the Senate in 1973 as the last U.S. troops were being withdrawn from Vietnam and is now a vocal Iraq war opponent, also touched on Vietnam as he opened Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on the president's plan.

"I think we all learned a lesson, whether we went or didn't go, whether we were for it or against it, [that] no foreign policy can be sustained in this country without the informed consent of the American people," Biden said. "They've got to sign on."

At the same committee meeting, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), an Army infantryman in Vietnam in 1968, was even more critical of the president's proposal, calling it "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam."

Biden and Hagel have introduced a resolution opposing Bush's plan.

The president has consistently rejected Vietnam analogies, arguing that the conditions in Iraq and in the United States bear little resemblance to the Vietnam era.

"Iraq, after the overthrow of the tyrant, voted on a constitution that is intended to unite the whole country. And then they had elections under that constitution where nearly 12 million people voted for this unity government which is different from Vietnam," the president said before he visited Vietnam in November.

At a recent briefing, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow dismissed Hagel's Vietnam reference as little more than "a pretty good line."

Several of the president's congressional allies also have argued more recently that the price of leaving Iraq would be much higher than that of leaving Vietnam.

"We were able to walk away from Vietnam," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a former Navy fighter pilot who spent 5 1/2 years as a prisoner of war in North Vietnam. "If we walk away from Iraq, we'll be back, possibly in the context of a wider war in the world's most volatile region."

Meanwhile, other congressional Republicans, including several more Vietnam veterans, have drawn on their own experiences during the war to challenge proposals that Congress should use its budgetary authority to stop the deployment of additional troops.

"I served at a time when we saw the Congress reduce funding for the military," Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.) said last week while unveiling a resolution opposing any cutoff of funds to troops.

"We served at a time when the military did not have the support of the people, the press or the Congress," said Kline, who flew Marine Corps helicopters during the Vietnam War. "I don't ever want to see that again."

Times researcher Robin Cochran contributed to this report.

Bush's History Lesson (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 21, 2007

AT HENRY Kissinger's recommendation, President Bush is reading "A Savage War of Peace," the classic account of the Algerian war of independence, 1954-1962. It holds up as well today as it did when published in 1977, but it's an odd choice for the president as he escalates the war in Iraq.

British historian Alistair Horne is sympathetic to all the combatants:

The French Army, trying to recover from defeats at the hands of the Germans (1940) and the Vietnamese (1954).

The National Liberation Front (FLN in the French abbreviation), insurgents who forged a political victory despite defeats in the field.

The million or so European settlers in Algeria.

The 9 million Muslim Algerians who bore the brunt of the war and had to make a decision to go against a colonial order that had lasted since 1830.

But the differences with Iraq are huge, and they include:

Problem of the pieds noirs (black feet), as the European settlers were called. "If the pied noir loved France," Horne writes, "it was with a love that sought constant reassurance." They refused to compromise with the Muslims early in the struggle. Americans, for all their problems in Iraq, experience none of this emotional tug.

DOJ_NMG_0119438

Dilemma of the army. Not a few soldiers were pied noir, which added urgency to the army's quest to redeem itself in Algeria. And the high command, all of whom had lived through the Third Republic, the Vichy government, the German occupation, and 26 changes of government in the Fourth Republic, had trouble maintaining a proper subordination to civilian authority. Many enlisted men and junior officers were draftees, fostering an intimate involvement of the home front in the war.

Coherence of the opposition. US troops in Iraq are fighting Sunnis, Shi'ites, Iranians, remnants of the Ba'ath Party, and a few others. In Algeria, there were splits in the Muslim population at first, but as the war wore on the resistance coalesced around the FLN, protected by a sanctuary in Tunisia. They weren't religious fanatics, like many of those in Iraq.

Soldiers' successes: US troops can point to few military victories since they swept into Baghdad almost four years ago. The French Army, however, effectively sealed the border with Tunisia with its electrified Morice Line, conducted an offensive in 1959 that broke the back of FLN forces within the country, and, in its most famous victory, destroyed the urban terrorist force in Algiers in 1957.

To win the Battle of Algiers, the French needed accurate intelligence, and they got it by torture. There have been occasional questionable practices in Iraq, notably at Abu Ghraib prison, but Americans should be relieved that no military leader has stooped to the debased tactics of the Algiers garrison.

Return of the hero. But the FLN would not be crushed, and the Fourth Republic politicians were divided about what to do. Under pressure from the army in Algeria in 1958, they brought back Charles de Gaulle, leader of the Free French in World War II. He had preserved French honor after Hitler's conquest, and had gone head to head with Churchill and Roosevelt. No American politician today can match his experience.

Brutal realism. De Gaulle intensified military pressure on the FLN and cast about for a political solution: total integration, a loose affiliation with France, or perhaps independence with the French maintaining control of the Saharan wastes, where oil had been discovered. The FLN would have none of these. Then in 1959 he uttered the fateful words, "self-determination," which meant independence. Today President Bush has yet to show this degree of flexibility in Iraq.

Officers' revolt. The pieds noirs and the army in Algeria were enraged. Pieds noirs tried to assassinate de Gaulle four times when he next visited Algeria, and several generals decided it was time to depose him. "I forbid every Frenchman, and above all every soldier, to execute their orders," de Gaulle thundered in a radio broadcast. "Frenchwomen, Frenchmen, help me!" The French conscripts in Algeria, listening via small transistor radios, the iPods of their day, heeded his words, and the revolt collapsed.

It wasn't over, though. The pieds noirs and their military allies commenced a terrorist war in Algeria and France, until they were crushed, and de Gaulle arranged a peace agreement with the FLN and a referendum that favored independence on July 1, 1962. France accepted 1,380,000 refugees, pieds noirs, and Muslim allies. Of the Muslim solders who helped the French and did not flee, tens of thousands were executed, some when they were forced to clear mines from the Morice Line. The ending of a long war against foreign occupiers is rarely neat and bloodless.

Horne writes of a formerly European district of Algiers, "Despite the . . . bricks and stones of the pieds noirs, were they really here at all?" Perhaps the lesson of "A Savage War of Peace" is that, however painful withdrawal and defeat may be, continuous bloodshed and stalemate are worse.

Lying Like It's 2003 (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

THOSE who forget history may be doomed to repeat it, but who could imagine we'd already be in danger of replaying that rotten year 2003?

Scooter Libby, the mastermind behind the White House's bogus scenarios for ginning up the war in Iraq, is back at Washington's center stage, proudly defending the indefensible in a perjury trial. Ahmad Chalabi, the peddler of flawed prewar intelligence hyped by Mr. Libby, is back in clover in Baghdad, where he purports to lead the government's Shiite-Baathist reconciliation efforts in between visits to his pal Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0119439

Last but never least is Mr. Libby's former boss and Mr. Chalabi's former patron, Dick Cheney, who is back on Sunday-morning television floating fictions about Iraq and accusing administration critics of aiding Al Qaeda. When the vice president went on a tear like this in 2003, hawking Iraq's nonexistent W.M.D. and nonexistent connections to Mohamed Atta, he set the stage for a war that now kills Iraqi civilians in rising numbers (34,000-plus last year) that are heading into the genocidal realms of Saddam. Mr. Cheney's latest sales pitch is for a new plan for "victory" promising an even bigger bloodbath.

Mr. Cheney was honest, at least, when he said that the White House's Iraq policy would remain "full speed ahead!" no matter what happened on Nov. 7. Now it is our patriotic duty — politicians, the press and the public alike — to apply the brakes. Our failure to check the administration when it rushed into Iraq in 2003 will look even more shameful to history if we roll over again for a reboot in 2007. For all the belated Washington scrutiny of the war since the election, and for all the heralded (if so far symbolic) Congressional efforts to challenge it, too much lip service is still being paid to the deceptive P.R. strategies used by the administration to sell its reckless policies. This time we must do what too few did the first time: call the White House on its lies. Lies should not be confused with euphemisms like "incompetence" and "denial."

Mr. Cheney's performance last week on "Fox News Sunday" illustrates the problem; his lying is nowhere near its last throes. Asked by Chris Wallace about the White House's decision to overrule commanders who recommended against a troop escalation, the vice president said, "I don't think we've overruled the commanders." He claimed we've made "enormous progress" in Iraq. He said the administration is not "embattled." (Well, maybe that one is denial.)

This White House gang is so practiced in lying with a straight face that it never thinks twice about recycling its greatest hits. Hours after Mr. Cheney's Fox interview, President Bush was on "60 Minutes," claiming that before the war "everybody was wrong on weapons of mass destruction" and that "the minute we found out" the W.M.D. didn't exist he "was the first to say so." Everybody, of course, was not wrong on W.M.D., starting with the United Nations weapons inspection team in Iraq. Nor was Mr. Bush the first to come clean once the truth became apparent after the invasion. On May 29, 2003 — two days after a secret Defense Intelligence Agency-sponsored mission found no biological weapons in trailers captured by American forces — Mr. Bush declared: "We found the weapons of mass destruction. We found biological laboratories."

But that's all W.M.D under the bridge. The most important lies to watch for now are the new ones being reiterated daily by the administration's top brass, from Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney on down. You know fiasco awaits America when everyone in the White House is reading in unison from the same fictional script, as they did back in the day when "mushroom clouds" and "uranium from Africa" were the daily drumbeat.

The latest lies are custom-made to prop up the new "way forward" that is anything but. Among the emerging examples is a rewriting of the history of Iraq's sectarian violence. The fictional version was initially laid out by Mr. Bush in his Jan. 10 prime-time speech and has since been repeated on television by both Mr. Cheney and the national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, last Sunday and by Mr. Bush again on PBS's "NewsHour" on Tuesday. It goes like this: sectarian violence didn't start spiraling out of control until the summer of 2006, after Sunni terrorists bombed the Golden Mosque in Samarra and forced the Shiites to take revenge.

But as Mark Seibel of McClatchy Newspapers noted last week, "the president's account understates by at least 15 months when Shiite death squads began targeting Sunni politicians and clerics." They were visible in embryo long before that; The Times, among others, reported as far back as September 2003 that Shiite militias were becoming more radical, dangerous and anti-American. The reasons Mr. Bush pretends that Shiite killing started only last year are obvious enough. He wants to duck culpability for failing to recognize the sectarian violence from the outset — much as he failed to recognize the Sunni insurgency before it — and to underplay the intractability of the civil war to which he will now sacrifice fresh American flesh.

An equally big lie is the administration's constant claim that it is on the same page as Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki as we go full speed ahead. Only last month Mr. Maliki told The Wall Street Journal that he wished he "could be done with" his role as Iraq's leader "before the end of this term." Now we are asked to believe not merely that he is a strongman capable of vanquishing the death squads of the anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, his political ally, but also that he can be trusted to produce the troops he failed to supply in last year's failed Baghdad crackdown. Yet as recently as November, there still wasn't a single Iraqi battalion capable of fighting on its own.

DOJ_NMG_0119440

Hardly a day passes without Mr. Maliki mocking the White House's professed faith in him. In the past week or so alone, he has presided over a second botched hanging (despite delaying it for more than two weeks to put in place new guidelines), charged Condi Rice with giving a "morale boost to the terrorists" because she criticized him, and overruled American objections to appoint an obscure commander from deep in Shiite territory to run the Baghdad "surge." His government doesn't even try to hide its greater allegiance to Iran. Mr. Maliki's foreign minister has asked for the release of the five Iranians detained in an American raid on an Iranian office in northern Iraq this month and, on Monday, called for setting up more Iranian "consulates" in Iraq.

The president's pretense that Mr. Maliki and his inept, ill-equipped, militia-infiltrated security forces can advance American interests in this war is Neville Chamberlain-like in its naiveté and disingenuousness. An American military official in Baghdad read the writing on the wall to The Times last week: "We are implementing a strategy to embolden a government that is actually part of the problem. We are being played like a pawn." That's why the most destructive lie of all may be the White House's constant refrain that its doomed strategy is the only one anyone has proposed. Administration critics, Mr. Cheney said last Sunday, "have absolutely nothing to offer in its place," as if the Iraq Study Group, John Murtha and Joseph Biden-Leslie Gelb plans, among others, didn't predate the White House's own.

In reality we're learning piece by piece that it is the White House that has no plan. Ms. Rice has now downsized the surge/escalation into an "augmentation," inadvertently divulging how the Pentagon is improvising, juggling small deployments in fits and starts. No one can plausibly explain how a parallel chain of command sending American and Iraqi troops into urban street combat side by side will work with Iraqis in the lead (it will report to a "committee" led by Mr. Maliki!). Or how $1 billion in new American reconstruction spending will accomplish what the $30 billion thrown down the drain in previous reconstruction spending did not.

All of this replays 2003, when the White House refused to consider any plan, including existing ones in the Pentagon and State Department bureaucracies, for coping with a broken post-Saddam Iraq. Then, as at every stage of the war since, the only administration plan was for a propaganda campaign to bamboozle American voters into believing "victory" was just around the corner.

The next push on the "way forward" propaganda campaign arrives Tuesday night, with the State of the Union address. The good news is that the Democrats have chosen Jim Webb, the new Virginia senator, to give their official response. Mr. Webb, a Reagan administration Navy secretary and the father of a son serving in Iraq, has already provoked a testy exchange about the war with the president at a White House reception for freshmen in Congress. He's the kind of guy likely to keep a scorecard of the lies on Tuesday night. But whether he does or not, it's incumbent on all those talking heads who fell for "shock and awe" and "Mission Accomplished" in 2003 to not let history repeat itself in 2007. Facing the truth is the only way forward in Iraq.

A Chance For Unity On Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The change of command in Iraq offers an opportunity to move past the divisive domestic debate over the deployment of more troops to Baghdad and instead put the pressure where it belongs -- on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

When Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander in Iraq, goes before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Tuesday, lawmakers are likely to hear a very different presentation from what they usually get from the Pentagon.

Rather than ask the senators to grant him free rein to operate as he wishes, Petraeus is ready, I am told, to invite and encourage the closest kind of congressional scrutiny of what is happening in Iraq.

The suggestion made here last week that Congress require frequent briefings from Petraeus and the embassy in Baghdad, to ensure that Maliki is keeping his promises to supply troops and avoid political interference, is one that Petraeus is prepared to endorse.

The weekly schedule that I suggested is too frequent for the general; it would take up too much staff time. But he could manage a biweekly schedule of closed briefings, and it would accomplish the same goal -- a constant reminder to Maliki that if he fails to cooperate with the strategic plan, any remaining support in Congress for his government will disappear.

DOJ_NMG_0119441

Petraeus's offer, which I am told will be made in explicit terms unless his civilian bosses in the Pentagon and White House intervene, provides the best avenue yet to appear for dealing with the mess in Iraq.

It will not satisfy those in Congress who would like to block or protest the "surge" of additional troops into Iraq ordered by President Bush. But the resolutions and legislation they are discussing will not keep Bush from carrying out his plan.

In effect, Petraeus is offering a way to convert the opposition to the war that is growing in both Republican and Democratic ranks into leverage on Maliki. Together, they can hold the prime minister to his pledge to go after all the combatants -- Shiites as well as Sunnis -- and to provide the troops for the fight.

What makes this possible is the character of the new commander in Iraq. Petraeus, who will get his fourth star with this new assignment, is a tested combat leader, the former commanding officer of the 101st Airborne Division. But Petraeus, who has a PhD from Princeton, also is co-author of the Army guide to counterinsurgency warfare and is a sophisticated student of both Iraqi and U.S. politics.

He knows what he needs to do to secure congressional support for his mission. And he has a realistic appraisal of the people he is dealing with in Baghdad and is quite willing to lean hard on them.

In fact, even before the change of command in Iraq, Petraeus has sent a trusted translator to start preparing the Maliki government for the closer monitoring that lies ahead; he was in the picture when Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton met with Maliki during her recent visit to Iraq.

In his testimony, the general is expected to tell lawmakers that he believes the "surge" of 21,500 additional soldiers and Marines into Iraq can help suppress the sectarian violence in Baghdad -- if Maliki keeps his end of the bargain.

If the streets are safe, it will be easier to insist that the Iraqis working in the ministries do their jobs, without fear of retaliation against their families or themselves.

But Petraeus, who spent 18 months trying to organize the training of Iraqi army and police forces in an earlier phase of the war, knows how tough a challenge it will be to improve either the Iraqi military or its bureaucracy. When then-Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld pulled him out of Iraq to run the Army Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., Sen. John McCain, among others, was furious that the ablest American in Iraq had been reassigned.

Returning to an Iraq where the security situation is now far worse, Petraeus is guardedly hopeful about the military mission.

But even if the violence can be quelled, a major concern is whether the other parts of our government -- notably the State Department -- are prepared for the effort it will take to get the Iraq economy up and running, unemployment down, the oil industry operating, and the government ministries delivering the basic services people need and expect.

The challenge is immense, but for a change, there is a chance to get the full weight of our government pulling in the same direction. Congress ought to seize the opportunity.

20 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 20 -- A U.S. Black Hawk helicopter crashed Saturday afternoon northeast of the capital, killing all 13 American soldiers on board, and at least seven soldiers died in other parts of the country, officials said. The deaths made the day the third-deadliest for U.S. service members in Iraq since the war began.

The incidents came as the Bush administration was extending the tours of some troops in Iraq and sending additional ones for a buildup that has met strong resistance in Congress. The administration has billed the increase as a key step toward securing the viability of Iraq's young government and bringing down the level of violence.

The helicopter went down about 3 p.m. in a barren area south of Baqubah in Diyala province. According to media reports, several parts of the province have come under Sunni insurgent control in recent months.

The military said the cause of the crash was under investigation.

"We can't confirm what the cause of the incident was," said Lt. Col. Josslyn L. Aberle, a military spokeswoman. "That's a big part of the investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0119442

Another helicopter traveling nearby, as is standard in military operations, remained in the air awaiting backup after the crash, Aberle said. "We had aircraft support within minutes," she said. A response team landed and cordoned off the scene, Aberle said.

Navy Capt. Frank Pascual, a member of a U.S. media relations team in the United Arab Emirates, told al-Arabiya television that the helicopter was believed to have suffered technical troubles before going down, the Associated Press reported.

Arkan al-Mujamai, 28, a day laborer who lives near the crash site, said in a telephone interview that the helicopter was shot down by a group of Sunni Muslim insurgents, one of whom is his uncle.

Mujamai said six Sunni insurgents were planting roadside bombs in the area when they saw a helicopter flying low overhead. One of the insurgents shot it down with a heavy machine gun, he said. Five of the insurgents, including his uncle, were missing Saturday night, and one returned with a wound on the left side of his upper body, he said.

Mujamai has provided The Washington Post with reliable information during past interviews, but his account Saturday could not be independently verified.

According to a database on military deaths kept by The Washington Post, 164 Americans have died in helicopter crashes in Iraq during the war.

Saturday's casualties included five soldiers who were killed in the southern city of Karbala after a military facility came under attack, the military said in a statement released late Saturday. The attack was carried out by an "illegally armed militia group," which ambushed the soldiers with grenades, guns and other weapons, the statement said. Three soldiers were wounded while fighting back, it said.

Local Iraqi officials and Iraqi and U.S. military personnel are stationed at the facility, which serves as a coordination center, the military said. The attack came as the soldiers were holding a meeting to ensure the safety of Shiite pilgrims during a coming holiday.

A Multinational Division Baghdad soldier was killed Saturday by an improvised explosive device while patrolling a neighborhood in the northern part of the capital, the military said in a statement.

A Task Force Lightning soldier assigned to the 1st Cavalry Division's 4th Brigade was killed by an improvised explosive device in Nineveh province in northern Iraq. Two soldiers were injured by the explosion. Earlier in the week, the unit had arrested 12 suspected insurgents while conducting raids in northern Baghdad "to disrupt militia activities," according to the statement.

The deadly string of incidents came on the eve of the Islamic new year, which starts Sunday.

At least two other service members were killed Friday, according to statements issued by the military, including a Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 who died of injuries sustained in what the military described as "enemy action" in Anbar province in western Iraq and a soldier who died in combat in Nineveh province.

The military said the names of the service members would be released after their relatives had been notified.

Meanwhile Saturday, two men were arrested trying to sneak a car bomb into Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, the military said.

The day was also deadly for Iraqis. In Khalis, a city in Diyala province, Saad Zowanie, a local prosecutor, was killed, according to Ali Khaiyam, a Diyala police spokesman. Elsewhere in the province, eight men were killed when U.S. helicopters bombed an area northeast of Baqubah, Khaiyam said.

Helicopter Crash Claims 13 On Deadly Day For U.S. In Iraq (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 20 — On one of the deadliest days for United States forces since the Iraq war began, an American helicopter crashed in a Sunni area north of Baghdad on Saturday, killing all 13 people onboard, the United States military said.

Iraqi officials in the area said it had been shot down, though there was no immediate confirmation from American officials.

In separate episodes, five American soldiers were killed and three wounded in a battle with gunmen who attacked the local governor's office in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, and two soldiers died from other attacks, military officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0119443

It was not clear whether all those on the helicopter were Americans. If they were, 20 uniformed Americans died Saturday. On the worst day of the war for American forces, Jan. 26, 2005, 37 American service members died. Thirty-one of them died when a Marine helicopter crashed in the western desert, and six others in combat that day.

An Interior Ministry official and the police in Diyala Province said Saturday that the American helicopter was shot down about 4 p.m. by insurgents who had fired missiles or grenades from at least two locations. It crashed near Tarrafa Village, they said, over a rural area near the Diyala River.

The American military said that debris had been immediately surrounded and secured. Several hours after the crash, soldiers were still combing through the wreckage.

A spokesman declined to provide details on the type of aircraft or how it crashed. The number of people aboard suggested that it had been a Black Hawk transport helicopter, which typically carries about 10 passengers and 4 crew members.

The crash occurred northeast of Baghdad near Baquba, where American and Iraqi forces have been battling Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia forces for months.

The American military also announced seven other deaths on Saturday and three deaths from earlier in the week. In addition to the five soldiers killed during the battle in Karbala, a soldier was killed in northern Baghdad on Saturday when a roadside bomb exploded near his patrol, and another, assigned to a unit of engineers, died of wounds from a roadside bomb in northern Iraq.

The three earlier deaths were of a sailor from Brooklyn who died Wednesday in a "noncombat-related incident" at Camp Bucca, an American-run detention center in southern Iraq; a marine who died Friday from wounds suffered in combat in Anbar Province; and a soldier who died Friday after being wounded by a roadside bomb in Tikrit, north of Baghdad.

The gun battle in Karbala started when "an illegally armed militia," according to a statement from the American military, attacked the offices of the provincial government in Karbala with guns and grenades.

Brig. Gen. Vincent K. Brooks, deputy commander for Multi-National Division-Baghdad, said American and Iraqi security forces were meeting at the time of the attack to ensure that Shiite pilgrims would be safe during the celebrations later this month for Ashura, one of Shiite Islam's holiest days, which marks the seventh-century martyrdom of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson, Hussein.

Iraqi state television reported that at least two dozen gunmen assaulted the building, getting inside, and drawing a response from American troops who were dropped by helicopter onto the roof.

Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a military spokesman, said it was not clear who or how many had attacked. By 10 p.m., the building had been secured, he said.

"It was never lost," he said. "It came under fire from a couple of directions. We responded to it."

The attack nonetheless seemed to be the latest in a series of power struggles in the south among a patchwork of Shiite tribes and political parties. American officials have been pressing the government of Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to set a date for provincial elections, which they said would firmly establish new leaders and possibly reduce the fighting.

Iraqi state television reported that a raid in south Baghdad on Saturday, with around 100 Iraqi police commandos backed by six United States helicopters, killed 15 suspected Sunni Arab insurgents.

The police found 29 bodies in the capital, many with gunshot wounds to the head.

U.S. Copter Crash Claims 13 In Iraq (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

BAGHDAD - A U.S. Army helicopter crashed northeast of the capital yesterday, killing all 13 persons on board on one of the deadliest days for U.S. forces since the Iraq war began. At least five other American soldiers died in an attack blamed on militiamen in the city of Karbala.

The crash and other deaths came as a brigade of the U.S. 82nd Airborne Division arrived in Baghdad and prepared for deployment in early February the first of the 21,500-troop buildup ordered by President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0119444

The division's 2nd Brigade with 3,200 soldiers will "assist Iraqi Security Forces to clear, control and retain key areas of the capital city in order to reduce violence and to set the conditions for a transition to full Iraqi control of security in the city," the military said.

The military gave little information on the crash of the Black Hawk during good weather in Diyala province, where U.S. and Iraqi forces have been battling Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite militias around the city of Baqouba for months.

Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a U.S. spokeswoman, said the cause of the crash had not been determined. Navy Capt. Frank Pascual, a member of a U.S. media-relations team in the United Arab Emirates, told Al Arabiya television that the helicopter was believed to have suffered technical troubles before going down.

It was the fourth-deadliest crash since the war started in March 2003. The worst occurred Jan. 26, 2005, when a Marine transport helicopter went down during a sandstorm in the western desert. Thirty Marines and one sailor were killed the most U.S. personnel to die in a single incident in Iraq.

The U.S. military later reported that militia fighters attacked a provincial headquarters in the Shi'ite Muslim holy city of Karbala, killing five American soldiers and wounding three last night.

The military said "an illegally armed militia group" attacked the building with grenades, small arms and "indirect fire," which usually means mortars or rockets.

"A meeting was taking place at the time of the attack to ensure the security of Shi'ite pilgrims participating in the Ashoura commemorations," said Brig. Gen. Vincent K. Brooks, deputy commander of the Multi-National Division-Baghdad.

Karbala is 50 miles south of Baghdad and thousands of Shi'ite pilgrims are flocking to the city to mark the 10-day Ashoura festival commemorating the death of one of Shi'ite Islam's most sacred saints, Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

Gen. Brooks said Iraqi officials and security forces as well as U.S. troops were present at the meeting, but his statement did not mention other casualties from the attack. It said the headquarters had "been secured by coalition and Iraqi security forces."

Earlier, Karbala Gov. Akeel al-Khazaali had reported that U.S. troops raided the provincial headquarters looking for wanted men but left with no prisoners. But Gen. Brooks said that report was incorrect.

The general did not identify any group suspected of staging the attack, but residents reached by telephone had reported seeing military helicopters flying over the local headquarters of anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi's Army militia, which has been accused of playing a big role in sectarian killings, has been hit repeatedly in recent weeks by operations in which key commanders have been captured or killed by U.S. and Iraqi troops.

Also yesterday, the U.S. military announced that combat Friday had killed an Army soldier in Nineveh province and a Marine in Anbar province, a Sunni insurgent stronghold west of the capital.

In south Baghdad, U.S. helicopters dropped Iraqi police commandos into the dangerous Dora neighborhood to stage a raid on the Omar Brigade, an al Qaeda-linked Sunni militant group, Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul-Karim Khalaf said.

Mr. Khalaf said 15 insurgents were killed and five captured during an intense battle at two abandoned houses taken over by Sunni gunmen, who he blamed for a series of kidnappings and killings in a bid to cleanse the once-mixed neighborhood of Shi'ite residents.

"We were provided with helicopter support by our friends in the multinational forces, and we did not suffer any casualties," Mr. Khalaf said. U.S. aircraft gave covering fire, but the U.S. military did not respond to a request for comment on the raid.

Sheik al-Sadr's followers voiced increasing anger over Friday's capture of a senior aide to the radical cleric in a raid in eastern Baghdad.

Nassar al-Rubaie, the head of Sheik al-Sadr's bloc in parliament, accused U.S. forces of trying to provoke the Sadrists into violence during the expanding campaign to quell Iraq's fighting.

"We condemn strongly the arrest of Sheik Abdul-Hadi al-Darraji. He is moderate and well-known as a media personality and always available in negotiations," Mr. al-Rubaie said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces reportedly detained Mr. al-Darraji during a raid on a mosque complex before dawn Friday.

Police reported at least 16 Iraqis slain in attacks yesterday. In addition, officials said 29 bodies were found in Baghdad and three in the northern city of Mosul, most of them showing signs of torture a hallmark of killings by sectarian death squads.

DOJ_NMG_0119445

At Least 19 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

Most perish in a copter crash. U.S. asserts cause is unknown; a witness says craft was downed.

At least 19 U.S. troops were killed in a helicopter crash and insurgent attacks across Iraq on Saturday in the deadliest day for the American military here in nearly two years.

The U.S. military also reported the deaths of two other troops the previous day, and the surge in fatalities just days before President Bush's State of the Union address was likely to inject a note of urgency into the debate over his Iraq policy.

The day's deadliest episode was the crash of a Black Hawk helicopter northeast of Baghdad on Saturday afternoon, killing all 12 U.S. soldiers aboard. The military initially had said 13 were killed but revised it to 12 early today.

South of the capital in the Shiite Muslim city of Karbala, men armed with grenades, mortars and assault rifles swarmed a provincial security building manned by U.S. and Iraqi forces, the military said. At least five U.S. soldiers were killed and three wounded.

Four more U.S. troops and 44 Iraqis were also reported killed or found dead Saturday in politically motivated violence as Iraqi and American forces stepped up an effort to target Shiite militiamen and Sunni Arab insurgents.

U.S. military officials said the cause of Saturday's crash had yet to be determined, but Iraqi sources said it was shot down. A witness said he saw ground fire bring down the aircraft, and an insurgent group claimed responsibility for the attack in an Internet posting that could not be authenticated.

Iraqi officials and witnesses said the crash took place near the town of Buhriz in the region of Tarefiya, a rural Sunni enclave of canals and wheat fields about six miles south of Baqubah, the capital of Diyala province. The area is known as an insurgent stronghold. A recent joint U.S.-Iraqi military offensive focused on Diyala.

Claiming responsibility

A message posted on the Web by the Mujahedin Army, an insurgent group that operates out of Baghdad and Diyala provinces, claimed responsibility for the attack.

"The helicopter was downed by [an] antiaircraft [rocket] that belongs to the Mujahedin Army in Buhriz," said the statement, posted to a website where insurgent claims are frequently trumpeted.

An Iraqi witness, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the helicopter was felled by ground fire.

"I'm not sure if it was a rocket or other projectile," said the man, a farmer. "After the helicopter was fired upon, it was obvious that it was losing control. Then it crashed with an explosion and the smoke started." The farmer said he and others dared not approach the wreckage to look for survivors, fearing that U.S. forces arriving on the scene might fire at them.

The U.S. military could not confirm the account. Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a military spokeswoman in Baghdad, said that the crash took place northeast of Baghdad about 3 p.m.

"All passengers and crew were military service members," she wrote in response to an e-mailed query, adding that more information was expected today. The military withheld names of the victims pending notification of family members.

An Iraqi official who spoke on condition of anonymity said U.S. forces had cordoned off a vast area of farmland and sheep pastures.

The U.S. military increasingly has come to rely on helicopters to transport troops between bases as roadside bombs target vehicle convoys. "There are helicopters flying over the area all the time," said the farmer.

Saturday's crash was the first since a U.S. Marine CH-53 transport chopper went down in an accident in Al Anbar province Dec. 11, killing one Marine. Insurgents last shot down a helicopter on May 14, near the village of Yousifiya south of the capital; two soldiers died in that attack.

The deadliest day for American service members in Iraq was Jan. 26, 2005, when 37 U.S. troops were killed, 31 of them in the accidental crash of a CH-53E Super Stallion helicopter in Al Anbar.

The Karbala clash erupted as U.S. and Iraqi officials planned security for the Ashura festival, an annual Shiite pilgrimage. Karbala has come under the sway of Shiite militiamen loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr, but it also is adjacent to Sunni areas. A statement released by the military did not clarify whether the attackers were suspected Sunni or Shiite gunmen.

DOJ_NMG_0119446

New U.S. troops arrive

The sharp rise in American military deaths comes as the U.S. intensifies its efforts to curb violence in Baghdad, with Pentagon planners and White House officials pushing forward with a plan to increase the number of U.S. soldiers in Iraq by 21,500.

The first of the additional troops, the 3,200 soldiers of the 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, have arrived in Baghdad and will be "fully operational" within two weeks, the U.S. military said today in a statement. Their mission will be to help Iraqi security forces "clear, control and retain key areas" of Baghdad "to reduce violence and to set the conditions for a transition to full Iraqi control of security in the city," the military said.

Bush and other supporters of the plan say it is an essential move to give the Iraqi government breathing space to crack down on violent groups and heal political wounds.

Opponents, including Democratic Party leaders in Congress and some skeptical Republicans, consider it a risky escalation that could bolster anti-American sentiment in Iraq and across the Middle East, and lead to more U.S. casualties. Since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, 3,047 U.S. troops have died in Iraq, according to icasualties.org.

Four other Americans were reported killed in separate incidents.

One soldier in northern Baghdad and another in northern Iraq were killed Saturday when their convoys struck roadside bombs, and the U.S. military reported that two troops had died the previous day.

A soldier assigned to the 1st Cavalry Division near Mosul died Friday from injuries sustained from an improvised explosive device, the official term for a roadside bomb. Two soldiers were injured in the bombing. And a Marine died of wounds he sustained Friday in combat in Al Anbar, a news release said.

U.S. military leaders have identified Shiite militias as the greatest threat to Iraq's stability. American troops raided the capital's main emergency hospital Saturday morning, seizing the weapons of security guards believed to be linked to Sadr's Al Mahdi militia, hospital and police officials said.

Iraqi forces said the U.S. military seized AK-47s and machine guns ostensibly used by the guards to protect the facility, which has come under repeated attack by insurgents.

One hospital employee said the Americans searched the hospital for a person who allegedly belongs to the Al Mahdi army. They were not able to identify the individual, and the guards were released after being told they'd face arrest if they were seen with weapons again, Iraqi officials at the hospital said.

Iraq's Health Ministry is controlled by Shiites loyal to Sadr. U.S. military commanders have complained privately that Sadr loyalists have turned the ministry into a political and fundraising tool. Sunnis complain that they're denied healthcare services or targeted for kidnapping and assassination upon entering state-controlled hospitals and clinics.

"It is known by everyone in Iraq that [the ministry] is fully occupied by Sadrists and the Mahdi army," said Saleh Mutlak, a Sunni lawmaker. "They removed all the previous officials and they got new ones. Everybody there has to swear his loyalty to the Mahdi army and Muqtada Sadr, otherwise he will not stay."

The 5:30 a.m. raid on Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital followed Friday arrest of Sheik Abdul-Hadi Darraji, a Sadr deputy and frequent spokesman, by U.S. and Iraqi troops.

Sunni suspects detained

U.S. forces also detained 25 people they described as suspected terrorists in Sunni enclaves north and west of Baghdad, a news release said.

Authorities in Baghdad said they discovered the bodies of 29 Iraqi civilians, all apparently victims of sectarian death squads, that had been dumped in various parts of the capital.

Mortar battles between neighboring Shiite and Sunni enclaves in northern Baghdad left at least four dead and 18 injured. Gunmen ambushed and killed a ranking Ministry of Interior official in northern Baghdad.

Near the provincial capital of Hillah, south of Baghdad, authorities discovered the bullet-riddled body of a man in his 30s. Unidentified gunmen in another town opened fire on a crowd, killing one.

Gunmen in the town of Madaen, a suburb south of the capital, broke into two houses and killed three people, including two women.

DOJ_NMG_0119447

daragahi@latimes.com

Times staff writers Said Rifai and Mohammed Rasheed and special correspondents in Baghdad, Baqubah, Hillah and Kirkuk contributed to this report.

U.S.: Brigade Soon Ready For Baghdad (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 21, 2007

A newly arrived brigade of the U.S. 82nd Airborne Division, the first of the 21,500-troop buildup ordered by President Bush, will be ready to join the fresh drive to quell sectarian violence in the capital by the start of next month, the American military said Sunday.

The 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne has 3,200 soldiers who will "assist Iraqi Security Forces to clear, control and retain key areas of the capital city in order to reduce violence and to set the conditions for a transition to full Iraqi control of security in the city," the military said in a statement.

The announcement came a day after at least 20 U.S. service members were killed in Iraq on Saturday, the highest daily toll in two years for American forces.

Four more brigades were expected to be deployed to Iraq between now and May, mainly in Baghdad, as part of Bush's plan to back Iraqi forces in a third attempt in less than a year to clamp off the raging sectarian warfare that has shattered the Iraqi capital.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has pledged to put an about equal number of Iraqi troops on the streets and has vowed they will target both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia fighters.

Al-Maliki has promised he will no longer block action against the Mahdi Army militia, the armed wing of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an ally of al-Maliki. The militia is believed responsible for much of the sectarian bloodshed in Baghdad, where the Health Ministry said about 16,000 people died in the violence last year.

Since the Bush and al-Maliki announced the planned drive against militants, U.S. and Iraqi special forces have regularly killed or captured a number of Mahdi Army commanders. The drive against Sunni insurgents has increased as well, with elite Iraqi police commandos reported to have killed 15 members of the al-Qaida-linked Omar Brigade in a U.S.-backed airborne assault on Saturday.

Kurdish Troops From North Deserting (BOS/MCT)

By Leila Fadel And Yaseen Taha,

The Boston Globe/McClatchy, January 21, 2007

Loyalties are with militia, not with Iraq

SULAIMANIYAH, Iraq -- As the Iraqi government attempts to secure a capital city ravaged by conflict between Sunni and Shi'ite Muslim Arabs, its decision to bring a third party into the mix may cause more problems than peace.

Kurdish soldiers from northern Iraq, who are mostly Sunnis but not Arabs, are deserting the army to avoid the civil war in Baghdad, a conflict they consider someone else's problem.

The Iraqi Army brigades being sent to the capital are filled with former members of a Kurdish militia, the peshmerga, that's the armed wing of President Jalal Talabani of Iraq's political party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan. Most remain loyal to that militia.

Much as Shi'ite militias have infiltrated the Iraqi security forces across Arab Iraq, the peshmerga fill the ranks of the Iraqi Army in the Kurdish region in the north, poised to secure a semi-independent Kurdistan and seize oil-rich Kirkuk and parts of Mosul if Iraq falls apart. One thing they didn't bank on, they said, was being sent into the "fire" of Baghdad.

"The soldiers don't know the Arabic language, the Arab tradition, and they don't have any experience fighting terror," said Anwar Dolani, a former peshmerga commander who leads the brigade that's being transferred to Baghdad from the Kurdish city of Sulaimaniyah.

Dolani called the desertions a "phenomenon" but refused to say how many soldiers have left the army.

DOJ_NMG_0119448

"I can't deny that a number of soldiers have deserted the army, and it might increase due to the ferocious military operations in Baghdad," he said.

"This is the biggest performance through which we can test them," said Lieutenant General Ali Ghaidan, the commander of land forces for the Iraqi Ministry of Defense. The Kurdish soldiers will be using translators, and they'll start off doing less dangerous tasks such as manning checkpoints with Arab soldiers, he said.

In interviews, however, soldiers in Sulaimaniyah expressed loyalty to their Kurdish brethren, not to Iraq. Many said they'd already deserted, and those who are going to Baghdad said they'd flee if the situation there became too difficult.

"I joined the army to be a soldier in my homeland, among my people. Not to fight for others who I have nothing to do with," said Ameen Kareem, 38, who took a week's leave with other soldiers from his brigade in the Kurdish city of Erbil and never returned. "I used to fight in the mountains and valleys, not in the streets."

Kareem said he knew that deserting was risky, but he said he'd rather be behind bars in Kurdistan than a "soldier in Baghdad's fire." Without the language and with his Kurdish features, he was sure he would stand out, he said. He's a Kurd, he said, and he has no reason to become a target in an Arab war.

Now he drives a taxi in Sulaimaniyah, eking out a living and praying that he doesn't get caught.

Other soldiers in Sulaimaniyah also said they didn't want to be involved in someone else's war.

Farman Mohammed, 42, celebrated the Muslim Eid holiday with his family last month and didn't go back when he heard that he might be deployed to Baghdad. Afraid for his life, he found a new job and settled in with his family.

"The fanatic Sunnis in Baghdad kill the Shi'ites and vice versa. Both of them are outraged against the Kurds. They will not hesitate to kill us and accuse us of being collaborators with the occupiers," he said. "How can we face them alone?"

Those who are planning to go to Baghdad said they didn't want to be considered cowards.

Mohammed Abdoul, 41, reluctantly prepared to leave for the Iraqi capital earlier this week.

"I don't know why we should interfere in this Sunni-Shi'ite war," he said. "If I am going to face a difficult task in Baghdad and feel sectarian tension, I will leave the army forever, come back to Sulaimaniyah, and work in the market."

An army brigade from Sulaimaniyah began arriving at Muthana Airport in Baghdad last week, and a brigade from Erbil is expected in February, Ghaidan said.

The 1,200 Kurdish soldiers in each of the two brigades from the Kurdish north will be dwarfed by 2,700 soldiers in each brigade that are being brought to Baghdad from the Shi'ite south.

Generals in Erbil and Sulaimaniyah begged the Ministry of Defense to choose brigades out of Kirkuk that spoke Arabic to help in Baghdad, Dolani said. Ghaidan wouldn't explain why entire Kurdish brigades weren't being transferred from the north.

Taming Iraq's "Wild West" (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

HUSAYBAH, IRAQ — It's midday in this farming-and-smuggling town on the Syrian border, and the market square is bustling.

A colorful array of fruits and vegetables and plump fish from both sides of the border is for sale in stalls along the muddy main street. The smell of freshly baked bread permeates the air. The jewelry stores, bridal salon, Internet cafe, pharmacy, and bicycle and butcher shops are crowded with customers. So is the pool hall.

"Business is good," Ahmed Ratib, the town cobbler, said as he nailed new heels on a pair of shoes. "Not like in the past."

Two years ago, the same streets were fraught with roadside bombs and snipers, and sellers and buyers stayed away. The area was considered too dangerous even for a quick tour by a U.S. general in his armored Humvee.

The Qaim region was routinely described, including in The Times, as an out-of-control "wild west" where the Marines were fighting with only limited success to control the smuggling of insurgent fighters and weapons from Syria.

Today, Marines walk the downtown beat, chatting with residents, fielding their complaints, encouraging them to contact the Iraqi police if they suspect insurgent activity.

DOJ_NMG_0119449

In a country studded with areas where the U.S. has either failed or made only limited progress toward stabilization, Husaybah and the surrounding Qaim region stand out as a success, officials said.

A State Department counterinsurgency expert, who is based in Iraq, lists Qaim as "very good," Fallouja as "good but backsliding" and Ramadi as "a mess" (a description the commanding officer there disputes).

The effort has combined U.S. military and economic power, backed by help from the municipal and tribal leadership.

In fall 2005, the Marines launched a massive effort to find weapons caches and confront insurgent sanctuaries in this part of Al Anbar province. A follow-up campaign is underway to the northeast of Husaybah, along both sides of the Euphrates River.

The U.S. also has several improvement projects underway, including a 10-lane port of entry from Syria that should provide an economic boost. Marines are assisting the health clinic and hospital, and the U.S. is funding construction of a jobs center and vehicle registration site.

Despite the improvement, problems persist. The port-of-entry project, being built by an American company with Iraqi workers and British security guards, is behind schedule, in part because building materials were hijacked.

Insurgents routinely hijack gasoline trucks coming from Baghdad. A City Council member was recently arrested on suspicion of insurgent activity, and bombers have tried to knock out the telephone system. The mayor needs bodyguards around the clock.

Hundreds of families are said to be coming here to escape Baghdad, which could lead to a struggle for housing and jobs.

"We had better get some tents and be ready," said Capt. Sean Wilson, commander of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 4th Regiment, as he continued walking the beat with his troops.

But Husaybah also has major advantages, including a mayor who refuses to be intimidated and has brokered a deal with local sheiks to get their support in fighting insurgents. The sheiks, whose tribes are spread on both sides of the border, were reluctant; but last fall they committed themselves to the fight.

Calling themselves the Protectors of the Desert, the sheiks have pledged to eliminate insurgents. U.S. officials, to avoid the rise of private militias, have asked that the sheiks instead urge tribesmen to carry on the fight by joining the police force or army. Hundreds of young men have volunteered for the police force and been sent to the police academy in Jordan, at U.S. expense.

"Things were very bad here in the past," said Farhan Farhan, mayor of Husaybah and Qaim. "The tribes and the people decided to fight, along with the Iraqi forces and the Americans. The terrorists only wanted to kill innocent people."

Marines are encouraged to spread the idea that the U.S. is not an occupying power but a transition force, in place until Iraqi security forces are ready to take charge.

"We try to be genuine, to show them we're trying to make things better," said Lance Cpl. Carey Tennison, 26, of San Antonio. "We appreciate that they want to control their own town. They just don't know how to do it yet."

President Bush, in a speech this month, said the Baghdad government had promised to take full responsibility for all provinces by November.

The next day, Col. William Crowe, commander of the Twentynine Palms-based 7th Marine Regiment, told a group of enlisted Marines that within months, the Americans may no longer be required in Qaim.

As they walk their beat, Wilson and his troops ask residents about their problems and what changes they hope to see in Husaybah. Some complain that thieves steal goods from the market stalls at night, and others complain about the paucity of fuel at the government gas station.

When asked about their own actions to help their town, the residents often reply that something will happen, inshallah — God willing.

Mohammed Ali was out shopping for dinner when Marines stopped to talk. He had a plastic bag of greens and radishes and offered the Marines a taste.

"Do you want the Americans to go home?" the captain asked.

"Someday, but not yet — too many Ali Babas [thieves] are still here," Ali said.

After more talk of the radishes and the good weather, Ali asked, somewhat tentatively, whether the Marines would be leaving soon.

"Inshallah," the captain answered.

DOJ_NMG_0119450

Army Says Improper Orders By Colonel Led To 4 Deaths (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Army investigators say that Col. Michael D. Steele, a decorated combat veteran and brigade commander in Iraq, issued improper orders to his soldiers that contributed to the deaths of four unarmed Iraqi men during a raid in May, according to military documents.

No charges have been filed against Colonel Steele in the Army's continuing investigation. But two Defense Department officials said last week that Colonel Steele was formally reprimanded in the summer by Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the former commander in Iraq, for not reporting the deaths and other details of the raid. The action was not made public.

The reprimand and the controversy surrounding the raid have effectively ended the career of Colonel Steele, an aggressive officer known for unorthodox methods and who was portrayed in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down" as a fearless fighter during Special Operations missions in Somalia in 1993.

The four Iraqi men were killed on a channel island northwest of Baghdad on May 9 by members of the division's Third Brigade Combat Team, which Colonel Steele commanded. Four soldiers were later charged with murder by military prosecutors, who said they captured the men, then turned them loose and killed them as part of a staged escape attempt. Over the past two weeks, two of the soldiers have pleaded guilty to lesser charges.

The military's administrative investigation into Colonel Steele centered on how he communicated the rules of engagement, the instructions that all soldiers must follow to determine whether they may legally use lethal force against an enemy, to his soldiers before the raid.

The colonel improperly led his soldiers to believe that distinguishing combatants from noncombatants — a main tenet of the military's standing rules of engagement — was not necessary during the May 9 mission, according to a classified report in June by Brig. Gen. Thomas Maffey, a deputy commander tapped by General Chiarelli to investigate Colonel Steele. "A person cannot be targeted on status simply by being present on an objective deemed hostile by an on-scene commander," General Maffey wrote in his June 16 report.

Although the colonel's "miscommunication" of the rules contributed to the deaths of four unarmed Iraqis, General Maffey wrote, formal charges were not warranted "in light of his honest belief of the correctness of the mission R.O.E." The general recommended that Colonel Steele be admonished, a lesser punishment than the formal reprimand he eventually received.

Several soldiers have said in sworn statements that Colonel Steele told them to kill all military-age males. Colonel Steele and two lawyers representing him did not respond to several e-mail and phone messages requesting comment on the case. But in testimony he gave on June 3 to General Maffey and another investigator at an Army garrison in Tikrit, Colonel Steele said he did not use "specific language" to order his soldiers to kill all military-age males, and that "we don't shoot people with their hands up."

On June 10, an investigative report by the 101st Airborne Division's lawyers concluded: "Although clearly unintentional, confusion regarding the R.O.E. was the proximate cause of the death of at least four unarmed individuals, none of whom committed a hostile act or displayed hostile intent."

In his June 3 testimony, Colonel Steele said he told his men that Army intelligence had shown that the island held dozens of fighters for Al Qaeda. "Guys, you are going to get shot coming off the helicopter," Colonel Steele said he told them before the raid. "If you don't get shot, you ought to be surprised."

As it turned out, the assault occurred without encountering any hostile fire, and the soldiers found only unarmed men, women and children. Only excess caution by Colonel Steele's troops spared the Iraqi civilians from being shot, General Maffey wrote in his report.

The military's investigations of Colonel Steele's actions before and after the raid also determined that the fourth Iraqi man killed in the assault was 70 years old, unarmed and not a legitimate target.

After the raid, several soldiers noticed blindfolds and plastic handcuffs on the bodies of three of the men who were killed. Colonel Steele testified that he ordered a junior officer to begin an investigation into the deaths but to avoid reporting any findings to the division commander until the colonel returned from leave a few weeks later.

DOJ_NMG_0119451

The formal reprimand Colonel Steele received effectively blocks any chance for his promotion, according to former and current military officers. “When you’re looking to go from colonel to general, and it’s a 2 percent selection rate, you’re looking to throw people out, and that’s an easy one,” said John D. Hutson, the former judge advocate general of the Navy.

In November, Colonel Steele was reassigned out of Iraq and the 101st Airborne Division to an administrative assignment at Fort McPherson, Ga., where the Army Forces Command oversees the readiness of United States-based active-duty and Army Reserve soldiers. He will work in the unit responsible for Army operations and training, including developing methods of teaching soldiers how to handle enemy detainees, an Army spokesman said.

In addition to the trial of the four soldiers charged in the killings during the raid, an investigation is continuing into whether at least 10 other soldiers from Colonel Steele’s former brigade lied to cover up three of the deaths, according to a classified report in December by the Army’s Criminal Investigative Division. A division spokesman declined to comment on its investigation.

Sunni-Shiite Fight Flares In Broadcasts (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

It was the worst insult a Sunni Iraqi could give to a Shiite countryman.

"You Persian shoe!" politician Mishan al-Jabouri shouted at journalist Sadeq al-Musawi during a panel discussion earlier this month on al-Jazeera television. "I will do things to you that you cannot even imagine."

Musawi gave it back in kind. "You are a thief. . . . Your father killed Kurds. We will settle accounts with all of you," he warned before stomping off the set past the pleading al-Jazeera moderator.

The exchange between two middle-aged men in suits was an up close and personal look at the religious and ethnic divides -- Sunni Muslim vs. Shiite Muslim, Arab vs. Persian -- that President Bush now cites as the main impediments to peace in Iraq. Widely circulated on the Internet in recent weeks, the video clip has fueled sectarian jeers and cheers in chat rooms throughout the Middle East.

For Jabouri, who sparked the shouting by offering a Koranic prayer for "the soul of the martyred president Saddam Hussein," it was welcome free publicity.

"It's spreading around the world," he said of the video in a telephone interview Friday from Damascus, "showing all the people the truth" of what he called the criminal occupation of Iraq by the U.S. military and an Iran-backed Shiite government in Baghdad.

"I've received thousands of letters from this interview, all supporting me. If you go to any tiny village in Saudi Arabia, in the [Persian] Gulf, you'll find discussions about this interview."

Even more popular among the Arab world's majority Sunnis, if press accounts in the region are to be believed, is Jabouri's satellite television station, al-Zawraa. Its battlefield videos of U.S. soldiers and Iraqi Shiites being blown apart with roadside explosions, truck bombs and sniper bullets fired by Sunni insurgents mark the first time such fare -- long an Internet staple -- has had its own television station.

The Bush administration has long charged that mainstream Arab networks such as al-Jazeera provide a platform to terrorists. But communications technology now allows the warring parties in Iraq direct access to audiences in Iraq and beyond.

The Internet videos are ubiquitous. The al-Jazeera clip apparently was first posted, with English subtitles, by the Middle East Media Research Institute, which monitors and distributes audio and video broadcasts from the region, many of them unflattering to Arabs. Macabrely humorous to Western ears, the clip has become a favorite on YouTube and hundreds of other sites.

Al-Zawraa television may prove just as difficult to squelch as the Internet.

A Sunni politician twice elected to the parliament, Jabouri started the station, a mix of standard entertainment and pro-Sunni rants, after Hussein's fall. Last year, he fled to Syria after the Iraqi government charged him with siphoning money from an American-financed project in his native Salahuddin province. In November, security forces shut down the station's Baghdad headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0119452

A month later, the station was back on the air, this time via the Egyptian satellite company Nilesat, with newly violent content featuring crudely recorded Sunni attacks on U.S. soldiers and what were said to be civilian Sunni victims of terrorism by Shiite militias.

Both the U.S. and Iraqi governments protested and asked the Egyptian government to force Nilesat to shut al-Zawraa down. "My understanding as of this weekend was that the broadcast had ceased," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said on Jan. 3.

A few days later, it was back on television screens across the Arab world, albeit with old footage of exploding Humvees and dead bodies looped over and over again, 24 hours a day. Egypt's Sunni government had blocked incoming video feeds to al-Zawraa but said free speech considerations prevented it from being shut off altogether.

Amin Basyouni, board chairman of Cairo-based Nilesat, said no government had asked him to cancel al-Zawraa. "We never interfere with content on any channel from any country in the world," he said. "We are like an airline. Passengers go on board. We never ask them, 'Why are you going to London or Paris?' "

Although conservative critics in the United States and the blogosphere have charged that al-Zawraa is a direct outlet for al-Qaeda in Iraq, Jabouri is most closely affiliated with the Islamic Army of Iraq, made up of ex-Baathists.

"We generally describe this as a Sunni Baathist insurgent media outlet rather than anything else," said a State Department official, who agreed to discuss the issue on condition he not be named. "It certainly isn't al-Qaeda broadcasting in Iraq." Jabouri, the official said, "is what our departed secretary of defense used to refer to as a 'dead-ender.' "

Jabouri denied supporting al-Qaeda and drew a sharp distinction between terrorists and what he called resistance fighters.

"The terrorists . . . the same people who bombed the Trade [Center] towers in New York and the civilian people in Iraq. . . . But there are honest resistance members fighting the invaders of their country," he said.

Despite his televised prayer for Hussein's soul, Jabouri said, he had little sympathy for Hussein. Yet "the way they hanged him and the words they said to him makes Saddam Hussein a semi-idol" to Sunnis, he said.

Jabouri said Friday that, thanks to a contract with Paris-based Eutelsat Communications, he expected to send new material from Iraq "in 48 hours." Eutelsat's Washington office said it had no record of a contract and referred calls to Paris, where no one could be reached late Friday.

The government of Syria, where Jabouri now lives, "does not allow" him to transmit from inside its borders, he said.

But the insurgents can download video images into computers and send them directly to the satellite transmitter via the Internet.

"With two, three or four computers in different places" not under U.S. or Iraqi control, he said, "I can send anywhere in the world."

Banned Station Broadcasts Voice Of Rebels In Iraq (NYT)

By Marc Santora, Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 20 — The video starts with a young American soldier patrolling an Iraqi street. His head is obscured by leaves, so a red target is digitally inserted to draw the viewer's eye. A split second later, the soldier collapses, shot. Martial music kicks in, a jihadi answer to John Philip Sousa. The time and place of the attack scrolls at the bottom of the screen.

Such tapes, along with images of victims of Shiite militias and unflattering coverage of Shiite leaders, are beaming across Iraq and much of the Middle East 24 hours a day, broadcast by a banned Iraqi satellite television station that has become a major information center for the Sunni insurgency — and the focus of a cat-and-mouse hunt that has exasperated and infuriated American and Iraqi forces.

Making the situation even more galling for the authorities, American and Iraqi officials say that money stolen from the United States probably helps pay for the station.

"They do not have programs but buffoonery, blaspheming and support for terrorism," said Jalal al-Din al-Sagheer, a senior member of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Shiite party. "The source of funding for the channel is theft."

DOJ_NMG_0119453

The channel's founder, Meshaan al-Juburi, is a former Sunni member of Parliament who was indicted last February on charges of embezzling millions of American dollars meant to pay for a vast pipeline protection force he had been assigned to help build with recruits from Salahuddin Province. He was accused of collecting salaries for thousands of soldiers who did not exist.

He denied the charges and went into hiding, fleeing to Syria.

But the American and Iraqi officials said he funneled some of the money to Sunni insurgents, and they suspect much of it helped him shift the programming on his channel, Al Zawra ("the gate" in Arabic), from popular music videos and dance shows to gruesome and detailed death scenes.

Iraqi officials said Mr. Juburi made the switch to irritate his critics, and to try and buy himself protection from prosecution.

"He started showing the insurgency videos just to be close to the resistance," said Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni Arab and speaker of Parliament. "Because the only thing that can save him from punishment is for the Iraqi government to collapse."

Iraqi officials banned the station on Nov. 5, focusing on its anti-Shiite footage and accusing it of "agitating the people against a large Iraqi sect with killing and genocide." Since then, the station has become a pirate outfit, fleeing new, makeshift headquarters at least twice.

Some top American military officials say they have aggressively tried to find where the broadcasts originate to put an end to them, but so far they have failed.

Baha al-Araji, a Shiite member of Parliament familiar with efforts to cut off the station, said the Iraqi government had also asked Nilesat, the Egyptian broadcaster responsible for transmitting the station via satellite, to cancel its contract with Al Zawra. So far, the company has refused, and the Egyptian government has rejected requests to intervene.

Iraqi officials said Nilesat promised not to renew Al Zawra's contract, though they did not know when it would expire.

The station's popularity is being aided by growing fears among Sunnis in neighboring countries of Shiite domination in Iraq, fears Al Zawra stokes through the often gruesome videotape of what it identifies as death-squad victims.

As neighborhoods in Baghdad and elsewhere continue to be purged of Sunnis, the broadcasts prominently list the names of areas that have been taken over, advocating bloody vengeance. And even as America considers sending more troops to Iraq, in part to protect Sunnis from being slaughtered, the channel is meant to inspire resistance.

Mr. Juburi's critics said he has a history of parlaying political favor into personal fortunes. Iraqi officials said he made millions as a cigarette supplier under Saddam Hussein, and later ingratiated himself with Americans searching for Sunnis to bring into Iraq's new government.

Mr. Juburi now lives openly and comfortably in Syria.

He refused requests for an interview, but has often appeared on other Arab satellite channels to defend the station. Earlier this month on Al Jazeera, he debated Sadiq al-Musawi, a Shiite Iraqi political analyst, condemning Iraq's government and what he described as an ambitious effort to "defame" Al Zawra.

In an interview conducted via e-mail, a representative of Al Zawra, who did not reveal his name, said that the station's leaders had been a direct target of the Americans, and forced to move twice. The representative railed against the Americans and the Shiite militias, as well as the government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

"Our media's message is to broadcast the voice of the resisters to the American and Iranian occupation, to reveal the crimes of Badr Organization and Moktada's army and the gangs of Maliki," the representative said, citing two prominent Shiite militias, "and document it and work on forming a legal directorate to prosecute them in international courts for the crimes of genocide against the Sunni Arabs in Iraq."

When the station shuttered its Baghdad office several months ago, it was thought to have moved its operations to Salahuddin Province, northwest of Baghdad, in the Sunni heartland. The governor there said publicly that he was ordered to make sure he did not play host to the station, noting that the Americans had delivered a "stern" message on the subject. In December, Kurdish officials denied reports that the station was operating out of a Christian neighborhood in Erbil.

The station does not have much structure or style. Grainy clips of grisly violence, running in loops and sometimes in slow motion, are interspersed with news bulletins featuring just two commentators — a woman, who wraps and covers her face, and a man in a full battle fatigues whose face is uncovered, and who appears to be about 30 years old.

DOJ_NMG_0119454

They regularly accuse Iraq's Shiite-led government of being a front for Iran. Mr. Mashhadani, the Parliamentary speaker and a Sunni, is often called "Mashhadi" — a reference to the Iranian town of Mashhad, Iran's holiest Shiite city.

The station also frequently offers critical coverage of the rebel cleric Moktada al-Sadr, including broadcasting a clip that the station says demonstrates his militia's infiltration of the Iraqi Army. Mr. Sadr is shown sitting with aides, discussing how many militiamen he can spare to be a part of the Iraqi Army. In the end, he says that he will supply two divisions. The source of the video is unclear.

In an odd twist, at the same time as the broadcasts promote attacks against the Americans and the Shiite militias, the station's main commentator, the man in fatigues, encourages other Shiites to join the struggle.

In fact, the commentator, who reads his diatribes from an undisclosed location, is himself a Shiite, according to a Baghdad couple who identified themselves as his parents.

As the station's agenda shifts from focusing strictly on the Americans to rallying Sunnis to prevent Shiite control of the country, the potential of the message to stir up more bloodshed is that much greater.

But the representative of the station seemed confident that it would stay on the air.

"Al Zawra represents all factions of resistance against the Iranian and American occupation," he wrote. "And it is committed to broadcasting their messages and activities without any interference or discrimination."

Rice Rules Out Talks With Syria, Iran (AFP)

AFP, January 21, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has reiterated Washington's opposition to talking to Syria or Iran to get their help in easing unrest in Iraq.

To believe that Damascus or Tehran would suddenly be ready to help stabilise Iraq, simply because the United States would talk to them, is false, Rice told German magazine Spiegel in an interview to be published on Monday.

Syria and Iran's "only motivation" in entering into such talks would be to draw some advantage for themselves, Rice said, adding that this was not diplomacy but blackmail.

Damascus would expect some goodwill from Washington over its Lebanon policy while Tehran would want room for manoeuvre on its nuclear programme, Rice said.

The Clock May Be Ticking On Iran's Fiery President (LAT)

By Dariush Zahedi, Omid Memarian

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

THE BUSH administration's decision to step up pressure against Iran by going after Iranian agents inside Iraq, coupled with the Islamic Republic's increasing economic and diplomatic isolation, have pushed conservatives inside Iran to further distance themselves from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Many pragmatic and traditional conservatives, such as former President Hashemi Rafsanjani and Ayatollah Ahmad Janati, who is the secretary of the Council of Guardians, were critical of Ahmadinejad's management of Iran's economic and foreign policies before U.S. military forces recently detained members of the Revolutionary Guard and Iranian intelligence agents in Irbil, Iraq. This incident, coupled with the U.N. Security Council's imposition of sanctions on Iran because of its refusal to abandon its nuclear program, has reportedly prompted 50 parliamentary members to sign a letter calling on Ahmadinejad to appear before parliament to explain himself. There have also been reports that Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has given a green light to parliament to criticize the president's performance. Coupled with the country's deteriorating economy, these developments could push Ahmadinejad's opponents to replace him with a less doctrinaire politician.

In Iran, the legislative branch and such supervisory institutions as the Council of Guardians have special powers to ensure that the nation's policies conform to the constitution, Islam and the interests of the Islamic Republic. As former President Mohammad Khatami, a reformist, discovered to his chagrin, the president is accountable to the electorate but lacks sufficient power to fulfill his promises to the people.

Until municipal elections in December, the relatively young conservatives who control Iran's parliament and the more traditional conservatives beholden to the clerics were unsure of Ahmadinejad's popularity. As a result, they were largely deferential to the president, allowing him wide latitude in conducting the nation's foreign and domestic policies. But Ahmadinejad's humiliation at the polls — about 90% of his allies lost — has emboldened his opponents.

DOJ_NMG_0119455

Ahmadinejad was elected in 2005 on a populist platform of combating poverty and corruption through a more equitable distribution of Iran's oil wealth. He comes from the most militant and ideologically driven faction in Iran, known as the Hezbollahis. In general, they are right-wing populists with security and military backgrounds in the Revolutionary Guard and the voluntary militia attached to it, the Basij. The president has gone out of his way to placate these extremist forces, granting them multibillion-dollar infrastructure contracts to develop the country's oil and gas sector, among other enterprises. Most flamboyantly, he has endeavored to return the Islamic revolution toward what he views as its essence — anti-Zionism and populism.

That has riled the country's pragmatic and traditional conservatives. Many recognize that last month's Holocaust denial conference in Tehran and Ahmadinejad's repeated threats to wipe Israel off the map may have persuaded China and Russia to vote for U.N. sanctions against Iran's nuclear program.

The economy remains a problem for Ahmadinejad. His decision to inject huge amounts of oil money into the Iranian economy and engage in deficit spending has stoked inflation, which has made it even more difficult for the poor to make ends meet. The prices of such basic items as beef, poultry, fruits and bread have increased by 25%, and rents have risen 30%.

In an unusual departure from the standard practice, conservatives blamed Ahmadinejad more than the United States after the five Iranians were detained in Irbil. Iran's unexpectedly moderate reaction to the detentions indicates that Ahmadinejad's voice in formulating Iranian policy may be fading.

But other developments also threaten to weaken his authority. President Bush's rejection of the Iraq Survey Group's recommendation that the U.S. seek out Tehran's cooperation in stabilizing Iraq unsettled some in Iran's ruling elite who believed that Bush had no choice, given U.S. domestic politics, but to invite Tehran to the table. The successful U.S.-led campaign to dry up financing for Iran's much-needed oil and gas and other industrial projects will only exacerbate the nation's economic woes. And Saudi Arabia's acceptance of lower oil prices through increased production will put additional pressure on an economy chiefly fueled by petrodollars.

From the conservatives' point of view, blaming a single individual who can easily be restrained or even removed for all that ails Iran could avert a legitimacy crisis for the system. Parliament can impeach Ahmadinejad, or the supreme leader can remove him. Short of that, a stern lecture from Khamenei could force Ahmadinejad to temper his words and play a less visible role.

Viewing himself as a man of God, Ahmadinejad is no doubt praying that the U.S. will not be satisfied with Iran's diplomatic and economic isolation and will launch military strikes against the Islamic Republic's nuclear installations. Such action may or may not set back Iran's nuclear ambitions. But it would surely give new life to Ahmadinejad's militant faction, enabling him to rally the masses behind the flag, compel his conservative critics to close ranks behind him and crush the remnants of Iran's liberal civil society and democratic movement.

DARIUSH ZAHEDI teaches in the departments of political economy and peace and conflict studies at UC Berkeley. OMID MEMARIAN, an Iranian journalist, was awarded Human Rights Watch's highest award.

Impatience On Iran Carries A Price (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

President Bush once again risks confusing his destiny with that of the nation. His presidency is running out of time. The United States is not. An all-or-nothing confrontation with Iran that has to be resolved before Bush leaves office is an artificial concept that will deepen American problems abroad.

Sports metaphors are dear to Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. But their "new thinking" on Iran and Iraq must not be allowed to turn into the political equivalent of pro football's two-minute drill. The "hurry-up" offense that works beautifully for the New England Patriots at game's end is far too dangerous when the stakes are war and peace.

With his presidency in its final two years, signs multiply that Bush has lost patience on Iran with the U.N. Security Council, much as he did on Iraq in 2003. While Rice was traveling in the Middle East and Europe last week, American allies were being told that Washington would not seek new and tougher Security Council sanctions against Iran, as has been widely expected.

DOJ_NMG_0119456

Iran rejected the largely symbolic sanctions that were adopted by the council on Dec. 23 and vowed to continue its nuclear program. That program will allow Tehran to master within a year or two the technology needed to manufacture atomic bombs, according to Western intelligence agencies. Iran claims it will not develop such weapons.

But Russia's unexpectedly strong opposition even to weak sanctions adopted only after months of debate has deepened Bush's growing disillusionment with President Vladimir Putin.

The American leader is determined not to get caught in "a dead end" at the United Nations, according to U.S. officials. Bush is said to feel that Putin went back on personal pledges to support meaningful U.N. action in return for Bush's committing to diplomatic efforts last June. Bush rarely forgives someone he believes has gone back on promises to him.

Instead of returning to the United Nations for a new resolution, the administration has launched a broad effort to assemble an economic coalition of the willing to confront Iran. Trade, investment and the price of oil are the primary targets Washington chose for this coalition.

The United States wants European Union nations to deny export credits to Iran and to encourage their banks to join a campaign led by the U.S. Treasury to squeeze Iranian financial institutions linked to their government's support for terrorism in the Middle East. Iran's poorly managed oil fields are in desperate need of new foreign technology and investment, making Iran vulnerable to this kind of pressure.

The campaign received a big boost last week when it became clear that Saudi Arabia is finally worried enough about Iran to use oil as a weapon against the regime of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Saudi oil minister Ali Nuaimi publicly opposed Iranian calls for production cuts by the OPEC cartel to halt a decline that has taken crude oil from $78 a barrel in July to just above $50 a barrel last week.

The Saudis have enough reserve production capacity to swing OPEC prices up and down at will. Their relatively small population gives them a flexibility in postponing revenue gains that populous Iran lacks. Nuaimi's pronouncement, although cast as a technical matter that had nothing to do with politics, seemed to give teeth to recent warnings issued in private by Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi national security adviser, that the kingdom will now respond to Iranian hostility with its own confrontational tactics.

So a broad, sustained campaign of economic sanctions is perhaps the most effective way to bring pressure to bear on an Iranian regime that has failed to deliver on its grandiose promises of prosperity to a restive population.

But it is the Europeans and the Saudis, not the Bush administration, who control the tools of economic pressure that Washington wants wielded. Managing a campaign in which the immediate price will be paid by others will require skill, extensive consultations and enormous patience.

Such a campaign would be undermined by hurry-up tactics built around the American political calendar, or the use of U.S. military force in Iraq intended to serve as a show of force against Iran. Divisions within the Saudi royal family over how to handle Iran also should be handled with care, not bluster, by Washington. A new consensus with Europe on how to proceed must be sought as well.

This will all take time. Bush must guard against a sense of false urgency dictated by his time in office coming to an end. As Charles de Gaulle counseled, history continues even though the graveyard is full of indispensable leaders.

Hang Up! Tehran Is Calling (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

One of the most worrying parts of President Bush's Iraq strategy doesn't have anything to do with Iraq. It's the way he's ramping up a confrontation with Iran.

Across a broad spectrum of policy levers, Mr. Bush is raising the pressure on Iran, increasing the risk that he will drag the U.S. into a third war in an Islamic country in six years. Instead of disengaging from war, he could end up starting another.

We could have taken another route. In 2003, Iran sent the U.S. a detailed message offering to work together to capture terrorists, to stabilize Iraq, to resolve nuclear disputes, to withdraw military support for Hezbollah and Hamas, and to moderate its position on Israel, in exchange for the U.S. lifting sanctions and warming up to Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0119457

Some diplomats liked the idea, but administration hawks rejected it at once. Lawrence Wilkerson, a former chief of staff to Colin Powell, says that the State Department sent a cable to the Swiss ambassador in Tehran, who looks after U.S. interests in Iran, scolding him for even forwarding the package to Washington.

Obviously, Iran's offer might have led nowhere. But it's plain where rejection of the offer has taken us: more Americans are dying in Iraq, and some experts worry about clashes with Iran itself.

The Iraq Study Group proposed engagement with Iran, but instead Mr. Bush has been escalating the rhetoric and military pressure.

"When you have such a buildup and have zero communications, and you have an arena like Iraq where you may step on each other's toes, you could have rapid escalation," warns Vali Nasr, an expert on the region at the Naval Postgraduate School.

It doesn't appear that Mr. Bush wants a war with Iran. His aim seems to be a show of force to deter Iran and reassure our allies in the region. But he is on a path that may easily lead to escalation.

It's unfortunate that we are ratcheting up the military pressure, because the administration has quietly taken one very useful step against Iran: squeezing its access to international banking transactions. That has caused real economic pain and has added to the unpopularity of Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Those banking sanctions, not military moves, are a reason Mr. Ahmadinejad has been rebuked by the country's supreme leader.

Unfortunately, both Mr. Bush and Mr. Ahmadinejad benefit from confrontation. Both are unpopular domestically but can use a crisis to distract from their policy failures.

"The current strategy benefits Ahmadinejad," says Professor Nasr. "It's going to divert attention at the popular level from democracy."

Mr. Ahmadinejad is facing growing criticism: he has been heckled by university students and scolded in the press, and his candidates did poorly in recent elections. Ordinary Iranians love the U.S. — it's the most pro-American country in the Middle East I've visited — and a civil society is struggling to be born.

"If there is any military strike on Iran, all this movement will end," said Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian lawyer and Nobel Peace Prize winner.

Even some Republicans opposed to a "grand bargain" favor some kind of engagement. Mitchell Reiss, a former senior State Department official under Mr. Bush, proposes technical talks with Iran about drug trafficking and maritime security. "Even if they are a nonstarter for Tehran, I think we score points in the region for trying," Ambassador Reiss said.

Granted, Mr. Bush is right to be frustrated by Iran and the way it's defying the international community with its nuclear program.

Unfortunately, Mr. Bush's military pressure may end up making Iraq bloodier than ever. Instead of being cowed, Iran may use its proxies in Iraq, Afghanistan, Lebanon and elsewhere to kill more American officials and troops.

Or even ordinary Americans here at home. "It's a pretty good assumption that they have, if not operatives, at least sympathetic actors and affiliated groups" in the U.S., said Henry Crumpton, the State Department coordinator for counterterrorism.

Mr. Bush is absolutely right to denounce Iran's leaders for stealing elections, suppressing their people and dabbling in terrorism. But we ourselves are partly to blame for the awful government in Tehran.

By instigating a coup in 1953 and seeking special legal privileges for American troops in 1964, we empowered extremists like Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and allowed them to tap nationalist outrage. So it would be in keeping with tradition if Mr. Bush, by shortsightedly stoking a confrontation with Tehran, now inadvertently helped Iranian hard-liners crush Iran's democracy movement.

Pakistani Role Seen In Taliban Surge At Border (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

QUETTA, Pakistan — The most explosive question about the Taliban resurgence here along the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan is this: Have Pakistani intelligence agencies been promoting the Islamic insurgency?

DOJ_NMG_0119458

The government of Pakistan vehemently rejects the allegation and insists that it is fully committed to help American and NATO forces prevail against the Taliban militants who were driven from power in Afghanistan in 2001.

Western diplomats in both countries and Pakistani opposition figures say that Pakistani intelligence agencies — in particular the powerful Inter-Services Intelligence and Military Intelligence — have been supporting a Taliban restoration, motivated not only by Islamic fervor but also by a longstanding view that the jihadist movement allows them to assert greater influence on Pakistan's vulnerable western flank.

More than two weeks of reporting along this frontier, including dozens of interviews with residents on each side of the porous border, leaves little doubt that Quetta is an important base for the Taliban, and found many signs that Pakistani authorities are encouraging the insurgents, if not sponsoring them.

The evidence is provided in fearful whispers, and it is anecdotal.

At Jamiya Islamiya, a religious school here in Quetta, Taliban sympathies are on flagrant display, and residents say students have gone with their teachers' blessings to die in suicide bombings in Afghanistan.

Three families whose sons had died as suicide bombers in Afghanistan said they were afraid to talk about the deaths because of pressure from Pakistani intelligence agents. Local people say dozens of families have lost sons in Afghanistan as suicide bombers and fighters.

One former Taliban commander said in an interview that he had been jailed by Pakistani intelligence officials because he would not go to Afghanistan to fight. He said that, for Western and local consumption, his arrest had been billed as part of Pakistan's crackdown on the Taliban in Pakistan. Former Taliban members who have refused to fight in Afghanistan have been arrested — or even mysteriously killed — after resisting pressure to re-enlist in the Taliban, Pakistani and Afghan tribal elders said.

"The Pakistanis are actively supporting the Taliban," declared a Western diplomat in an interview in Kabul. He said he had seen an intelligence report of a recent meeting on the Afghan border between a senior Taliban commander and a retired colonel of the Pakistani Inter-Services Intelligence.

Pakistanis and Afghans interviewed on the frontier, frightened by the long reach of Pakistan's intelligence agencies, spoke only with assurances that they would not be named. Even then, they spoke cautiously.

The Pakistani military and intelligence services have for decades used religious parties as a convenient instrument to keep domestic political opponents at bay and for foreign policy adventures, said Husain Haqqani, a former adviser to several of Pakistan's prime ministers and the author of a book on the relationship between the Islamists and the Pakistani security forces.

The religious parties recruited for the jihad in Kashmir and Afghanistan from the 1980s, when the Pakistani intelligence agencies ran the resistance by the mujahedeen and channeled money to them from the United States and Saudi Arabia to fight the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, Mr. Haqqani said.

In return for help in Kashmir and Afghanistan the intelligence services would rig votes for the religious parties and allow them freedom to operate, he said.

"The religious parties provide them with recruits, personnel, cover and deniability," Mr. Haqqani said in a telephone interview from Washington, where he is now a visiting scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

The Inter-Services Intelligence once had an entire wing dedicated to training jihadis, he said. Today the religious parties probably have enough of their own people to do the training, but, he added, the I.S.I. so thoroughly monitors phone calls and people's movements that it would be almost impossible for any religious party to operate a training camp without its knowledge.

"They trained the people who are at the heart of it all, and they have done nothing to roll back their protégés," Mr. Haqqani said.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, President Pervez Musharraf, under strong American pressure, pledged to help root out Islamic extremism, and, as both head of the army and president, he has more direct control of the intelligence services than past civilian prime ministers. But according to several analysts, Pakistani intelligence officials believe it is more prudent to prepare for the day when Western troops leave Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0119459

Pakistan has long seen jihadi movements like the Taliban as a counter to Indian and Russian influence next door in Afghanistan, the Western diplomat and other analysts said, and as a way to provide Pakistan with "strategic depth," or a friendly buffer on its western border.

In Pashtunabad, a warren of high mud-brick walls and narrow lanes in Quetta, the links of the government, religious parties and Taliban commanders to a local madrasa are thinly hidden, said a local opposition party member who lives in the neighborhood.

Three students from the madrasa went to Afghanistan recently on suicide missions, he said. The family of one of the men admitted that he had blown himself up but denied that he had attended the school. The man's brother suggested that he had been forced into the mission and that someone had recruited him for payment.

"Nowadays people are getting money from somewhere and they are killing other people's children," he said. "We are afraid of this government," he said. His father said he feared the same people would try to take his other son and asked that no family names be used.

President Musharraf relies on the religious party Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam, or J.U.I., which dominates this province, Baluchistan, as an important partner in the provincial and national parliaments.

At a madrasa, called simply Jamiya Islamiya, on winding Hajji Ghabi Road, a board in the courtyard proudly declares "Long Live Mullah Omar," in praise of the Taliban leader, and "Long Live Fazlur Rehman," the leader of J.U.I.

Members of the provincial government and Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam are frequent visitors to the school, the local opposition party member said, asking that his name not be used because he feared Pakistan's intelligence services. People on motorbikes with green government license plates visit at night, he said, as do luxurious sport utility vehicles with blackened windows, a favorite of Taliban commanders.

Maulvi Noor Muhammad, a Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam representative from Baluchistan in the National Assembly, recently received a guest barefoot while sitting on the floor of a grubby district office in Quetta, a map of the world above him painted on the wall to represent his belief in worldwide Islamic revolution.

He denied providing the militants any logistical support. "The J.U.I. is not supporting the Taliban anymore," he said. "We are only providing moral support. We pray for their success in ousting the foreign troops from the land of Afghanistan."

On a recent morning, the deputy director of the Jamiya Islamiya madrasa, Qari Muhammad Ibrahim, declined to meet a female reporter for The New York Times but answered a question from a local male reporter.

He did not deny that some of the madrasa's 280 students had gone to fight in Afghanistan. "In the Koran it is written that it is every Muslim's right to fight jihad," he said. "All we are telling them is what is in the Koran, and then it's up to them to go to jihad."

NATO officials and Western diplomats in Afghanistan have grown increasingly critical of Pakistan for allowing the Taliban leaders, commanders and soldiers to operate from their country, which has given an advantage to the insurgency in southern Afghanistan. In September, Gen. James L. Jones, then NATO's supreme commander, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that Quetta remained the headquarters of the Taliban movement.

Still, Pakistan has insisted that the Taliban leadership is not based in Quetta. "If there are Taliban in Quetta, they are few," said Pakistan's minister for information and broadcasting, Tariq Azim Khan. "You can count them on your fingers."

American officials and Western diplomats noted that, when put under enough pressure, Pakistan had come through with flashes of cooperation. But that only seems to reinforce the view that Pakistan's intelligence agencies are more in touch with what is going on in the Taliban insurgency than the government lets on publicly.

For instance, a senior Taliban leader, Mullah Akhtar Muhammad Osmani, who operated on both sides of the border, was killed in an airstrike in Afghanistan on Dec. 19, after Pakistan helped track him, an American official in Afghanistan said.

At the same time, a kind of dirty war is building between Afghan and Pakistani intelligence agencies. A senior Afghan intelligence official said one of its informers in Pakistan was recently killed and dumped in pieces in Peshawar, a border town. The Afghan intelligence service has also recently arrested two Afghan generals, one retired, who have been charged with spying for Pakistan, as well as a Pakistani suspected of being an intelligence agent.

President Musharraf has acknowledged that some retired Pakistani intelligence officials may still be involved in supporting their former protégés in the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0119460

Hamid Gul, the former director general of Pakistani intelligence, remains a public and unapologetic supporter of the Taliban, visiting madrasas and speaking in support of jihad at graduation ceremonies.

Afghan intelligence officials recently produced a captured insurgent who said Mr. Gul facilitated his training and logistics through an office in the Pakistani town of Nowshera, in the North-West Frontier Province, west of the capital, Islamabad.

NATO and American officials in Afghanistan say there is also evidence of support from current midlevel Pakistani intelligence officials. Just how far up that support reaches remains in dispute.

At least five villages in Pishin, a district northwest of Quetta that stretches toward the Afghan border, lost sons in the recent fighting in Kandahar between the Taliban and NATO forces, opposition politicians said.

One village, Karbala, is a main center of support for the jihad, local people say. Unlike the other villages, which blend into the stark desertlike landscape with their mud-brick houses and compound walls, Karbala has lavish houses, mosques and madrasas, suggesting an unusual wealth.

Farther on, in the village of Bagarzai, lies the grave of Azizullah, a religious scholar who used only one name and acquired fame as a Taliban commander.

Only 25, he was killed with a group of 15 to 20 men in an airstrike in the Afghan province of Helmand on May 22, said his father, Hajji Abdul Hai. Thousands of people attended his funeral, including senior members of the provincial government, the father said.

Mr. Hai, 50, who is a Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam member, denied that his son had been persuaded to fight by anyone. “From the start it was his spirit to take part in jihad,” his father said. “It’s all to do with personal will. If someone agrees, then he goes. Even if someone wishes to, no one can stop him.”

It is an argument that supporters of the jihad use frequently. But for some of the families mourning their sons, there is no doubt that the madrasas and the religious parties are the first point of contact.

That was the conclusion reached by the family of Muhammad Daoud, a 22-year-old man from Pishin who disappeared more than a year ago.

“In our search we went to many places and everyone said different things,” said his father, Hajji Noora Gul. “We went to the madrasa in Pashtunabad, but no one was ready to tell us his whereabouts.”

“Even the madrasa people did not know,” he added. “Behind the curtain of the madrasa, maybe there are other people who do this. Maybe there are some businessmen who take them.”

Then, he said, a Taliban propaganda CD came out showing his son with a group of others taking an oath before the Taliban commander, Mullah Dadullah.

“He had a shawl over his head and was preparing for a suicide bombing,” Mr. Gul said. “He said, ‘I am fighting for God, and I am ready for this.’ ”

His eldest son, Allah Dad, 33, blamed the jihadi groups and the Inter-Services Intelligence. “We don’t know how he made contact with those jihadi groups,” he said. “There are some groups active in taking people to Afghanistan and they are active in Quetta.

“All Taliban are I.S.I. Taliban,” he added. “It is not possible to go to Afghanistan without the help of the I.S.I. Everyone says this.”

Pakistan Denies It Harbors Taliban (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Jan. 20 -- Faced with new charges that Pakistan is harboring Islamic insurgents, including fugitive Taliban leader Mohammad Omar, Pakistani officials this weekend denied such allegations and defended their efforts to curb cross-border insurgent attacks in Afghanistan as sincere if not totally successful.

"We don't deny the Taliban come and go, but that is not the entire truth," Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, Pakistan's military spokesman, said in an interview Saturday. "If 25 percent of the problem lies on our side of the border, 75 percent of it lies on the Afghan side." Of four known top Taliban commanders, he said, three are Afghan and one is Pakistani.

DOJ_NMG_0119461

Sultan and other officials denied statements by a Taliban spokesman arrested in recent days in Afghanistan that Omar has been living in the Pakistani border city of Quetta under the protection of Pakistani intelligence agents. Omar's capture has been a top priority for U.S. forces in Afghanistan since the overthrow of Taliban rule in 2001.

Afghan officials have long charged that Omar and other Taliban leaders operate from Quetta, and senior U.S. officials have recently begun echoing those accusations, saying Pakistan has not done enough to curb Taliban attacks although it continues to be a valuable ally in the broader fight against Islamic terrorism.

Sultan said Pakistani officials repeatedly had asked Afghan and U.S. authorities to provide them with solid information on Omar's location but had received none. He also asserted that the captured Taliban spokesman, known as Mohammad Hanif, had lied about Omar's whereabouts after being tortured by interrogators in Afghanistan.

However, the army spokesman acknowledged that several Afghan refugee camps near Quetta and elsewhere provide safe havens for insurgents, who he said easily cross back and forth across the busy and porous border. "They do come for rest and recuperation," Sultan said, adding that Pakistan plans to close the camps and send all their inhabitants home.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said at a meeting of his national security council Thursday that strong punitive action would be taken against illegal cross-border actions and against any terrorists seeking refuge in Pakistan, according to news reports here.

Pakistani officials also defended their recent military and political actions in the tribal regions along the northwest border with Afghanistan, including peace pacts with tribal leaders in the adjoining South and North Waziristan districts. Afghan and U.S. officials charge that cross-border attacks from that area have risen dramatically since the pacts were signed in September.

Sultan acknowledged that a senior Taliban commander based in South Waziristan, Beitullah Mehsud, had been recruiting and arming local men to become insurgents despite the terms of the peace deal, which was aimed at stopping extremist violence in Pakistan and across the border.

He said an airstrike against several training camps in South Waziristan last Monday had been aimed at punishing Mehsud, although the commander escaped and has since tried to rally supporters for revenge attacks. Sultan also denied reports this week that a pilotless U.S. Predator aircraft had first dropped bombs on the camp, saying, "The strike was carried out by us. We struck against five compounds and destroyed three."

In a separate interview Friday, Ali Jan Mohammed Orakzai, the governor of Pakistan's North-West Frontier province and the architect of the North and South Waziristan accords, asserted that the pacts had been successful in some ways but had led to worrisome local tensions and had not been able to stop all cross-border movement by insurgents.

"There have been no attacks on law enforcement agencies, and no efforts to challenge the government writ," Orakzai said. "We do admit that some cross-border movement is taking place, but to say that it has increased because of the agreement is unrealistic. We have 80,000 troops deployed on the border, and they are not sitting there for nothing."

He also said that the government was "really squeezing" local tribes that had violated the agreements, and that they had created confusion and tension between locals and foreign-born residents who fled to Pakistan from various Afghan conflicts over the years and now feel pressure to leave.

But Orakzai, a retired army general who led numerous military operations against Islamic militants in the tribal areas after 2001, said it was imperative to switch to a political approach after hundreds of soldiers died, traditional tribal structures collapsed and local anti-government sentiments soared, helping Islamic extremists attract more support.

Orakzai was scathing in his criticism of the Afghan government, saying it had been unable to extend control or services to much of the country and was largely to blame for the revival of the Taliban insurgency. "There is no democracy, no writ of government in Afghanistan," he said. The Afghan government has received billions of dollars in foreign aid and is protected by tens of thousands of NATO and U.S. troops.

In the past several weeks, the nature of Pakistan's role in relation to cross-border insurgent attacks has provoked contradictory foreign assessments. Top American military and civilian officials have said Pakistan needs to do more to eliminate safe havens for the Taliban and prevent them from slipping into Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0119462

But NATO commanders in Afghanistan, who oversee 31,000 troops there, say Pakistan has helped international forces far more than is widely known. For example, they said, Pakistani intelligence sources were crucial in tracking down Akhtar Mohammad Osmani, a senior Taliban commander who was killed in a U.S. airstrike in southern Afghanistan in December.

"The Pakistan government does not wish to see the Taliban in power here," Lt. Gen. David Richards, the outgoing NATO commander in Kabul, said in an interview recently. "They are determined to bear down on the insurgency. But when they help us, they get no credit for it. No one says thank you."

Afghan Women's Quiet Revolution Hangs By A Thread (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

Each step toward equality has been a struggle, but the nation's instability is eroding their gains.

Kabul, Afghanistan — EACH morning, the policewoman puts on her uniform, goes to her precinct office, sits behind a bare desk. And waits.

She is one of several officers appointed to make it easier for women to report domestic violence. Her job ought to be one of the busiest in the district. Instead, Pushtoon, who goes by one name, has one of the loneliest.

"Last week we had one woman. Before that there had not been anyone for several weeks," she said, twisting hands left scarred by her attempt at suicide years ago in a Taliban jail. "Women are afraid to come, but we are not allowed to go to them.

"The police chiefs will not let us. They say it is unsafe for women officers," she said.

Five years after the end of the Taliban era, there are new opportunities for women in Afghanistan, and notable efforts are underway to make their daily lives better, especially in Kabul, the capital. Improving the status of women has been a core goal of U.S. policy here, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said at a congressional hearing in 2005 that enshrining women's equality in the Afghan Constitution was an important advance for the entire region.

But conversations with dozens of women suggest that each step forward has been a struggle. Afghan society remains deeply uncomfortable with the idea of women gaining independence and authority. The Taliban's resurgence has reversed incremental gains, particularly in the south. If the Taliban incursions spread, more women are likely to lose ground.

Families in the south that recently began allowing their daughters to go to school and wives to enroll in vocational programs have pulled them out because of Taliban attacks.

"Women's future depends so much on security. As much as se-curity deteriorates, women's situation deteriorates," said Masuda Jalal, former acting minister of women's affairs. "At the first sign of insecurity, the head of the family protects his women and children, and the first measure they take is to keep them inside the house."

Women who have gained ground haven't talked of the constitutional principles of equality. Instead, they focus on the respect accorded women by the Koran, and on the importance of mothers and homes, where older women have long held positions of power.

Their goal, often unstated, is to convince fathers and brothers, husbands and sons that when a woman is empowered, the males benefit as well. They hope their daughters will at least have more choices than they had.

Women are learning to drive, some at their husbands' urging so they can help with family errands. Small numbers have opened bank accounts. Women have become a regular presence on television talk shows, and they deliver weather reports and other news features.

According to Farsona Simimi, a popular television talk show host, "There is a quiet revolution here." But, she added, "I do not know whether it will succeed."

Pushing a stone uphill

THREE times in the last century, the status of women has improved, only to suffer reversals.

The first time was in the 1920s, when ruler Amanullah Khan abolished the requirement that women be completely covered in public and encouraged his wife to wear a hat without a veil. He was ousted by the mullahs.

The lot of women improved again in the 1960s, when four women were elected to parliament. One of them was the mother of Nasrine Gross, now an Afghan American lecturer in sociology at Kabul University.

DOJ_NMG_0119463

A family album contains photos of her mother and several friends at a picnic 40 years ago. They wear knee-length dresses with short sleeves; a couple of them have beehive hairdos, strands blowing free in the summer breeze as they lean against a sleek car. Two men in Western clothing stand nearby.

"No one can believe these pictures were taken here," Gross said.

In the 1970s, political turmoil stymied women's progress. But in the next decade, ruling communists prohibited women from wearing burkas and appointed many to government posts. More than 50 were given judgeships, and many others took positions in the police and healthcare professions.

When the Taliban took power in 1996, it banned all education for women, even small girls. It removed women from almost all jobs outside the home and required them to cover their faces in public by wearing a burka. In some areas, it demanded that house windows be painted black so women could not see out and men could not see in. Women were whipped in public for the smallest infraction.

Educated Afghans and international aid workers say the U.S.-backed government of President Hamid Karzai has done little besides removing the Taliban restrictions. He has only one woman in his Cabinet of 25 and none among his top advisors.

Several Afghan women said that they had encouraged Karzai to do small things, such as have his wife accompany him to public events, but that he had never done so.

In the name of Islam

RAHALA Salim was one of those who became a judge under the communists, and she recalls watching in horror as the Taliban dismantled every vestige of protection for women.

"As a judge, when I saw women coming to me crying because they had been abused, I felt responsible, I felt I had to defend their rights," said Salim, who was removed from her post by the Taliban. Under its rule, she said, "if a man was accused of rape, it was the woman who was arrested and blamed."

Salim knew from her legal studies that Sharia, or Islamic law, offered women some legal protection. The Koran and hadiths, the sayings of the prophet Muhammad, are open to an array of interpretations. And early Islam glorifies several women, including Muhammad's daughter Fatima, who is portrayed as an independent leader of her people.

"We have to know the real Sharia; we have to be able to point to passages in the holy Koran and say, 'Here, read this,' " Salim said. "In Islamic history, men have been the boss. They want to be the boss forever. That's why they never want women to appear in public, but that is not Islam; that is cultural tradition."

The notion of Islam as a pillar of freedom came from Salim's mother.

"My mother didn't have any sons, and so my father took a second wife, and it made her extremely sad and it made her life very hard," Salim said. "She told me, 'Unless you can have enough education, you can never stand against men. You must learn Islam so you can struggle against them.' "

During the Taliban era, Salim began to teach the Koran. Once a week, 70 women would gather for classes, sometimes at her house, sometimes elsewhere so the Taliban would not become suspicious.

"I would cook something as if we were just gathering for a meal, and then we would recite the holy Koran and discuss Islamic questions and then political issues," she recalled.

After the Taliban fled, Salim ran for parliament. But she understood that she would need the mullahs behind her, and when she was elected, she asked them whether she could address families in the mosque. Her appeal opened the door for women to enter there. In her district, women never had; they prayed at home.

"It was the first time that women saw the inside of the mosque," she said. Then, with the mullahs' assent, she asked the families to send their daughters to school.

Other women have reached similar conclusions: that if they are to persuade men to stand behind them, they will need mullahs as allies and Islam as a shield.

Jalal, the former women's minister, has convened meetings of mullahs to discuss Koranic interpretations of women's rights. A meeting last summer in Kabul drew 100 mullahs from around the country. She also has asked new "women's councils" to work closely with local mullahs. So far, the councils are active primarily in Kabul and on its outskirts.

DOJ_NMG_0119464

In Chakadera, a district at the foot of mountains about an hour north of Kabul, Maseema Sakhi acts as the local liaison to the Women's Affairs Ministry. A tiny, graceful woman of 45, she went to college and teaches at the local grade school. But she married a village man and lives in a typical Afghan mud compound with several generations of family, where chickens and turkeys roam the yard.

She has made overtures to local mullahs, so when there are domestic problems they consider coming to her.

Recently a girl arrived in the village in tattered clothes, exhausted and battered. She had run away from her husband's family. She said she had been badly beaten and was afraid she would be killed.

In the past, the elders and the mullah might have forced the girl to tell them where she came from and taken her back, all but condemning her to death. This time, the mullah sent for Sakhi.

"She had walked three days and three nights through the mountains without stopping. Her feet were torn," Sakhi said. "She said she was so miserable in her home that she wished a wild animal would eat her. We took her to the women's ministry, and now she is in a shelter and she calls me her mother."

'Someone should listen'

PUSHTOON, the policewoman, never thought of herself as a crusader.

Her mother died when she was an infant. Brought up by her father in Logar province, south of Kabul, she gained a rudimentary knowledge of reading.

At 13, she was married to a man many years her senior. At 15, she bore the first of her six children. The family moved to Pakistan, where her husband, who was often unemployed, took up with a younger woman.

Depressed, confused and only dimly aware of how the Taliban treated women, Pushtoon returned to Logar to claim a piece of land her father had left her when he died. She wanted to sell it to help support her family.

But the Taliban arrested her, saying she must have killed her husband since he wasn't with her. Her only relatives were her husband's family, and they wanted the land for themselves. The Taliban accused her of murder and took her to the women's prison in Kabul.

Locked in a cell barely large enough for a bed, she became desperate.

"I was shouting and shouting that I was innocent, and no one was listening," she recalled, nervously touching the braid on the cuff of her police uniform.

After six months, she shut herself in a tiny, squalid latrine, lighted a match and held it to her clothing.

"The flames licked over the material and burned my hair and was burning my face and burned my hands," she said. "I burned myself to die there. That would have been better than a life in prison. I knew no one in Kabul. No one came to visit me. I had two daughters and four boys and they were in Pakistan and I missed them."

But she didn't die. And a few days later the Taliban released her. She still has scars on her hands and a dark, pitted mark on her forehead from the flames. She covers it with the ornamental red makeup that some Afghan women daub above their brows.

And she has a cause.

She cited the case of a woman who sought her help: "Her husband didn't have a job. He was home all the time and he beat her every day. He broke two of her teeth, and he put a pillow over her mouth when he hit her so she wouldn't shout and so the neighbors would not hear."

Such women are often afraid that if they complain, their husbands will kill them and they will bring dishonor to their families, Pushtoon said.

"I am doing this job now," Pushtoon said, "because when a woman says she is innocent, someone should listen."

'Happy Morning'

FARSONA Simimi has taken a different road, becoming a popular television talk show host on the Tolo network, one of Afghanistan's new private stations.

She uses the nonthreatening idiom of shows such as "Bride" and "Happy Morning" to help women think about asserting their rights and to help men understand the problems women face. She often alternates taboo topics with ones that even the most conservative men would not oppose.

DOJ_NMG_0119465

"Today I had two subjects on the family program: how to teach a child and how to get dark spots out of a shirt," she said with a smile.

Dressed modestly in a high-necked white blouse and an ankle-length white skirt, only her veil suggests her independent views: It perches so far back on her head that it looks in danger of slipping off, and it shows a swath of her slightly hennaed hair.

"When I first was on TV, my family was afraid for me," she said. "People said to my husband, 'How can you let her do that?' "

A year ago, one of Simimi's female colleagues was slain. Many people think it was because someone in her family considered her too modern. She wore blouses and tight jeans and went to clubs at night, said colleagues at Tolo.

It has taken almost three years, but Simimi has found that her audience is beginning to trust her. Women telephone her at the station and send her e-mails, and when she attends weddings or other large gatherings, they seek her out to ask questions or tell her their stories.

Her greatest regret is that television cannot yet show the cracked ribs and the burns and the other abuses women suffer.

"But we can talk about some of these things. One of our main topics on the family program is men beating their wives…. And we talk about arranged marriage from many perspectives, [such as] the father picks a person and doesn't talk about it or discuss it with the woman."

When she looks at her own family, she sees the problem writ small. Her young son recently told her as she was leaving for work, "Mama, you must wear a bigger scarf."

"Now, where did he get that idea? He is only 8, but he spends time with his father, with his grandfather — they must say some of these things," she said.

"It will take a long, long time for things to change. We must wait for this generation to grow up, and then maybe in two more generations we will see some changes."

The sewing circle

OUTSIDE Kabul, where villages sit lonely in the mountain desert, women's prospects are far bleaker. In Chakadera, Sakhi's village, formation of a sewing circle was seen as a major advance. It allowed women to meet and share their stories. But the conversations often turn to domestic violence.

Chakadera was on the front line when the Taliban took over, and its women were forbidden even to go to the village market. They married first cousins because those were the only people they could meet. Now the women gather in a school room to sew, to laugh a little, cry, and support those among them most battered by their men.

But no one knows how long the sewing group will last. In early autumn, a nearby school was burned. If there is another attack, the women might not be allowed to go out, or their daughters to go to school.

For now, Sakhi said, "everybody can come here to sew and weave and forget her sorrows for two or three hours each week."

One of the women, Malalai, 29, managed a smile even though she expressed little affection for her husband, who forbids her even to buy clothes for their children without his permission. Married at 15, she was a mother of three boys and two girls before she was 24. She wants a different life for her girls.

"I want them to get an education, to work, and only then to get married," she said.

What will happen if the Taliban returns?

She brushed her hand over several spools of thread sitting before her on the floor, knocking each one over as if they represented the sewing circle, the dreams for her daughters, the possibility of a different future.

"Gone," she said. All gone.

alissa.rubin@latimes.com

Rubin recently was on assignment in Afghanistan.

DOJ:

Editorial: A Case Of Justice That Stinks (ROT)

Roanoke (VA) Times, January 21, 2007

The administration's forced resignations among U.S. attorneys tell the tale of the corrupting influence of unchecked power.

is a new old story, about one of those "little-noticed" provisions in complex legislation that draws attention only when it starts to stink.

The complex law is the Patriot Act. The smelly provision -- one of many, but a noticeable one of late -- is an innocuous-seeming change in the way the executive branch makes interim appointments of U.S. attorneys.

In effect, the change allows the attorney general to replace federal prosecutors without Senate approval.

The Bush administration seems to be using this new power, in part, to rid the Justice Department of prosecutors deep into political corruption investigations and to put political hacks in their place.

Congress should act quickly to strip the law of a provision so ripe for abuse.

Distressingly, lawmakers passed the change without debate last year when the GOP-dominated Congress approved the USA Patriot Improvement and Reauthorization Act.

The political blog TPMmuckraker.com reports that a spokesman for one of the bill's Republican managers, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, said then-Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter slipped the new language into the bill at the last minute. Separate measures passed earlier in both houses did not include the change.

U.S. attorneys are appointed by the president and approved by the Senate. When appointees leave, voluntarily or not, the attorney general can make an interim appointment that is not subject to a Senate vote.

Formerly, such an appointment could last up to 120 days, after which a local federal district court would name a replacement until the vacancy was filled. Now interim appointments can last indefinitely, at least until the end of a president's term, a process that circumvents the Senate's check on executive power.

That change began stinking after a series of forced resignations that includes the impending departure of Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney for San Diego. Lam focused her office's efforts on successfully prosecuting former Rep. Duke Cunningham for corruption.

The head of the FBI's San Diego office bemoans Lam's ouster, saying it will jeopardize a continuing investigation that has touched several Republican lawmakers. He and several former federal prosecutors say her firing smells of politics.

Not so, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales insists. He testified at a congressional hearing Thursday, assuring Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Patrick Leahy that U.S. attorneys are never removed to retaliate for or interfere with an investigation or court case.

"Sources" suggest other reasons for Lam's firing, from her pursuit of public corruption and white-collar crime at the expense of drug smuggling and gun cases to a poor track record for convictions. Suspicions that politics underlies all would be hard to prove -- but they are also hard to dismiss.

One of Gonzales' interim appointments, after all, is J. Timothy Griffin, since late December the interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. His career up to then was spent largely doing "opposition research" -- digging up dirt on Democrats -- for the Republican Party and, from 2005 to 2006, for Karl Rove.

The Justice Department forced Griffin's predecessor to resign.

Such examples illustrate, at the least, the potential for putrefying politics to corrupt the Justice Department's use of truly awesome powers.

Feinstein and Leahy have filed a bill to restore the district court's authority to make interim appointments. Gonzales' protestations of high principle do not persuade. The senators should press on.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutor In Apple Case Joins Law Firm (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119467

Christopher J. Steskal, a lead prosecutor of a federal task force investigating the backdating of stock options at Apple Inc. and other companies, is leaving his San Francisco post to join a law firm, the United State Attorney's office in San Francisco confirmed late Friday.

Mr. Steskal's decision follows the recent resignation of his boss, United States Attorney Kevin V. Ryan.

Mr. Steskal also was the lead prosecutor in the government's case against Gregory L. Reyes, the former chief executive of Brocade Communications Systems.

Mr. Steskal, who was to try Mr. Reyes's case in June in San Francisco, is the second of five assistant United States attorneys on the task force to leave since its formation in July. He said he would join the San Francisco office of Fenwick & West within 30 days.

William J. Portanova, a criminal defense attorney and former federal prosecutor, said that he believed that the Brocade case would not suffer, no matter who is picked to succeed Mr. Steskal.

"The government has people stacked up ready to pick up the case and run with it," he said.

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States Attorney's office in San Francisco, said that one of two prosecutors the office is planning to hire would replace Mr. Steskal on the task force.

Departures Could Slow Option Probe Two In U.S. Attorney's Office Were First To File Charges For Backdating Stock Grants (SFC)

By Jessica Guynn, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 21, 2007

The abrupt resignations last week of U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, the Justice Department's top law enforcement official in Northern California, and Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Steskal, the lead prosecutor on the task force investigating stock-option backdating, raise questions about the fate of Bay Area technology companies under investigation.

Ryan gained a national profile for his aggressive stance on the controversial issue, becoming the first prosecutor to file backdating charges -- against two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. for allegedly violating securities laws by backdating stock options without properly accounting for them.

But it is the loss of Steskal, who is leaving to head the white-collar crime unit at Fenwick & West, headquartered in Mountain View, that could dramatically slow the pace of the criminal probes. Steskal was the office's resident expert on backdating, overseeing a dozen probes into suspect options grants, the highest-profile of which was Apple Computer Inc. He also was the lead prosecutor in the case against Brocade.

"Any time a line prosecutor leaves an investigation, there's clearly a loss of momentum because that person is invested, knows the cases and has spent all the time with the cases," said Thomas Carlucci, a San Francisco lawyer who represents former Apple attorney Wendy Howell, a potential target of the federal probe. "So there is undoubtedly going to be a momentary hiccup given that Chris has been the lead in all of the stock-option cases and in particular in the Apple case."

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the agency has a long track record of managing cases and investigations during leadership transitions.

"U.S. Attorney Ryan is taking care to ensure a smooth transition in the office's cases," Macauley said. "There continue to be many assistant U.S. attorneys with strong investigative skills and substantial trial experience on the stock-options backdating task force and throughout the office who are fully capable of carrying on the work of the task force."

In the long run, the swiftly revolving door at the U.S. attorney's office is unlikely to have a profound impact on the backdating probes, former federal prosecutors and legal experts agree.

"Whenever new leadership comes into an office, there is inevitably a period of adjustment and assessment for the new U.S. attorney to decide whether this type of investigation is going to be a priority and how much in the way of resources he or she is willing to commit," said former Colorado U.S. Attorney William Leone, now in private practice.

Will Ryan's successor share his zeal? Ryan and other federal prosecutors had pledged that 2007 will bring more prosecutions.

DOJ_NMG_0119468

"Mr. Ryan saw the critical import of these issues that touch on companies that employ hundreds of thousands of people and have billions of dollars of investments, including from citizens and pension funds," said James Post, a Boston University management professor. "He saw that no matter how you look at it, shareholders are hurt when options are backdated."

In an interview last month with The Chronicle, Ryan said his office was investigating more than 25 companies, of which 15 to 20 percent had troubling red flags. Any replacement for Ryan likely will pursue the high-profile cases, legal observers said.

"Obviously the question remains: Are there cases that can be made?" said one former federal prosecutor, who asked not to be named. "If there are good cases, I don't see why anyone wouldn't want to pursue them."

Backdating -- manipulating the timing of stock-option grants to enrich company executives -- became a cause celebre for Ryan, who in July formed a task force to focus on the growing scandal.

Since then, the toll of the scandal on corporate America has been heavy, engulfing as many as 200 companies and leading to a rash of executive resignations and billions of dollars in restatements as well as the indictment of five former top executives at two companies, Brocade and Comverse Technology Inc.

More than 2,000 public companies have backdating issues, according to Erik Lie, the University of Iowa finance professor whose research zeroed in on the widespread practice of choosing dates on which the stock was trading lower to inflate the value of options for executives.

Many of the companies embroiled in the scandal hail from Silicon Valley, the most prominent of which is Apple.

Dual investigations from regulators and prosecutors have unsettled investors, who are concerned about the future of Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs. An internal investigation at the Cupertino tech giant found that Jobs chose "favorable" dates for options but did not understand the accounting implications.

Federal law enforcement is focusing on cases of serious fraud, such as deliberately misleading investors or forging documents. Many companies have voluntarily reported problems in the ways they accounted for options. Both the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission have promised swift and aggressive action.

Ryan is among a handful of top prosecutors nationwide who are leaving the Justice Department. Rumors of his pending resignation had circulated in the legal community for months.

A conservative Republican, Ryan served as a state prosecutor and state court judge before being appointed to the federal post by President Bush in 2002. His stormy tenure was characterized by high-profile prosecutions but also by widespread reports of low morale and an exodus of experienced prosecutors from the office, which has about 100 lawyers.

How he ran the office became the subject of a recent internal Justice Department audit.

In an e-mail to his staff, Ryan cited personal and professional reasons for leaving the job. Ryan did not say when his resignation will take effect, but one former federal prosecutor said he expects Ryan to leave office in the next four to six weeks, when his successor is lined up.

E-mail Jessica Guynn at jguynn@sfchronicle.com.

Big Game? An Enron Survivor Hunts For Riches (NYT)

By Charles Duhigg

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

THE South Pacific islands of Papua New Guinea, where canned mackerel occasionally serves as currency and cannibalism was once on the menu, are a long way from the corporate jungles where Enron was born.

Yet amid the wreckage of Enron, the energy giant that went bankrupt in 2001, is a leftover sliver of the company that is still doing business in Papua New Guinea: an oil refinery near the country's capital, Port Moresby, that was shipped there from Alaska and in which Enron continues to hold a small stake.

In November, the relatively obscure Houston company that owns most of that refinery, the InterOil Corporation, made the kind of announcement investors crave: explorations near the refinery had uncorked a vast pool of natural gas potentially larger than the United States' total residential consumption of the fossil fuel in 2005. The size of the discovery was so large, Phil E. Mulacek, InterOil's chairman and chief executive, informed an analyst, that simply controlling its output "was sort of like trying to stop the Mississippi."

DOJ_NMG_0119469

Just a few years ago, such proclamations — and the executives who made them — might have been viewed as curiosities, if they were noticed at all. Energy prices were so low that many natural-gas discoveries were burnt off so that drilling rigs could extract precious oil deposits further below. And rattled investors might have been wary of any company linked to Enron, especially one like InterOil that was boasting of possible treasures unearthed in remote jungles.

But that was then. This is now.

After a lengthy dormant spell, the global search for gas and oil has reignited with a fervor that is transforming companies like InterOil into Wall Street darlings. "The gold rush is back on," said Andrew V. Boland, an energy analyst at Peters & Company, a Canadian investment firm. "It's like the wild, wild West, all over again."

InterOil's gas find — which is unconfirmed and may be impossible to transport — caused the company's stock price to soar and its market capitalization to swell to $891 million from $572 million within three weeks of the announcement. Many of InterOil's financial backers, including Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs, Wells Fargo, and Boone Pickens's investment firm, increased their bets after the discovery was revealed. Stanley Druckenmiller, a former lieutenant of George Soros, disclosed three days after the announcement that his hedge fund had poured more than $30 million into InterOil stock.

The passion for unearthing energy riches goes well beyond InterOil, of course. Yet, as the tangled history and relationships behind InterOil demonstrate, fortune and merit do not always march in lockstep in today's energy scramble. In addition to enfranchising bold explorers, energy fever has empowered scrappy promoters and would-be kingmakers who are rushing to remake nations and economies in a flash, analysts say.

In a controversial move, the monarchy of Qatar, for instance, earned a shot at becoming a regional power broker after a collection of local magnates helped to persuade the government and ExxonMobil to pour more than $25 billion into the nation's gas fields. In Bolivia, President Evo Morales is trying to use his country's gas reservoirs to force neighboring Chile to give his landlocked country a corridor to the sea.

For small companies like InterOil, the possibilities for riches and influence are even more intoxicating. "I knew from the start this company would be great," said Wayne Andrews, an analyst at Raymond James who has long encouraged investors to buy InterOil. "These guys have moved mountains. They're working in an area with huge documented reservoirs of crude oil and natural gas. This is how fortunes are made."

Critics disagree. The company's history of disappointing results cause some to worry that not everything at InterOil is as it seems.

"This is a very questionable company," said Peter J. Hodson, a senior portfolio manager at Sprott Asset Management who has both owned and bet against InterOil's stock, but is not currently invested in the company. "These are not the types of people who are supposed to win the energy race."

INTEROIL was born in 1994, when Mr. Mulacek, a Texas oilman, bought a small Alaskan oil refinery and decided to relocate it halfway around the world.

Mr. Mulacek, who declined repeated interview requests, founded his first energy company in 1981 while he was still an undergraduate at Texas Tech University. In 1990, according to an interview with The Australian, the newspaper, he was processing oil waste in war-torn Kuwait when he met a group of Chevron executives. Four years later, they invited him to Alaska on a fishing trip that also included a tour of a small refinery that Chevron was trying to sell.

At the time, oil refineries were not in high demand. Global petroleum development had slowed to a relative standstill as energy companies faced record low oil prices. But Mr. Mulacek saw in the Alaskan refinery a unique opportunity: although the rugged terrain of Papua New Guinea, 6,000 miles away, was known to house oil and gas reserves — in some places, visitors could squeeze rocks until their hands were coated with an oily residue — the country had no domestic refining capacity. Mr. Mulacek, who is described by acquaintances as a uniquely intense and driven businessman, bought the refinery and started the move.

To find investors to finance the purchase, he enlisted the aid of Gaylen J. Byker, an oil executive who he had met through mutual acquaintances. Mr. Byker was about to become president of Calvin College, an educational affiliate of the Christian Reformed Church that is based in Grand Rapids, Mich. (Mr. Byker still holds that position.) But before taking the reins at Calvin College, Mr. Byker incorporated a small company to invest in Mr. Mulacek's refinery. A few months later, in mid-1995, Mr. Byker sold a portion of that company to his previous employer, the Offshore Energy Development Corporation.

DOJ_NMG_0119470

When Offshore Energy went public a few months after that, Mr. Byker sold his shares for $1.6 million, according to securities filings. Five months later, Offshore Energy's stock had declined by more than 73 percent, and Offshore Energy announced that it was for sale. In 1997, Titan Exploration, controlled by the deal maker Richard Rainwater, and an Enron subsidiary named JEDI (an entity later implicated in Enron's bankruptcy) bought the company and its stake in Mr. Mulacek's refinery.

By the time Titan entered the scene, Mr. Mulacek and Mr. Byker were scrambling to find cash to finance the refinery's relocation, according to Mr. Byker. Foremost among potential financiers was the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, a federal agency also known as OPIC that offers American companies loans and insurance for foreign projects with strategic value to the United States.

By 1999, when InterOil's talks with OPIC were announced, Papua New Guinea was struggling to maintain a fragile peace achieved only a year earlier when a treaty ended a popular revolt that had claimed 20,000 lives. The United States had promised more than $1 million in direct aid to help quell unrest. In 2001, OPIC agreed to lend InterOil $85 million to finance the refinery's rebuilding.

By then, the project was almost 10 years old and reconstruction was almost complete. But the refinery failed to meet expectations: although it began in 2004 to process crude bought from other oil companies, and has produced millions of barrels of gasoline and other products, it has never sold any of it at a profit. InterOil has booked about $893 million in revenue over the last three years, largely by selling the refinery's output. But the company reported increasing losses, posting a net loss of $37 million in 2005 alone, the last full year for which data are available.

"When crude was $30 a barrel, this refinery made a lot of sense," said Mr. Byker, who still serves as an InterOil director. But the market for nontransportation fuels produced in the refining process, like naphtha, became less profitable as the price of crude rose, said Mr. Byker, causing InterOil's earnings to suffer. The company has spent millions of dollars making the refinery more efficient, but thus far "it hasn't worked out as we hoped," he said.

A dearth of profits, however, did not stop InterOil from raising wads of money from investors. InterOil raised more than $125 million from shareholders and $318 million from debt holders between 2003 and 2005, according to securities filings. It did so based on assets that consist primarily of the refinery, which Mr. Byker said InterOil bought for less than $10 million, about 60 Papua New Guinean gas stations and a handful of oil and gas exploration projects.

The company's executives and analysts say investors are willing to overlook InterOil's losses because they believe that its oil and gas exploration activities will eventually pay off.

"While there hasn't been any real success in the company's history, I think they're on the brink of something huge," said Mr. Andrews at Raymond James, one of the few Wall Street analysts who has consistently followed the company. "I know it's controversial, and when people bash the company, I can't really say they're wrong, but I think it's going to be a great investment. It's happened with other energy explorers before."

In the last seven years, InterOil has drilled major wells in at least eight locations in Papua New Guinea. At the beginning of many of those projects, InterOil executives announced impressive preliminary results. With wells bearing such robust and bullish names as "Rhino," "Sterling Mustang" and "Triceratops," InterOil has announced tentative oil finds that topped 1.3 billion barrels.

And, as has always been the case on Wall Street, rosy announcements often provide more than enough fuel to ignite a stock surge.

A dollar invested in the company's stock in January 2002, when InterOil first said it discovered a major new oil system in Papua New Guinea, would be worth nearly $11.50 today. (By comparison, $1 invested in ExxonMobil would be worth $2.10.) During that time InterOil insiders, including Mr. Mulacek and Mr. Byker, have exercised stock options worth millions of dollars, and hedge funds have sold large blocks of shares to smaller, retail buyers, according to interviews with some of these large investors.

But none of InterOil's wells have ever produced any significant amounts of oil, according to securities filings. Almost all of its petroleum wells are now capped or dormant. InterOil remains dependent on buying crude from other Papua New Guinea oil explorers and foreign companies that it then refines. Mr. Byker said the company has always been forthright about its exploration activities, and has always been explicit in public statements that its business projections may be wrong. "Those press releases were very carefully couched," Mr. Byker said.

DOJ_NMG_0119471

InterOil's vice president for investor and public relations, Anesti Dermedgoglou, agreed. "There is often a difference between expectations and results in life," he said. "I can't help if investors get too excited. I don't control the stock price."

Mr. Byker added that throughout the company's history, InterOil insiders have held onto most of their stock, showing that they are as dedicated as the investors they approached.

The company has also always urged inside shareholders to be forthright about their purchases and sales of the company's stock, he said.

"We're all pretty well committed," said Mr. Byker, who personally owns shares worth more than $8 million. Mr. Mulacek holds shares worth more than $25 million, according to securities filings.

But Mr. Byker acknowledges that the company's convoluted, labyrinthine ownership structure makes it difficult to know exactly who owns what at InterOil. For instance, a portion of InterOil's shares are owned by a series of different entities that Mr. Mulacek and his family partially own. There are also a number of other entities partially owned or affiliated with Mr. Mulacek or Mr. Byker that own InterOil stock.

"The company grew up over a long period of time, and so there were a lot of different groups involved," Mr. Byker said. Although identified in filings as one of InterOil's largest shareholders, Mr. Byker said that "there are lots of other people involved with this company who own more than I do."

"But it's hard to tell who they are or who owns what," he added, "because they work through limited partnerships and offshore companies."

Such explanations have not satisfied some short-sellers and analysts, such as Ira Zadikow at Great Eastern Securities in New York and Mr. Hodson of Sprott Asset Management, who say the company's complicated ownership structure is worrisome.

InterOil has obtained millions of dollars in loans from Clarion Finanz AG, the investment firm of Carlo Civelli, a Swiss businessman who has worked with Mr. Mulacek since 1996 as an investor or adviser. Last year, InterOil announced that Clarion and Merrill Lynch had agreed to lend the company $130 million. Mr. Civelli has a long history as an investor in Canadian energy, mining and technology companies, where he often takes director posts.

In 1994, according to news reports, two inspectors working for the British government reviewing insider-trading allegations accused Mr. Civelli of improperly working with a broker to disguise stock sales of companies involved in takeover talks. The inspectors also examined financial transactions that they believed were "akin to a money-laundering operation," according to the reports, for possible links to Mr. Civelli. Mr. Civelli was never charged with any crimes by the British government, and Vancouver Stock Exchange officials who reviewed the report decided not to pursue their own investigation.

In an interview, Mr. Civelli said that he would have been criminally charged if there had been any real evidence of wrongdoing. "They were interested in destroying my reputation," he said. "They were not interested in the truth."

In a second, unrelated case earlier this year, Canadian securities regulators said Mr. Civelli had covertly helped another executive gain control of a publicly traded energy company after regulators had banned the executive from running any public companies. Mr. Civelli said the regulators' claims were false, and that he was simply helping to broker a stock deal. Canadian regulators have not charged Mr. Civelli with any wrongdoing in the matter.

Merrill Lynch, which had a banking relationship with Enron and is now one of InterOil's major lenders, declined to discuss its relationship with Mr. Civelli or InterOil. For his part, Mr. Byker asserted that Mr. Civelli's problems had nothing to do with InterOil. "He's been a very reliable and straightforward person in everything involving InterOil," he said.

InterOil has had other entanglements with controversial figures. In 2004, Mr. Mulacek hired an investor relations executive named Carl Caserta, whom the Securities and Exchange Commission had barred from the securities industry almost two decades earlier, after he was accused of buying hundreds of thousands of stock shares for clients without their authorization. Mr. Caserta, who declined to speak on the record, stopped working for InterOil in 2005, according to his former employer, Lighthouse Capital Ltd.

DOJ_NMG_0119472

Mr. Byker said the InterOil board was not aware of Mr. Caserta's history when he was retained. Mr. Dermedgoglou of InterOil said he was not aware that the firm had hired Mr. Caserta.

THE tangled corporate structure at InterOil, and the skein of financial and business relationships propping it up, might not have generated much attention if the company had not unfurled its November announcement about the Mississippi-sized natural-gas fields it had found in Papua New Guinea. The timing of the announcement was impeccable, arriving amid a global transformation in energy exploration.

For years, foreign development of natural gas lagged behind the search for other resources like petroleum, because low natural-gas prices did not generate much interest. But earlier in this decade, energy prices began rising and natural-gas exploration became much more attractive. Previously discovered but undeveloped gas fields in Qatar, Nigeria, Indonesia, Algeria, Australia, Iran, Egypt and Trinidad and Tobago began drawing interest. Analysts at Cambridge Energy Research Associates forecast that production of liquefied natural gas, or L.N.G., will more than double by 2012.

InterOil's blue-chip backers, all of whom declined to speak about the company, are betting that some of that enthusiasm will spill into Papua New Guinea. But if InterOil's gas find is to become a gold mine, someone needs to build a plant nearby that can convert natural gas into a liquid, so it can be easily transported.

While InterOil bought its refinery for just $10 million, L.N.G. plants are a tad more pricey: the cost of such facilities starts at about $4 billion.

"The name of the game is creating the infrastructure to bring reserves to market," said Michael Zenker at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "There's a tremendous appetite for L.N.G. projects, and companies and development banks are lining up. Where that money goes may have as much to do with hype and politics as economic logic."

Almost every country with untapped gas fields is racing to convince major energy companies, international lenders and third-world development organizations that its gas finds justify extraction. In November, when InterOil tentatively reported its discovery of 4 trillion to 11 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, the company also said it had lined up $130 million for pre-engineering work on a liquefied natural gas plant. But to win the energy race, it obviously will need to raise much more.

To that end, InterOil executives have enlisted Papua New Guinea's prime minister, Sir Michael Somare, and its energy minister, Sir Moi Avei, to convince investors and foreign governments that the nation deserves their help. At InterOil's urging, the country has changed its tax laws to make natural-gas investments more profitable. InterOil executives are circling the globe to pitch investors on the company's stock and a major new refinery project.

Some independent engineers and analysts say InterOil's efforts may pay off.

"They've been very open with their data, and at first glance you can't help but be amazed," said Robb Moss, a geologist at Acumen Capital Finance Partners in Calgary, Alberta, who has reviewed InterOil's published findings. Acumen is not an investor in the company.

"But until you drill a lot of wells, you can't really measure anything," Mr. Moss added. "It's almost impossible to accurately forecast anything at this stage."

Furthermore, analysts say, given the enormous amount of natural gas development occurring elsewhere, it is unclear if developing even a large discovery makes sense. InterOil critics note that Australia, a neighbor of Papua New Guinea, is already the fifth-largest producer of liquefied natural gas in the world, and is expected to more than double its production by 2015, according to the United States Department of Energy. Such concerns helped persuade a consortium of investors to pull out of plans to build a pipeline from Papua New Guinea to Australia in August.

"High gas prices have seduced investors into overlooking concerns," said Mr. Boland at Peters & Company. "Energy is always cyclical, and the natural-gas market is particularly fickle."

If InterOil can convince investors to back an L.N.G. plant, the company is almost certain to profit from the gas fields, analysts say, because it will make the deposits cheaper to develop than fields in other countries.

To that end, Mr. Mulacek is working hard. A few years ago, he flew with a handful of Papua New Guinea ministers to Trinidad, a nation that won the natural-gas lottery when a plant was constructed there in the late 1990s. Today, the energy industry is one of Trinidad's largest employers.

DOJ_NMG_0119473

"We're making our case to organizations like OPIC, who want to help impoverished countries, and to groups like Merrill Lynch and foreign investors, who are very interested," Mr. Byker said.

If InterOil succeeds, the company's shares, which closed on Friday at $26.20, may climb. If executives fail, or the discovered gas reserves turn out to be too small to justify a pipeline or plant, the company may, like Enron, simply disappear.

InterOil's executives are undaunted, and enthusiastic, about the challenges of striking it rich in Papua New Guinea.

"This is a beautiful island, filled with amazing jungles and rainforest, spectacular animals and birds that are like something out of storybooks," Mr. Byker said. "It's like an unknown frontier. These areas need visionaries. That's how dreams become real."

Why Backdated Options Might Be Contagious (NYT)

By Mark Hulbert

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

DIRECTORS of corporations often form a tight-knit community, serving at more than one company and creating what are known as interlocking boards of directors. As a result of this chumminess, corporate practices that otherwise might remain confined to just a few companies can spread quickly.

That appears to have been the case with the backdating of stock options, according to a new statistical study of publicly traded American companies.

The study's authors are two finance professors, John M. Bizjak of Portland State University in Oregon and Michael L. Lemmon of the University of Utah, as well as one of Professor Lemmon's graduate students, Ryan J. Whitby. A version of the study, "Option Backdating and Board Interlocks," is at papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract-id=946787.

Options backdating, of course, involves retroactively granting options to executives and directors on dates when a company's stock price was lower. The practice has favorable monetary, accounting and tax consequences for the companies themselves, as well as for the recipients. It isn't necessarily illegal, but it must be disclosed under federal securities law. Federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission are investigating numerous companies in connection with options backdating.

How did the practice become trendy in boardrooms across America? According to the study, a big part of the answer may be found in interlocking boards, which the researchers describe as the biggest conduit for transferring information about options backdating.

The study looked at publicly traded companies that granted options at any point from 1996 through 2002, and it particularly examined those that began to engage in options backdating during this time. The researchers found that the probability that a company would start the practice rose by a third to a half if one of its directors was also on the board of a company that was already backdating options. The range in these probabilities depended on various factors, including the number of directors who served on other companies' boards.

The researchers would not have been able to reach statistically meaningful results based only on the 120 or so companies that regulators have publicly identified as under investigation for possible options backdating. As a result, the sample was expanded to include other companies where the odds of having engaged in the practice were overwhelming, according to the researchers.

To identify these additional companies, they looked at the behavior of the companies' stocks in the days before and after the option grant dates. If the price of a company's stock fell substantially just before the grant date, then rose substantially immediately after, the researchers flagged the grant as suspicious. That's because the odds are extremely small, they say, that a company would randomly pick a date so conveniently sandwiched between a large price drop and a subsequent price hike. Even so, the researchers didn't assume that a company had engaged in backdating unless at least 20 percent of its option grants were suspicious.

In an interview, Professor Bizjak said that though this hurdle was quite high, surpassing it wasn't proof that a company backdated options. There is a small theoretical possibility, he said, that the company was just lucky in picking very favorable days for granting at least 20 percent of its options. But he and his fellow researchers are confident, he said, that the number of companies that backdated at least some options is close to the total reached in their study. He also noted that this number — around 1,400, or 43 percent of the publicly traded companies that granted options from 1996 to 2002 — was in line with estimates reached by other academic researchers.

DOJ_NMG_0119474

IF these estimates are even modestly close to correct, there are hundreds of companies that engaged in options backdating but whose identities are not yet public. The study didn't identify any likely companies by name, but it showed investors how to do so themselves. Such insight could be valuable, because a company's stock typically drops when previously undisclosed backdating is belatedly made known.

Professor Bizjak advises investors to check whether the boards of any companies in their portfolios are heavily interlocked with those of companies where backdating is already public knowledge. There is a markedly increased chance that such companies have also engaged in the practice, making their stocks vulnerable.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Calif. Zone Tops In Porn Arrests (FRESBEE)

By John Ellis, The Fresno Bee

Fresno Bee, January 21, 2007

Area including Fresno leads nation in exploitation indictments.

When it comes to fighting child exploitation, no part of the nation has put up statistical numbers like the federal law enforcement zone centered on Fresno and Sacramento.

Over the past two fiscal years — including the one that ended Sept. 30 — the Eastern District of California has indicted more people for child pornography, molestation and related crimes than any other federal law enforcement zone in the nation.

In the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30, the number was 71. In the one that preceded it, the total was 67.

"It's something we're very proud of," said McGregor W. Scott, U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of California.

Proud, but also surprised. Such information, Scott said, isn't published regularly, and for the most part the various federal districts around the nation are unaware of any statistical crime totals from outside their own region.

This particular recognition came last month, during a Washington, D.C., conference on Project Safe Childhood. During a speech, Associate Attorney General Bill Mercer — who holds the No. 3 position at the Justice Department — singled out the Eastern District of California, which runs from Kern County to the Oregon border, as the national leader in child exploitation indictments.

Assistant U.S. Attorney David Gappa, who specializes in child exploitation cases in Fresno's federal courthouse, said, "We're always just looking for a way we can do a case, rather than ways we can't do it."

Scott cited four primary reasons for the high numbers in his district:

Weak state laws. Until recently, Scott said, California had weak child pornography and child exploitation laws.

That changed somewhat in September, when Gov. Schwarzenegger signed a package of bills that, among other things, allows possession of child pornography to be charged as a felony and extends prison sentences for Internet luring.

Before that, Scott pointed out, the federal government "was the only game in town" for "egregious cases where men posed a real threat to children."

Outreach. During his first six months on the job, Scott said, he visited all 34 counties in California's Eastern District, talking to sheriffs and police chiefs at every stop.

Because of the state's weak laws, he stressed that law enforcement officials should send child pornography and child exploitation cases to the federal level for prosecution. They responded, he said.

Making it a priority. Studies done among inmates at federal penitentiaries found a connection between possession of child pornography and child molestation.

It prompted a policy change at the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Eastern District, labeling such crimes as "crimes of violence" and making prosecution of them a priority.

Momentum. In the end, a snowball effect happened as local and federal law enforcement and federal prosecutors saw the results of their efforts — long prison sentences for those convicted of child pornography or child exploitation crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0119475

Gappa said the cooperation between agencies was key in the effort.

"We're fortunate to have aggressive prosecution, but we're also benefitting from high-quality investigations at agencies that have also made it a priority."

He specifically cited Clovis police, the Fresno County Sheriff's Department and the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement for their efforts.

Rick Eaton, assistant special agent in charge of the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Sacramento office — which oversees Fresno — agreed that cooperation between law enforcement agencies has been critical to the successful child exploitation efforts.

"I have never had a better working relationship in 30 years of law enforcement than with the U.S. Attorney's Office," Eaton said.

"It makes you want to cooperate with everybody else."

The reporter can be reached at jellis@fresnobee.comor (559) 441-6320.

Violent Crime Falls Sharply In Providence (PROJO)

By Gregory Smith, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 21, 2007

PROVIDENCE — With a crew of streetworkers calming gang feuds and a gun task force invading criminal haunts, the frequency of murder has fallen to a historic low in Rhode Island's capital city.

The number of slayings fell by half last year and violent crime overall declined sharply, Police Chief Dean M. Esserman said, as improved law enforcement strategy and tactics such as the streetworkers and gun task force had a cumulative effect.

While 22 people were killed in 2005, that fell to 11 in 2006, which Esserman said last week is the fewest in 31 years.

Violent crimes decreased by 18.6 percent last year, according to preliminary figures in a police document obtained by The Providence Journal. The number of such crimes — homicide, rape, robbery and aggravated assault — fell from 1,145 to 932, a decrease of 213.

Mayor David N. Cicilline and the chief are scheduled to announce final numbers for 2006 tomorrow, including figures for property crime and total crime. Excepting murders, the final figures for violent crime may vary slightly from the preliminary figures.

Killings in Providence, the second most-populated city in New England, peaked at 30 in 2000, then declined to 23 in 2001 and 2002, to 20 in 2003, and then to 18 in 2004. The next year there was a spike, to 22, but then the number plummeted last year.

Esserman has no explanation for what he called "a blip" in killings and violent crime in 2005. But since he became chief in January 2003, he contends, a disciplined, dedicated and properly staffed Police Department has brought down both violent and property crimes.

"We have focused on crime as never before over the last four years," Esserman said last week. "Even though we worked very hard in 2005, there was some terrible violence that was hard for us to intercept. … I think our strategies are working" overall.

Those strategies, among others, include the government-subsidized streetworker program, in which paid youth workers from the nonprofit Institute for the Study and Practice of Nonviolence mediate conflicts and try to head off violence; a concerted effort to separate criminals from their guns; and community policing.

Community policing entails the decentralization of the police command to delegate more decision-making authority to captains and lieutenants in neighborhoods, and the enlistment of community groups, other agencies inside and outside law enforcement, and residents to help solve problems and prevent crimes.

The decrease in killings and violent crime in Providence runs contrary to a national trend over the past few years in which cities comparable to Providence and larger cities generally have seen an increase. The severity of the violence has gotten worse and teenagers are becoming criminals at a younger age, according to law enforcement experts.

Violent crime nationwide surged by 2.5 percent in 2005 — the highest rate of increase in 15 years — according to the FBI. And for the first six months of 2006, violent crime was up nearly 4 percent. The FBI does not yet have a figure for the entire year.

DOJ_NMG_0119476

Although a reason sometimes is never found, slayings generally stem from the illicit drug trade, money or street disputes and personal relationships that sour, such as cases of domestic violence. Gang activity can be a direct factor, although the police say gang-related violence in Providence has diminished, in part because of a gang task force that predates Esserman's tenure.

None of the 2006 homicide victims in Providence was younger than 20 years old, a phenomenon in which Teny Gross, director of the Institute for the Study and Practice of Nonviolence, takes some pride.

"We work on small conflicts. We don't wait for them to become huge," he said of the streetworkers.

"A lot of little detail works. If a kid gets robbed, we're trying to mediate, trying to get stuff returned."

"As a salesperson of a positive lifestyle," Gross said, "I still have very little to offer" compared with the lure of the streets and the camaraderie of gangs. Investing in youth programs pays off in the long run with a reduction in crime and other benefits, he said.

The streetworker program began in August 2003 with three streetworkers and expanded to five in 2005. Gross did a flurry of hiring in 2006, boosting his crew to 13, and he said the larger complement had an effect. But he cautioned that he is having trouble paying for them.

One of the factors in the decline in violent crime over time is fewer shootings, which fell to 44 in 2006. There were 105 people shot in 2002, 92 in 2003, 73 in 2004 and 65 in 2005. A five-member gun task force, according to Esserman, has had an impact.

Task force members watch criminal hangouts, waiting for suspects to do something suspicious so they can confront and frisk them in the hopes of finding a gun. However, more firearms actually are seized by the police Narcotics and Organized Crime Bureau in the course of drug investigations.

The U.S. Justice Department collaborates with the city police, arranging for the assignment of agents from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to work on gun crime. Everyone caught with a gun is interviewed by a federal agent to determine if the suspect is eligible for federal prosecution, according to Esserman.

Gun-carrying criminals are dealt with more harshly in the federal criminal justice system than in the state system, with longer sentences and incarceration in prisons far away from family and friends. Although the federal system has a provision for sentence reduction called "good time," there is no parole.

A properly sized police force also has made a difference, according to Esserman.

"Most [sizeable] police departments in the country have suffered significant attrition in the last four years," Esserman said. For example, he pointed out, the New York City police force was reduced by several thousand officers, Boston by several hundred and New Haven, Conn., by several dozen.

The chief credited the mayor and City Council for maintaining Providence's force of 494, which currently has no vacancies.

"There is no me" in the anticrime achievements, said Esserman, who thanked state and federal officials and other groups that he counts as the department's partners. "There's only we."

"We have focused on crime as never before over the last four years."

Dean M. Esserman,

Providence police chief

"We have focused on crime as never before over the last four years."

Dean M. Esserman,

Providence police chief

WHO IS R. LINDLEY DeVECCHIO? (HTRIB)

By CAROL E. LEE

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), January 21, 2007

SARASOTA -- By the time R. Lindley DeVecchio settled in Sarasota, his days at the FBI had become gangland lore.

He worked Brooklyn turf alongside storied undercover agents like "Donnie Brasco," back when mobsters gunned each other down in the streets and children stumbled upon bullet-riddled corpses while playing outside.

Having sealed up a 33-year career with the FBI, DeVecchio bought a courtyard-style home set among hammocks of palms in virtually crime-free Palmer Ranch. He became a grandfather. He got elected president of a homeowners association where the major issue is landscaping.

And then he got indicted for murder.

The supervisory special agent who helped bring down the leaders of New York City's five organized crime families now faces four 25-years-to-life prison sentences in what a prosecutor at the Brooklyn District Attorney's Office has called "one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the history of this country."

As he awaits another pretrial hearing this month, DeVecchio, 66, has also been busy tending to some local matters, leading the search for a property manager at his deed-restricted community and coordinating elections to the homeowners association.

Some 1,200 miles north, in the chambers of a small Brooklyn courtroom, sits the bane of his golden years.

The foot-thick case file charges that when DeVecchio was investigating organized crime in the 1980s and 1990s, he gave a legendary capo in the Colombo family the addresses of his enemies and details about whom among his crew might be a rat.

The leaks led to the shooting deaths of a young woman, an 18-year-old kid, a mobster flirting with born-again Christianity and a bus company employee, court documents say.

DeVecchio, who declined to speak publicly about his pending trial or his life in Sarasota, pleaded not guilty to all four counts of second-degree murder at his March 30 arraignment in Brooklyn State Supreme Court.

And a 1994 internal Justice Department investigation into similar accusations found he had done nothing wrong.

"We deny the allegations in as strong a language as you can possibly deny anything," said one of DeVecchio's lawyers, Mark Bederow. "He's being falsely accused of the worst crimes imaginable."

But Brooklyn prosecutors say DeVecchio became too entwined with top-echelon informant Gregory Scarpa Sr., a "made" Colombo family mobster who once boasted that he stopped counting the number of murders he committed after reaching 50.

DeVecchio, prosecutors say, fed Scarpa confidential FBI information that kept the Colombo consigliere out of jail and helped him take out rivals. He took weekly payments in return and extracted inside information about the Mafia that aided his rise in the bureau, court files allege.

New York tabloids have since branded DeVecchio a "rogue," and his court appearances are main events. There, the case generates the pomp of blue-ribbon kinds on which prosecutors make names for themselves.

Here in Sarasota, DeVecchio's presence mostly goes unnoticed.

Taking the occasional note and wearing a sticker name tag, he sat quietly through a two-hour community meeting last week, where residents gave out certificates for best holiday decorations and a sheriff's deputy explained how he handles teenage disturbances.

In DeVecchio's community, Savannah at Turtle Rock, the rare mention of his legal woes falls on shrugged shoulders. His neighbors do not pry.

"It's not an issue. The folks here -- which is very, very nice -- judge you for what you're doing," said Ron Mingst, who lives next door to DeVecchio, whom he met at a New Jersey gym about five years ago. "You're doing a good job in the community. You're doing a good job as president of our association. That's what they see."

From clerk to agent

In 1963, DeVecchio was 23, with a political science degree from George Washington University and a clerk's job in J. Edgar Hoover's FBI. Scarpa was in his initial years as an informant.

DeVecchio became an agent a few years later and soon specialized in organized crime at the bureau's New York City office.

"He was one of the best informant analysts that we had," said James Kossler, one of DeVecchio's former bosses. "He was very good at developing informants and getting information that we needed."

Informants are paid FBI sources who are not allowed to participate in criminal activities without permission from the bureau.

But Gregory "The Grim Reaper" Scarpa dabbled in a medley of crimes: loan sharking, drug dealing, burglary, illegal gambling and murder.

DOJ_NMG_0119478

One of his attorneys once told The New Yorker magazine that Scarpa being an FBI informant was as inconceivable as finding out that "Mother Teresa is assisting Saddam Hussein."

Handling the mobster was a touchy endeavor, and the FBI had a falling out with him in the mid-1970s.

DeVecchio brought Scarpa back into the fold in 1980 after getting permission from the bureau.

The charismatic agent with curly, dark hair and a mustache became the only one in the bureau to deal with the informant.

"Scarpa immediately became an important source of information in connection with the FBI's war on organized crime because he was highly placed in the Colombo crime family," DeVecchio stated in court records. "Moreover, Scarpa understood the inner workings of the Colombo crime family."

DeVecchio's informant finesse helped then-U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani jail leaders of the city's Cosa Nostra in the celebrated 1986 Commission case.

"Without Lin or without that informant, we wouldn't have been able to accomplish what we did," Kossler said.

But the Brooklyn District Attorney's office says that over the course of their 12-year relationship, Scarpa also gave DeVecchio rolls of rubber-band bound cash for confidential information, and DeVecchio kept $66,598 of FBI money intended for Scarpa.

DeVecchio has said he never took more than small gifts from Scarpa, such as a pan of lasagna and a Cabbage Patch doll when they were popular and scarce. He vehemently denies intentionally giving any information to Scarpa that could have led to the murders of which he stands accused.

"At no time did I ever instruct Scarpa to murder anyone," DeVecchio stated in an affidavit. "Nor did I ever conspire with him to plan any murder."

The murders

In late September 1984, DeVecchio walked up the four steps leading to Scarpa's two-story home on Avenue J in Brooklyn and suggested he "take care of" the girlfriend of Alphonse Persico, a fugitive and the brother of the Colombo family boss, court documents charge.

He said 31-year-old Mary Bari had talked to federal agents and might reveal the location of Persico, prosecutors allege.

A few days later, Scarpa and his crew lured Bari to a Brooklyn bar with the promise of a job offer. As she entered the club, one of them allegedly slid his arm around her and pushed her to the floor. She was shot three times in the head, the case charges.

Prosecutors say DeVecchio gave Scarpa a similar tip a year and a half later. He told him that one of his crewmen, Joseph DeDomenico, 44, had cut him out of profits from robbing jewelry and fur stores, and could be a liability because he was dating a born-again Christian, court documents allege. Being born again was one step from being a rat, prosecutors say Scarpa later told his right-hand man, and he ordered DeDomenico killed.

DeVecchio again warned Scarpa of a potential snitch among his ranks in May 1990, prosecutors charge. And a couple of Scarpa soldiers later shot 18-year-old Patrick Porco in the head and dumped his body on a street corner, the case alleges.

A bloody internal war broke out in the Colombo family the following year, in the wake of its boss's imprisonment.

DeVecchio was a supervisor of the FBI squad investigating the Colombo family. Scarpa continued to pick off rivals.

One of them was Lorenzo Lampasi, 66, whom he shot with a rifle outside his Brooklyn home after DeVecchio gave Scarpa his address, prosecutors charge.

The war lasted about a year. Nearly a dozen people died.

Retired to Florida

Scarpa was convicted on gun charges in 1992. The FBI ordered DeVecchio to cut ties.

Around the same time, some of DeVecchio's colleagues began to question the orthodoxy of his relationship with Scarpa, who died in prison in 1994 while serving time for murder and racketeering.

The department conducted a two-year investigation and found DeVecchio innocent.

He retired from the FBI in October 1996.

He sold his home in Dumont, N.J., where he had lived for decades, and moved to Sarasota in 2004.

Here, he blends in as a typical retiree. He belongs to a motorcycle club. And like many who have chartered a new beginning in paradise, he shoots the breeze over the fence with his neighbor, Mingst, about their home building woes.

DOJ_NMG_0119479

His prospects for another term on the homeowners' board appears untainted by the lawsuit. No one else has volunteered for the job, although the 82 homeowners probably would have elected DeVecchio anyway.

"No one has come up to me and wanted to discuss the situation, and I've never even heard that someone would say that we want to remove him from the board," said Burke Terhune, the board's secretary.

But for DeVecchio, the trial looms.

Unless he gets permission from a judge -- as he did to watch the July Fourth fireworks at Sarasota Bay -- he can always be found inside his three-bedroom home during a mandated curfew from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m.

He wears an electronic monitoring anklet. He has had to notify a judge of his plans to lunch with his fiancée, get a haircut or peruse the Ellenton outlet mall. And this summer he had to reschedule a homeowners board meeting because it conflicted with a court appearance.

DeVecchio simply told the group he had to "go and testify," Terhune said.

"It seemed like it was New York City or someplace. He said the next meeting will be at this time, if it's OK with the rest of you," Terhune said.

No one asked questions.

ANTITRUST:

Some Speculate On Future Of P-I, Purchase By Black (SEATIMES)

By Eric Pryne, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, January 21, 2007

Could David Black save the P-I?

With a decision looming in four months that might spell the beginning of the end for the smaller of Seattle's two daily newspapers, some speculate Black could ride to the Post-Intelligencer's rescue.

He kept an endangered daily alive before under similar circumstances, they note, in Honolulu.

Liz Brown, administrative officer for the Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild, said she mentioned the possibility to Don Kendall, who heads Black Press' new King County operations, at a meeting last month.

"I told him, 'You could save the day again,' " said Brown, whose union represents workers at both Seattle papers.

But Kendall said he's never discussed buying or printing the P-I with Black. What's more, he added, Seattle isn't Honolulu.

Here's the P-I's situation, and how Black conceivably could factor into it.

The P-I has pretty much been only a newsroom since 1983. That's when its owner, The Hearst Corp., entered into a federally sanctioned joint operating agreement (JOA) with The Seattle Times Co.

The Times prints, circulates and sells the advertising for both papers. In return, it gets most of the proceeds. But it has maintained in recent years that it is losing money under the arrangement and moved in 2003 to trigger an escape clause in the contract.

Hearst has said the P-I couldn't survive outside the JOA. It also says The Times' loss claims aren't valid.

After years of litigation, the companies agreed last spring to submit their dispute to binding arbitration. The arbitrator is scheduled to rule by May 31.

If The Times wins, the agreement calls for Hearst to shut down the P-I in six to 12 months. In return, it would get 32 percent of The Times' profits until 2083, when the JOA expires.

To comply with antitrust laws, however, the U.S. Justice Department or federal judges almost certainly would require Hearst to put the P-I up for sale before closing it. That's what happened in Hawaii in 2000.

The owner of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin had announced that, in return for a cash payout, it would close its paper and dissolve its JOA with the larger Honolulu Advertiser. After the courts stepped in, the Star-Bulletin was put up for sale

The Star-Bulletin then — like the P-I today — had no presses, no advertising sales force and no circulation network. "It was essentially a startup business," said Wayne Cahill of the Hawaii Newspaper Guild.

But Black stepped in when no one else in the industry would, buying the paper for $10,000 and building up the business and production end from scratch. Kendall, who headed Black's Hawaii operations at the time, says it wouldn't have happened if the company hadn't also been able to buy an Oahu weekly with presses that became the foundation for the Star-Bulletin's new printing operation.

In almost every other U.S. city, the dissolution of a JOA has meant the death of a paper. In Honolulu, the Star-Bulletin survives.

Black could do the same thing in Seattle, Brown and others say. The Times-Hearst arbitration agreement acknowledges Hearst could still collect its 32 percent of The Times' profits, even if it sells the P-I to a buyer willing to publish the paper outside the JOA.

Kendall said he doesn't know whether the Kent press Black acquired as part of the King County Journal Newspapers purchase is big enough to print the P-I. What's more, he said, he hasn't asked: "In this region, our focus is on community newspapers."

But others say it would be possible, perhaps by adding capacity at Kent and contracting out part of the press run.

"It's a business opportunity he [Black] might well be interested in," said Cahill, who once worked in The Times' circulation department.

The Seattle situation isn't identical to Honolulu's. For one, powerful political forces in Hawaii lined up to save the Star-Bulletin. That hasn't happened — at least not yet in Seattle.

Publishing the P-I would require a huge investment on Black's part, not just in equipment but in people, said John Morton, a leading national newspaper analyst.

"It would be a very daunting prospect," he said.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Blueprint To Beautify, Restore Yosemite Tangled Up In Court (SFC)

By Chuck Squatriglia, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 21, 2007

When the Merced River overran its banks and scoured Yosemite National Park a decade ago, many saw an unprecedented opportunity to restore the iconic park and cede more of the Yosemite Valley to nature.

A plan by the National Park Service to reinvent the valley and another to protect the Merced River drew broad support from environmentalists, the public and the government. Years of acrimonious debate over how to manage a crown jewel of America's national park system gave way to a consensus that the Park Service had finally gotten it right.

Yet 10 years after the flood, both plans remain tied up in court, challenged by a small but passionate group of activists who argue that the Park Service would render Yosemite an exclusive resort. A federal judge has rejected the river plan, the future of the valley plan is uncertain and, with several projects planned for the valley brought to a halt, frustrated park officials worry they'll be told to begin the planning process anew.

But many of the environmentalists who championed the plans have moved on to other issues. Public, not to mention governmental, priorities have shifted. There is mounting concern that the broad support for remaking Yosemite is gone.

"We are rapidly approaching a point where a historic opportunity will become a lost opportunity," said Jay Watson, who as regional director of the Wilderness Society was intimately involved in shaping the park plans before leaving the organization two years ago. "Everything was aligned. I'm not sure a similar effort could be mounted again."

The flood devastated Yosemite Valley during the first three days of 1997. The Merced River, swollen by rain and melting snow, raced past Pohono Bridge at 187,000 gallons per second and crested at 16 feet.

The water ripped up roads, washed out bridges and ruined the park's water and sewer systems. It felled trees, inundated cabins and swamped campgrounds. What wasn't soaked was carried away. Picnic tables, bear-resistant food lockers and even tent cabins washed up miles downstream.

DOJ_NMG_0119481

Bruce Babbitt, Interior secretary at the time of the disaster, called Yosemite "a national treasure" and vowed to rebuild. Congress appropriated $220.5 million for the task.

The Park Service had for decades worried that the place John Muir called "the incomparable valley" was being overwhelmed. Yosemite covers 1,169 square miles, but 95 percent of the 3.5 million or so people who visit each year don't venture out of Yosemite Valley, which is 7 miles long and 1 mile wide. So in 1980, the Park Service produced a blueprint, called the General Management Plan, to curtail traffic and push development to the park periphery. It was shelved for lack of money and political will.

The flood provided both.

Flush with cash, the Park Service used the general plan to frame the Yosemite Valley Plan released in March 2000. It outlined 250 projects that would reduce traffic, reclaim developed land and restore ecosystems at a cost of $442 million. It would, officials said, reduce the development footprint in the valley.

The valley plan came three months after the Park Service, responding to a 1999 federal court order, completed a plan to protect the Merced River, which wends 81 miles through the park.

Together, the documents provided an ambitious blueprint to reinvent Yosemite. The Wilderness Society, the National Parks Conservation Association, the American Alpine Club and the Natural Resources Defense Council eagerly endorsed them.

"We believed (the plans) would provide a strong and environmentally sound groundwork for the park's future and make, at long last, real progress toward fulfilling the goals of the original General Management Plan to restore the valley," defense council attorney Johanna Wald said recently.

Californians, too, overwhelmingly approved of the plans, according to a statewide poll commissioned by the defense council shortly after the plans were announced.

But two small environmental organizations, Friends of Yosemite Valley and Mariposans for Environmentally Responsible Growth, opposed the plans. They sued, arguing that the Merced River Plan was hastily written, used flawed data and favored development.

U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii agreed and rejected the plan in July. He ordered the Park Service to draft a new plan, a process the Park Service says will take 33 months. In October, Ishii shut down several construction projects until the new plan is drafted.

The U.S. Justice Department is expected to announce it will appeal Ishii's rulings, but now finds itself defending the Yosemite Valley Plan as well.

The plaintiffs filed another lawsuit on Dec. 28, arguing that the valley plan should be tossed because it was based upon a General Management Plan that was never adopted and a Merced River Plan that was invalidated.

"Yosemite should take a deep breath and do the work needed to develop a legally compliant river plan, and then use that to develop a valley plan," said Greg Adair, executive director of Friends of Yosemite Valley. He said the organization has several hundred active members, most of whom live in the communities surrounding Yosemite and visit the park regularly.

He praises the Park Service for developing an "excellent" wilderness management plan and said the plaintiffs simply want the agency to apply the same effort to the river and valley plans.

"If they would draft a solid Merced River plan and give it a chance, and then come back and draft the valley plan so it respects the river and works toward protection, we would step back and agree with it," he said. "But until they do that, we'll be in conflict."

The issue goes far deeper than the nuts and bolts of two highly technical documents. It is a fundamental question of how to manage the park, and the plaintiffs disagree with the Park Service on almost every point.

They believe the Park Service has crafted a plan to urbanize Yosemite and create a theme park resort. They argue it will expand Yosemite Lodge, cede the valley to tour buses and push traditional campers aside in favor of RVs. They say the plan does little to restore the valley's beauty.

Adair insists that he recognizes the Park Service must serve a broad constituency, but argues it has failed to do so.

"We see the proposals at Yosemite as benefiting the wealthy and the corporate interests over the people," he said. "It's mass-transit, tour-bus tourism."

DOJ_NMG_0119482

The plaintiffs' reading of the plans stuns park officials and their supporters. Yosemite Superintendent Mike Tollefson says Adair's claims are "so bogus."

"Before the flood, we had twice the number of rooms at the lodge," he said. "Cutting the number of rooms in half is not urbanization. We've lost more than 300 camping spaces. That's not urbanization. We've got a plan to move 600 more employees out of the valley. That's not urbanization. We've got a shuttle system that gets people out of their cars. That's not urbanization."

Tollefson is proud of the work that was accomplished before Judge Ishii pulled the plug. Lower Yosemite Falls was remade with almost a mile of trails, five footbridges and other amenities. Sixty-eight acres of meadowland were restored. The park's dilapidated sewer system was rebuilt. Two dams spanning the Merced River were removed. A fleet of 18 hybrid shuttle buses replaced the park's entire diesel fleet.

The park is "standing tall," Tollefson said, but he's frustrated that he hasn't done more since he was named superintendent four years ago. And he wonders how much longer his hands will be tied by litigation that has already cost the park as much as $15 million.

"They have squandered a lot of money and time," he said of the plaintiffs. "But the opportunity hasn't been totally squandered. We're dedicated to improving the resource and the visitor experience. The idea that B.J. Griffin, superintendent at the time of the flood, put forth was 'We need to put it back, so let's put it back better than it was.' She started that work, and it's been very frustrating that we haven't been able to finish."

Yosemite since the flood of '97

Heavy rain and snowmelt caused the Merced River to overrun its banks, flooding Yosemite Valley during the first three days of 1997. Ongoing litigation has halted several projects launched in the wake of the flood. Here's a look at the valley since the flood:

Lower Yosemite Falls

The park installed nearly 1 mile of paved trails, five footbridges, small stone amphitheater, new restrooms and other amenities to make it easier to navigate the park's most popular feature. The $13.5 million project was completed in 2005.

Yosemite Lodge

250 low- and moderately-priced rooms in cabins and cottages lost in the flood will not be replaced, and the land will be restored. Eighty-eight lodge rooms will be removed and replaced with 90 new rooms.

Lower and Upper River campgrounds

262 campsites were lost in the flood and will be replaced with sites outside the valley.

Cook's Meadow and Stoneman Meadow (numbered on map)

Asphalt trails were replaced with wood boardwalks traversing the meadows, and fill-dirt and invasive species were removed, restoring 68 acres of meadowland between 2003 and 2006.

Lower Pines

103 campsites destroyed in the flood will be replaced with sites elsewhere in the park.

Upper Pines

The park hopes to create 39 RV campsites and 59 traditional campsites.

Curry Village

Employee housing provided in tent cabins has been replaced with 27 buildings providing 219 beds.

Happy Isles footbridge

Heavily damaged in a 1996 rockslide and further damaged in the flood, it was removed in 2000 and has not yet been replaced.

Happy Isles dam

Small, obsolete hydroelectric dam was removed in 2004.

Other projects

Park sewer system: Completely overhauled in 2003.

Water and utility lines: Had crisscrossed the valley floor underground; were consolidated into one trench since last year.

Hybrid shuttle buses: Fleet of 18 replaced the park's diesel buses in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0119483

Shuttle bus stops: Erected at Yosemite Falls, Sentinel Bridge, LeConte Memorial Lodge, Awahnee Hotel and the Valley Visitor Center between 2004 and 2006.

Cascades Dam: Obsolete hydroelectric dam just west of the valley was removed in 2004.

Campsites: The park hopes to add as many as 800 outside the valley, including the 365 lost in the flood.

Sources: ESRI, TeleAtlas, USGS

The Chronicle

E-mail Chuck Squatriglia at csquatriglia@sfchronicle.com.

Page A - 1

One Tribal Family Lost Two Members In Unsolved Cases (YHR)

By Phil Ferolito, YAKIMA HERALD-REPUBLIC

Yakima (WA) Herald Republic, January 21, 2007

Authorities still have no clue about what happened to Donnie Sampson.

The 71-year-old Yakama tribal official left early Oct. 30, 1994, for the Wilson Charlie-Dry Creek area, one of his favorite hunting spots near Mount Adams.

Three days later, authorities found his 1992 four-wheel drive pickup in more than a foot of snow near the mouth of Holdaway Meadows north of Mount Adams in the closed area of the Yakama reservation.

A rifle, pickup keys, extra clothing and a sack lunch were found inside his truck, but no trace of Sampson, a member of the Yakama Nation Code of Ethics Committee, a watchdog board of tribal government.

His disappearance puzzled family and tribal authorities. A massive search involving helicopters, snowmobiles, dogs and nearly 100 people found no trace of him, and seven years later he was presumed dead, according to the Yakima County Coroner's Office.

His disappearance isn't the only grief his family suffers. Two years earlier, the body of Sampson's 30-year-old daughter, Shari Dee Sampson Elwell, was found strangled and sexually mutilated in an area not far from where her father later disappeared.

The family hadn't seen her for weeks before a group of hunters found her body.

Her death, which remains unsolved, capped a decade-long string of mysterious deaths involving at least a dozen women -- all but two were tribal members -- on the 1.2-million-acre Yakama reservation.

Those cases are just two of an unknown number involving either unsolved deaths or missing tribal members here.

It's hard to say just how many unsolved cases exist because case files are dispersed among tribal, federal, state and county law enforcement agencies, says Yakama tribal police Chief Davis Washines.

How cases are classified on the reservation often determines which jurisdiction they fall under, he says.

If it's classified a homicide on tribal land, it goes to the FBI. If it's a missing tribal member or accidental death, tribal police take it. If it's a death caused by an auto accident, either the Washington State Patrol or Yakima County Sheriff's Office could take it.

Without any central filing system, though, it's hard for tribal police to discern which cases remain unsolved or have been closed, says Washines, who worked on some of the cases in the rash of women's deaths that spanned the 1980s.

Washines says tribal detectives are now working with the FBI not only to determine the number of unsolved deaths here, but also to update the number of missing persons.

"It may be quite an extensive list," he says.

When it comes to the number of unsolved homicides on the reservation, federal authorities have provided conflicting information.

Last spring, they said only one homicide remained unsolved here, but later changed the number to possibly two.

Finally, FBI spokesman Ray Lauer in Seattle said the number of unsolved cases including deaths or missing people could be as high as 32, a number Smiskin estimates dating back to the early 1970s.

DOJ_NMG_0119484

Reports gathered by the Yakima Herald-Republic nearly two decades ago accounted for at least 13 mysterious deaths here involving women, many of them classified as homicides. Now, those cases and others are the focus of a cold case review sparked by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Newspaper reports during the early 1990s reflected that tribal members and some investigators weren't convinced the FBI was doing all it could to solve the cases.

But FBI officials say that's not what happened. They say they had suspects in some of those cases, but they didn't have enough evidence to convict and the cases were subsequently closed, Lauer says.

FBI officials recently promised to discuss the unsolved cases involving women with the Yakima Herald-Republic, but changed their mind, saying they first needed to review the cases and couldn't say how long it would take.

Because of the lack of any central filing system on criminal cases on reservations, it's difficult to assess the FBI's efforts on Indian reservations in general or compile any statistics, says Gary Edwards, president of the national Native American Law Enforcement Association, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit organization that represents tribal police.

"It's still a problem that is going to have to be looked at," he says. "There hasn't been a clear boundary of who reports what to which agency."

Concurring with Edwards, Washines also blames much of it on a lack of resources and ability to conduct thorough follow-up investigations.

While describing the working relationship with the FBI as "generally good," Washines admits that the agency many times was shorthanded and often tribal police were left to investigate homicides.

"Which we did, which we were very successful in providing information to the Department of Justice office," he says. "I think the lack of resources, our ability to do a real thorough follow-up and our communication could have been better."

Blinding Ourselves In Space (NYT)

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

You don't have to be a space or climate expert to recognize that this country's ability to track climate and environmental changes from space is heading in the wrong direction. At a time when concerns about global warming are rising, the Bush administration is sharply reducing the number of satellites that can measure the impact of rising temperatures and a host of other environmental trends.

The administration's hypocrisy is stunning. For years, the president and top officials have justified their refusal to grapple seriously with global warming by insisting that more research is needed. Now, after pledging that such research would be the centerpiece of a new climate change strategy, the administration is underfinancing some of the most important efforts to gather data.

A report issued last week by the National Academy of Sciences projected an alarming decline in vital studies and monitoring. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration currently has a sizable number of Earth-observing satellites and instruments in orbit, but since 2000 its budget for earth sciences has decreased over 30 percent when adjusted for inflation.

By 2010, the number of operating sensors and instruments on NASA satellites that observe the Earth is likely to drop by 40 percent as old equipment fails and is not promptly replaced. Meanwhile, at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, huge cost overruns and technical problems have delayed planned launchings of key climate and weather-monitoring satellites and forced the elimination of instruments essential for climate science.

The setbacks are bound to hobble efforts to understand whether hurricanes and heat waves are becoming more frequent and intense, whether ice sheets will collapse and drive sea levels dangerously high, and how fish stocks, deforestation, drinking water supplies and air pollution are affected as populations grow and economies take off. We clearly need more data in coming years, not less.

The academy's panel estimates that some $7.5 billion in new money is needed through 2020, mostly at NASA, to conduct high-priority observational missions. NASA's resources are already grievously overextended. It must finish building the international space station, keep flying the rickety shuttle fleet and start developing a follow-on spacecraft to explore the Moon and get ready to travel to Mars.

DOJ_NMG_0119485

With little new money to carry out these costly tasks, the agency has been forced to rein in other parts of its budget, including earth science studies. Unless Congress gives NASA more funds, the agency should shift money internally to give Earth observations higher priority. Studies that could affect the livability of the planet seem vastly more consequential than completing a space station or returning to the Moon by an arbitrary date.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Officials Laud Transfer Of Mexican Drug Suspects (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 20 -- The extradition to the United States of four major drug traffickers, including Osiel Cardenas Guillen, head of the powerful Gulf cartel, was hailed Saturday by U.S. officials as a signal of a new era of cooperation.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called the extraditions "unprecedented," and the U.S. ambassador to Mexico, Antonio O. Garza Jr., proclaimed the transfer "a monumental moment in our two nations' battle with the vicious drug traffickers and criminals who threaten our very way of life."

For years, U.S. officials have criticized Mexico as a sometimes-difficult partner in the war against drugs because of its reluctance to extradite top drug lords to the United States. Mexico has long refused to extradite suspects who might face the death penalty. In 2001, Mexico's Supreme Court also barred extraditions of suspects facing possible life sentences, which were considered "cruel and unusual punishment" here. But the court reversed itself in November 2005, clearing the way for higher-profile extraditions. The ruling did not affect death penalty cases.

C?rdenas, who was suspected of running his drug empire from his prison cell, was one of 15 people extradited late Friday. A swaggering figure, he is known for his gold-plated rifle and for currying favor with the poor by lavishing children with thousands of dollars' worth of toys, cakes and milk.

C?rdenas faces drug distribution charges in southern Texas and is also charged with assaulting and threatening to kill agents of the FBI and the Drug Enforcement Administration, as well as a sheriff's deputy. Two brothers, Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero -- both former high-ranking members of the Arellano Felix drug cartel -- face drug trafficking and money laundering charges in Southern California. Hector "El Guero" Palma Salazar, a former top figure in the Chapo Guzman-Guero Palma cartel, also faces drug distribution charges in Southern California.

Mexico extradited a record 63 suspects to the United States in 2006. But the administration of President Vicente Fox, who left office Dec. 1, was criticized for failing to turn over large numbers of high-ranking drug lords.

The latest extraditions coincide with a major crackdown on drug gangs in Mexico by the administration of President Felipe Calderon, who has been using the military to swarm regions of the country plagued by brazen violence, including beheadings. In the hours before the extraditions were announced, Calderon dispatched more than 7,000 soldiers to Acapulco, where drug violence threatens the lucrative tourist market. The offensive is the third ordered by Calderon, who also has sent troops to Tijuana and the state of Michoacan.

"Calderon is sending a message that he is going to be firm in combating the drug cartels. But on the other hand, the extraditions also allow him to get rid of hot potatoes from the Mexican penal system," said Jorge Chabat, an expert in Mexican criminal justice.

Mexico's prisons, which are notoriously corrupt, have struggled to handle drug kingpins. Mexico's most powerful drug lord, Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, escaped from prison in 2001 and remains at large despite a U.S. government reward for information leading to his arrest.

Mexican drug cartels have become some of the most powerful and violent in the world. Between 70 and 90 percent of cocaine destined for the United States passes through Mexico, according to the U.S. State Department's Bureau for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs.

Drug gangs are suspected in more than 2,000 killings in Mexico last year, including dozens of police officers and local political officials. Chabat said the cartels would probably respond to the extraditions with more killings.

Reputed Drug Lords Extradited To U.S. (WT/AP)

By Lisa J. Adams

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY -- Mexico has extradited a purported drug-cartel boss and three other reputed major traffickers to the United States, a move that Washington yesterday called "unprecedented" in the cross-border fight against organized crime.

Osiel Cardenas, the purportedGulf cartel leader who was thought still to be running his gang from jail in Mexico, was sent north Friday along with 13 others wanted by U.S. authorities after their appeals against extradition ran out, the office of Mexico's attorney general said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales praised Mexican President Felipe Calderon yesterday for the extradition, saying the United States had never before received from Mexico such a large number of drug suspects and others wanted for prosecution in the United States.

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," Mr. Gonzales said yesterday.

In the past, Mexico has been reluctant to extradite major Mexican drug lords to the United States, arguing they should face justice here first.

Officials also refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is barred in Mexico.

But that attitude changed under President Vicente Fox, who last September promised to extradite "all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice."

Mr. Fox extradited a record 63 reputed criminals to the United States in 2006 alone, including suspected drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix of the Tijuana-based Arellano Felix gang.

Mr. Calderon, who took office Dec. 1, promised to increase the flow drug-trafficking suspects sent to the United States and to do his share to fight the organized crime that has infiltrated all aspects of Mexican society, including nearly every level of law enforcement and government.

U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza said the latest extradition demonstrated the "courage and conviction" of Mexico's president, attorney general and law enforcement officers.

"Today, both the Mexican and the American people can celebrate a monumental moment in our two nations' battle with the vicious drug traffickers and criminals who threaten our very way of life," Mr. Garza said in a statement Friday night.

In addition to Cardenas, Mexico extradited Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers and former chiefs in the Arellano Felix cartel in Tijuana and Mexicali; and Hector Palma Salazar, a former leader in the Sinaloa cartel led by Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman.

Eleven others were extradited on a variety of U.S. charges, including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes, the two governments said.

After taking office, Mr. Calderon almost immediately ordered widespread raids by federal police and army troops in states where rival drug-trafficking gangs have engaged in shootouts, executions and even beheadings in recent months.

More than 17,000 soldiers have been deployed in the city of Tijuana, across from San Diego; Mr. Calderon's native central state of Michoacan; and the Pacific coast state of Guerrero, which includes the resort city of Acapulco.

Many drug leaders remain at large. Guzman, the head of the Sinaloa cartel, who escaped from a Mexican prison in 2001, is described as Mexico's most powerful drug lord.

Mexican investigators say Guzman has formed an alliance with purported drug barons Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada and Juan Jose "El Azul" Esparragoza. Known as "the Federation," the alliance is engaged in a bloody turf war with the Gulf and Tijuana cartels, with the gangs using heavy weapons like rocket-propelled grenades.

Washington has offered rewards of $5 million each for information leading to the arrests of Zambada and Guzman.

Mexico Sends 4 Kingpins To Face Trial In The U.S. (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119487

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 20 — Breaking with longstanding practice, Mexico extradited four major drug traffickers to the United States late Friday and sent a signal that the country's newly elected president, Felipe Calderón, is serious about cooperating with his northern neighbor to dismantle cartels.

United States law enforcement officials have long complained about Mexican reluctance to hand over drug traffickers indicted in crimes north of the Rio Grande, as many drug kingpins have continued to operate their deadly networks from inside Mexican prisons, where they have been able to corrupt officials.

Until now, however, the Mexican government has resisted the extraditions, arguing that the drug cartel leaders must face justice here first. Also, until a recent Supreme Court ruling, Mexican officials were unable to extradite criminals because they face the death penalty in the United States, which is banned in Mexico. The court overturned that rule.

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," the United States attorney general, Alberto R. Gonzales, said in a statement on Saturday.

Osiel Cárdenas Guillén, the leader of the Gulf Cartel in Tamaulipas State, was among the 21 people flown under heavy armed guard to the United States on Friday night and handed over to federal authorities. He is under indictment in Texas for trafficking in marijuana and threatening to kill three law enforcement agents.

The Mexican government also turned over Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers who were high-ranking members of the Arellano-Félix cartel in Tijuana, as well as Hector Palma Salazar, a former leader in the Sinaloa cartel. All face racketeering and drug trafficking charges in Southern California.

The Sinaloa cartel controls the border around El Paso. Joaquín Guzman, known as El Chapo, escaped from prison in 2001 after bribing officials and still oversees the gang, along with several other important traffickers who have somehow eluded the Mexican police.

Former President Vicente Fox, who left office in December, created a special force to combat organized crime and arrested scores of high-ranking mobsters, weakening the three major cartels in Tijuana and Sinaloa State in the west and Tamaulipas State, along the eastern Texas border.

But his administration failed to break up the Sinaloa mob, and the arrests of people like Mr. Cárdenas and his counterpart in Tijuana, Benjamin Arellano-Félix, set off an underworld turf war that has increased in brutality and claimed thousands of lives in recent years.

Officials at the Drug Enforcement Agency privately voiced frustration with the Fox administration for not extraditing the drug kingpins to the United States, where they would be unable to run their networks from prison. A similar tactic proved effective in Colombia, Panama and other countries where drugs are produced and shipped.

Mr. Calderón and his attorney general, Eduardo Medina Mora, did not immediately say why they had switched course. The attorney general's office put out a statement saying simply that the people extradited had run out of appeals against extradition and that Mexico wanted them to face trial in the United States before the time limit ran out on the charges there.

But all are serving sentences or facing trials in Mexico. In the past, the Mexican authorities have said those were barriers to extradition.

A high-ranking federal prosecutor, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said President Calderón had decided to extradite the drug traffickers despite their pending legal proceedings. The aim is to make it difficult for them to communicate with their lieutenants in Mexico. "It breaks up the entire logistical structure of these organizations here," the prosecutor said.

Besides the four top drug traffickers, the Mexicans extradited seven other lower-level drug dealers, among them Gilberto Salinas Doria, who is wanted in the Southern District of New York on charges of helping to import 200 tons of cocaine.

They delivered four other prisoners wanted on charges of murder, drug trafficking and trafficking in prostitutes, officials said. One of these, Consuelo Carreto Valencia, is under indictment in New York City on charges of smuggling women and forcing them to become prostitutes.

Cartel Leader Handed To U.S. (DMN)

By Laurence Iliff, Alfredo Corchado

The Dallas Morning News, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119488

MEXICO CITY – The Gulf cartel leader alleged to have directed a violent turf war along the Mexico-Texas border from his Mexican prison now faces the law in the Lone Star State after President Felipe Calderón's unprecedented decision to extradite 11 drug traffickers to the U.S.

According to a video released by the Mexican government, Osiel Cárdenas Guillen, whose nickname "matamigos" means "friend-killer," was being held in Houston, where he will face charges that include threatening to murder three U.S. law enforcement officials.

AP/Mexico Attorney Generals Office Alleged Gulf cartel leader Osiel Cardenas, third from left, is moved during his extradition to the United States from Mexico.

In a landmark, top-secret operation, Mr. Cárdenas and 14 others were extradited to the U.S. late Friday, bringing lavish praise by U.S. officials and hope for a new era of cooperation in battling drug trafficking.

But it also prompted fear of retaliation by drug cartels that are heavily armed and well financed.

Although the extraditions seemed to signal a new policy, they actually were the culmination of several years' effort by the government to enable the transfers under Mexican law.

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," said U.S. Attorney General Al Gonzales, who met with his Mexican counterpart in Mexico City earlier this month. "Never before has the United States received from Mexico such a large number of major drug defendants and other criminals for prosecution in this country, including Osiel Cárdenas Guillen, the accused chief of the notorious Gulf cartel."

The controversial subject of extraditing high-level drug lords has been a source of debate and legal complications for decades. U.S. officials want the capos in their control, but Latin American leaders have faced nationalistic concerns at home. Law enforcement officials have long complained that the kingpins continue to run their drug empires from prison.

Mr. Cárdenas' cartel is active in Nuevo Laredo and along the Mexican border with Texas. Its enforcement arm, the Zetas, is a paramilitary group that includes former Mexican Army soldiers. The Zetas are suspected of having ordered killings in the United States, including in Dallas.

The 15 extraditions include four reputed top drug lords from three different cartels and seven lesser drug traffickers. The remaining four people are wanted in the U.S. for crimes such as human smuggling, homicide, and sexual assault against a child.

In a prepared statement, the Mexico attorney general's office blamed the drug lords for "generating a wave of violence and social decomposition in our country, in addition to damaging the health of thousands of Mexicans by turning them into prisoners of their drug addiction."

Possible return

While the extradited drug lords will now be charged and tried in the United States, some still may have to come back to Mexico to complete their sentences, said Jorge Chabat, an analyst who specializes in the drug war. Whether they will first serve out their sentences in Mexico or in the United States is not clear, he said.

An estimated 2,500 people died last year in the cartels' fight among themselves and with government forces. The killings included a level of violence never seen before, such as decapitations.

U.S. Ambassador to Mexico Tony Garza, who was critical of the previous administration of President Vicente Fox for not controlling the narco violence, congratulated Mr. Calderón.

"Today, both the Mexican and the American people can celebrate a monumental moment in our two nations' battle with the vicious drug-traffickers and criminals who threaten our very way of life," Mr. Garza said in a prepared statement Saturday. "Some of the most brutal criminals in the history of our two countries have been extradited from Mexico to the United States to face justice for the crimes they have committed."

But the bold move by Mr. Calderón, made possible by a 2005 Mexican Supreme Court decision that opened the door to more extraditions, could lead to more violence, particularly along the border with Texas as cartel leaders move in to fill a powerful vacuum.

A merchant in Nuevo Laredo, speaking by phone on the condition of anonymity because of possible repercussions, expressed fear the move would escalate violence in the border city across from Laredo, Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0119489

"This will get nastier," the merchant said. "I don't see an end to this unless tomorrow the American drug consumers, in unison, said, 'Hey, let's all kick the habit,' and I have more faith in hell freezing over before that happens."

One of the those extradited, Hector "El Guero" Palma, is a top associate of Mexico's most wanted man, Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, the reputed leader of the Sinaloa cartel that has been fighting a bloody turf war across Mexico with the Gulf cartel.

Court paved way

In Mexico, the law prevented the extradition of anyone who would face life in prison or the death penalty since those punishments do not exist in Mexico. But the country's Supreme Court ruled in 2005 that Mexico does have a de facto life sentence when multiple charges are considered, giving the green light for extraditions except when the defendant would face the death penalty.

One veteran U.S. law enforcement official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said: "No one believed this extradition would ever happen, so the fact that this is now a done deal is simply unbelievable. This has to be among the best things that's ever happened between our two countries."

But the law enforcement official also warned that repercussions, particularly in the short term, are likely – as happened in Colombia. In the 1980s, the government of Colombia began a policy of extraditing cartel leaders to the United States. The move led to a massive backlash, as bombings and assassinations ravaged the nation.

"There will definitively be serious repercussions and threats against Calderón, and U.S. officials," the U.S. official added. "But in the long term, it's the best thing that has ever happened. Mexico will gain a lot of respect worldwide and be seen as a country where rule of law is practiced."

The law enforcement official added that the move will likely force cartel leaders to reassess their violent action and come up with a new approach, like dividing up the country's drug routes evenly among leaders.

"The violence has to stop," the official said. "There's too much pressure from both governments for them to continue their violent ways. They have to start behaving like serious businessmen because one thing is clear: the drug demand will not end with these extraditions."

Mr. Chabat, the Mexican analyst, said that Mexican drug lords have generally avoided targeting politicians, the public or American tourists and are unlikely to start now.

"In Colombia, when they started extraditing drug kingpins, the narcos responded with violence, but in Mexico we don't have a history of the drug traffickers directly taking on the government like in Colombia, although I don't rule it out completely," said Mr. Chabat.

In terms of targeting the millions of American tourists who visit Mexico each year, Mr. Chabat said that was also unlikely given the magnitude of the United States' ability to retaliate.

"If you ask the drug traffickers whether they want to fight against the U.S. government or the Mexican government, they would certainly say against the Mexican government," said Mr. Chabat, who thinks Mr. Calderón's actions could also improve U.S.-Mexican relations and can't hurt the immigration reform efforts in the U.S. Congress.

The extradition was done under a cloud of secrecy, officials said, a sign that there was fear word could get to cartel leaders. One U.S. official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said there were reports that the Gulf cartel was in the process of breaking Mr. Cardenas from jail.

"The government had no choice but to act fast, and they did, and for that they should be praised," the official said.

Mexico's Extraditions Make A Point (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's decision to extradite 10 leaders of its most powerful drug-trafficking organizations to the U.S. is a landmark event that will boost the fortunes of new President Felipe Calderon, though the long-term effect on the drug business remains uncertain, Mexican analysts and U.S. officials said Saturday.

The extraditions took place late Friday night, just seven weeks after Calderon took office, but after several years of legal and diplomatic wrangling by officials on both sides of the border.

DOJ_NMG_0119490

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales said in a statement Saturday. "Never before has the United States received from Mexico such a large number of major drug defendants and other criminals for prosecution in this country."

In all, Mexican authorities extradited 15 people. The most prominent was Osiel Cardenas, who was reputed to have been running the Gulf cartel from his cell at the maximum-security La Palma prison since his arrest in 2003.

A federal grand jury in Texas indicted Cardenas in 1999 on drug-trafficking and assault charges. The Bush administration singled him out for special treatment in 2001 under the Foreign Narcotics Kingpin Designation Act, which allows the government to freeze the assets of those who do business with drug lords and their families.

Three others extradited late Friday were on the White House kingpin list, including Hector Palma, said to be the top lieutenant of Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, leader of the Sinaloa cartel. Had he not escaped from a Mexican prison in 2001, Guzman too might have been extradited Friday.

Palma is a colorful figure who, it has been said, once paid $40 million in annual protection fees to the Guadalajara municipal police. When he was arrested in 1999 after his small plane crashed, he had in his possession a handgun encrusted with diamonds and emeralds.

The other two on the kingpin list extradited were Ismael Higuera Guerrero and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers and bosses in the Arellano Felix cartel, based in Tijuana.

Even inside their Mexican prisons, the kingpins were known for outrageous behavior. Cardenas treated 17,000 people to a Day of the Child party at a baseball stadium in the border city of Reynosa last year.

Columnist Ricardo Aleman wrote in the Mexico City newspaper El Universal that Cardenas was deliberately making the government of then-President Vicente Fox look ridiculous.

"In spite of being locked up in the most secure and strict of Mexico's prisons, the head of the cartel does what he wants," Aleman wrote last May. "It seems to confirm the fact that the most powerful cartels and criminal groups are beyond the control of the state."

Widespread corruption in the prison system made it nearly impossible for Mexican officials to control the drug bosses, said Jorge Chabat, an expert on the drug trade.

"Having them out of Mexico is one less headache for the Mexican government," Chabat said. The extraditions, coming on the heels of Calderon's decision to send federal troops to combat drug trafficking in Baja California and the southern states of Michoacan and Guerrero, add to the sense that the new president is trying to take charge of a seemingly intractable problem.

"We are determined not to tolerate any defiance to the authority of the state," Calderon said Friday.

The extraditions give Calderon increased credibility as he deals with the U.S. on contentious issues, including immigration reform and legislation approved last year in Washington to tighten the U.S.-Mexican border.

As well, the extraditions in effect end the kingpins' influence over the vast drug-trafficking organizations, although new leaders are almost certain to emerge. "It's like any big business," Chabat said. "If the CEO resigns, then a new CEO takes his place."

U.S. and Mexican officials say the drug-trafficking organizations are huge businesses in which no individual knows more than a handful of others — a cell-like structure that makes them especially difficult to break.

How the drug-trafficking organizations will react to the extraditions remains an open question. In Colombia in the 1980s, drug kingpins resisted extradition to the U.S. with a campaign of bombings and assassinations.

In recent years, analysts say, Mexico's drug-trafficking organizations have not sought an open confrontation with the federal government. Most of their firepower has been directed against one another, and against municipal and state officials. Last year, more than 2,000 people were killed as rival groups battled one another and the authorities.

Cardenas and the Gulf cartel, based in the northern Mexican state of Tamaulipas, have upped the ante in the war against their rivals from the western state of Sinaloa by recruiting highly trained soldiers from the Mexican army, known as the Zetas.

The rival Mexican syndicates are responsible for 80% of the cocaine that enters the United States, according to American officials.

DOJ_NMG_0119491

Gonzales Lauds Mexico's Extradition Of 15 To U.S. (SDUT)

By Matthew T. Hall, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 21, 2007

Mexico's extradition of 15 reputed drug lords and violent criminals, four of whom have ties to San Diego, drew praise from the U.S. attorney general yesterday and signaled its new determination to keep traffickers from running their cartels from inside prison walls.

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement yesterday.

Osiel Cárdenas, the alleged Gulf cartel leader who was believed to be running his gang from prison in Mexico, was sent north late Friday along with 14 others wanted by the United States after their appeals against extradition ran out, the office of Mexico's attorney general said.

Four of those extradited had been indicted years ago in San Diego. They include the reputed former leader of the Sinaloa drug cartel and three men connected to the Arellano Félix drug cartel. They will be transported to San Diego "relatively soon," perhaps within weeks, to answer the charges against them, Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said.

All of the suspects are being held in Houston and are expected to appear in court there early this week.

Gonzales applauded "the bold stance" of Mexican President Felipe Calderón and his government "in targeting the drug-related violence and corruption that affects both our nations."

The three men who worked for the Arellano Félix cartel are brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, indicted in 2003 on racketeering, drug-trafficking and money-laundering charges, and José Alberto Marquez Esqueda, indicted in 2002 on charges of importing and distributing marijuana and cocaine.

Ismael Higuera Guerrero was a chief lieutenant in the Arellano Félix cartel in charge of day-to-day operations, including the receipt and export of cocaine and marijuana, according to his indictment. He was arrested in Ensenada in 2000.

Gilberto Higuera Guerrero supervised drug trafficking from Mexicali and used kidnapping, torture and murder to enforce the cartel's work, according to the same indictment. Mexican authorities captured him in Mexicali in 2004 at a time when he was estranged from the cartel and appeared to be hiding from it.

José Alberto Marquez Esqueda worked as an enforcer, bodyguard and caretaker of the drug "stash houses" for the cartel, according to his indictment. He was arrested in Tijuana in 2003.

The fourth person who will appear in San Diego federal court is Hector Palma Salazar, indicted in 1995 on charges of conspiring to distribute large amounts of cocaine. He is said to be a past leader of the Sinaloa cartel. He was arrested in 1995 near Guadalajara, and a Mexican court denied an extradition request for him by the U.S. government three years ago.

The 10 other purported criminals are wanted in the United States on a variety of charges in Texas, New York and Washington, including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes.

Traditionally, Mexico has been reluctant to extradite major Mexican drug lords to the United States. Its officials also refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is barred in Mexico.

But that attitude changed under former President Vicente Fox, who in September promised to extradite "all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice."

Fox extradited a record 63 alleged criminals to the United States in 2006, including suspected drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Félix of the Tijuana-based Arellano Félix gang.

Calderón, who took office Dec. 1, promised to increase the flow of drug-trafficking suspects sent to the United States. He also vowed to fight the organized crime that has infiltrated all aspects of Mexican society.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Matthew Hall: (619) 542-4599; matthew.hall@uniontrib.com

Extraditing Reputed Drug Lords Earns Mexico Praise From U.S. (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119492

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's extradition of four reputed drug lords drew praise from the U.S. attorney general yesterday and signaled its new determination to keep traffickers from running their cartels from inside prison walls.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the extraditions on Friday were "unprecedented in their scope and importance."

Osiel Cardenas, the alleged Gulf cartel leader thought to be running his gang from prison in Mexico, was sent north late Friday along with 14 others wanted by the U.S. after their appeals against extradition ran out, the office of Mexico's attorney general said.

"Never before has the United States received from Mexico such a large number of major drug defendants and other criminals for prosecution in this country," Gonzales said in a statement yesterday.

The Mexican attorney general's office said the extraditions were also aimed in part at cracking down on turf battles between Mexican drug cartels, which have cost hundreds of lives in recent months in states such as Michoacan, Guerrero, Baja California and Sinaloa.

Recently, the government has sent thousands of soldiers and police to try to stem the drugfueled violence.

"This changes the rules, as far drug traffickers' impunity and the potential punishment they face," said Oscar Aguilar, a political-science professor at Mexico City's Iberoamerican University. "Before, the capos could say, 'Well, if they ever do catch me, I'll be in Mexico, my family and associates can visit me whenever they want, and I can keep running the business' " from prison.

Mexican officials have said that Cardenas and top members of the Tijuana cartel forged an alliance while locked up at a maximum-security prison just west of Mexico City, where they organized to fight turf wars against rival drug lords.

Authorities also said Cardenas sought to control that prison and other jails through gangs of inmates, and might have organized killings both inside and outside prison. Authorities say he ran his cartel by passing messages to attorneys for him and dozens of associates.

The United States once offered a $2 million reward for Cardenas before his 2003 arrest. In 1999, U.S. officials said Cardenas held two U.S. agents at gunpoint in their car in a Mexican border city, then let them go, saying: "You gringos, this is my territory. You can't control it, so get the hell out of here."

In the past, Mexico has been reluctant to extradite major Mexican drug lords to the United States, arguing that they should face justice here first. They also refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is illegal in Mexico.

But that attitude changed under former President Vicente Fox, who last September promised to extradite "all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice." Fox extradited a record 63 alleged criminals to the U.S. in 2006, including the suspected drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix.

In addition to Cardenas, Mexico on Friday extradited Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers and former chiefs in the Arellano-Felix cartel in Tijuana and Mexicali, and Hector Palma Salazar, a former leader in the Sinaloa cartel led by Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman.

Eleven others were extradited on a variety of U.S. charges, including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Announce Health Care Tax Incentives (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

President Bush yesterday said he wants to expand health care coverage by putting incentives into the tax code for individuals to buy their own, and that he will lay out a detailed plan in Tuesday's State of the Union speech.

In his weekly radio address Mr. Bush said his plan will treat health insurance like a mortgage.

"The current tax code encourages home ownership by allowing you to deduct the interest on your mortgage from your taxes," he said. "We can reform the tax code so that it provides a similar incentive for you to buy health insurance."

The changes will require congressional action and Mr. Bush, now facing a Democratic majority in Congress, ruled out raising taxes or "creating a new federal entitlement program" as possible options for expanding health care.

The White House has told Republicans on Capitol Hill that Tuesday's address will make the most news on health care and energy policy. Aides have said the speech will forgo the usual laundry list of new programs and instead focus on those two areas and three others: the war on terrorism, immigration and education.

"President Bush will outline issues where he believes we can find common ground with the new Congress," spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

In his radio address Mr. Bush called for aiding states that are trying innovative programs to broaden health coverage.

In doing so, he is returning to a strength of the Republican Party in the 1990s, when governors pioneered welfare reform plans and the federal government followed their lead.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican now exploring a run for president, created a program in his state that sought to cover those eligible under existing programs such as Medicaid, subsidize coverage for the poor who are ineligible, and punish those who can afford it but don't sign up through penalties such as higher taxes.

And earlier this month, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, announced his own plan to require all residents to have health insurance and to force most companies to provide insurance for employees or face a higher tax rate.

With Democrats now in control of Congress and promising to push plans to expand health care coverage, Mr. Bush is trying to get out in front of them and set the parameters for the debate.

"Health insurance should be available, it should be affordable, and it should put you and your doctor in charge of your medical decisions," Mr. Bush said, calling on Congress to pass the package he will propose Tuesday.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, is not embracing the idea.

"This is a dangerous policy that ultimately shifts cost and risk from employers to employees and could result in a higher number of uninsured," Mr. Rangel said.

Census Bureau data show that 46.6 million individuals, or 15.9 percent of the population, were without health insurance in 2005. That was 1.3 million more than in 2004.

The figures show that Medicare and Medicaid, the main government insurance programs, cover an increasing percentage of the population, while employer-sponsored health plans and plans bought by individuals both declined from 2004 to 2005.

Bush Seeks Shift In Health Coverage (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

President Bush will propose a deep tax break for Americans who purchase their own medical insurance and would finance it with an unprecedented tax on a portion of high-priced health-care plans that workers receive from their employers, according to the White House.

The initiative, which the president briefly previewed in his radio address yesterday, has a dual purpose: It would create a financial incentive for the estimated 46 million to 48 million Americans who lack health insurance to buy it. And it would rein in the soaring cost of health insurance by encouraging workers in high-priced plans to seek more modest coverage.

"Today, the tax code unfairly penalizes people who do not get health insurance through their job," Bush said. "It unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans. The result is that insurance premiums rise and many Americans cannot afford the coverage they need."

The proposal, which Bush plans to fully unveil in Tuesday's State of the Union address, marks a sharp departure for a president who has been criticized for advocating tax cuts that disproportionately benefit higher-income Americans.

Administration officials familiar with the plan say it reflects the new political order in Washington, where Democrats now control both chambers of Congress. They refuse to characterize the plan as a tax increase because it raises no new money for the federal government. Instead, it would add a new tax on employer-provided health-care plans worth more than $15,000 to subsidize those who buy modestly priced plans out of their pockets.

DOJ_NMG_0119494

In addition, they say, the plan is consistent with the president's idea of increasing access to health insurance through the private market while encouraging people to be more cost-conscious as they purchase medical-care coverage.

In his speech Tuesday night, the president will also propose increasing the federal assistance to states that make private health-care plans available to low-income or chronically unhealthy people who are uninsured. The administration hopes to provide waivers under Medicaid -- the government health insurance program for the poor that is jointly funded by the federal government and the states -- to allow states to redirect money from hospitals and nursing homes to individuals to help them buy health insurance.

Some states are already moving to offer health-care coverage to the uninsured. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) recently announced a plan to provide coverage to about 6.5 million people, including many recent immigrants, who are uninsured. If the plan is approved by the state legislature, California would become the fourth state -- along with Massachusetts, Vermont and Maine -- to offer near-universal health insurance.

Taken together, Bush's proposals are his most ambitious attempt to address the health-care crisis. In the past, Bush had pushed for limited tax breaks to help people buy health insurance, but those initiatives never gained traction. He has also advocated health savings accounts, consumer-driven plans with higher deductibles and lower premiums than those in traditional insurance.

The new tax measure would attempt to roughly equalize the benefits of people who have health insurance, whether they buy it or receive it from employers.

The estimated 150 million people covered by employer-provided health insurance are not taxed on the value of their health insurance, regardless of how much it is worth. The average employer-provided family health insurance plan costs $11,500 a year, administration officials said -- three times what it cost 19 years ago.

Under the president's proposal, workers who receive employer-provided health insurance would have to pay a tax on the cost of their benefit above $15,000, the threshold proposed by Bush for the tax break. For instance, if a person's health insurance costs $16,000, he would pay a tax on the $1,000 difference.

People with families who buy low-cost policies, meanwhile, would have their taxable income reduced by $15,000, regardless of the cost of the plans and whether they itemize deductions on their tax returns. The deduction would be $7,500 for single individuals. The deduction, to be indexed to account for inflation, would also be extended to those with employer-provided plans, to be offset by the cost of their coverage.

"This is a huge incentive for the uninsured to get coverage, but, also, the vast majority of people with employer-provided coverage will benefit as well," a senior administration official said. "This is essentially a standard deduction for health care, and the size of the deduction will be significantly higher than the cost of an average policy."

The Bush administration estimates that 80 percent of people with employer-provided plans would see their tax liability fall because the deduction would be larger than the value of their insurance plans.

The idea of ending the taxpayer subsidy for what some in the health industry call "Cadillac health insurance" policies and using the savings to subsidize insurance for those who do not have it has been around for at least two decades, experts said. Underlying the idea is the belief that the current tax structure essentially adds to the inflationary pressure on health care by subsidizing expensive health-care plans, making coverage even more unaffordable for those who do not have it.

But now may be an interesting moment to resurrect the idea because the new Democratic Congress has vowed not to initiate any new programs that cannot pay for themselves. Additionally, the idea of imposing a tax on those with generous coverage to help those without it has a progressive cast that could appeal to Democrats. "It is being proposed by a Republican, but it's kind of a Democrat idea," said Robert Laszewski, a health policy consultant. "It should be something that will interest a lot of Democrats."

Still, some leading Democrats are skeptical of the plan. "It is good that the president is finally talking about health care," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Senate committee that oversees health-care matters. "I question, however, why the president thinks the way to solve this problem is through the tax code."

Bush To Propose Health Insurance Changes (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0119495

AP, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush will propose in his State of the Union address a tax break for people who buy their own health insurance and a limit on how much coverage individuals can receive tax free at work.

The proposal to be announced Tuesday offers a tax deduction to people who purchase coverage and urges those with generous plans to either embrace cheaper insurance or pay taxes on part of it, according to a Bush administration official familiar with the proposals.

If passed by Congress, the plan would be the first time that workers could get a tax break for buying their own insurance. At the same time, it would be the first time that some employer-provided health care benefits could be taxed.

Bush also will announce steps next week to take some federal money now going to hospitals and institutions and give it to states for programs to reduce the number of uninsured people.

The cost of health care is growing more than two times faster than wages, making it harder for families to buy insurance and for employers to sponsor a health benefit for workers, Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address.

"Our challenge is clear: We must address these rising costs, so that more Americans can afford basic health insurance," Bush said. "And we need to do it without creating a new federal entitlement program or raising taxes."

Further details of the two proposals were to be announced in the State of the Union address.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity so as not to pre-empt the president's speech, would not disclose the amount of the proposed deduction or the top amount of coverage from employer-sponsored plans that would remain free of income and payroll taxes.

"The tax code unfairly penalizes people who do not get health insurance through their job," Bush said. "It unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans. The result is that insurance premiums rise, and many Americans cannot afford the coverage they need."

He said health insurance needs to be treated more like homeownership.

"The current tax code encourages homeownership by allowing you to deduct the interest on your mortgage from your taxes," Bush said. "We can reform the tax code, so that it provides a similar incentive for you to buy health insurance."

There are an estimated 46 million to 48 million people in the United States who are uninsured at some point during the year.

"Most of the uninsured are people who are working and they've got a little bit too high of income to qualify for Medicaid or other government programs. If they buy health insurance they have to pay for it entirely out of their own pocket," Dr. Mark McClellan, former administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services and former commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, said in a telephone interview. "This would be a significant amount of new help for them."

William Galston, a domestic policy adviser to President Clinton and a fellow at the Brookings Institution, said making health insurance more affordable for people on the individual market is a good idea. But he said he is worried that the proposal, taken by itself, could make it harder to argue for a more comprehensive measure for widening health care insurance to cover many more people.

"If it goes through as is, it's going to make the task of bargaining for a broader bill more difficult," Galston said, although he said he had not yet seen details of the proposals.

Under a second proposal, the president is proposing to redirect federal dollars that hospitals and other institutions get to help cover costs for caring for the uninsured. With this money, states would set up programs to assist people in getting health coverage and help people with high-cost health conditions.

Several states are working to reduce the number of people living without health insurance.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, for instance, has announced a plan that would cost $12 billion a year to extend health care coverage to most of the state's 6.5 million uninsured. That would make it the second state, after Massachusetts, to require everyone to carry insurance.

"When somebody is uninsured and they come into the emergency room there are federal programs that provide some help with covering those costs," McClellan said.

DOJ_NMG_0119496

"The idea would be to redirect that money to provide better subsidies and assistance for people to get affordable health insurance. If you've got more people with insurance, you don't need to have as much in the way of payments to the institutions," he said.

Hospital administrators are worried about what the president's plan will mean for their facilities. They fear they will be getting less money when they treat Medicare patients. They say the federal reimbursements already do not cover costs and that the president's plan will remove tens of millions of dollars for them.

Bush, who has begun rehearsing drafts of the speech, left Saturday for Camp David with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten. Before departing, he met with Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates to hear details of their recent foreign trips.

Rice was in the Middle East, and Gates returned to Washington on Saturday after a whirlwind tour that began last weekend in London and ended Friday in southern Iraq. In between he visited NATO headquarters in Brussels, met with troops and officials in Afghanistan and made stops in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Qatar.

To Expand Health Coverage, Bush Pitches Tax Code Change (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Saturday entered the growing debate about providing healthcare coverage for uninsured Americans, calling for a major change in the tax system to help those whose employers don't offer a plan.

Bush's proposal is a combination of carrots and sticks — and, if enacted, would create new winners and losers in the health insurance arena. It is likely to run into opposition in the Democratic-led Congress but could serve as a key element of a broader package dealing with rising healthcare costs and shrinking coverage.

The carrot in Bush's plan is the creation of a health insurance tax deduction that all taxpayers would receive — $7,500 a year for individuals and $15,000 for families.

But the proposal also comes with a stick: Those with insurance plans with an annual premium more than the deduction would have to pay income taxes on the difference. That would be a big change from current law, under which all employerprovided health insurance is tax-free for workers.

Bush wants to use tax revenue from people with benefit-rich plans — the healthcare haves — to pay for the new health insurance deduction. That would enable many of the estimated 47 million uninsured Americans — the healthcare have-nots — to buy coverage.

"One of the most promising ways to make private health insurance more affordable is by reforming the federal tax code," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

"Today, the tax code unfairly penalizes people who do not get health insurance through their job," he said. "It unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans. The result is that insurance premiums rise, and many Americans cannot afford the coverage they need."

Bush's plan may seem like a startling move from a president who has repeatedly vowed not to raise taxes. People with generous healthcare coverage would face the higher taxes, although they could avoid the hit by switching to a standard policy. Family coverage costs an average of $11,500 to $13,000 a year, according to industry surveys.

Defending the plan, a White House official said it would be a wash for federal coffers. Over 10 years, all the additional revenue would go toward the tax deduction to help people buy coverage.

Saturday's radio address signaled that healthcare will be a theme of the president's State of the Union message on Tuesday, in which he will also propose an initiative to help governors expand coverage.

Consumer groups, medical organizations, insurers, employers and state leaders have recently reopened the long-dormant debate over healthcare. In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is pursuing an ambitious plan to cover as many as 6 million uninsured residents.

Though Bush focused Saturday on a plan to expand coverage, he stopped short of committing to the goal of coverage for all.

DOJ_NMG_0119497

Congressional aides have privately expressed concern that the president's budget will call for tens of billions of dollars in cuts in healthcare programs such as Medicare and Medicaid as part of his pledge to balance the federal budget in five years.

On Capitol Hill, prominent Democrats issued statements saying they were glad Bush was talking about healthcare but were skeptical about his plan.

"To the extent that the president is now recognizing that all Americans need health coverage, that's positive," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles). "But it clearly cannot come at the cost of undermining comprehensive health coverage for those who do have insurance."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said he questioned "why the president thinks the way to solve this problem is through the tax code."

Many economists, however, say that Bush's plan deserves serious consideration.

"Given that we agree that we need some combination of individual and social responsibility, this is one key step in a total package that could bring coverage to all Americans," said Len Nichols of the nonpartisan New America Foundation think tank.

But Nichols would use the additional revenue to expand group coverage instead of individually purchased policies.

The current tax breaks for health insurance are worth about $147 billion a year, surpassing the mortgage interest deduction. Not only is employerprovided health insurance tax-free for employees, but companies can also deduct the cost as a business expense.

There are two main reasons many economists and healthcare experts believe this system is flawed.

One is that it gives no help to people without employerprovided coverage. In effect, that makes health insurance coverage even more prohibitive for small employers and the selfemployed.

"It's an unlevel playing field in terms of providing support," said Mark McClellan, who formerly headed Medicare and Medicaid and is a health economist and physician. "In the 21st century, we have more people working in self-employment, so there are more and more people who don't benefit from the tax exclusion."

The other reason is that many economists believe an unlimited tax deduction for employer-provided coverage encourages wasteful healthcare spending.

Many of those who would have to pay more under Bush's plan are union workers who have negotiated generous health insurance packages. The plan is likely to be opposed not only by organized labor, but also by big employers, which fear that unions would push for bigger wage hikes if health benefits were curtailed.

Some influential administration allies, such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, have already raised questions.

"Our concern … is that it would undermine the current system and become a disincentive for employers providing good, rich benefits for their employees," said Katie Mahoney, a healthcare policy expert for the business group.

Bush To Urge New Tax Plan For Health Care Coverage (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20 — President Bush intends to use his State of the Union address Tuesday to tackle the rising cost of health care with a one-two punch: tax breaks to help low-income people buy health insurance and tax increases for some workers whose health plans cost significantly more than the national average.

White House officials say Mr. Bush has decided to forgo the traditional formula for the State of the Union — a laundry list of ideas, many of them dead on arrival — in favor of a more thematic speech that will concentrate on a few issues, like health care, immigration and energy, on which he hopes to make gains with the new Democrat-controlled Congress.

The basic concept is that employer-provided health insurance, now treated as a fringe benefit exempt from taxation, would no longer be entirely tax-free. Workers could be taxed if their coverage exceeded limits set by the government. But the government would also offer a new tax deduction for people buying health insurance on their own.

“I will propose a tax reform designed to help make basic private insurance more affordable,” Mr. Bush said in his weekly radio address on Saturday, “whether you get it through your job or on your own.” He did not offer specifics, but an administration official provided details of the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0119498

The proposed plan is a startling move for a president who has repeatedly vowed not to raise taxes. And it is certain to run into opposition from business groups, labor unions and, most of all, the Democrats who now run Capitol Hill.

"It's a bad policy," Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who is chairman of the House committee that writes tax legislation, said in an interview Friday night. "We are trying to bring tax relief to the middle class. The president is trying to increase their tax liability. This proposal is inconsistent with what the majority is seeking in the House and the Senate."

White House officials say the health tax plan would neither increase spending nor reduce tax revenues. Supporters say it would expand coverage to some of the 47 million uninsured. But critics say it would, in effect, tax people with insurance to provide coverage to those without it.

That would amount to a tectonic shift in the way people get and pay for their health coverage, and historically it has been all but impossible to win Congressional approval for such changes. When President Ronald Reagan made a proposal similar to Mr. Bush's in 1986, it died in Congress, with Mr. Rangel helping to lead the opposition.

As he heads into the address, his first delivered to a Congress controlled entirely by Democrats, Mr. Bush faces intense skepticism from lawmakers over his new strategy in Iraq. But while he will not be able to avoid the subject of Iraq in the speech, White House officials hope to use the address to shift the national conversation away from the war and toward the possibility of bipartisan cooperation in Washington.

"What they want to accomplish is to have the average American believe that Bush really does want to work across party lines and he's going to do it," said one Republican strategist close to the White House.

In his radio address on Saturday, Mr. Bush described his proposal as a way to "treat health insurance more like home ownership," giving people tax deductions for their health insurance in much the same way as they get tax deductions for home mortgage interest. He said the current system "unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans," driving up the overall cost of coverage and care.

The federal government does without tens of billions of dollars each year in potential tax revenue by making health coverage tax-free. The idea of limiting such tax-free coverage has circulated in various forms for more than two decades and is "quite controversial," said Dr. Mark B. McClellan, a former White House economist and Medicare administrator, who has consulted with Bush officials on the plan.

"The conventional wisdom is that there would be too much political opposition to propose" such limits, Dr. McClellan said.

In preparation for the president's speech, the White House has been shopping the idea around Capitol Hill, trying to sound out lawmakers like Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, the senior Republican on the Senate Finance Committee, and Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon.

The administration official said Mr. Wyden's plan contained tax provisions similar to the one proposed by the president. But in an interview, Mr. Wyden was skeptical. He said any tax changes must be coupled with regulations that would encourage private insurance companies to offer affordable coverage to people with pre-existing health conditions.

"The market is broken," Mr. Wyden said. "Private insurance companies cherry-pick. They're trying to take just healthy people and send fragile people over to government programs more fragile than they are, and I'm not sure what this does to fix the broken market."

The Census Bureau estimates that 175 million Americans obtain private health insurance through employers, while 27 million people are covered by insurance bought outside the workplace. The rest, with the exception of the 47 million uninsured, are covered through government programs like Medicare and Medicaid and military health care.

Under Mr. Bush's proposal, people buying health insurance on their own would receive a tax break similar to the one that has historically been available to people who receive coverage through their jobs. The plan is tied to the average cost of family health coverage, which is currently $11,500 a year.

It would work like this: The administration would cap the amount of benefits that can remain tax free at $15,000 for a family and $7,500 for an individual. Anyone whose health insurance cost more than that would pay taxes on the difference. For example, a family with coverage costing $16,000 a year would pay taxes on $1,000.

DOJ_NMG_0119499

The cap would also be used to establish the amount of the new deduction for people who lack coverage. In this example, a family buying insurance on its own could take a $15,000 deduction — even if the insurance cost less. The cap would rise with some measure of overall inflation, but would not necessarily keep pace with the costs of medical care and health insurance.

A White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity so as not to upstage the president, said, "The vast majority of people with employer-provided coverage will benefit as well."

One of the nation's leading experts on tax policy, C. Eugene Steuerle, a Treasury official in the Reagan administration who is now a senior fellow at the Urban Institute, said the proposal "would probably help increase the number of people with health insurance at no cost to the budget."

The administration official said the White House envisioned health insurance companies offering new plans to meet a growing market. But employers expressed doubts.

"This is a classic case of robbing Peter to help Paul pay for coverage," said E. Neil Trautwein, a vice president of the National Retail Federation, which represents retailers of all sizes. "I do not think the president will find many backers in the employer community for this proposal."

In trying to address the problems of the uninsured, Mr. Trautwein said, "we should not start by endangering coverage for people who already have it."

Senate Newcomer Is Designated To Encounter President Bush Yet Again (NYT)

By Francis X. Clines

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Senator Jim Webb, a spirited Democratic freshman from Virginia, looked uneasy as he hand wrote his very first letter of condolence to a grieving constituent who had just lost her soldier son in the Iraq war. The senator, a lantern-jawed Marine veteran with his own son at war, brightened noticeably as he discussed the surprising invitation from his party's leaders to deliver the main response for the Democrats to President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday.

Normally, no one pays much attention to the opposition's rebuttal to a State of the Union address. But the capital's mood as the war spirals downward is palpably, if not desperately, expectant of some change, somehow. And in Washington, fresh rhetoric must be invested to feed any chance of change.

With their narrow victory, the Democrats newly in control of Congress are being turned to as if they are the loyal opposition in the British system, expected to be ready with a shadow cabinet wielding dossiers of perfectly worded alternatives.

It won't work quite that way on Tuesday night when Senator Webb speaks for a perennially discordant party full of upholders of yes-buts and whereases and why-nots. But Mr. Webb, whose upset victory was fueled by stinging, uninhibited criticism of the Bush administration's bungling of its war, clearly has something closer to a glinting riposte in mind than some boilerplate response for the record.

"My sense is people really want to see something different here," said the senator, dismissing the administration's dispatch of another 20,000 troops as not even a doomed strategy, but a "flailing around" for public relations cover. "Sooner or later we are going to withdraw from Iraq," Mr. Webb explained. "The circumstances under which we withdraw are the debate."

Tuesday will not be the first time the president and Mr. Webb have had a close encounter. After the election, the senator-elect declined to stand in a reception line and be photographed with Mr. Bush. News reports told of how the president later sought him out, asking, "How's your boy?"

"I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President," Mr. Webb responded, broadening the question.

"That's not what I asked you," Mr. Bush replied, sounding snappish. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," said Mr. Webb, showing some of the instincts he honed as a former member of a Republican president's administration and a former boxer.

In choosing Mr. Webb, the party seems to be inviting some of his patented iconoclasm to tinge its image, particularly since he is not among the Democrats who first backed the war. Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who was against the war from the first, journeyed from the House to privately tell her Senate colleagues that the party has nothing less than a moral imperative to move the Iraq issue in a new direction.

DOJ_NMG_0119500

And so expectations are being raised. Party leaders made sure that Representative Tim Walz of Minnesota, a combat veteran of Afghanistan who speaks knowingly of the troops and their families, had the radio rebuttal last weekend when President Bush accused the Democrats of "proposing nothing," for all their objections to the latest version of his war plan.

A former secretary of the Navy for Ronald Reagan, Mr. Webb says he ran as a Democrat because his own politics are rooted in national security interests, and he found that issue despoiled by the Bush administration. "Hurricane Katrina was the thing that pushed me over into running," he said. "Katrina and the war were parallel situations in terms of failed leadership."

For the senator, the way out of Iraq is "from the outside in" — the full-scale regional diplomacy eschewed by the administration — rather than from inside Washington's misplaced sense of being the center of all solutions.

He is not alone. Republicans have been talking to Democrats about the wording of nonbinding resolutions of disapproval of the president's troop increase. Senator Olympia Snowe of Maine joined Senator Chuck Hagel, a fellow Republican from Nebraska, in the protest. Others were privately dickering.

Maybe nobody will be listening on Tuesday. But as a freshman, Senator Webb likes the early feel of things. He has already presided at the head of the chamber, aided by stage cues from a parliamentarian.

"I closed the Senate down on Friday, and I was teasing the Republican staffers that since there was nobody on the floor, I was going to ask for unanimous consent to withdraw from Iraq." The recollection prompted a booming laugh from the new senator that rolled forth like a preamble to Tuesday night.

"Told them we're going to be out of Iraq by the time I'm done."

Energy Independence (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

BOTH CONGRESS and the Bush administration seem certain to return to energy policy this year. The subject is likely to be featured in President Bush's State of the Union address; a variety of energy bills have been proposed in Congress; and this year's reauthorization of the farm program may repackage agricultural handouts as ethanol-promoting energy policy. But there is a danger in the way political leaders are framing this issue. "Energy independence" is more elusive and less rewarding than is commonly perceived. It should not be allowed to take precedence over attempts to curb global warming.

The United States imports 60 percent of the petroleum it consumes, about double the share two decades ago. Those imports come mostly from countries whose governments are unstable, unsavory or overtly hostile to the United States: 60 percent of the world's oil reserves are in the Middle East, 10 percent in Africa, 6 percent in Venezuela and 5 percent in Russia. It sounds reasonable to argue that if the United States relied less on these regions for its fuel, it would be better off.

But consider this thought experiment: If the United States replaced all oil imports with domestically produced fuel, how much more secure would it be? Well, a Venezuelan or Iranian oil embargo could still hurt U.S. motorists and oil-consuming industries. An embargo would create a global scarcity of oil, and fuel prices would jump -- including the price of fuel in the United States. Admittedly, Americans would be paying those high prices to producers in their own country rather than to producers abroad, but the importance of this distinction is debatable. Some producers in the United States are foreign-owned, and many production operations abroad are U.S.-owned.

Some military planners say that, even so, energy independence would boost national security. The nation must be able to count on access to sufficient fuel to power its military machine and key industries. But two-fifths of the oil consumed in the United States is domestically produced, and the nation maintains a strategic petroleum reserve. Besides, it would take a truly formidable enemy to prevent the United States from buying oil simultaneously from the Middle East, West Africa and Latin America. True energy security comes not so much from energy independence as from diverse sources of supply.

Another security argument for energy independence is that by importing oil from radical Islamic regimes the United States is financing both sides in the struggle against terrorism. But it doesn't matter to Islamic radicals who buys their oil; the United States has banned Iranian oil imports since 1979, but Iran's crude still fetches the world price in the international market. It's true that, in pursuing energy independence, the United States would either restrict its consumption or boost its output; this would slightly alter the global balance of supply and demand, perhaps reducing the oil price and diminishing Iran's revenue. But even this effect is not certain: Saudi Arabia might respond by pumping less so that prices remained stable.

DOJ_NMG_0119501

This is not to say that curing the American addiction to oil would bring no security benefits whatever. Over the long term it would probably exert a moderating influence on oil prices; this would reduce the influence of authoritarian petro-states such as Russia or Venezuela. But this distant and uncertain benefit should not be the prime driver of energy policy. Mr. Bush and Congress should focus their energy policy on mitigating climate change and accept security gains that may flow from that as a welcome byproduct.

Bush's Fourth Quarter (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

ON THE EVE of his seventh State of the Union address, President Bush's Texas swagger is muted. Not long ago, Bush famously called himself "the decider," but the drubbing he took in November's elections has reduced him to being "educator in chief," as he referred to himself on "60 Minutes" a week ago.

He wasn't referring to education, of course; he's realized that he's lost the support of most of the country (and Congress) on the war in Iraq and that he needs to "educate" them back into the fold. The problem for the administration, as it enters the fourth quarter, is that persuasion has never been its strength.

Quite the contrary — it's been anathema to its political approach. In the aftermath of the Clinton years, the Bush administration proudly stood against nuance and muddled compromise. The 9/11 attacks reinforced the White House's penchant for viewing the world in binary terms, and Bush's "with us or against us" mantra fit the moment. On issue after issue, from tax cuts to Iraq to its tactics against suspected terrorists, this administration has portrayed opponents as beyond the pale, while its own positions are crucial to the defense of Western civilization. Until recently, Bush also seemed pathologically incapable of conceding any failings or of deviating from campaign-style happy talk, even about the clearly deteriorating situation in Iraq.

Such absolutism is hard to sustain in a messy democracy (or a messy world, for that matter). It makes altering course all the more shocking — not just to those who support the administration, who feel misled or, worse, used, but to those who advocated for change. So, for instance, it was jarring to see the administration suddenly drop its insistence that judges should have no oversight over the National Security Agency's Terrorist Surveillance Program. It was the right thing to do, but it was hard to reconcile with the White House's previous hyperbolic narrative.

There have been other whiplash-inducing U-turns for Bush, along with more than a few policy dead-ends. Remember those ill-advised steel import tariffs? And whatever happened to all that talk of going to Mars and overhauling Social Security? After 9/11, the president initially opposed federalizing airport security and creating a Department of Homeland Security. He changed course on the military's interrogation methods and on whether Guantanamo detainees were covered by the Geneva Convention. In another departure, the administration engaged North Korea in bilateral talks last week, and there is talk of starting to take global warming seriously.

This isn't to say that Bush is exceptionally inconsistent. It's that he's exceptionally obstinate, and so changes in policy prove more damaging to his credibility than they might be otherwise.

On Iraq, of course, the president is still (though he would not put it this way) staying the course, insofar as he believes (rightly, in our view) that it would be disastrous for the United States to walk blithely away from the mess it created. That Bush himself only recently seems to have noticed the mess in Iraq — or acknowledged it — is one of those credibility-sapping traits that doesn't inspire much confidence in his ability to succeed.

To be fair, this is never an easy time for a second-term president. Bush is in the uncomfortable position of having to rely on the likes of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr to define his legacy. But then, at least he's not spending his days forced to deny having sex with "that woman," dealing with allegations that he illegally funneled arms to a Central American insurgency or fending off efforts to get at his incriminating tapes.

Bush will be with us for another two years, and this Tuesday, with the State of the Union address, he will attempt to begin engineering a fourth-quarter comeback. Iraq will remain at the forefront, of course, but Bush desperately needs to find ways to remain relevant on the domestic front as well. Comprehensive immigration reform would be one way to do that, and perhaps

DOJ_NMG_0119502

Bush will embrace environmentalism in the same way that Ronald Reagan improbably embraced arms control in his last years in office.

Regardless of the issue, the most worrisome aspect of the Bush administration at this point is the president's lack of stature. It sounds corny, but the president of the United States remains the leader of the free world, and it's essential for him to command respect and authority on the global stage. The unsettling question about Bush in his fourth quarter is whether anyone will take him seriously the next time he identifies a crisis — especially if, and when, it's a real crisis.

Pragmatic, Up To A Point (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

THE town almost missed the news late Wednesday afternoon when the White House announced President Bush was ending his warrantless wiretap program. It was initially hard to believe that a president who has held his ground on so many fronts, against so many prevailing forces, had reversed himself on a signature assertion of executive power.

There had to be a hitch.

But perhaps the move — which really did happen — should not have come as such a surprise.

It was the latest evidence of an emerging pragmatism inside the West Wing. In the last few months, the new White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, has switched out longtime Bush loyalists with a handful of so-called policy realists — and their appointments have cast a famously ideological White House inner circle in a more pragmatic light. And they have expressed a willingness to deal with a new Democratic Congress.

But Washington being Washington, there is skepticism. Just how pragmatic will they be on issues they hold dear?

Kenneth Duberstein, the former chief of staff to President Ronald Reagan who has welcomed the changes, said it was clear that Mr. Bolten had retooled the administration for a new era of "compromise and confrontation." But, he added, "They may have changed their faces, but not what's in their hearts."

This goes to a fundamental debate over whether — or how far — the president will do a turnabout on issues which he had refused to budge on when dealing with a Republican Congress.

Evidence is ample that Mr. Bush will choose his battles more carefully in his final two years. After all, the war is taking up so much political oxygen and Congress is under Democratic management. And as Texas governor, Mr. Bush worked well with Democrats.

"He understands how to work with a majority and he understands how to work as part of a minority and he'll adjust accordingly," said Mark McKinnon, a political strategist for Mr. Bush's presidential campaigns. "This is a president who still wants to get a lot done."

Yet this new approach is not a wholesale about-face. In fact, the administration's decisions in the last few weeks could be seen as a move to compromise now to avoid more serious setbacks to his agenda later. In other words, it is pragmatism at gunpoint.

Take, for instance, the administration's agreement last week to submit the wiretap program to judicial review. Opponents of the program said the administration had finally folded, trying to avoid pending legal decisions that could find that presidents do not have the wartime executive authority to issue wiretaps without warrants. In the process, the administration may also have deflated Congressional plans to move against the program. In effect, critics say, the White House was trying to duck for now a debate on a crucial balance of power question.

"They've changed the surveillance program under the pressure," said Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, a leading Republican opponent of the policy.

Mr. Specter said he did not think the administration would yield on its long-term goal, pushed most by Vice President Dick Cheney, to reclaim the executive authority that was lost after Watergate.

"I would expect the vice president to continue to insist on executive power," he said.

Mr. Specter is among the administration's many moderate allies who hopes that one of Mr. Bolten's new appointees, the incoming White House counsel Fred F. Fielding, will prevent what the administration's critics would call overreaching. Fairly or not, the woman he is succeeding, Harriet Miers, was seen as too often going along with — or being unable to rein in — some of the administration's more assertive impulses. Mr. Fielding, who has the stature of having worked for Presidents Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan, is perceived to be better able to counterbalance those impulses.

DOJ_NMG_0119503

Mr. Specter said, "I think Fred is going to be much more" — here comes that word again — "realistic in his dealings."

The same has been said about Robert M. Gates, the successor to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who hails from the realist school of foreign policy.

Even Democrats praised his appointment. But they were decidedly less enthusiastic about the Iraq policy he ultimately endorsed — including an increase in troops — which many took as a rebuttal to the bipartisan approach recommended by the Iraq Study Group.

"What the president did on Iraq just sends a real signal that he's going to continue to basically do what he wants to do," said Leon Panetta, a former chief of staff to Bill Clinton and a member of the Iraq Study Group. A true test of how pragmatic Mr. Bush will be will come on Tuesday night when Mr. Bush presents his State of the Union address.

HIS team is clearly hoping to do in 2007 what Bill Clinton did in his penultimate address, in 1999: produce a rousing speech with a hefty set of goals that catch his opponents off guard and help put his second term on firmer footing.

Mr. Bush's strategists have already foreshadowed a more aggressive approach to end what the president last year called the nation's "addiction to oil." The president is expected to reaffirm his understanding of the human causes of global warming, and discuss ways to reduce emissions.

Yet some energy industry officials have said his proposals will be partly pre-emptive — adopting an environmental policy that hews to his anti-regulatory and free-market principles before someone with more liberal ideas on regulation can take over in 2009.

And, just as President Clinton in 1999 proposed a long-term fix for Social Security and challenged his Republican partners in Congress to join him, Mr. Bush is likely to do the same this year. Mr. Clinton had opened the door to investment of some Social Security funds in the stock market, a break from traditional liberal orthodoxy.

Some conservatives fear that Henry M. Paulson, Mr. Bush's new treasury secretary, will similarly try to seek common ground with Democrats, in this case by not categorically ruling out some sort of tax increase to help shore up the system. But Republicans close to the administration say Mr. Bush's longtime political adviser, Karl Rove, is focused on holding together the president's conservative coalition, and would be dead set against any such thing.

Yet all of this talk about deal making and pragmatism is enough to give Mr. Bush's longtime supporters a serious stomach ache. Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, who consults regularly with White House officials, suggested that Mr. Bush should avoid deal making, hold firm on his principles and help Republicans win back power in 2008 to finish out his vision thereafter.

"What you're sacrificing short term is approbation," Mr. Norquist said. "But you'll be able to say 'It didn't happen when I was in office, but it happened because I was in office.' "

Fragile Hopes For Bipartisan Rescue Of Social Security (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20 — President Bush is renewing his call for a bipartisan effort on Social Security, but few other issues so clearly highlight the limits of bipartisanship these days, the mistrust and ideological division just barely below the surface.

Many Democrats and Republicans agree that this period of divided government should, theoretically, be an opportune moment to find a solution to the long-term fiscal problems in Social Security, the 72-year-old government pension system. It is almost universally acknowledged that any fix — which would be likely to involve a politically risky mix of benefit reductions, tax hikes or other painful changes — would require broad and deep bipartisan support.

DOJ_NMG_0119504

"The American people have to sense on these types of issues that it's absolutely bipartisan and that the agreement was reached in an absolutely fair way," said Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, the senior Republican on the Budget Committee. "And that's one of the strengths of divided government."

But even the earliest efforts at a rapprochement have been vexed, in large part because of the memories of the Social Security battle of 2005, when Mr. Bush campaigned hard to create private investment accounts in the program but failed.

Efforts have been made: Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has talked to crucial lawmakers, including Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, "encouraging everyone to bring all their ideas to the table, and hoping that some kind of consensus can emerge," as Michele Davis, the assistant Treasury secretary, puts it.

Mr. Rangel said he had also been talking about the possibility of action on Social Security with the ranking Republican on his committee, Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana. And in the Senate, Mr. Gregg and Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the chairman of the Budget Committee, have proposed a bipartisan working group to explore broad entitlement and fiscal issues.

But the old fault lines have quickly re-emerged. Vice President Dick Cheney, in an interview with Fox News last week, said Mr. Paulson's openness to all ideas did not indicate that the administration was open to any increase in the payroll tax that supports Social Security. Raising the cap on income subject to payroll taxes — now at $97,500 — is one of the most commonly cited ways to shore up Social Security. "I think this president has been very, very clear on his position on taxes, and nothing's changed," Mr. Cheney said.

Mr. Conrad said that after those comments, his effort to move forward with his working group "is on life support." He added, "People have interpreted that to mean that the administration is not willing to alter their position one iota, and it's their way or the highway. Well, that's not going to work."

Democrats already mistrustful of negotiating with the administration were buttressed in their views, Mr. Conrad added. "They say, look, they're playing us for suckers."

Many Democrats say they still want the president to take private investment accounts explicitly off the table before serious negotiations can begin. Mr. Bush is expected to include those accounts in his budget again this year, although with their hypothetical creation pushed back a year.

Representative Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Caucus, said that in a climate of such uncertainty for many Americans' private pension programs, it was all the more important "not to take away the one solid cornerstone of their retirement." He added, "It's not good politics and it's not good economics."

Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the chairman of the Finance Committee, a critical venue for any Social Security plan, said he too believed the president must give up his private accounts before serious talks could occur. If so, he added, "I'm more than open, if the president is truly willing to look at all options."

It is, in short, a polarized debate, and likely to become all the more so as the parties head into the 2008 election. On left and right, advocacy groups are watching for any signs of a flinch. Grover Norquist, the antitax conservative, said he was vocally making a pre-emptive case against any payroll tax increase, although he had been assured by the president in December that he would hold the line.

Still, Mr. Norquist added, it is simply too dangerous to walk into negotiations with the Democrats without explicitly ruling out tax increases. "Mom didn't want you to have girls at the house after 10, not because she didn't trust you, but because she thought it was unwise," he said.

There is similar vigilance on the left. "There is no reason for us, as a campaign working on this issue, and there's no reason for the Democrats to compromise with this president on the most sacrosanct program to progressives after he lost the privatization debate and lost the election," said Brad Woodhouse of Americans United for Change, a liberal labor-backed organization.

Business Faces New Pressures On The Hill (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119505

For almost a year, business interests have had an inkling that their days of calling the shots in Washington were about to come to an end.

But last week, as the clocked ticked down on the symbolic first 100 hours of the 110th Congress, it was becoming pretty clear how hostile the political environment had become after 12 years of Republican rule.

It wasn't just that key business lobbyists were no longer invited to the weekly meeting to set the agenda, plan strategy and coordinate the talking points. Or that much of the promised legislation was hostile to their interests, such as House passage last week of an energy bill that wiped out tax breaks and raised royalty fees for the oil industry and cut subsidies to banks and others making college loans. Or that, in pushing through their first six bills, House Democrats were able to get an average of 62 votes from the once-united Republican caucus.

More troubling for business interests was the fact that nearly every day seemed to bring news of some fresh new offensive -- a hostile hearing or a special new committee or some calculated retreat by the Bush administration, leaving them surprised and exposed.

"I don't think most people have grasped what they are facing yet," said Kenneth Kies, the go-to tax lobbyist, after the Senate Finance Committee unveiled an unexpected proposal to limit the amount of income that top corporate executives could defer tax-free.

And imagine the surprise of auto industry executives when House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said she would appoint a special committee on energy independence and global warming as a way around John Dingell, Detroit's main man in Washington and chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who could always be counted on to keep the lid on fuel economy and auto emission standards.

Meanwhile, small-business lobbyists were not pleased to see the head of the very big-business Business Roundtable standing before reporters with the heads of AARP and the Service Employees International Union, saying nice things about health-reform efforts that require all businesses to offer some kind of health insurance or pay an offsetting tax.

Just how far left the political center of gravity has moved on these issues may be clearer after President Bush delivers his State of the Union message this week, in which he will try to reestablish his centrality in the policy debate by stealing a march on the Democrats on a number of domestic initiatives, not all of which may be to business's liking.

But the early going has revealed that a business community that has spent a decade playing offense had become a bit rusty when playing defense. A strategy of playing to stalemate rather than compromise in the closely divided Senate may founder as Republicans respond to the public clamor for bipartisan accomplishment. And while Bush seems ready to begin wielding his veto pen, he may want to husband his political capital for issues relating to the war and presidential power rather than protecting business interests.

The Equality Engineer (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Barney Frank, the 14-term Massachusetts congressman who chairs the House Financial Services Committee, says it might be useful to "make it a misdemeanor to use metaphors in the discussion of public policy," such as "a rising tide lifts all boats." Against what he considers that too-complacent view of economic growth (the metaphor was John Kennedy's), Frank says: A rising tide is wonderful "if you have a boat."

Frank questions whether market-driven wealth creation is producing more inequality "than is either socially healthy or economically necessary." He favors much more government intervention in the economy to diminish inequality. Sometimes he means equal dependence on government. For example, he wants everyone enrolled in Medicare -- with larger co-payments for higher-income people -- in order to take health care "out of the wage system."

Frank mildly says that Congress should "pay a little more attention" to the seven governors of the Federal Reserve system, all of whom are confirmed by Congress. The Fed, says Frank less mildly, should not be considered "above democracy": "We can debate whether Terri Schiavo's life should be recognized as over" and other fundamental questions of existence, "but God forbid anybody in elected office should talk about whether or not we need a 25-basis-point increase" in interest rates. "Somehow that's sacrosanct. No, it isn't. It's public policy."

DOJ_NMG_0119506

The late Sen. William Proxmire, a populist Democrat who represented Wisconsin for 32 years, said that all members of Congress should have written on their bathroom mirrors, so it is the first thing they read each day, this: "The Fed is a creature of Congress." Frank says Congress should not intervene in monetary policy . . . "unless." By monitoring whether the Fed's governors act as they said they would when they were being confirmed, Congress would be "setting the predicate for intervention if they act otherwise."

He wants the Fed to emphasize full employment as well as protect the currency as a store of value -- restraining inflation. But the Fed's stunning conquest of inflation since the early 1980s is almost a sufficient explanation of subsequent prosperity.

Three years ago, when unemployment was 5.8 percent, Frank outlined his doctrine of "capitalism plus" -- plus a lot of government -- in a House speech, warning that America was at "a major inflection point" where the economy's ability to create wealth is exceeding its ability to create jobs. Today, unemployment is 4.5 percent. How low can it go? He answers briskly: It fell to 3.8 percent during the Clinton administration. Could that become normal? And Frank says that when the New York Times wrote that the economy had exceeded its "normal rate of growth" for 11 years, he wrote to the Times wondering whether facts are redefining normality.

Frank may be the most liberal member of Congress. His thinking is what today's liberalism looks like when organized by a first-class mind. He thinks he discerns cultural contradictions of conservatism: Some conservative policies -- free trade and tax and other policies that (he thinks) widen income inequalities -- undermine support for other conservative policies. When capitalism's "creative destruction," intensified by globalization, churns the labor market and deepens the insecurities of millions of families, conservatives should not be surprised by the collapse of public support for free trade and an immigration policy adequate to the economy's needs.

Frank's solution, "fair trade," is to use the threat of denying access to the American market to force less developed countries to adopt "minimal standards of civility," meaning more expansive -- more American -- labor rights and environmental protections. This is an economic version of George W. Bush's foreign policy. Bush's Wilsonian goal is "ending tyranny in our world." Frank's trade policy is "Wilsonianism without weapons." Or perhaps it is Johnsonian (Lyndon Johnson): Trade policy should impose semi-Great Society rules on less developed trading partners, thereby helping the poor in those countries -- and reducing those countries' competitive advantages.

Frank's committee has, he says, "a larger jurisdiction to talk than to legislate." Pay attention to the talk: In it liberalism's interest in diminishing inequality (using government power to regulate the economy's distribution effects) duels with conservatism's emphasis on freedom (incentives by which market forces rationally allocate wealth and opportunity).

Frank says he is fortunate to be "in a profession where a weakness of mine -- a short attention span -- is a strength." In a government with its fingers in far too many pies, legislators must flit from one subject to another. What distinguishes Frank, however, is the coherence -- which is not a synonym for persuasiveness -- of his argument for more government-engineered equality.

Democrats Seek To Avert Abortion Clashes (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Eager to avoid a resumption of the culture wars, the new Democratic leaders are trying to tiptoe around the abortion issue by promoting legislation to encourage birth control and assist women who decide to proceed with unwanted pregnancies.

Democrats acknowledge that they alienated many social conservatives and churchgoing voters during years of combat with Republicans over the explosive issue of reproductive rights, and they want to change their emphasis to woo some of those voters back into the fold.

On the opening day of the 110th Congress on Jan. 4, for instance, Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), an abortion foe, introduced a bill to increase funding for family planning and to improve access to emergency contraception. The measure has been endorsed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), a champion of abortion rights, and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), a leading Democratic presidential prospect.

DOJ_NMG_0119507

These and other initiatives are a far cry from previous Democratic efforts that drew strong conservative opposition, including funding for abortions for women in the military serving overseas and U.N. family-planning programs in Third World countries.

"There are few more divisive issues in America today than abortion, but there is an opportunity to find common ground if we are willing to join together and seize it," Reid said recently. "The rate of unintended pregnancies is unacceptably high." Legislation such as his, he added, "can reduce the number of unintended pregnancies and the resulting abortions in America today."

During the past decade of Republican rule, Congress became a battleground for opposing forces in the abortion debate. Nearly 150 bills and amendments have been offered with the aim of restricting the procedure. Democrats and pro-abortion-rights Republicans blocked most of those measures, but in the process they alienated a vital group of voters -- religious moderates who support, in principle, the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide but who are morally squeamish about terminating pregnancies.

Now Democrats are seeking to reach these "abortion grays" through their own legislative proposals, all focused on preventing unwanted pregnancies. The initiatives, including several in development for more than a year, represent an attempt to broaden the discussion beyond the traditional framework of whether abortion should be legal. By recasting their approach, Democrats hope to appeal to "grays" in suburban areas and Midwestern towns who have voted Republican in recent elections.

"We believe deeply that we can do better than we're doing in our country when it comes to preventing unintended pregnancies and helping to support mothers and children," Clinton said in announcing her support for Reid's initiative.

In the House, Reps. Tim Ryan (Ohio), a Democrat who opposes abortion, and Rosa DeLauro (Conn.), a member of the Democratic leadership who supports abortion rights, are backing measures to make contraception easier to obtain, while providing aid to women who proceed with unintended pregnancies. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) helped smooth the path for the Ryan-DeLauro bill, and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the fourth-ranking House Democrat, is a cosponsor. "This is something that Democrats are really into," Emanuel said.

At least four similar bills are circulating. Antiabortion Democrats who are reluctant to promote contraception use are backing a more limited effort to help pregnant women and single mothers.

"You're going to see a change in the tone of the debate, and a move toward more solutions, rather than the divisiveness," said Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, a leading abortion rights group that signed on early to the prevention agenda. "What we're going to see in this Congress is some problem-solving."

The 2006 election results sent mixed signals about where voters stand on abortion. On one hand, pro-abortion-rights Democrats won in 22 House districts that had been represented by antiabortion Republicans. Three Senate seats also flipped from anti- to pro-abortion-rights candidates, and antiabortion ballot initiatives failed in three states, including South Dakota, where voters blocked an effort to outlaw the procedure.

On the other hand, five antiabortion Democrats were elected to the House from districts in the industrial Midwest and South, conservative regions that the Democratic Party had been struggling to infiltrate. Robert P. Casey Jr. (Pa.), who is Catholic and opposes abortion, won a Senate seat with strong Democratic establishment backing -- although his father, the late Pennsylvania governor Robert P. Casey Sr., had been barred from addressing the 1992 Democratic National Convention because of his antiabortion views. A slim majority of the Senate leans toward favoring abortion rights, but the Democratic-led House remains antiabortion by a narrow margin. As one abortion rights activist put it, "We've made gains, but we don't have carte blanche on anything."

Democrats hope their proposals for preventing unwanted pregnancies will become a bridge within the party and even across the aisle to some Republicans, a way to reconcile moral reservations with legal rights.

Third Way, a moderate Democratic policy group, coined the term "abortion grays" to define the nearly two-thirds of voters who hold mixed views on the subject. Rachel Laser, Third Way's abortion expert, has counseled numerous Democratic candidates and lawmakers on prevention rhetoric. In a poll the group commissioned last summer, 69 percent of voters said they supported the goal of reducing the number of abortions "while still preserving the basic right to have one."

DOJ_NMG_0119508

And yet Democrats have been reluctant even to mention abortion in recent years. Laser reviewed Senate Web sites and found that Democratic members used the word fewer than 350 times, while Republicans raised the issue 1,900 times. Democrats "also are prone to make conflicting statements about abortion or to couple their pro-choice voting records with a statement professing their personal opposition to abortion," one of her Third Way memos said. "This comes across as defensive, confusing and disingenuous."

The Reid bill, sponsored in the House by Rep. Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.), would increase funds for family-planning services, ensure contraception equity in health insurance plans and improve access to emergency contraception. The Ryan-DeLauro legislation would expand access to contraception, fund sex-education programs, improve health-care access for low-income women and children, and extend adoption tax credits.

There are still minefields, as Ryan discovered when he entered the abortion fray in the House. A 33-year-old Catholic who represents a working-class Ohio district, he has sought to jostle Democratic thinking on abortion since his service in the state legislature. After he was elected to Congress in 2002, Ryan reached out to the antiabortion group Democrats for Life. The group was devising what evolved into a foundation of the prevention agenda, a plan to lower the abortion rate by 95 percent over 10 years.

In late 2005, Democrats for Life discussed a possible collaboration with Third Way, but an alliance never materialized because many antiabortion Democrats, particularly Catholics, were reluctant to endorse contraception provisions.

"We wanted a bill that all pro-life Democrats could feel comfortable supporting," said Kristen Day, executive director of Democrats for Life. But Ryan decided that Democrats had to go further, and he shopped his bill around the House without the group's support. It has since become the leading Democratic vehicle in that chamber. "We cannot have a legitimate abortion-reduction bill without contraception," Ryan said.

But the Democrats for Life bill also has gained broad support and even has attracted some Republican backers. Among its provisions: expanding welfare and health benefits for pregnant women and closing health-insurance loopholes that limit prenatal care. At least three states -- Alabama, Michigan and Virginia -- are considering smaller versions of the House package, Day said.

"In the ideal world, there would have been just one bill," she said. "But it's a positive step that our party has been talking about this. Two bills is a good thing."

The Socialist Senator (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times Magazine, January 21, 2007

When Bernie Sanders visits a high-school class, as he does regularly, students don't hear a speech, a focus-grouped polemic, a campaign pitch or, heaven forbid, practiced one-liners. Nor, in all likelihood, do they hear Sanders tell stories about his family, childhood or some hardship he has endured. He makes no great effort to "connect" emotionally in the manner that politicians strive for these days, and he probably doesn't "feel your pain" either, or at least make a point of saying so. It's not that Sanders is against connecting, or feeling your pain, but the process seems needlessly passive and unproductive, and he prefers a more dynamic level of engagement.

"I urge you all to argue with your teachers, argue with your parents," Sanders told a group of about 60 students at South Burlington High School — generally liberal, affluent and collegebound — one afternoon in mid-December.

The newly elected senator whipped his head forward with a force that shifted his free-for-all frizz of white hair over his forehead. (Journalistic convention in Vermont mandates that every Sanders story remark on his unruly hair as early on as possible. It also stipulates that every piece of his clothing be described as "rumpled.")

"C'mon, I'm not seeing enough hands in here," he said.

A senior named Marissa Meredyth raised hers, and Sanders flicked his index finger at her as if he were shooting a rubber band. She bemoaned recent cuts to college financial-aid programs.

Sanders bemoans these, too, but he'd rather provoke.

DOJ_NMG_0119509

"How we going to pay for this financial aid?" Sanders asked. "Who in here wants us to raise taxes on your parents to pay for this?"

Not many, based on the show of hands.

"O.K., so much for financial aid," Sanders said, shrugging.

Next topic: "How many of you think it was a good idea to give the president the authority to go to war in Iraq?"

No hands.

"C'mon, anyone?"

He paused, paced, hungry for dissent, a morsel before lunch. Sanders says he thinks Iraq was a terrible idea, too, but he seemed to crave a jolt to the anesthetizing hum of consensus in the room.

"Iraq is a huge and very complicated issue," Sanders said, finally. ("Huge" is Sanders favorite word, which he pronounces "yooge," befitting a thick Brooklyn accent unsmoothed-over by 38 years in Vermont.) He mentioned that Vermont has had more casualties in Iraq per capita than any other state in the union, including one from South Burlington High School.

"O.K., last call for an Iraq supporter," he said. Going once, going twice.

By this point, Sanders's cheeks had turned a shade of dark pink with a strange hint of orange. It's a notable Sanders trait; his face seems to change color with the tenor of a conversation, like a mood ring. His complexion goes orangey-pink when he's impatient (often when someone else is speaking), purpley-pink when he's making a point or a softer shade of pink when at rest, "rest" being a relative term.

Next question from Sanders: "Should people in this country who want to go to college be able to go, regardless of income?"

Wall-to-wall hands, with the exception of one belonging to Andy Gower, a senior in a backward baseball cap who recently moved up from North Carolina. Relatively conservative, Andy is a conspicuous outlier in the class. Bernie knows how he feels, having spent eight terms as the lone Socialist in Congress, and the first to serve in the House since the 1920s.

"Why do you think that?" Sanders asked Andy.

He replied with a question of his own: "Why should people who can afford to go to college pay for people who can't?" He was sheepish at first but gained momentum. "Why should people who are successful in this society be burdened by people who aren't? It's just a fact of life. Some people will succeed, and some people won't. And it's just the way it's going to be and has always been."

A few classmates smirked, shook their heads. But Sanders was suddenly buoyant. He stomped forward, clapped twice — provocation achieved.

Hands were shooting up everywhere, and Sanders contorted his mouth into a goofy grin.

"At the end of the day, democracy is a tough process," Sanders said finally, arms restored to their flailing default positions.

"The discussion we've had in here is at a higher level than what we often have on the floor of the United States Congress," Sanders gushed, for as much as he ever gushes, which is not much.

And given some of the things Sanders has said about the United States Congress, maybe this wasn't such a gush after all.

Sanders has always been an easier fit in Vermont than in Washington. Being a Socialist in the seat of two-party orthodoxy will do that. While he has generally championed liberal Democratic positions over the years — and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee endorsed his Senate campaign — Sanders has strenuously resisted calling himself a Democrat. And he has clung to a mantle — socialism — that brings considerable stigma, in large part for its association with authoritarian communist regimes (which Sanders is quick to disavow).

But he does little to airbrush the red "S" from his political profile. On the wall of his Congressional office hangs a portrait of Eugene V. Debs, the Socialist Party presidential candidate of the early 20th century. A poster in a conference room marks Burlington's sister-city relationship with Puerto Cabeza, Nicaragua — one of a few such alliances he forged with cities in Marxist states during his 10-year stint as mayor of Vermont's biggest city in the 1980s.

Socialism brings Sanders instant novelty in Washington and, in many circles, instant dismissal as a freak. But Sanders's outcast status in Washington probably owes as much to his jackhammer style as to any stubborn ideology. It is a town filled with student body president types — and Sanders, for his part, finished a distant third when he ran to be president of his class at James Madison High School in Brooklyn.

DOJ_NMG_0119510

Few would describe Sanders's personality as "winning" in the classic politician's sense. He appears to burn a disproportionate number of calories smiling and making eye contact. "Bernie is not going to win a lot of 'whom would you rather live on a desert island with' contests," says Garrison Nelson, a professor of political science at the University of Vermont. No matter. Sanders's agitating style in Washington also constitutes a basic facet of anticharm, antipolitician appeal at home.

"I'm not afraid of being called a troublemaker," Sanders says, something he's been called many times, in many different ways, many of them unprintable. "But you have to be smart. And being smart means not creating needless enemies for yourself."

In this regard, Sanders has not always been smart, especially when he was first elected to the House in 1990. He called Congress "impotent" and dismissed the two major parties as indistinguishable tools of the wealthy. He said it wouldn't bother him if 80 percent of his colleagues lost re-election — not the best way to win friends in a new workplace.

"Bernie alienates his natural allies," Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat, said at the time. "His holier-than-thou attitude — saying in a very loud voice he is smarter than everyone else and purer than everyone else — really undercuts his effectiveness." The late Joe Moakley, another Massachusetts Democrat, waxed almost poetic in his derision for Sanders. "He is out there wailing on his own," Moakley said. "He screams and hollers, but he is all alone."

Frank says he came to like and work well with Sanders, with whom he served on the House Financial Services Committee. His early objections were over Sanders's railing against both parties as if they were the same. "I think when he first got here, Bernie underestimated the degree that Republicans had moved to the right," Frank told me. "I get sick of people saying 'a curse on both your houses.' When you point out to them that you agree with them on most things, they'll say, 'Yeah, well, I hold my friends up to a higher standard.' Well, O.K., but remember that we're your friends."

Among his House colleagues, "Bernie's not a bad guy," is something I heard a lot of. "You appreciate Bernie the more you see him in action," says Senator Chuck Schumer, the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, who served with him for several years in the House. A fellow Brooklynite who is nine years younger, Schumer attended the same elementary school as Sanders (P.S. 197) and the same high school (James Madison, which also graduated a third United States senator, Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota). "Bernie does tend to grow on people, whether it's in the House or in Vermont," Schumer says.

But he has clearly grown bigger in Vermont, and more seamlessly. "His bumper stickers just say, 'Bernie,' " says Senator Patrick Leahy, Vermont's senior Senator and a Democrat. "You have to reach a certain exulted status in politics to be referred to only by your first name."

Sanders is particularly beloved in Burlington, which elected the recovering fringe candidate as its mayor despite the Reagan landslide of 1980 — thus christening the so-called "People's Republic of Burlington." Some supporters called themselves "Sanderistas."

His election to the Senate in November came at the expense of a too-perfect Bernie foil — Richard Tarrant, a well-barbered, Bentley-driving Republican businessman who spent $7 million of his own money so he could lose by 33 percentage points.

"Congratulations, Bernie," a fan yells to Sanders outside his district office in Burlington. Sanders was out for a quick bagel on a balmy December morning, temperatures in the 60s — another day of Al Gore weather in the once-frozen north. He walked head down but kept getting stopped. "Now you gotta run for president, please," the congratulator added, something Sanders gets a lot of too.

It is a reception that any natural, eager-to-please politician would relish — and accordingly, Sanders dispatches these glad-handing chores with the visible joy of someone cleaning a litter box, coughing out his obligatory thank yous and continuing on his way.

Sanders's popularity in Vermont brings up the obvious questions: to what degree is he a quaint totem of the state, like the hermit thrush (the state bird), and could a Socialist be elected to the Senate anywhere else?

In recent years, Vermont has joined — perhaps surpassed — states like Massachusetts and New York in the top tier of liberal outposts. Several distinctions nurture the state's credentials: It was the first place to legalize civil unions for same-sex partners; it is the home of Phish, the countercultural rock-folk band and contemporary analog to the Grateful Dead and of Ben and Jerry's ice cream (and its peacenik-themed flavors); and it is host to cultural quirks and ordinances like not allowing billboards, being the last state to get a Wal-Mart.

DOJ_NMG_0119511

The state has also incubated several politicians who have achieved national boogie-man status among Republicans. They include Leahy, the Grateful Dead fan and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee; former Senator James Jeffords, the liberal Republican who became an Independent in 2001, giving Democrats a temporary majority; and Howard Dean, the former governor whose presidential campaign boom (and perhaps fizzle) was tied heavily to his association with Vermont's progressive politics.

Sanders fits snugly into this maverick's pantheon. But Leahy says his fellow senator appeals to an antiestablishment strain in Vermont that is not necessary liberal. Leahy notes that he himself is the only Democrat the state's voters have ever elected to the Senate. Before 1992, only one Democratic presidential candidate carried Vermont — Lyndon Johnson in 1964.

"A lot of the lower-income parts of our state are Republican," Leahy says, adding that many of them are populated by rural libertarians who are greatly suspicious of government intrusion into individual rights. "I saw Bernie signs all over those parts of the state."

Sanders opposes some federal gun-control laws, which has helped him in a state where "you grow up believing it is legal to shoot deer on the statehouse lawn in Montpelier," says Luke Albee, a South Burlington native who was Leahy's House chief of staff.

But again: Could Sanders be elected to the Senate anywhere else?

No, not as a Socialist, Schumer says. "Even in New York State it would be hard."

Massachusetts? "Maybe this year he could," Frank says, meaning 2006. "But if he were running in any other state, he probably would have to comb his hair."

Leahy says that just any Socialist probably couldn't get elected in Vermont, either. But Sanders has made himself known in a state small enough — physically and in terms of population — for someone, particularly a tireless someone, to insinuate himself into neighborly dialogues and build a following that skirts ideological pigeonholes. Indeed, there are no shortages of war veterans or struggling farmers in Vermont who would seemingly have no use for a humorless aging hippie peacenik Socialist from Brooklyn, except that Sanders has dealt with many of them personally, and it's a good bet his office has helped them procure some government benefit.

"People have gotten to know him as Bernie," Leahy says. "Not as the Socialist."

Sanders calls himself as a "democratic Socialist." When I asked him what this meant, as a practical matter, in capitalist America circa 2007, he did what he often does: he donned his rhetorical Viking's helmet and waxed lovingly about the Socialist governments of Scandinavia. He mentioned that Scandinavian countries have nearly wiped out poverty in children — as opposed to the United States, where 18 to 20 percent of kids live in poverty. The Finnish government provides free day care to all children; Norwegian workers get 42 weeks of maternity leave at full pay.

But would Americans ever accept the kinds of taxes that finance the Scandinavian welfare state? And would Sanders himself trade in the United States government for the Finnish one? He is curiously, frustratingly non-responsive to questions like this. "I think there is a great deal we can learn from Scandinavia," he said after a long pause. And then he returns to railing about economic justice and the rising gap between rich and poor, things he speaks of with a sense of outrage that always seems freshly summoned.

Sanders crinkles his face whenever a conversation veers too long from this kind of "important stuff" and into the "silly stuff," like clothes and style. "I do not like personality profiles," Sanders told me during our first conversation. He trumpets a familiar rant against the media, its emphasis on gaffes, polls and trivial details.

"If I walked up on a stage and fell down, that would be the top story," Sanders says. "You wouldn't hear anything about the growing gap between rich and poor."

When I first met Sanders in person on Church Street, there were big streaks of dried mud on his shoes and dried blood on his neck from what looked to be a shaving mishap. His hair flew every which way in a gust of wind. At six feet tall, he is wiry, but he walks with shoulders hunched and elbows out, like a big, skulking bird. From a distance, he looked as if he could be homeless.

DOJ_NMG_0119512

Closer in, the overwhelming impression made by Sanders is that of an acute worrier. He evinces the wearied default manner of a longtime insomniac, eyes weather-beaten with big lines and a perpetual slight cringe. His brow appears close to collapse beneath the weight of an invisible sandbag.

Richard Sugarman, a professor of religion at the University of Vermont and a longtime friend, recalls that during Sanders's days as mayor, constituents would sometimes call him at his listed home phone number in the middle of the night. "Someone would call at 3 a.m. and say, 'Hey Bernie, someone just threw a brick through my window, what should I do?' He was as hands on as anyone. ... Does he have an off-mode? Not really."

Luke Albee, Leahy's former chief of staff, says: "He has no hobbies. He works. He doesn't take time off. Bernie doesn't even eat lunch. The idea of building a fire and reading a book and going on vacation, that's not something he does."

As much as anything, this distills why Sanders has been an awkward fit in the chummy realm of Capitol Hill. He is no pleaser or jokester by anyone's prototype. I don't recall Sanders laughing more than two or three times in the 48 hours I spent with him in Vermont. His one memorably funny aside came when I asked if his Congressional office had a dress code.

"Yes," he said. "You can't come in if you're totally nude," he said. He instituted the rule, he said, when his outreach director, Phil Fiermonte, who is now sitting next to him, came to work naked.

"Totally nude," Sanders said. "On three occasions."

He was kidding, presumably.

Riding in the passenger seat of Fiermonte's car, Sanders was shouting into a brick-size cellphone, the likes of which were all the rage in the 1990s. He was talking to a staff person who was about to meet with someone from the office of Senator Edward Kennedy, chairman of Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, one of five committees that Sanders will sit on. Sanders voice filled the car.

"Dental care is yooge," Sanders boomed into the phone. This has been a leitmotif of my visit — Sanders's crusade to improve dental health among Vermont's rural poor. He views this as an employment and economic issue. "How many employers are going to hire someone who doesn't have teeth?" he asks. "You go around this state, and you will find a lot of people with no teeth. It is their badge of poverty."

Improving dental care for the poor is a classic Sanders issue: unsexy and given to practical solutions and his obsessive attention. Sanders sees bad dental care among the poor as a "pothole issue" in Vermont, meaning it is pervasive and something that government should be active in fixing (like potholes). Teeth are tangible, especially when they hurt.

Sanders's car pulled into the parking lot of H.O. Wheeler Elementary School in North Burlington, where he was visiting a drop-by dental clinic. The notion of "school-based dental care" excites Sanders immensely, and his gait speeds as he enters the school, past the main office, a classroom and several school officials he has come to know over multiple visits.

"If you're a kid, and you're having dental pain, you're not going to be learning a lot," said Joseph Arioli, of Burlington's Community Health Center and one of a half-dozen program administrators — including a dentist in scrubs — convened around a dentist chair.

The clinic provides free access to dental care for kids at high risk of neglecting their teeth. Students are typically seen during the school day, which means they miss minimal class time and their parents don't have to leave work to take them. Betsy Liley, a grant writer for the city, says that many households in Vermont own just one toothbrush.

"Lemme guess, a lot of the dietary habits you see here are not great," Sanders said. Nods all around. He said he'd do his best to secure more financing and vowed to return. And he told Liley that he might bring her to Washington to testify before a Senate committee.

Walking out, Sanders didn't bother with goodbye — just as he didn't with hello — only a thank you and a "what you're doing here is yooge" over his shoulder.

"Great program," Sanders said in the car. He likes to check in whenever possible. That's essentially what I did with Sanders in Vermont: check in, with programs that he's been involved with or wants to learn more about. He likes to hit lots of meetings, quick, businesslike transactions.

Only once in six discussions I sat in on did Sanders indulge in a personal anecdote. He was in his office talking to Sharon Moffat, Vermont's acting commissioner of health, and the topic turned to dental care.

DOJ_NMG_0119513

"I have a personal story to tell you," Sanders said, and my ears perked up as I fantasized of learning the "Rosebud" episode that might explain Bernie's interest in teeth.

"I was in the House cloakroom about five years ago," Sanders said. "And I was thirsty. I took a drink of grape juice. Blawww."

He scrunched up his face.

"It was awful, awful. Then I looked at the label. The amount of junk they put in there is unbelievable."

Moffat nodded.

"Anyway, I no longer drink that stuff," Sanders said.

Sanders's parents were Jewish immigrants from Poland. His father, Eli, a struggling paint salesman who saw his family wiped out in the Holocaust, worried constantly about supporting his wife and two sons. His mother, Dorothy, dreamed of living in a "private home," but they never made it beyond their three-and-a-half-room apartment on East 26th and Kings Highway. She died at age 46, when Bernie was 19. "Sensitivity to class was imbedded in me then quite deeply," Sanders told me.

Sanders spent a year at Brooklyn College before transferring to the University of Chicago, where he studied psychology and helped lead protests against racially segregated housing on campus. He spent time on a kibbutz in Israel after graduation and then moved to Vermont with his first wife. "I had always been captivated by rural life," he says. As a child, Sanders attended Boy Scout camp upstate and used to cry on the bus as it returned him to New York at the end of the summer.

In Vermont, Sanders worked many jobs for meager sums — as a freelance writer, filmmaker, carpenter and researcher, among other things. (Sanders has one son, Levi, and three stepchildren from his marriage to his second wife, Jane O'Meara Driscoll, the president of a small college in Burlington whom he met at a party on the night of his first mayoral victory.)

Politics came to dominate Sanders's life. He was an early member of Vermont's Liberty Union party, an offshoot of the antiwar movement in Vermont. He ran as the party's nominee for the Senate in a special election in 1971 and finished with 2 percent of the vote. The following year, he ran for governor and received 1 percent. He would run two more times for statewide office that decade as a third-party candidate and never come close.

That changed when he ran for mayor of Burlington in 1980, at Sugarman's urging. Sugarman studied the race and believed Sanders could win, if few others did. Sanders knocked on doors all over the city, campaigned day and night and beat a six-term Democratic incumbent by 12 votes.

"People generally assumed this was a fluke and that he would be gone in two years," said Peter Clavelle, a friend who succeeded Sanders as mayor.

Sanders spoke out against poverty in the third world and made good-will visits to the Soviet Union and Cuba, among other places that U.S. mayors generally didn't travel to during that time. But a funny thing happened on the way to what many had dismissed as a short-running circus. Sanders undertook ambitious downtown revitalization projects and courted evil capitalist entities known as "businesses." He balanced budgets. His administration sued the local cable franchise and won reduced rates for customers. He drew a minor-league baseball team to town, the Vermont Reds (named for the Cincinnatis, not the Commies).

Sanders's appeal in Vermont's biggest city blended the "think globally" sensibility of a liberal college town with the "act locally" practicality of a hands-on mayor. He offered sister-city relations with the Sandinistas and efficient snowplowing for the People's Republic of Burlington. Before Sanders's mayoral victory, Leahy says, it was easy not to take him seriously. "Then he got over that barrier, and got elected. He fixed the streets, filled the potholes, worked with the business community. He did what serious leaders do." He was re-elected three times.

In a sense, Sanders's stint as mayor become a template for his subsequent successes — and limitations — as a national officeholder. In the House, he gained great publicity and favor as an audacious critic with a geopolitical purview, but ultimately left his biggest mark with small-bore diligence to the local realpolitik.

I was reminded of this when I asked Sanders in early January what his immediate legislative goals would be in the Senate. He listed these broad-brush priorities: 1) ending the Iraq war; 2) reversing the "rapid decline of the middle class" (a corollary to "addressing the gap between rich and poor"); 3) reordering priorities in the federal budget; and 4) enacting environmental laws to thwart global warming. When I asked how he would translate any of his priorities into concrete legislation, he nodded sheepishly and said, "I'm in the process of trying to figure that out now." It is an unsatisfying response somewhat reminiscent of Sanders's all-purpose invocations of Scandinavia whenever he's pressed on how his socialist philosophy can be applied to the two-party system he exists in.

DOJ_NMG_0119514

As a general rule, Sanders is much more convincing at proffering outrage than solutions. He can do this in Vermont, in part, because he is an entrenched political brand — "Bernie" — and voters will forgive a little blowhardedness (if not demagoguery) from someone they basically agree with and who has grown utterly familiar to their landscape, like cows. Sanders can also pull this off because, as he did in the mayor's office, he has buttressed his bomb-throwing with rock-solid attention to the pothole matters of dental clinics, veterans' benefits, farm subsidies, the kind of things an attentive politician operating in a tiny state (with a population of just 620,000) can fashion a formidable political base from.

After three terms as mayor, Sanders ran for Vermont's at-large House seat in 1988 as an Independent and lost by a small margin to Peter Smith, the Republican former lieutenant governor. He won a rematch in 1990.

"When I came into the House, no one knew what to do with me," Sanders says. "I was the only representative from Vermont, so I had no one to help me. And I was the only Independent, so no one knew where to put me in terms of committee."

Sanders was known as something of a pragmatic gadfly in the House. His grillings of former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan became a running burlesque, much awaited by many Hill and Federal Reserve watchers whenever Greenspan appeared before the House Financial Services Committee. ("Do you give one whit of concern for the middle class and working families of this country?" Sanders asked Greenspan in one representative exchange.)

Sanders was not without his legislative triumphs. He was adept at working with people with whom he otherwise disagreed sharply — forging alliances with conservatives like Representative Ron Paul, Republican of Texas and a well-known libertarian, with whom he shared a common hostility to the U.S.A. Patriot Act. In what might have been Sanders's signature triumph of recent years, he was instrumental in striking a provision from the Patriot Act that would have required librarians to release data on what their patrons were reading.

But in keeping with his pragmatic gadfly's approach, Sanders was far more accomplished at filing amendments to House bills than actually writing and producing legislation of his own. He was also gifted at drawing attention to his issues and (just as important) to himself. He was the first congressman to lead a bus trip to Canada to help seniors buy cheaper prescription drugs.

As he makes the transition to his new job, Sanders says his former House colleagues have teased him about not becoming "like the rest of them" in the Senate. Sanders jokes about this, as much as he jokes about anything. He says he will be required to enter a machine that zaps his brain and transforms him "into a member in good standing in the House of Lords."

"We're talking about a completely different animal here," Sanders says. The House fosters a more hospitable habitat for the audacious and eccentric; their ranks tend to be camouflaged by its larger numbers, curtailed by strict time limits on floor speeches and reined in by the outsize power of the House leadership. Senators can speak for as long as they want and single-handedly buck the wishes of 99 other senators by placing "holds" on bills and nominations. Tradition dictates that senators exercise such privileges sparingly.

"There will be times when he causes the Democratic leadership some agita," Schumer predicts. "But knowing him, I think he's smart enough not to make any gratuitous enemies. He might make enemies, but they won't be gratuitous enemies."

Sanders told me, "You have to ask yourself, Did the people send me here to give long speeches, or did they send me here to get things done?"

By "you" Sanders means himself, as his sleepless Socialist adventure proceeds into the House of Lords.

On a quiet morning in mid-December, Sanders was sitting in his new office in the basement of a Senate office building — it is a temporary office he will inhabit before he moves to another temporary office that he will occupy until a permanent space opens up, probably around March. It's all very exasperating, he said, this office-space situation. But he asked that I keep the specifics of his exasperation out of the article. He is trying to meet a stepped-up standard of tact and decorum in his new home.

"Why can't we get these phone calls forwarded from the House office?" Sanders asked a staff person who is working temporarily at a temporary reception desk in the temporary-temporary office. Everything seems temporary, but not as temporary as before. Sanders has a six-year term now instead of a two-year one. Friends have advised him to pace himself, curb his impatience. He would seem ill wired for this, but he is trying. He even took a four-day vacation last month — and to Palm Springs.

DOJ_NMG_0119515

But now he has work to do, beginning with getting to know his colleagues. "Personal relationships are very important in the Senate," he told me. He likes the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, a lot, appreciates that he gave him the committee assignments that he wanted — Health, Education, Labor and Pensions; the Environment and Public Works; Veterans' Affairs; Energy and Natural Resources; and the Budget. And wouldn't you know, Reid has an interest in dental care, too. He grew up dirt poor in Nevada, and his mother had no teeth. The first thing Reid did when he got his first job — at a gas station — was buy her a new set. So the Senate's leading Democrat gets the importance of dental care, which could help save teeth in Vermont.

"Let's go somewhere else to talk," Sanders said, as we headed out the door of his temporary-temporary office. "We can get some coffee."

We traversed a maze of hallways that lead into a Senate dining room. "Can we sit down in here?" he asked a busperson. Yes, but then Sanders looked at a bunch of tables covered in white linen table clothes, not what he had in mind.

We walked upstairs, in search of a quiet place in the new neighborhood, on the Senate side. He kept navigating short hallways and turning back. An elevator opened in front of Sanders. It said "Senators Only." The attendant invited him on, but he hesitated, turned away and began looking for another route to wherever he was going.

Sanders zigzags the Capitol this way barely recognized, or acknowledged (or congratulated, or urged to run for president). A few people stare at the new senator as he walks by — maybe because he looks lost, or famous, or maybe just because he looks like a strange bird out of Vermont.

Mr. Chips Goes To Congress (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

We're in bipartisan nirvana. Bills are passing through the House 356 to 71 and through the Senate 96 to 2. Nancy Pelosi is aglow, and this week President Bush will trot out a State of the Union speech so conciliatory in tone it'll sound like Gandhi on Quaaludes.

The question is, What is all this good cheer accomplishing? It's time to render judgments on the substance of all this legislation coursing through the Democratic Congress:

Ethics reform: A–. This is the best thing the Democrats have done. The bans on lobbyist-financed gifts, meals and travel are unimportant. Few legislators are corrupted by a steak or even a ride in a Gulfstream.

But there are measures in the tough Senate bill that will change behavior. Legislators will have to wait two years before becoming lobbyists. Lobbyists will have to disclose donations they collect and bundle. There will be more transparency on earmarks. If this bill becomes law, the Democrats will have done something significant to clean up Washington.

Minimum wage: B–. The traditional argument against raising the minimum wage is that higher labor costs mean that employers hire fewer workers. It's hard to believe this burden will cost many jobs, given how low the minimum wage is now.

On the other hand, raising the minimum wage won't be of much benefit to the working poor. Only 0.6 percent of all wage workers make the minimum, and many of those are middle-class teenagers or recent grads.

The economists Richard Burkhauser of Cornell and Joseph Sabia of the University of Georgia estimate that a mere 12.7 percent of the benefits of a federal minimum wage hike would go to poor families, while 63 percent would go to families earning more than twice the poverty line. In sum, a poorly targeted publicity measure that will nonetheless help some people in need. Raising the earned-income tax credit would have been better.

Prescription drugs: D. While they were the opposition, Democrats fulminated that the Republicans were so deep in the pockets of Big Pharma that they wouldn't even let the government negotiate lower drug prices. But governing is harder than kvetching, and the Congressional Budget Office has concluded that the Democratic plan would have a negligible effect on prices for the elderly.

The plan allows the government to negotiate, but doesn't take the politically difficult step of giving it any leverage to actually lower prices. A symbolic gesture.

Student loans: C–. House Democrats (and 124 Republicans) voted to cut the interest rates on student loans. This is a nice subsidy for middle-class grads, but will do almost nothing to help working-class kids complete college. Over the past three decades, the federal government has spent more than $750 billion on financial aid, with spending levels exploding over the past 10 years. This money has done little to improve graduation rates. That's because relatively few students can't complete college for financial reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0119516

Study after study has failed to find any link between recent federal subsidy programs and college attendance. Democrats would have been better off streamlining existing aid or focusing their efforts on Pell grants.

Energy policies: A–. Democrats have voted to reduce some of the government's oil and gas subsidies and shift them toward renewable energy. As Jerry Taylor wrote in The National Review recently, the case for the existing oil subsidies is "laughably thin." In fact, it's too bad Congress didn't take an even bigger slice out of corporate pork.

Sept. 11 commission recommendations: C–. This is another case of governing being a lot harder than complaining. Democrats vowed to enact all the recommendations, but immediately backtracked on the one the commission said was "among the most difficult and important": strengthening Congressional oversight. No guts, no glory.

Stem cell research. B. The House voted 253 to 174 to reverse the Bush restrictions on embryonic stem cell research funding (not enough to overturn a veto). A good move, for most of us. But it's hard to judge the practical consequences, given how distant the benefits of this research are, and the fact that recent innovations like amniotic stem cells might alter the whole debate.

In conclusion, if a wonky Mr. Chips were to step back and render a judgment on the new Congress so far, he'd note that it's not a terribly ambitious student. It hasn't tried anything big. It has a weakness for showy symbolism and middle-class subsidies. Still, at least it hasn't humiliated the nation the way the last Congress did, and it looks set to do some modest good.

The Cause Bush Did Justice To (WP)

By Jan Crawford Greenburg

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The courtroom crackled with tension on the final day of the Supreme Court's 2004-05 session. It was shaping up to be a historic day, many believed, and the seats were packed with top government officials and people who had camped out overnight in the sticky heat of a Washington summer. They had come for one reason: to see Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist announce his retirement after 33 years on the court.

Rehnquist was dying of thyroid cancer, and he appeared almost ghostly that morning as he pulled back his tall leather chair in the center of the bench. He was thin and stooped, his once-robust complexion now gray. His booming baritone, which had silenced many a lawyer, was weak, and he struggled even to briefly summarize the court's decision in a key religion case.

When he finished, he thanked the court for its work during a difficult year. The room grew still, and the other justices peered at Rehnquist. The chief justice paused briefly, then banged down the gavel and slowly rose. Most of his colleagues seemed confused. Only Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, his friend of five decades, appeared to have a sense of purpose. She already knew about his plans for the future -- and her own. She turned and stepped beside her old chief, ready to help him if he needed her arm, as he shuffled back to his chambers. There was no announcement.

The anticlimax that morning only reinforced unease among conservatives. Amid the rumors of retirement and change, they were facing an uncomfortable reality: The Rehnquist Court, with seven justices appointed by Republican presidents, had become a legal and ideological disappointment. The justices had consistently refused to set aside landmark liberal rulings of previous Supreme Courts and had declined to issue clear decisions on some of the most contentious matters of constitutional law. On issue after issue -- abortion, affirmative action, capital punishment, separation of church and state, and presidential power -- conservatives watched the court chart a liberal path, injecting itself into explosive public disputes and handing the left big victories.

Ironically, the court's decision on Bush v. Gore, in which the five most conservative justices voted to stop the Florida recounts in the 2000 presidential election and deliver victory to George W. Bush, was also a blow to conservatives: It opened the court to criticism for deciding the case on politics, not law, and those denunciations may have made the court's moderates, O'Connor and Anthony M. Kennedy, more wary of being cast as predictable votes on the right.

Once in the White House, however, President Bush was to ultimately get the openings that conservatives needed to remake the court for a post-Rehnquist era. When the chief justice announced his illness in the days before the 2004 election, the moment for change was at hand. And barely two months after Rehnquist banged his gavel for the last time, on June 27, 2005, Bush seized that moment and filled not one but two vacancies.

DOJ_NMG_0119517

The departures of O'Connor and Rehnquist produced a titanic conflict over their successors, one that turned allies into enemies, damaged reputations and reopened old wounds. Yet, after bizarre missteps and strategic brilliance at the highest levels, Bush engineered lasting change in the court, succeeding where past Republican presidents -- including his own father -- had failed. And in so doing, he provided some redemption for the conservative movement, so dismayed by watching Republicans in the political branches flout ethics laws, expand government and indulge in runaway spending. If nothing else, they would get their court.

Bush was seared by his father's 1990 nomination of David H. Souter to the Supreme Court, and he vowed to avenge that mistake. Souter, an unknown New Hampshire jurist who edged out favored nominee Kenneth W. Starr, quickly became one of the court's most liberal justices. Conservatives consider his selection one of the biggest blunders of a Republican president in the 20th century.

Bush promised to nominate justices in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, and his advisers methodically looked for nominees who fit that bill. A group of advisers, including Vice President Cheney, had begun quietly interviewing prospective nominees after the extent of Rehnquist's illness became apparent. They were looking for solid judicial conservatives with proven track records. Determined to avoid a Souter redux, they looked for nominees with a clear paper trail. They did not want another Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate conservative who they believed had drifted to the left in his years on the court. They believed that service in the executive branch, which typically desensitized people to media coverage, would stiffen a justice's backbone once those critical newspaper editorials began rolling in.

John G. Roberts Jr., a highly regarded Supreme Court advocate who had served in two Republican administrations, was among the top candidates. He also had impressed conservative colleagues during his short tenure on the D.C.-based federal appeals court, an impression that liberal judges confirmed. Judge Harry Edwards, an outspoken liberal on that court, said privately that Roberts was "the most conservative judge" he had ever seen. (And Edwards has served with Scalia and Thomas.)

Also on the short list was Samuel A. Alito Jr., a Newark-based federal judge who had 15 years of experience on the bench and who deputy White House counsel William K. Kelley believed had "never written a wrong opinion."

Roberts wasn't an obvious choice after his screening interview with Cheney and other top advisers. He had carefully held his views on controversial issues (including abortion) close for so long that some in the administration were suspicious of those views. But Roberts had supporters in the White House, and Kelley was one of them. He knew Roberts held conservative views; he just didn't share them often. He and others pointed to Roberts's record under presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, as well as his opinions on the appeals court, to convince skeptics that he was the kind of conservative Bush wanted to nominate. Roberts edged onto the short list to meet with the president.

Meanwhile, Alito had wowed the group in his interview with his quiet confidence and sparkling conservative record. He even joked about his nickname, "Scalito," which journalists used to compare him to Scalia. (Alito disliked the nickname, believing it had less to do with his opinions than with his Italian ethnicity.)

Then O'Connor shocked Washington by announcing her retirement in July 2005, with the ailing Rehnquist still serving as chief justice, and administration lawyers renewed efforts to find female and minority candidates. However, Bush eventually went back to his original list and interviewed five contenders: Alito, Roberts, Edith Brown Clement, J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson III. Bush told advisers that Roberts's qualifications "jumped off the page," and that Roberts's congenial nature would be an asset in a court packed with strong personalities. After interviewing Roberts in the West Wing, Bush quickly settled on him to replace O'Connor.

Six weeks later, on Sept. 3, the weekend before Roberts's confirmation hearings were to begin on Capitol Hill, Rehnquist died at home in Virginia. His death came at one of the lowest points of Bush's presidency. Only five days before, Hurricane Katrina had devastated the Gulf Coast, killing nearly 2,000 people and displacing many more. As the floodwaters rose and state and local officials floundered, neither Bush nor his administration seemed to grasp the scale of the disaster.

On the weekend of Rehnquist's death, Bush was in full damage-control mode, and he did not hesitate on his decision for the court's new leader. He called Roberts at his home in Chevy Chase less than 12 hours after the news of Rehnquist's death became public, and asked him to come to the White House that afternoon. The next morning, he introduced Roberts as his nominee for chief justice -- just moments before he boarded Air Force One for another trip back to the ravaged Gulf Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0119518

Now Bush had to find a replacement for O'Connor, and this time he told advisers that it would be a woman or a minority. He was getting pressure, including from the first lady, to nominate a woman. And as new White House lawyers were to quickly learn, the president indeed cared about diversity and demanded that the lists of nominees to federal posts or lower courts always include women and minorities.

But as one candidate after another fell off the roster -- some were too old, some too liberal, some too unpredictable -- White House counsel Harriet Miers edged her way onto it. The Miers story -- how she became the nominee and then withdrew -- is a perfect storm of missteps and disconnect throughout the White House.

Bush's decision to nominate Miers was driven by his determination not to repeat his father's mistake with Souter. Of all the possible nominees, he knew Miers best, and he knew she would not change. She had been involved in the selection of Roberts; in fact, Miers had originally worried that he wasn't conservative enough. Bush was confident that she wouldn't disappoint.

Coincidentally, the opposition of conservative groups to Miers also was driven by the Souter nomination. To conservatives, Miers was an unproven and untested nominee, just as Souter had been. How could she stand up to the liberal intellectual heavyweights on the court, such as Stephen G. Breyer? Who could say she wouldn't change once Bush left town and headed back to Texas? Conservatives would not be fooled again.

Alito was waiting in the wings when Miers's nomination fell apart. Unlike Reagan, who appointed the more liberal Kennedy to the court in 1987 after his nominations of Robert H. Bork and Douglas H. Ginsburg went down in flames, Bush had no problem seeking another solid conservative. With a Republican majority in the Senate, he did not compromise. Alito was considered a solid conservative, though not combative like others, and he had hired liberal law clerks. Bush hoped that Alito, like Roberts, would prove effective in building coalitions.

The call from the White House surprised Alito. Living in New Jersey, he had been insulated from the negative Washington buzz over Miers. He had absorbed the disappointment about being passed over and had come to terms with remaining a federal appellate judge. Alito didn't know that he had been Miers's choice for the O'Connor vacancy after Roberts got the nod for the top spot. She liked his quiet confidence; he didn't seem to be pushing too hard for the job. When Alito was nominated just four days after Miers dropped out, she greeted him warmly in the White House, moments before Bush introduced him as his next nominee.

With the miasma in Iraq and a historic midterm election that wrested control of Congress from Republicans, many have labeled Bush's presidency an unmitigated failure. Yet no historian will be able to write that Bush failed to follow through on his campaign promises regarding the Supreme Court. His nominations of Roberts and Alito -- two of the most conservative justices to reach the court in many years -- will be felt for decades to come.

Bush fulfilled his early vow to appoint justices in the mold of Scalia and Thomas. Together with those two justices, Alito and Roberts make the Roberts Court the most conservative Supreme Court in half a century. Roberts and Alito will not be as forceful as Scalia and Thomas on the bench or in their opinions; they are unlikely to push moderates away with their strong views. For that reason, they may be more effective than Scalia or Thomas in finally removing the court from the contentious social issues that conservatives think belong in legislatures. With the court now poised to recede from some of those divisive cultural debates, George W. Bush and his lawyers at the White House and Justice Department will continue shaping the direction of U.S. law and culture long after many of them are dead.

Jan Crawford Greenburg is the legal correspondent for ABC News and author of "Supreme Conflict: The Inside Story of the Struggle for Control of the United States Supreme Court" (Penguin Press).

OTHER NEWS:

States Act On Congressional Goals (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119519

The newly Democratic House may think it responded swiftly to the populist message of the November elections with passage of Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour agenda. But out in the heartland, many state legislatures and governors hope to leave Congress in the dust.

Paying heed to voters' economic anxieties, governors of both parties and in all regions opened legislative sessions with proposals such as eliminating sales taxes on groceries, providing public kindergarten for low-income children, targeting tax relief to low- and moderate-income families and investing state dollars in job training for a new economy.

Stepping ahead of the Democratic-controlled House in attending to the growing gap between rich and poor, lawmakers in 17 states are moving to raise the minimum wage sooner or more than Congress proposes, or to tie it to inflation so it continues to rise. Under the House bill, the federal minimum wage would not reach its target of $7.25 an hour for more than two years and would not rise with inflation.

And California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) was hardly the sole governor calling for universal health insurance. His counterparts in Kansas, Illinois and Colorado did the same, while governors in Arizona, New Mexico, Indiana, New York and elsewhere called for covering hundreds of thousands of low-income, uninsured families.

"If you ask voters what do you want your state to do, that takes federal issues like the war in Iraq and the deficit off the table," said Bernie Horn of the Center for Policy Alternatives, which supports liberal policies in state legislatures. "So economic insecurity is the top issue."

While this partly reflects Democratic gains in the November elections in state legislatures and in governors' offices, it is hardly a one-party phenomenon.

Politicians of both parties are moving to eliminate state sales taxes on groceries in the cause of economic fairness. In his State of the State address, newly elected Arkansas Gov. Mike Beebe (D) invoked "a moral charge to rid our state of its most regressive tax, the state sales tax on food." A similar measure failed last year, but Beebe said 25 of 35 state senators are co-sponsoring his plan to halve the 6-cent tax this year and eventually eliminate it.

In Wyoming, the Republican-controlled House Revenue Committee passed a grocery tax exemption last week that would cost the state $50 million, rejecting alternative tax relief measures that would benefit the wealthy. And in Idaho, Gov. C. L. "Butch" Otter (R) called for a grocery tax credit for low-income residents.

Lawmakers in 17 states are moving to raise their minimum wages despite the pending congressional action. The majority-Democratic Mississippi House of Representatives passed a measure to raise the state minimum wage to $7.25 an hour by next January, at least a year ahead of the federal increase, and to index it to inflation so that it rises with the cost of living.

"I thought we needed to index it because Democrats control Congress now, but if Republicans ever get back even one house of Congress, they'll never raise the minimum wage again," said Mississippi state Rep. Ricky Cummings (D), sponsor of the measure, which faces strong resistance in the narrowly Democratic state Senate and from Gov. Haley Barbour (R).

Barbour said the indexing provision would eventually raise Mississippi's minimum wage above that of neighboring states, which he argued would drive jobs away. "Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, Tennessee must be laughing up their sleeves," he said.

Ray Keating, chief economist at the Small Business and Entrepreneurship Council, said businesses are concerned about the populist mood in legislatures, particularly surrounding minimum wage indexing and health care.

"The minimum wage indexing is especially troubling," he said. "You'll see it most clearly when the economy slows down and job creation slows down. States that pushed to get their minimum wage ahead of the federal wage are going to feel it."

Minimum wage indexing bills are pending in Kansas, Nebraska, Indiana, North Dakota, Minnesota, Rhode Island, Texas, Utah, Virginia and Wyoming, but analysts said it is too early to tell whether any of them will be enacted.

As for universal health care, Keating said it is not "the type of proposal we'd hope to come from Republicans, who usually believe in restrained government, lower taxes and less regulation." He was referring to Schwarzenegger and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), who steered a mandatory-coverage measure through his legislature and now is considering running for president.

The free-market approach is alive and well in some states, however. In Georgia, where Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) and Republican majorities in both houses were re-elected by large margins, Perdue has proposed solving the health-care crisis by emphasizing preventive care, exercise, healthful diets and access to cost and quality comparisons for medical care. He also called for tax incentives to develop more health care in underserved rural areas.

DOJ_NMG_0119520

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who chairs the National Governors Association, said its annual meeting next month will focus on how to use government, particularly public schools and colleges, to foster an "innovation economy" that expands opportunity for people of all incomes.

Governors have called for expanded job training, pre-kindergarten and college scholarships for low-income students, all in the name of equipping more people to compete for higher-wage jobs.

In Arkansas, Beebe called for spending $111 million to provide preschool for all children whose families earn up to twice the poverty level. He also proposed scholarships for students in families earning under $25,000 a year. Colorado Gov. Bill Ritter (D) proposed a similar plan.

Napolitano linked health insurance to education in her State of the State address, saying healthy children are better learners and calling for state-subsidized coverage for children in families making up to $60,000. Republicans who control the legislature called the plan too generous and expensive.

"What I sense out there," Napolitano said, "is people asking: Where are we going as a country? What is the economic future that we're going to have? Are we really going to be the generation that hands off an economic future less bright than the one we were handed?"

Hillary Clinton Opens Presidential Bid (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton yesterday launched a long-anticipated 2008 presidential campaign that could make her the first female president in the nation's history and the only former first lady to follow her husband in the White House.

"I'm in and I'm in to win," Clinton said on her campaign Web site early in the morning, and then spent the day at her Washington home making calls to supporters, donors and friends. Her announcement was deliberately timed to come shortly before President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday night, campaign advisers said, so she can draw a contrast with the administration's record and help focus attention on the office of the presidency.

Their hope, they said, is to establish Clinton as the candidate best prepared to become the first Democrat in the White House since Bush succeeded Bill Clinton six years ago.

"The stakes will be high when America chooses a new president in 2008," she said in a statement that was posted on her Web site along with a video announcement. "As a senator, I will spend two years doing everything in my power to limit the damage George W. Bush can do. But only a new president will be able to undo Bush's mistakes and restore our hope and optimism."

Clinton begins the long campaign as the clear front-runner for the Democratic nomination, according to a nationwide Washington Post-ABC News poll completed Friday night. The poll showed her the favorite of 41 percent of Democrats, giving her more than double the support of any of her potential rivals.

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who established his exploratory committee last week, has generated enormous interest and attention, putting the Clinton camp on notice. The poll put him in second place among Democrats at 17 percent, but his support has not increased over the past month as he has moved toward a formal candidacy.

In hypothetical general election matchups against the two most prominent prospective GOP candidates, Clinton narrowly leads Arizona Sen. John McCain and is running about even with former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

In her video statement, Clinton made only a glancing reference to the war in Iraq. She has emerged as a vocal critic of the president and opposes his proposal to send more than 20,000 additional troops into the conflict. But she voted for the war in 2002 and angered some party antiwar activists by standing behind that vote until last month.

Regardless, Clinton brings considerable assets to the race.

DOJ_NMG_0119521

As a former first lady now serving her second term in the Senate, she has one of the best-known names in American politics. She has a national network of supporters, the capacity to raise as much or more money than any of her rivals, and a r?sum? of political activity dating back decades that now includes six years in the Senate and a landslide reelection victory in November.

And for the past 15 years, she has shown an ability to weather sometimes harsh attacks from her critics, especially among conservatives.

But those considerable assets have done nothing to ward off a sizable cadre of rivals. That group includes, in addition to Obama, former North Carolina senator John Edwards, Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, all of whom have established campaign committees.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson plans to declare his intentions today and Delaware Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. has said he will be a candidate. The field also includes Ohio Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich. On the sidelines are Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 nominee, who is considering becoming a candidate, and former vice president Al Gore, the 2000 nominee, who has said he is not likely to run again.

The size and experience of the Democratic field underscores the reality that, for all of her support, fundraising potential and political muscle, Clinton continues to face questions about whether she can win a general election.

The electability issue comes in different forms. Will she suffer from a sense of Clinton fatigue on the part of many voters, who may be looking for the kind of fresh face Obama offers? Is she too defined as a partisan Democrat to fit the mood of an electorate that may be hungry for a different style of politics after eight years of the Clinton presidency and six years of Bush? Have the attacks against her as a cold and calculating politician created an image that, correct or incorrect, will be difficult to overcome?

Wasting no time to confront the issue, Clinton's campaign posted on its Web site a 1,250-word memo from strategist and pollster Mark Penn that begins: "People are always asking, can Hillary Clinton win the presidency? Of course she can."

"The number one asset we have is Hillary Clinton, her strength and leadership," Penn said in an interview. "As more and more people get to know her -- as they know her in New York -- they will like the leadership and the experience she represents."

But many Democrats say she will have to work to overcome skepticism about her candidacy inside the party. "Can they [voters] finally see the reality of Hillary Clinton, not the myth of Hillary Clinton?" said Mickey Kantor, who was commerce secretary in the Clinton administration and supports the senator's candidacy. "The money will be there. . . . The experienced people will be there. All those things she will have. But the image [is something] she will have to turn around in some parts of the country."

Clinton loyalists describe her as the least-known famous person in politics, by which they mean they do not believe people know the real Hillary Clinton. They hope to use town hall meetings, living-room coffees and interactive Internet conversations to reintroduce her to voters. On her Web site yesterday, Clinton emphasized her Midwestern middle-class roots and her cooperation with Republicans in the Senate.

All that may help to personalize her, but her advisers say the most effective way of overcoming questions about her electability is to focus voters' attention on what it takes to be president -- strength, intelligence, discipline and toughness -- all of which they say she already exhibits.

"At the end of the day, people are going to make a decision about who would be the best president, and that's the person they're going to vote for," campaign spokesman Howard Wolfson said.

Campaign officials also believe that Clinton's potential for making history as the nation's first female president will give the campaign added energy, a talking point emphasized in a memo sent to supporters yesterday. "In particular, younger generation women believe it's time we had our first woman president and believe Hillary is the right choice," the memo states.

The Post-ABC News poll demonstrates that she remains the candidate to beat for the nomination. Clinton led the Democratic field with 41 percent, followed by Obama with 17 percent, Edwards with 11 percent and Gore with 10 percent.

She had significantly greater support among women (49 percent) than men (30 percent) and drew about the same support from liberals (38 percent) as moderates (37 percent). Her strongest support came among nonwhite Democrats, 56 percent of whom backed her, despite the presence of Obama, who is the son of a black Kenyan father and white American mother.

In general election tests, she led McCain 50 to 45 percent and was roughly even with Giuliani, with 49 percent to his 47.

DOJ_NMG_0119522

More than half the respondents, 54 percent, gave Clinton a favorable rating, while 44 percent viewed her unfavorably. Giuliani, at 61 percent, had a higher rating, but McCain and Obama were both somewhat lower -- 49 and 45 percent, respectively. A quarter of those surveyed had no opinion about Obama and 16 percent had no opinion about McCain.

Sixty-one percent of Americans gave her husband, former president Bill Clinton, a favorable rating.

The poll also suggested that the New York senator may be less damaged by her position on the war than some analysts have suggested. Among Democrats who say the war is the most important issue facing the country -- the overwhelming percentage of whom oppose the war -- Clinton's favorable rating is 76 percent, almost identical among all Democrats, and she wins the support of 43 percent of that group, compared with 18 percent for Obama.

Clinton has more potentially serious problems in some of the early states where the nomination fight will begin. She trails either Edwards or Obama in recent polls in Iowa and has a much more fragile lead (or, in at least one case, is in second place) in New Hampshire. That is one reason campaign advisers want to get her to Iowa and New Hampshire as quickly as possible.

She will appear publicly in New York this afternoon, and will answer questions from voters during live online chats Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights. Her first trip to Iowa, whose caucuses will kick off the nomination contest, will come next weekend.

Clinton Enters '08 Field, Fueling Race For Money (NYT)

By Patrick Healy, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton jumped into the 2008 presidential race yesterday, immediately squaring off against Senator Barack Obama and the rest of the Democratic field in what is effectively the party's first primary, the competition for campaign donations.

"I'm in," Mrs. Clinton said in an e-mail message to supporters early yesterday. "And I'm in to win."

If successful, Mrs. Clinton, 59, would be the first female nominee of a major American political party, and she would become the first spouse of a former president to seek a return to the White House.

Her entrance into the race followed Mr. Obama's by less than a week, and highlighted the urgency for her of not falling behind in the competition for money, especially in New York, her home turf, where the battle has already reached a fever pitch. It also set off rounds of e-mail messages and conference calls among both her allies and opponents.

George Soros, the billionaire New York philanthropist, has made maximum donations in the past to both candidates, for instance, and last week he faced a choice: support Mr. Obama, who created his committee on Tuesday, or stay neutral and see what Mrs. Clinton and others had to say. In this case, Mr. Obama won.

Mr. Soros sent the maximum contribution, $2,100, to Mr. Obama, the first-term senator from Illinois, just hours after he declared his plans to run.

"Soros believes that Senator Obama brings a new energy to the political system and has the potential to be a transformational leader," said Michael Vachon, a spokesman for Mr. Soros.

Mrs. Clinton's presidential operation is only one day old, but she already finds herself in a breakneck competition against Mr. Obama for fund-raising supremacy in two towns that she and her husband have mined heavily for political gold: New York and Hollywood. Mr. Obama's entrance into the race has also put up for grabs other groups that are primary targets for Mrs. Clinton, including African-Americans and women.

At this early stage in the nomination fight, securing donations and signing up fund-raisers are among the best ways of showing political strength in a crowded field (seven Democrats and counting). And Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton are looking to raise at least $75 million this year alone.

Advisers said yesterday that they had begun corralling donors to build quickly on the formidable $14 million that Mrs. Clinton already had in the bank. They predicted that they would outpace Mr. Obama, though they acknowledged that he is moving impressively to try to match Mrs. Clinton's national fund-raising network, which has been in the making far longer than his.

DOJ_NMG_0119523

Mrs. Clinton faces some fatigue among donors after more than 15 years of Clinton fund-raising, Democratic contributors and strategists said, and some skepticism about whether she can win. Yet she has the Democrats' most popular rainmaker at her full disposal, former President Bill Clinton, and she has influential friends like the lawyer and power broker Vernon E. Jordan Jr. to help keep African-American donors and others by her side.

Notably, no prominent Clinton fund-raiser has moved to Mr. Obama's camp (though his aides are working on it). Mrs. Clinton has also lined up a powerful roster of fund-raising and economic advisers in New York, including the financiers Roger Altman, Steven Rattner, Blair W. Effron, Alan Patricof and Mr. Rattner's wife, Maureen White, a former finance chairwoman of the Democratic National Committee.

"Maureen and I will happily do everything we can to help her," Mr. Rattner said. "Based on our long relationship with her, we feel that she has demonstrated incontrovertibly that she would be an effective candidate and a terrific president."

For all of the attention swirling around Mr. Obama, meanwhile, he faces many obstacles as he seeks to become the nation's first black president. His background, including a father from Kenya and a mother from Kansas, has elevated his appeal, but it does little to answer questions about whether he has the experience to serve in the White House.

Picking off Clinton loyalists is no easy task, either. Hours after opening his fund-raising committee on Tuesday, Mr. Obama convened separate conference calls with donors in Chicago and on the East and West Coasts; in the East Coast phone call, according to participants, Mr. Obama asked them to keep an open mind about his candidacy even if they had been allies of Mrs. Clinton.

James Torrey, chairman of the global hedge fund Torrey Funds, said he signed on with Mr. Obama not as a snub to Mrs. Clinton, but because he believed that the Illinois senator had the best chance of inspiring Democrats and other voters.

"I know it's perceived as an anti-Hillary thing," Mr. Torrey said in an interview Friday. "I think she's marvelous, I think she's a great senator, but I'd rather see Barack Obama as president. I think the Republicans will make it their life's work to bring her down."

Several New York and Hollywood donors offered a similar assessment: they liked Mrs. Clinton as a senator, but worried that her rating in a new Washington Post/ABC News Poll released Saturday was at 41 percent, despite having nearly 100 percent name recognition.

Some of her veteran supporters in New York are now on the fence, including the business executives Orin S. Kramer and Robert Zimmerman, who are active in Democratic politics. Others say they plan to play it safe and contribute to both candidates. In Los Angeles, the producers David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg are working to plan a fund-raiser for Mr. Obama after he officially enters the race, which he is scheduled to do on Feb. 10. Mr. Geffen has signed on with Mr. Obama, while Mr. Katzenberg and Mr. Spielberg have not decided which candidate to formally endorse.

Yet hedging bets with a spread of donations could prove perilous with the Clinton camp, said Bob Kerrey, the former Nebraska senator who is president of the New School University.

"The Clintons value loyalty, and I don't think they are going to risk offending her," Mr. Kerrey said of Mrs. Clinton's traditional supporters, noting that he spoke to several undecided Democrats last week. Referring to Mr. Obama, he added: "He's got to reach out to Hillary's supporters and hope he can persuade some of them. If he doesn't, she's the nominee."

Mr. Zimmerman said he was enthusiastic about Mrs. Clinton. Asked why he had not aligned with her yet, he said: "It's appropriate and respectful to hear every candidate's message."

Mr. Obama is putting together his own finance team to focus on New York. He has hired Julianna Smoot, who helped tap Wall Street money as part of a record-setting team at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee under Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York. He has also dispatched a fund-raiser, Jenny Yeager, to run his New York operation, and he is calling on Robert Wolf, chairman of UBS Americas, to raise money. (A spokeswoman for Mr. Wolf, who has donated to Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats, confirmed that he planned to help Mr. Obama.)

In New York, chief executives, lawyers, entertainers, gay men and lesbians, African-Americans and women have been prominent in political fund-raising for decades — though usually they are picking among outsiders, not hometown friends and allies. Yet the 2008 race will test personal and political loyalties, with Mrs. Clinton preparing to announce a run and former Mayor

DOJ_NMG_0119524

Rudolph W. Giuliani and perhaps former Gov. George E. Pataki moving to seek the Republican nomination. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is also being encouraged to run as an independent.

The attention given to Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama is making fund-raising that much more difficult for other Democrats. While former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina still hopes to tap into a network of supporters among trial lawyers, his former profession, and to build an army of grass-roots donors, strategists for other candidates conceded that raising money would be an uphill battle and said it was an open question whether there was room for more than one alternative to Mrs. Clinton.

"I just got off the phone with someone who said, 'It's between Edwards and Obama,' and with a little nudging I pushed him over to the Obama camp," said Jeh Johnson, a partner at the Paul, Weiss law firm in New York who has been making fund-raising calls on behalf of Mr. Obama.

Mr. Johnson, who was general counsel for the Air Force in the Clinton administration, said younger Democrats and women — crucial parts of Mrs. Clinton's base — were excited about Mr. Obama. "I haven't encountered many New Yorkers who say, 'No, I'm not interested, I'm a Hillary supporter,' " he said.

The competition for supporters — and contributors — extends well beyond New York. And Mr. Obama could complicate Mrs. Clinton's fund-raising efforts in Chicago, another lucrative base for Democrats. In her Senate re-election bid last year, she raised nearly $700,000 from Illinois, her native state.

One Democratic operative, who has knowledge of Mrs. Clinton's fund-raising operation in the Midwest, called donors in Chicago last week after Mr. Obama's announcement, asking whether it would be foolhardy to sign onto the Clinton campaign if he was in the race. While party officials say Mr. Obama will have an advantage in Chicago, they said Mrs. Clinton would still find considerable support there.

While Mr. Obama has never run a national campaign, his political action committee, the Hopefund, has attracted a broad base of contributors from across the country.

In the New York entertainment industry, too, Mr. Obama's candidacy has received raves. Hours after his announcement Tuesday, the Broadway producer Margo Lion sent out an e-mail message urging her friends to donate to him — making clear that the theater community was not locked down by Mrs. Clinton.

"Along with many others in the industry, I will be producing a fund-raiser at the St. James Theater later this spring" for Mr. Obama, Ms. Lion wrote. "We need to find a new direction for our country, and finally, we have the man to do it."

Announcement Sends Race Into High Gear (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's entry into the 2008 presidential contest yesterday set off rounds of e-mail messages and conference calls among both her allies and opponents, some of whom were shaking their heads that a major political event was happening early on a Saturday morning.

Advisers to some of her top 2008 rivals — Senators John McCain and Barack Obama, and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts — replied within minutes to requests for comment, and signaled that the Clinton announcement meant that the 2008 race was truly under way.

"She's tough enough, smart enough and experienced enough to overcome a decidedly liberal philosophy," said John Weaver, a senior adviser to Mr. McCain, who is preparing to seek the Republican presidential nomination.

"The Clinton, Obama, Edwards chain match will be hard to avert my eyes from, speaking as a pure spectator, of course," Mr. Weaver added, referring to former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina. (At least four other Democrats are preparing to campaign as well.)

Clinton advisers said that they chose Jan. 20 as the target date for an announcement during a meeting in mid-December, and that Mrs. Clinton was "raring to go" on Friday.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," Mrs. Clinton said in announcing the formation of a presidential exploratory committee on her Web site, HillaryClinton.com. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them."

DOJ_NMG_0119525

The advisers said she wanted to announce yesterday so that she would dominate the weekend news and Sunday talk shows, and to demonstrate a contrast in leadership with President Bush as he prepares for his State of the Union speech on Tuesday night.

Next weekend, she plans to campaign across Iowa, the site of the first presidential caucuses in January 2008, and visit the early primary state of New Hampshire soon after.

Mrs. Clinton appears at the head of the Democratic pack in many national polls, yet she is in a tighter spot in some voter surveys in Iowa and New Hampshire, which begin the presidential nominating process. Recent polls show Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards doing well in those states.

"She has not spent as much time in those state as in others, but this is a woman who is not a stranger for hard work, and who is prepared to go out and work hard for every vote," said one Clinton adviser, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not want to openly acknowledge that she was running behind to anyone.

Other than Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards, the 2008 Democratic field at this stage also includes Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut; former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa; and Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio. An eighth possible candidate, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, was expected to declare today that he is forming an exploratory committee.

Clinton Joins 2008 Race For President (LAT)

By Stephen Braun, Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton made her long-anticipated entrance Saturday into the 2008 presidential race, aiming to make history as the first woman elected to the White House after an audacious and turbulent political journey from first lady to a New York Senate seat.

"I'm in," she said in a statement accompanying a video airing on her newly unveiled campaign website. "And I'm in to win."

Clinton, 59, long has been viewed by most Democratic insiders as the odds-on favorite to capture her party's presidential nod. But doubts have surrounded her prospects of winning the general election. And of late, her status in the nomination race has become more clouded, in part by the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

She sets out with strong advantages — national name recognition, a command of the major issues, a crack campaign staff and a brimming war chest.

But she will also have to overcome her reputation for political calculation, an inconsistent stump presence and her intimate ties to the polarizing events of her husband's White House tenure, from the collapse of its healthcare initiative in 1994 to the 1998-99 impeachment crisis.

Clinton held back from a formal announcement of her candidacy, taking the preliminary step of forming an exploratory committee. But her campaign quickly kicked into overdrive; a mass e-mail soliciting donations was sent to her vast base of support, and aides made preparations for her to make appearances in the coming days in Iowa and New Hampshire, sites of the crucial early contests in the nominating process.

In her video clip and written statement, Clinton lost no time in confronting two of the major questions that loom as hurdles to her drive for the nomination — how she will reckon with her early support for the war in Iraq and whether wary voters will look beyond the furors of her eight high-profile years as Bill Clinton's influential first lady.

"How do we bring the war in Iraq to the right end?" Clinton asked on the video.

Although she simply raised the question in her announcement, last week she waded more deeply into the intensifying debate over the war by proposing a cap on troop levels in Iraq. That suggestion was spurned by the Bush administration and questioned by some of her own party's antiwar activists as fainthearted.

Up against the GOP

DOJ_NMG_0119526

In a message clearly aimed at Democratic primary voters, Clinton in her statement also declared that she was eminently electable and braced to ward off organized attempts by conservatives and Republican rivals to demonize her past.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," said Clinton, who breezed to reelection in November after easily first winning her Senate seat in 2000.

"After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them," she said.

The final vote in the 2008 election is almost two years away, however, and Clinton must first pass a potentially tough cast of Democratic challengers.

Her entry into the race came five days after a similar move by Obama, whose magnetic appeal and electrifying speeches have quickly positioned him as a threat to her prospects. In his bid to become the first black president, he has added his own historic dimension to the campaign that competes with Clinton's path-breaking effort.

Responding to Clinton's announcement, Obama said: "I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back to work."

What the polls say

A conflicting spate of recent polls suggested Clinton is poised at the top of the field, but they also showed Obama would be a formidable foe in the early contests, as would former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

A Washington Post-ABC News nationwide poll released Saturday of Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents showed Clinton far ahead of the pack. She was backed by 41%, compared with 17% for Obama and 11% for Edwards.

But a survey released last week by pollster John Zogby of likely Democratic voters in the New Hampshire primary showed Obama slightly ahead, with Clinton and Edwards tied.

Already in full campaign mode, Edwards has staked out a strong antiwar position, disavowing his 2002 Senate vote to authorize the Iraq invasion. His aides suggest that Clinton's refusal to do the same could harm her chances among Democratic activists in Iowa and New Hampshire, where sentiment against the war runs high.

In the primary campaign, Clinton can be expected to emphasize her political experience — especially in contrast to Obama, who has been in the Senate barely more than two years, and Edwards, who quit the chamber after one term.

Clinton has established a reputation as a hardworking lawmaker. She secured a seat on the Senate Armed Services Committee and, in the wake of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, concentrated on domestic security issues. She also has sought better benefits for members of the military and focused on improving the economy of upstate New York.

Often taking nuanced stances on hot-button issues, she has made a point of working with conservative Republicans. She joined with Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) — who as a House member had helped prosecute the impeachment case against her husband — in sponsoring legislation designed to aid domestic U.S. manufacturers.

Several Clinton supporters said her decision to announce her presidential intentions Saturday had been planned more than three weeks ago, with a target date carefully slotted to fall after she returned from last week's fact-finding trip to Iraq and Afghanistan and before President Bush's State of the Union speech Tuesday.

Clinton aides said Obama's announcement last Tuesday that he was establishing an exploratory committee was not a key factor in settling on the timing of her statement.

Her move was also carefully coordinated, aides said, so that an intricately designed website would spring to life at the same time the e-mail appeal for money was sent out. As part of the Internet effort, Clinton will take questions from prospective voters during three nightly Web sessions, starting Monday.

"Let's chat," she urged breezily.

Signals to women

Clinton took care in her announcement to send signals to the constituency she and her aides hope will provide her campaign with much of its energy — women eager to send one of their own to the White House for the first time.

Clinton noted her role in working on "family" issues of healthcare and education, and pointedly referred to her 1998 trip to China as first lady "to affirm that women's rights are human rights."

DOJ_NMG_0119527

Deputy campaign spokesman Phil Singer said, "This is a historic candidacy that will energize the largest voting bloc in America — women."

Even before her announcement, Clinton won an important nod from Ellen R. Malcolm, the director of Emily's List, a well-financed Washington political organization that provides support for pro-choice Democratic women running for office.

"Many of us have waited a lifetime for this opportunity," Malcolm said.

Clinton's campaign structure solidified in recent weeks as she debriefed key party officials across the country, hired veteran campaign aides and huddled almost daily with a star-studded circle of advisors that included her husband and many of his former top staffers.

During her 2006 Senate reelection campaign, Clinton invested more than $11 million to amass a list identifying hundreds of thousands of supporters and low-figure donors. Despite spending more than $35 million, Clinton still has $14 million on hand — far outstripping any of her rivals.

To raise the estimated $100 million or more that experts say the major campaigns will need, Clinton also has built a dependable pyramid of wealthy supporters. Her strongest bases are New York's financial center — where she can count on Wall Street heavyweights such as venture capitalist Alan J. Patricof, former Clinton deputy Treasury secretary Roger Altman and investment banker Steven Rattner — and Southern California, where staunch supporters include entertainment industry stalwarts Haim Saban and Sherry Lansing and billionaire businessman Ron Burkle.

"I spoke to her today and told her, 'We're ready to go,' " Saban said Saturday. "I'm awaiting instructions."

A field well set

With Clinton's move into the race — and the expected entry today of New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson — many political observers regard the field of serious Democratic presidential candidates as fairly well set. There is still some talk that former presidential nominees Al Gore and Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts may join the race. But even without them, Democrats will choose from an array of candidates.

Clinton is regarded with wary respect by aides to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), considered by many the early front-runner for the GOP nomination. "People underestimate her at their own political peril," John Weaver, McCain's top political advisor, said Saturday.

Weaver described Clinton as "diligent," a word that only begins to depict the habitual caution and steely preparation of a woman immersed in the minutiae of politics since her teenage years.

Path to the White House

Once a devotee of conservative icon Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Wellesley College and Yale Law School graduate drifted to the left by the early 1970s, working as a House Judiciary committee staffer during the Watergate investigation of President Nixon.

She moved to Arkansas, marrying Bill Clinton (whom she met at law school) and helping steer him toward the state's governorship and then the presidency. During his 1992 campaign against former President George H.W. Bush, Bill Clinton advertised their pairing as a political "twofer." And once in office, he gave his wife an important role in domestic policy, especially on family and children's issues.

But her push for a comprehensive national healthcare policy collapsed and was a factor in the GOP's winning control of Congress in 1994. From then on, the first lady was often on the defensive, dogged by GOP-sponsored investigations into White House travel abuses and an Arkansas land deal; the suicide of her close aide, Vince Foster; and finally, her husband's sexual relationship with intern Monica S. Lewinsky that led to the impeachment proceedings.

At first fiercely supporting her husband when news of the Lewinsky scandal broke, Clinton said they had been targeted by a "vast right-wing conspiracy." But as details of President Clinton's affair emerged, their marriage teetered, she later acknowledged in her autobiography.

2000 Senate victory

Even before her husband's administration officially ended in January 2001, Clinton had made history by winning her Senate seat in the 2000 campaign — becoming the first first lady to gain an elected office.

In the Senate, her delicate dance on Iraq helped her cut a more moderate profile, which could help her in a general election contest. But it remains a potential problem for Democratic primary voters.

DOJ_NMG_0119528

Although she has opposed Bush's troop buildup, she has not set a timetable for withdrawal and remained silent as other Democratic lawmakers have repudiated their vote for the invasion of Iraq.

Dissent from the left has created an opening for some of her rivals, but her commanding lead in fundraising and fame positions her to overcome such criticism.

"She is the 800-pound gorilla in this race," said Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster who is neutral in the primary. "Could [the Iraq issue] cost her something? Yes, but a 600-pound gorilla is still pretty big. Being the front-runner means she can afford to sustain some blows."

"I'm In To Win" White House, Hillary Says (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton -- newly re-elected to the Senate representing the state of New York -- formed a presidential exploratory committee yesterday with hopes of returning to the White House eight years after departing as first lady.

On her campaign Web site, she wrote: "I'm in. And I'm in to win."

"I'm not just starting a campaign, though, I'm beginning a conversation -- with you, with America," she said in a video announcement posted yesterday on the site. "Because we all need to be part of the discussion if we're all going to be part of the solution. And all of us have to be part of the solution."

A front-runner even before she entered the contest, Mrs. Clinton made her announcement just days after Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois said on his Web site that he, too, intends to run for president. New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson is expected to announce his own presidential bid today.

The announcements set up a historic race that will include Mrs. Clinton, who would be the first female president if elected; Mr. Obama, who would be the first black president; and Mr. Richardson, who would become the first Hispanic president.

The Clinton campaign quickly seized upon its front-runner status yesterday by going directly into full-campaign mode, issuing statements and updates throughout the day.

"Demonstrating the ground-swell of enthusiasm generated by her historic candidacy, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's announcement for president lit up the Internet today, garnering rave reviews in the blogosphere and thousands of supporters flocking to her Web site each hour," the campaign reported yesterday afternoon.

The air of inevitability that Mrs. Clinton will receive the Democratic nomination is crucial for fundraising, an art that Mrs. Clinton already has mastered. She has more than $14 million in her campaign account after spending more than $30 million in a decisive victory over her underfunded Republican challenger in November's election.

In another announcement yesterday, the Clinton campaign touted the latest poll conducted by The Washington Post and ABC News showing Mrs. Clinton with a commanding lead over the entire field of potential Democratic hopefuls.

Mrs. Clinton garnered 41 percent among Democrats; Mr. Obama took 17 percent; and former Sen. John Edwards, the North Carolina Democrat who was his party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, netted 11 percent. Former Vice President Al Gore garnered 10 percent, and Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, drew 8 percent. No other potential candidates earned more than 3 percent.

The poll, conducted last week among 561 Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents, shows virtually no change from last month, suggesting that the intense buzz surrounding Mr. Obama's candidacy has had little real impact.

Mr. Obama issued a statement welcoming Mrs. Clinton to the contest.

"Senator Clinton is a good friend and a colleague whom I greatly respect," he said. "I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track."

In her announcement, Mrs. Clinton laid out several key issues she hopes to address in her campaign, leading with an attempt to disarm one of the most explosive obstacles in her path to the nomination: her 2002 vote authorizing the war in Iraq.

"Let's talk about how to bring the right end to the war in Iraq and to restore respect for America around the world," she said, seated on a sofa beside a large cushion embroidered with a floral pattern.

DOJ_NMG_0119529

Mrs. Clinton also mentioned her hope for energy independence, an "end to the deficits that threaten Social Security and Medicare," and "how every American can have quality, affordable health care."

Mrs. Clinton also tried tapping into the general exhaustion over the current administration.

"You know, after six years of George Bush, it is time to renew the promise of America," she said.

Also announcing his presidential intentions yesterday was Sen. Sam Brownback, the Kansas Republican whose staunch pro-life positions have endeared him to many Christian conservatives.

Last week, Mr. Brownback offered a bleak assessment of the Iraq war and said he opposes Mr. Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq. But in his announcement address yesterday, he sounded a more optimistic tone.

"It is a long fight. We will win," he told an audience in his hometown of Topeka. "We cannot lose our will to win. We must win to redeem our troops' sacrifice."

The Washington Post/ABC poll showed Mr. Brownback lingering at the back of the pack, with about 1 percent support from Republicans.

Leading the Republican field was former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani with 34 percent, followed by Sen. John McCain of Arizona with 27 percent. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich each garnered 9 percent.

The survey of Democrats had a margin of error of 4 percentage points. The survey of Republicans had a margin of error of 5 percentage points.

Clinton Joins Race: "I'm In To Win" (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, January 21, 2007

NEW YORK – Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton launched a trailblazing campaign for the White House on Saturday, a former first lady turned political powerhouse intent on becoming the first female president.

"I'm in. And I'm in to win," she said.

In a videotaped message posted on her Web site, Mrs. Clinton said she was eager to start a dialogue with voters about challenges she hoped to tackle as president – affordable health care, deficit reduction and bringing the "right" end to the Iraq war.

"I'm not just starting a campaign, though, I'm beginning a conversation with you, with America," she said. "Let's talk. Let's chat. The conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think?"

Mrs. Clinton's announcement, while widely anticipated, was nonetheless historic in a fast-developing race that has already seen the emergence of a formidable contender, Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

In an instant, Mrs. Clinton became the most credible female candidate ever to seek the presidency and the first presidential spouse to attempt to return to the White House in her own right. Her husband, Bill, served two terms as president from 1993 to 2001.

With her immense star power, vast network of supporters and donors and seasoned team of political advisers, the 59-year-old Mrs. Clinton long has topped every national poll of potential Democratic contenders.

"The front-runner has just stepped on the stage," observed Charlie Cook, the nonpartisan political analyst and author of the authoritative Cook Political Report.

Pressure to decide

But since joining the field, Mr. Obama has secured the backing of a number of prominent fundraisers, including billionaire philanthropist George Soros, stepping up the pressure on Mrs. Clinton to disclose her plans.

Her controversial tenure as first lady left her a deeply polarizing figure among voters, leading many Democrats to doubt Mrs. Clinton's viability in a general election.

In a detailed statement posted on her Web site, Mrs. Clinton sought to acknowledge and bat away such doubts.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," she wrote. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate and how to beat them."

DOJ_NMG_0119530

Recently, Mrs. Clinton has clashed with many in her own party over the Iraq war.

Mrs. Clinton supported the 2002 resolution authorizing military intervention in Iraq. She has refused to recant her vote or call for a deadline for the removal of troops. She has announced her opposition to President Bush's troop increase in Iraq and has introduced legislation capping troop levels.

"A woman candidate could find it easier to run in peacetime, rather than wartime, but Senator Clinton's tried to position herself as a serious person on national security," said Andrew Polsky, a presidential historian at Hunter College. "But that means she's staked out a difficult position on the war that won't make it easy for her to get the Democratic nomination."

With a $14 million campaign treasury, Mrs. Clinton starts with an impressive fundraising advantage over the rest of the Democratic field. But Mr. Obama and others have started to secure fundraising commitments from New York, California and other deep-pocketed, Clinton-friendly areas.

Her creation of a presidential exploratory committee, announced Saturday, allows her to raise money for the campaign; she already has lined up campaign staff.

In tone and substance, Mrs. Clinton's videotaped announcement recalled her first Senate race in New York in 2000, where she conducted a "listening tour" of the state's 62 counties before formally entering the contest.

She promised a three-day series of Web chats with voters beginning Monday and prepared a campaign swing late this coming week through the early caucusing state of Iowa, while a visit to New Hampshire was in the works.

Today, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson was also set to enter the Democratic field; if elected, he would be the first Hispanic president.

John Edwards of North Carolina and several other veteran politicians are also running.

Outsize candidacies

The sizable field of candidates underscores the belief that, for all of Mrs. Clinton's experience and credentials, there are Democrats who question whether she can win a general election.

For the short term at least, the outsize candidacies of Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama are expected to soak up the lion's share of attention.

Mr. Obama, who launched his own presidential committee on Tuesday, praised Mrs. Clinton as a friend and colleague.

"I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track," he said in a statement.

An influential player in her husband's political career in Arkansas, Mrs. Clinton leapt to the national scene during the 1992 presidential campaign when husband and wife fought to survive the scandal over Gennifer Flowers' allegations of a lengthy affair with Mr. Clinton when he was the state's governor.

As first lady, Mrs. Clinton headed up a disastrous first-term effort to overhaul the health care insurance system. There was more controversy as the couple battled allegations of impropriety over land deals and fundraising, missing records from her former Arkansas law firm and even her quick and hefty profits from an investment in cattle futures.

There was no letup in the second term. The president found himself denying – then admitting – a sexual relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. As he battled impeachment and possible removal from office, his wife's poll numbers rose.

Her own political career began to take shape in late 1998 when New York Democrat Daniel Patrick Moynihan announced he would not seek re-election to the Senate seat he had held since 1976 and she decided to run.

The campaign trail was not always friendly. For almost every cheer, there was a shouted "Go home, Hillary!" and the emerging Republican theme that carpetbagger Clinton simply wanted to use New York as a launching pad for a later presidential run.

Republicans Party Over Prospect Of Her As Nominee (NYDN)

By Thomas M. DeFrank

New York Daily News, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - She's hardly a pushover, but top Republican leaders think Hillary Clinton's candidacy is a dream come true.

DOJ_NMG_0119531

GOP strategists aren't silly enough to discount Clinton's impressive assets: rock-star appeal, enormous name recognition, a five-star political machine, bulging treasury and a trailblazer pedigree that will drive millions of proud women to the polls.

"Make no mistake about it, she will be the Democrat nominee and she can absolutely be elected President," one of President Bush's closest political confidants said yesterday.

Indeed, the standard line, heard from party leaders on down to precinct chairmen, is that the junior senator from New York is an exceedingly formidable opponent.

"I think she could win," Vice President Cheney said last October. "I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for President."

Even so, Republicans have been lying in wait for Clinton for months, honing their attack strategy and hoping those leaks from Democratic tacticians worried about Hillary's - and her husband's - political baggage wouldn't derail the senator's outsize ambitions.

Now that she's in to stay, Republicans know they're facing a huge, nasty brawl to hang onto the White House next year. But many party elders believe she can be had.

"She's the one Democrat capable of uniting and galvanizing every person in our party, even the ones mad at Bush," a senior GOP election strategist said recently.

Republicans say Hillary loses in the end for these factors:

The country wants the uniter, not a divider that Bush promised but wasn't - and Hillary is the most turbocharged polarizer on the planet.

Voters still aren't ready for a female President, but they're embarrassed to admit their bias to pollsters, so Hillary's numbers are inflated.

Elections are won in the middle, and Hillary is Ted Kennedy in a pantsuit. "She can zig and zag all she wants," a senior GOP planner said yesterday, "but she will never convince anyone she's anything but an oldfashioned liberal."

She and Bill Clinton's complicated personal life is the kind of below-the-radar drag that never goes away, no matter how many times Hillary scoffs at what she calls "mythology."

Still, Hillary is a powerhouse of a candidate, and beating her won't be easy. "You are going to see the roughest, most hard-fought election in the history of America," another senior GOP strategist predicted, "and it will come down to one state or two."

Hillary Clinton Eyes Presidency (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON—Calling for a national conversation to undo what she sees as the damage wrought by President Bush, Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York launched her presidential campaign Saturday with a polished videotaped announcement, making history as the only former first lady to run for the nation's highest office.

"The frontrunner has just stepped on the stage," observed Charlie Cook, the non-partisan political analyst and author of the authoritative Cook Political Report.

With massive resources and a worldwide profile, she instantly became the most serious woman candidate ever to run for president. Her decision to form an exploratory committee for president is expected to swamp many of the other Democratic candidates as they hunt for money, organization and voter support that she has already locked up during years of preparation.

Still, Clinton faces many serious challenges. She has an image as divisive and polarizing; she made grave mistakes in taking the lead on trying to remake the health care system in the 1990s; and she has been considered slow to renounce her vote to go to war in Iraq, a touchstone issue for party activists who dominate the nominatng process.

Nevertheless, Clinton, who grew up in Park Ridge, made clear that her campaign is no mere symbol or quixotic venture.

"I'm in it," she said. "I'm in to win."

"This is the first woman in our history who will be taken seriously by everyone," said Ruth Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University.

DOJ_NMG_0119532

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) announced his intention to run for president last Tuesday, creating his own wave of excitement about the historic nature of an African-American candidate for president. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina is running, too, with a focus on eradicating poverty. And New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who would be the first Latino to run for the White House, is expected to announce his candidacy Sunday.

"For all the excitement and focus on Obama, she's the one who almost has Obama and Edwards lapped in terms of poll numbers and very likely money," said Cook.

A new ABC-Washington Post poll showed Clinton leading Obama 41-17 among Democratic-leaning voters. Edwards received 11 percent support, while former Vice President Al Gore got 10 percent and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry received 8 percent. Neither Gore nor Kerry, the 2004 nominee, has said he is running for president in 2008.

Obama welcomed Clinton and other candidates into the race Saturday "as allies in the work of getting our country back on track."

Clinton struck just that theme in her announcement on her Web site, www.hillaryclinton.com.

"I want you to join me not just for the campaign but for a conversation about the future of our country—about the bold but practical changes we need to overcome six years of Bush administration failures," said Clinton, a New York senator since 2001 and first lady for eight years beginning in 1993.

Marking the growing importance of the Internet to political campaigns, Clinton asked voters to join her in a series of Web chats over three days beginning Monday at 7 p.m. to discuss the future of the nation. It is the virtual equivalent of the listening tours Clinton took throughout New York as she ran for Senate as a non-New Yorker.

"This is a big election with some very big questions," said Clinton, sitting on her living room couch in a warm red blazer. "How do we bring the war in Iraq to the right end? How can we make sure every American has access to adequate health care? How will we ensure our children inherit a clean environment and energy independence? How can we reduce the deficits that threaten Social Security and Medicare?"

She used her video announcement to introduce herself, but also to let voters know she believes she is tough enough to win, whatever attacks may come her way.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," said Clinton, who coined the phrase "vast, right-wing conspiracy" to denounce critics of her husband's presidential administration.

"After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them," she said.

Clinton has been elected easily in New York and won praise for her constituent services. In the Senate, she has worked with Republicans and has modulated her position on abortion, while continuing to favor abortion rights.

Emily's List, the nation's largest political action committee, immediately endorsed Clinton, pledging to raise as much money for her as possible from its 100,000 members. The PAC is dedicated to electing women candidates who support abortion rights.

"She's been through the fires of the political wars and has shown that she's tough and doesn't rattle and can stay focused and be effective," said Ellen Malcolm, president of Emily's List. "Women across the country are going to be excited and energized and wanting to help elect the first woman president."

Clinton is making history in more than one way. She is the first woman to run who would be trying to win the same high office once held by her husband, former President Bill Clinton. And she is the first woman to run for president who is considered credible enough to win.

In recent history, Elizabeth Dole—now a North Carolina senator—ran for president in 2000 in the Republican primary, but she never gained traction and dropped out of the race early. In 1987, former Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.) ran for president, but failed to mount a serious campaign.

Expectations for Clinton, however, are far different given her longstanding political connections and her ability to raise money. She already has a campaign staff in place.

"She's been preparing for a long time, she has the experience, the background, knowledge, the ambition, the organization," said Mandel.

DOJ_NMG_0119533

Still, top-tier candidates in the past have been unable to convert their charisma or their cash-on-hand into the votes required to win.

"There's something that can trip up any candidate, you never know," said Mandel.

For now, one of Clinton's biggest challenges may come from Obama, who has generated excitement among voters almost everywhere he goes. He's also drawn high-powered fundraising support from billionaire George Soros and lavish words of praise from talk-show host Oprah Winfrey.

But Obama has never been through a rigorous campaign, nor has he experienced the roughness of a presidential race as Clinton has.

"I think he's going to have a very, very hard time beating her," Cook said. "What you've got is a boxer from the YMCA level going into the world championship fight. He's never taken a punch, he's never had a tough race."

Clinton Gives Her Answer To Voters: I'm In (BOS)

By Susan Milligan

The Boston Globe, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, hounded for months with questions about her presidential ambitions, gave a two-word answer yesterday to voters: "I'm in."

In an Internet video statement, the New York Democrat and former first lady said she would be forming an exploratory committee to determine whether she will become a formal candidate for the Democratic nomination in 2008, the first step in launching a full-scale campaign.

"You know, after six years of George Bush, it is time to renew the promise of America -- our basic bargain that no matter who you are or where you live, if you work hard and play by the rules, you can build a good life for yourself and your family," Clinton said, addressing voters alone, with no sign of her husband, former president Bill Clinton.

Seated on a living room couch and speaking as though she were addressing a small gathering instead of millions of voters, Clinton promised to begin a "conversation" with Americans to solicit views on how to end the war in Iraq and deal with issues including energy independence, health care, and the federal deficit.

The tactic mirrors the "listening tour" Clinton took of New York State before her successful campaign for the US Senate seat in 2000. Clinton's nonstop travel to small towns around the state has been credited with winning over an initially skeptical upstate New York and delivering her the US Senate seat.

"So let's talk. Let's chat. Let's start a dialogue about your ideas and mine," Clinton said, gesticulating casually with her hands on a website that refers to the US senator by her first name. "Because the conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think? And we can all see how well that works."

The second-term senator joins a crowded pack of Democrats seeking the nomination, including several current and former colleagues. Her biggest threats, according to public opinion polls and political polls, are charismatic Illinois Senator Barack Obama and John Edwards , former North Carolina senator, who has been leading an antipoverty center since his unsuccessful run for the vice presidency in 2004.

Antiwar Democrats have complained Clinton has never categorically renounced her 2002 vote for the use of force in Iraq, as other candidates have done. Clinton last week laid out a plan for phased withdrawal of troops from Iraq.

Clinton, 59, has major advantages in fund-raising ability, name recognition, and the historic quality of her candidacy, one of the few launched by a woman for the White House. But both Obama, a newcomer whose message of unity has electrified crowds in his early campaign, and Edwards, an antiwar candidate who has highlighted the plight of the working poor, are strong rivals, analysts say.

"She's the national front-runner, but she's not the runaway favorite anymore," said John Zogby , a pollster in upstate New York. "She's running against Jack Kennedy and Bobby Kennedy," he said, referring to Edwards and Obama.

Also running among Democrats are Senators Joseph Biden of Delaware and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, Representative Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, and Tom Vilsack, former Iowa governor. Governor Bill Richardson of New Mexico is scheduled to announce his plans today , while Senator John F. Kerry , Democrat of Massachusetts, is expected to reveal his intentions soon.

DOJ_NMG_0119534

Senator Sam Brownback , a Kansas Republican, announced yesterday that he will seek the GOP nomination. Brownback, one of the most prominent antiabortion lawmakers in Congress, is competing against Mitt Romney , former Massachusetts governor, for the social conservative vote.

Clinton is scheduled to make a public appearance in New York today, and said she will participate in online video chats during the week starting tomorrow.

Obama, who also used a video Web format to announce his exploratory committee last week, said he welcomed Clinton into the race. "Senator Clinton is a good friend and a colleague whom I greatly respect. I welcome her and all the candidates , not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track," Obama said in a statement.

Long expected by both supporters and critics, Clinton's announcement yesterday captured an immediate endorsement from EMILY's List , an influential group that raises funds for Democratic women who are abortion rights activists . It was the group's first-ever presidential endorsement.

"I think some people had worries and concerns anticipating the run, but now that it's begun, there's a tremendous sense of excitement," said Ellen Malcolm , president of EMILY's List. "I think there's no question women will be tremendously excited about electing the first woman president."

The New York senator brings an impressive resume to the race, and has a vast network of political supporters and donors. Her political career has blossomed since 1992, when she was derided by some for saying, "I suppose I could have stayed home and baked cookies and had teas," but instead pursued a career in law while her husband was in the Arkansas governor's mansion.

As first lady, Clinton headed a health care task force that ultimately ended in a political debacle for both Clintons, with the plan rejected on Capitol Hill. After a painful public examination of her marriage after Bill Clinton's affair with former intern Monica Lewinsky was revealed, Hillary Rodham Clinton rallied in 2000, persuading New York voters to send an Illinois native and former Arkansas first lady to the US Senate.

In the Senate, Clinton has drawn respect from both parties for her knowledge and hard work. But she remains a divisive figure nationwide, a factor political consultants and pollsters say is her biggest early hurdle to capturing the Democratic nomination.

"There are people who might be looking for a change, who might not be comfortable with a Bush-Clinton-Bush-Clinton sequence" in the White House," said Lee Miringoff , director of the Marist Institute for Public Opinion in Poughkeepsie, N.Y. A recent Marist poll showed that 47 percent of American voters would never vote for Clinton, and "that doesn't leave a lot of room for error," Miringoff said.

Zogby -- whose polling last week showed Clinton trailing Obama in New Hampshire, site of the first primary, and behind Edwards in Iowa, the location of the first Democratic caucuses -- said Clinton looked "feminine enough, commanding enough, and smart enough" in her video. But he and other Democrats said Clinton must now assure the party that she is electable.

"She's got to prove to Democrats first that she is a winner," said Peter Fenn , a Washington-based Democratic consultant. "She's got to convince the people who like her, like what she stands for, who like the idea of a Clinton presidency, but are reluctant to go on the bandwagon because they're not sure she can win."

While other candidates, like Obama, are trying to become better known nationally, Clinton must counter negative impressions held by voters who have never seen her in person or heard her speak on issues -- a challenge Clinton has acknowledged.

"You may think you know about me, but I may be the most famous person you know very little about," Clinton said during a National Public Radio interview last month. "I'd like to make sure the record is clear and then people can make their own judgments."

Clinton Announces 2008 Presidential Bid (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

DOJ_NMG_0119535

Newsday, January 21, 2007

"I'm in. And I'm in to win."

With these words, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton Saturday launched a historic and hyped bid for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, a first step toward her goal of becoming the nation's first female commander in chief.

In a conversational two-minute video filmed in the parlor of White Haven, her Washington mansion, the former first lady announced a presidential exploratory committee -- then quickly added that she won't just be exploring, she's actually running.

Wasting little time, Clinton is traveling to Iowa next weekend, her first trip to an early primary or caucus state and, to some extent, an act of political self-preservation. She's currently running fourth among Iowa's liberal Democratic voters behind Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, former vice presidential candidate John Edwards and ex-Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

Clinton is likely to visit New Hampshire in the next several weeks, according to people familiar with her plans.

"As we campaign to win the White House, we will make history and remake our future," Clinton, 59, said in a statement posted along with the video on HillaryClinton.com. "This campaign is our moment, our chance to stand up for the principles and values that we cherish."

Receptionists at HILL PAC, the senator's sprawling Washington-based political action committee, began answering the phones "Hillary for president" Saturday.

Clinton, who has been criticized by many in the party's left wing for voting to authorize the Iraq war in October 2002, said she would use the campaign to "talk about how to bring the right end to the war in Iraq and to restore respect for America around the world."

The video was recorded last Wednesday, a day after Obama aired a similar video announcing his own exploratory committee on his campaign site, BarackObama.com. In that statement, Obama didn't go as far as Clinton, saying he'd announce his final plans Feb. 10.

Clinton's timing had nothing to do with Obama's announcement, staffers said. But it did come just in time to be discussed on the national Sunday morning news shows.

Still, Clinton's entry into the race comes as her sheen of inevitability has been stripped away by Obama and Edwards, who are battling her for big-money donors and leverage with interest groups, especially unions.

Saturday was the latest leg of what has surely been one of the longest, strangest trips in modern politics.

Born to a middle-class family in Chicago, Clinton achieved national renown as an anti-Vietnam activist at Wellesley College in the late 1960s and then as a student leader at Yale University Law School, where she met Bill Clinton.

Following a stint as a congressional lawyer on the Watergate committee, she married Clinton and served as first lady of Arkansas while moonlighting as a Rose Law Firm partner, Legal Services Corporation official and children's rights activist.

In 2000, after eight tumultuous years in the White House that included her failed health care reform attempt, she was elected to fill the New York Senate seat vacated by Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

Clinton was re-elected last year by a landslide, spending more than $50 million, much of it to develop a direct-mail and donor database that will be used for her presidential run.

She still has about $14 million in the bank. Clinton's fearsome fundraising operation, arguably the best of its kind in either party, will be officially back in business next week to raise the $75 million to $100 million she'll need for the primaries.

Clinton is the last of the major 2008 contenders to create an exploratory committee, a step already taken by Obama, Edwards, and Republicans John McCain and Rudolph Giuliani.

N.Y. Dems Cheer Clinton Announcement, GOP Says, "We Told You So" (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — Democrats in New York offered up whoopees while Republicans had scolding "we-told-you-so" reminders Saturday in the wake of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's entry into the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0119536

"She understands the enormous challenges that America faces and she's going to make a great president," former state Democratic Party Chairwoman Judith Hope, who is close to both Clintons, told The Associated Press just minutes after New York's junior senator launched her website announcement.

"I think it's an exciting moment in history for New York women, for American women and, in fact, for women around the world," added Hope, who heads "Eleanor's Legacy," a New York-based political action committee named for former first lady Eleanor Roosevelt and dedicated to advancing the political careers of women candidates.

But John Spencer, the former Yonkers mayor who was crushed by Clinton as she won a second Senate term in November, said the announcement came as no surprise and simply proved what he had complained about throughout their campaign — that New York would have an "absentee senator."

"Senator Clinton is not going to be in New York," he told the AP on Saturday when reached at his Yonkers home. "She's going to be in New Hampshire and Iowa and South Carolina and fighting with (Democratic presidential candidate rival) Barack Obama and others, and that takes away from the everyday needs of New Yorkers."

"Mrs. Clinton running for president, now there's a new story," former state GOP Chairman Stephen Minarik told the AP. "Mrs. Clinton should be embarrassed by her deceptive game she played out on New York voters last year."

In fact, during the campaign against Spencer, Clinton had said she realized there was a lot of talk about her possibly running for president and said if that bothered people they should take it into consideration when they voted. Unlike her first campaign for Senate in 2000, Clinton refused during her 2006 race to rule out a presidential run.

Hope, whose father was a two-term speaker of the Arkansas House of Representatives before Bill Clinton became governor there, said that while Sen. Clinton faced "a real contest' for the Democratic nomination, "she's got to give this a try and I think she will win the nomination."

With the nomination in hand, Hope predicted a general election victory in 2008 for Clinton based on her successful strategy in New York of reaching out to more conservative voters.

"She will confound her critics," Hope said. "She will win some of them over, as she did in New York, and the others she will simply leave in the dust."

Republican Spencer said he agreed with Hope that Clinton would win the Democratic nomination and thought that was a good thing.

"I hope she is the presidential candidate because I think she is easily beaten," Spencer said. "I know she's put the mask on in New York and she's pulled the wool over the people of New York's eyes, but she's a very, very liberal Democrat."

While GOP leaders in Clinton's adopted state — she only moved to New York in 1999 — were critical, New York Democrats were praising Clinton as someone who could become the first New Yorker to win the White House since Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

"Few candidates come with a better preparation and stronger base of support than Hillary," said New York's new Democratic governor, Eliot Spitzer, after receiving a Saturday morning call from Clinton during which they talked about her plans.

"Hillary has done a superb job both campaigning and serving the people of New York, and she'll do an even better job as president," said New York's senior senator, fellow Democrat Charles Schumer.

"She won over New Yorkers from every part of our state and we know she'll do the same across the country," said David Pollak, a current co-chairman of the state party.

"Senator Clinton has been a fabulous senator for us and will be an incredible president," said state Assemblyman Herman Farrell, who just resigned as state party chairman.

Hope said Clinton would be helped by the experience she and her husband gained during his two successful campaigns for the White House.

Asked about concerns that a new Clinton candidacy would resurrect the scandals that dogged Bill Clinton's presidential tenure, Hope said, "It raises a lot of issues, including that fact that under Bill Clinton this country was prosperous and peaceful and Americans were doing very well. That is, of course, what I would concentrate on."

Candidate Clinton Faces Tough Battle For Nation's Favor (SFC)

DOJ_NMG_0119537

By Carla Marinucci, John Wildermuth

San Francisco Chronicle, January 21, 2007

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's leap into the 2008 presidential race Saturday sets up a high-priced, high-profile political melee that could make California, working to move its primary up to February, the decisive contest in the campaign for the Democratic nomination.

"I'm in. And I'm in to win," was the simple announcement Clinton posted on her campaign Web site Saturday morning. The long-expected announcement was a low-key opening to her historic effort to become the country's first female president and return to the White House where she spent eight years as first lady.

In a video aimed at her supporters across the nation, the former first lady said that she was forming an exploratory committee for a presidential run, although she made it clear she wasn't just testing the waters.

"I want you to join me not just for the campaign, but for a conversation about the future of our country," she said. "And I am forming my exploratory committee because I believe that together we can bring the leadership that this country needs."

Clinton's announcement probably will cement her spot as the front-runner in the scramble for the Democratic presidential nomination, both in California and across the nation. In a national Gallup Poll taken last week, 29 percent of Democrats and Democrat-leaning independents said they would be most likely to vote for Clinton in 2008, compared with 18 percent who backed Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who announced his own exploratory committee last week. Obama is an African American newcomer with enormous appeal to many Democrats.

The poll also showed Clinton easily winning a head-to-head matchup with Obama, 53 percent to 39 percent.

In California, where 58 percent of Democrats are women, Clinton has "a built-in advantage" among primary voters, said pollster Mark Baldassare, director of the Public Policy Institute of California. Baldassare, however, also noted that Clinton is not the current favorite in polls for Iowa and New Hampshire, the two states that traditionally open the 2008 primary season.

For years, some party strategists have quietly suggested that while Clinton's wild popularity among rank-and-file Democrats is enough to take the party nomination, she is too polarizing a figure to win a national election. They worry that all the scandals, complaints and gossip surrounding Bill Clinton's presidential years will take on new life if Hillary Clinton becomes the Democratic nominee.

"Hillary is no surprise. She's the front-runner in money," said Bruce Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at UC Berkeley. "But there isn't a Democratic group I've spoken to that isn't nervous about her. There is a real fear that her baggage will divert the campaign."

Clinton's efforts in recent years to become a more centrist Democrat also have brought her problems with the left wing of her party, especially with those most opposed to the war in Iraq.

"If Hillary Clinton is in the California primary, it becomes a tough contest" between her and Obama, said Phil Trounstine of the Survey and Policy Research Institute at San Jose State University. "Obama's stance against the war, and Hillary's (past vote) for it, could be her Achilles' heel in California."

Clinton faced many of those concerns in her announcement Saturday, talking about the need to bring the war "to the right end" and warning Republicans and Democrats that she's ready for a fight.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," she said in her video statement. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them."

Beating the other Democrats in the race is the first order of business, though. Besides Obama, six other Democrats already have entered the presidential derby and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson is expected to announce his own exploratory committee today.

"Hillary and Barack are the two front-runners ... and the problem for Hillary is that all the activists will flock to (him)," said Katie Merrill, a Democratic strategist. "People who have never been involved in a campaign have read his book ('The Audacity of Hope') and want to walk door to door for him."

Clinton has undeniable strengths, including $14 million in the bank, a battle-tested campaign organization, and more experience on the national scene.

DOJ_NMG_0119538

But the 45-year-old Obama "has created a wave that is compelling," Merrill said, and against his fresh face, Clinton, 59, could find herself labeled -- and dismissed -- as the establishment candidate.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and a number of Democrats in the Legislature only last week started a new drive to move California's primary from its traditional slot in June -- months after many other states have conducted their primaries -- to the first week in February.

Republican strategist Matthew Dowd, who helped shape the Bush-Cheney 2004 campaign victory, said such a move would fundamentally alter the Democratic primary race.

"That will move California from being a vacuum for money to a place where (candidates) can appeal to a lot of voters," he said. "It will put a premium on the ability to get media attention -- and whoever has that ability" has an advantage.

In California, where Schwarzenegger was able to win office with virtually no electoral experience, voters may be far more open to a newcomer like Obama, Dowd said.

"This year's election, for both parties, was about the next generation of politics," he said. "Barack Obama represents a new language, the next generation ... and (Clinton) is a little bit of yesterday's news."

The proposed shift in the California primary date represents a potentially huge change in the 2008 race, Baldassare agreed.

"If Schwarzenegger is able to move up the California primary, it becomes the de facto national primary -- a heavyweight battle," he said.

A February primary in California instantly becomes more influential, because its diversity makes it "a microcosm of the national population," something that New Hampshire, Iowa, Nevada and many of the other early primary and caucus states aren't, said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst and senior scholar at the University of Southern California.

The question, though, is exactly who would benefit if the state moves its presidential primary to February. Campaigning in a sprawling state like California takes lots of time and even more money, especially with the $1 million to $2 million-a-week cost of the type of TV ad campaign it typically takes to win in the state.

While Obama has started to build a fundraising organization in California and across the nation, Clinton has had years to work the state and make contacts with the financial and political movers and shakers.

Clinton has "accelerated the time frame" with her declaration, said Bill Carrick, a veteran Democratic consultant, which pressures all the candidates to get organized almost a year before the Jan. 14, 2008, New Hampshire primary.

"California is bigger and more open-minded than most other states, (which) gives a chance for somebody to walk in, like a Barack Obama," being a nontraditional fresh candidate, Carrick said. But because of the size of the state and its diverse population, "name ID and money will be a big thing, and Hillary has both of those."

Those longtime ties Clinton and her husband have in California also could make a difference come election day.

"Hillary Clinton is a very strong candidate in California," a state that was a strong backer of Bill Clinton, said Susan Kennedy, Schwarzenegger's chief of staff and the head of the Democratic Party's coordinated campaign effort in California in 1992, when Clinton was first elected president.

"These are loyal Clinton Democrats in California, where the center of gravity for Democrats is in the San Francisco Bay Area and Los Angeles," Kennedy said. "She has a strong base in both regions."

California Considers Moving Primary To February (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif., Jan. 20 (AP) — California is considering moving up the date of its presidential primary in hope of gaining more clout in picking White House nominees.

State Senator Ron Calderon said Friday that he planned to introduce a bill on Monday that would move the primary from June to February, making it one of the earliest in the country.

“California is the biggest and most influential state in the union, yet our current June presidential primary virtually ensures that the nominees will be determined long before our voters cast their ballots,” Mr. Calderon, the chairman of the Senate elections committee, said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0119539

A similar bill was introduced in the Assembly on Thursday.

California, which has 55 electoral votes, has traditionally held its primary elections in June. But in 1996, it began experimenting with a March primary in hopes of giving its voters a bigger say in determining who wins the White House.

Other states moved up their primaries and caucuses, as well. By the time California's elections were held, the nominations were locked up.

In 2004, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation moving the primary back to June.

But Mr. Schwarzenegger said this week that he would support a move to February, complaining that presidential candidates only visited California to raise campaign donations.

"We're kind of an afterthought when it comes to the presidential campaign," he told the Sacramento Press Club. "I mean, all those guys come out here, and they clean up, and they take the money and run. Millions and millions and millions of dollars — both parties."

If the legislation passes, the election would be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in February.

Clinton: "I'm In To Win" White House (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, January 20, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) - Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton launched a trailblazing campaign for the White House on Saturday, a former first lady turned political powerhouse intent on becoming the first female president. "I'm in, and I'm in to win," she said.

In a videotaped message posted on her Web site, Clinton said she was eager to start a dialogue with voters about challenges she hoped to tackle as president - affordable health care, deficit reduction and bringing the "right" end to the Iraq war.

"I'm not just starting a campaign, though, I'm beginning a conversation with you, with America," she said. "Let's talk. Let's chat. The conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think?"

Clinton's announcement, while widely anticipated, was nonetheless historic in a fast-developing campaign that has already seen the emergence of a formidable black contender, Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

(AP) Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton greets fans in New York, in this Dec. 18, 2006, file photo. Democratic...

Full ImageIn an instant, Clinton became the most credible female candidate ever to seek the presidency and the first presidential spouse to attempt to return to the White House in her own right. Her husband, Bill, served two terms as president from 1993 to 2001.

"I am one of the millions of women who have waited all their lives to see the first woman sworn in as president of the United States - and now we have our best opportunity to see that dream fulfilled," said Ellen Malcolm, president of EMILY's list, which raises money for Democratic women who run for office.

With her immense star power, vast network of supporters and donors and seasoned team of political advisers, the 59-year-old Clinton long has topped every national poll of potential Democratic contenders.

But since joining the field, Obama has secured the backing of a number of prominent fundraisers, including billionaire philanthropist George Soros, stepping up the pressure on Clinton to disclose her plans.

Her controversial tenure as first lady left her a deeply polarizing figure among voters, leading many Democrats to doubt Clinton's viability in a general election.

(AP) U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., reacts to applause before addressing the Association for...

Full ImageIn a detailed statement posted on her Web site, Clinton sought to acknowledge and bat away such doubts.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," she wrote. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate and how to beat them."

Recently, Clinton has clashed with many in her own party over the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0119540

Clinton supported the 2002 resolution authorizing military intervention in Iraq. She has refused to recant her vote or call for a deadline for the removal of troops. She has announced her opposition to President Bush's troop increase in Iraq and has introduced legislation capping troop levels.

"A woman candidate could find it easier to run in peacetime, rather than wartime, but Senator Clinton's tried to position herself as a serious person on national security," said Andrew Polsky, a presidential historian at Hunter College. "But that means she's staked out difficult position on the war that won't make it easy for her to get the Democratic nomination."

(AP) Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-NY, talks about her trip to Iraq during Capitol Hill news conference...

Full ImageWith a $14 million campaign treasury, Clinton starts with an impressive fundraising advantage over the rest of the Democratic field. But Obama and others have started to secure fundraising commitments from New York, California and other deep-pocketed, Clinton-friendly areas.

Her creation of a presidential exploratory committee, announced Saturday, allows her to raise money for the campaign; she already has lined up campaign staff.

In tone and substance, Clinton's videotaped announcement recalled her first Senate race in New York in 2000, where she conducted a "listening tour" of the state's 62 counties before formally entering the contest.

She promised a three-day series of Web chats with voters beginning Monday and prepared a campaign swing late this coming week through the early voting state of Iowa, while a visit to New Hampshire was in the works.

On Sunday, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson was also set to enter the Democratic field; if elected, he would be the first Hispanic president.

(AP) Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-NY, listens to speakers, in this Dec. 21, 2006, file photo in New York. In...

Full ImageFor the short term at least, the outsized candidacies of Clinton and Obama were expected to soak up the lion's share of attention.

Obama, who launched his own presidential committee on Tuesday, praised Clinton as a friend and colleague.

"I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track," he said in a statement.

Campaigning in New Hampshire, Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd did not comment specifically on Clinton's announcement, but said: "I'm not one for exploratory committees. You're in or you're not."

Other Democratic contenders include former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack; Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice-presidential nominee. Delaware Sen. Joe Biden has said he will run and planned to formalize his intentions soon. Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 standard bearer, is also contemplating another run.

An influential player in her husband's political career in Arkansas, Hillary Clinton leapt to the national scene during the 1992 presidential campaign when husband and wife fought to survive the scandal over Gennifer Flowers' allegations of a lengthy affair with Bill Clinton when he was the state's governor.

The Clintons appeared together on CBS'"60 Minutes" to talk about their marriage - Hillary Clinton's first famous "Stand by Your Man" moment.

As first lady, Clinton headed up a disastrous first-term effort to overhaul the health care insurance system. There was more controversy as the couple battled allegations of impropriety over land deals and fundraising, missing records from her former Arkansas law firm and even her quick and hefty profits from an investment in cattle futures.

There was no letup in the second term. The president found himself denying - then admitting - having a sexual relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. As he battled impeachment and possible removal from office, his wife's poll numbers rose.

Her own political career began to take shape in late 1998 when New York Democrat Daniel Patrick Moynihan announced he would not seek re-election to the Senate seat he had held since 1976.

The campaign trail was not always friendly. For almost every cheer, there was a shouted "Go home, Hillary!" and the emerging Republican theme that carpetbagger Clinton simply wanted to use New York as a launching pad for a later presidential run.

DOJ_NMG_0119541

Can Hillary Clinton Win In 2008? (BBC)

By Richard Allen Greene

BBC.com, January 20, 2007

Hillary Clinton has finally announced that she is considering running for president in 2008 - a declaration anticipated for the past six years that puts a heavyweight contender into the race.

Senator Clinton has already made history by becoming the first former First Lady to be elected to public office.

But all thoughts will now turn to whether the New York Democrat really has what it takes to become the first woman president of the United States.

It would be foolish to dismiss a woman who sits on an enormous war chest and is backed by some of the best political strategists in the country.

But it would be equally unwise to bet that the US will elect a woman president when the country is at war - much less one who is already reviled by a substantial minority of Americans for her perceived liberalism and association with Bill Clinton.

Warning to Republicans

Mark Corallo, a Republican strategist, reckons she has a good chance of capturing the White House in 2008 - and says he is constantly warning friends against underestimating her.

"Every time a Republican tells me: 'We want [to run against] Hillary', I say: 'Be careful what you wish for'.

"There is no other candidate on either side of the equation that has the instant party organisation and the ability to raise an enormous amount of money.

"She has the two most formidable strategists in the Democratic Party - Terry McAuliffe and Harold Ickes," Mr Corallo says before correcting himself: "No, three, because Bill Clinton is the most formidable. The guy is brilliant."

Mr Corallo, co-owner of the consultancy Corallo Comstock, says only one Democrat could take the party's nomination away from Senator Clinton: Barack Obama, the first-term senator from Illinois.

"He has the 'wow factor' that Bill had," the strategist says, which, he predicts, will make him Senator Clinton's first target.

"Hillary's partisans will start to whisper that he is an empty suit" without the experience to win or govern, he says.

"If Obama is tough enough, it is going to be an interesting primary season," he says.

Goliath and Davids

But Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics, is not so certain that Hillary Clinton will be waltzing into the White House any time soon.

"She's Goliath, but plenty of Goliaths have been downed by Davids," says Mr Sabato, who specialises in elections.

Senator Clinton regularly comes top in polls asking Democrats who they would like their 2008 White House candidate to be.

Mr Sabato argues that is simply because "everyone knows who she is".

In the states that are first to choose their preferred presidential candidate, he adds, she is not doing as well.

"It is surprising how weak she is in places like Iowa and New Hampshire, and they matter enormously."

He says the intensely committed party activists in those states may fear she cannot win a national election and will shy away from her.

"They realise she has serious problems - we are going to get a regurgitation of all those past scandals and controversies with new wrinkles and information."

He also thinks her personality does her no favours.

"People just don't warm up to her, including a lot of Democrats - they don't dislike her, but they don't feel warmly towards her at all," he says.

"And I have never understood how someone could spend so much time around Bill Clinton and be such a wooden speaker," he adds.

"I'm not saying she can't get nominated or that she can't win a general election. But this is nowhere near the slam-dunk it is made out to be."

DOJ_NMG_0119542

Hillary Clinton Launches White House Bid: "I'm In" (CNN)

CNN.com, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Sen. Hillary Clinton jumped into the fray as a 2008 presidential candidate with the words "I'm in" posted on her Web site.

"And I'm in to win," she added in a statement, announcing she has set up an exploratory committee that can gauge opinions and raise money for a presidential campaign.

Clinton's announcement comes on the same day that the next president will be inaugurated two years down the road: January 20, 2009.

The former first lady and Democratic senator from New York is considered her party's front-runner in what has become a diverse Democratic field.

Should she win, she would be the first woman to serve as president of the United States -- and the first presidential spouse to do so as well. President Bill Clinton served two terms from 1993 to 2001.

On Tuesday, Democrat Sen. Barack Obama announced that he was filing papers to form a presidential exploratory committee, a bid to become the first African-American president. And on Sunday, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, also a Democrat, is expected to announce his bid, one that could make him the first Latino president.Live 'Web chats' start Monday

Bringing "the right end" to the war in Iraq, reducing the deficit, making the country energy independent and health care affordable were issues Clinton touted in her announcement, speaking on a video posted on her site.

"After six years of George Bush, it is time to renew the promise of America," she said.

"I grew up in a middle-class family in the middle of America, and we believed in that promise," the 59-year-old Chicago native said.

"I still do. I've spent my entire life trying to make good on it, whether it was fighting for women's basic rights or children's basic health care, protecting our social security or protecting our soldiers."

On Sunday she'll appear at the Ryan Chelsea-Clinton Community Health Center to discuss legislation that would expand the State Children's Health Insurance Program. The center bears the names of the two Manhattan neighborhoods it serves -- Chelsea and Clinton -- coincidentally, Chelsea Clinton is the senator's daughter's name.

In the video, she invited Americans to join her in a three-night series of live video Web chats beginning Monday.

"So let's talk. Let's chat, let's start a dialogue about your ideas and mine, because the conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think?"

She'll travel next weekend to Iowa and later to New Hampshire, two kickoff states for the Democratic presidential nominating process in 2008, according to her campaign organizers.

When Clinton launched her Senate bid in New York in 1999, she began a "listening tour" around the state to explore views on education, business and health care issues.

Her Republican opponent, Rick Lazio, called her a "carpetbagger" because she had not previously lived in New York. But she beat him, becoming the first sitting first lady to win an elected office, and was re-elected last year with 67 percent of the vote.

A crowded field

Clinton's announcement puts her in a big Democratic crowd of candidates.

In a statement released Saturday, Obama said: "Senator Clinton is a good friend and a colleague whom I greatly respect. I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track."

In addition to Obama and Richardson, the field also includes former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, who declared his candidacy late last year; Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, a liberal critic of the war in Iraq; and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut have also said they will seek the nomination, and other Democrats mentioned as possible candidates include the party's 2004 presidential candidate, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts; retired Army Gen. Wesley Clark, and the Rev. Al Sharpton.Clinton wants troop cap, is wary of al-Maliki

Clinton, who just returned from a trip to U.S. military facilities in Afghanistan, Iraq and Germany, has urged the Bush administration to return its focus to Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0119543

She has proposed a bill to cap troop levels in Iraq and require congressional approval before the president may send more troops.

She has also been highly critical of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, saying Washington should cut off financial support to the Iraqi government unless it shows commitment to stemming the sectarian violence there.

"I don't have any faith," she said of al-Maliki, when asked by CNN if she had any faith in him.

In 2002, Clinton was among the majority in Congress who voted in favor of authorizing Bush to attack Iraq if Saddam Hussein refused to give up weapons of mass destruction as required by U.N. resolutions.

In a 2005 letter to constituents posted on her Senate Web site, she said that she took responsibility for her vote, which she said she made "on the basis of the evidence presented by the administration."

In turn, she said, "I, along with a majority of Americans, expect the president and his administration to take responsibility for the false assurances, faulty evidence and mismanagement of the war."

Sen. Clinton Throws Hat Into Ring (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, January 20, 2007

"I'm in."

Six years after leaving 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue as first lady, Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) announced Saturday morning that she wants to return to the White House, this time as the country's first female president. Clinton said she is launching a presidential exploratory committee, eliminating the last doubts regarding her intentions in 2008. She cited the need for "bold changes" to fix the damage that "six years of Bush administration failures" had done to the country.

"The promise of America is that all of us will have access to opportunity, and I want to run a 2008 campaign that renews that promise, a campaign built on a lifetime record of results," she said.

Clinton pledged to take her campaign to the people and plans to hold web chats over the course of the coming days. The first such chat, in which people can ask Clinton questions about her bid, the platform of the campaign and the issues that face the country, will be held Monday at 7:00 pm. In her current job in the Senate, Clinton said she would spend the next two years "doing everything in my power to limit the damage George W. Bush can do.

"But only a new president will be able to undo Bush's mistakes and restore our hope and optimism," Clinton added. New York's junior senator jumps to the top of the list of announced Democratic contenders. Her ability to raise funds, a national profile and the Clinton political network are all major assets in her campaign. However, she is joining an already crowded field that is expected to get even more full over the course of this year.

This week, rising Democratic star Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) also announced he would make a run for the White House and 2004 vice presidential candidate John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, has also thrown his hat in the ring. In addition, several other Democrats have already begun campaigning.

Throwing Her Hat On The Web (WP)

By Ann Hornaday

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

If a Democratic primary were held on sheer production values, Hillary Rodham Clinton would win in a landslide.

In the video on Clinton's Web site yesterday, announcing the formation of a presidential exploratory committee, she chucked the formulaic genre of flag-draped backdrops and stiff monotones, instead delivering a 1-minute 45-second vlog-cast that arrived like a chintz-upholstered, sun-drenched blockbuster.

Perched almost-comfortably on a shabby-chic couch with a carefully rumpled pillow at her back, Clinton spoke in that intimate tone befitting her rhetoric, which focused on words like "conversation" and "chat."

Unlike other candidates (coughBarack Obamacough), whose videos might have been produced by a guy with a cellphone camera, Clinton's announcement was a veritable showpiece of Hollywood-style set design, lighting and cinematography. While Clinton, looking radiant in a red jacket and flattering makeup, affected the demeanor of a kaffe-klatching neighbor while speaking about the Iraq war, energy, Social Security and health care, the camera swung with pen dular subtlety between a background

DOJ_NMG_0119544

tableaux of framed family pictures and a fabulous table lamp exuding a warm glow. In fact, the background is so eye-catching, so crowded with totemic details, so bursting with semiotic potential, that I missed whole passages of Clinton's statement the first time around. (And yes, I do want that lamp.)

The effect was one of breathtaking political shrewdness and brilliant staging, like a mash-up between "The West Wing" and Diane Keaton's latest holiday heartwarmer. And for all its studied spontaneity, its air of having been pre-tested, choreographed, and managed to within a microfiber of Clinton's mascara, it worked, if only to provide a little eye candy within a grainy sea of canned speeches and awkward iChats. The aesthetic sophistication suited Clinton, who, as a former first lady and a U.S. senator, would look hopelessly out of place in most other contexts (rocking the mom jeans in the Ninth Ward? Uh-uh. Maybe an ornate Senate office, but where's the zazz in yet another wall of law books?), and the look and the script warmed up a woman portrayed as either an amoral ice queen or control-freaky dragon lady by her political opponents.

Still, for all of Clinton's glitz, the best example of the announcement video genre is John Edwards's, which he staged like a news story in post-Katrina New Orleans. Seamlessly blending form and content, Edwards seemed to take a page from Anderson Cooper for character and setting, while he spoke passionately about his signature theme of "two Americas" and creating a fake-news video image that would look right at home amid the screen grabs, podcasts and bootlegs on the Web. (Meanwhile, Republican U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback made an announcement yesterday as well, but he kicked it old school, stating he was an actual presidential candidate, not an exploratory one, and delivering the news live in front of hundreds of supporters, with his Web site presumably receiving the official video by pneumatic tube.)

So candidates now find themselves thrust into a new target-shoots-first media universe, where to preempt leaks and take an early bite of the public-awareness apple, the Web site exploratory committee announcement has become the new hat in the ring. And while politicians navigate the Googley highways and Wiki byways, looking about as comfortable as Barbara Bush at a rave, the young and the viral that they're trying so desperately to win over are ready to chew up and spit out anything that smacks of the inauthentic, the unhip or the analog.

It remains to be seen whether any or all of these explorers decide to run, and then if any of them succeed in conquering YouTube political culture. On second thought, that one's easy -- the only remaining question is who will be the first presidential candidate to figure out how to combine their campaign kick-off with Diet Coke and Mentos.

Tops In Political Toolbox: Internet (LAT)

By Peter G. Gosselin

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — In choosing the Internet to announce she intends to run for the presidency in 2008, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton bowed to the burgeoning political power of the medium and offered a preview of how she hopes to harness it to her purposes.

In declaring "I'm in" the White House race in a video clip on her new campaign website, HillaryClinton.com, the New York Democrat did considerably more than simply appear before the cameras; she invited supporters to join an almost Oprah Winfrey-like session of give and take.

"Let's talk. Let's chat. Let's start a dialogue about your ideas and mine…. " she told viewers."With a little help from modern technology, I'll be holding live online video chats … starting Monday."

By doing this, Clinton signaled her intention of using the Internet to shore up one of her chief political weak points, what independent analyst Charlie Cook called the caricature of her as "this shrill, raving, partisan, liberal lunatic."

"She needs to build people's comfort level with her, and she's going to do that with [an Internet] conversation," Cook said.

Clinton's online declaration that she is forming a presidential exploratory committee came less than a week after similar news delivered online by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill).

It also follows even more elaborate use of the Internet by the third major presidential contender in the Democratic ranks, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

The website for Edwards, the party's vice presidential nominee in 2004, offers documentary-style video of him grousing about his political consultants and informally chatting about the campaign ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0119545

The Internet's power both to make and break politicians has been vividly demonstrated in recent years.

In 2004, former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean jumped from political obscurity to grab the front-runner's position in the initial stages of the Democratic race largely on the strength of the interest and fundraising he generated online.

Last year, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) watched his reelection campaign — and his hopes of emerging as a prime contender for the GOP presidential nomination — go down in flames after a video clip of him addressing a young man of Indian descent as "macaca" made the rounds on the Web.

Barely a factor in campaigning 11 years ago when Clinton's husband won reelection as president, the Internet has become an integral part of the political landscape, with every major candidate fielding a website and seeking to create a virtual community around his — or her — campaign.

But with the recent advent of YouTube and other video-sharing sites, analysts said the most intriguing aspect of the evolving use of the Web may be as part of an immense game of political "gotcha," in which campaigns seek to catch opposing candidates off-guard and off-message, as happened to Allen.

Analysts said Clinton's announcement and the accompanying rollout of her campaign website underscore the well-organized nature of her bid.

In addition to the video clip, the site includes a political analysis of recent polls suggesting she can win, as well as invitations to contribute and sponsor local events to support her.

"This is an example of what's to come," Cook said. "It has lots of bells and whistles. There's nothing left to chance."

With Boots Or Suits, Candidates Carefully Craft First Impressions (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The announcement of a candidacy for president can leave a lasting impression.

While it's only a single day in a marathon campaign, it's also the first glimpse that many voters get of a candidate. And, as we all know, first impressions matter.

Democratic strategist Chris LeHane calls these announcements "the reality TV shows of politics," adding: "Each announcement is designed to out-entertain the prior announcements."

Take the declarations of candidacy by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.).

Edwards -- clad in jeans, a tan work shirt and boots -- entered the race just after Christmas, making his announcement in front of a New Orleans home, destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, that was being rebuilt.

Obama -- casual in a suit coat and an open-necked shirt -- countered with a low-key and decidedly serious video sent to supporters last week.

"The announcement strategies reflect the state of the candidacies," said Stephanie Cutter, a Democratic consultant well-versed in image politics, in an e-mail. "Sen. Obama's celebrity allows for him to control three news cycles with a simple and articulate internet video, while Sen. Edwards smartly took advantage of a slow news cycle and executed a multi-state tour to make national news."

And now Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is in the race, joining the fray with a two-minute video clip shot from her home in the District.

The understated tone of the Clinton announcement -- released on a Saturday via video -- ran counter to suggestions the Fix fielded earlier in the week about how the senator should make it official.

Jamal Simmons, a founder of Cherry Tree Mobile Media, suggested an aircraft carrier as an appropriate backdrop to convey Clinton's "serious times demand serious leaders" message. Unfortunately, "George Bush ruined that photo op," he said.

Matt Bennett, a partner in Third Way, a centrist Democratic advocacy group, suggested that Clinton go deliberately low-tech.

"High-tech announcements are totally last cycle," he said. "Clinton should go retro-chic. How about a slide show? Or maybe a filmstrip?"

DOJ_NMG_0119546

2 days: Will Al Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth" be nominated for an Academy Award for best documentary film? And would such an accolade increase the pressure on the former vice president to consider a run for president in 2008? We'll know the answer to the first question in 48 hours.

19 days: Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R) makes a stop in Alabama to speak to the state's Republican Executive Committee. Why? No longer content with its spectator status in the nomination fights every four years, Alabama has moved its presidential primary from June 2008 to February 5, 2008.

Far From A Hindrance, Gender Could Be Key For Clinton (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton enters the presidential arena as the most viable woman ever to seek the office and at a propitious moment.

More women hold elected office than ever before, and 9 million more women than men voted in the last presidential election. The New York Democrat's candidacy will test whether she can turn excitement over gender into a powerful political advantage.

"Over the last 35 years, the political climate has changed to make women more acceptable to Americans at all levels of office," said Ruth B. Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University. "And now, finally, the moment has arrived when we have a candidate ready to make that leap and a public that can see a woman in that role."

After some rocky moments with female voters over the past 15 years, Clinton begins her historic race viewed favorably by 59 percent of women nationally, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll completed Friday night. She is viewed favorably among women of all age groups and educational backgrounds, and has especially large advantages among core pockets of Democratic women, including non-whites and lower-income women, and among Northeasterners.

In primary and general election matchups as of today, Clinton has sizable advantages among women, the survey showed. Forty-nine percent of Democratic and Democratic-leaning women would support her in their state's caucus or primary if it were held today, compared with 18 percent who would support Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.). And against Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) or former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R), she has a big lead among women.

She is particularly popular among younger women, 18-34, who see her as a role model and who may not recall the negative publicity and partisan attacks that Clinton weathered as first lady over her health-care proposal and other issues. "I like her because she's a Democrat and a woman, and it's time for a female president," said Rene Davis, 23, of Gloucester, N.J. "If I have a daughter, I want to know that she can run for president."

For this reason, women's advocates see her candidacy as having the potential to create a cultural and political shift not unlike those under John F. Kennedy, the first Catholic president and a symbol of generational change, or during the Vietnam War.

"What is so exciting about this is that she will appeal to a whole new generation of women who will become political and get involved because of her," says Ellen Malcolm, the president of Emily's List, which raises money for female candidates. "We will see a dramatic shift in demographics that could affect the landscape for decades to come."

In the Post survey, Clinton made her most significant strides in the past 10 months among women 55 and older, 59 percent of whom have a favorable view of her, compared with 48 percent last year.

"I think you're seeing an overall warming up towards her," said Mark Penn, a longtime adviser and pollster for Clinton and her husband, former president Bill Clinton. "With older women, objections are beginning to melt because Senator Clinton is getting out there and saying, 'Here's what I can do,' and they are paying attention."

Clinton follows a path walked by other female presidential candidates, who either were dismissed as tokens or could not generate the support and funds to be competitive. In recent political history, a handful made the effort: Margaret Chase Smith in 1964, Shirley Chisholm in 1972, Patricia Schroeder in 1988 and Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) in 2000.

Clinton's relationship with women has been slow in developing. It took her a long time to recover from a remark she made during her husband's 1992 campaign, when she appeared to be scornful of those who stayed home and baked cookies. But she generated tremendous sympathy when she stoically dealt with the public humiliation of her husband's affair with Monica Lewinsky.

DOJ_NMG_0119547

Today, the senator's advisers acknowledge that one hurdle for Clinton will be to convince women that she can actually win -- a fear that women often articulate.

In her first race for the Senate in New York, her campaign targeted those very women in an advertisement showing a woman who said she tells her friends who have doubts about Clinton that they should "get over it."

Eventually Clinton won over a highly skeptical female electorate through relentless public appearances, old-fashioned retail politics and advertising. She won with 55 percent of the vote, including what exit polls showed was 60 percent of female voters.

Sources say Clinton's presidential campaign will attempt to implement this same strategy on a grander scale, by exposing her to as many people as possible in the small groups in which she thrives.

It was no accident that her announcement came in the form of a personal video, where she called her effort the beginning of a "conversation." And last month, she ventured onto "The View," the daytime show by women for women.

"There's no question women are stepping back and taking a second look," said Terry McAuliffe, a friend and adviser.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger, Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Nancy Pelosi -- first female speaker of the House! Hillary Rodham Clinton -- first woman who maybe, kinda, has a chance of getting elected U.S. president! We haven't been so excited since . . . well, since Katie Couric became the first female solo anchor of a major American network evening newscast! Let's look back at some of our sister pioneers.

Dawn of Time: Eve, first woman to hear, "I told you so."

35 B.C.: Livia, wife of Augustus, first Roman woman allowed to handle her own money.

1872: Victoria Woodhull, first woman to run for president of the United States.

1899: Martha Place, first woman to die in the electric chair.

1901: Annie Edson Taylor, first person to survive trip over Niagara Falls in a barrel.

1903: Marie Curie, first woman to win a Nobel Prize in physics.{+1}

1910s: Madame C.J. Walker, first African American female self-made millionaire.

1916: Jeannette Rankin, first woman elected to Congress.

1928: Janet Gaynor, first woman to win an Oscar, Best Actress.{+2}

1936: Wallis Warfield Simpson, Time's first female Man of the Year.

1952: Christine Jorgensen, first woman with an unassailable reason to shop for new clothes.{+3}

1958: Coya Knutson, first female member of Congress whose relationship wrecked her career, or vice versa.{+4}

1964: Margaret Chase Smith, first woman to have her name placed in nomination for president at a major party convention.{+5}

1969: Golda Meir, Israel, world's first female prime minister.

1970: Diane Crump, first female jockey to ride in the Kentucky Derby.

1974: Isabel Peron, Argentina, world's first female president.

1977: Michelle Triola, first to successfully sue for "palimony."{+6}

1978: Janice Dickinson, world's first female supermodel.{+7}

1980: Sherry Lansing, first female head of a major movie studio.

1981: Sandra Day O'Connor, first female Supreme Court justice.

1997: Madeleine Albright, first female secretary of state.

2006: Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Liberia, first woman elected head of an African nation, and Michelle Bachelet, first female president of Chile.{+8}

{+1} Dies before she can say "nyah, nyah" to Larry Summers.

DOJ_NMG_0119548

{+2} Eighty years later, "separate but equal" still reigns in showbiz awards.

{+3} After ex-GI George Jorgensen got the world's first (highly publicized) sex change.

{+4} An opponent enlisted her drunk husband to write a "Coya, come home" letter. She lost, she went home to Minnesota, she divorced him.

{+5} She lost.

{+6} Won thousands from tough-guy actor Lee Marvin, her longtime live-in boyfriend, after he dumped her.

{+7} Or so she insists in every TV appearance.

{+8} That's right, and in the U.S. we're still waiting.

Hill's Bid Her-Storic: Feminists (NYPOST)

The New York Post, January 21, 2007

January 21, 2007 -- I am woman, watch me run.

A successful Hillary Clinton campaign would not just be a win for her, but for women everywhere, feminist leaders said yesterday.

"We are thrilled a prominent woman has entered the race," said Kim Gandy, the president of the National Organization for Women. "Every woman who runs opens another door."

"A woman's place is in the house - the White House!" said high-profile lawyer Gloria Allred.

On her campaign Web site, Clinton talked of the effect her candidacy would have on women everywhere. If she wins the Democratic nomination, it would be the first run of a woman on a major-party ticket since Rep. Geraldine Ferraro sought the vice presidency 1984.

"As we campaign to win the White House, we will make history and remake our future," she told supporters on the site yesterday. "We can only break barriers if we dare to confront them."

Mosemarie Boyd, president of American Women Presidents, said President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney had already "proven" that a woman can be president.

"Dick Cheney proved you don't have to have a heart and Bush proved that you don't have to have a brain," said Boyd.

Noted feminist Gloria Steinem echoed those sentiments.

"The question is whether she can accomplish the same thing [she has in New York] in a big country," said Steinem. "Certainly she would be a thousand times better than what we currently have."

Race May Revolve Around Clintons (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

Chicago Tribune, January 21, 2007

Shortly after breakfast Saturday, the country reverted to a familiar rhythm--Clinton Standard Time.

Hillary Rodham Clinton's bold splash into the presidential waters ensures that for the foreseeable future the race for her fellow Democrats and for Republicans will be about the Clintons--what she does, what he does--bringing with it all the brilliance, triumph, power, passion, drama and love-hate, place-called-Hope, didn't-inhale, flirt-with-disaster madness that defined the eight years of Bill Clinton's presidency.

But make no mistake: In this race, at this point, Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York is the sun. Everyone else, including Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, revolves around her.

She will have the money, the organization and the most attention focused on her. It will be her blessing and may be her curse. She repels at least as much as she attracts. At least for now.

Saturday morning, on her Web site, she gave an "It takes a village" approach to her campaign, saying she wanted to engage voters in a "conversation" about the state of the country. It was a low-key pitch with high production values and bespoke a drive and confidence. This moment has been a long time in the planning.

She gave an early indication of her style last week when Obama announced his own White House intentions, refusing to even acknowledge his fitness to be commander in chief. Instead, she gave an icily perfunctory "let the voters decide" back of the hand.

DOJ_NMG_0119549

Obama did not follow suit. In a statement, he said, "Senator Clinton is a good friend and colleague whom I greatly respect. I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track."

Grace notes are the more common approach in the early rounds of a presidential campaign. Clinton is known for her upright bearing, and her bare knuckles.

She enters the competition as the candidate who is at once most potent and most polarizing. The good news for her is that it is hard to see how her negatives could go much higher. In New York, she started her Senate campaign in 2000 in a similar position and, through a focused campaign to deliver for the folks back home, she won over a huge part of the state, including traditionally Republican Upstate, home of her greatest skeptics.

She has been a star in the Senate, but won points for not seeking the spotlight. She has tacked to the center on some issues, even moderating her position on abortion. That approach is just another measure of the tactical brilliance the Clintons bring to any political race in which they choose to play.

The former president and potential "first man," Bill Clinton, has been talking up his wife's chances as he has rebuilt his own popularity among a wide swath of the American people.

Without question one of the most gifted politicians of the last 50 years, the former president could be an extraordinary asset to his wife, in effect doubling the capacity of her campaign. He also carries some obvious risks and his life will again be put under a spotlight.

A substantial segment of the public seems to have a near-fixed view of the former first lady, and it is not positive, representing perhaps the singular challenge of her candidacy: reversing a perception about someone who is so well known.

Even within the Democratic Party, she will have obstacles, and none likely to be more important than her early support for the war in Iraq and her reluctance to join those who are asking for an immediate drawndown of troops. It is a doubly difficult walk for Clinton who, as a woman, faces scrutiny that men do not on issues of national security. Bill Clinton, it seems, would find a way to recalibrate.

And that is another hurdle--having her political skills constantly compared to those of her husband.

The spur-of-the-moment polls--taken about a year before the first votes cast in the Iowa caucuses--look very good for the junior senator from New York. But they also are just this side of meaningless, given that they reflect her name recognition more than real support at this stage.

That in no way diminishes her position as this race begins, the position at the top. When the Clintons first became known nationally during the New Hampshire primary in 1992, Bill Clinton famously offered the couple as the ultimate two-for-the-price-of-one bargain.

That notion faded dramatically when Hillary Clinton was put in charge of the president's health care reform package and her popularity plummeted.

Interestingly, it was when she was seen as somewhat of a victim during the Clinton impeachment that America saw her in different light, and even started to embrace her.

Now, Hillary Clinton is testing whether the nation wants a sequel of the Clinton Era, and Clinton Standard Time.

Clinton Assembles A Seasoned Team (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Although Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) presidential campaign is just a day old, she already has a full stable of senior staffers in place. Here is a look at the people who will guide Clinton's White House bid.

Patti Solis Doyle: Unquestionably a first among equals in Clinton's inner circle, Solis Doyle will manage the campaign. She has been with Clinton since her days as the first lady of Arkansas.

Mike Henry: A newcomer to the Clinton circle, Henry will be deputy campaign manager. He made a name for himself by leading Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) to victory in 2005 and then overseeing Senate Democrats' national ad campaign in 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0119550

Howard Wolfson: Wolfson will oversee the communications operation for Clinton, reprising the role he played in her 2000 Senate race. Wolfson has deep roots in Democratic New York politics, having worked for Sen. Charles E. Schumer and Rep. Nita M. Lowey.

Evelyn S. Lieberman: Lieberman, a former undersecretary of state and senior aide in President Bill Clinton's White House, will be chief operating officer.

Jonathan Mantz: As finance director, Mantz has the Herculean task of raising the millions Clinton will need to compete in the four early-voting states and beyond. Before joining Clinton, Mantz oversaw fundraising for New Jersey Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D).

Neera Tanden: Tanden served as policy adviser to President Bill Clinton and went on to serve as the legislative director in Hillary Clinton's Senate office. She will be the campaign's policy director.

Kim Molstre: Fresh off a stint in the office of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), Molstre will serve as director of scheduling and long-term planning. In 2004, Molstre worked on the presidential efforts of former congressman Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

Mandy Grunwald: A veteran of Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign, Grunwald designed the ads for Hillary Clinton's 2000 and 2006 Senate races. She will be the lead media consultant in 2008 as well.

Mark Penn: The pollster of choice during President Bill Clinton's second term, Penn, like Grunwald, has been with Hillary Clinton since her run in 2000.

Phil Singer: Singer, the deputy communications director, is extremely close to Schumer, for whom he worked at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in the 2006 election. He also has experience in past presidential politics as a member of Kerry's rapid-response operation.

Leecia Eve: Eve, a black woman from Buffalo, will be a senior policy adviser to the campaign. She worked as counsel to Clinton in her Senate office, leaving to make an abbreviated bid for lieutenant governor in New York in 2006.

Minyon Moore: Moore served a stint as political director in the Clinton White House and will be a senior adviser in the campaign. Moore, an African American, oversaw minority outreach for Kerry's 2004 campaign.

Ann Lewis: Lewis is a longtime Clinton loyalist. She was deputy campaign manager for President Bill Clinton's 1996 reelection race and handled communications during Hillary Clinton's 2006 reelection contest. She will be a senior adviser to the '08 campaign.

In A Field Of Heavy Hitters, No Sure Thing (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Compared with the other Democrats who plan to run for president in 2008, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is the most battle-tested, has the biggest fund-raising network and can walk into the job with a unique set of skills and perspectives gleaned from eight years in the White House as first lady.

Yet none of that guarantees Mrs. Clinton will steamroll her opponents, or manage and master the issues that have long vexed her, like the war in Iraq and universal health insurance. Far from it: she has told friends that she is more worried about winning the Democratic nomination than winning a general election against a Republican.

With this presidential campaign starting far earlier than any in history, Mrs. Clinton, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and their five Democratic rivals find themselves facing 400 more days before the nomination is sealed up. Each of those days could bring a surprise or flub or Senate vote or controversy that might change their political fortunes. The field is still growing, too: Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico is expected to jump in today. And whither John Kerry? Wesley Clark? Al Gore?

“Given the high velocity of the campaign at this early stage, it’s incredible to think what the race will look like a year from now, and who will be standing out,” said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic political consultant who supports Mrs. Clinton.

Mrs. Clinton has also told friends that she does not think of herself as the Democratic front-runner, nor does she like the word — which are both things that front-runners tend to say, political analysts note. (Her new campaign wasted no time yesterday sending an e-mail message about a new Washington Post-ABC poll giving Mrs. Clinton a 41 percentage point lead over her closest rival, Mr. Obama, who had 17 points.)

DOJ_NMG_0119551

Still, unlike 1988, when the so-called seven dwarves were running for the Democratic nomination, the current field is full of heavy hitters, and Mrs. Clinton faces formidable challenges. Mr. Obama is Mrs. Clinton's strongest rival thus far in attracting crowds of screaming fans; John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina, was the 2004 vice presidential nominee, and has staked out a clear antiwar position; and Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut are seasoned lawmakers who lead powerful committees, giving them access to donors and the media spotlight.

"Democrats are going to have a real opportunity to see some of the best and brightest in the party," said Kathy Sullivan, the chairwoman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party. "We're a wait-and-see state, and while a lot of people are very excited about Senator Clinton — including me — very few people have made up their minds."

Mrs. Clinton's advisers say she knows full well, from long and sometimes painful experience, the challenges to come. She will have to convince people that another Clinton in the White House will bring more of the successes, and fewer of the shadows and scandals, that marked her husband's administration, her advisers say. She will have to figure out the role that Mr. Clinton will play, a question that Republicans will almost certainly highlight.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," Mrs. Clinton said in a statement on her new campaign Web site. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them."

In her statement, she also called for "bold but practical changes" in national policy, a four-word formulation that her advisers said was carefully chosen, given that she has sought to portray herself as both a pragmatist and someone who thinks big. Some Democrats dismiss the latter image, finding her too cautious. Yet her pledge of boldness reflects her well-known desire to disprove the notion that she is hesitant or calculating.

And she will have to show people that she is not the person her critics describe: radically liberal, ruthlessly ambitious, or ethically compromised. Her friends say she is none of these; some of them still chide her for being the "Goldwater girl" of her youth.

Political analysts say that part of her challenge will be letting voters see the full her and not just a rehearsed politician, no easy task for such a private person.

"People consider her to be capable and smart, even those who hate her, but have taken issue over the years with her hardness and lack of warmth," said Ruth Sherman, a political communications specialist who spent time yesterday watching Mrs. Clinton's video announcement on the campaign Web site. "If she can keep it up and persuade people it is authentic, they will have a hard time remembering the Hillary they loved to hate."

Mrs. Clinton will also have to persuade enough people to trust a woman as commander in chief at a time of war, and to view her as a steady, forward-thinking critic of the Iraq war and not as indecisive. Her years on the Senate Armed Services Committee, and her ties to military leaders on New York bases and in Washington, should help, advisers say.

"I would say she is more qualified to be commander in chief than any other Democrat or Republican running, given her years of international experience and her work with the military," said Ellen R. Malcolm, the president of Emily's List, a political and fund-raising organization that endorsed Mrs. Clinton yesterday.

Indeed, one reason Mrs. Clinton chose to make her announcement on a Saturday morning, when the political world is usually in slumber, was to dominate the news cycle, her advisers said, and contrast herself vividly as a leader with President Bush before his State of the Union speech on Tuesday night. They waved off the appearance that she was announcing to catch up with Mr. Obama, who declared his plans to run on Tuesday. They said they had determined in mid-December that, if Mrs. Clinton decided to run, they would announce the decision on the Saturday before the State of the Union address.

Mrs. Clinton spent yesterday at home in Chappaqua with Mr. Clinton, making calls to crucial Democratic officials across the country, including Michael Gronstal, the majority leader of the Iowa State Senate, as well as to some supporters.

She plans to attend Mr. Bush's speech on Tuesday and hit the campaign trail for the first time soon after, traveling next weekend to Iowa, the site of the first presidential caucuses in January 2008. After that, she will visit the early primary state of New Hampshire, where Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards have been recently. Mr. Dodd and former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa have visited the state in the last few days.

DOJ_NMG_0119552

For Democratic Advisers, A Season Of Tough Choices (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Rep. Rahm Emanuel considers Sen. Barack Obama a close friend. The Illinois Democrats had dinner just last week. They are both from Chicago and socialize together with their wives. But Emanuel got his big break in national politics from Bill Clinton and worked for him in the White House. And now his worst-case scenario has come true -- both Obama and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton are running for president and want his support.

Emanuel was widely credited with engineering his party's takeover of the House in November. Now fellow White House veterans are pressing him to take a senior position in the former first lady's campaign. Meanwhile, Chicago allies, led by the powerful Daley family, are pressing him to take a senior position in his Illinois colleague's campaign.

Torn by conflicting loyalties, Emanuel is ducking. "Maybe the witness protection program," he joked. "Or maybe I'll just stop answering the phone."

They still have Iowa and New Hampshire to conquer, but Clinton, Obama and the other Democratic presidential contenders already are squaring off in what might be called the Rahm Primary, an early contest to win over the movers and shakers from the only Democratic administration in the last quarter-century.

As Clinton kicks off a bid to follow in her husband's footsteps to the White House, she is trying to reconstitute much of his old team.

While it might seem like a simple loyalty test, loyalty in politics is not always defined in terms of who hired someone first or who someone worked for longest. Politics breeds complicated relationships. They are partly personal, partly ideological and partly transactional.

"It creates a dilemma for a lot of people," said Joe Lockhart, a former White House press secretary now at the Glover Park Group, a communications and lobbying firm with close ties to Hillary Clinton. "It would be easy if you had worked for a person who you knew wasn't up to the job, but that's not the case this year. It takes a little soul-searching on what you want to do."

Many familiar figures from the 1990s, such as Lockhart, are back in the Clinton corner formally or informally -- political advisers, fundraisers and policy aides such as James Carville, Harold Ickes, Mark Penn, Mandy Grunwald, Ann Lewis, Maggie Williams, Bruce Reed, John D. Podesta, Patti Solis Doyle and Terence R. McAuliffe.

But others are signing up with Obama or other candidates or staying on the sidelines, out of estrangement from the Clintons, skepticism about her chances, fealty to other patrons or some combination.

Former treasury secretary Robert E. Rubin, widely considered his party's economic wise man, has refused to sign up with Hillary Clinton or any of the other candidates. So has House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who first recruited Hillary Clinton to run for Senate from New York in 2000 but who lately has encouraged Obama to run for president.

"I don't know who the rest of the candidates are," Rangel said with a wry arch of an eyebrow last week when asked whether he would prefer Obama or Clinton.

Former commerce secretary William M. Daley, like his brother Richard M. Daley, the mayor of Chicago, is backing Obama, and so are former national security adviser Anthony Lake and former assistant secretary of state Susan E. Rice. A handful of junior Clinton White House aides are working for the Obama campaign as well.

Former White House political director Douglas B. Sosnik and Clinton pollster Stanley Greenberg are with Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.). Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) has Clinton administration veterans Ronald A. Klain, Tom Donilon, Antony Blinken and Evan Ryan. Jennifer Palmieri, a former White House spokeswoman, is helping former senator John Edwards (N.C.). And one former Clinton Cabinet member, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, is running against his former boss's wife himself.

"Most Democratic political professionals over the age of 25 who came to Washington passed through the Clinton administration at some point unless they spent their entire career on the Hill," said Reed, Bill Clinton's domestic policy adviser and now president of the Democratic Leadership Council. "It would be hard to fill a campaign without some people who had the '90s on their resumes."

DOJ_NMG_0119553

For some, the choice was not that hard. "The Clintons, for me and for many of us who worked for him, we owe them our loyalty," said Steve Ricchetti, who was deputy White House chief of staff. "They have been very generous personally and gave me my biggest opportunities in public service. It's not something you forget."

Yet others have not forgotten the personal slights, policy struggles and turf battles; after eight years, the Clinton White House was left with its share of scar tissue. Hillary Clinton inspired deep affection and loyalty among her own staff, but she could be demanding, and her temper sometimes singed those outside her inner circle.

For that matter, her husband could be tough to work for as well. Some who served in the West Wing emerged bruised by the experience, disenchanted with the conduct that led to his impeachment and leery of returning for Clinton the Sequel.

They do not couch their decisions this year in those terms, though, at least not publicly. They explain their neutrality or affiliations by the complex rules of political allegiance -- an old boss who came calling, a new job that prevents partisan activity, more recent involvement with another candidate, the sorts of word-of-mouth encounters that can bring teams together by happenstance more than by design.

Sosnik and Greenberg went back to Dodd, their original sponsor in politics. Dodd was Greenberg's first client. Sosnik drove Dodd in his 1980 campaign and became his chief of staff. "I first worked for Chris Dodd over 25 years ago and have always considered him my mentor," Sosnik said. "He taught me that there is nothing more important in life as well as in politics than being loyal to your friends."

Others calculated that another candidate would be more likely to win or would be a better president than Hillary Clinton. Lake said he was impressed with Obama. "This is the first time I've been excited by somebody since 1992, when I was doing foreign policy with Bill Clinton," he said. As for Hillary Clinton, he said: "I think highly of her. It's not that I'm trying to help somebody run against her. I'm helping somebody I think can be a great president."

Under other circumstances, Emanuel would be a natural for the Obama camp. But Emanuel was a rambunctious 31-year-old when he joined Clinton's campaign in 1991 as one of the original members of the Little Rock war room and followed the candidate to the White House. Although he was demoted at one point -- reportedly at the instigation of the first lady -- he eventually became one of the president's closest aides.

Emanuel declared on television early last year that he was supporting Clinton, but that was before Obama expressed interest in running. Now he is officially neutral. And both sides are lobbying him to take a top campaign post. "I'm going to call Rahm and talk the issue through with him and see what he thinks," said Mickey Kantor, who chaired Bill Clinton's campaign in 1992 and is now backing Hillary Clinton.

Obama has been calling, too. He had dinner with Emanuel on Thursday, which the congressman called a longstanding personal engagement. Asked where Emanuel will come down in the 2008 race, Obama recently told the Chicago Tribune: "Rahm knows the right thing to do."

If he does, he is not saying what the right thing is. "I have two friends in this. I just got off a two-year national campaign. It took everything out of me," Emanuel said. "There's a time for governing and a time for campaigning, and I'm in the governing mode right now."

As for picking sides, he said: "There will be an appropriate time. But now is not the appropriate time."

Hillary Runs For The White House As "new Thatcher" (LONT)

By Sarah Baxter

Times of London, January 21, 2007

HILLARY CLINTON is to be presented as America's Margaret Thatcher as she tries to become the first woman to win the White House. As she entered the 2008 presidential race yesterday, a senior adviser said that her campaign would emphasise security, defence and personal strengths reminiscent of the Iron Lady.

"Their policies are totally different but they are both perceived as very tough," said Terry McAuliffe, Clinton's campaign chairman. "She is strong on foreign policy. People have got to know you are going to keep them safe."

Clinton, 59, used her website to announce that she was taking the first step of her campaign by forming a presidential exploratory committee. "I'm in. And I'm in to win," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0119554

It made the New York senator the instant frontrunner for the Democratic nomination. “She has the name recognition, the money, the glitz, she’s got it all,” McAuliffe said.

If she wins, she will return to the White House where she spent eight years as first lady during Bill Clinton’s presidency from 1993-2001.

McAuliffe predicted a rough campaign. “She is going to fight for herself and she is going to have people around her who will fight,” he said.

“They are going to play mean, nasty and dirty on the other side. You don’t walk into a knife fight without adequate gloves.”

The Clinton campaign intends to paint the Republican nominee as President George W Bush’s political heir, particularly over the war in Iraq. “George Bush is going to be on the ticket whether they like it or not,” McAuliffe added.

Clinton said she would talk to voters about “how to bring the right end to the war in Iraq and restore respect for America around the world”. She also hopes to appeal to women voters in their twenties and thirties.

Clinton faces strong competition from Barack Obama, the charismatic but inexperienced 45-year-old Illinois senator. The race is already being billed “the magic v the machine”.

Aides: Clinton Plans Weekend Swing Through Iowa (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

DES MOINES (AP) — New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the newest entrant in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, will make her initial foray into Iowa next weekend, aides said Saturday.

Details of the upcoming campaign swing were still being finalized, but spokeswoman Lorraine Voles said an official announcement would come within days.

Clinton's decision to enter the race, and to compete in Iowa's leadoff precinct caucuses, reshuffles the Democratic contest in the state.

"This is going to be a real donnybrook," said Jeff Link, a veteran Democratic strategist who is advising former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack in his bid for the nomination. "I think the race is completely up in the air."

Former Iowa Democratic Chairman Gordon Fischer said he got a call from Clinton aides advising him of her plans, which were announced on her website early Saturday morning.

"She will be a very formidable candidate," Fischer said. "It's not a shock. She has been calling people and asking for advice."

While Clinton lags behind other Democrats in building a campaign organization for Iowa's caucuses, she is very well known and traveled to the state often during here husband's two terms in office, and afterward.

Some political onlookers had suggested she would use Vilsack's presence in the race as an excuse to skip past Iowa's leadoff caucuses, but she has clearly decided against that strategy.

Her move comes after Illinois Sen. Barack Obama announced he will form an exploratory committee to ponder seeking the Democratic nomination, with a final decision expected Feb. 10. Despite starting later, key Iowa activists said Clinton is certain to be a force.

"I think she'll be a serious player here in Iowa and other places," said veteran strategist Ron Parker. "Once she starts touring Iowa, she'll have some of the same star power as Sen. Obama, and then you add on top of that her fundraising ability."

Clinton is seeking to become the first female president, and her ability to raise money sets her apart from other women candidates, many of whom have struggled with raising campaign funds. Clinton raised more than $40 million in winning a second term in the Senate in November, and still has $13 million in the bank.

"I think the great intangible in all this is the appeal she will have as a female candidate, with experience, with fundraising ability and as somebody who has been battle tested in a real campaign," Parker said.

Clinton has been calling leading Democrats in Iowa to keep them posted about her intentions. Among them is Senate Majority Leader Michael Gronstal, a Democrat from Council Bluffs, who said he spoke with her Saturday.

"I kind of said, 'Well, welcome to the race in Iowa,'" Gronstal said. "I told her the field was open in Iowa and we're welcome to basically anyone."

DOJ_NMG_0119555

Link said Vilsack welcomes the competition in his home state, saying there's plenty of time until activists attend caucuses early next year.

"Everything has been turned upside down in the last two weeks," Link said. "I don't even think there's been enough time passed for there to be a conventional wisdom."

Parker agreed that Iowa's backing for the Democratic presidential nomination is up for grabs.

"Twelve months is a long, long time for all of the candidates," he said.

Clinton's decision comes as the pace of campaigning in Iowa is beginning to quicken. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards swung through the state on Saturday holding a town hall meeting on the war in Iraq at the University of Iowa, and former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson was also spending time in eastern Iowa.

It's widely anticipated that Obama will make a stop in Iowa soon if he chooses to enter into the race early next month.

Kansas Senator Announces Bid For Presidency (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20 — Declaring himself a proud conservative before a crowd of cheering supporters waving American flags, Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, on Saturday announced his candidacy for president.

Mr. Brownback, an evangelical Protestant turned Roman Catholic and a former Kansas agriculture secretary, said he would focus on reviving faith and families in America; combating abortion, poverty and wasteful government spending; opposing same-sex marriage; and revamping Social Security and the federal tax system.

“The last thing we need in America is to take God out of our public lives and institutions,” Mr. Brownback said during his speech in Topeka, Kan. “We need to embrace our nation’s motto, ‘In God we trust,’ and not be ashamed of it.

“To walk away from the Almighty is to embrace decline for a nation,” he said. “To embrace him leads to renewal, for individuals and for nations.”

Mr. Brownback, 50, was first elected to the House in 1994. Two years later, he was elected to the Senate, to complete the unexpired part of Senator Bob Dole’s term when Mr. Dole left to run for president.

Mr. Brownback acknowledged that he would be one of the lesser-known candidates in what is expected to be a crowded field of Republican presidential hopefuls, including Senator John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York.

He said his bid might be “a long shot,” but he compared himself to other successful presidential candidates who had come from behind, including Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton. He said his ideas would separate him from the pack.

“I start out with less name ID, but I’ve been there before,” Mr. Brownback said at a news conference after his speech in Topeka, Kan. “My positions are at the heart of where the Republican Party is.”

With his opposition to abortion, embryonic stem-cell research and same-sex marriage, Mr. Brownback hopes to establish himself as the dominant conservative in the race. The American Conservative Union, which hails him as one of “the best of the best” in the Senate, gave him a 100 percent conservative rating in its most recent survey of Congress.

In recent weeks, Mr. Brownback has been emboldened by the struggles of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, whose conservative credentials have come under attack because of questions about his evolving positions on abortion and gay rights. Mr. Brownback said Saturday that he planned to march in an anti-abortion rally in Washington on Monday.

But Mr. Brownback has also broken with Republicans on some issues. He supports putting most of the nation’s 12 million illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship, for instance. And this month, he joined many Congressional Democrats in announcing that he opposed President Bush’s plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq.

Paul M. Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, a conservative research group, praised Mr. Brownback for his commitment to conservative principles. But he questioned whether the senator had the charisma to prevail. “If he can prove that, then he will have a shot,” Mr. Weyrich said. “If not, then his conservatism will not be enough to carry him.”

Brownback Announces Presidential Bid (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

DOJ_NMG_0119556

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Sen. Sam Brownback, the son of a rural Kansas farmer who has become a leader among religious conservatives in Congress, formally launched his 2008 bid for president at a rally in Topeka yesterday.

Brownback, 50, became one of the first Republicans to announce the formation of an exploratory committee six weeks ago, and yesterday said he had decided "to take the first steps on the yellow brick road to the White House."

The Kansas Republican acknowledged being little known beyond his home state. A Washington Post-ABC News poll released yesterday shows he is supported by 1 percent of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. He was also unlucky to announce his candidacy on the same day as a better-known Democratic contender, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

But he may be the best-known among those who hope to be the choice of social conservatives and wield that power to break into a group of more visible GOP candidates.

"My positions are where the heart of the Republican Party is," he told reporters after his speech.

Brownback's supporters say the party's better-known contenders -- Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney -- offer weaker platforms for voters who strongly oppose abortion, same-sex marriage and stem cell research.

"There are really two primaries taking place simultaneously in the Republican party," said Gary Bauer, the family values activist who ran for president in 2000. "One, for center-left candidates, is being fought out between Giuliani and Senator McCain. On the conservative side, nobody has captured that crown yet, but Senator Brownback will be a major competitor."

Brownback was raised on a farm in tiny Parker, Kan., served as the state's youngest-ever secretary of agriculture and came to Congress in 1994. Two years later, he won the Senate seat that had been vacated by Robert J. Dole in advance of his run for president.

While in Congress, Brownback, a Methodist most of his life, converted to Catholicism and forged an alliance with conservative Christian leaders on the Hill. He began leading meetings of the Values Action Team, where advocacy groups meet to track socially conservative legislation, and speaking out sternly about a cultural decline.

"Senator Brownback is unrivaled as an advocate for the family and for life in Washington," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council. "What Sam has that is unique, is that he has a pro-life, pro-family record to go with his pro-life, pro-family message."

Brownback captured many of those themes yesterday as he addressed a raucous crowd of supporters in Topeka, Kan., telling them: "I am a conservative and I'm proud to be a conservative."

In his 17-minute speech, he touched on the sanctity of marriage, the protection of all life "whether elderly or in the womb," and the need to preserve religion's place in public institutions. But he also addressed other subjects, vowing for instance to "end deaths by cancer in 10 years," and to take the tax code "behind the barn" and kill it "with a dull ax."

After the speech, Brownback conceded that he "starts out with less name ID" than other candidates. According to the Post-ABC News poll, Giuliani is favored by 34 percent of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents, McCain by 27 percent and Romney by 9 percent, with former House speaker Newt Gingrich, who is also considering a run for the White House, at 9 percent as well.

Giuliani, McCain and Romney also have hired teams of advisers seasoned in President Bush's two campaigns and signaled that they hope to raise $100 million by the time primary season begins early next year.

Brownback's Senate campaign account has $600,000 as he starts his fundraising drive. A key to his campaign's financial strength may rest with Tom Monaghan, founder of Domino's Pizza and a Roman Catholic philanthropist who started Legatus, a lay group of wealthy conservative business executives. Monaghan has been serving as a top adviser to Brownback's campaign.

The senator's chances may ultimately depend on his ability to ignite Christian conservatives, said John Green, senior fellow with the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. Religious activists "don't have a consensus candidate yet," he said, but Brownback is one "they're certainly paying a lot of attention to."

Sen. Brownback Joins Presidential Race (LAT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0119557

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

TOPEKA, KAN. — Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas jumped into the 2008 presidential race Saturday, a favorite of the religious right now in a battle against better-known rivals for the GOP nomination.

"My family and I are taking the first steps on the yellow brick road to the White House. It's a great journey," the two-term senator told hundreds of supporters. He pledged to fight for the nation's cultural values and to focus on rebuilding families.

The 50-year-old Brownback offers himself as a "full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative."

After Saturday's speech, he told reporters: "My positions are at the heart of where the Republican Party is. I'm willing to take those positions with all comers."

Brownback's announcement, planned weeks ago, came hours after Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) entered her party's 2008 race.

"I don't know why she did that. I guess she's scared of me," Brownback said.

Though he is on solid footing on social issues, Brownback has broken with some Republicans on the Iraq war and immigration. He opposes sending more troops to Iraq and favors a path to citizenship for some of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the U.S.

Conservative Kansan Starts White House Run (CNN)

By Sasha Johnson

CNN.com, January 20, 2007

TOPEKA, Kansas (CNN) -- On a day when the political world was consumed with Hillary Clinton, Republican Senator Sam Brownback made his official foray into an already crowded field of 2008 aspirants.

"It is with sincere humility and a determination to do good that I declare my candidacy for President of the United States," Brownback told a buoyant crowd of supporters in Topeka, Kansas, Saturday.

The two-term senator enters a Republican field already dominated by big names and money, most notably Arizona Senator John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney. McCain, Giuliani and Romney have yet to make their candidacies official but are raising money through exploratory committees.

Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican, became the second member of Congress on Saturday to formally announce a run for the White House when New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Clinton announced on her Web site that she is forming a presidential exploratory committee.

A break from Bush on Iraq

A self-described fiscal and social conservative, Brownback made headlines recently when he broke with President George W. Bush and came out against the president's plan to send 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq and called for more diplomatic efforts.

"The United States seems to care more about a peaceful Iraq than the Iraqis do," Brownback said in a senate floor speech last week after returning from a trip to Afghanistan and Iraq. "If that is the case, it is difficult to understand why more U.S. troops would make a difference."

Brownback briefly mentioned the Iraq war in his speech which mainly revolved around faith and family issues. "We must win to redeem our troops' sacrifice. Let us resolve to have a bipartisan strategy for the war. We need unity here to win over there," he said.

Breaking with the White House on Iraq could be politically risky among the Republican base Brownback needs to court and win in order to be a successful candidate, said Chuck Hurley, a member of his exploratory committee, said.

Brownback spent a good deal of time during a trip to Iowa last week meeting with various constituencies and explaining the "reasoning" behind his position, Hurley, an Iowa supporter, said.

"As the debate unfolds, his position, if he's right will look prescient," said Hurley. Hurley concedes some "hardcore conservatives" will "initially recoil" at Brownback's stance but "among those willing to engage in an open debate, he'll be fine."Preempted by Clinton

DOJ_NMG_0119558

Brownback appeared to take the news of Senator Clinton's newly formed exploratory committee in stride acknowledging her marquis name and political star power.

"I think this is just a confirmation of something people have pretty well already mentally processed would take place," Brownback told CNN's Candy Crowley. "I think it's way too early to handicap this, this is a long road with a lot of things to go."

Despite his underdog status, many political observers caution those who are quick to write Brownback off in the 2008 cycle. "There is a path for him to be a factor in this race," said Chuck Todd, editor-in-chief of "The Hotline," a daily political publication. Todd calls Brownback "not a predictable Republican," pointing to the Kansas senator's strong anti-abortion platform, his deep religious ties to the Christian community, and his willingness to buck the conservative base and support immigration reform and efforts to combat global warming. "Brownback is trying to say 'hey you can be culturally conservative and mainstream'" at the same time, Todd said.

Brownback's strong Catholic faith could help pave the way in the early caucus state of Iowa where Christian evangelicals are a highly organized voting bloc. According to supporters Brownback has regularly returned to the state since 2004 meeting activists in small house parties across the state. In that year's presidential election almost half of Iowa Republican voters said they were either evangelical or born again Christian according to exit polls.

After his speech in Topeka, Brownback is scheduled to travel to North Carolina and then to Washington, D.C. for Monday's March for Life.

Brownback Formalizes White House Bid (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, January 20, 2007

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan) on Saturday formally announced his intention to seek the presidency. "I am running to spread hope and ideas," Brownback said in his announcement. "We are a blessed nation at an important crossroads. War, corruption, disintegrating families, and for some, hopelessness, tear at the American Dream."

Brownback's bid is seen as an uphill battle because several high-profile, well-organized candidates with deeper pockets are expected to join the race for the GOP nomination. These include Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

But if Brownback can become the consensus choice of value conservatives, his candidacy could make waves and build momentum. Many members of the Christian conservative base have concerns over the views of the better known candidates on issues like abortion and gay marriage.

The senator's announcement showed that his campaign will strongly focus on traditional values. "We must renew our families and rebuild our culture!" Brownback said.

But his announcement, which was overshadowed by Sen. Hillary Clinton's declaration earlier Saturday that she would also seek the presidency, also showed that the campaign will not only be limited to promoting conservative values. The introduction of a flat tax is part of his platform, as is the aim to achieve energy independence. In addition, Brownback vowed to fight government waste and help the poor in the US and abroad.

McCain Contends With Vocal Critics (AR)

By Dan Nowicki

The Arizona Republic, January 21, 2007

On the national stage, Sen. John McCain is a political star and a front-runner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

But back home, he faces some vocal critics in his own party who seem determined to derail his White House chances.

McCain supporters, including Arizona GOP Chairman Matt Salmon, are fuming about the latest stunt to embarrass McCain: a presidential "straw poll" that found McCain coming in fourth. Duncan Hunter, a little-known congressman from El Cajon, Calif., finished first.

DOJ_NMG_0119559

Hunter's exploratory committee helped distribute the straw-poll results under the headline "Arizona Republican presidential primary no lock for John McCain." The news release, which lists Maricopa County GOP Chairman Lyle Tuttle as the contact person, did not provide details about the unscientific survey's methodology.

A number of national and local media outlets and political blogs ran with the story, which carries the man-bites-dog appeal of McCain trailing in his home state's biggest county.

Bruce Merrill, an Arizona State University political scientist and polling expert, said he caught a television blurb about McCain finishing fourth in an Arizona poll.

Initially intrigued, Merrill said he was surprised, and appalled, to learn the report was based on a dubious straw poll.

"I think it is, one, irresponsible journalism to even report on it," Merrill said. "And, number two, if I were McCain, I would be madder than hell."

Merrill said he intended to launch his own poll of Arizona Republicans to determine their sentiment toward potential GOP contenders.

"My concern is that this (straw poll) is a perfect case of where a poll could create public opinion rather than measure public opinion," Merrill said.

Sham or accurate gauge?

In general, straw polls at political events are a fairly common way to informally gauge support for a candidate or an idea.

Some Republicans called this one a sham orchestrated to hurt McCain. Others acknowledged irregularities with the way the survey was conducted but defended it as a legitimate expression of grass-roots dissatisfaction with McCain.

Maricopa County Republicans conducted the straw poll at their Jan. 13 organizational meeting.

The one-page ballot offered 12 Republican possibilities for president and asked precinct committeemen to pick their first choice as well as label certain candidates "acceptable" or "unacceptable."

Hunter finished first, with 96 of 458 ballots cast. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney was second with 82, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich was third with 53 and McCain was fourth with 50. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has said she will not run, came in fifth with 27 votes.

Tom Tancredo, a Colorado congressman known as a hard-line foe of illegal immigration, was sixth with 24 votes.

Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, also considered a national front-runner, was seventh with 22 votes.

In the "unacceptable" category, McCain was the top vote-getter.

Rob Haney, legislative District 11 Republican chairman and an outspoken McCain critic, said many "platform" Republicans have abandoned McCain over issues such as campaign-finance reform, gun control and immigration.

"I don't know how anybody could look at that survey and say it wasn't reflective of what the Republican base felt," Haney said. "That is the Republican base: your precinct committeemen."

Tensions between McCain and segments of the party faithful are not unique to Maricopa County or Arizona. During his 2000 presidential campaign, McCain alienated many conservatives.

The straw poll "does suggest that there is enduring enmity toward McCain in many conservative circles," said Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia. "They just don't like him, and they never will. McCain could walk on water, and their headline would be, 'McCain can't swim.' "

Salmon called the straw poll the latest salvo in an ongoing attack by a disgruntled few.

"We have a couple of people who are activists within the Republican Party who have made it their cause celebre to try to torpedo John McCain, and they play a lot of games," Salmon said. "They try to make it seem like the opposition is a lot bigger and broader than it really is."

Capitalizing on results

In the news release announcing the straw-poll results, Tuttle, the county GOP chairman, invited other Republicans to compete in Arizona's February 2008 presidential primary.

"This straw poll demonstrates that candidates who might be tempted to ignore campaigning here, thinking that our senior senator has it wrapped up, may make a big mistake," Tuttle says in the written statement. "Arizona is very much in play."

DOJ_NMG_0119560

In a telephone interview, Tuttle acknowledged that the straw poll was unscientific and said nobody "tried to make it something that it wasn't."

The straw poll was not publicized, and ballots were hard to find at the meeting, said Tom Liddy, a former Maricopa County GOP chairman and radio talk-show host.

"I started asking around, and a lot of people didn't have them," he said. "Other people, I found, had five or six ballots. So it's kind of bogus."

Tuttle conceded that not everybody got a ballot. But he dismissed claims that the straw poll was rigged against McCain as "horse pucky."

"It was not manipulated in any way that I am aware of," Tuttle said. "The people who voted, I assume, voted their consciences."

Haney said some in attendance voted by proxy for absent committee members, while others did not. The proxy voting "wasn't handled as best as it could be," he said.

Hunter, the straw-poll winner, is the former chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

Haney, who supports Hunter, said Hunter's candidacy started generating local "buzz" after Rep. Trent Franks, R-Ariz., announced his support.

"I expected him to do relatively well, but I didn't expect him to finish first," Haney said.

In 2000, McCain won Arizona's primary despite Republican Gov. Jane Hull's endorsement of George W. Bush.

"Senator McCain has tremendous support in Arizona and was re-elected (in 2004) with nearly 80 percent of the vote," said Danny Diaz, a spokesman for McCain's presidential exploratory committee. "The senator and his team will continue to communicate his message of 'common-sense conservatism' with supporters in the state."

Donna Reagan, a former legislative District 8 GOP chairwoman who attended the county meeting, is rooting for McCain.

"I'm proud that our state has a person who can make a run for the presidency," said Reagan, whose daughter, Michele, is a state lawmaker from Scottsdale.

"What's that saying? Sometimes you're not considered a king in your own country."

What Would Jeb Do? (WP)

By S.v. Date

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Tuesday would have marked his sixth State of the Union address -- and it might have been his best yet.

The nation is in great shape, President Jeb Bush would have reported: record tax cuts propelling the economy to greater heights; a revolutionary school-vouchers program for the first time granting low-income parents real education choices; and, five years after the capture of Osama bin Laden, the final 20,000 U.S. troops returning home from Iraq.

The president would break into his fluent Spanish and wave at his Mexican-born wife, Columba, gazing at him from the balcony. The cameras would settle on their eldest, George P. Bush, 30, and commentators would speculate on whether the dashing lawyer would soon run for Congress and carry on the Bush dynasty.

Yet contrary to the best-laid plans of the Bush family, it won't be John Ellis "Jeb" Bush addressing the nation this week, all because of that disastrous November Tuesday a dozen years ago. That was the day Jeb -- the articulate and handsome workaholic, the one who as a boy spoke of his White House ambitions, and the one the Bush family counted on to avenge the Great Usurpation of 1992 -- narrowly lost his bid to be governor of Florida. Meanwhile, his older brother George W. had overcome long odds and won the Texas governorship, putting George an insurmountable step ahead of Jeb in the race for the presidency.

But what if Jeb had won the Florida governorship in 1994, been reelected and then taken the White House in 2000? How would the nation be different? What sort of State of the Union would he deliver this week?

This is more than an exercise in alternative history. Because of Florida's term limits, Jeb stepped down as governor three weeks ago, but he should not be counted out of the national political scene. I've covered Jeb Bush for eight years as a state capital reporter, and I'm convinced that he remains the GOP conservative wing's best hope for a post-Iraq comeback. And his own political ambitions burn as brightly as ever. Perhaps 2012 or 2016 or -- why not? -- maybe even 2008, if things break right.

DOJ_NMG_0119561

Jeb and George W. are seven years apart but have much in common. Both are stubborn. Both appear convinced that anything that government does the private sector can do better. Both are enamored of tax cuts. And both seem to believe that voters don't have the right to observe the workings of their administrations and should simply trust them to do the right thing. However, the two display real differences on issues spanning crisis management, fiscal policy, foreign policy and, perhaps most important, personal style. Jeb pays much more attention to detail than his brother, and is far more dogged and competent in advancing his agenda -- meaning that a Jeb presidency over the past seven years would have been distinct from his brother's -- and a future one would be as well.

Look first to the home front. On key domestic policy issues such as tax cuts and education reform, Jeb probably would have mirrored his brother's instincts and proposals, though he might have displayed greater staying power in seeing them through.

Under President Jeb, the nation still would have had large federal tax cuts, skewed heavily toward the rich -- or the "risk takers" and "job creators," in Bush family parlance. In Florida, he reduced taxes by $12.2 billion over his eight years, with more than half of that going to the wealthiest 4.5 percent of the population. That saved the average risk taker more than $1,500 a year by the time Jeb left office. And much as President George W. Bush cites tax cuts as the explanation for any positive economic results, Gov. Jeb Bush says that his tax cuts created jobs in Florida and gave us the best economy in the country. (In reality, Jeb had the lowest job-creation rate of any Florida governor dating to 1971.)

On education, Jeb quickly pushed into law a testing program, just as his brother did in Texas and later nationally through No Child Left Behind. Unlike George W., however, Jeb succeeded in introducing the nation's first statewide school-vouchers program. The results are unclear: Jeb says that students who used vouchers to attend private schools received better educations than they had been getting in public schools. But all we know is that the vast majority of such schoolchildren received religious educations at the public's expense. Gov. Bush refused to release the scores for the few voucher children who had to take the public-school standardized test, so whether their educations were superior or awful remains anyone's guess.

For a brief period, George W. sought to include school vouchers in NCLB, but he eventually relented; Jeb, I believe, would never have let it drop. Indeed, much more than his older brother, Jeb seems to take pleasure in the business of governing, as opposed to just campaigning. Whereas George W. claims to stay at 30,000 feet and see the big picture, Jeb is all about the details. He kept long hours as governor, took home fat binders to study each night and knew enough about policy matters to make detailed and cogent arguments for his ideas. It's hard to imagine a President Jeb countenancing the explosion of pork-barrel earmarks in the federal budget the way his brother did, for example. During his eight years as governor, Jeb took the time to slash thousands of such projects out of Florida state budgets, most of them inserted by Republican lawmakers.

His willingness to delve into the nitty gritty probably would have made Jeb a radically different commander in chief than his brother during one of the most dramatic and tragic events of the Bush presidency: Hurricane Katrina.

When a spate of hurricanes struck Florida in the late summer of 2004, Jeb responded quickly. He didn't dream up schemes to give hurricane victims private-school vouchers for their children. He didn't try to privatize disaster response. Instead, he worked on obvious, sensible things: He implemented an effective and thorough evacuation, and then came in quickly with massive assistance, including search-and-rescue teams, water, ice, food, law enforcement -- in more or less that order.

This was Jeb's shining, nonpartisan leadership moment in Florida and, the tragedy notwithstanding, he relished the challenge. He loves to compete, and standing up to a category four or five storm is the ultimate challenge a Florida governor can face.

In the state-of-the-art Emergency Operations Center on the southern edge of Tallahassee, with its giant display screens and dozens of computers, Jeb was in his element, walking around, getting status reports about how many shelters were open, effortlessly issuing commands without worrying about obstructionist judges or meddlesome state legislators.

Had Jeb been president in the days before Katrina struck, he would have known that such a huge storm threatened catastrophe for New Orleans. He would have known that the levees could break -- and he would have made sure that the city and state governments got all the help they needed. Jeb would not have undermined the Federal Emergency Management Agency with cronyism and incompetence. He would have "federalized" Katrina while the storm was still in the Gulf, taking over the evacuation and even using the military to empty the Lower Ninth Ward ahead of the storm, if that's what it took.

DOJ_NMG_0119562

"I have learned a lot during my tenure as governor," Jeb told the Pensacola News Journal during that hurricane season. "One is when to be partisan and when not to be. Storms don't hit just Rs and Ds or independents. They're all Floridians."

I believe Jeb was being candid. He would have responded just as vigorously if the storm had struck a predominantly black, poor and entirely Democratic town as he did when it hit Republican-rich cities such as Pensacola, Punta Gorda and Stuart. A poor Florida city is still a Florida city, and to let a hurricane kill hundreds of Floridians, or to allow it to destroy a town without quickly rebuilding, is to let the hurricane defeat him.

Jeb Bush doesn't do defeat.

That leads to the key question of a Jeb Bush presidency. In public, of course, Jeb has supported his brother's decision to invade Iraq. "It's tough," he said in a recent interview with Newsmax.com. "Thank God the president has been resolute, because it's not a popular war." But would Jeb have made the same choice? Would his state of the union speech this week have to include a lengthy discussion of a war in Iraq gone horribly wrong?

Unlike George, who ridiculed his classmates at Yale University for opposing the Vietnam War but then sought refuge in the National Guard, Jeb was troubled enough by that war that, according to his mother in a 1984 interview, he considered registering as a conscientious objector. Ultimately, he chose not to hurt his father's political career -- at the time, George H.W. Bush was President Richard M. Nixon's ambassador to the United Nations -- and registered for the draft. He was never called. "I had no compelling reason to go to Vietnam" he told the Miami Herald in 1994.

But he has grown more hawkish over time. Jeb Bush was a 1997 signatory to the Project for the New American Century, the neoconservative blueprint for a more "Reaganite" foreign policy. And his mother, Barbara, recalls in her memoirs a 1990 dinner gathering with President George H.W. Bush, their four sons and Air Force Chief of Staff Merrill McPeak. At the time, the president was pondering how to handle Saddam Hussein, who had invaded Kuwait, and Jeb (then 37) agreed with his brothers that their father should deal with Hussein harshly.

Yet Jeb did not sign on to PNAC's 1998 call to invade Iraq and depose Hussein. He also likes and respects former secretary of state Colin L. Powell; perhaps Jeb would have followed the "Powell Doctrine" in Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, pursuing the Taliban and al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden more zealously and using overwhelming force. With about 300,000 troops stabilizing Afghanistan, Iraq might not have become the imperative that it became under George W.

Finally, there is a chance that Jeb's more internationally minded background -- he majored in Latin American studies in college and later lived in Venezuela for two years as a young bank officer -- might have made him open to a nuanced, more even-handed foreign policy, less susceptible to his neoconservative friends urging him to deal with Iraq once and for all.

It is impossible to know, but I suspect that the United States still would have gone to war in Iraq under President Jeb Bush. He would have been amenable to a compelling case from the same neocon camp that influenced George W., and Hussein's 1993 assassination attempt against George H.W. Bush could have clinched the deal. However, once in Iraq, Jeb would have been less prone to botch the job through inattention and cronyism. As with Florida's hurricanes, Jeb probably would have considered the task of invading, occupying and rebuilding a foreign country too important to outsource to political hacks or ideologues.

Once the family's brightest hope for this generation, Jeb may now prove a victim of the political ruin his older brother has brought to the Bush brand. Barely three in 10 Americans think that George W. is doing a good job. What are the chances that voters will gamble on the First Brother?

No one should write Jeb's political epitaph just yet. Even a 2008 presidential run should not be ruled out entirely. Should John McCain or Rudolph W. Giuliani or Mitt Romney fail to build a dominating presence by mid-summer, there is probably only one Republican who could come in at such a late date and still build an effective organization and a powerful fundraising machine in a matter of weeks: Jeb Bush. After all, Jeb raised about $35 million to win reelection as Florida governor four years ago. Pulling in $100 million in a few months is well within the realm of the possible.

In all likelihood, though, 2008 would be tough. The Iraq war is not getting any more popular, and U.S. troops may not be coming home quickly enough to allow Jeb a credible run.

A better fit for Jeb this time around is the number two slot. It would ensure his claim to be the GOP's front-runner in future contests. Coming on the heels of the George W. Bush presidency, the prospect of a Vice President Jeb Bush is not quite as scary as a President Jeb Bush. And the campaign trail is the ideal venue for Jeb to sell himself to the national media. The gap between Jeb, the Serious and Thoughtful Grownup, and George, the Perpetual Frat Boy, would become a major storyline.

DOJ_NMG_0119563

McCain swung by Tallahassee in December 2005 to sound out Jeb about running with him, and any Republican candidate would be foolish not to put him on the short list. He can raise money by the bucketfuls. Unlike his father and brother, Jeb does not tread gingerly through debates as though they were minefields, but uses them to his advantage. The fact that he has a Mexican-born wife could put Democrats on the defensive in California. And he remains popular in electoral-vote-rich Florida.

Jeb Bush will turn 54 next month. He has plenty of time. Given his personality and his sense of mission -- not to mention that his father and brother have already succeeded at this -- it seems impossible that Jeb would not run for president. Whether in two or six or 10 years, the United States will face the prospect of yet another Bush in the White House. Americans will then quickly learn what we in Florida already know: This Bush not only combines his father's interest in governing and his brother's permanent campaign but also brings a relentlessness to impose his will that seems entirely his own.

And ultimately, if Jeb is hobbled by the myth or reality of "Bush fatigue," one cure seems certain: Hillary Rodham Clinton. Should the junior senator from New York run away with the Democratic nomination, Jeb would have a ready answer for those who lament a Bush Dynasty.

"We're going to have a dynasty either way," he could respond. "The question is: Which one do you want? My family or hers?"

S.V. Dáte is the Tallahassee bureau chief for the Palm Beach Post and author of "Jeb: America's Next Bush" (Tarcher/Penguin).

Gut Check (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Colorado Sen. Wayne Allard's decision not to run for reelection last week gives Democrats a prime pickup opportunity in 2008. Is Allard's retirement a blip on the radar or a sign of things to come? Here's a look at the other Republican senators contemplating calling it quits in '08:

Sen. John Warner (Va.): Frustrated by his lack of power and still gasping at George Allen's drubbing in November, this five-term vet may take a pass -- especially if Democrats find a strong candidate.

The Betting: Slight tilt to retire.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.): One of President Bush's strongest GOP war critics, he has never come across as an enthusiastic senator -- and he still has an eye on the White House in '08.

The Betting: Lean retires.

Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.): The former Senate Republican campaign chair had a miserable 2006, but her colleagues believe she will tough it out to reinstate her icon status.

The Betting: Lean runs.

Sen. Pete Domenici (N.M.): The official word is that he's running, but two years is a long time for a 74-year-old who has health problems and appears increasingly frail.

The Betting: Lean retires.

Sen. Larry Craig (Idaho): Another regular on the retirement rumor mill, but Democrats aren't paying much attention, because Idaho is Republican country.

The Betting: Lean runs.

Sen. Thad Cochran (Miss.): He recently suggested that a decision may be a year away. The longer a party loyalist such as Cochran waits, the more inclined he may be to stay.

The Betting: Lean runs.

Carter, Clinton Seek To Bring Together Moderate Baptists (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119564

Former presidents Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton are leading an effort to forge dozens of small and medium-size, black and white Baptist organizations into a robust coalition that would serve as a counterweight to the conservative Southern Baptist Convention.

The giant SBC, with more than 16 million members, has long dominated the political, theological and social landscape among Baptists, often spawning resentment among smaller Baptist groups. It has also been closely aligned with the Republican Party.

The new coalition, which is Carter's brainchild, would give moderate Baptists a stronger collective voice and could provide Democrats with greater entree into the Baptist community. But Carter and other organizers are trying to walk a fine line, insisting that the alliance is not directly political while touting its potential to recast the role of religion in the public square.

"We hope . . . to emphasize the common commitments that bind us together rather than to concentrate on the divisive issues that separate us," Carter said. "There's too much of an image in the Baptist world, and among non-Christians, that the main, permeating characteristic of Christian groups is animosity toward one another and an absence of ability to cooperate in a spirit of brotherhood and sisterhood."

The Rev. Richard Land, head of the SBC's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, said the smaller Baptist groups are in "a search for significance and relevance." He scoffed at the idea that the new coalition would be nonpartisan.

"I'm not going to question their motives. I just know that if I were them, I would be concerned about how it might appear to many people, the timing," Land said. "Purportedly they're going to hold a convention of several thousand people in Atlanta in early 2008, hosted by two former Democratic presidents, one of whom has a wife seeking the Democratic presidential nomination. Some would see that as an overtly political activity."

Carter and Clinton were raised as Southern Baptists but have expressed dismay over the SBC's increasingly conservative bent since traditionalists defeated modernists in a struggle for control of the denomination in the 1970s and '80s.

The leadership battle, which raged over issues such as biblical inerrancy, temperance, homosexuality, abortion and women's role in the church, culminated in 2000 with revisions to the "Baptist Faith and Message" that barred women from serving as pastors and called for wives to "submit graciously" to the leadership of their husbands.

Carter stopped calling himself a Southern Baptist that year. Clinton attended a Methodist church during his years in the White House.

On Jan. 9 at the Carter Center in Atlanta, the two ex-presidents brought together the heads of 40 Baptist denominations and organizations to launch a year-long organizing effort that they hope will climax with the celebration of a "New Baptist Covenant" in early 2008. Clinton described himself as just a "cheerleader" for the effort and declined to be interviewed.

One of the main organizers, William D. Underwood, president of Mercer University in Atlanta, said the covenant's members will spend the coming months identifying joint projects to undertake in international aid, domestic poverty relief and missionary work.

"We're not against any other group of people of faith," he said. "We're against the fact that 100,000 people died last month of malaria. We're against the fact that hundreds of thousands of Africans face starvation each year."

The covenant would not be not a new denomination but a coalition of four historically black Baptist churches -- including the 7.5-million-member National Baptist Convention USA and the 2.5-million-member Progressive National Baptist Convention -- and several predominantly white Baptist groups, including the 1.4-million-member American Baptist Churches USA and the 500,000-member Cooperative Baptist Fellowship.

Together, they have more than 20 million members, outnumbering the SBC, which was not invited to the Atlanta meeting.

"The elephant is no longer in the room. There's been a convergence of the rest of the Baptists in North America," said the Rev. Daniel Vestal, national coordinator of the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, a group of present and former Southern Baptists unhappy with the SBC's course.

"The thrust here is for a voice of Baptists that has not been heard," said the Rev. William J. Shaw, president of the Nashville-based National Baptist Convention USA. "Most of the representations of Baptists have come from the prominent television personalities, and that's okay, but they don't represent the full sweep of Baptist understanding of the faith."

DOJ_NMG_0119565

Shaw said broadcast evangelists such as the Rev. Jerry Falwell and the Rev. Pat Robertson, along with the Southern Baptist Convention, have "downsized the moral message" of the Bible "so that the dominant question has to do with sexuality."

Black Baptist churches, he said, are saying that "sexuality is not the only dimension of morality. The whole business of social justice, of a fair prosecution of offenders, caring for the environment, immigration, even the morality of our foreign policy, are things that really need to be put into the debate."

Land denied that Southern Baptists care only about sexual morality, noting that the SBC was heavily involved in relief efforts after Hurricane Katrina. But he agreed that there appear to be significant disagreements between the SBC and the new coalition.

"One of the areas where we would be in significant disagreement would be our view toward Israel, as highlighted by President Carter's new book," he said, referring to "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid," published in November by Simon & Schuster. Fourteen members of an advisory panel at the Carter Center have resigned over the book's depiction of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Another difference, he said, was made clear last week when Carter spoke of sexual orientation as an "ancillary issue." "Most Southern Baptists would disagree with that," Land said. "We're not going to affirm and accept all sexual orientations."

Although the SBC was not invited to the planning meetings, Carter said he is confident that "many full-fledged Southern Baptists" will join the new covenant.

"We want our whole concept to be receptive and positive and inclusive -- and not exclusive or rejecting any Baptist," he said.

With Rich Little, Press Corps Is Assured A Nice Impression (WP)

By Paul Farhi

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The White House press corps last week found itself embroiled in controversy -- a controversy over its efforts to avoid controversy at an event whose guests include President Bush.

Stung by criticism that comedian Stephen Colbert went too far last year in his remarks at the White House Correspondents' Association annual dinner, the group announced last week that it had lined up a different kind of entertainer for its next dinner on April 21: impersonator Rich Little.

The choice elicited two general reactions: Who? And why?

While the name is probably unfamiliar to people under 40, Little was a popular Las Vegas performer and guest star on TV variety shows of the 1960s and 1970s. He's best known for impressions of celebrities (Johnny Carson, Jimmy Stewart, Jack Benny) and presidents (Nixon and Reagan) who are no longer with us.

But "edgy" Little isn't. Even in his heyday, he didn't do biting topical satire or searing political humor. As a performer, he's more "Ed Sullivan" than "Daily Show."

Which is why, according to Little, he was hired in the first place. "One of the reasons they picked me is because I'm not controversial," he said yesterday from his home in Las Vegas. "They did get some flak about the guy they had last year. I don't think they wanted someone political or controversial again."

Yet after Colbert made waves -- he compared the Bush administration to the Hindenburg disaster, among other things -- some wondered whether choosing Little indicated that the rough, tough White House press corps was going soft, ensuring that its honored guests from the White House would suffer not even the slightest slight.

That's more or less how MSNBC host Keith Olbermann read it; he nominated the entire correspondents' association as his "Worst Person in the World" on his program last week.

Little, 68, disavows comments attributed to him in the Las Vegas Review-Journal last week that seemed to suggest he had been told by the press group to go easy on the president and that he "wouldn't even mention the word 'Iraq' " at the dinner. "No one ever put restrictions on what I can do or say," Little said. "I wouldn't mention Iraq because there's nothing funny about it."

Nevertheless, Little's published comments put the WHCA on the defensive. The group's president, C-SPAN's Steve Scully, issued a statement saying: "The White House Correspondents' Association never dictates or censors the content of a press dinner entertainer's act . . . My advice to [Little's agency] when we booked [him] in December was to follow the time-honored Washington motto [of] the Gridiron Dinner: 'Singe, but never burn.' "

DOJ_NMG_0119566

On the other hand, Scully said in an interview, the group does want to avoid "an Imus moment," a reference to radio talk-show host Don Imus's monologue at the 1996 Radio and Television Correspondents' Association Dinner, in which Imus rankled some of the assembled with off-color cracks about President Clinton's extramarital behavior.

"I loved Colbert and thought he was outstanding," Scully said, "but some people don't get his brand of humor. Do you want to invite someone to a party and make them into a political pi?ata? That's not the purpose of the dinner. It's for [journalists] and their sources and contacts to have an enjoyable evening. That's what we're trying to do."

Scully said his group sought David Letterman, Jay Leno, Billy Crystal and Martin Short as performers for this year's dinner, but none was interested. Scully turned to Little after seeing him perform on Letterman's TV show in November. He accepted the gig, which Scully said pays "in the low five figures."

But even a nice paycheck doesn't make playing black-tie Washington worthwhile, says Lewis Black, comedian and "Daily Show" regular. "What they want at those events are [politically correct] jokes, and P.C. jokes just aren't funny," said Black, who grew up in Silver Spring. "You spend the rest of the year making fun of these people, and when you come to Washington, you have to turn your act into a series of innocuous knock-knock jokes. It's just painful."

When he performed at the Radio and Television Correspondents' Association dinner in 2005, Black said, he edited all of his usual material, even avoiding saying "nipple" in reference to the Janet Jackson "wardrobe malfunction" incident. He also thought it was inappropriate to use the word "laid" in the punch line of a joke about his high school prom, which had been held in the same Hilton Washington ballroom as the dinner.

As for Little's being hired this year by the White House Correspondents' Association, Black said: "It's like going from Jackson Pollock to paint-by-numbers. God love Rich Little, but he's not in this decade. He's in no position to pose any threat to anyone. He makes Bob Hope look like Lenny Bruce. It's sad that we've reached this point" with comedy as political expression.

Another reason to scrap the dinner altogether, suggests Rem Rieder, editor of the American Journalism Review. After the Colbert controversy last year, and an earlier one in which Bush joked about not finding weapons of mass destruction, Rieder wrote that such press-politico events reflect the "smugness" and arrogance of the news media, suggesting that they are "part of a wealthy elite, completely out of touch with ordinary Americans."

The hiring of "a controversy-free" Little underscores the point, he says: "Do we really need a neon sign to proclaim the coziness of the White House press corps and the White House's occupant? It's really hard for me to understand making a decision like this, particularly so close to the WMD debacle. The dinner must go."

George A. Smathers, 93; Former Florida Senator (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

George A. Smathers, 93, a former Democratic senator from Florida who forged friendships with presidents, waged war against communism, resisted civil rights legislation and was an early voice warning against Fidel Castro's rise to power in Cuba, died Jan. 20 at Indian Creek Village, an exclusive island community near Miami. He had a stroke earlier in the week.

Mr. Smathers was among a new breed of congressmen -- including John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon -- who arrived on Capitol Hill in the late 1940s and were shaped by their experience in World War II. Mr. Smathers used his during more than two decades in Washington to focus on international issues and to fight communism.

Early in his career he was considered a moderate, but by the time he left office in 1969, he had a tarnished legacy as an opponent of civil rights.

Charming, tall and handsome -- his opponents called him "Gorgeous George" -- Mr. Smathers easily won friends. He spoke on behalf of the groom at Kennedy's wedding rehearsal dinner. When Lyndon B. Johnson suffered his first heart attack, Mr. Smathers was at his side. And when Nixon sought a refuge from the White House, Mr. Smathers sold him a house on Key Biscayne in Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0119567

In spite of his connections, Mr. Smathers sometimes found himself at odds with his party's leadership. Like other Southern Democrats, he coddled segregationist white voters. He supported voting rights for African Americans but sought to weaken other equal rights measures and voted against the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964.

He opposed Thurgood Marshall's nomination to the Supreme Court and called the Brown v. Board of Education decision, which declared school segregation illegal -- a "clear abuse of judicial power." When the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was jailed in St. Augustine, Fla., Mr. Smathers offered to pay King's bail, but only if he left the state.

As an expert on Latin America, Mr. Smathers supported the Alliance for Progress, which pumped billions of dollars in aid to the region. He was also among the earliest and loudest voices cautioning of Castro's communist leanings and urged a hard-line approach to Cuba and a total embargo on its goods.

George Armistead Smathers was born Nov. 13, 1913, in Atlantic City. His father was a federal judge and his uncle a U.S. senator. His family moved to Miami when he was 6, and he won his first election, as student body president, while attending Miami Senior High School.

After graduating from the University of Florida, he received a law degree from there in 1938. He served as an assistant U.S. district attorney, then entered the Marine Corps during World War II.

In 1946, Mr. Smathers won his congressional seat by unseating a four-term representative. He and Kennedy, who was elected the same year, shared similar affluent backgrounds, wartime experiences and a passion for golf -- and women. Hampered by a bad back and other war injuries, Kennedy sometimes leaned on Mr. Smathers as they walked to the floor of Congress to cast votes.

When Mr. Smathers ran for the Senate in 1950, the race turned out to be among the most contentious in Florida's history. Mr. Smathers badgered incumbent Sen. Claude Pepper (D) on his support of civil rights and accused Pepper of being a communist sympathizer. Both sides issued scurrilous statements, but the most famous remarks may never have been uttered.

"Do you know that Claude Pepper is known all over Washington as a shameless extrovert?" Mr. Smathers was quoted as saying. "Not only that, but this man is reliably reported to practice nepotism with his sister-in-law and he has a sister who was once a thespian in wicked New York. Worst of all, it is an established fact that Mr. Pepper, before his marriage, habitually practiced celibacy."

The comments appeared in Time magazine and were forever etched into public memory, but Mr. Smathers denied ever having made them. Pepper's backers called Mr. Smathers a fearmonger and a bigot, but Mr. Smathers prevailed.

In Congress, Mr. Smathers helped pass bills to create Medicare, the Small Business Administration and Everglades National Park. He pushed for federal holidays to be moved to Mondays and ardently supported the war in Vietnam.

After voluntarily leaving office in 1969, Mr. Smathers made a fortune through lobbying and varied business ventures, ranging from orange groves to car dealerships. He gave tens of millions of dollars to the University of Florida and the University of Miami.

His first marriage, to Rosemary Townley Smathers, ended in divorce soon after his departure from politics.

Survivors include his wife, Carolyn Hyder Smathers, whom he married in the early 1970s, of Indian Creek Village; two sons from his first marriage, John Smathers of Arlington and Bruce Smathers, a former Florida secretary of state, of Jacksonville; a sister; and three grandchildren.

Talks On Palestinian Unity Postponed (AP)

By Zeina Karam, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 21, 2007

Key talks on forming a Palestinian unity government and ending deadly infighting were canceled Saturday night, dimming expectations for a planned meeting between the Palestinian president and the exiled leader of Hamas militants.

"The meeting was postponed until tomorrow (at the earliest). We hope that it will be held," Izzat Rashaq, a member of Hamas' politburo, told The Associated Press.

Rashaq said further preliminary negotiations were needed to resolve differences over forming a coalition government before Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal could meet. He did not elaborate.

Another senior member of a Palestinian faction also told AP the meeting had been postponed.

DOJ_NMG_0119568

"There are difficulties facing such a meeting and there are current mediations to try and resolve the problems," he said, agreeing to discuss the matter only if not quoted by name or even by faction because of the sensitivity of the matter.

There had been hopes that the meeting — the first between Abbas and Mashaal since July 2005 — could end the yearlong political deadlock between the militant Hamas, which controls the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet, and Abbas' more moderate Fatah movement.

With the two sides unable to agree, tensions have repeatedly exploded into warfare in the Gaza Strip — a traditional Hamas stronghold — that has killed at least 62 people.

The thorniest issues are control of the two factions' security forces and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist.

Western nations are demanding that the militant Islamic group accept Israel's existence and renounce violence as a condition for ending an economic boycott they imposed on the Palestinian Authority after Hamas won legislative elections last year.

Abbas has been pushing Hamas for months to form a unity government of independent experts in hopes of ending the sanctions and has threatened to call early elections if the two sides can't agree.

Before Abbas arrived in Damascus on Saturday, he had billed the planned talks with Mashaal as a last-ditch effort to end the crisis.

But, as Abbas began meeting with leading members of other Palestinian factions Saturday evening, his aide Saeb Erekat sought to play down the significance of any talks with Mashaal and would not confirm a meeting had been planned.

"The purpose of this visit is for President Abbas to meet with (Syrian) President (Bashar) Assad, though I'm not excluding the possibility of President Abbas meeting with Mr. Mashaal and other Palestinian leaders in Damascus," Erekat told reporters.

Abbas met with the Syrian-based leaders of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine and Islamic Jihad at his hotel in the Syrian capital.

Rashaq, the Hamas official, said Islamic Jihad leaders and the leaders of other Palestinian factions were involved in mediation efforts to try to resolve the problems between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement. "We hope an agreement can be reached," he said.

Mashaal has lived in Damascus since 1997, when he survived an Israeli assassination attempt in Jordan.

Abbas came to Damascus bolstered by Israel's release to him on Friday of $100 million in frozen Palestinian taxes that the Jewish state has refused to turn over to the Hamas-controlled Palestinian government.

Israel said the money would be used by Abbas for humanitarian purposes and to strengthen his security forces.

___

Associated Press writer Albert Aji contributed to this report.

Lawmaker's Tough Talk Rouses Fatah Faithful (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

RAMALLAH, WEST BANK — Once again, Mohammed Dahlan is playing the heavy.

The former Palestinian security chief gained a reputation for having an iron hand during a crackdown against Hamas a decade ago. Now he again is at the forefront of his Fatah movement's conflict with the radical Islamist group.

The 45-year-old lawmaker stoked tensions during a fiery speech at a rally in the Gaza Strip this month, angrily labeling Hamas "murderers" and vowing to strike back twice as hard if its gunmen carried out more attacks on his Fatah brethren.

The address, marking Fatah's 42nd anniversary, came three days after Hamas forces besieged the Gaza home of a senior Fatah security official, killing him and six others as the official pleaded for help in a telephone call aired live by Palestinian radio.

During the Jan. 7 rally, which drew tens of thousands of backers, Dahlan defiantly pushed his bodyguards away, reportedly telling them to "let Hamas shoot me."

Hamas activists call Dahlan a thug and say he is serving as a proxy for Israeli and U.S. efforts to oust them from power.

DOJ_NMG_0119569

But the tough talk also generated an exhilarating shiver among many members of the once-dominant Fatah movement, still struggling to regain its balance a year after losing parliamentary elections to Hamas, and renewed speculation among Palestinians over Dahlan's ambitions.

"He wants to be the president of the Palestinians. It is very clear," said Hani Masri, a Palestinian commentator in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Poised and well groomed

Dahlan dismisses such speculation, even though he has helped fuel it by assuming a higher profile after many months in the background. Poised and always impeccably groomed, Dahlan lately has appeared nearly inseparable from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, also of Fatah, with whom he has had an up-and-down relationship.

Israeli media have reported that Abbas quietly named Dahlan to oversee Palestinian security forces, in effect putting him in command of Fatah's battle with Hamas. Dahlan has denied it.

"I'm just a member of Fatah and not more than that. I will carry out my responsibilities on that basis," he told foreign journalists in a briefing Friday. "I'm a person up the street."

Among the next generation of Fatah activists, polls generally show Dahlan and Marwan Barghouti, the jailed leader of the Palestinian uprising, as the favored potential successors to Abbas.

Many party members complain of a leadership vacuum since the death of Yasser Arafat in 2004. Abbas, 71, has not indicated any plans to step aside, nor made it clear whether he will run if early elections are held this year. Abbas has called for presidential and parliamentary elections to break the months-long impasse with Hamas, but he has not followed through.

Dahlan is popular in Gaza, where clan ties helped him win a legislative seat despite Hamas' near sweep and where he retains influence with thousands of members of the security forces loyal to Fatah. A canny political survivor and charismatic counterpoint to the drab Abbas, he receives a rock star's reception among admirers, especially women and young people.

But he has scant support in the more populous West Bank. Even Fatah members there regard him as potentially divisive and in too big a hurry for power. Moreover, ordinary Palestinians view Dahlan's lifestyle as lavish, possible evidence of his ties to the graft that was rampant under Arafat. Dahlan has denied corruption allegations.

But by standing up to Hamas, Dahlan appears to have provided his listless party with a fortifying jolt. His speech came during a spate of factional violence that killed more than 30 people.

"It was very important to Fatah. It gave them this push back by showing there was someone willing to stand up," said Diana Buttu, a political analyst and former legal advisor to the Palestine Liberation Organization. "For the first time in a long time, he energized the movement."

Analyst Ghassan Khatib, a former planning minister, said Dahlan had to step up when the Fatah-Hamas deadlock turned violent.

"Fatah needed a strong man in Gaza to lead," Khatib said. "He's the only one who can do that."

'Leading the coup'

Hamas has portrayed Dahlan as the embodiment of its fight with Fatah.

"Dahlan is leading the coup against the democratically elected government," said Ismail Radwan, a Hamas spokesman in Gaza.

Hamas officials accused Dahlan of orchestrating what they said was an assassination attempt against Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh in December. Hamas spokesmen say Dahlan has incited further factional violence, and they accused him of treason.

Dahlan depicts Hamas members as religious zealots bent on keeping power no matter the cost.

"If Hamas kills somebody from Fatah, I will not stay quiet. I will confront them," he told reporters.

The two sides have a history of bad blood.

Dahlan, who led a Fatah youth group in the Gaza Strip during the 1980s, recalls with disdain that the Islamists refused to join the Palestinian resistance movement. Hamas leaders, meanwhile, blame Dahlan for the torture and humiliation they said their members endured at the hands of his forces when Arafat ordered a crackdown in 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0119570

Dahlan grew up in a refugee camp in Khan Yunis, in the southern Gaza Strip, and as a young Fatah activist repeatedly was jailed by Israeli authorities before being deported to Jordan in 1988. He later joined Arafat in Tunis, Tunisia, and returned in 1994 with the rest of the exiled Palestinian leadership after the signing of the interim peace agreement with Israel.

He has served as a negotiator, but came to be known for his role in security matters. Although Dahlan had a stormy relationship with Arafat, he never formally broke with the late leader.

Dahlan is viewed among Palestinians as the strongest man in Gaza, with thousands of guns at his command, and as a favorite of U.S. officials. Many Palestinians remain wary of Dahlan's past cooperation with Israel on security issues, saying he became too closely associated with the Jewish state even though he came under fire from Israeli forces after violence broke out in 2000.

"He is seen as a man who seems very close to America and Israel during a period when neither one is giving the Palestinians anything," said Masri, the commentator.

A senior U.S. State Department official described Dahlan as "a serious guy" who supports peace with Israel "on terms favorable to the Palestinians."

The Bush administration is seeking congressional approval for $86 million in what it describes as nonlethal aid to bolster security forces under the control of Abbas. Officials in Hamas consider the move part of an effort to undermine it.

Dahlan says his focus since Fatah's defeat has been to rebuild and rejuvenate the party, now led largely by men of advanced years, in anticipation of the next electoral battle.

"Wherever I can assist Fatah and can serve Fatah, I will do it," he said. "If Hamas gets upset, it's not my problem."

U.S. Troops To Protect Serbs In Kosovo (WT)

By John Phillips, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

BELGRADE, Serbia -- The United States has moved troops to northern Kosovo to protect the Serbian minority ahead of elections today in Serbia, where nationalists have pledged to prevent the province's ethnic-Albanian majority from obtaining independence.

Two U.S. military platoons, accompanied by one Austrian and one Georgian platoon were deployed in late December for a month to a NATO camp at Leposavic, close to the border with Serbia, Kosovo's peacekeepers' headquarters announced. The redeployment was part of NATO's plan for rapid intervention aimed at providing security for about 100,000 Serbs living in Kosovo.

A U.N. civil administration mission and about 16,000 NATO protection troops have been in Kosovo to curb ethnic conflicts since 1999, when an Allied bombing campaign expelled Serbian forces.

The war ended a wave of brutal ethnic cleansing against the Kosovar civilian population by Serbian then-President Slobodan Milosevic's regime.

In the Kosovo capital of Pristina, leaders of ethnic Albanians, who make up 90 percent of the province's population of 1.8 million, insist on independence. Serbia Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica has said Kosovo will be part of Serbia and the historic cradle of Serbian culture forever.

After the election, Kosovo is expected to be offered limited independence from Belgrade.

The latest rotation of about 1,500 U.S. troops under Brig. Gen. Douglas Earhart, commander of the U.S. Army National Guard's 29th Infantry Division and of Kosovo Forces Multi-National Task Force (East) moved into position in Kosovo last month. Most are Guard troops from Virginia, Massachusetts, 20 other states and Puerto Rico.

The United Nations late last year delayed a recommendation by the U.N. special envoy for Kosovo, Martti Ahtisaari, on the future status of Kosovo so as not to prejudice the Serbian elections.

NATO said last week it is unlikely to reduce troop levels in the province until 2008. NATO has 16,500 soldiers from 35 countries deployed in Kosovo.

"We will maintain our mandate, our strength, our organization on 2007," Lt. Gen. Roland Kather, the German commander of NATO's Kosovo force, said at a press conference. "I think that there will be no change until early 2008, and then we'll have to look at how far we have come."

DOJ_NMG_0119571

Kosovo Looms Over Serbian Vote (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

BELGRADE, SERBIA — Once the most powerful of the former Yugoslav republics and a kingdom that reached from the Adriatic to the Aegean, Serbia is about to lose the only vestige of its days of glory: Kosovo.

United Nations mediators say they will unveil their plan for the province, which is predominantly ethnic Albanian and Muslim, and has been governed as a U.N. protectorate since 1999, sometime after today's Serbian general elections.

Although the result of their deliberations appears to be a foregone conclusion and most outsiders have viewed Kosovo as a separate entity since a U.S.-led NATO air campaign forced the withdrawal of Serbian security forces, Serbs hardly see the same reality.

The imminent loss of the province has been a central issue in the parliamentary campaign. Serbian politicians, intent on proving their loyalty to the country's traditional identity, have pulled out the stops to convince the world that the province should remain within their nation's borders.

They have hired the high-powered Republican-affiliated lobbying firm of Barbour Griffith & Rogers in Washington. The Serbian Orthodox Church has allied itself with televangelist Pat Robertson, who shares its concern about the rise of Muslim influence in the West.

Serbian political leaders have been on the phone to the Russians, fellow Slavs who have veto power in the U.N. Security Council, which would have to approve any broad independence deal.

Symbol of righteousness

Why does the province exert such a hold on the Serbian imagination? Landlocked, poor and now populated mostly by ethnic Albanians hostile to Serbs, it nonetheless has become a symbol of Serbia's image of itself as a righteous nation, a beacon of the Orthodox Christian world.

"We were all raised on the Kosovo myth … and Serbs, even if they don't go there, see it as part of their country, part of our history," said Rade Stanic, editor of the newsweekly Evropa.

Every Serbian schoolchild studies the epic poetry that describes the 14th century battle of medieval Serbian princes against the Turks. Although the Turks won, Serbs believe they won in the eyes of heaven by martyring themselves on Kosovo Polje, the battlefield that gives the province its name.

Prince Lazar, the hero, is given a choice by a gray falcon on the eve of the battle: "Which kingdom is it that you long for most? / Will you choose a heavenly crown today? / Or will you choose an earthly crown?"

Lazar chooses heaven. "Earthly kingdoms are such passing things / A heavenly kingdom, raging in the dark, endures eternally," he says.

To this day, Kosovo is thought of as Serbia's Jerusalem. The seat of the Serbian Orthodox Church and the titular home of the patriarch, its spiritual leader, as well as some of its most beautiful and historic monasteries, are at Pec, deep in Kosovo.

However, Kosovo's population now is 90% ethnic Albanian. A majority of them are Muslims; most of the rest are Catholics.

Serb politicians' mantra

The election campaign in Serbia has focused on many immediate issues such as unemployment and inflation, but talk of Kosovo's status has also been a mantra. On this issue, there is little difference in the positions of the leading parties, all of which support Kosovo remaining part of Serbia.

The likely outcome of the elections will be a split among the three leading parties: The Radical Party, led by Vojislav Seselj, who is being held in The Hague on war crimes charges, takes a nationalist stand and believes that Serbia must confront the West; the party of Vojislav Kostunica, the current prime minister, advocates a slow rapprochement with Europe and the West; and the party of President Boris Tadic is more Western-leaning.

Kostunica, a lawyer by training, has endeavored to make a strong case that under international law, no sovereign country has ever been forced to grant independence to part of its territory. Serbs argue that it is as if Florida wanted to be a separate country, and the world decided that the U.S. should be compelled to give it independence.

DOJ_NMG_0119572

U.S. diplomats queried on the point said that lawyers had not looked at the precedents but that Kosovo's case was different because it had been a U.N. protectorate, and that the Serbian "ethnic cleansing" there in 1999 in effect ended Serbia's right to control the province.

But Kostunica's argument has resonated with Russian leaders, who fear that if Kosovo can be taken away from Serbia, they could lose areas of Russia that aspire to independence, such as Chechnya.

If Russia opposes independence at the Security Council, ethnic Albanian officials would have to declare independence and wait for countries to recognize Kosovo as a sovereign state, a far more unwieldy process.

Serbian political analysts believe that the West has failed to take into account the potential for a nationalist backlash if Kosovo separates. In that case, the Radical Party, with its more isolationist ideology, would gain significant support, they argue.

"It would be best if things stay as they are; Kosovo already has a sort of de facto independence. But political symbolism is very important, and the United States and the international community is wrong to push for a formal resolution of Kosovo's status," said Djordje Vukadinovic, a professor of political science at Belgrade University.

"The status quo leaves the illusion of sovereignty and allows Serbia not to lose face by having its territory shrink again," he said. "It's a mirage, but mirages are useful in politics and it would mean a reduction in radicalism, which Washington does not want and which would otherwise grow."

Waiting game

Diplomats said it was possible that the U.N. would delay an announcement of Kosovo's status until after Serbia forms a government, which could take a month or more.

In the meantime, Kosovo's Albanians have become increasingly frustrated with the slow movement on their province's status, and some experts warn that spring could bring a renewal of violence.

Vukadinovic and others point out that Serbs never refer to Kosovo's "final status," the terminology used by Kosovo's Albanians and by the West, but speak of its "future" status.

"Saying 'future' status suggests that there could be other futures after the next one, and it leaves open the possibility that the Serbs will control Kosovo again," said a political consultant in Belgrade, the capital of Serbia, who asked not to be named because of the subject's political sensitivity. He noted that it took more than four centuries after the Serbs' defeat by the Turks for them to regain control of Kosovo, but that eventually they succeeded.

"Serbs don't think in years," he said, "they think in centuries."

PM: U.S. Wants Base In Czech Republic (AP)

By Karel Janicek, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 21, 2007

The United States has asked the Czech Republic to host a radar base that would be part of a global missile defense system, the prime minister announced Saturday, drawing a warning from Russia of retaliatory actions.

U.S. officials contend the system could defend Europe against intercontinental missiles fired by states such as Iran and North Korea. But the Kremlin warned that the military balance in Europe could be at stake and said the development risked a new arms race.

Independent defense experts have said the ground-based missile defense system is still years from being able to protect against long-range missile attacks.

Washington declined comment on Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek's statement. But the U.S. has been negotiating with Poland and the Czech Republic, both former communist states now in NATO, as it explores setting up missile defense sites in Eastern Europe.

The U.S. has missile interceptor bases in Alaska and California. It activated a powerful X-band radar site in northern Japan as part of the system last September, but so far has no anti-missile weapons based outside U.S. territory.

The U.S. request that the Czech Republic host only an X-band radar facility could indicate Washington is considering putting launchers for anti-missile missiles in Poland.

DOJ_NMG_0119573

Czech authorities refused to comment on Poland's possible role. Topolanek said only that he would discuss the issue with his Polish counterpart, Jaroslaw Kaczynski.

Topolanek said his government would name a committee in the next week to consider the U.S. request and a decision could take several months. Czech opposition parties have spoken against the defense system, and the premier's governing coalition does not have enough parliament votes to pass measures on its own.

In Moscow, Andrei Kokoshin, the former Russian Security Council chief who now heads parliament's committee for ties with former Soviet bloc nations, warned that Czech approval of the plan would "not pass without consequences."

Russian lawmakers dealing with security issues "will recommend taking retaliatory measures" that would "help maintain strategic stability and ensure the national security of Russia and our friends and allies," Kokoshin was quoted as telling the Interfax news agency.

A State Department spokesman, Edgar Vasquez, told The Associated Press he could not confirm that the Czechs had been asked to host the radar site and Poles the missile interceptors. He only repeated that negotiations were under way.

"Depending on the result of the discussions, the U.S. will seek to field a limited number of ground-based missile defense silo launchers, with their associated interceptors, similar to those currently fielded at Fort Greely, Alaska, and to deploy an X-band radar for midcourse tracking and discrimination of ballistic missile threats out of the Middle East," he said.

Vasquez would not specify which countries in the Middle East are considered a threat, but U.S. officials and others worry about Iran's development of long-range missiles that can reach Europe.

The missile defense system is intended to begin tracking missiles early during their boost phase and then guide intercepter missiles that would destroy the threatening missiles in flight.

So far, the U.S. military has deployed only a small number of interceptor missiles — at least 11 at Fort Greely and two at Vandenberg Air Force Base on the central California coast.

Topolanek said that if the Czech Republic approves the U.S. request, some 200 American specialists would be deployed here and the base would become operational in 2011.

"We are convinced that a possible deployment of the radar station on our territory is in our interest," he said. "It will increase security of the Czech Republic and Europe."

___

Associated Press writers Maria Danilova in Moscow and John Heilprin in Washington contributed to this report.

Turkish Police Arrest Teenage Suspect In Editor's Killing (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

ISTANBUL, Jan. 20 — The Turkish police on Saturday arrested a 17-year-old suspect in the killing of a newspaper editor who championed Armenian rights, Turkish authorities said.

The editor, Hrant Dink, 52, a Turk of Armenian descent, was shot Friday afternoon outside the office of his newspaper, Agos. A gunman was recorded by a surveillance camera nearby, and the police appealed to the public for help in identifying him.

On Saturday night, Ogun Samast was captured in Samsun, a Black Sea port, after his father recognized his images from the surveillance video and notified the police in Trabzon, their hometown, said Muammer Guler, Istanbul's governor, at a news conference just before midnight.

"The suspect was captured in Samsun on a passenger bus destined to Trabzon, together with all the evidence, including his gun and the white beret" seen in the video, Mr. Guler said.

Mr. Samast, an unemployed secondary school graduate who arrived in Istanbul a week ago, admitted killing Mr. Dink, the Samsun police said.

The police are also looking into possible links between Mr. Samast and the killing of a Catholic priest, Andrea Santaro, last February. The assailant was a 16-year-old who, like the priest and Mr. Samast, was from Trabzon.

DOJ_NMG_0119574

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan praised the efforts of the security forces Saturday and expressed satisfaction that an arrest had been made before Mr. Dink's funeral on Tuesday. "We're going to continue investigations with the same determination," Mr. Erdogan told the reporters, assuring that the arrest was only the start.

Mr. Guler said at a news conference earlier Saturday that Mr. Samast had visited the Agos office on Friday. He apparently posed as a university student hoping to meet Mr. Dink, whose secretary told the young man he would need an appointment.

The secretary later saw him loitering outside the office before Mr. Dink was attacked, Mr. Guler said.

Kazim Kolcuoglu, head of the Istanbul Bar Association, noting that Mr. Samast and the killer of Mr. Santaro were under 18, said that minors in Turkey are used in slayings because they face lower penalties than an adult convicted of the same crime.

As a 17-year-old, Mr. Samast will be interrogated by a public prosecutor instead of the police, and will be tried at a minors' court, which will lead to certain reductions on his possible jail term, Mr. Kolcuoglu said.

Mr. Dink's murder has shocked Turkey. Mr. Erdogan condemned the shooting as a direct attack on Turkey's stability, and analysts from diverse political backgrounds appeared to agree.

"If the trigger finger aimed at the air of stability and confidence in Turkey, it hit the bull's eye," wrote Mehmet Barlas, a columnist for the center-right newspaper Sabah.

Although analysts like Mr. Barlas saw the assassination as a politically motivated attack on Turkey's progress toward membership in the European Union, others blamed a controversial law under which Mr. Dink had been convicted of insulting the Turkish identity.

Mr. Dink, who angered many in Turkey by challenging the official Turkish version of the 1915 Armenian genocide, was given a six-month, suspended sentence. But in the eyes of many radical nationalists, it made him a target.

Meanwhile, people continued to flock to the Agos office in Istanbul. Chants of "We are all Armenians, we are all Hrants," filled the air.

"We're here because we lost one of us," said a 33-year-old woman. As a teacher, she declined to give her name because it is illegal in Turkey for public workers to make public comments. "I want to see the perpetrators be brought to justice and the plot behind this assassination clarified immediately," she said.

Agos, the only bilingual Armenian-Turkish newspaper in Turkey, was founded and run by Mr. Dink since 1996.

"We lost the voice that spoke for us, but Turkey lost as much as we did," said Nadya Ismezoglu, an Armenian woman standing outside the Agos office. "Our pain is indescribable."

Look Up! Is It A Threat? Or A Plea For A Ban? (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

THE nation's star warriors, frustrated that their plans to arm the heavens went nowhere for two decades despite more than $100 billion in blue-sky research, felt a shiver of hope last week with news that China had conducted its first successful test of an antisatellite weapon.

Having long warned of the Chinese threat, they now said their fears were vindicated and expressed optimism for their own projects, which range from new kinds of defensive satellites to flotillas of space weapons and orbital battle stations able to shatter all kinds of enemy arms.

China, a group of 26 "Star Wars" supporters warned in a recent report, has "begun to erode American space dominance" and will accelerate that slide with "both lasers and missiles capable of destroying satellites."

H. Baker Spring of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research group in Washington, said in an interview that the cost to the United States of new arms and defensive measures would most likely run to "billions or tens of billions of dollars a year, pretty much year in and year out," and added, "I don't think that's excessive."

But the prospect of a new arms race in space is also energizing an opposition, including arms control supporters and fiscal conservatives alarmed at the rising costs of the Iraq war. Treaties could short-circuit the costly game of measure-countermeasure on the high frontier before it expands any further, they say. Currently, no international treaty or domestic law forbids such developments.

DOJ_NMG_0119575

An unfettered arms race could hurt the United States more than any other nation, arms control advocates argue. The United States owns or operates 443 of the 845 active satellites that now orbit the planet, or 53 percent. By contrast, China owns just 4 percent.

"We not only have the most satellites but they are more integrated into our economy and our way of making war than any other country," said Laura Grego, a staff scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, a private group in Cambridge, Mass., that takes liberal positions on arms issues and environmental issues. "We have the most to lose in an unrestrained arms race."

But that logic has not persuaded the Star Wars advocates, who say the United States needs to protect its huge investment in space satellites by being ahead of anyone else in shooting such devices out of the sky.

Diplomats from around the globe have gathered in Geneva for many years to hammer out a treaty on the "Prevention of an Arms Race in Outer Space," which would ban space weapons. Arms control supporters say China and Russia have backed the process, while the United States has dragged its feet.

Last year, John Mohanco, a State Department official, told the diplomats in Geneva that as long as attacks on satellites remained a threat, "our government will continue to consider the possible role that space-related weapons may play in protecting our assets."

A Heritage Foundation analysis of such diplomacy says China is charging ahead to build space arms while "seeking to block the United States from developing its own anti-satellite weapons and space-based ballistic missile defense systems."

China's strategy, the analysis says, is clear: "Work on public opinion in the United States to make moral arguments against weapons in space, develop international coalitions to limit the way that the United States can use space, and develop China's own weapons systems and tactics to destroy American satellites and space-based weapons."

But Theresa Hitchens, a critic of the administration's space arms research who is director of the Center for Defense Information, a private group in Washington that tracks military programs, said that China's antisatellite test might be "a shot across the bow" meant to prod the Bush administration into serious negotiations. In the test, a Chinese missile pulverized an aging Chinese weather satellite more than 500 miles above Earth on Jan. 11.

Ms. Hitchens warned that an arms race in space could easily spin out of control, noting that India has been "rattling its sword" and some experts in that country are openly calling for antisatellite arms. A global competition that produced armadas of space weapons, she added, could raise the risk of accidental nuclear war if, for instance, a whirling piece of space junk knocked out a spy satellite.

"How do you know it's not a precursor to a nuclear attack?" she asked. "Do you have an itchy trigger finger? If you've got a lot of satellites out there, you probably do."

The Bush administration has conducted secret research that critics say could produce a powerful ground-based laser meant to shatter enemy satellites. The project, parts of which were made public through Air Force budget documents submitted to Congress last year, appears to be part of a wide-ranging administration effort to develop space weapons, both defensive and offensive.

John E. Pike, who is the director of GlobalSecurity.org, a group in Washington that conducts research on military and space topics, said that treaties and defensive measures were the smart, cheap way to counter antisatellite threats, and that the star warriors in the wake of the Chinese tests were playing a false card.

"They're trying to piggyback on a totally unrelated topic," he said. "This says nothing about space-based weapons, star wars or any of that."

But a report, "Missile Defense, the Space Relationship and the 21st Century," researched by a group of organizations that focus on national security issues and published late last year by the Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis, called the military development of the high frontier vital to the nation's protection from a wide variety of threats — including Chinese arms.

"Without the means to dissuade, deter and defeat the growing number of strategic adversaries now arrayed against it," the group warned, "the United States will be unable to maintain its status of global leadership."

Vatican Urges "Dialogue" With China To Rebuild Ties (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

DOJ_NMG_0119576

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

ROME, Jan. 20 — The Vatican issued a measured statement on Saturday on its future relations with China, saying it wanted a "respectful and constructive dialogue" to rebuild diplomatic ties but still noting the "suffering" of Chinese Catholics.

The statement was issued after two days of high-level talks at the Vatican on rebuilding relations with China. The statement said Pope Benedict XVI intended to write a letter to Catholics in China, though it did not say when or hint at any message.

The pope and Chinese officials have expressed a desire to restore diplomatic ties broken in 1951 when the Communist government took over. But any concrete steps were frozen after the official Chinese church, which answers to the government, appointed several bishops last year without the Vatican's consent.

The pope issued statements protesting the appointment of the bishops, saying that China had violated a long-standing, if informal, agreement in which the Vatican was able to have a tacit role in the process.

But the statement on Saturday was even in its tone, avoiding harsh criticism of China as it spoke of "following the road of a respectful and constructive dialogue with the governing authority to overcome the misunderstandings of the past."

The reconciliatory tone seemed aimed at encouraging more talks with the government. Still, the statement strongly praised the bravery of Catholics in China who are loyal to Rome, rather than to the Chinese authorities. An "official church" of five million Catholics, presided over by the government, exists beside with an underground church of 10 million.

"It is noted, with deep recognition, the luminous testimony offered by bishops, priests and the faithful, who without ceding to compromises, have maintained their faith to Seat of St. Peter, at times even at the price of grave suffering," the statement read.

The pope did not take part in the meetings, though the statement said he was fully briefed.

Benedict Seen As Isolated At Vatican (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

VATICAN CITY -- The forced resignation of Pope Benedict XVI's handpicked choice for archbishop of Warsaw, Stanislaw Wielgus, has exposed divisions within the Vatican, which insiders say have left the pontiff increasingly isolated.

"Benedict does not have a decisive temperament and must take into account his age," said the Italian Panorama newsmagazine. "The initiatives he has taken are meeting with much resistance."

Bishop Wielgus announced his resignation on Jan. 9, just two days after accepting the post, in the face of disclosures that he had been an agent for Poland's communist secret service for decades and twice attended its spy school.

Benedict had passed over six other candidates to select Bishop Wielgus for the post, actions that suggest he was at best poorly advised by his entourage, Vatican sources say.

The Vatican declined to comment for this article.

The controversy over Bishop Wielgus recalled the Muslim furor over a papal speech last year at the University of Regensburg in Germany. Afterward, Vatican watchers asked why the pope's aides had not spotted the potentially offensive remarks in the text and removed them in advance.

Marco Politi, the respected Vatican reporter for La Repubblica newspaper, said many officials in the Curia, the church's central government, resent the conservative pontiff and see him as "a man of the past."

As he prepares to celebrate his 80th birthday on April 16, Benedict evidently has fostered resentment by trying to sideline several Polish clerics appointed to senior Vatican posts by Polish-born John Paul II, who died in 2005.

Cardinal Edmund Szoka, a Polish-American, was replaced as governor of Vatican City, responsible for the day-to-day running of the tiny state in Rome.

Also planned is the transfer of Edward Nowak, the secretary for the Congregation of Saints, the body that rules on requests for sainthood, according to Panorama.

In another move, Benedict was expected to replace the archbishop of Moscow, Tadeusz Kondrusiewicz, also Polish, to improve the pope's chances of arranging a historic meeting with Russian Orthodox Patriarch Alexius II, Vatican sources say.

In recent months, the German pontiff has moved to reorganize his inner Cabinet around Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the extroverted Vatican secretary of state from the Salesian Order.

DOJ_NMG_0119577

Cardinal Bertone, named in September, made headlines last month by suggesting that the Vatican could field a soccer team in Italy's first division.

Other key appointments include Dominique Mamberti as effective foreign minister of the Holy See and the elevation of Indian Cardinal Ivan Dias to head the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

But Benedict, who is more used to playing a low-key role as John Paul's personal theologian, evidently has had difficulty becoming a team leader.

"For months, Benedict appeared isolated, closed up in his study polishing his speeches, writing his book on Jesus of Nazareth to be published in April or playing the piano," said Ignazio Ingrao, who writes for Panorama.

"His only outings were dinners at the home of his former secretary, Monsignor Josef Clemens. He has paid dearly for not being a team player."

La Repubblica said the pope was furious when he was forced to accept Bishop Wielgus' resignation only hours before his formal installation.

Among those Benedict reportedly passed over for the Warsaw Archdiocese was Stanislaw Rylko, president of the Pontifical Council for the Laity and the reputed ghostwriter of the last books by John Paul II.

Bishop Wielgus at first denied cooperating with Poland's communist-era secret police, despite disclosures in a Polish weekly that his name was on a list of documents found at the National Remembrance Institute. He then acknowledged it, but said he "never informed on anyone and never tried to hurt anyone."

Hong Kong Tries To Stop Mainlander Baby Boom (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

HONG KONG, Jan. 19 — The plaintive cries of newborns never stop in the special care infant ward at Hong Kong's Queen Elizabeth Hospital — a ward designed for 30 babies but that has had as many as 60 at a time in recent weeks.

The crowding is not a result of a baby boom among Hong Kong women, who have the world's lowest birthrate. Instead, the rows of bassinets are full because of an influx of mainland Chinese women who go to great lengths to make sure that their babies are born in Hong Kong.

The Hong Kong government wants to discourage them. Starting Feb. 1, pregnant women from the mainland will have to pay $5,000 for their hospital care before they are even allowed to enter Hong Kong, which has been a semiautonomous Chinese territory since Britain returned it in 1997.

Under rules the government announced Tuesday evening, immigration officers will be instructed to turn back any mainlander who appears to be at least seven months pregnant and has not paid.

The policy is expected to produce tearful showdowns at border points, and is already provoking an acrimonious debate in Hong Kong over what it means to be a citizen of this cosmopolitan metropolis on the South China Sea.

Just as many women from Mexico struggle to make sure their babies are born in the United States and are entitled to American citizenship, thousands of women from the mainland come to Hong Kong to give birth because it entitles their babies to permanent residency here. The benefits include a free education and subsidized health care as part of Hong Kong's British-inspired welfare policies. Hong Kong residents pay as little as $12.80 to give birth at a hospital because of extensive government subsidies.

The issue has divided the democracy movement here. Some, like Martin Lee, the founding chairman of the Democratic Party, agree with the city's Beijing-appointed leaders that Hong Kong needs more citizens because of its low birthrate — 0.9 per woman of child-bearing age, far below the replacement rate of 2.1. If the babies grow up and come live here, Hong Kong will have young people to care for an aging population. By having babies here, the mainland women "do what we cannot do ourselves," Mr. Lee said.

But others in the democracy movement, like Dr. Kwok Ka-ki, a surgeon who represents the medical profession in the legislature, say permanent residency should be restricted to babies born to Hong Kong parents.

"How could we stand the impact if huge numbers of mainland women come here to have babies?" he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0119578

The number of babies born in Hong Kong to mainland mothers surged to 15,000 last year from several hundred a year in the late 1990s. Before the new restrictions were adopted, the number was poised to rise even more, as the Year of the Pig, which Chinese tradition holds to be an auspicious time for adding to a family, begins on Feb. 4 or Feb. 18, depending on which Chinese tradition is followed.

Every fifth Year of the Pig, falling once every 60 years, is considered especially auspicious and is known as a Year of the Golden Pig. The coming year is a Year of the Golden Pig, and is expected to produce an increase in births because marriage and birth statistics across China continue to show clear influences from such traditional beliefs, despite strong efforts by the Chinese Communist Party to dismiss them as superstitions.

Having a baby in Hong Kong, a city of 6.9 million people, can also help a family evade the mainland's one-child policy, although enforcement of that policy has been less stringent in recent years. Most of the women giving birth here return to the mainland initially to raise their babies because the mothers do not have the right to live here. The babies frequently have Hong Kong fathers, because Hong Kong companies now employ an estimated 11 million people on the mainland and send tens of thousands of Hong Kong citizens, mostly men, to manage them.

After marrying a Hong Kong man, a mainland woman can wait as long as seven years for the legal right to live here.

Beijing officials made it much easier in 2003 for mainlanders to visit Hong Kong, in a bid to help Hong Kong's struggling economy recover from SARS (severe acute respiratory syndrome) and thereby reduce pressures in Hong Kong for more democratic local rule.

Greater access has produced a tourism boom and throngs at shopping malls, but it has also made it much easier for pregnant women from the mainland to reach here.

Queen Elizabeth Hospital is on Kowloon Peninsula close to the train station where mainland Chinese arrive. It has been receiving a steady flow of women, many of whom show up in labor and with minimal medical records, making it hard to provide proper care.

"We have to be very cautious, very careful, because they've got complications as well" in some cases, said Dr. Cecilia Cheon, a consulting obstetrician at the hospital.

The special care infant ward handles babies born with jaundice and other problems not severe enough to require that they be placed in intensive care. The ward was so busy on Wednesday that the regular nurses were joined by retired pediatric nurses who had been called in to help give the babies bottles, burp them and change their diapers.

Dr. Terence Lao, an obstetrician at Queen Mary Hospital on Hong Kong Island, said the unexpected arrival of women in labor with few health records posed several risks. The women may be infected with influenza, asymptomatic tuberculosis or even H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS.

"Even if we are suspecting something, we cannot get the tests back in time," Dr. Lao said.

It is also harder to treat a baby at birth for possible health problems if no ultrasound tests have been done in advance to determine the health of the fetus.

Dr. Anthony Hedley, a former chairman of the department of community medicine at Hong Kong University and a frequent critic of government health policies, said that discouraging pregnant women from the mainland from traveling to Hong Kong was a prudent health measure. "It's not good for mothers or infants to be shuttling long distances," he said.

But Dr. Kwok said that the new rules might prompt mainland women to enter the territory before their pregnancies show, and then to overstay their visas to give birth here.

Beijing officials have been quiet on Hong Kong's new restrictions. Mainland leaders seldom comment publicly on issues involving Hong Kong, to avoid being accused of interfering with the city's autonomy, but they wield enormous influence on a wide range of issues.

The new policy has attracted its share of jokes. A cartoon in the South China Morning Post on Wednesday showed a large-bellied woman walking past two immigration officers.

"You're letting her in?" one of the officers asked.

The other replied, "Apparently it's only heroin, which is a customs problem."

DOJ_NMG_0119579

Thai Army Officers Held In Bombings (NYT)

By Seth Mydans, Thomas Fuller

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

SINGAPORE, Jan. 20 — Authorities in Thailand detained 15 people, including some military officers, in connection with a string of bombings that killed three people and disrupted celebrations on New Year's Eve, the police said Saturday.

Police sources said nearly 100 police officers and soldiers had searched 18 locations in and around the capital and detained eight military officers and seven civilians.

"I was informed by police that they have detained some suspects and it is very regrettable that some of the officers are involved," Prime Minister Surayud Chulanont told reporters in Bangkok. "It is the power of police to investigate and file charges if they have evidence."

The arrests were made under martial law imposed after a coup four months ago that ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra.

The police said no charges had been filed, and it remained unclear who was behind the bombings, which the government has said were done by supporters of Mr. Thaksin.

In separate televised comments on Saturday, Mr. Surayud said Mr. Thaksin, who was outside the country at the time of the coup and is now in Japan, could return to Thailand if he promised not to engage in politics.

"Mr. Thaksin should express clearly that he will stop all movements and express that his family wants to live in peace," Mr. Surayud said. "Then, we can talk and make arrangements."

The interim government, appointed by the military junta, has remained worried about a backlash from Mr. Thaksin's backers and has resisted the possibility of his return.

On Jan. 10 the government told television executives not to carry statements by Mr. Thaksin.

On Saturday the local cable provider, UBC, deleted from its broadcast a CNN interview done this week in Singapore.

In the interview, Mr. Thaksin denied involvement in the bomb blasts, saying: "I do everything for the good of the country and the people. I don't do something that's stupid."

He said that he did not want to return to Thailand if his presence would cause division or unrest and that he had no plans to become involved in politics.

"If I have to go to testify, I go," he said, referring to potential corruption cases against him. "But now the reason I'm not going back yet because I want unity in the country. I want the administration to do the reconciliation.

"I want everyone to unite, to move the country forward together," he said.

The ruling generals remain nervous, however.

Last week the coup leader, Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratglin, told fellow members of the junta not to talk on mobile telephones because they might be tapped.

"Our army has a problem now," he said. "When we make a call, the line goes to Singapore. When we talk secrets, they go straight to Singapore."

Early last year the family of Mr. Thaksin, a telecommunications tycoon, sold control of his company, Shin Corporation, to Temasek, the investment arm of the Singapore government.

The tax-free, $1.9 billion sale contributed to the building opposition against Mr. Thaksin that culminated in the coup.

It also raised tensions between the governments that broke into the open last week when Mr. Thaksin visited Singapore and met with a government official.

Worried about Mr. Thaksin's possible return and about potential threats or violence by his supporters, the ruling generals now seem increasingly to be on the defensive.

"What General Sonthi said was they should be careful of confidential information they talk about on mobile phones," said a spokesman for the junta, Sunsern Kaewkumnerd. "They should switch to talk on fixed-line phones or in person."

Tanyapas Chuaycho, a company spokeswoman, denied that there had been any wiretapping.

"We are a business, we are not a spy," she told the Bloomberg news agency. "We can't do it, and the question is why would we?"

DOJ_NMG_0119580

In recent months, Mr. Thaksin has been traveling through Asia, from Hong Kong to Bali to China to Singapore to Japan, meeting with supporters and keeping his name in the newspapers at home.

He is represented in Washington by Barbour Griffith & Rogers, a prominent lobbying firm, and he has hired the public relations firm Edelman of New York to help arrange meetings with the news media.

In a telephone interview from Hong Kong, Alan VanderMolen, vice president for Asia and the Pacific at Edelman, said, "We're working with him in his capacity as a private citizen and supporting some media outreach to support his efforts to return to Thailand."

Major Warlord Surrenders Arms To Somali Government (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 20 -- The last major warlord to withhold support from Somalia's government surrendered his weapons and militiamen on Saturday -- a boost for a fledgling leadership that still faces threats of guerrilla attacks from the Islamic movement that fled the capital.

Mohamed Dheere, one of the most feared rebel leaders in Somalia, gave the army chief 23 trucks mounted with heavy weapons and ordered 220 of his fighters to report for training at government camps. The handover took place during a ceremony in Dheere's stronghold of Jowhar, about 60 miles north of the capital of Mogadishu, said Abdirahman Dinari, the government spokesman.

But fears of an Islamic insurgency grew following an ambush Saturday morning on a convoy of Ethiopian troops in Mogadishu. The Ethiopians returned fire, killing a man and a woman on the side of the road, said Hawa Malin, a Mogadishu resident. Two other people died on the way to the hospital, officials said.

Late Friday, government troops also repelled an attack on the Somali president's palace.

A leader in Somalia's Islamic Courts movement said his group was responsible for the attacks, calling it part of a "new uprising."

"The only solution can be reconciliation and talks between the transitional federal government and the Islamic Courts," said Ahmed Qare, the movement's deputy chairman.

The U.N.-backed government -- with key military backing from Ethiopia -- drove the Islamic movement that had challenged it out of Mogadishu and much of the rest of southern Somalia weeks ago. But Islamic leaders have threatened a guerrilla war as long as Ethiopian troops remain in Somalia.

The United States and the European Union have called on the government to hold peace talks. So far, only clan leaders and warlords have been involved in the process, and religious leaders have been excluded.

The government has asked African peacekeepers to maintain security in the country, but they are unlikely to come if fighting continues. African Union officials approved an 8,000-peacekeeper mission Friday, but only Uganda has volunteered troops thus far.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since 1991 when warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on each other, reducing the Horn of Africa nation to anarchy and clan-based violence.

Expelled Bushmen Return Home (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

GABORONE, Botswana -- Several dozen Bushmen who had been expelled from the Central Kalahari Game Reserve have returned there under a landmark court ruling giving the traditional hunter-gatherers rights to land they and their ancestors occupied for thousands of years.

Ten families entered the vast, arid game reserve on Jan. 13, said Duma Gideon Boko, a lawyer who represented the Bushmen in their suit seeking to reverse years of government efforts to drive them out. The December judgment, which ended Botswana's longest-running legal battle, called the government's actions unconstitutional and ruled that the Bushmen were free to return to the game reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0119581

The initial government response to the ruling suggested that only the 189 Bushmen named in the suit would be allowed to return, and park officials denied access to several others who sought to enter the park last month, according to Bushmen representatives and news reports.

But Jeff F. Ramsay, spokesman for President Festus Mogae, said Friday that all Bushmen, whether named in the suit or not, were free to enter the game reserve while the government developed a new permanent policy on the issue. Ramsay said 44 Bushmen, including several not named in the suit, entered this month.

"Those who wish to go into the park can do so," Ramsay said.

His comments were the latest sign that Botswana's government is seeking to defuse a standoff that has generated years of bad publicity for a country otherwise admired as a bastion of stability, prosperity and democracy on a troubled continent.

Disagreements remain over whether the Bushmen will be allowed to bring their livestock into the game reserve, which the government says is restricted to wild animals, and whether the government must provide services such as medical care to the people living there.

But Boko said government officials have been more conciliatory on most issues since the ruling.

"I think they are backing off," he said.

Bushmen, a catchall term for several related ethnic groups whose languages include distinctive clicks and pops, are descendants of hunter-gatherers who once roamed most of southern African before other groups relying on settled agriculture took control of the region. Bushmen long have been victims of discrimination and once were routinely shot as if they were vermin by farmers guarding their fields.

About 100,000 Bushmen remain in southern Africa, with the largest group in Botswana. Only a tiny minority is seeking to live traditionally in the Central Kalahari Game Reserve, an area larger than Switzerland.

Even before government relocation efforts, Bushmen living in the game reserve augmented their diets with livestock such as goats and some crops. Several Bushmen families had trucks for delivering water or making trips outside the reserve.

Major relocation campaigns happened in 1997, 2002 and 2005, and Bushmen alleged that police and park wardens destroyed their huts, dumped precious water supplies and used intimidation to drive the Bushmen to camps outside the reserve. The government also sharply restricted most forms of hunting, making it difficult for Bushmen to get crucial protein for their diets.

Bushmen advocacy groups have long said the government was motivated by a desire to control any diamonds -- the mainstay of the national economy -- that might be found in the park. The government, meanwhile, has said it was seeking to offer the Bushmen modern government services while also protecting the ecology of the game reserve.

On Thursday, Mogae visited with Bushmen at New Xade, a resettlement camp beyond the western border of the game reserve. New Xade has such amenities as schools, concrete homes and medical clinics, and Bushmen say it is impossible to maintain their ancient lifestyle there.

Mogae reportedly urged the Bushmen to embrace modernization, as most of the country has since independence from Britain in 1966.

Colombian Government Is Ensnared In A Paramilitary Scandal (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

BOGOTÁ, Colombia, Jan. 20 — The government of President Álvaro Uribe, the largest recipient of American aid outside the Middle East, has found itself ensnared in a widening scandal as revelations surface of a secret alliance between some of the president's most prominent political supporters and paramilitary death squads.

Testimony this week from Salvatore Mancuso, a former paramilitary commander who admitted to orchestrating the killing of more than 300 people, as well as a document made public on Friday implicating more than a dozen politicians in the pact with paramilitaries, have injected fresh detail into a slow-burning scandal that has caused Colombia's elite political class to shudder in recent weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0119582

Senior members of Mr. Uribe's government and Mr. Uribe himself have said that anyone shown to have had illegal ties to the paramilitaries, which terrorized Colombian cities and the countryside in the nation's internal war, which has gone on for decades, and made fortunes in cocaine trafficking, should be prosecuted in courts of law.

The scandal has already touched Mr. Uribe's cabinet, with Senator Álvaro Araújo, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo Araújo, under investigation for collaborating with militias.

"If there's someone involved at the highest level, they will be fired," Francisco Santos, Colombia's vice president, said in an interview. "Scrutiny is fine for us," Mr. Santos said. "This country needs to know the whole truth."

Some of the details coming to light about the breadth of paramilitary activities are the result of a process set in motion by Mr. Uribe's own government, which has allowed paramilitary leaders to confess their crimes and pay reparations in exchange for reduced sentences of no more than eight years in prison.

Though some militia leaders have balked at the deal, much of Colombia has been gripped by the first such confession, that of Mr. Mancuso, a cattleman who helped found the paramilitary movement in the 1980s in an effort to combat leftist guerrillas.

Mr. Mancuso, 48, who studied English at the University of Pittsburgh, wept during the first days of his testimony at a special hearing in Medellín last month. This week, however, he simply read from a statement describing how he oversaw the assassinations of hundreds of people, with some operations made possible with information from military intelligence.

Mr. Mancuso also put Mr. Uribe in the spotlight by saying that militias pressured people to vote for the president in 2002, when Mr. Uribe was first elected. Mr. Uribe responded quickly by going on a national radio network to say he had never sent any emissaries to strike deals with the paramilitaries.

On the heels of Mr. Mancuso's testimony, a document rumored to exist in recent weeks was published in the daily newspaper El Tiempo on Friday. It describes a secret pact in 2001 between Mr. Mancuso, other paramilitary leaders and 11 congressmen, two governors and five mayors, in which those present agreed to work together to forge "a new social contract," largely in order to protect private property rights.

Senator Miguel de la Espriella, one of the signatories to the pact, helped bring the scandal to light last year by disclosing the ties between politicians and paramilitaries. Like other officials implicated in the pact, he said he was forced to sign, raising doubts as what type of legal punishment, if any, they might receive.

"At first we declined to sign, but when they put a man with a rifle next to the document we understood we had no choice," Mr. de la Espriella, a member of the Democratic Colombia party, said in an e-mail interview.

Asked why he was the only politician to come forward with details of the secret agreement, Mr. de la Espriella, alluding to widespread suspicions that legislators and government officials had for years worked in tandem with the paramilitaries, responded, "I told myself that a half-truth doesn't serve anybody, and we should all contribute to the enlightenment of the truth during so many years of war."

Those who signed the document included not only supporters of Mr. Uribe but also high-ranking officials in the political opposition, pointing to how a growing portion of the political establishment could be tarnished by the scandal.

Some 30,000 paramilitary members have been demobilized during Mr. Uribe's government in recent years. Colombia's military still receives more than $700 million a year in aid from the United States to combat drug trafficking and armed insurgencies.

Two guerrilla groups, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia and the National Liberation Army, still operate in the country. A truck carrying more than 600 pounds of explosives this week destroyed a dairy plant in southern Colombia owned by Nestlé, the Swiss food company, an act that the police attributed to the rebels.

Although the scandal has emerged as the most pressing political challenge to Mr. Uribe's presidency, his approval ratings remain high, at above 60 percent, after five years of rule and a re-election victory last year. Many Colombians credit Mr. Uribe for declining levels of murders and kidnappings and robust economic growth.

However, political analysts here say a steady stream of disclosures related to the paramilitary scandal could diminish Mr. Uribe's credibility, particularly if implicated officials are perceived to have close ties to the president. The scandal has already entangled a former ambassador to Chile and a former head of the intelligence service.

DOJ_NMG_0119583

Equally pressing for Mr. Uribe's government could be the scandal's influence on discussions in the United States Congress of aid to Colombia and a trade agreement awaiting Congressional approval that has been signed by Mr. Uribe and President Bush. Political analysts say the Democratic-led Congress is expected to add greater scrutiny of human rights issues in Colombia.

Vast Pipelines In Amazon Face Challenges Over Protecting Rights And Rivers (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

URUCU, Brazil — In theory, the issue is a simple one: Brazil needs more sources of energy to keep its economy humming, and huge reserves of gas and oil are in the Amazon jungle. Problem solved.

Over the years, Petrobras, Brazil's state-controlled oil company, has, in fact, invested more than $7 billion in Amazon exploration and development, and in 1986 it made a major find here. But only now — after a seemingly endless sequence of geographic, logistical, environmental and political challenges were overcome — is the first in what is intended as a series of pipelines finally being constructed, this one to carry gas the 400 miles from here to Manaus, a port city of 1.5 million at the junction of the region's two biggest rivers that is emerging as an important industrial center.

"Everything in the Amazon requires preparation that is big, long and complicated, especially a pioneering effort like this one," explained Joelson Falcão Mendes, the company's regional director here. "You've got a harsh climate that limits you to working only four months a year in some places. You're working in mud and crossing rivers that are not navigable, and there are 47 tropical diseases to worry about."

But oil pipeline leaks and the collapse of an offshore drilling platform in other parts of the country have damaged Petrobras's reputation, and there was initially strong resistance to the pipeline from local people, environmental and indigenous groups and archaeologists.

Some of them preferred that the gas be transported to Manaus by tankers from a terminal north of here, already connected by a pipeline, while others argued it would be cheaper and safer to buy the excess electricity generated by the Guri Dam in Venezuela.

Rather than steamrolling the opponents and skeptics, however, as often happens in Brazil, the company chose to woo them. The two million residents of Amazonas State have been promised economic benefits that have contributed to the project's $1.15 billion price, and scientists and environmentalists were consulted about how to minimize damage to the jungle that blankets the state, which is larger than Britain, France, Germany and Italy combined.

"They have really tried to minimize the impact, and the outcome is not as bad as we had feared," said Paulo Adário, director of Greenpeace's Amazon campaign. "Since they are taking oil and gas out of the heart of the Amazon, creating a model for what will be done in the future, that concern is quite understandable and necessary."

A second pipeline, which would head south to Porto Velho, a city more than 300 miles away, is a far more complicated matter. That project still faces challenges from advocates for the environment and rights of indigenous people because it will cross rivers and Indian lands, and is competing with two large dams for government money.

Farther west, near the Jurua River, Petrobras also has plans to develop oil and gas deposits first discovered in 1978. Company officials said they hoped to begin production in 2010, after construction of a pipeline that would run through dense and remote jungle to a refinery here.

Recent changes in energy policy in neighboring countries have added to the importance of the planned network of Amazon pipelines. For example, President Evo Morales of Bolivia, which has substantial reserves of gas that supply Brazil, has nationalized oil fields and refineries there, shutting out Petrobras, and has suggested quadrupling the price of some of the natural gas his country supplies to Brazil's industrialized south.

"All the research indicates that we are certain to find more gas in the Amazon," Eduardo Braga, the governor of Amazonas, said in an interview in Manaus, the state capital. "Brazil is going to need that gas over the next 30 years, so it is imperative that we develop those deposits. This is a strategic issue, not just for the Amazon but for all of Brazil."

DOJ_NMG_0119584

The challenges Petrobras has had to confront also raise questions about the viability of the grand plan of Venezuela's president, Hugo Chávez, to build a 5,000-mile gas pipeline from Caracas to Buenos Aires, a cornerstone of his campaign to bring South America's economies together.

Initial estimates of the cost of that project, which would be longer than the Great Wall of China, run as high as $24 billion.

"The pipeline should be the locomotive of a new process of integration whose objective will be to defeat poverty and exclusion," Mr. Chávez said during a visit to São Paulo, Brazil's industrial capital, last year. "Unity is our only path."

[On Thursday, Brazil and Venezuela signed an agreement that calls for studies to begin this year on construction of a pipeline to cut through the northern Amazon to Manaus and then split in two directions.]

But environmental groups have complained that Mr. Chávez is trying to rush or even bypass the hearings and studies that are normally required and that his plan would worsen problems of deforestation and population migration.

"Just imagine the rivers and vast areas of forest they would have to cross," Mr. Adário said. "This is just something that just leaped out of Chávez's head. I don't know of a single technical expert or scientist who has done a serious analysis of the impacts that would have."

In the past, the construction of large energy projects in the Amazon, such as the mammoth Tucuruí dam, typically led to the migration of thousands of peasants seeking work and the creation of slum settlements in the jungle. When a project is finished, the workers will often remain, with no jobs, swelling social and environmental problems that are already intractable.

Small jungle settlements along the path of transmission lines have also complained that no provision is made for them to be supplied electricity. That alienates local residents and has even provoked some incidents of sabotage.

Urucu, however, is being built with a requirement that two-thirds of the labor force be hired from the population already in the region. That has created about 10,000 jobs, a significant advance in a region with fewer than 500,000 people, as well as job-training programs.

To prevent an influx of settlers, who typically carve out illegal homesteads along highways, almost no permanent roads have been built.

Instead, the armed forces bring in supplies and equipment by helicopter or boat, and many construction workers live in floating dormitories that move from one site to the next as the work advances.

"There was a time when the only way to get in here was to come by helicopter and then rappel down," said Mauro Loureiro, the project's technical director. "It took hundreds of trips like that just to open a clearing to be able to do the initial soundings and then dig a test well."

In addition, the pipeline here will include spurs to seven smaller towns on its way to Manaus, adding $30 million and 78 miles to the project. As a result, diesel fuel will no longer have to be sent in by boat for local consumption, blackouts will diminish and businesses can be promised regular supplies of cheap, clean energy.

"Each municipality is using this to increase its economic potential," said Mr. Braga, the Amazonas governor. The projects, he said, include one to build a plant in Codajas to process açaí (pronounced ah-sigh-EE), an Amazon fruit whose purple pulp and juice Brazilians consume as a health and energy tonic, and another in, in Manacaparu, to expand the production of organic fibers there.

"The idea is not only to avoid repeating the errors committed in the past, but also to change the energy sources here in the north of the country," Mr. Braga said. "More than 90 percent of this state is forest, and I want to keep it that way."

DOJ_NMG_0119585

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Help US Close Guantanamo, Say MPs (BBC) ... 3
U.K. Panel Urges Guantanamo Alternative (AP) ... 4
A Retreat On Wiretapping? (WP) ... 4
Retreat And Cheat (NYT) ... 5
Editorial: Legal Eavesdropping, Or Surveillance Gone Wild? (SACBEE) ... 6
Editorial: Judicious Change To Wiretapping (GRPRESS) ... 6
Our View Intelligence Oversight Should Confirm Judges' Role In Wiretap Orders (WILNJ) ... 7
Editorial: Legally Secret (HARTC) ... 7
Editorial: Unanswered Questions (HC) ... 7
Editorial: Balance Point (ABJ) ... 8
Editorial: Timing Raises Questions (LVS) ... 9
No More Warrantless Spying (OCR) ... 9
Preserving Civil Liberties (MH) ... 9
Steve Chapman: Never Mind What We Said About Spying (CHIT) ... 10

Homeland Response:

Passport Prerequisite (WT) ... 11
New Orleans Of Future May Stay Half Its Old Size (NYT) ... 13

War News:

Embattled, Bush Held To Plan To Salvage Iraq (WP) ... 14
Bush Administration, Under Criticism, Warns Iraq To Fulfill Its End Of The Bargain (NYT) ... 17
Vietnam Surfaces On Both Sides Of Iraq Debate (LAT) ... 18
Bush's History Lesson (BOS) ... 20
Lying Like It's 2003 (NYT) ... 21
A Chance For Unity On Iraq (WP) ... 22
20 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (WP) ... 23
Helicopter Crash Claims 13 On Deadly Day For U.S. In Iraq (NYT) ... 24
U.S. Copter Crash Claims 13 In Iraq (WT/AP) ... 25
At Least 19 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (LAT) ... 26
U.S.: Brigade Soon Ready For Baghdad (AP) ... 28
Kurdish Troops From North Deserting (BOS/MCT) ... 28
Taming Iraq's "Wild West" (LAT) ... 29
Army Says Improper Orders By Colonel Led To 4 Deaths (NYT) 30
Sunni-Shiite Fight Flares In Broadcasts (WP) ... 32
Banned Station Broadcasts Voice Of Rebels In Iraq (NYT) ... 33
Rice Rules Out Talks With Syria, Iran (AFP) ... 34
The Clock May Be Ticking On Iran's Fiery President (LAT) ... 34
Impatience On Iran Carries A Price (WP) ... 35
Hang Up! Tehran Is Calling (NYT) ... 36
Pakistani Role Seen In Taliban Surge At Border (NYT) ... 37
Pakistan Denies It Harbors Taliban (WP) ... 40
Afghan Women's Quiet Revolution Hangs By A Thread (LAT) ... 41

DOJ:

Editorial: A Case Of Justice That Stinks (ROT) ... 44

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutor In Apple Case Joins Law Firm (BLOOM) ... 45
Departures Could Slow Option Probe Two In U.S. Attorney's Office Were First To File Charges For Backdating Stock Grants (SFC) ... 46
Big Game? An Enron Survivor Hunts For Riches (NYT) ... 47
Why Backdated Options Might Be Contagious (NYT) ... 51

Criminal Law:

Calif. Zone Tops In Porn Arrests (FRESBEE) ... 52
Violent Crime Falls Sharply In Providence (PROJO) ... 53
WHO IS R. LINDLEY DeVECCHIO? (HTRIB) ... 54

Antitrust:

Some Speculate On Future Of P-I, Purchase By Black (SEATIMES) ... 56

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Blueprint To Beautify, Restore Yosemite Tangled Up In Court (SFC) ... 57
One Tribal Family Lost Two Members In Unsolved Cases (YHR) 59
Blinding Ourselves In Space (NYT) ... 61

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Officials Laud Transfer Of Mexican Drug Suspects (WP) ... 61
Reputed Drug Lords Extradited To U.S. (WT/AP) ... 62
Mexico Sends 4 Kingpins To Face Trial In The U.S. (NYT) ... 63
Cartel Leader Handed To U.S. (DMN) ... 64
Mexico's Extraditions Make A Point (LAT) ... 65
Gonzales Lauds Mexico's Extradition Of 15 To U.S. (SDUT) ... 66
Extraditing Reputed Drug Lords Earns Mexico Praise From U.S. (AP) ... 67

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Announce Health Care Tax Incentives (WT) ... 68

Bush Seeks Shift In Health Coverage (WP) ... 69
Bush To Propose Health Insurance Changes (AP) ... 70
To Expand Health Coverage, Bush Pitches Tax Code Change (LAT) ... 71
Bush To Urge New Tax Plan For Health Care Coverage (NYT) . 72
Senate Newcomer Is Designated To Encounter President Bush Yet Again (NYT) ... 74
Energy Independence (WP) ... 74
Bush's Fourth Quarter (LAT) ... 75
Pragmatic, Up To A Point (NYT) ... 76
Fragile Hopes For Bipartisan Rescue Of Social Security (NYT) . 77
Business Faces New Pressures On The Hill (WP) ... 78
The Equality Engineer (WP) ... 79
Democrats Seek To Avert Abortion Clashes (WP) ... 80
The Socialist Senator (NYT) ... 82
Mr. Chips Goes To Congress (NYT) ... 87
The Cause Bush Did Justice To (WP) ... 88

Other News:

States Act On Congressional Goals (WP) ... 91
Hillary Clinton Opens Presidential Bid (WP) ... 92
Clinton Enters '08 Field, Fueling Race For Money (NYT) ... 94
Announcement Sends Race Into High Gear (NYT) ... 96
Clinton Joins 2008 Race For President (LAT) ... 96
"I'm In To Win" White House, Hillary Says (WT) ... 99
Clinton Joins Race: "I'm In To Win" (DMN) ... 100
Republicans Party Over Prospect Of Her As Nominee (NYDN) 101
Hillary Clinton Eyes Presidency (CHIT) ... 102
Clinton Gives Her Answer To Voters: I'm In (BOS) ... 103
Clinton Announces 2008 Presidential Bid (NSDY) ... 104
N.Y. Dems Cheer Clinton Announcement, GOP Says, "We Told You So" (AP) ... 105
Candidate Clinton Faces Tough Battle For Nation's Favor (SFC)106
California Considers Moving Primary To February (NYT/AP) ... 108
Clinton: "I'm In To Win" White House (AP) ... 108
Can Hillary Clinton Win In 2008? (BBC) ... 110
Hillary Clinton Launches White House Bid: "I'm In" (CNN) ... 111
Sen. Clinton Throws Hat Into Ring (HILL) ... 112
Throwing Her Hat On The Web (WP) ... 112
Tops In Political Toolbox: Internet (LAT) ... 113
With Boots Or Suits, Candidates Carefully Craft First Impressions (WP) ... 114
Far From A Hindrance, Gender Could Be Key For Clinton (WP)114
The Reliable Source (WP) ... 115
Hill's Bid Her-Storic: Feminists (NYPOST) ... 116
Race May Revolve Around Clintons (CHIT) ... 116
Clinton Assembles A Seasoned Team (WP) ... 117
In A Field Of Heavy Hitters, No Sure Thing (NYT) ... 118
For Democratic Advisers, A Season Of Tough Choices (WP) .. 119
Hillary Runs For The White House As "new Thatcher" (LONT) 121
Aides: Clinton Plans Weekend Swing Through Iowa (AP) ... 121
Kansas Senator Announces Bid For Presidency (NYT) ... 122
Brownback Announces Presidential Bid (WP) ... 123
Sen. Brownback Joins Presidential Race (LAT/AP) ... 124
Conservative Kansan Starts White House Run (CNN) ... 124
Brownback Formalizes White House Bid (HILL) ... 125
McCain Contends With Vocal Critics (AR) ... 125
What Would Jeb Do? (WP) ... 127
Gut Check (WP) ... 129
Carter, Clinton Seek To Bring Together Moderate Baptists (WP)130
With Rich Little, Press Corps Is Assured A Nice Impression (WP) ... 131
George A. Smathers, 93; Former Florida Senator (WP/AP) ... 132
Talks On Palestinian Unity Postponed (AP) ... 133
Lawmaker's Tough Talk Rouses Fatah Faithful (LAT) ... 134
U.S. Troops To Protect Serbs In Kosovo (WT) ... 135
Kosovo Looms Over Serbian Vote (LAT) ... 136
PM: U.S. Wants Base In Czech Republic (AP) ... 137
Turkish Police Arrest Teenage Suspect In Editor's Killing (NYT)138
Look Up! Is It A Threat? Or A Plea For A Ban? (NYT) ... 139
Vatican Urges "Dialogue" With China To Rebuild Ties (NYT) ... 140
Benedict Seen As Isolated At Vatican (WT) ... 141
Hong Kong Tries To Stop Mainlander Baby Boom (NYT) ... 141
Thai Army Officers Held In Bombings (NYT) ... 143
Major Warlord Surrenders Arms To Somali Government (WP/AP) ... 144
Expelled Bushmen Return Home (WP) ... 144
Colombian Government Is Ensnared In A Paramilitary Scandal (NYT) ... 145
Vast Pipelines In Amazon Face Challenges Over Protecting Rights And Rivers (NYT) ... 146

DOJ_NMG_0119587

TERRORISM NEWS:

Help US Close Guantanamo, Say MPs (BBC)

BBC.com, January 21, 2007

MPs who have visited Guantanamo Bay have called on Britain and the international community to do more to help the US close the camp.

Seven Foreign Affairs Committee members visited the detention centre for "enemy combatants" in Cuba in September.

In a report they were critical of the conditions there, but said many inmates posed a threat and the world needed to find a "longer term solution".

Opposition MPs and human rights groups called the report "disappointing".

'Real threat'

The Guantanamo Bay facility was set up at a US base in Cuba after the invasion of Afghanistan in 2002.

The international community as a whole needs to shoulder its responsibility in finding a longer-term solution

MPs' report The camp once held 750 inmates, including several British citizens. A total of 395 prisoners are currently being held there, including nine British residents, whom the government says it is not obliged to try to bring home.

The report by the seven MPs said many of those detained presented a "real threat to public safety", and said all states were under an obligation to protect their citizens and others.

But at present only the US was doing so, and "the international community as a whole needs to shoulder its responsibility in finding a longer-term solution," it said.

The chairman of the committee, Mike Gapes, told BBC News: "The problem is if you closed it straight away what do you do with the people that are there?

"Some of them no doubt could be released - sent back to there country of origin and be of no threat to anyone. But there are people there that are dangerous people...

"The international community as a whole needs to look at finding a longer-term solution."

24-hour lighting

The MPs spent only one day at the camp and had no direct access to detainees.

Their report says food was plentiful, medical care good and the facilities broadly comparable with a British maximum security prison.

But they said the camp did not meet UK guidelines for recreation and education facilities nor for access to the media, lawyers and the outside world.

One area apparently was closed for repair after detainees had been found dismantling the plumbing to make weapons.

Electric lighting was kept on 24 hours a day. Some detainees were reported to be clinically obese; two were being force-fed and 20% had some psychiatric condition.

The MPs said prisoner abuse had "almost certainly" happened there but the added that this was "unlikely to be taking place now".

And they said the government was right to "stick to its established policy of not accepting consular responsibility for non-British nationals".

'Missed opportunity'

Liberal Democrat MP Sarah Teather, who represents a 10-year-old constituent whose father is being held at the camp, said the committee appeared to have been given "the VIP antiseptic tour".

"The committee were given no direct access to prisoners, and they do not appear to have taken evidence either from former detainees, or lawyers or families of current detainees," she said.

Tory MP Andrew Tyrie, who chairs the all party Parliamentary group on extraordinary rendition, said the report did not address the main issue, "which is whether US detention policy, whether in Guantanamo or elsewhere, is making the US, UK and the West more secure or less".

Amnesty International said the report was a "missed opportunity".

"We would have liked to have seen the committee unequivocally backing Amnesty International's long-standing call for Guantanamo to be closed immediately," said the organisation's UK director Kate Allen.

"We do not share the committee's apparent confidence that abuse is unlikely to be taking place now," she added.

DOJ_NMG_0119588

Clive Stafford Smith, legal director of charity Reprieve which represents 38 prisoners at the base, said the report was "full of factual errors" and largely based on a "show tour".

U.K. Panel Urges Guantanamo Alternative (AP)

By David Stringer, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 21, 2007

A panel of British lawmakers urged the government Sunday to work with the United States to develop an alternative to holding terror suspects at Guantanamo — aiming to speed up the closure of the much-criticized U.S. military prison.

The Commons Foreign Affairs Select Committee released a report that also called for an overhaul of the Geneva Conventions and suggesting Prime Minister Tony Blair lead efforts to update the international standards to reflect the challenge of terrorism.

"The international community as a whole needs to shoulder its responsibility in finding a longer-term solution" to the indefinite detention of terrorist suspects at Guantanamo.

"We recommend that the government engage actively with the U.S. administration and with the international community to assist the process of closing Guantanamo as soon as may be consistent with the overriding need to protect the public from terrorist threats," the report said.

About 395 foreign men currently held at Guantanamo are allegedly linked to al-Qaida or the Taliban. Human rights groups have condemned the U.S. for operating the prison, where most detainees have been held for years without being charged.

The U.S. government has blocked their access to U.S. courts, claiming it has the authority to detain them indefinitely to keep America safe. The military says many of those imprisoned provide interrogators with information about terror networks. The U.S. has operated the prison for five years.

Nine British nationals held at the facility had been released by January 2005, but the committee said it believed another nine former British residents remained at Guantanamo. Human rights lawyers have said they were aware of eight ex-British residents being detained.

Seven panel members visited Guantanamo in September. Though the image of inmates "kneeling in the dirt, shackled and hooded" was no longer accurate, the report said Guantanamo failed to achieve minimum British standards "on access to exercise and recreation, to lawyers, and to the outside world through educational facilities and the media."

In October, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said Guantanamo was "unacceptable in terms of human rights" and "ineffective in terms of counterterrorism."

Blair has gone no further than calling the camp an "anomaly" that sooner or later must end.

The committee called on Blair and his successor to help change the Geneva Convention that governs treatment of prisoners of war to "deal more satisfactorily with asymmetric warfare, with international combatants and with the status of irregular combatants."

President Bush has said the Geneva Conventions do not apply to Guantanamo detainees, who were classified as "enemy combatants" — a status that accords them fewer rights than prisoners of war.

Britain's Foreign Office said it would not comment on the report until a formal response had been sent to the committee.

A Retreat On Wiretapping? (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

WHEN THE Bush administration announced that it had belatedly put its warrantless wiretapping program under court supervision, its attitude was like that of a traffic officer trying to hurry along bystanders at an accident scene: "Move right along, folks, nothing to look at here." The administration would like Congress, under its new management, to abandon its efforts to dislodge details about the program's operations or to craft legislation to provide a legal framework. Lawmakers don't seem inclined to simply go away, nor should they.

It may be that the Justice Department has devised what Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called a "creative" way to bring the surveillance program under the procedures of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), one that preserves the "speed and agility" that the administration wants while ensuring adequate judicial review, not simply broad-brush, "programmatic" approval for warrantless wiretapping. If so, that would be good news. It's what we have been saying should happen since the program was revealed more than a year ago -- even as the administration insisted that such a move was neither practically feasible nor legally required.

But there is no way for lawmakers to make a determination about the program on the basis of information they have and every reason for them to be skeptical of the administration's assurances, given its previous intransigence. Those who've been briefed on the program have said they still have questions, and they expressed concerns. Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) said that it "doesn't have the protections for civil liberties" she believes necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0119589

The special court that oversees the FISA law has said that it is willing, with the administration's approval, to provide a copy of the order under which it is operating. But Mr. Gonzales was anything but reassuring last week when members of the Senate Judiciary Committee pressed for access to the relevant documents. "Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us decisions that you've publicly announced?" said Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) "Are we a little 'Alice in Wonderland' here?"

A little? Traveling down the rabbit hole with Mr. Gonzales is an endlessly frustrating journey, light on details, heavy on unsubstantiated assurances. "So could you give us some idea of the breadth of these warrants?" Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) asked the attorney general. "What I can tell you, Senator, is that they meet the legal requirements under FISA," Mr. Gonzales replied. Maybe that kind of conclusory non-answer would suffice when Republicans were in the majority. In fact, no senator of either party should stand for it.

Retreat And Cheat (NYT)

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program was once deemed so vital to national security that it could not be subjected to judicial review. Last week, the White House said it was doing just that.

In 2005, the White House would not even comment on news reports about the C.I.A.'s prisons because Americans' safety depended on their being kept secret. In 2006, Mr. Bush held a photo-op to announce that he was keeping them open.

The administration has repeatedly insisted that it was essential to the American way of life for Mr. Bush to be able to imprison foreigners without trial or legal counsel. Now the administration claims it was trying to bring those detainees to trial all along but was stymied by white-shoe lawyers.

By now, this is a familiar pattern: First, Mr. Bush and his aides say his actions are so vital to national security that to even report on them — let alone question them — lends comfort to the terrorists. Then, usually when his decisions face scrutiny from someone other than a compliant Republican Congress, the president seems to compromise.

Behind this behavior are at least two dynamics, both of them disturbing.

The first is that the policies Mr. Bush is trying so hard to hide have little, if anything, to do with real national security issues — and everything to do with a campaign, spearheaded by Vice President Dick Cheney, to break the restraints on presidential power imposed after Vietnam and Watergate. And there is much less than meets the eye to Mr. Bush's supposed concessions.

Generally, they mask the fact that he either got what he wanted from Congress or found a way to add some other veneer of legitimacy to his lawless behavior. The campaign to expand presidential power goes on, at the expense of American values.

Mr. Bush's aides don't try very hard to hide it. The day the shift on domestic wiretapping was announced, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave a speech in which he sneered at the idea of allowing judges to review national security policies. The next day, he was in the Senate refusing to turn over the agreement that he said would provide judicial review for the wiretapping. And his lawyers were in court arguing that a lawsuit over the warrantless eavesdropping should be dropped because Mr. Bush said he would stop the operation.

We don't know exactly what agreement the White House made with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court about eavesdropping. But there is evidence that Mr. Bush got some broad approval for a wiretapping "program" rather than the individual warrants required by law. Because the court works in secret, the public may never know whether Mr. Bush really is complying with the law.

Nor is there likely to be an explanation of why the White House could not have sought the court's approval in the first place. The White House's claim that the process is too cumbersome doesn't ring true. The law already allows the government to wiretap first and then ask for a warrant within three days. The real reason is almost certainly that the imperial presidency had no desire to share power even with the most secret part of the judiciary.

Why else would the president have turned down more than one offer from Congress to amend the 1978 wiretapping law after 9/11 to make getting warrants easier and faster than the three-day rule?

For that matter, why did the White House initially refuse to work with senior Republican lawmakers to create a legal court system for the Guantánamo detainees? Instead, Mr. Bush ordered the creation of kangaroo courts, expanding presidential authority at the expense of Congress and the judiciary, and at the expense of justice.

The Republican-led Congress (with the help of cowed Democrats) refused to hold Mr. Bush and his presidency to account on any of these issues. The Military Commissions Act, passed by Congress just before the midterm elections last year, gave Mr. Bush a pass on what he had already done with the detainees outside the law, and did not stop him from jailing non-Americans indefinitely without due process. Congress absolved American intelligence agents of past abuses of prisoners and approved future abuses, and Mr. Bush happily announced that the C.I.A. prisons would stay open.

There are signs, from people like Senator Patrick Leahy, the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that the Democrats will be tougher than the Republicans on these issues. The eavesdropping program and Mr. Bush's secret deal with the surveillance court are a very good place to start.

Editorial: Legal Eavesdropping, Or Surveillance Gone Wild? (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, January 21, 2007

The Senate Judiciary Committee surely had something else in mind when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales dropped by last Thursday to talk about the state of affairs at the Justice Department.

Gonzales provided more details about the department's prosecution of the "Girls Gone Wild" video series than he did about warrantless surveillance. His testimony leaves more questions than it answers and should be considered only Round One of the oversight process on surveillance.

Nothing in the backdrop seems to have changed. While the administration now has gone to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court for warrants, it continues to say that the president has "inherent power" to eavesdrop on Americans and others inside the United States, to search for evidence of terrorist activity without court-approved warrants. In short, the decision to seek warrants could be temporary and applied only as the president chooses.

The earlier decision by Bush to monitor international phone calls and international e-mail messages of people inside the United States without warrants was a major shift in American intelligence-gathering practices -- and a major re-interpretation of the Fourth Amendment's requirements for warrants, based on probable cause, for searches and seizures. With that decision, the Bush administration decided to do an end run around the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. That, enacted in 1978, made it a crime to eavesdrop on Americans without judicial oversight.

After last week's hearing, we still don't know whether the warrants sought by the administration from the FISA court are for surveillance of known phone numbers or known persons, or for dragnet-style data-mining operations of hundreds or thousands of individuals. Normally, the government would seek a FISA warrant for surveillance of a particular suspect's phone calls or e-mails. A congressional staffer told the New York Times that the FISA approvals appear to be for a hybrid of individual warrants and broader approval, whatever that means. Gonzales offered no information or documents to clarify the matter.

U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, presiding judge of the FISA court, told the Judiciary Committee in a letter that the court would be willing to give lawmakers copies of orders and opinions related to the surveillance program "if the executive and legislative branches reach agreement for access to this material." Gonzales said the decision would have to be the president's.

Clearly, Congress still has a lot to do to determine whether the spying program follows the 1978 law and the Constitution. And Congress and the president will have to be open to negotiating possible adjustments to the 29-year-old law to reflect developments in technology, surveillance and the new realities of terrorism. But this should be non-negotiable: Congress cannot let the president get away with disregarding or rewriting the law and the Constitution at his whim.

A senior administration official told the New York Times that "People ought to take yes for an answer" -- implying that Congress should just accept the executive branch's word that the spying program is all hunky dory now that it has been approved by the FISA court. That's not how checks and balances work.

Editorial: Judicious Change To Wiretapping (GRPRESS)

Grand Rapids Press (MI), January 21, 2007

After resisting for more than a year, the Bush administration is putting its controversial domestic wiretapping program under the jurisdiction of the secret court set up to govern such cases. It's a good course correction. Concerns about terrorism shouldn't give federal intelligence agencies license to eavesdrop on citizens' phone calls and e-mails without court approval or congressional oversight.

The administration now says it will comply with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) and seek warrants from the secret panel of 11 federal judges for its domestic surveillance program, which monitors communications to and from the United States of people with suspected terrorist ties. That is not an unreasonable or onerous requirement.

President Bush waived the warrant requirement shortly after 9/11 in a secret order that didn't become public knowledge until December 2005. The president chose not to seek authority from the special FISA court, contending he had power under other statutes and that the FISA review process is too slow and too cumbersome to meet the technical needs of the eavesdropping program.

The FISA law was a Cold War-era statute designed to track Soviet agents when communication essentially meant office or home telephones. Today's Islamist terrorists operate globally and not just with standard telephones but with the Internet, disposable cell phones, email and fiber-optic networks. But instead of agreeing to amend the surveillance act to meet today's technical challenges, the administration chose to simply ignore it. That was a bad decision.

DOJ_NMG_0119591

Advocacy groups filed lawsuits challenging the legality of the surveillance program. U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled that the program was unconstitutional and should be halted. A federal appeals court is scheduled to hear the first appellate argument about the lawfulness of the program in two weeks. That may have prompted the government's about-face.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the Justice Department has worked out an "innovative" arrangement to bring the surveillance program under FISA jurisdiction. He wouldn't elaborate on the specifics to members of the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, so questions remain about what form the new compliance takes. Congressional leaders shouldn't be left in the dark about this new arrangement.

The operational details need not be made public, but congressional leaders or members of the House and Senate Intelligence committees should be thoroughly briefed. What has changed to make the process workable? Does the arrangement require the National Security Agency to seek individual warrants? Or did the court approve of the overall program and grant blanket wiretapping privileges to the NSA?

The issue is not about whether to monitor the communications of suspected terrorists but doing it legally and with proper checks and balances. We all should want that.

Our View Intelligence Oversight Should Confirm Judges' Role In Wiretap Orders (WILNJ)

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, January 21, 2007

So apparently there is a way to do surveillance of intelligence suspects with court oversight after all. For a year, the Bush administration insisted that wartime justified secrecy and executive privileges, regardless of a 1978 law setting up review through a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

Now, after months of rebuffing congressional negotiations and the threat of investigation, the Justice Department has a method for going to designated judges when it wants to monitor international e-mail and telephone calls given a probably terrorism link.

Skepticism is rife in the Capitol and among civil libertarians, and rightly so. There is only a vague outline of what the new ground rules are that prompted the administration's turn-around.

The Justice Department also is to go before federal court in Cincinnati on Jan. 31 for more arguments on the constitutionality of the Bush's earlier policy.

Congress should look into exactly what is going on. Given this administration's resistance to judicial checks on presidential authority, this adaptation may well be too good to be true.

Editorial: Legally Secret (HARTC)

The Hartford Courant, January 21, 2007

President George W. Bush has substituted one controversial spying program with another.

The old program eavesdropped on American and foreign al-Qaida suspects without the legally required court oversight. The new program? Well, it eavesdrops on the same targets, but now with the required warrants.

Just how broad and loose those warrants are, however - whether they give blanket authority for spying on broad groups of people, for example - are among the important details that nobody outside a small, tight-lipped circle knows.

So much for quelling fears of Big Brother.

The 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act required a warrant from a special court before an American citizen could be wiretapped. The National Security Agency ignored that legality in the domestic wiretapping program it began in 2001. The program was itself a well-kept secret until it was exposed by The New York Times in late 2005.

On Wednesday, the Bush administration announced it had dismantled the fiercely criticized program and started applying for court approval for wiretaps - but under new orders and opinions issued by the FISA court. The administration's turnabout was supposed to be welcome news. But the new FISA orders are so wrapped in mystery that no one outside the Bush administration and the spy court knows what they say.

The presiding judge has no objection to releasing them, but the Justice Department refuses to do so or to give even the bare outlines on how the new program works.

Without those details, it's impossible for lawmakers to judge whether their 1978 law is protecting privacy rights as well as public safety.

Editorial: Unanswered Questions (HC)

Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 21, 2007

Decision by Bush administration to reinstate judicial oversight of domestic wiretaps a welcome step that needs clarification

DOJ_NMG_0119592

After operating an electronic surveillance program for five years outside legally mandated oversight by a secret federal court, President George W. Bush has seemingly bowed to legal and congressional pressure. Justice Department officials have announced an arrangement with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court to obtain warrants for future spying inside the U.S.

While lawmakers and officials of civil liberties groups welcomed the development, they also want more information on whether the FISA court will review each surveillance request individually or whether it has simply given blanket approval for the activities by the National Security Agency.

Some suspect that the administration's action is simply a maneuver to derail several pending federal court cases challenging the constitutionality of the president's secretly authorized Terrorist Surveillance Program. The Justice Department added some credence to that view by immediately filing notice with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit that upcoming filings would address implications of the latest development.

Both Democratic and Republican lawmakers immediately expressed their concerns as to whether the new plan satisfies the requirements of existing law. One House Intelligence panel member, Rep. Heather A. Wilson, R-N.M., told reporters that she believed a single FISA judge had issued an unspecified order with blanket approval for surveillance rather than case-by-case warrants. Wilson is concerned that there are inadequate safeguards for civil liberties as provided by either the FISA legislation or a bill she proposed last year.

Other legislators wondered why the administration has taken so long to bring the surveillance program back under the supervision of the judiciary. The chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, D-W.Va., called the Justice Department announcement "confirmation that the administration's go-it-alone approach, effectively excluding Congress and the courts and operating outside the law, was unnecessary." Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., wondered why the administration took so long to bring an unlawful program back under the umbrella of the courts.

In a visit with the Chronicle Editorial Board last year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales justified the surveillance program as a legal extension of presidential authority in wartime and a congressional resolution supporting military action against terrorists.

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday, Gonzales refused to explain why the administration had reversed its previous position that court oversight was too restrictive to effectively combat terrorism.

The Judiciary Committee chairman, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., produced a letter from FISA court presiding judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly stating she was willing to give the panel the currently classified surveillance orders if the Justice Department agreed. Gonzales responded that he could not authorize the release because it was not his decision to make, indicating President Bush must make the call.

Americans need to be reassured that their constitutionally guaranteed rights against illegal government surveillance are being safeguarded as mandated by the FISA legislation.

If the chief jurist of the relevant court sees no harm in explaining how it will oversee the program, the administration should assent to providing a thorough explanation to lawmakers and the public.

Editorial: Balance Point (ABJ)

Akron (OH) Beacon Journal, January 21, 2007

The Bush White House says yes to judicial oversight

For more than a year, the Bush White House has publicly claimed the right to conduct electronic surveillance, without first seeking a court warrant, of Americans suspected of terrorist ties. It vigorously defended the program, which started after the Sept. 11 attacks, at congressional hearings and in legal briefs, denying it violated the constitutional protections of citizens. The president insisted the war on terrorism made speedy, warrantless wiretaps a national security imperative.

After all the contention, it is encouraging that the president has reversed course, the Justice Department announcing on Wednesday the program will be under the oversight of the court created by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. It is the right decision, a welcome return to checks and balances.

That said, it should not surprise the unexpected reversal has met with skepticism on Capitol Hill. On several anti-terrorism issues, including the interrogation and access of terror suspects to legal counsel, the Bush team has made extravagant claims of executive power, ignoring the roles Congress or the courts may play. The expansive assertion of authority earned a sharp rebuke in a 2004 Supreme Court ruling, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor scolding that ``a state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens."

The president has forfeited much good will, certainly the benefit of the doubt. He has invited questioning of his intentions and the timing of the about-face on the National Security Agency's wiretap program. In this instance, analysts noted the White House's penchant for riding a controversial policy hard and then shifting course without conceding error, just when the policy is about to be tested in the courts or in Congress. The federal appeals court in Cincinnati was due to hear a case on the legality of the wiretap program. Other lawsuits are pending.

DOJ_NMG_0119593

In Senate hearings Thursday, a tight-lipped Attorney General Alberto Gonzales did little to ease worries whether the new ``innovative arrangements'' with the FISA court would merely provide the program a blanket cover to conduct wiretaps. Congress would do well to press hard for clarification.

Editorial: Timing Raises Questions (LVS)

Las Vegas Sun, January 21, 2007

Suspicions persist in Bush's claim of changes to government's domestic spying program

One day before the Senate Judiciary Committee was to begin hearings on President Bush's warrantless domestic eavesdropping program, Bush administration officials announced that such surveillance would now be subject to judicial review.

The decision was a reversal for Bush, who has stubbornly insisted that forcing the National Security Agency to adhere to a 1970s-era law - which requires the agency to seek warrants in a secret court before monitoring Americans' communications - hindered the government's ability to track terrorist activity. Bush started domestic surveillance without warrants after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The New York Times revealed the program's existence in 2005. Bush has since been admonished by both Democratic and Republican lawmakers and federal appeals courts for what amounts to spying on Americans without any judicial oversight.

The timing of this apparent reversal in policy doesn't help to quell suspicions, as Bush often makes grand public promises to deflect criticism. And it is unclear how much the process will change. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, citing security concerns, refused to tell the Judiciary Committee whether eavesdropping requests will be reviewed one at a time or in groups.

The Bush administration's history of secrecy and deceit by omission runs deep, and it is hard to believe that this seeming change of heart is anything more than an attempt to avoid scrutiny by a Congress that is now run by Democrats.

No More Warrantless Spying (OCR)

Orange County (CA) Register, January 21, 2007

Bush defends the NSA domestic snooping even as he ends the program

The announcement last week that President Bush will not reauthorize the program of having the National Security Agency spy, eavesdrop or perform surveillance on U.S. residents suspected of having contact with terrorists overseas without a warrant being issued is welcome at first blush. It may prove to be an unalloyed benefit. But questions remain, and there are details the American people should be able to know about what government is doing in their name.

The program, revealed in December 2005 by the New York Times, has been controversial because it appears to be illegal. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 made a distinction between surveillance of Americans and intelligence surveillance of people in other countries. Americans can't have their phones tapped or be subject to certain other kinds of surveillance without probable cause and a warrant from a court.

The act set up a special secret court to consider requests to eavesdrop on Americans suspected of working for a foreign power. Over the years the court has disapproved only a handful of requests, and most of those were later approved with modifications. If there's a good reason to spy on Americans, the FISA court generally gives the government permission.

President Bush and other members of his administration have maintained that the program is legal as an extension of presidential powers in time of crisis or war. It was begun right after the attacks of 9/11, presumably because even the FISA procedures were considered too cumbersome in an era of cell phones, e-mail, instant messaging and more diverse threats.

An obvious question: If this program was considered legal and utterly essential a year ago, why is there no need to continue it? At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing last Thursday, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the administration had worked out procedures for more "swift and agile" consideration by the FISA court, but did not provide details.

It is also valid to wonder whether this switch was done to avoid judicial scrutiny in three cases challenging the program that are before the courts and might now be moot.

On balance, however, this is a welcome development. Checks and balances don't always prevent abuse, but they are essential to the American system.

Preserving Civil Liberties (MH)

The Miami Herald, January 21, 2007

It would be nice to believe that the Bush administration's reversal of policy on its secret wiretapping program -- allowing a measure of judicial oversight for the first time -- represents a change of attitude regarding the balance between civil liberties and executive power. But that's hardly the case.

DOJ_NMG_0119594

This administration has a consistent pattern of ignoring fundamental rights such as privacy and habeas corpus in order to extend the reach of the "unitary executive." Congress has a duty to find out more about the program and determine whether this change is merely a tactical shift designed to preserve the questionable authority of the president to decide which of those rights can be overlooked or denied in the name of national security.

A positive step

At issue is a vague White House announcement on Wednesday giving the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court jurisdiction over warrantless eavesdropping -- known as the "Terrorist Surveillance Program." This is a positive step to allow at least some monitoring of this unsupervised activity. But in an appearance before Congress Thursday, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a steadfast defender of the program, continued to withhold pertinent details. He also failed to give reassurances that the administration would not suddenly reverse itself once again and deny the courts proper jurisdiction.

In the past, the administration has been known to shift gears suddenly when facing a slapdown from the Supreme Court over dubious assertions of executive power. That was the case, for example, in the prosecution of Jose Padilla, held incommunicado as an "enemy combatant" for three years before the administration decided to charge him as a criminal.

This made the Padilla appeal before the court moot, hence averting a possible ruling that would have undermined the White House's claims of unfettered authority to designate U.S. citizens as enemy combatants. In the latest instance, a federal court in Cincinnati was on the verge of holding the first appellate hearing on the warrantless wiretapping program. By deciding to give the so-called FISA Court authority to monitor the program, the administration can argue that this case is also moot and thus can avoid a potentially embarrassing judicial spanking.

If civil liberties advocates are right -- and they have a strong case -- the administration has been operating outside the law for five years. FISA was created in the 1970s as a super-secret court to deal with sensitive national security eavesdropping. Why did it take 19 months following public disclosure of the secret wiretapping for the administration to agree that the court should monitor the program? Did the court surrender any of its authority in return for getting the program back under its jurisdiction?

Checks and balances

It is vital for Congress to learn the answers to these and other questions about who is secretly listening to the conversations of Americans and under what rules. Courts are supposed to determine when there is probable cause to suspect that the target of the wiretap is connected to terrorism. Without oversight, even the most well-intended prosecutor or federal agent can step across the line that protects our freedoms.

Whether the administration likes it or not, this is part of the bedrock system of checks and balances that has preserved the civil liberties that Americans cherish.

Steve Chapman: Never Mind What We Said About Spying (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, January 21, 2007

Is President Bush surrendering in the war on terror? For more than a year, the administration has insisted that preserving its "terrorist surveillance program," which involves unfettered and unauthorized wiretapping of Americans suspected of communicating with Al Qaeda operatives abroad, was, in the words of former White House press secretary Scott McClellan, "a vital tool" for us "to stay a step ahead of a deadly enemy that is determined to strike America again." Now, Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales says the program will not be renewed.

Before, we were told it was impossible to combat terrorism within the confines of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which places such investigations under the review of a special intelligence court--a process Gonzales portrayed as cumbersome and obsolete.

But that was in the past. "Any electronic surveillance that was occurring as part of the Terrorist Surveillance Program will now be conducted subject to the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court," wrote Gonzales in a letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week. Did we say impossible? We meant easy!

This about-face must be causing massive cognitive dissonance within the administration and among conservatives who regard any check on executive power as a favor to Al Qaeda. From the moment the secret National Security Agency program was revealed by The New York Times in 2005, Republicans treated its critics as foolish appeasers.

Never mind that it apparently violated the law, and never mind that it let the government spy on Americans right here at home, without bothering to get the search warrants that are normally required. Issues of legality, constitutionality and privacy cut no ice with the administration and its supporters. Either you were for the program, or you preferred to expose us to catastrophe.

During last fall's campaign, Bush mercilessly ridiculed congressional critics. "They must not think we're at war," he charged. "When the Terrorist Surveillance Program was brought to a vote on the floor of the House of Representatives, the vast majority of Democrats voted against it." So when, exactly, did the war end?

DOJ_NMG_0119595

Even stalwart administration allies are asking that question. An editorial in The Wall Street Journal, which defended the program from the start, declared itself "baffled by Mr. Bush's surrender" and warned that the "administration has some explaining to do--not least to its own officials who spent months saying FISA warrants were dangerously restrictive."

Contrary to the president's suggestions, critics were never against surveillance of Al Qaeda confederates in the United States. They only wanted the government to do what cops normally do when they want to eavesdrop: go to a judge and explain why the person targeted warrants investigation. In an emergency, FISA even allows the NSA to install the wire-tap first and seek approval within 72 hours. But that wasn't good enough for the administration.

The attorney general now says the NSA no longer has to operate as it did because the Justice Department worked with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to devise a faster, more flexible way to get a judge's approval of wiretaps. But if there is a way to do that, why did the administration wait five years to propose it?

Congress, after all, has amended FISA several times since it was enacted. Yet the White House chose to circumvent the law and create a secret program that, if the president had his way, would still be spying on Americans without our knowledge.

We don't know exactly how the program will operate under the court's supervision, because Gonzales refuses to say. But apparently the administration has succumbed to the once-intolerable burden of demonstrating to judges that certain people pose a danger before they are bugged.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, says Justice Department officials assured him the eavesdropping will proceed on the basis of old-fashioned individualized warrants, not simply a blanket court approval of what the NSA was doing. Other sources told The Washington Post that such warrants are one part of the new system. So apparently we can fight Al Qaeda without giving up our privacy protections.

Maybe we were misled before, or maybe we're being misled now. But the next time the president tries to sell us on the idea that some expansion of executive power is critical to fighting terrorism, I hope he'll throw in the Brooklyn Bridge.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Passport Prerequisite (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

Some travel-industry officials say they fear a passport bottleneck when new federal regulations take effect Tuesday requiring Americans to show a passport to re-enter the United States after traveling to countries in the Western Hemisphere.

But officials at the State and Homeland Security departments, which are implementing the changes, say most travelers who need passports to comply with the new rules already have them.

The first phase of the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative (WHTI) will require U.S. citizens traveling by air between the United States and Canada, Mexico, Central and South America, the Caribbean and Bermuda to present a valid passport. In the past, many of these destinations required only a valid U.S. driver's license or other official identification.

The changes in travel requirements do not affect trips to and from U.S.-controlled territories in the Caribbean, such as Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

The new rules were recommended by the September 11 commission and were passed into law as part of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004. The rules are aimed at reducing the threat of terrorism and creating a uniform system to identify travelers.

Currently, a traveler "may make a verbal declaration of citizenship" or "produce 8,000 different documents" to try to show who they are as they try to cross the border, making authentication of identity both difficult and time-consuming, said Derwood Staeben, a senior adviser for the State Department's Consular Affairs Bureau, which oversees passports. "In fiscal 2005, our Customs Bureau intercepted 75,000 fraudulent documents."

A recent poll by Kayak.com, which provides travel information to about 2 million people a month, showed that "only a small percentage of those planning to get a passport" to comply with the new regulations "have even sent in their applications," said Steve Hafner, co-founder and chief executive officer of the firm, which has offices in New Jersey and Massachusetts.

"We think it could create a major backlog when the U.S. State Department starts processing all those applications, once they are in the system," Mr. Hafner said, noting that it already takes six weeks for applicants to obtain a passport.

In contrast, data from the Homeland Security Department show that 86 percent of Americans who have flown to the United States since Nov. 20 had passports, leading Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to say Thursday that he expects a "relatively seamless transition."

DOJ_NMG_0119596

Overall, about 73 million Americans -- or 27 percent to 28 percent of the U.S. population -- have passports, Mr. Staeben said.

But Ileana Kerasidis, manager of Skyline Travel in Alexandria, said her clients are expressing "tremendous concern" about potential passport backlogs.

'Start very early'

Steve Dahlgren, manager of Ticket to Ride, a travel agency in the District, said he is "recommending that people start very early" in the passport-application process.

"For example, if someone is planning a trip in July and would usually wait until May to apply for a passport, we are advising them to apply now," Mr. Dahlgren said. "There is not much confidence the process will be smooth. I am not concerned that the State Department will be completely overwhelmed, but I think it's best to start early and be safe."

The State Department says it has "dedicated sufficient resources" to handle the nearly 4 million additional applications for passports it expects to receive this year as a result of the new requirements. It says it has hired 250 new employees to review passport applications.

"We've been preparing for this, and so we're not expecting a backlog," Mr. Staeben said. "We don't have a backlog now, even though applications are up 51 percent over last year. We process passports in a six-week period, and we expect that to continue."

However, Mr. Dahlgren said he's heard from some clients who already have waited at least eight weeks to get passports. "There is a backlog," he said.

The second phase of the WHTI, expected to begin as early as Jan. 1, 2008, will require citizens traveling back to the United States by land or sea -- including ferries -- to show passports.

About 86 million people fly to the United States each year. But about four times that number arrive in cars. As a result, many officials are expecting passport applications to rise dramatically next year. The State Department says it expects 18 million applications in 2008, up from 12.1 million last year and an anticipated 16 million this year.

A price to pay

Because the new passport requirements can add sharply to the cost of a trip -- especially for families -- there seems to be increased client interest in travel to places that will remain passport-free, said Drew Patterson, a vice president at Kayak.com.

In most cases, a passport costs $97, which includes a $30 execution fee. For children younger than 16, the cost is $82. Mr. Staeben said those prices will not rise under the new policy.

But a couple with three children who need passports to travel somewhere that passports formerly weren't necessary will pay another $440.

And if they need a passport in a hurry, they will have to pay $60 more per person -- or a total of $300 for a family of five -- for the faster service. Mr. Staeben said paying the "expedite fee" typically means applicants will receive passports in two weeks rather than six.

Some hotel chains and tourism offices in parts of the Caribbean affected by the new rules, including Nassau and Paradise Island in the Bahamas, are offering promotions that reimburse travelers who suddenly need to get passports.

As for what will happen to U.S. citizens who attempt to re-enter the country without a passport, the government says the law allows the new documentation requirements to be waived under certain circumstances.

"These exceptions include individual cases of unforeseen emergency and individual cases based on 'humanitarian or national-interest reasons,' " the State Department says in a fact sheet.

Exempting 'snowbirds'

Mr. Chertoff said so-called "snowbirds" -- Canadians spending the winter in the United States -- are also exempt from the new passport requirements. "We will allow them to depart from the United States without having a passport for some significant period of time to avoid the problem of people who may have come here last year" before the requirement took effect, he told reporters last week.

There also will be exceptions for those with special cards issued for those who travel between the United States and Canada for work, merchant marines with Coast Guard documents and permanent residents with green cards.

In addition, the State Department says it "has processes to assist U.S. citizens overseas to obtain emergency travel documentation for those with lost or stolen passports."

Originally, the proposed date for implementation of the air phase of WHTI was Jan. 1, rather than Jan. 23. But it was postponed at the request of the airline industry "in order to facilitate holiday travel," the government said.

Later this year, the State Department will begin providing credit-card-size Passport Cards or PASS Cards, which can be used as ID for land and sea travel between the United States and Canada, Mexico, the Caribbean and Bermuda.

DOJ_NMG_0119597

Passport applicants must appear in person at a passport acceptance center, found in post offices, federal courthouses, county clerk offices and even libraries in some communities. Full information about the application process can be obtained at the State Department's Web site (http://travel.state.gov/passport/passport_1738.html).

New Orleans Of Future May Stay Half Its Old Size (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 20 — The empty streets, deserted avenues and abandoned houses prompt a gnawing question, nearly 17 months after Hurricane Katrina: Is this what New Orleans has come to — a city half its old size?

Over and over, the city's leaders reassure citizens that better days and, above all, more people are in the future. Their destiny will not merely be to reside in a smaller city with a few good restaurants and curious local customs, the citizens are told.

But some economists and demographers are beginning to wonder whether New Orleans will top out at about half its prestorm population of about 444,000, already in a steep decline from its peak of 627,525 in the 1960 Census. At the moment, the population is well below half, and future gains are likely to be small.

"It will be a trickle based on what we know now," said Elliott Stonecipher, a consultant and demographer based in Shreveport, La. "Low tens of thousands, over three or four or five years, something in that range. I would say we could start losing people, especially if the crime problem doesn't get high visibility."

The new doubts, surprisingly, are largely not based on the widespread damage caused by the flood. Rather, crippling problems that existed long before Hurricane Katrina are mostly being blamed for the city's failure to thrive.

In this view, the storm was merely a grim exclamation point to conditions decades in the making. Before the storm, some economists say, New Orleans may have had more people than its economy could support, and the stalled repopulation is merely reflecting that.

Hurricane Katrina may have brutally recalibrated the city's demographics, setting New Orleans firmly on the path its underlying characteristics had already been leading it down: a city losing people at the rate of perhaps 1.5 percent a year before Hurricane Katrina, with a stagnant economy, more than a quarter of the population living in poverty, and a staggeringly high rate of unemployment, in which as many as one in five were jobless or not seeking work.

Political leaders, worried about the loss of clout and a Congressional seat, press for people to return, but a smaller New Orleans may not be bad, some economists say. Most of those who have not returned — 175,000, by Mr. Stonecipher's count — are very poor, and can be more easily absorbed in places with vibrant job markets, they say.

Large-scale concentrations of deep poverty — as was the case in New Orleans before the storm — are inherently harmful to cities. The smaller New Orleans is almost certain to wind up with a far higher percentage of its population working than before Hurricane Katrina.

"Where there are high concentrations of poverty, people can't see a way out," said William Oakland, a retired economist from Tulane University who has studied the city's economy for decades. "Maybe the diaspora is a blessing."

Others, however, worry that permanently losing so many people threatens the city's culture — its unique way of talking, parading and eating.

"Culture is people," said Richard Campanella, a Tulane geographer who has written extensively about the city's neighborhoods. "If half the local people are dispersed and no longer living cohesively in those social networks, then half of local culture is gone."

The new doubts also take into account the current barriers to repopulation, including the well-documented failure of the state's Road Home aid program for homeowners, the loss of tens of thousands of jobs since the storm, the crime problem and delays in rebuilding moderately priced housing. Official efforts — local, state and federal — to rebuild the network of hospitals, schools and public housing projects that once served the city's huge poor population have been faltering. But they also look at what New Orleans was before the storm.

The low population figure, 191,000, which was reported by the Louisiana Recovery Authority in November last year in the most credible survey to date, was about half the 444,000 count in a Census estimate before Hurricane Katrina. The number was surprising, dashing expectations of a "big return," as one economist put it, and was hotly disputed by local officials. Still, upticks, if there are any, are imperceptible: the percentage of prehurricane gas and electric users who were getting service, for instance, remained the same between April and November 2006, the Brookings Institution reported last month.

"Our expectations were just wrong," said James A. Richardson, an economist who directs the Public Administration Institute at Louisiana State University. "I don't believe it will ever be 450,000 again. I think New Orleans did not need 450,000 people to support the economy you had at that time."

DOJ_NMG_0119598

With no real place for the poorest of the evacuees in the economy before the storm, New Orleans may have permanently lost that part of its population. Supporting that notion is an unpublished analysis by Mr. Oakland, the former Tulane economist, which shows unusually low rates of participation in the labor force before Hurricane Katrina.

Thus, a frequent impression of prehurricane travelers to New Orleans — that there were "a lot of people hanging around, going nowhere," as the Nobel-winning Columbia University economist Edmund S. Phelps, a sometime-visitor, puts it — turns out to have a statistical basis.

The statistics, which compare the number of people actually working with the total working-age population, suggest "there are a lot of people out there not working," said Mr. Oakland, referring to the period before Hurricane Katrina. Or, he said, they were working in an underground economy, not measured by statistics. If not actually illegal, he said, it was not very profitable.

In New Orleans, before the storm, about 4 out of 10 men in the working-age population were out of a job or not looking for one, compared with less than 3 in 10 nationally.

Employment had dropped sharply in the city from 1969 to 1999, Mr. Oakland writes. More than half of young black men ages 16 to 24 were not in the labor force. Unemployment rates among young blacks were above 25 percent. "The data is showing New Orleans is really a basket case," Mr. Oakland said.

In the city's poorest areas, the numbers were even more discouraging. In places like the Lower Ninth Ward or Central City, half of all working-age people were not looking for work, Mr. Oakland wrote. The real unemployment rate in these impoverished, high-crime areas, which would include those not looking for work, would have been a "whopping" 32 percent, he wrote.

Compounding the city's difficulties, and, in effect, helping to stem the population loss, was a secondary factor: the direness of the city's poverty, and its concentration. Those conditions helped make the city's poor population exceptionally immobile. New Orleans was also poor not only in absolute terms, but also in relative terms. The poorest 30 percent of households had a lower share of the city's total income than the comparable slice in any other similar Southern city, Mr. Oakland found.

"The job mobility was very low among the poor, so they just stay where they are, and the social welfare system shored them up," Mr. Oakland said.

The city's population was thus "out of equilibrium, if you would say that," Mr. Oakland added. "It's not normal to have that level of nonparticipation in the labor force."

Haunting the city's effort to repopulate, too, is the incalculable toll inflicted by ghosts from its past — a political legacy of corruption and patronage, and a deep racial division with a far more distressing passage toward integration than was experienced, say, in Atlanta.

Looking to the future, another 50,000 people might eventually be added to the city's population, Mr. Oakland suggested, but there are no guarantees.

There has been little to no construction of cheap housing that would enable the return of the largest category of those still displaced, Mr. Stonecipher noted.

A second category of people, 50,000 or more who have established themselves elsewhere but who could return, may be even harder to recapture, given the combination of past weaknesses and continuing present-day hurdles.

"The longer it lasts, the more likely it is that our population is plateauing, the longer the uncertainty continues," said Janet Speyrer, an economist at the University of New Orleans.

WAR NEWS:

Embattled, Bush Held To Plan To Salvage Iraq (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had a surprise for President Bush when they sat down with their aides in the Four Seasons Hotel in Amman, Jordan. Firing up a PowerPoint presentation, Maliki and his national security adviser proposed that U.S. troops withdraw to the outskirts of Baghdad and let Iraqis take over security in the strife-torn capital. Maliki said he did not want any more U.S. troops at all, just more authority.

The president listened intently to the unexpected proposal at their Nov. 30 meeting, according to accounts from several administration officials. Bush seemed impressed that Maliki had taken the initiative, but it did not take him long to reject the idea.

By the time Bush returned to Washington, the plan had already been picked through by his military commanders. At a meeting in the White House's Roosevelt Room, the president flatly told his advisers that the Maliki plan was not going to work. He had concluded that the Iraqis were not up to the task and that Baghdad would collapse into chaos, making a bad situation worse. And so the Americans would have to help them.

DOJ_NMG_0119599

From that early December meeting on, Bush was headed down a path that would result in his defying critics and the seeming message of the November elections by ordering 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq. A reconstruction of the administration's Iraq policy review, based on more than a dozen interviews with senior advisers, Bush associates, lawmakers and national security officials, reveals a president taking the lead in driving the process toward one more effort at victory -- despite doubts along the way from his own military commanders, lawmakers and the public at large.

He never seriously considered beginning to withdraw U.S. forces, as urged by newly elected Democratic congressional leaders and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. And he had grown skeptical of his own military commanders, who were telling him no more troops were needed.

So Bush relied on his own judgment that the best answer was to try once again to snuff out the sectarian violence in Baghdad, even at the risk of putting U.S. soldiers into a crossfire between Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. When his generals resisted sending more troops, he seemed irritated. When they finally agreed to go along with the plan, he doubled the number of troops they requested.

It was a signature moment for a president who seems uninfluenced by the electorate on Iraq and headed for a showdown with the new Democratic Congress. Presented with an opportunity to pull back, Bush instead chose to extend and, in some ways, deepen his commitment, gambling that more time and a new plan will finally bring success to the troubled U.S. military mission.

"The guy who is most committed to winning and finding a way to win is the president. He always has been; he's the only reason we are still in this fight," said Frederick W. Kagan, a military historian at the American Enterprise Institute whose advice to send more troops has been closely monitored by senior administration policymakers.

Yet in hindsight, some Bush advisers believe they misjudged the politics that would greet Bush's Jan. 10 unveiling of the new plan. They understood that many if not most Democrats would not welcome a troop increase but thought at least some would grudgingly go along -- not anticipating what ended up as near-universal opposition by Democrats and visceral anger even among some Republicans.

They had hoped more members of Congress would embrace the advice that Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) gave the president during one session in the Cabinet Room. "Mr. President, I have two words for you," Lieberman said, according to officials who were present. " 'Be bold.' "

That advice, at least, Bush would take to heart.Political Surprises

Bush's new Iraq plan traces its origin to last summer, after the second of two operations designed to quell spiking violence in Baghdad collapsed. For more than three years, Bush and his advisers had been leading the war on the fundamental belief that once they built a representative democratic government, the Sunni insurgency and sectarian violence would ebb.

By early fall, even as Bush was on the campaign trail accusing Democrats of defeatism, he and his senior advisers were coming to the conclusion that his core assumptions were wrong. The political process would not lead to security in Iraq. In fact, it would have to be the other way around. And they started to doubt the advice from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and senior commanders in Baghdad that troop levels were adequate to contain the violence.

"It was pretty clear when you started to look at our assumptions, many of them just weren't right," said a senior administration official, who like others discussed internal deliberations on the condition of anonymity.

Bush concluded by the run-up to the Nov. 7 congressional elections that to change course he would have to get rid of Rumsfeld, the senior figure in his administration most resistant to rethinking the Iraq strategy. At the same time, several agency reviews of Iraq policy were launched. But both decisions were kept secret until after the balloting.

In the meantime, Bush dispatched national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley to Iraq to bring back what White House officials called "ground truth." Hadley returned from his Oct. 29 to Nov. 5 trip profoundly disturbed by the Maliki government, uncertain whether the prime minister was capable of doing what was necessary to rein in Shiite militias.

The day after the election, Bush announced that he was removing Rumsfeld and replacing him with former CIA director Robert M. Gates. That same day, Hadley sent a five-page classified memo to the president that proposed bolstering Maliki's political and security capacities and raised the prospect of more U.S. troops.

On Nov. 14, Bush ordered that the various agency reviews be combined into a single process and declared that he would lead it himself. A group led by deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch II began a series of grueling seven- and eight-hour-a-day meetings.

Closeted in a conference room named for World War II-era secretary of state Cordell Hull, the Iraq team debated papers presented by senior officials throughout the government. State Department officials urged a more energetic outreach to Iraqis beyond Baghdad's Green Zone, to hedge against failure by the Maliki government. Other officials, including those in the office of Vice President Cheney, voiced concern that U.S. steps to reach out to disaffected Sunni Iraqis had not brought about a corresponding decrease in violence.

DOJ_NMG_0119600

The president also heard from outside experts. In an early December Oval Office meeting, retired Army Gen. Jack Keane presented his own plan for an increase of tens of thousands of U.S. troops to restore security in Baghdad. Another retired Army general, Barry R. McCaffrey, said he told Bush that the idea was a "fool's errand" and argued that putting more troops on the ground would not change the underlying dynamic. Still, the administration was interested enough in a buildup that Keane had follow-up sessions with Cheney and Hadley.

At the same time, White House officials called in scores of lawmakers to discuss Iraq with the president in the weeks leading up to Bush's Jan. 10 speech. While many Democrats dismissed such talks as a facade of consultation over a decision long since made, Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said when he told Hadley at a private meeting that the president needed to make clear that the U.S. commitment was not "open-ended," Hadley picked up the telephone and called an aide to make sure the speech included such language.

White House aides also debated how to respond to the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan, congressionally chartered commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a close friend of the president's father, and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (Ind.), a widely respected Democrat. At first, officials said, they hoped the group would prove a vehicle for bringing the two parties together after a bitter election.

But the panel advanced several key proposals that the White House quickly made clear were unacceptable to Bush, particularly a plan to withdraw U.S. combat forces by early 2008, open talks with Iraq's neighbors Iran and Syria, and condition U.S. assistance on the Maliki government meeting defined political benchmarks.Rejecting Plan B

A version of Maliki's surprise proposal during the Amman meeting turned out to be the major alternative considered by Bush, White House officials said. The plan called for ringing Baghdad with U.S. troops while Iraqi security forces fought the sectarian violence in the city. Other U.S. troops in the country would shift to the borders to keep Iranian and Syrian infiltrators out, leaving U.S. forces with one main combat mission -- attacking al-Qaeda elements in Anbar province in western Iraq.

The plan had the appeal of not pulling U.S. troops out of the country while still allowing Iraqis to settle their own differences. But Bush worried that such a move might mean losing the war.

"He became convinced that that was not sustainable," Hadley said in an interview. "Let's assume that the sectarian violence does escalate. Are the American military really going to stand outside the city while sectarian violence rages in Baghdad? I don't think so."

The Bush team concluded that the previous Baghdad security plans had failed for four reasons: The Iraqis never took ownership over security, Maliki placed political constraints on military operations, there were not enough reliable Iraqi and U.S. forces, and there was no serious effort to rebuild areas taken back from insurgents or militias.

Bush spent hours in conversation with Maliki, on the phone and in videoconference, probing to determine whether he could count on the prime minister. "The president decided we need to bring this issue to a head," one senior adviser said. "We need to clarify whether this government is really a partner or not."

Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, said Maliki's presentation of a new plan in Amman was a sign of his heightened interest in tackling Baghdad's security problems.

"We all recognized that it was too ambitious," he said. "What the president liked was the intent and the willingness to take on more responsibility."

Another problem for Bush was that the military did not necessarily want more troops. Army Gens. John P. Abizaid, the Middle East commander, and George W. Casey Jr., the commander in Iraq, opposed an influx of U.S. forces because they were unconvinced it would change the dynamics on the ground.

Resistance from Casey and the Joint Chiefs of Staff flared throughout the process. On Dec. 13, Bush went to the super-secure "tank" at the Pentagon to listen to his top generals, only to walk away convinced that some of them were trying to manage defeat rather than find a way to victory.

Bush decided to placate some of the concerns expressed by the generals about the overextended military and told The Washington Post six days later that he would expand the size of the Army and Marines. When Gates went to Baghdad that week, he came back with Casey's agreement for more troops based on the understanding that the commander would no longer be held back by the Iraqi government and that the United States would address the country's economic needs.

"He was not overriding his commanders," one Bush aide said of the president. "But he was pushing them to identify what went wrong and what do we need to change what happened."

Still, Bush and the military came at the plan from different perspectives. Casey asked for two more brigades for Baghdad, plus a third that would be stationed in Kuwait as a reserve and two others that would be put on call back in the United States.

Bush decided that was not enough. His advisers studied the experience in the northern Iraqi town of Mosul under Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who successfully undercut the insurgency there, and they decided they could not risk having too few troops. Bush had already decided to replace Casey with Petraeus, and through intermediaries the president reached out to Petraeus, who was supportive of more troops than Casey requested.

DOJ_NMG_0119601

So the president reversed Casey's plan, deciding that all five brigades would go to Baghdad in a phased deployment. "The president came out and said, 'Let's err on the side of making sure they have everything they need,' " said a senior official.

Bush Administration, Under Criticism, Warns Iraq To Fulfill Its End Of The Bargain (NYT)

By Helene Cooper, David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20 — President Bush and his top advisers, after nine days of unrelenting criticism from Congress, are warning the Iraqi government that continuing funding for an American troop increase and other elements of Mr. Bush's new Iraq strategy will be contingent on Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's delivery on promises to quell violence, senior administration officials said in recent interviews.

"It's going to be a little bit pay-as-you-go, and it's going to depend a lot on Iraqis performing," Stephen J. Hadley, President Bush's national security adviser, said Friday.

"As Mr. Maliki's government follows through on its promises," Mr. Hadley said, the administration will "be in a much better position to resist any efforts to fence the funds" when the Iraq budget request goes before Congress.

The warning is coming despite President Bush's declaration, in an interview last weekend, that he had the sole authority to carry out the strategy, including an increase of about 18,000 troops to secure Baghdad. Now, administration officials, who have carefully avoided declaring outright that the American commitment in Iraq would be cut back if Mr. Maliki fails, are using the open hostility of most Democrats and the skepticism of many Republicans as a way to underscore to the prime minister that the White House plan represents a last chance for him.

In recent days, however, as Mr. Bush's plan has come under attack in both houses, White House officials are trying to head off both a vote condemning Mr. Bush's approach and a longer-term effort to restrict money or limit the number of troops that can be sent.

The White House has dismissed some of that criticism as partisan and "poisonous," the word it used in response to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's charge on Friday that Mr. Bush knows that "because the troops are in harm's way, that we won't cut off the resources." She went on to charge, "that's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way."

But even the ranking Republican member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, has declared deep concern about the wisdom of sending more troops, and one of the nation's most senior retired marines, Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that "the addition of 20,000 troops is too, little too late."

The result is that some members of the administration are already discussing what one called "Plan C," even as the administration publicly expresses support for Mr. Maliki. Some senior officials, insisting on anonymity, are discussing alternative leadership for the Iraqi government, including throwing American support behind another Shiite leader, Adel Abdul Mahdi. Mr. Mahdi is the deputy to Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Iranian-backed Supreme Council of the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a party known as Sciri. Mr. Mahdi has long been a favorite of the White House to take the top job; he lost out last spring when the anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose family has long feuded with Mr. Hakim's, threw his support behind Mr. Maliki in a vote within the Shiite coalition.

Administration officials maintain that there is no American plan afoot to encourage a removal of Mr. Maliki from power, and several senior officials said that if Mr. Maliki does not follow through on his promise to deploy Iraqi Army and police brigades in Baghdad to quell sectarian violence, the Iraqis themselves will move to replace him as prime minister.

Some in the administration complain that backing a member of Mr. Hakim's party would quickly give Iran enormous influence over the Iraqi government; when American military forces picked up Iranian operatives in Baghdad late last month, the raid took place within Mr. Hakim's compound. Those operatives were later released after Iran and Iraq claimed they had diplomatic immunity; the Pentagon said one of the men was the chief of operations for an elite Iranian military unit.

The conflicting signals here reflect doubt within the administration that Mr. Maliki will actually prove either willing or able to crack down on Shiite militia groups, which make up a large percentage of his support base.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's recent trip through the region to sell America's Sunni Arab allies on Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy, underscored just how much hostility there is among Sunni Arabs toward Mr. Maliki, administration officials said. "What she heard was that Maliki has failed completely, both politically and personally, and they don't trust him to crack down on the Shiites," one senior administration official said.

Mr. Hadley expressed concern about Mr. Maliki in a memorandum to Mr. Bush in November, which was later leaked. But his comments on Friday appeared to be the first time that any senior administration official had suggested that should those doubts grow, Congress could imperil Mr. Bush's new approach.

DOJ_NMG_0119602

Administration officials, in interviews, said they were not conceding that Congress was heading toward making a troop increase contingent on Iraqi action. But by warning the Iraqis of the possibility, they are clearly both using Congress's dissatisfaction to gain leverage, and preparing for the possibility that the Democratic majority may impose conditions that Mr. Bush has resisted.

Last Sunday, on the CBS program "60 Minutes," Mr. Bush insisted that he has the authority as commander-in-chief to execute his strategy, no matter what kind of objections Congress raises. "In this situation, I do, yeah," he said. "Now, I fully understand they could try to stop me from doing it. But I made my decision, and we're going forward."

Interviews with senior administration officials, however, indicated that now that question is no longer viewed in such black-and-white terms. While Mr. Bush clearly has the money to keep his strategy afloat for a number of months, there is a growing realization that domestic pressure to place a "cap" on troop levels or begin withdrawal could become overwhelming. So, in an effort to turn a potential constraint into a negotiating tool, Mr. Bush's aides have begun to tell Iraqi politicians that Congress's patience with the pace of the war is just about exhausted.

"If they do perform in the next two months, we've probably bought ourselves another four months," said one senior administration official, referring to the Iraqi government.

The hedging under way reflects a continuing debate within the administration about how explicitly to make the proposed troop increase conditional on Iraqi performance, administration officials said. That debate was still on display even after Mr. Bush, in his speech to the nation on Jan. 10, praised the Maliki government's "strong commitment" to ending sectarian violence, and pledged that "America will change our strategy help the Iraqis carry out their campaign to put down sectarian violence—and bring security to the people of Baghdad."

But the next morning, both Ms. Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates struck a different note. "Among Americans and Iraqis, there is no confusion over one basic fact: It is the Iraqis who are responsible for what kind of country Iraq will be," Ms. Rice said during a news briefing at the White House. "The president has conveyed to the Iraqi leadership that we will support their good decisions, but that Americans' patience is limited."

Mr. Gates went further a week ago when he suggested that the United States had built "off-ramps" in case the troop reinforcement was not needed, and said that if they were used, "you don't necessarily have to go to the full extent of the buildup." At another point, he said, "We're going to know pretty early on whether the Iraqis are meeting their military commitments," he said.

But American officials have been cagey about how they would respond if they conclude Mr. Maliki is unwilling or unable to face down Shiite militias, or strike the deals necessary to reach a political accord with the minority Sunnis. American leverage over Mr. Maliki is limited, especially because he has never been enthusiastic about an increase of American troops, and has even suggested that he is not interested in remaining the country's leader for long.

"The baseline strategy is that we'll invest in good performance, not in things we consider foolish and destructive," said Philip D. Zelikow, the former counselor at the State Department who participated in the administration's Iraq strategy review. "Since the odds that the Iraqi government are genuinely going to adopt" the Iraqi part of the troop increase "are uncertain, recent events reinforce the need to underscore this baseline strategy, which may not seem to promise a big win but also doesn't seem to be placing such a big gamble," Mr. Zelikow said.

Vietnam Surfaces On Both Sides Of Iraq Debate (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

Supporters and critics of Bush policies have invoked the conflict. But scholars say the two wars differ greatly.

WASHINGTON — As President Bush was preparing to announce plans to send more troops to Iraq earlier this month, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy chose to talk about another conflict.

"In Vietnam, the White House grew increasingly obsessed with victory, and increasingly divorced from the will of the people," the 74-year-old Massachusetts Democrat said in a speech to the National Press Club.

"We all know what happened, though," he continued.

"There was no military solution to that war.... In the end, 58,000 Americans died in the search for it. Echoes of that disaster are all around us today."

Kennedy mentioned Vietnam seven times in the speech, in which he outlined plans to challenge Bush's plan.

Other members of Congress would follow.

On the floors of the House and Senate, in committee hearings and news conferences since the president's Jan. 10 announcement, lawmakers on both sides of the aisle and both sides of the war debate have repeatedly invoked America's longest war.

DOJ_NMG_0119603

Opponents use the vocabulary of the Vietnam War as they talk of opposing an escalation that they consider as divisive as those pushed by Presidents Johnson and Nixon in the 1960s and early 1970s. And supporters of the president warn of repeating other mistakes of that conflict by withdrawing support for American soldiers while they remain in harm's way.

Capitol Hill even witnessed the recent return of one of the Vietnam era's iconic figures when former Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota, the 1972 Democratic presidential nominee, came to Washington to offer lawmakers advice about ending this war.

Analogies between the two conflicts are as old as the Iraq war itself — and fraught with some peril, said Vassar College historian Robert K. Brigham, author of the recent book "Is Iraq Another Vietnam?"

"When you say 'escalation' like Vietnam, you are in a sense saying there is an escalation that has no end ... and 'phased withdrawal' rings of a retreat from Vietnam," Brigham said. "One thing we have to be careful of is that a lot of the references to Vietnam are intellectual shorthand.... Vietnam is a very complicated war to understand."

Just as Iraq and Vietnam are vastly different, the American military commitments in the two conflicts have striking differences.

At the peak of the Vietnam War, there were nearly 540,000 American troops in Vietnam, with more than 58,000 of them killed. In Iraq, troop levels have remained relatively stable at about 130,000, and more than 3,000 of them have died.

Nonetheless, the president's proposal seems to have rekindled a spirited debate on Capitol Hill about America's last prolonged war and what lessons can be drawn from it.

"You have a generation who grew up with Vietnam as the political issue of their time," said Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Sherman Oaks), who reminded Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at a recent hearing that the United States had withdrawn from Vietnam and had still won the Cold War.

For critics of the Bush plan, Vietnam has provided ammunition to bolster their calls for congressional intervention to end the current conflict and to push for a political rather than a military solution.

"If the lesson in Iraq teaches anything, it is that military might has very great limitations," Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) said on the floor of the Senate recently. "But then that is a lesson we should have learned many years ago from Vietnam."

Byrd, a longtime war opponent who has been in the Senate since 1959, is one of seven current senators who were elected before the end of the Vietnam War.

In the House, Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.) drew on her brother's experience in Vietnam to challenge the president's proposal.

"As the sister of a Vietnam veteran, I still remember vividly our escalation of that failed war.... ," Maloney said. "I remember vividly the worry I had for my brother and the feeling that our troops would be better-served if they were returned home rather than fighting in another country's civil war. Those are the same feelings I have today."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who joined the Senate in 1973 as the last U.S. troops were being withdrawn from Vietnam and is now a vocal Iraq war opponent, also touched on Vietnam as he opened Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on the president's plan.

"I think we all learned a lesson, whether we went or didn't go, whether we were for it or against it, [that] no foreign policy can be sustained in this country without the informed consent of the American people," Biden said. "They've got to sign on."

At the same committee meeting, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), an Army infantryman in Vietnam in 1968, was even more critical of the president's proposal, calling it "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam."

Biden and Hagel have introduced a resolution opposing Bush's plan.

The president has consistently rejected Vietnam analogies, arguing that the conditions in Iraq and in the United States bear little resemblance to the Vietnam era.

"Iraq, after the overthrow of the tyrant, voted on a constitution that is intended to unite the whole country. And then they had elections under that constitution where nearly 12 million people voted for this unity government which is different from Vietnam," the president said before he visited Vietnam in November.

At a recent briefing, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow dismissed Hagel's Vietnam reference as little more than "a pretty good line."

Several of the president's congressional allies also have argued more recently that the price of leaving Iraq would be much higher than that of leaving Vietnam.

"We were able to walk away from Vietnam," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a former Navy fighter pilot who spent 5 1/2 years as a prisoner of war in North Vietnam. "If we walk away from Iraq, we'll be back, possibly in the context of a wider war in the world's most volatile region."

DOJ_NMG_0119604

Meanwhile, other congressional Republicans, including several more Vietnam veterans, have drawn on their own experiences during the war to challenge proposals that Congress should use its budgetary authority to stop the deployment of additional troops.

"I served at a time when we saw the Congress reduce funding for the military," Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.) said last week while unveiling a resolution opposing any cutoff of funds to troops.

"We served at a time when the military did not have the support of the people, the press or the Congress," said Kline, who flew Marine Corps helicopters during the Vietnam War. "I don't ever want to see that again."

Times researcher Robin Cochran contributed to this report.

Bush's History Lesson (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 21, 2007

AT HENRY Kissinger's recommendation, President Bush is reading "A Savage War of Peace," the classic account of the Algerian war of independence, 1954-1962. It holds up as well today as it did when published in 1977, but it's an odd choice for the president as he escalates the war in Iraq.

British historian Alistair Horne is sympathetic to all the combatants:

The French Army, trying to recover from defeats at the hands of the Germans (1940) and the Vietnamese (1954).

The National Liberation Front (FLN in the French abbreviation), insurgents who forged a political victory despite defeats in the field.

The million or so European settlers in Algeria.

The 9 million Muslim Algerians who bore the brunt of the war and had to make a decision to go against a colonial order that had lasted since 1830.

But the differences with Iraq are huge, and they include:

Problem of the pieds noirs (black feet), as the European settlers were called. "If the pied noir loved France," Horne writes, "it was with a love that sought constant reassurance." They refused to compromise with the Muslims early in the struggle. Americans, for all their problems in Iraq, experience none of this emotional tug.

Dilemma of the army. Not a few soldiers were pied noir, which added urgency to the army's quest to redeem itself in Algeria. And the high command, all of whom had lived through the Third Republic, the Vichy government, the German occupation, and 26 changes of government in the Fourth Republic, had trouble maintaining a proper subordination to civilian authority. Many enlisted men and junior officers were draftees, fostering an intimate involvement of the home front in the war.

Coherence of the opposition. US troops in Iraq are fighting Sunnis, Shi'ites, Iranians, remnants of the Ba'ath Party, and a few others. In Algeria, there were splits in the Muslim population at first, but as the war wore on the resistance coalesced around the FLN, protected by a sanctuary in Tunisia. They weren't religious fanatics, like many of those in Iraq.

Soldiers' successes: US troops can point to few military victories since they swept into Baghdad almost four years ago. The French Army, however, effectively sealed the border with Tunisia with its electrified Morice Line, conducted an offensive in 1959 that broke the back of FLN forces within the country, and, in its most famous victory, destroyed the urban terrorist force in Algiers in 1957.

To win the Battle of Algiers, the French needed accurate intelligence, and they got it by torture. There have been occasional questionable practices in Iraq, notably at Abu Ghraib prison, but Americans should be relieved that no military leader has stooped to the debased tactics of the Algiers garrison.

Return of the hero. But the FLN would not be crushed, and the Fourth Republic politicians were divided about what to do. Under pressure from the army in Algeria in 1958, they brought back Charles de Gaulle, leader of the Free French in World War II. He had preserved French honor after Hitler's conquest, and had gone head to head with Churchill and Roosevelt. No American politician today can match his experience.

Brutal realism. De Gaulle intensified military pressure on the FLN and cast about for a political solution: total integration, a loose affiliation with France, or perhaps independence with the French maintaining control of the Saharan wastes, where oil had been discovered. The FLN would have none of these. Then in 1959 he uttered the fateful words, "self-determination," which meant independence. Today President Bush has yet to show this degree of flexibility in Iraq.

Officers' revolt. The pieds noirs and the army in Algeria were enraged. Pieds noirs tried to assassinate de Gaulle four times when he next visited Algeria, and several generals decided it was time to depose him. "I forbid every Frenchman, and above all every soldier, to execute their orders," de Gaulle thundered in a radio broadcast. "Frenchwomen, Frenchmen, help me!" The French conscripts in Algeria, listening via small transistor radios, the iPods of their day, heeded his words, and the revolt collapsed.

DOJ_NMG_0119605

It wasn't over, though. The pieds noirs and their military allies commenced a terrorist war in Algeria and France, until they were crushed, and de Gaulle arranged a peace agreement with the FLN and a referendum that favored independence on July 1, 1962. France accepted 1,380,000 refugees, pieds noirs, and Muslim allies. Of the Muslim solders who helped the French and did not flee, tens of thousands were executed, some when they were forced to clear mines from the Morice Line. The ending of a long war against foreign occupiers is rarely neat and bloodless.

Horne writes of a formerly European district of Algiers, "Despite the . . . bricks and stones of the pieds noirs, were they really here at all?" Perhaps the lesson of "A Savage War of Peace" is that, however painful withdrawal and defeat may be, continuous bloodshed and stalemate are worse.

Lying Like It's 2003 (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

THOSE who forget history may be doomed to repeat it, but who could imagine we'd already be in danger of replaying that rotten year 2003?

Scooter Libby, the mastermind behind the White House's bogus scenarios for ginning up the war in Iraq, is back at Washington's center stage, proudly defending the indefensible in a perjury trial. Ahmad Chalabi, the peddler of flawed prewar intelligence hyped by Mr. Libby, is back in clover in Baghdad, where he purports to lead the government's Shiite-Baathist reconciliation efforts in between visits to his pal Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Iran.

Last but never least is Mr. Libby's former boss and Mr. Chalabi's former patron, Dick Cheney, who is back on Sunday-morning television floating fictions about Iraq and accusing administration critics of aiding Al Qaeda. When the vice president went on a tear like this in 2003, hawking Iraq's nonexistent W.M.D. and nonexistent connections to Mohamed Atta, he set the stage for a war that now kills Iraqi civilians in rising numbers (34,000-plus last year) that are heading into the genocidal realms of Saddam. Mr. Cheney's latest sales pitch is for a new plan for "victory" promising an even bigger bloodbath.

Mr. Cheney was honest, at least, when he said that the White House's Iraq policy would remain "full speed ahead!" no matter what happened on Nov. 7. Now it is our patriotic duty — politicians, the press and the public alike — to apply the brakes. Our failure to check the administration when it rushed into Iraq in 2003 will look even more shameful to history if we roll over again for a reboot in 2007. For all the belated Washington scrutiny of the war since the election, and for all the heralded (if so far symbolic) Congressional efforts to challenge it, too much lip service is still being paid to the deceptive P.R. strategies used by the administration to sell its reckless policies. This time we must do what too few did the first time: call the White House on its lies. Lies should not be confused with euphemisms like "incompetence" and "denial."

Mr. Cheney's performance last week on "Fox News Sunday" illustrates the problem; his lying is nowhere near its last throes. Asked by Chris Wallace about the White House's decision to overrule commanders who recommended against a troop escalation, the vice president said, "I don't think we've overruled the commanders." He claimed we've made "enormous progress" in Iraq. He said the administration is not "embattled." (Well, maybe that one is denial.)

This White House gang is so practiced in lying with a straight face that it never thinks twice about recycling its greatest hits. Hours after Mr. Cheney's Fox interview, President Bush was on "60 Minutes," claiming that before the war "everybody was wrong on weapons of mass destruction" and that "the minute we found out" the W.M.D. didn't exist he "was the first to say so." Everybody, of course, was not wrong on W.M.D., starting with the United Nations weapons inspection team in Iraq. Nor was Mr. Bush the first to come clean once the truth became apparent after the invasion. On May 29, 2003 — two days after a secret Defense Intelligence Agency-sponsored mission found no biological weapons in trailers captured by American forces — Mr. Bush declared: "We found the weapons of mass destruction. We found biological laboratories."

But that's all W.M.D under the bridge. The most important lies to watch for now are the new ones being reiterated daily by the administration's top brass, from Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney on down. You know fiasco awaits America when everyone in the White House is reading in unison from the same fictional script, as they did back in the day when "mushroom clouds" and "uranium from Africa" were the daily drumbeat.

The latest lies are custom-made to prop up the new "way forward" that is anything but. Among the emerging examples is a rewriting of the history of Iraq's sectarian violence. The fictional version was initially laid out by Mr. Bush in his Jan. 10 prime-time speech and has since been repeated on television by both Mr. Cheney and the national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, last Sunday and by Mr. Bush again on PBS's "NewsHour" on Tuesday. It goes like this: sectarian violence didn't start spiraling out of control until the summer of 2006, after Sunni terrorists bombed the Golden Mosque in Samarra and forced the Shiites to take revenge.

But as Mark Seibel of McClatchy Newspapers noted last week, "the president's account understates by at least 15 months when Shiite death squads began targeting Sunni politicians and clerics." They were visible in embryo long before that; The Times, among others, reported as far back as September 2003 that Shiite militias were becoming more radical, dangerous and anti-American. The reasons Mr. Bush pretends that Shiite killing started only last year are obvious enough. He wants to duck culpability for failing to recognize the sectarian violence from the outset — much as he failed to recognize the Sunni insurgency before it — and to underplay the intractability of the civil war to which he will now sacrifice fresh American flesh.

DOJ_NMG_0119606

An equally big lie is the administration's constant claim that it is on the same page as Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki as we go full speed ahead. Only last month Mr. Maliki told The Wall Street Journal that he wished he "could be done with" his role as Iraq's leader "before the end of this term." Now we are asked to believe not merely that he is a strongman capable of vanquishing the death squads of the anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, his political ally, but also that he can be trusted to produce the troops he failed to supply in last year's failed Baghdad crackdown. Yet as recently as November, there still wasn't a single Iraqi battalion capable of fighting on its own.

Hardly a day passes without Mr. Maliki mocking the White House's professed faith in him. In the past week or so alone, he has presided over a second botched hanging (despite delaying it for more than two weeks to put in place new guidelines), charged Condi Rice with giving a "morale boost to the terrorists" because she criticized him, and overruled American objections to appoint an obscure commander from deep in Shiite territory to run the Baghdad "surge." His government doesn't even try to hide its greater allegiance to Iran. Mr. Maliki's foreign minister has asked for the release of the five Iranians detained in an American raid on an Iranian office in northern Iraq this month and, on Monday, called for setting up more Iranian "consulates" in Iraq.

The president's pretense that Mr. Maliki and his inept, ill-equipped, militia-infiltrated security forces can advance American interests in this war is Neville Chamberlain-like in its naiveté and disingenuousness. An American military official in Baghdad read the writing on the wall to The Times last week: "We are implementing a strategy to embolden a government that is actually part of the problem. We are being played like a pawn." That's why the most destructive lie of all may be the White House's constant refrain that its doomed strategy is the only one anyone has proposed. Administration critics, Mr. Cheney said last Sunday, "have absolutely nothing to offer in its place," as if the Iraq Study Group, John Murtha and Joseph Biden-Leslie Gelb plans, among others, didn't predate the White House's own.

In reality we're learning piece by piece that it is the White House that has no plan. Ms. Rice has now downsized the surge/escalation into an "augmentation," inadvertently divulging how the Pentagon is improvising, juggling small deployments in fits and starts. No one can plausibly explain how a parallel chain of command sending American and Iraqi troops into urban street combat side by side will work with Iraqis in the lead (it will report to a "committee" led by Mr. Maliki!). Or how $1 billion in new American reconstruction spending will accomplish what the $30 billion thrown down the drain in previous reconstruction spending did not.

All of this replays 2003, when the White House refused to consider any plan, including existing ones in the Pentagon and State Department bureaucracies, for coping with a broken post-Saddam Iraq. Then, as at every stage of the war since, the only administration plan was for a propaganda campaign to bamboozle American voters into believing "victory" was just around the corner.

The next push on the "way forward" propaganda campaign arrives Tuesday night, with the State of the Union address. The good news is that the Democrats have chosen Jim Webb, the new Virginia senator, to give their official response. Mr. Webb, a Reagan administration Navy secretary and the father of a son serving in Iraq, has already provoked a testy exchange about the war with the president at a White House reception for freshmen in Congress. He's the kind of guy likely to keep a scorecard of the lies on Tuesday night. But whether he does or not, it's incumbent on all those talking heads who fell for "shock and awe" and "Mission Accomplished" in 2003 to not let history repeat itself in 2007. Facing the truth is the only way forward in Iraq.

A Chance For Unity On Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The change of command in Iraq offers an opportunity to move past the divisive domestic debate over the deployment of more troops to Baghdad and instead put the pressure where it belongs -- on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

When Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander in Iraq, goes before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Tuesday, lawmakers are likely to hear a very different presentation from what they usually get from the Pentagon.

Rather than ask the senators to grant him free rein to operate as he wishes, Petraeus is ready, I am told, to invite and encourage the closest kind of congressional scrutiny of what is happening in Iraq.

The suggestion made here last week that Congress require frequent briefings from Petraeus and the embassy in Baghdad, to ensure that Maliki is keeping his promises to supply troops and avoid political interference, is one that Petraeus is prepared to endorse.

DOJ_NMG_0119607

The weekly schedule that I suggested is too frequent for the general; it would take up too much staff time. But he could manage a biweekly schedule of closed briefings, and it would accomplish the same goal -- a constant reminder to Maliki that if he fails to cooperate with the strategic plan, any remaining support in Congress for his government will disappear.

Petraeus's offer, which I am told will be made in explicit terms unless his civilian bosses in the Pentagon and White House intervene, provides the best avenue yet to appear for dealing with the mess in Iraq.

It will not satisfy those in Congress who would like to block or protest the "surge" of additional troops into Iraq ordered by President Bush. But the resolutions and legislation they are discussing will not keep Bush from carrying out his plan.

In effect, Petraeus is offering a way to convert the opposition to the war that is growing in both Republican and Democratic ranks into leverage on Maliki. Together, they can hold the prime minister to his pledge to go after all the combatants -- Shiites as well as Sunnis -- and to provide the troops for the fight.

What makes this possible is the character of the new commander in Iraq. Petraeus, who will get his fourth star with this new assignment, is a tested combat leader, the former commanding officer of the 101st Airborne Division. But Petraeus, who has a PhD from Princeton, also is co-author of the Army guide to counterinsurgency warfare and is a sophisticated student of both Iraqi and U.S. politics.

He knows what he needs to do to secure congressional support for his mission. And he has a realistic appraisal of the people he is dealing with in Baghdad and is quite willing to lean hard on them.

In fact, even before the change of command in Iraq, Petraeus has sent a trusted translator to start preparing the Maliki government for the closer monitoring that lies ahead; he was in the picture when Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton met with Maliki during her recent visit to Iraq.

In his testimony, the general is expected to tell lawmakers that he believes the "surge" of 21,500 additional soldiers and Marines into Iraq can help suppress the sectarian violence in Baghdad -- if Maliki keeps his end of the bargain.

If the streets are safe, it will be easier to insist that the Iraqis working in the ministries do their jobs, without fear of retaliation against their families or themselves.

But Petraeus, who spent 18 months trying to organize the training of Iraqi army and police forces in an earlier phase of the war, knows how tough a challenge it will be to improve either the Iraqi military or its bureaucracy. When then-Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld pulled him out of Iraq to run the Army Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., Sen. John McCain, among others, was furious that the ablest American in Iraq had been reassigned.

Returning to an Iraq where the security situation is now far worse, Petraeus is guardedly hopeful about the military mission.

But even if the violence can be quelled, a major concern is whether the other parts of our government -- notably the State Department -- are prepared for the effort it will take to get the Iraq economy up and running, unemployment down, the oil industry operating, and the government ministries delivering the basic services people need and expect.

The challenge is immense, but for a change, there is a chance to get the full weight of our government pulling in the same direction. Congress ought to seize the opportunity.

20 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 20 -- A U.S. Black Hawk helicopter crashed Saturday afternoon northeast of the capital, killing all 13 American soldiers on board, and at least seven soldiers died in other parts of the country, officials said. The deaths made the day the third-deadliest for U.S. service members in Iraq since the war began.

The incidents came as the Bush administration was extending the tours of some troops in Iraq and sending additional ones for a buildup that has met strong resistance in Congress. The administration has billed the increase as a key step toward securing the viability of Iraq's young government and bringing down the level of violence.

The helicopter went down about 3 p.m. in a barren area south of Baqubah in Diyala province. According to media reports, several parts of the province have come under Sunni insurgent control in recent months.

The military said the cause of the crash was under investigation.

"We can't confirm what the cause of the incident was," said Lt. Col. Josslyn L. Aberle, a military spokeswoman. "That's a big part of the investigation."

Another helicopter traveling nearby, as is standard in military operations, remained in the air awaiting backup after the crash, Aberle said. "We had aircraft support within minutes," she said. A response team landed and cordoned off the scene, Aberle said.

Navy Capt. Frank Pascual, a member of a U.S. media relations team in the United Arab Emirates, told al-Arabiya television that the helicopter was believed to have suffered technical troubles before going down, the Associated Press reported.

DOJ_NMG_0119608

Arkan al-Mujamai, 28, a day laborer who lives near the crash site, said in a telephone interview that the helicopter was shot down by a group of Sunni Muslim insurgents, one of whom is his uncle.

Mujamai said six Sunni insurgents were planting roadside bombs in the area when they saw a helicopter flying low overhead. One of the insurgents shot it down with a heavy machine gun, he said. Five of the insurgents, including his uncle, were missing Saturday night, and one returned with a wound on the left side of his upper body, he said.

Mujamai has provided The Washington Post with reliable information during past interviews, but his account Saturday could not be independently verified.

According to a database on military deaths kept by The Washington Post, 164 Americans have died in helicopter crashes in Iraq during the war.

Saturday's casualties included five soldiers who were killed in the southern city of Karbala after a military facility came under attack, the military said in a statement released late Saturday. The attack was carried out by an "illegally armed militia group," which ambushed the soldiers with grenades, guns and other weapons, the statement said. Three soldiers were wounded while fighting back, it said.

Local Iraqi officials and Iraqi and U.S. military personnel are stationed at the facility, which serves as a coordination center, the military said. The attack came as the soldiers were holding a meeting to ensure the safety of Shiite pilgrims during a coming holiday.

A Multinational Division Baghdad soldier was killed Saturday by an improvised explosive device while patrolling a neighborhood in the northern part of the capital, the military said in a statement.

A Task Force Lightning soldier assigned to the 1st Cavalry Division's 4th Brigade was killed by an improvised explosive device in Nineveh province in northern Iraq. Two soldiers were injured by the explosion. Earlier in the week, the unit had arrested 12 suspected insurgents while conducting raids in northern Baghdad "to disrupt militia activities," according to the statement.

The deadly string of incidents came on the eve of the Islamic new year, which starts Sunday.

At least two other service members were killed Friday, according to statements issued by the military, including a Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 who died of injuries sustained in what the military described as "enemy action" in Anbar province in western Iraq and a soldier who died in combat in Nineveh province.

The military said the names of the service members would be released after their relatives had been notified.

Meanwhile Saturday, two men were arrested trying to sneak a car bomb into Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, the military said.

The day was also deadly for Iraqis. In Khalis, a city in Diyala province, Saad Zowanie, a local prosecutor, was killed, according to Ali Khaiyam, a Diyala police spokesman. Elsewhere in the province, eight men were killed when U.S. helicopters bombed an area northeast of Baqubah, Khaiyam said.

Helicopter Crash Claims 13 On Deadly Day For U.S. In Iraq (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 20 — On one of the deadliest days for United States forces since the Iraq war began, an American helicopter crashed in a Sunni area north of Baghdad on Saturday, killing all 13 people onboard, the United States military said.

Iraqi officials in the area said it had been shot down, though there was no immediate confirmation from American officials.

In separate episodes, five American soldiers were killed and three wounded in a battle with gunmen who attacked the local governor's office in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, and two soldiers died from other attacks, military officials said.

It was not clear whether all those on the helicopter were Americans. If they were, 20 uniformed Americans died Saturday. On the worst day of the war for American forces, Jan. 26, 2005, 37 American service members died. Thirty-one of them died when a Marine helicopter crashed in the western desert, and six others in combat that day.

An Interior Ministry official and the police in Diyala Province said Saturday that the American helicopter was shot down about 4 p.m. by insurgents who had fired missiles or grenades from at least two locations. It crashed near Tarrafa Village, they said, over a rural area near the Diyala River.

The American military said that debris had been immediately surrounded and secured. Several hours after the crash, soldiers were still combing through the wreckage.

A spokesman declined to provide details on the type of aircraft or how it crashed. The number of people aboard suggested that it had been a Black Hawk transport helicopter, which typically carries about 10 passengers and 4 crew members.

The crash occurred northeast of Baghdad near Baquba, where American and Iraqi forces have been battling Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia forces for months.

DOJ_NMG_0119609

The American military also announced seven other deaths on Saturday and three deaths from earlier in the week. In addition to the five soldiers killed during the battle in Karbala, a soldier was killed in northern Baghdad on Saturday when a roadside bomb exploded near his patrol, and another, assigned to a unit of engineers, died of wounds from a roadside bomb in northern Iraq.

The three earlier deaths were of a sailor from Brooklyn who died Wednesday in a "noncombat-related incident" at Camp Bucca, an American-run detention center in southern Iraq; a marine who died Friday from wounds suffered in combat in Anbar Province; and a soldier who died Friday after being wounded by a roadside bomb in Tikrit, north of Baghdad.

The gun battle in Karbala started when "an illegally armed militia," according to a statement from the American military, attacked the offices of the provincial government in Karbala with guns and grenades.

Brig. Gen. Vincent K. Brooks, deputy commander for Multi-National Division-Baghdad, said American and Iraqi security forces were meeting at the time of the attack to ensure that Shiite pilgrims would be safe during the celebrations later this month for Ashura, one of Shiite Islam's holiest days, which marks the seventh-century martyrdom of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson, Hussein.

Iraqi state television reported that at least two dozen gunmen assaulted the building, getting inside, and drawing a response from American troops who were dropped by helicopter onto the roof.

Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a military spokesman, said it was not clear who or how many had attacked. By 10 p.m., the building had been secured, he said.

"It was never lost," he said. "It came under fire from a couple of directions. We responded to it."

The attack nonetheless seemed to be the latest in a series of power struggles in the south among a patchwork of Shiite tribes and political parties. American officials have been pressing the government of Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to set a date for provincial elections, which they said would firmly establish new leaders and possibly reduce the fighting.

Iraqi state television reported that a raid in south Baghdad on Saturday, with around 100 Iraqi police commandos backed by six United States helicopters, killed 15 suspected Sunni Arab insurgents.

The police found 29 bodies in the capital, many with gunshot wounds to the head.

U.S. Copter Crash Claims 13 In Iraq (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

BAGHDAD - A U.S. Army helicopter crashed northeast of the capital yesterday, killing all 13 persons on board on one of the deadliest days for U.S. forces since the Iraq war began. At least five other American soldiers died in an attack blamed on militiamen in the city of Karbala.

The crash and other deaths came as a brigade of the U.S. 82nd Airborne Division arrived in Baghdad and prepared for deployment in early February the first of the 21,500-troop buildup ordered by President Bush.

The division's 2nd Brigade with 3,200 soldiers will "assist Iraqi Security Forces to clear, control and retain key areas of the capital city in order to reduce violence and to set the conditions for a transition to full Iraqi control of security in the city," the military said.

The military gave little information on the crash of the Black Hawk during good weather in Diyala province, where U.S. and Iraqi forces have been battling Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite militias around the city of Baqouba for months.

Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a U.S. spokeswoman, said the cause of the crash had not been determined. Navy Capt. Frank Pascual, a member of a U.S. media-relations team in the United Arab Emirates, told Al Arabiya television that the helicopter was believed to have suffered technical troubles before going down.

It was the fourth-deadliest crash since the war started in March 2003. The worst occurred Jan. 26, 2005, when a Marine transport helicopter went down during a sandstorm in the western desert. Thirty Marines and one sailor were killed the most U.S. personnel to die in a single incident in Iraq.

The U.S. military later reported that militia fighters attacked a provincial headquarters in the Shi'ite Muslim holy city of Karbala, killing five American soldiers and wounding three last night.

The military said "an illegally armed militia group" attacked the building with grenades, small arms and "indirect fire," which usually means mortars or rockets.

"A meeting was taking place at the time of the attack to ensure the security of Shi'ite pilgrims participating in the Ashoura commemorations," said Brig. Gen. Vincent K. Brooks, deputy commander of the Multi-National Division-Baghdad.

Karbala is 50 miles south of Baghdad and thousands of Shi'ite pilgrims are flocking to the city to mark the 10-day Ashoura festival commemorating the death of one of Shi'ite Islam's most sacred saints, Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

DOJ_NMG_0119610

Gen. Brooks said Iraqi officials and security forces as well as U.S. troops were present at the meeting, but his statement did not mention other casualties from the attack. It said the headquarters had "been secured by coalition and Iraqi security forces."

Earlier, Karbala Gov. Akeel al-Khazaali had reported that U.S. troops raided the provincial headquarters looking for wanted men but left with no prisoners. But Gen. Brooks said that report was incorrect.

The general did not identify any group suspected of staging the attack, but residents reached by telephone had reported seeing military helicopters flying over the local headquarters of anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi's Army militia, which has been accused of playing a big role in sectarian killings, has been hit repeatedly in recent weeks by operations in which key commanders have been captured or killed by U.S. and Iraqi troops.

Also yesterday, the U.S. military announced that combat Friday had killed an Army soldier in Nineveh province and a Marine in Anbar province, a Sunni insurgent stronghold west of the capital.

In south Baghdad, U.S. helicopters dropped Iraqi police commandos into the dangerous Dora neighborhood to stage a raid on the Omar Brigade, an al Qaeda-linked Sunni militant group, Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul-Karim Khalaf said.

Mr. Khalaf said 15 insurgents were killed and five captured during an intense battle at two abandoned houses taken over by Sunni gunmen, who he blamed for a series of kidnappings and killings in a bid to cleanse the once-mixed neighborhood of Shi'ite residents.

"We were provided with helicopter support by our friends in the multinational forces, and we did not suffer any casualties," Mr. Khalaf said. U.S. aircraft gave covering fire, but the U.S. military did not respond to a request for comment on the raid.

Sheik al-Sadr's followers voiced increasing anger over Friday's capture of a senior aide to the radical cleric in a raid in eastern Baghdad.

Nassar al-Rubaie, the head of Sheik al-Sadr's bloc in parliament, accused U.S. forces of trying to provoke the Sadrists into violence during the expanding campaign to quell Iraq's fighting.

"We condemn strongly the arrest of Sheik Abdul-Hadi al-Darraji. He is moderate and well-known as a media personality and always available in negotiations," Mr. al-Rubaie said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces reportedly detained Mr. al-Darraji during a raid on a mosque complex before dawn Friday.

Police reported at least 16 Iraqis slain in attacks yesterday. In addition, officials said 29 bodies were found in Baghdad and three in the northern city of Mosul, most of them showing signs of torture a hallmark of killings by sectarian death squads.

At Least 19 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

Most perish in a copter crash. U.S. asserts cause is unknown; a witness says craft was downed.

At least 19 U.S. troops were killed in a helicopter crash and insurgent attacks across Iraq on Saturday in the deadliest day for the American military here in nearly two years.

The U.S. military also reported the deaths of two other troops the previous day, and the surge in fatalities just days before President Bush's State of the Union address was likely to inject a note of urgency into the debate over his Iraq policy.

The day's deadliest episode was the crash of a Black Hawk helicopter northeast of Baghdad on Saturday afternoon, killing all 12 U.S. soldiers aboard. The military initially had said 13 were killed but revised it to 12 early today.

South of the capital in the Shiite Muslim city of Karbala, men armed with grenades, mortars and assault rifles swarmed a provincial security building manned by U.S. and Iraqi forces, the military said. At least five U.S. soldiers were killed and three wounded.

Four more U.S. troops and 44 Iraqis were also reported killed or found dead Saturday in politically motivated violence as Iraqi and American forces stepped up an effort to target Shiite militiamen and Sunni Arab insurgents.

U.S. military officials said the cause of Saturday's crash had yet to be determined, but Iraqi sources said it was shot down. A witness said he saw ground fire bring down the aircraft, and an insurgent group claimed responsibility for the attack in an Internet posting that could not be authenticated.

Iraqi officials and witnesses said the crash took place near the town of Buhriz in the region of Tarefiya, a rural Sunni enclave of canals and wheat fields about six miles south of Baqubah, the capital of Diyala province. The area is known as an insurgent stronghold. A recent joint U.S.-Iraqi military offensive focused on Diyala.

Claiming responsibility

A message posted on the Web by the Mujahedin Army, an insurgent group that operates out of Baghdad and Diyala provinces, claimed responsibility for the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0119611

"The helicopter was downed by [an] antiaircraft [rocket] that belongs to the Mujahedin Army in Buhriz," said the statement, posted to a website where insurgent claims are frequently trumpeted.

An Iraqi witness, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the helicopter was felled by ground fire.

"I'm not sure if it was a rocket or other projectile," said the man, a farmer. "After the helicopter was fired upon, it was obvious that it was losing control. Then it crashed with an explosion and the smoke started." The farmer said he and others dared not approach the wreckage to look for survivors, fearing that U.S. forces arriving on the scene might fire at them.

The U.S. military could not confirm the account. Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a military spokeswoman in Baghdad, said that the crash took place northeast of Baghdad about 3 p.m.

"All passengers and crew were military service members," she wrote in response to an e-mailed query, adding that more information was expected today. The military withheld names of the victims pending notification of family members.

An Iraqi official who spoke on condition of anonymity said U.S. forces had cordoned off a vast area of farmland and sheep pastures.

The U.S. military increasingly has come to rely on helicopters to transport troops between bases as roadside bombs target vehicle convoys. "There are helicopters flying over the area all the time," said the farmer.

Saturday's crash was the first since a U.S. Marine CH-53 transport chopper went down in an accident in Al Anbar province Dec. 11, killing one Marine. Insurgents last shot down a helicopter on May 14, near the village of Yousifiya south of the capital; two soldiers died in that attack.

The deadliest day for American service members in Iraq was Jan. 26, 2005, when 37 U.S. troops were killed, 31 of them in the accidental crash of a CH-53E Super Stallion helicopter in Al Anbar.

The Karbala clash erupted as U.S. and Iraqi officials planned security for the Ashura festival, an annual Shiite pilgrimage. Karbala has come under the sway of Shiite militiamen loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr, but it also is adjacent to Sunni areas. A statement released by the military did not clarify whether the attackers were suspected Sunni or Shiite gunmen.

New U.S. troops arrive

The sharp rise in American military deaths comes as the U.S. intensifies its efforts to curb violence in Baghdad, with Pentagon planners and White House officials pushing forward with a plan to increase the number of U.S. soldiers in Iraq by 21,500.

The first of the additional troops, the 3,200 soldiers of the 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, have arrived in Baghdad and will be "fully operational" within two weeks, the U.S. military said today in a statement. Their mission will be to help Iraqi security forces "clear, control and retain key areas" of Baghdad "to reduce violence and to set the conditions for a transition to full Iraqi control of security in the city," the military said.

Bush and other supporters of the plan say it is an essential move to give the Iraqi government breathing space to crack down on violent groups and heal political wounds.

Opponents, including Democratic Party leaders in Congress and some skeptical Republicans, consider it a risky escalation that could bolster anti-American sentiment in Iraq and across the Middle East, and lead to more U.S. casualties. Since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, 3,047 U.S. troops have died in Iraq, according to icasualties.org.

Four other Americans were reported killed in separate incidents.

One soldier in northern Baghdad and another in northern Iraq were killed Saturday when their convoys struck roadside bombs, and the U.S. military reported that two troops had died the previous day.

A soldier assigned to the 1st Cavalry Division near Mosul died Friday from injuries sustained from an improvised explosive device, the official term for a roadside bomb. Two soldiers were injured in the bombing. And a Marine died of wounds he sustained Friday in combat in Al Anbar, a news release said.

U.S. military leaders have identified Shiite militias as the greatest threat to Iraq's stability. American troops raided the capital's main emergency hospital Saturday morning, seizing the weapons of security guards believed to be linked to Sadr's Al Mahdi militia, hospital and police officials said.

Iraqi forces said the U.S. military seized AK-47s and machine guns ostensibly used by the guards to protect the facility, which has come under repeated attack by insurgents.

One hospital employee said the Americans searched the hospital for a person who allegedly belongs to the Al Mahdi army. They were not able to identify the individual, and the guards were released after being told they'd face arrest if they were seen with weapons again, Iraqi officials at the hospital said.

Iraq's Health Ministry is controlled by Shiites loyal to Sadr. U.S. military commanders have complained privately that Sadr loyalists have turned the ministry into a political and fundraising tool. Sunnis complain that they're denied healthcare services or targeted for kidnapping and assassination upon entering state-controlled hospitals and clinics.

DOJ_NMG_0119612

"It is known by everyone in Iraq that [the ministry] is fully occupied by Sadrists and the Mahdi army," said Saleh Mutlak, a Sunni lawmaker. "They removed all the previous officials and they got new ones. Everybody there has to swear his loyalty to the Mahdi army and Muqtada Sadr, otherwise he will not stay."

The 5:30 a.m. raid on Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital followed Friday arrest of Sheik Abdul-Hadi Darraji, a Sadr deputy and frequent spokesman, by U.S. and Iraqi troops.

Sunni suspects detained

U.S. forces also detained 25 people they described as suspected terrorists in Sunni enclaves north and west of Baghdad, a news release said.

Authorities in Baghdad said they discovered the bodies of 29 Iraqi civilians, all apparently victims of sectarian death squads, that had been dumped in various parts of the capital.

Mortar battles between neighboring Shiite and Sunni enclaves in northern Baghdad left at least four dead and 18 injured. Gunmen ambushed and killed a ranking Ministry of Interior official in northern Baghdad.

Near the provincial capital of Hillah, south of Baghdad, authorities discovered the bullet-riddled body of a man in his 30s. Unidentified gunmen in another town opened fire on a crowd, killing one.

Gunmen in the town of Madaen, a suburb south of the capital, broke into two houses and killed three people, including two women.

daragahi@latimes.com

Times staff writers Said Rifai and Mohammed Rasheed and special correspondents in Baghdad, Baqubah, Hillah and Kirkuk contributed to this report.

U.S.: Brigade Soon Ready For Baghdad (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 21, 2007

A newly arrived brigade of the U.S. 82nd Airborne Division, the first of the 21,500-troop buildup ordered by President Bush, will be ready to join the fresh drive to quell sectarian violence in the capital by the start of next month, the American military said Sunday.

The 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne has 3,200 soldiers who will "assist Iraqi Security Forces to clear, control and retain key areas of the capital city in order to reduce violence and to set the conditions for a transition to full Iraqi control of security in the city," the military said in a statement.

The announcement came a day after at least 20 U.S. service members were killed in Iraq on Saturday, the highest daily toll in two years for American forces.

Four more brigades were expected to be deployed to Iraq between now and May, mainly in Baghdad, as part of Bush's plan to back Iraqi forces in a third attempt in less than a year to clamp off the raging sectarian warfare that has shattered the Iraqi capital.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has pledged to put an about equal number of Iraqi troops on the streets and has vowed they will target both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia fighters.

Al-Maliki has promised he will no longer block action against the Mahdi Army militia, the armed wing of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an ally of al-Maliki. The militia is believed responsible for much of the sectarian bloodshed in Baghdad, where the Health Ministry said about 16,000 people died in the violence last year.

Since the Bush and al-Maliki announced the planned drive against militants, U.S. and Iraqi special forces have regularly killed or captured a number of Mahdi Army commanders. The drive against Sunni insurgents has increased as well, with elite Iraqi police commandos reported to have killed 15 members of the al-Qaida-linked Omar Brigade in a U.S.-backed airborne assault on Saturday.

Kurdish Troops From North Deserting (BOS/MCT)

By Leila Fadel And Yaseen Taha,

The Boston Globe/McClatchy, January 21, 2007

Loyalties are with militia, not with Iraq

SULAIMANIYAH, Iraq -- As the Iraqi government attempts to secure a capital city ravaged by conflict between Sunni and Shi'ite Muslim Arabs, its decision to bring a third party into the mix may cause more problems than peace.

Kurdish soldiers from northern Iraq, who are mostly Sunnis but not Arabs, are deserting the army to avoid the civil war in Baghdad, a conflict they consider someone else's problem.

DOJ_NMG_0119613

The Iraqi Army brigades being sent to the capital are filled with former members of a Kurdish militia, the peshmerga, that's the armed wing of President Jalal Talabani of Iraq's political party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan. Most remain loyal to that militia.

Much as Shi'ite militias have infiltrated the Iraqi security forces across Arab Iraq, the peshmerga fill the ranks of the Iraqi Army in the Kurdish region in the north, poised to secure a semi-independent Kurdistan and seize oil-rich Kirkuk and parts of Mosul if Iraq falls apart. One thing they didn't bank on, they said, was being sent into the "fire" of Baghdad.

"The soldiers don't know the Arabic language, the Arab tradition, and they don't have any experience fighting terror," said Anwar Dolani, a former peshmerga commander who leads the brigade that's being transferred to Baghdad from the Kurdish city of Sulaimaniyah.

Dolani called the desertions a "phenomenon" but refused to say how many soldiers have left the army.

"I can't deny that a number of soldiers have deserted the army, and it might increase due to the ferocious military operations in Baghdad," he said.

"This is the biggest performance through which we can test them," said Lieutenant General Ali Ghaidan, the commander of land forces for the Iraqi Ministry of Defense. The Kurdish soldiers will be using translators, and they'll start off doing less dangerous tasks such as manning checkpoints with Arab soldiers, he said.

In interviews, however, soldiers in Sulaimaniyah expressed loyalty to their Kurdish brethren, not to Iraq. Many said they'd already deserted, and those who are going to Baghdad said they'd flee if the situation there became too difficult.

"I joined the army to be a soldier in my homeland, among my people. Not to fight for others who I have nothing to do with," said Ameen Kareem, 38, who took a week's leave with other soldiers from his brigade in the Kurdish city of Erbil and never returned. "I used to fight in the mountains and valleys, not in the streets."

Kareem said he knew that deserting was risky, but he said he'd rather be behind bars in Kurdistan than a "soldier in Baghdad's fire." Without the language and with his Kurdish features, he was sure he would stand out, he said. He's a Kurd, he said, and he has no reason to become a target in an Arab war.

Now he drives a taxi in Sulaimaniyah, eking out a living and praying that he doesn't get caught.

Other soldiers in Sulaimaniyah also said they didn't want to be involved in someone else's war.

Farman Mohammed, 42, celebrated the Muslim Eid holiday with his family last month and didn't go back when he heard that he might be deployed to Baghdad. Afraid for his life, he found a new job and settled in with his family.

"The fanatic Sunnis in Baghdad kill the Shi'ites and vice versa. Both of them are outraged against the Kurds. They will not hesitate to kill us and accuse us of being collaborators with the occupiers," he said. "How can we face them alone?"

Those who are planning to go to Baghdad said they didn't want to be considered cowards.

Mohammed Abdoul, 41, reluctantly prepared to leave for the Iraqi capital earlier this week.

"I don't know why we should interfere in this Sunni-Shi'ite war," he said. "If I am going to face a difficult task in Baghdad and feel sectarian tension, I will leave the army forever, come back to Sulaimaniyah, and work in the market."

An army brigade from Sulaimaniyah began arriving at Muthana Airport in Baghdad last week, and a brigade from Erbil is expected in February, Ghaidan said.

The 1,200 Kurdish soldiers in each of the two brigades from the Kurdish north will be dwarfed by 2,700 soldiers in each brigade that are being brought to Baghdad from the Shi'ite south.

Generals in Erbil and Sulaimaniyah begged the Ministry of Defense to choose brigades out of Kirkuk that spoke Arabic to help in Baghdad, Dolani said. Ghaidan wouldn't explain why entire Kurdish brigades weren't being transferred from the north.

Taming Iraq's "Wild West" (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

HUSAYBAH, IRAQ — It's midday in this farming-and-smuggling town on the Syrian border, and the market square is bustling.

A colorful array of fruits and vegetables and plump fish from both sides of the border is for sale in stalls along the muddy main street. The smell of freshly baked bread permeates the air. The jewelry stores, bridal salon, Internet cafe, pharmacy, and bicycle and butcher shops are crowded with customers. So is the pool hall.

"Business is good," Ahmed Ratib, the town cobbler, said as he nailed new heels on a pair of shoes. "Not like in the past."

Two years ago, the same streets were fraught with roadside bombs and snipers, and sellers and buyers stayed away. The area was considered too dangerous even for a quick tour by a U.S. general in his armored Humvee.

The Qaim region was routinely described, including in The Times, as an out-of-control "wild west" where the Marines were fighting with only limited success to control the smuggling of insurgent fighters and weapons from Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0119614

Today, Marines walk the downtown beat, chatting with residents, fielding their complaints, encouraging them to contact the Iraqi police if they suspect insurgent activity.

In a country studded with areas where the U.S. has either failed or made only limited progress toward stabilization, Husaybah and the surrounding Qaim region stand out as a success, officials said.

A State Department counterinsurgency expert, who is based in Iraq, lists Qaim as "very good," Fallouja as "good but backsliding" and Ramadi as "a mess" (a description the commanding officer there disputes).

The effort has combined U.S. military and economic power, backed by help from the municipal and tribal leadership.

In fall 2005, the Marines launched a massive effort to find weapons caches and confront insurgent sanctuaries in this part of Al Anbar province. A follow-up campaign is underway to the northeast of Husaybah, along both sides of the Euphrates River.

The U.S. also has several improvement projects underway, including a 10-lane port of entry from Syria that should provide an economic boost. Marines are assisting the health clinic and hospital, and the U.S. is funding construction of a jobs center and vehicle registration site.

Despite the improvement, problems persist. The port-of-entry project, being built by an American company with Iraqi workers and British security guards, is behind schedule, in part because building materials were hijacked.

Insurgents routinely hijack gasoline trucks coming from Baghdad. A City Council member was recently arrested on suspicion of insurgent activity, and bombers have tried to knock out the telephone system. The mayor needs bodyguards around the clock.

Hundreds of families are said to be coming here to escape Baghdad, which could lead to a struggle for housing and jobs.

"We had better get some tents and be ready," said Capt. Sean Wilson, commander of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 4th Regiment, as he continued walking the beat with his troops.

But Husaybah also has major advantages, including a mayor who refuses to be intimidated and has brokered a deal with local sheiks to get their support in fighting insurgents. The sheiks, whose tribes are spread on both sides of the border, were reluctant; but last fall they committed themselves to the fight.

Calling themselves the Protectors of the Desert, the sheiks have pledged to eliminate insurgents. U.S. officials, to avoid the rise of private militias, have asked that the sheiks instead urge tribesmen to carry on the fight by joining the police force or army. Hundreds of young men have volunteered for the police force and been sent to the police academy in Jordan, at U.S. expense.

"Things were very bad here in the past," said Farhan Farhan, mayor of Husaybah and Qaim. "The tribes and the people decided to fight, along with the Iraqi forces and the Americans. The terrorists only wanted to kill innocent people."

Marines are encouraged to spread the idea that the U.S. is not an occupying power but a transition force, in place until Iraqi security forces are ready to take charge.

"We try to be genuine, to show them we're trying to make things better," said Lance Cpl. Carey Tennison, 26, of San Antonio. "We appreciate that they want to control their own town. They just don't know how to do it yet."

President Bush, in a speech this month, said the Baghdad government had promised to take full responsibility for all provinces by November.

The next day, Col. William Crowe, commander of the Twentynine Palms-based 7th Marine Regiment, told a group of enlisted Marines that within months, the Americans may no longer be required in Qaim.

As they walk their beat, Wilson and his troops ask residents about their problems and what changes they hope to see in Husaybah. Some complain that thieves steal goods from the market stalls at night, and others complain about the paucity of fuel at the government gas station.

When asked about their own actions to help their town, the residents often reply that something will happen, inshallah — God willing.

Mohammed Ali was out shopping for dinner when Marines stopped to talk. He had a plastic bag of greens and radishes and offered the Marines a taste.

"Do you want the Americans to go home?" the captain asked.

"Someday, but not yet — too many Ali Babas [thieves] are still here," Ali said.

After more talk of the radishes and the good weather, Ali asked, somewhat tentatively, whether the Marines would be leaving soon.

"Inshallah," the captain answered.

Army Says Improper Orders By Colonel Led To 4 Deaths (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119615

Army investigators say that Col. Michael D. Steele, a decorated combat veteran and brigade commander in Iraq, issued improper orders to his soldiers that contributed to the deaths of four unarmed Iraqi men during a raid in May, according to military documents.

No charges have been filed against Colonel Steele in the Army's continuing investigation. But two Defense Department officials said last week that Colonel Steele was formally reprimanded in the summer by Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the former commander in Iraq, for not reporting the deaths and other details of the raid. The action was not made public.

The reprimand and the controversy surrounding the raid have effectively ended the career of Colonel Steele, an aggressive officer known for unorthodox methods and who was portrayed in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down" as a fearless fighter during Special Operations missions in Somalia in 1993.

The four Iraqi men were killed on a channel island northwest of Baghdad on May 9 by members of the division's Third Brigade Combat Team, which Colonel Steele commanded. Four soldiers were later charged with murder by military prosecutors, who said they captured the men, then turned them loose and killed them as part of a staged escape attempt. Over the past two weeks, two of the soldiers have pleaded guilty to lesser charges.

The military's administrative investigation into Colonel Steele centered on how he communicated the rules of engagement, the instructions that all soldiers must follow to determine whether they may legally use lethal force against an enemy, to his soldiers before the raid.

The colonel improperly led his soldiers to believe that distinguishing combatants from noncombatants — a main tenet of the military's standing rules of engagement — was not necessary during the May 9 mission, according to a classified report in June by Brig. Gen. Thomas Maffey, a deputy commander tapped by General Chiarelli to investigate Colonel Steele. "A person cannot be targeted on status simply by being present on an objective deemed hostile by an on-scene commander," General Maffey wrote in his June 16 report.

Although the colonel's "miscommunication" of the rules contributed to the deaths of four unarmed Iraqis, General Maffey wrote, formal charges were not warranted "in light of his honest belief of the correctness of the mission R.O.E." The general recommended that Colonel Steele be admonished, a lesser punishment than the formal reprimand he eventually received.

Several soldiers have said in sworn statements that Colonel Steele told them to kill all military-age males. Colonel Steele and two lawyers representing him did not respond to several e-mail and phone messages requesting comment on the case. But in testimony he gave on June 3 to General Maffey and another investigator at an Army garrison in Tikrit, Colonel Steele said he did not use "specific language" to order his soldiers to kill all military-age males, and that "we don't shoot people with their hands up."

On June 10, an investigative report by the 101st Airborne Division's lawyers concluded: "Although clearly unintentional, confusion regarding the R.O.E. was the proximate cause of the death of at least four unarmed individuals, none of whom committed a hostile act or displayed hostile intent."

In his June 3 testimony, Colonel Steele said he told his men that Army intelligence had shown that the island held dozens of fighters for Al Qaeda. "Guys, you are going to get shot coming off the helicopter," Colonel Steele said he told them before the raid. "If you don't get shot, you ought to be surprised."

As it turned out, the assault occurred without encountering any hostile fire, and the soldiers found only unarmed men, women and children. Only excess caution by Colonel Steele's troops spared the Iraqi civilians from being shot, General Maffey wrote in his report.

The military's investigations of Colonel Steele's actions before and after the raid also determined that the fourth Iraqi man killed in the assault was 70 years old, unarmed and not a legitimate target.

After the raid, several soldiers noticed blindfolds and plastic handcuffs on the bodies of three of the men who were killed. Colonel Steele testified that he ordered a junior officer to begin an investigation into the deaths but to avoid reporting any findings to the division commander until the colonel returned from leave a few weeks later.

The formal reprimand Colonel Steele received effectively blocks any chance for his promotion, according to former and current military officers. "When you're looking to go from colonel to general, and it's a 2 percent selection rate, you're looking to throw people out, and that's an easy one," said John D. Hutson, the former judge advocate general of the Navy.

In November, Colonel Steele was reassigned out of Iraq and the 101st Airborne Division to an administrative assignment at Fort McPherson, Ga., where the Army Forces Command oversees the readiness of United States-based active-duty and Army Reserve soldiers. He will work in the unit responsible for Army operations and training, including developing methods of teaching soldiers how to handle enemy detainees, an Army spokesman said.

In addition to the trial of the four soldiers charged in the killings during the raid, an investigation is continuing into whether at least 10 other soldiers from Colonel Steele's former brigade lied to cover up three of the deaths, according to a classified report in December by the Army's Criminal Investigative Division. A division spokesman declined to comment on its investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0119616

Sunni-Shiite Fight Flares In Broadcasts (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

It was the worst insult a Sunni Iraqi could give to a Shiite countryman.

"You Persian shoe!" politician Mishan al-Jabouri shouted at journalist Sadeq al-Musawi during a panel discussion earlier this month on al-Jazeera television. "I will do things to you that you cannot even imagine."

Musawi gave it back in kind. "You are a thief. . . . Your father killed Kurds. We will settle accounts with all of you," he warned before stomping off the set past the pleading al-Jazeera moderator.

The exchange between two middle-aged men in suits was an up close and personal look at the religious and ethnic divides -- Sunni Muslim vs. Shiite Muslim, Arab vs. Persian -- that President Bush now cites as the main impediments to peace in Iraq. Widely circulated on the Internet in recent weeks, the video clip has fueled sectarian jeers and cheers in chat rooms throughout the Middle East.

For Jabouri, who sparked the shouting by offering a Koranic prayer for "the soul of the martyred president Saddam Hussein," it was welcome free publicity.

"It's spreading around the world," he said of the video in a telephone interview Friday from Damascus, "showing all the people the truth" of what he called the criminal occupation of Iraq by the U.S. military and an Iran-backed Shiite government in Baghdad.

"I've received thousands of letters from this interview, all supporting me. If you go to any tiny village in Saudi Arabia, in the [Persian] Gulf, you'll find discussions about this interview."

Even more popular among the Arab world's majority Sunnis, if press accounts in the region are to be believed, is Jabouri's satellite television station, al-Zawraa. Its battlefield videos of U.S. soldiers and Iraqi Shiites being blown apart with roadside explosions, truck bombs and sniper bullets fired by Sunni insurgents mark the first time such fare -- long an Internet staple -- has had its own television station.

The Bush administration has long charged that mainstream Arab networks such as al-Jazeera provide a platform to terrorists. But communications technology now allows the warring parties in Iraq direct access to audiences in Iraq and beyond.

The Internet videos are ubiquitous. The al-Jazeera clip apparently was first posted, with English subtitles, by the Middle East Media Research Institute, which monitors and distributes audio and video broadcasts from the region, many of them unflattering to Arabs. Macabrely humorous to Western ears, the clip has become a favorite on YouTube and hundreds of other sites.

Al-Zawraa television may prove just as difficult to squelch as the Internet.

A Sunni politician twice elected to the parliament, Jabouri started the station, a mix of standard entertainment and pro-Sunni rants, after Hussein's fall. Last year, he fled to Syria after the Iraqi government charged him with siphoning money from an American-financed project in his native Salahuddin province. In November, security forces shut down the station's Baghdad headquarters.

A month later, the station was back on the air, this time via the Egyptian satellite company Nilesat, with newly violent content featuring crudely recorded Sunni attacks on U.S. soldiers and what were said to be civilian Sunni victims of terrorism by Shiite militias.

Both the U.S. and Iraqi governments protested and asked the Egyptian government to force Nilesat to shut al-Zawraa down. "My understanding as of this weekend was that the broadcast had ceased," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said on Jan. 3.

A few days later, it was back on television screens across the Arab world, albeit with old footage of exploding Humvees and dead bodies looped over and over again, 24 hours a day. Egypt's Sunni government had blocked incoming video feeds to al-Zawraa but said free speech considerations prevented it from being shut off altogether.

Amin Basyouni, board chairman of Cairo-based Nilesat, said no government had asked him to cancel al-Zawraa. "We never interfere with content on any channel from any country in the world," he said. "We are like an airline. Passengers go on board. We never ask them, 'Why are you going to London or Paris?' "

Although conservative critics in the United States and the blogosphere have charged that al-Zawraa is a direct outlet for al-Qaeda in Iraq, Jabouri is most closely affiliated with the Islamic Army of Iraq, made up of ex-Baathists.

"We generally describe this as a Sunni Baathist insurgent media outlet rather than anything else," said a State Department official, who agreed to discuss the issue on condition he not be named. "It certainly isn't al-Qaeda broadcasting in Iraq." Jabouri, the official said, "is what our departed secretary of defense used to refer to as a 'dead-ender.' "

Jabouri denied supporting al-Qaeda and drew a sharp distinction between terrorists and what he called resistance fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0119617

"The terrorists . . . the same people who bombed the Trade [Center] towers in New York and the civilian people in Iraq. . . . But there are honest resistance members fighting the invaders of their country," he said.

Despite his televised prayer for Hussein's soul, Jabouri said, he had little sympathy for Hussein. Yet "the way they hanged him and the words they said to him makes Saddam Hussein a semi-idol" to Sunnis, he said.

Jabouri said Friday that, thanks to a contract with Paris-based Eutelsat Communications, he expected to send new material from Iraq "in 48 hours." Eutelsat's Washington office said it had no record of a contract and referred calls to Paris, where no one could be reached late Friday.

The government of Syria, where Jabouri now lives, "does not allow" him to transmit from inside its borders, he said.

But the insurgents can download video images into computers and send them directly to the satellite transmitter via the Internet.

"With two, three or four computers in different places" not under U.S. or Iraqi control, he said, "I can send anywhere in the world."

Banned Station Broadcasts Voice Of Rebels In Iraq (NYT)

By Marc Santora, Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 20 — The video starts with a young American soldier patrolling an Iraqi street. His head is obscured by leaves, so a red target is digitally inserted to draw the viewer's eye. A split second later, the soldier collapses, shot. Martial music kicks in, a jihadi answer to John Philip Sousa. The time and place of the attack scrolls at the bottom of the screen.

Such tapes, along with images of victims of Shiite militias and unflattering coverage of Shiite leaders, are beaming across Iraq and much of the Middle East 24 hours a day, broadcast by a banned Iraqi satellite television station that has become a major information center for the Sunni insurgency — and the focus of a cat-and-mouse hunt that has exasperated and infuriated American and Iraqi forces.

Making the situation even more galling for the authorities, American and Iraqi officials say that money stolen from the United States probably helps pay for the station.

"They do not have programs but buffoonery, blaspheming and support for terrorism," said Jalal al-Din al-Sagheer, a senior member of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Shiite party. "The source of funding for the channel is theft."

The channel's founder, Meshaan al-Juburi, is a former Sunni member of Parliament who was indicted last February on charges of embezzling millions of American dollars meant to pay for a vast pipeline protection force he had been assigned to help build with recruits from Salahuddin Province. He was accused of collecting salaries for thousands of soldiers who did not exist.

He denied the charges and went into hiding, fleeing to Syria.

But the American and Iraqi officials said he funneled some of the money to Sunni insurgents, and they suspect much of it helped him shift the programming on his channel, Al Zawra ("the gate" in Arabic), from popular music videos and dance shows to gruesome and detailed death scenes.

Iraqi officials said Mr. Juburi made the switch to irritate his critics, and to try and buy himself protection from prosecution.

"He started showing the insurgency videos just to be close to the resistance," said Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni Arab and speaker of Parliament. "Because the only thing that can save him from punishment is for the Iraqi government to collapse."

Iraqi officials banned the station on Nov. 5, focusing on its anti-Shiite footage and accusing it of "agitating the people against a large Iraqi sect with killing and genocide." Since then, the station has become a pirate outfit, fleeing new, makeshift headquarters at least twice.

Some top American military officials say they have aggressively tried to find where the broadcasts originate to put an end to them, but so far they have failed.

Baha al-Araji, a Shiite member of Parliament familiar with efforts to cut off the station, said the Iraqi government had also asked Nilesat, the Egyptian broadcaster responsible for transmitting the station via satellite, to cancel its contract with Al Zawra. So far, the company has refused, and the Egyptian government has rejected requests to intervene.

Iraqi officials said Nilesat promised not to renew Al Zawra's contract, though they did not know when it would expire.

The station's popularity is being aided by growing fears among Sunnis in neighboring countries of Shiite domination in Iraq, fears Al Zawra stokes through the often gruesome videotape of what it identifies as death-squad victims.

As neighborhoods in Baghdad and elsewhere continue to be purged of Sunnis, the broadcasts prominently list the names of areas that have been taken over, advocating bloody vengeance. And even as America considers sending more troops to Iraq, in part to protect Sunnis from being slaughtered, the channel is meant to inspire resistance.

DOJ_NMG_0119618

Mr. Juburi's critics said he has a history of parlaying political favor into personal fortunes. Iraqi officials said he made millions as a cigarette supplier under Saddam Hussein, and later ingratiated himself with Americans searching for Sunnis to bring into Iraq's new government.

Mr. Juburi now lives openly and comfortably in Syria.

He refused requests for an interview, but has often appeared on other Arab satellite channels to defend the station. Earlier this month on Al Jazeera, he debated Sadiq al-Musawi, a Shiite Iraqi political analyst, condemning Iraq's government and what he described as an ambitious effort to "defame" Al Zawra.

In an interview conducted via e-mail, a representative of Al Zawra, who did not reveal his name, said that the station's leaders had been a direct target of the Americans, and forced to move twice. The representative railed against the Americans and the Shiite militias, as well as the government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

"Our media's message is to broadcast the voice of the resisters to the American and Iranian occupation, to reveal the crimes of Badr Organization and Moktada's army and the gangs of Maliki," the representative said, citing two prominent Shiite militias, "and document it and work on forming a legal directorate to prosecute them in international courts for the crimes of genocide against the Sunni Arabs in Iraq."

When the station shuttered its Baghdad office several months ago, it was thought to have moved its operations to Salahuddin Province, northwest of Baghdad, in the Sunni heartland. The governor there said publicly that he was ordered to make sure he did not play host to the station, noting that the Americans had delivered a "stern" message on the subject. In December, Kurdish officials denied reports that the station was operating out of a Christian neighborhood in Erbil.

The station does not have much structure or style. Grainy clips of grisly violence, running in loops and sometimes in slow motion, are interspersed with news bulletins featuring just two commentators — a woman, who wraps and covers her face, and a man in a full battle fatigues whose face is uncovered, and who appears to be about 30 years old.

They regularly accuse Iraq's Shiite-led government of being a front for Iran. Mr. Mashhadani, the Parliamentary speaker and a Sunni, is often called "Mashhadi" — a reference to the Iranian town of Mashhad, Iran's holiest Shiite city.

The station also frequently offers critical coverage of the rebel cleric Moktada al-Sadr, including broadcasting a clip that the station says demonstrates his militia's infiltration of the Iraqi Army. Mr. Sadr is shown sitting with aides, discussing how many militiamen he can spare to be a part of the Iraqi Army. In the end, he says that he will supply two divisions. The source of the video is unclear.

In an odd twist, at the same time as the broadcasts promote attacks against the Americans and the Shiite militias, the station's main commentator, the man in fatigues, encourages other Shiites to join the struggle.

In fact, the commentator, who reads his diatribes from an undisclosed location, is himself a Shiite, according to a Baghdad couple who identified themselves as his parents.

As the station's agenda shifts from focusing strictly on the Americans to rallying Sunnis to prevent Shiite control of the country, the potential of the message to stir up more bloodshed is that much greater.

But the representative of the station seemed confident that it would stay on the air.

"Al Zawra represents all factions of resistance against the Iranian and American occupation," he wrote. "And it is committed to broadcasting their messages and activities without any interference or discrimination."

Rice Rules Out Talks With Syria, Iran (AFP)

AFP, January 21, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has reiterated Washington's opposition to talking to Syria or Iran to get their help in easing unrest in Iraq.

To believe that Damascus or Tehran would suddenly be ready to help stabilise Iraq, simply because the United States would talk to them, is false, Rice told German magazine Spiegel in an interview to be published on Monday.

Syria and Iran's "only motivation" in entering into such talks would be to draw some advantage for themselves, Rice said, adding that this was not diplomacy but blackmail.

Damascus would expect some goodwill from Washington over its Lebanon policy while Tehran would want room for manoeuvre on its nuclear programme, Rice said.

The Clock May Be Ticking On Iran's Fiery President (LAT)

By Dariush Zahedi, Omid Memarian

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119619

THE BUSH administration's decision to step up pressure against Iran by going after Iranian agents inside Iraq, coupled with the Islamic Republic's increasing economic and diplomatic isolation, have pushed conservatives inside Iran to further distance themselves from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Many pragmatic and traditional conservatives, such as former President Hashemi Rafsanjani and Ayatollah Ahmad Janati, who is the secretary of the Council of Guardians, were critical of Ahmadinejad's management of Iran's economic and foreign policies before U.S. military forces recently detained members of the Revolutionary Guard and Iranian intelligence agents in Irbil, Iraq. This incident, coupled with the U.N. Security Council's imposition of sanctions on Iran because of its refusal to abandon its nuclear program, has reportedly prompted 50 parliamentary members to sign a letter calling on Ahmadinejad to appear before parliament to explain himself. There have also been reports that Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has given a green light to parliament to criticize the president's performance. Coupled with the country's deteriorating economy, these developments could push Ahmadinejad's opponents to replace him with a less doctrinaire politician.

In Iran, the legislative branch and such supervisory institutions as the Council of Guardians have special powers to ensure that the nation's policies conform to the constitution, Islam and the interests of the Islamic Republic. As former President Mohammad Khatami, a reformist, discovered to his chagrin, the president is accountable to the electorate but lacks sufficient power to fulfill his promises to the people.

Until municipal elections in December, the relatively young conservatives who control Iran's parliament and the more traditional conservatives beholden to the clerics were unsure of Ahmadinejad's popularity. As a result, they were largely deferential to the president, allowing him wide latitude in conducting the nation's foreign and domestic policies. But Ahmadinejad's humiliation at the polls — about 90% of his allies lost — has emboldened his opponents.

Ahmadinejad was elected in 2005 on a populist platform of combating poverty and corruption through a more equitable distribution of Iran's oil wealth. He comes from the most militant and ideologically driven faction in Iran, known as the Hezbollahis. In general, they are right-wing populists with security and military backgrounds in the Revolutionary Guard and the voluntary militia attached to it, the Basij. The president has gone out of his way to placate these extremist forces, granting them multibillion-dollar infrastructure contracts to develop the country's oil and gas sector, among other enterprises. Most flamboyantly, he has endeavored to return the Islamic revolution toward what he views as its essence — anti-Zionism and populism.

That has riled the country's pragmatic and traditional conservatives. Many recognize that last month's Holocaust denial conference in Tehran and Ahmadinejad's repeated threats to wipe Israel off the map may have persuaded China and Russia to vote for U.N. sanctions against Iran's nuclear program.

The economy remains a problem for Ahmadinejad. His decision to inject huge amounts of oil money into the Iranian economy and engage in deficit spending has stoked inflation, which has made it even more difficult for the poor to make ends meet. The prices of such basic items as beef, poultry, fruits and bread have increased by 25%, and rents have risen 30%.

In an unusual departure from the standard practice, conservatives blamed Ahmadinejad more than the United States after the five Iranians were detained in Irbil. Iran's unexpectedly moderate reaction to the detentions indicates that Ahmadinejad's voice in formulating Iranian policy may be fading.

But other developments also threaten to weaken his authority. President Bush's rejection of the Iraq Survey Group's recommendation that the U.S. seek out Tehran's cooperation in stabilizing Iraq unsettled some in Iran's ruling elite who believed that Bush had no choice, given U.S. domestic politics, but to invite Tehran to the table. The successful U.S.-led campaign to dry up financing for Iran's much-needed oil and gas and other industrial projects will only exacerbate the nation's economic woes. And Saudi Arabia's acceptance of lower oil prices through increased production will put additional pressure on an economy chiefly fueled by petrodollars.

From the conservatives' point of view, blaming a single individual who can easily be restrained or even removed for all that ails Iran could avert a legitimacy crisis for the system. Parliament can impeach Ahmadinejad, or the supreme leader can remove him. Short of that, a stern lecture from Khamenei could force Ahmadinejad to temper his words and play a less visible role.

Viewing himself as a man of God, Ahmadinejad is no doubt praying that the U.S. will not be satisfied with Iran's diplomatic and economic isolation and will launch military strikes against the Islamic Republic's nuclear installations. Such action may or may not set back Iran's nuclear ambitions. But it would surely give new life to Ahmadinejad's militant faction, enabling him to rally the masses behind the flag, compel his conservative critics to close ranks behind him and crush the remnants of Iran's liberal civil society and democratic movement.

DARIUSH ZAHEDI teaches in the departments of political economy and peace and conflict studies at UC Berkeley. OMID MEMARIAN, an Iranian journalist, was awarded Human Rights Watch's highest award.

Impatience On Iran Carries A Price (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

DOJ_NMG_0119620

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

President Bush once again risks confusing his destiny with that of the nation. His presidency is running out of time. The United States is not. An all-or-nothing confrontation with Iran that has to be resolved before Bush leaves office is an artificial concept that will deepen American problems abroad.

Sports metaphors are dear to Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. But their "new thinking" on Iran and Iraq must not be allowed to turn into the political equivalent of pro football's two-minute drill. The "hurry-up" offense that works beautifully for the New England Patriots at game's end is far too dangerous when the stakes are war and peace.

With his presidency in its final two years, signs multiply that Bush has lost patience on Iran with the U.N. Security Council, much as he did on Iraq in 2003. While Rice was traveling in the Middle East and Europe last week, American allies were being told that Washington would not seek new and tougher Security Council sanctions against Iran, as has been widely expected.

Iran rejected the largely symbolic sanctions that were adopted by the council on Dec. 23 and vowed to continue its nuclear program. That program will allow Tehran to master within a year or two the technology needed to manufacture atomic bombs, according to Western intelligence agencies. Iran claims it will not develop such weapons.

But Russia's unexpectedly strong opposition even to weak sanctions adopted only after months of debate has deepened Bush's growing disillusionment with President Vladimir Putin.

The American leader is determined not to get caught in "a dead end" at the United Nations, according to U.S. officials. Bush is said to feel that Putin went back on personal pledges to support meaningful U.N. action in return for Bush's committing to diplomatic efforts last June. Bush rarely forgives someone he believes has gone back on promises to him.

Instead of returning to the United Nations for a new resolution, the administration has launched a broad effort to assemble an economic coalition of the willing to confront Iran. Trade, investment and the price of oil are the primary targets Washington chose for this coalition.

The United States wants European Union nations to deny export credits to Iran and to encourage their banks to join a campaign led by the U.S. Treasury to squeeze Iranian financial institutions linked to their government's support for terrorism in the Middle East. Iran's poorly managed oil fields are in desperate need of new foreign technology and investment, making Iran vulnerable to this kind of pressure.

The campaign received a big boost last week when it became clear that Saudi Arabia is finally worried enough about Iran to use oil as a weapon against the regime of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Saudi oil minister Ali Nuaimi publicly opposed Iranian calls for production cuts by the OPEC cartel to halt a decline that has taken crude oil from $78 a barrel in July to just above $50 a barrel last week.

The Saudis have enough reserve production capacity to swing OPEC prices up and down at will. Their relatively small population gives them a flexibility in postponing revenue gains that populous Iran lacks. Nuaimi's pronouncement, although cast as a technical matter that had nothing to do with politics, seemed to give teeth to recent warnings issued in private by Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi national security adviser, that the kingdom will now respond to Iranian hostility with its own confrontational tactics.

So a broad, sustained campaign of economic sanctions is perhaps the most effective way to bring pressure to bear on an Iranian regime that has failed to deliver on its grandiose promises of prosperity to a restive population.

But it is the Europeans and the Saudis, not the Bush administration, who control the tools of economic pressure that Washington wants wielded. Managing a campaign in which the immediate price will be paid by others will require skill, extensive consultations and enormous patience.

Such a campaign would be undermined by hurry-up tactics built around the American political calendar, or the use of U.S. military force in Iraq intended to serve as a show of force against Iran. Divisions within the Saudi royal family over how to handle Iran also should be handled with care, not bluster, by Washington. A new consensus with Europe on how to proceed must be sought as well.

This will all take time. Bush must guard against a sense of false urgency dictated by his time in office coming to an end. As Charles de Gaulle counseled, history continues even though the graveyard is full of indispensable leaders.

Hang Up! Tehran Is Calling (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

One of the most worrying parts of President Bush's Iraq strategy doesn't have anything to do with Iraq. It's the way he's ramping up a confrontation with Iran.

Across a broad spectrum of policy levers, Mr. Bush is raising the pressure on Iran, increasing the risk that he will drag the U.S. into a third war in an Islamic country in six years. Instead of disengaging from war, he could end up starting another.

DOJ_NMG_0119621

We could have taken another route. In 2003, Iran sent the U.S. a detailed message offering to work together to capture terrorists, to stabilize Iraq, to resolve nuclear disputes, to withdraw military support for Hezbollah and Hamas, and to moderate its position on Israel, in exchange for the U.S. lifting sanctions and warming up to Iran.

Some diplomats liked the idea, but administration hawks rejected it at once. Lawrence Wilkerson, a former chief of staff to Colin Powell, says that the State Department sent a cable to the Swiss ambassador in Tehran, who looks after U.S. interests in Iran, scolding him for even forwarding the package to Washington.

Obviously, Iran's offer might have led nowhere. But it's plain where rejection of the offer has taken us: more Americans are dying in Iraq, and some experts worry about clashes with Iran itself.

The Iraq Study Group proposed engagement with Iran, but instead Mr. Bush has been escalating the rhetoric and military pressure.

"When you have such a buildup and have zero communications, and you have an arena like Iraq where you may step on each other's toes, you could have rapid escalation," warns Vali Nasr, an expert on the region at the Naval Postgraduate School.

It doesn't appear that Mr. Bush wants a war with Iran. His aim seems to be a show of force to deter Iran and reassure our allies in the region. But he is on a path that may easily lead to escalation.

It's unfortunate that we are ratcheting up the military pressure, because the administration has quietly taken one very useful step against Iran: squeezing its access to international banking transactions. That has caused real economic pain and has added to the unpopularity of Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Those banking sanctions, not military moves, are a reason Mr. Ahmadinejad has been rebuked by the country's supreme leader.

Unfortunately, both Mr. Bush and Mr. Ahmadinejad benefit from confrontation. Both are unpopular domestically but can use a crisis to distract from their policy failures.

"The current strategy benefits Ahmadinejad," says Professor Nasr. "It's going to divert attention at the popular level from democracy."

Mr. Ahmadinejad is facing growing criticism: he has been heckled by university students and scolded in the press, and his candidates did poorly in recent elections. Ordinary Iranians love the U.S. — it's the most pro-American country in the Middle East I've visited — and a civil society is struggling to be born.

"If there is any military strike on Iran, all this movement will end," said Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian lawyer and Nobel Peace Prize winner.

Even some Republicans opposed to a "grand bargain" favor some kind of engagement. Mitchell Reiss, a former senior State Department official under Mr. Bush, proposes technical talks with Iran about drug trafficking and maritime security. "Even if they are a nonstarter for Tehran, I think we score points in the region for trying," Ambassador Reiss said.

Granted, Mr. Bush is right to be frustrated by Iran and the way it's defying the international community with its nuclear program.

Unfortunately, Mr. Bush's military pressure may end up making Iraq bloodier than ever. Instead of being cowed, Iran may use its proxies in Iraq, Afghanistan, Lebanon and elsewhere to kill more American officials and troops.

Or even ordinary Americans here at home. "It's a pretty good assumption that they have, if not operatives, at least sympathetic actors and affiliated groups" in the U.S., said Henry Crumpton, the State Department coordinator for counterterrorism.

Mr. Bush is absolutely right to denounce Iran's leaders for stealing elections, suppressing their people and dabbling in terrorism. But we ourselves are partly to blame for the awful government in Tehran.

By instigating a coup in 1953 and seeking special legal privileges for American troops in 1964, we empowered extremists like Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and allowed them to tap nationalist outrage. So it would be in keeping with tradition if Mr. Bush, by shortsightedly stoking a confrontation with Tehran, now inadvertently helped Iranian hard-liners crush Iran's democracy movement.

Pakistani Role Seen In Taliban Surge At Border (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

QUETTA, Pakistan — The most explosive question about the Taliban resurgence here along the border between Afghanistan and Pakistan is this: Have Pakistani intelligence agencies been promoting the Islamic insurgency?

The government of Pakistan vehemently rejects the allegation and insists that it is fully committed to help American and NATO forces prevail against the Taliban militants who were driven from power in Afghanistan in 2001.

Western diplomats in both countries and Pakistani opposition figures say that Pakistani intelligence agencies — in particular the powerful Inter-Services Intelligence and Military Intelligence — have been supporting a Taliban restoration, motivated not only by Islamic fervor but also by a longstanding view that the jihadist movement allows them to assert greater influence on Pakistan's vulnerable western flank.

DOJ_NMG_0119622

More than two weeks of reporting along this frontier, including dozens of interviews with residents on each side of the porous border, leaves little doubt that Quetta is an important base for the Taliban, and found many signs that Pakistani authorities are encouraging the insurgents, if not sponsoring them.

The evidence is provided in fearful whispers, and it is anecdotal.

At Jamiya Islamiya, a religious school here in Quetta, Taliban sympathies are on flagrant display, and residents say students have gone with their teachers' blessings to die in suicide bombings in Afghanistan.

Three families whose sons had died as suicide bombers in Afghanistan said they were afraid to talk about the deaths because of pressure from Pakistani intelligence agents. Local people say dozens of families have lost sons in Afghanistan as suicide bombers and fighters.

One former Taliban commander said in an interview that he had been jailed by Pakistani intelligence officials because he would not go to Afghanistan to fight. He said that, for Western and local consumption, his arrest had been billed as part of Pakistan's crackdown on the Taliban in Pakistan. Former Taliban members who have refused to fight in Afghanistan have been arrested — or even mysteriously killed — after resisting pressure to re-enlist in the Taliban, Pakistani and Afghan tribal elders said.

"The Pakistanis are actively supporting the Taliban," declared a Western diplomat in an interview in Kabul. He said he had seen an intelligence report of a recent meeting on the Afghan border between a senior Taliban commander and a retired colonel of the Pakistani Inter-Services Intelligence.

Pakistanis and Afghans interviewed on the frontier, frightened by the long reach of Pakistan's intelligence agencies, spoke only with assurances that they would not be named. Even then, they spoke cautiously.

The Pakistani military and intelligence services have for decades used religious parties as a convenient instrument to keep domestic political opponents at bay and for foreign policy adventures, said Husain Haqqani, a former adviser to several of Pakistan's prime ministers and the author of a book on the relationship between the Islamists and the Pakistani security forces.

The religious parties recruited for the jihad in Kashmir and Afghanistan from the 1980s, when the Pakistani intelligence agencies ran the resistance by the mujahedeen and channeled money to them from the United States and Saudi Arabia to fight the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, Mr. Haqqani said.

In return for help in Kashmir and Afghanistan the intelligence services would rig votes for the religious parties and allow them freedom to operate, he said.

"The religious parties provide them with recruits, personnel, cover and deniability," Mr. Haqqani said in a telephone interview from Washington, where he is now a visiting scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

The Inter-Services Intelligence once had an entire wing dedicated to training jihadis, he said. Today the religious parties probably have enough of their own people to do the training, but, he added, the I.S.I. so thoroughly monitors phone calls and people's movements that it would be almost impossible for any religious party to operate a training camp without its knowledge.

"They trained the people who are at the heart of it all, and they have done nothing to roll back their protégés," Mr. Haqqani said.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, President Pervez Musharraf, under strong American pressure, pledged to help root out Islamic extremism, and, as both head of the army and president, he has more direct control of the intelligence services than past civilian prime ministers. But according to several analysts, Pakistani intelligence officials believe it is more prudent to prepare for the day when Western troops leave Afghanistan.

Pakistan has long seen jihadi movements like the Taliban as a counter to Indian and Russian influence next door in Afghanistan, the Western diplomat and other analysts said, and as a way to provide Pakistan with "strategic depth," or a friendly buffer on its western border.

In Pashtunabad, a warren of high mud-brick walls and narrow lanes in Quetta, the links of the government, religious parties and Taliban commanders to a local madrasa are thinly hidden, said a local opposition party member who lives in the neighborhood.

Three students from the madrasa went to Afghanistan recently on suicide missions, he said. The family of one of the men admitted that he had blown himself up but denied that he had attended the school. The man's brother suggested that he had been forced into the mission and that someone had recruited him for payment.

"Nowadays people are getting money from somewhere and they are killing other people's children," he said. "We are afraid of this government," he said. His father said he feared the same people would try to take his other son and asked that no family names be used.

DOJ_NMG_0119623

President Musharraf relies on the religious party Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam, or J.U.I., which dominates this province, Baluchistan, as an important partner in the provincial and national parliaments.

At a madrasa, called simply Jamiya Islamiya, on winding Hajji Ghabi Road, a board in the courtyard proudly declares "Long Live Mullah Omar," in praise of the Taliban leader, and "Long Live Fazlur Rehman," the leader of J.U.I.

Members of the provincial government and Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam are frequent visitors to the school, the local opposition party member said, asking that his name not be used because he feared Pakistan's intelligence services. People on motorbikes with green government license plates visit at night, he said, as do luxurious sport utility vehicles with blackened windows, a favorite of Taliban commanders.

Maulvi Noor Muhammad, a Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam representative from Baluchistan in the National Assembly, recently received a guest barefoot while sitting on the floor of a grubby district office in Quetta, a map of the world above him painted on the wall to represent his belief in worldwide Islamic revolution.

He denied providing the militants any logistical support. "The J.U.I. is not supporting the Taliban anymore," he said. "We are only providing moral support. We pray for their success in ousting the foreign troops from the land of Afghanistan."

On a recent morning, the deputy director of the Jamiya Islamiya madrasa, Qari Muhammad Ibrahim, declined to meet a female reporter for The New York Times but answered a question from a local male reporter.

He did not deny that some of the madrasa's 280 students had gone to fight in Afghanistan. "In the Koran it is written that it is every Muslim's right to fight jihad," he said. "All we are telling them is what is in the Koran, and then it's up to them to go to jihad."

NATO officials and Western diplomats in Afghanistan have grown increasingly critical of Pakistan for allowing the Taliban leaders, commanders and soldiers to operate from their country, which has given an advantage to the insurgency in southern Afghanistan. In September, Gen. James L. Jones, then NATO's supreme commander, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that Quetta remained the headquarters of the Taliban movement.

Still, Pakistan has insisted that the Taliban leadership is not based in Quetta. "If there are Taliban in Quetta, they are few," said Pakistan's minister for information and broadcasting, Tariq Azim Khan. "You can count them on your fingers."

American officials and Western diplomats noted that, when put under enough pressure, Pakistan had come through with flashes of cooperation. But that only seems to reinforce the view that Pakistan's intelligence agencies are more in touch with what is going on in the Taliban insurgency than the government lets on publicly.

For instance, a senior Taliban leader, Mullah Akhtar Muhammad Osmani, who operated on both sides of the border, was killed in an airstrike in Afghanistan on Dec. 19, after Pakistan helped track him, an American official in Afghanistan said.

At the same time, a kind of dirty war is building between Afghan and Pakistani intelligence agencies. A senior Afghan intelligence official said one of its informers in Pakistan was recently killed and dumped in pieces in Peshawar, a border town. The Afghan intelligence service has also recently arrested two Afghan generals, one retired, who have been charged with spying for Pakistan, as well as a Pakistani suspected of being an intelligence agent.

President Musharraf has acknowledged that some retired Pakistani intelligence officials may still be involved in supporting their former protégés in the Taliban.

Hamid Gul, the former director general of Pakistani intelligence, remains a public and unapologetic supporter of the Taliban, visiting madrasas and speaking in support of jihad at graduation ceremonies.

Afghan intelligence officials recently produced a captured insurgent who said Mr. Gul facilitated his training and logistics through an office in the Pakistani town of Nowshera, in the North-West Frontier Province, west of the capital, Islamabad.

NATO and American officials in Afghanistan say there is also evidence of support from current midlevel Pakistani intelligence officials. Just how far up that support reaches remains in dispute.

At least five villages in Pishin, a district northwest of Quetta that stretches toward the Afghan border, lost sons in the recent fighting in Kandahar between the Taliban and NATO forces, opposition politicians said.

One village, Karbala, is a main center of support for the jihad, local people say. Unlike the other villages, which blend into the stark desertlike landscape with their mud-brick houses and compound walls, Karbala has lavish houses, mosques and madrasas, suggesting an unusual wealth.

Farther on, in the village of Bagarzai, lies the grave of Azizullah, a religious scholar who used only one name and acquired fame as a Taliban commander.

Only 25, he was killed with a group of 15 to 20 men in an airstrike in the Afghan province of Helmand on May 22, said his father, Hajji Abdul Hai. Thousands of people attended his funeral, including senior members of the provincial government, the father said.

DOJ_NMG_0119624

Mr. Hai, 50, who is a Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam member, denied that his son had been persuaded to fight by anyone. “From the start it was his spirit to take part in jihad,” his father said. “It’s all to do with personal will. If someone agrees, then he goes. Even if someone wishes to, no one can stop him.”

It is an argument that supporters of the jihad use frequently. But for some of the families mourning their sons, there is no doubt that the madrasas and the religious parties are the first point of contact.

That was the conclusion reached by the family of Muhammad Daoud, a 22-year-old man from Pishin who disappeared more than a year ago.

“In our search we went to many places and everyone said different things,” said his father, Hajji Noora Gul. “We went to the madrasa in Pashtunabad, but no one was ready to tell us his whereabouts.”

“Even the madrasa people did not know,” he added. “Behind the curtain of the madrasa, maybe there are other people who do this. Maybe there are some businessmen who take them.”

Then, he said, a Taliban propaganda CD came out showing his son with a group of others taking an oath before the Taliban commander, Mullah Dadullah.

“He had a shawl over his head and was preparing for a suicide bombing,” Mr. Gul said. “He said, ‘I am fighting for God, and I am ready for this.’ ”

His eldest son, Allah Dad, 33, blamed the jihadi groups and the Inter-Services Intelligence. “We don’t know how he made contact with those jihadi groups,” he said. “There are some groups active in taking people to Afghanistan and they are active in Quetta.

“All Taliban are I.S.I. Taliban,” he added. “It is not possible to go to Afghanistan without the help of the I.S.I. Everyone says this.”

Pakistan Denies It Harbors Taliban (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Jan. 20 -- Faced with new charges that Pakistan is harboring Islamic insurgents, including fugitive Taliban leader Mohammad Omar, Pakistani officials this weekend denied such allegations and defended their efforts to curb cross-border insurgent attacks in Afghanistan as sincere if not totally successful.

"We don't deny the Taliban come and go, but that is not the entire truth," Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, Pakistan's military spokesman, said in an interview Saturday. "If 25 percent of the problem lies on our side of the border, 75 percent of it lies on the Afghan side." Of four known top Taliban commanders, he said, three are Afghan and one is Pakistani.

Sultan and other officials denied statements by a Taliban spokesman arrested in recent days in Afghanistan that Omar has been living in the Pakistani border city of Quetta under the protection of Pakistani intelligence agents. Omar's capture has been a top priority for U.S. forces in Afghanistan since the overthrow of Taliban rule in 2001.

Afghan officials have long charged that Omar and other Taliban leaders operate from Quetta, and senior U.S. officials have recently begun echoing those accusations, saying Pakistan has not done enough to curb Taliban attacks although it continues to be a valuable ally in the broader fight against Islamic terrorism.

Sultan said Pakistani officials repeatedly had asked Afghan and U.S. authorities to provide them with solid information on Omar's location but had received none. He also asserted that the captured Taliban spokesman, known as Mohammad Hanif, had lied about Omar's whereabouts after being tortured by interrogators in Afghanistan.

However, the army spokesman acknowledged that several Afghan refugee camps near Quetta and elsewhere provide safe havens for insurgents, who he said easily cross back and forth across the busy and porous border. "They do come for rest and recuperation," Sultan said, adding that Pakistan plans to close the camps and send all their inhabitants home.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said at a meeting of his national security council Thursday that strong punitive action would be taken against illegal cross-border actions and against any terrorists seeking refuge in Pakistan, according to news reports here.

Pakistani officials also defended their recent military and political actions in the tribal regions along the northwest border with Afghanistan, including peace pacts with tribal leaders in the adjoining South and North Waziristan districts. Afghan and U.S. officials charge that cross-border attacks from that area have risen dramatically since the pacts were signed in September.

Sultan acknowledged that a senior Taliban commander based in South Waziristan, Beitullah Mehsud, had been recruiting and arming local men to become insurgents despite the terms of the peace deal, which was aimed at stopping extremist violence in Pakistan and across the border.

He said an airstrike against several training camps in South Waziristan last Monday had been aimed at punishing Mehsud, although the commander escaped and has since tried to rally supporters for revenge attacks. Sultan also denied reports this week that a pilotless U.S. Predator aircraft had first dropped bombs on the camp, saying, "The strike was carried out by us. We struck against five compounds and destroyed three."

DOJ_NMG_0119625

In a separate interview Friday, Ali Jan Mohammed Orakzai, the governor of Pakistan's North-West Frontier province and the architect of the North and South Waziristan accords, asserted that the pacts had been successful in some ways but had led to worrisome local tensions and had not been able to stop all cross-border movement by insurgents.

"There have been no attacks on law enforcement agencies, and no efforts to challenge the government writ," Orakzai said. "We do admit that some cross-border movement is taking place, but to say that it has increased because of the agreement is unrealistic. We have 80,000 troops deployed on the border, and they are not sitting there for nothing."

He also said that the government was "really squeezing" local tribes that had violated the agreements, and that they had created confusion and tension between locals and foreign-born residents who fled to Pakistan from various Afghan conflicts over the years and now feel pressure to leave.

But Orakzai, a retired army general who led numerous military operations against Islamic militants in the tribal areas after 2001, said it was imperative to switch to a political approach after hundreds of soldiers died, traditional tribal structures collapsed and local anti-government sentiments soared, helping Islamic extremists attract more support.

Orakzai was scathing in his criticism of the Afghan government, saying it had been unable to extend control or services to much of the country and was largely to blame for the revival of the Taliban insurgency. "There is no democracy, no writ of government in Afghanistan," he said. The Afghan government has received billions of dollars in foreign aid and is protected by tens of thousands of NATO and U.S. troops.

In the past several weeks, the nature of Pakistan's role in relation to cross-border insurgent attacks has provoked contradictory foreign assessments. Top American military and civilian officials have said Pakistan needs to do more to eliminate safe havens for the Taliban and prevent them from slipping into Afghanistan.

But NATO commanders in Afghanistan, who oversee 31,000 troops there, say Pakistan has helped international forces far more than is widely known. For example, they said, Pakistani intelligence sources were crucial in tracking down Akhtar Mohammad Osmani, a senior Taliban commander who was killed in a U.S. airstrike in southern Afghanistan in December.

"The Pakistan government does not wish to see the Taliban in power here," Lt. Gen. David Richards, the outgoing NATO commander in Kabul, said in an interview recently. "They are determined to bear down on the insurgency. But when they help us, they get no credit for it. No one says thank you."

Afghan Women's Quiet Revolution Hangs By A Thread (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

Each step toward equality has been a struggle, but the nation's instability is eroding their gains.

Kabul, Afghanistan — EACH morning, the policewoman puts on her uniform, goes to her precinct office, sits behind a bare desk. And waits.

She is one of several officers appointed to make it easier for women to report domestic violence. Her job ought to be one of the busiest in the district. Instead, Pushtoon, who goes by one name, has one of the loneliest.

"Last week we had one woman. Before that there had not been anyone for several weeks," she said, twisting hands left scarred by her attempt at suicide years ago in a Taliban jail. "Women are afraid to come, but we are not allowed to go to them.

"The police chiefs will not let us. They say it is unsafe for women officers," she said.

Five years after the end of the Taliban era, there are new opportunities for women in Afghanistan, and notable efforts are underway to make their daily lives better, especially in Kabul, the capital. Improving the status of women has been a core goal of U.S. policy here, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said at a congressional hearing in 2005 that enshrining women's equality in the Afghan Constitution was an important advance for the entire region.

But conversations with dozens of women suggest that each step forward has been a struggle. Afghan society remains deeply uncomfortable with the idea of women gaining independence and authority. The Taliban's resurgence has reversed incremental gains, particularly in the south. If the Taliban incursions spread, more women are likely to lose ground.

Families in the south that recently began allowing their daughters to go to school and wives to enroll in vocational programs have pulled them out because of Taliban attacks.

"Women's future depends so much on security. As much as se-curity deteriorates, women's situation deteriorates," said Masuda Jalal, former acting minister of women's affairs. "At the first sign of insecurity, the head of the family protects his women and children, and the first measure they take is to keep them inside the house."

DOJ_NMG_0119626

Women who have gained ground haven't talked of the constitutional principles of equality. Instead, they focus on the respect accorded women by the Koran, and on the importance of mothers and homes, where older women have long held positions of power.

Their goal, often unstated, is to convince fathers and brothers, husbands and sons that when a woman is empowered, the males benefit as well. They hope their daughters will at least have more choices than they had.

Women are learning to drive, some at their husbands' urging so they can help with family errands. Small numbers have opened bank accounts. Women have become a regular presence on television talk shows, and they deliver weather reports and other news features.

According to Farsona Simimi, a popular television talk show host, "There is a quiet revolution here." But, she added, "I do not know whether it will succeed."

Pushing a stone uphill

THREE times in the last century, the status of women has improved, only to suffer reversals.

The first time was in the 1920s, when ruler Amanullah Khan abolished the requirement that women be completely covered in public and encouraged his wife to wear a hat without a veil. He was ousted by the mullahs.

The lot of women improved again in the 1960s, when four women were elected to parliament. One of them was the mother of Nasrine Gross, now an Afghan American lecturer in sociology at Kabul University.

A family album contains photos of her mother and several friends at a picnic 40 years ago. They wear knee-length dresses with short sleeves; a couple of them have beehive hairdos, strands blowing free in the summer breeze as they lean against a sleek car. Two men in Western clothing stand nearby.

"No one can believe these pictures were taken here," Gross said.

In the 1970s, political turmoil stymied women's progress. But in the next decade, ruling communists prohibited women from wearing burkas and appointed many to government posts. More than 50 were given judgeships, and many others took positions in the police and healthcare professions.

When the Taliban took power in 1996, it banned all education for women, even small girls. It removed women from almost all jobs outside the home and required them to cover their faces in public by wearing a burka. In some areas, it demanded that house windows be painted black so women could not see out and men could not see in. Women were whipped in public for the smallest infraction.

Educated Afghans and international aid workers say the U.S.-backed government of President Hamid Karzai has done little besides removing the Taliban restrictions. He has only one woman in his Cabinet of 25 and none among his top advisors.

Several Afghan women said that they had encouraged Karzai to do small things, such as have his wife accompany him to public events, but that he had never done so.

In the name of Islam

RAHALA Salim was one of those who became a judge under the communists, and she recalls watching in horror as the Taliban dismantled every vestige of protection for women.

"As a judge, when I saw women coming to me crying because they had been abused, I felt responsible, I felt I had to defend their rights," said Salim, who was removed from her post by the Taliban. Under its rule, she said, "if a man was accused of rape, it was the woman who was arrested and blamed."

Salim knew from her legal studies that Sharia, or Islamic law, offered women some legal protection. The Koran and hadiths, the sayings of the prophet Muhammad, are open to an array of interpretations. And early Islam glorifies several women, including Muhammad's daughter Fatima, who is portrayed as an independent leader of her people.

"We have to know the real Sharia; we have to be able to point to passages in the holy Koran and say, 'Here, read this,' " Salim said. "In Islamic history, men have been the boss. They want to be the boss forever. That's why they never want women to appear in public, but that is not Islam; that is cultural tradition."

The notion of Islam as a pillar of freedom came from Salim's mother.

"My mother didn't have any sons, and so my father took a second wife, and it made her extremely sad and it made her life very hard," Salim said. "She told me, 'Unless you can have enough education, you can never stand against men. You must learn Islam so you can struggle against them.' "

During the Taliban era, Salim began to teach the Koran. Once a week, 70 women would gather for classes, sometimes at her house, sometimes elsewhere so the Taliban would not become suspicious.

"I would cook something as if we were just gathering for a meal, and then we would recite the holy Koran and discuss Islamic questions and then political issues," she recalled.

DOJ_NMG_0119627

After the Taliban fled, Salim ran for parliament. But she understood that she would need the mullahs behind her, and when she was elected, she asked them whether she could address families in the mosque. Her appeal opened the door for women to enter there. In her district, women never had; they prayed at home.

"It was the first time that women saw the inside of the mosque," she said. Then, with the mullahs' assent, she asked the families to send their daughters to school.

Other women have reached similar conclusions: that if they are to persuade men to stand behind them, they will need mullahs as allies and Islam as a shield.

Jalal, the former women's minister, has convened meetings of mullahs to discuss Koranic interpretations of women's rights. A meeting last summer in Kabul drew 100 mullahs from around the country. She also has asked new "women's councils" to work closely with local mullahs. So far, the councils are active primarily in Kabul and on its outskirts.

In Chakadera, a district at the foot of mountains about an hour north of Kabul, Maseema Sakhi acts as the local liaison to the Women's Affairs Ministry. A tiny, graceful woman of 45, she went to college and teaches at the local grade school. But she married a village man and lives in a typical Afghan mud compound with several generations of family, where chickens and turkeys roam the yard.

She has made overtures to local mullahs, so when there are domestic problems they consider coming to her.

Recently a girl arrived in the village in tattered clothes, exhausted and battered. She had run away from her husband's family. She said she had been badly beaten and was afraid she would be killed.

In the past, the elders and the mullah might have forced the girl to tell them where she came from and taken her back, all but condemning her to death. This time, the mullah sent for Sakhi.

"She had walked three days and three nights through the mountains without stopping. Her feet were torn," Sakhi said. "She said she was so miserable in her home that she wished a wild animal would eat her. We took her to the women's ministry, and now she is in a shelter and she calls me her mother."

'Someone should listen'

PUSHTOON, the policewoman, never thought of herself as a crusader.

Her mother died when she was an infant. Brought up by her father in Logar province, south of Kabul, she gained a rudimentary knowledge of reading.

At 13, she was married to a man many years her senior. At 15, she bore the first of her six children. The family moved to Pakistan, where her husband, who was often unemployed, took up with a younger woman.

Depressed, confused and only dimly aware of how the Taliban treated women, Pushtoon returned to Logar to claim a piece of land her father had left her when he died. She wanted to sell it to help support her family.

But the Taliban arrested her, saying she must have killed her husband since he wasn't with her. Her only relatives were her husband's family, and they wanted the land for themselves. The Taliban accused her of murder and took her to the women's prison in Kabul.

Locked in a cell barely large enough for a bed, she became desperate.

"I was shouting and shouting that I was innocent, and no one was listening," she recalled, nervously touching the braid on the cuff of her police uniform.

After six months, she shut herself in a tiny, squalid latrine, lighted a match and held it to her clothing.

"The flames licked over the material and burned my hair and was burning my face and burned my hands," she said. "I burned myself to die there. That would have been better than a life in prison. I knew no one in Kabul. No one came to visit me. I had two daughters and four boys and they were in Pakistan and I missed them."

But she didn't die. And a few days later the Taliban released her. She still has scars on her hands and a dark, pitted mark on her forehead from the flames. She covers it with the ornamental red makeup that some Afghan women daub above their brows.

And she has a cause.

She cited the case of a woman who sought her help: "Her husband didn't have a job. He was home all the time and he beat her every day. He broke two of her teeth, and he put a pillow over her mouth when he hit her so she wouldn't shout and so the neighbors would not hear."

Such women are often afraid that if they complain, their husbands will kill them and they will bring dishonor to their families, Pushtoon said.

"I am doing this job now," Pushtoon said, "because when a woman says she is innocent, someone should listen."

'Happy Morning'

FARSONA Simimi has taken a different road, becoming a popular television talk show host on the Tolo network, one of Afghanistan's new private stations.

DOJ_NMG_0119628

She uses the nonthreatening idiom of shows such as "Bride" and "Happy Morning" to help women think about asserting their rights and to help men understand the problems women face. She often alternates taboo topics with ones that even the most conservative men would not oppose.

"Today I had two subjects on the family program: how to teach a child and how to get dark spots out of a shirt," she said with a smile.

Dressed modestly in a high-necked white blouse and an ankle-length white skirt, only her veil suggests her independent views: It perches so far back on her head that it looks in danger of slipping off, and it shows a swath of her slightly hennaed hair.

"When I first was on TV, my family was afraid for me," she said. "People said to my husband, 'How can you let her do that?' "

A year ago, one of Simimi's female colleagues was slain. Many people think it was because someone in her family considered her too modern. She wore blouses and tight jeans and went to clubs at night, said colleagues at Tolo.

It has taken almost three years, but Simimi has found that her audience is beginning to trust her. Women telephone her at the station and send her e-mails, and when she attends weddings or other large gatherings, they seek her out to ask questions or tell her their stories.

Her greatest regret is that television cannot yet show the cracked ribs and the burns and the other abuses women suffer.

"But we can talk about some of these things. One of our main topics on the family program is men beating their wives…. And we talk about arranged marriage from many perspectives, [such as] the father picks a person and doesn't talk about it or discuss it with the woman."

When she looks at her own family, she sees the problem writ small. Her young son recently told her as she was leaving for work, "Mama, you must wear a bigger scarf."

"Now, where did he get that idea? He is only 8, but he spends time with his father, with his grandfather — they must say some of these things," she said.

"It will take a long, long time for things to change. We must wait for this generation to grow up, and then maybe in two more generations we will see some changes."

The sewing circle

OUTSIDE Kabul, where villages sit lonely in the mountain desert, women's prospects are far bleaker. In Chakadera, Sakhi's village, formation of a sewing circle was seen as a major advance. It allowed women to meet and share their stories. But the conversations often turn to domestic violence.

Chakadera was on the front line when the Taliban took over, and its women were forbidden even to go to the village market. They married first cousins because those were the only people they could meet. Now the women gather in a school room to sew, to laugh a little, cry, and support those among them most battered by their men.

But no one knows how long the sewing group will last. In early autumn, a nearby school was burned. If there is another attack, the women might not be allowed to go out, or their daughters to go to school.

For now, Sakhi said, "everybody can come here to sew and weave and forget her sorrows for two or three hours each week."

One of the women, Malalai, 29, managed a smile even though she expressed little affection for her husband, who forbids her even to buy clothes for their children without his permission. Married at 15, she was a mother of three boys and two girls before she was 24. She wants a different life for her girls.

"I want them to get an education, to work, and only then to get married," she said.

What will happen if the Taliban returns?

She brushed her hand over several spools of thread sitting before her on the floor, knocking each one over as if they represented the sewing circle, the dreams for her daughters, the possibility of a different future.

"Gone," she said. All gone.

alissa.rubin@latimes.com

Rubin recently was on assignment in Afghanistan.

DOJ:

Editorial: A Case Of Justice That Stinks (ROT)

Roanoke (VA) Times, January 21, 2007

The administration's forced resignations among U.S. attorneys tell the tale of the corrupting influence of unchecked power.

is a new old story, about one of those "little-noticed" provisions in complex legislation that draws attention only when it starts to stink.

The complex law is the Patriot Act. The smelly provision -- one of many, but a noticeable one of late -- is an innocuous-seeming change in the way the executive branch makes interim appointments of U.S. attorneys.

In effect, the change allows the attorney general to replace federal prosecutors without Senate approval.

The Bush administration seems to be using this new power, in part, to rid the Justice Department of prosecutors deep into political corruption investigations and to put political hacks in their place.

Congress should act quickly to strip the law of a provision so ripe for abuse.

Distressingly, lawmakers passed the change without debate last year when the GOP-dominated Congress approved the USA Patriot Improvement and Reauthorization Act.

The political blog TPMmuckraker.com reports that a spokesman for one of the bill's Republican managers, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, said then-Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter slipped the new language into the bill at the last minute. Separate measures passed earlier in both houses did not include the change.

U.S. attorneys are appointed by the president and approved by the Senate. When appointees leave, voluntarily or not, the attorney general can make an interim appointment that is not subject to a Senate vote.

Formerly, such an appointment could last up to 120 days, after which a local federal district court would name a replacement until the vacancy was filled. Now interim appointments can last indefinitely, at least until the end of a president's term, a process that circumvents the Senate's check on executive power.

That change began stinking after a series of forced resignations that includes the impending departure of Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney for San Diego. Lam focused her office's efforts on successfully prosecuting former Rep. Duke Cunningham for corruption.

The head of the FBI's San Diego office bemoans Lam's ouster, saying it will jeopardize a continuing investigation that has touched several Republican lawmakers. He and several former federal prosecutors say her firing smells of politics.

Not so, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales insists. He testified at a congressional hearing Thursday, assuring Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Patrick Leahy that U.S. attorneys are never removed to retaliate for or interfere with an investigation or court case.

"Sources" suggest other reasons for Lam's firing, from her pursuit of public corruption and white-collar crime at the expense of drug smuggling and gun cases to a poor track record for convictions. Suspicions that politics underlies all would be hard to prove -- but they are also hard to dismiss.

One of Gonzales' interim appointments, after all, is J. Timothy Griffin, since late December the interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. His career up to then was spent largely doing "opposition research" -- digging up dirt on Democrats -- for the Republican Party and, from 2005 to 2006, for Karl Rove.

The Justice Department forced Griffin's predecessor to resign.

Such examples illustrate, at the least, the potential for putrefying politics to corrupt the Justice Department's use of truly awesome powers.

Feinstein and Leahy have filed a bill to restore the district court's authority to make interim appointments. Gonzales' protestations of high principle do not persuade. The senators should press on.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutor In Apple Case Joins Law Firm (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 21, 2007

Christopher J. Steskal, a lead prosecutor of a federal task force investigating the backdating of stock options at Apple Inc. and other companies, is leaving his San Francisco post to join a law firm, the United State Attorney's office in San Francisco confirmed late Friday.

Mr. Steskal's decision follows the recent resignation of his boss, United States Attorney Kevin V. Ryan.

Mr. Steskal also was the lead prosecutor in the government's case against Gregory L. Reyes, the former chief executive of Brocade Communications Systems.

Mr. Steskal, who was to try Mr. Reyes's case in June in San Francisco, is the second of five assistant United States attorneys on the task force to leave since its formation in July. He said he would join the San Francisco office of Fenwick & West within 30 days.

William J. Portanova, a criminal defense attorney and former federal prosecutor, said that he believed that the Brocade case would not suffer, no matter who is picked to succeed Mr. Steskal.

“The government has people stacked up ready to pick up the case and run with it,” he said.

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States Attorney’s office in San Francisco, said that one of two prosecutors the office is planning to hire would replace Mr. Steskal on the task force.

Departures Could Slow Option Probe Two In U.S. Attorney's Office Were First To File Charges For Backdating Stock Grants (SFC)

By Jessica Guynn, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 21, 2007

The abrupt resignations last week of U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, the Justice Department's top law enforcement official in Northern California, and Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Steskal, the lead prosecutor on the task force investigating stock-option backdating, raise questions about the fate of Bay Area technology companies under investigation.

Ryan gained a national profile for his aggressive stance on the controversial issue, becoming the first prosecutor to file backdating charges -- against two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. for allegedly violating securities laws by backdating stock options without properly accounting for them.

But it is the loss of Steskal, who is leaving to head the white-collar crime unit at Fenwick & West, headquartered in Mountain View, that could dramatically slow the pace of the criminal probes. Steskal was the office's resident expert on backdating, overseeing a dozen probes into suspect options grants, the highest-profile of which was Apple Computer Inc. He also was the lead prosecutor in the case against Brocade.

"Any time a line prosecutor leaves an investigation, there's clearly a loss of momentum because that person is invested, knows the cases and has spent all the time with the cases," said Thomas Carlucci, a San Francisco lawyer who represents former Apple attorney Wendy Howell, a potential target of the federal probe. "So there is undoubtedly going to be a momentary hiccup given that Chris has been the lead in all of the stock-option cases and in particular in the Apple case."

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the agency has a long track record of managing cases and investigations during leadership transitions.

"U.S. Attorney Ryan is taking care to ensure a smooth transition in the office's cases," Macauley said. "There continue to be many assistant U.S. attorneys with strong investigative skills and substantial trial experience on the stock-options backdating task force and throughout the office who are fully capable of carrying on the work of the task force."

In the long run, the swiftly revolving door at the U.S. attorney's office is unlikely to have a profound impact on the backdating probes, former federal prosecutors and legal experts agree.

"Whenever new leadership comes into an office, there is inevitably a period of adjustment and assessment for the new U.S. attorney to decide whether this type of investigation is going to be a priority and how much in the way of resources he or she is willing to commit," said former Colorado U.S. Attorney William Leone, now in private practice.

Will Ryan's successor share his zeal? Ryan and other federal prosecutors had pledged that 2007 will bring more prosecutions.

"Mr. Ryan saw the critical import of these issues that touch on companies that employ hundreds of thousands of people and have billions of dollars of investments, including from citizens and pension funds," said James Post, a Boston University management professor. "He saw that no matter how you look at it, shareholders are hurt when options are backdated."

In an interview last month with The Chronicle, Ryan said his office was investigating more than 25 companies, of which 15 to 20 percent had troubling red flags. Any replacement for Ryan likely will pursue the high-profile cases, legal observers said.

"Obviously the question remains: Are there cases that can be made?" said one former federal prosecutor, who asked not to be named. "If there are good cases, I don't see why anyone wouldn't want to pursue them."

Backdating -- manipulating the timing of stock-option grants to enrich company executives -- became a cause celebre for Ryan, who in July formed a task force to focus on the growing scandal.

Since then, the toll of the scandal on corporate America has been heavy, engulfing as many as 200 companies and leading to a rash of executive resignations and billions of dollars in restatements as well as the indictment of five former top executives at two companies, Brocade and Comverse Technology Inc.

More than 2,000 public companies have backdating issues, according to Erik Lie, the University of Iowa finance professor whose research zeroed in on the widespread practice of choosing dates on which the stock was trading lower to inflate the value of options for executives.

Many of the companies embroiled in the scandal hail from Silicon Valley, the most prominent of which is Apple.

DOJ_NMG_0119631

Dual investigations from regulators and prosecutors have unsettled investors, who are concerned about the future of Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs. An internal investigation at the Cupertino tech giant found that Jobs chose "favorable" dates for options but did not understand the accounting implications.

Federal law enforcement is focusing on cases of serious fraud, such as deliberately misleading investors or forging documents. Many companies have voluntarily reported problems in the ways they accounted for options. Both the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission have promised swift and aggressive action.

Ryan is among a handful of top prosecutors nationwide who are leaving the Justice Department. Rumors of his pending resignation had circulated in the legal community for months.

A conservative Republican, Ryan served as a state prosecutor and state court judge before being appointed to the federal post by President Bush in 2002. His stormy tenure was characterized by high-profile prosecutions but also by widespread reports of low morale and an exodus of experienced prosecutors from the office, which has about 100 lawyers.

How he ran the office became the subject of a recent internal Justice Department audit.

In an e-mail to his staff, Ryan cited personal and professional reasons for leaving the job. Ryan did not say when his resignation will take effect, but one former federal prosecutor said he expects Ryan to leave office in the next four to six weeks, when his successor is lined up.

E-mail Jessica Guynn at jguynn@sfchronicle.com.

Big Game? An Enron Survivor Hunts For Riches (NYT)

By Charles Duhigg

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

THE South Pacific islands of Papua New Guinea, where canned mackerel occasionally serves as currency and cannibalism was once on the menu, are a long way from the corporate jungles where Enron was born.

Yet amid the wreckage of Enron, the energy giant that went bankrupt in 2001, is a leftover sliver of the company that is still doing business in Papua New Guinea: an oil refinery near the country's capital, Port Moresby, that was shipped there from Alaska and in which Enron continues to hold a small stake.

In November, the relatively obscure Houston company that owns most of that refinery, the InterOil Corporation, made the kind of announcement investors crave: explorations near the refinery had uncorked a vast pool of natural gas potentially larger than the United States' total residential consumption of the fossil fuel in 2005. The size of the discovery was so large, Phil E. Mulacek, InterOil's chairman and chief executive, informed an analyst, that simply controlling its output "was sort of like trying to stop the Mississippi."

Just a few years ago, such proclamations — and the executives who made them — might have been viewed as curiosities, if they were noticed at all. Energy prices were so low that many natural-gas discoveries were burnt off so that drilling rigs could extract precious oil deposits further below. And rattled investors might have been wary of any company linked to Enron, especially one like InterOil that was boasting of possible treasures unearthed in remote jungles.

But that was then. This is now.

After a lengthy dormant spell, the global search for gas and oil has reignited with a fervor that is transforming companies like InterOil into Wall Street darlings. "The gold rush is back on," said Andrew V. Boland, an energy analyst at Peters & Company, a Canadian investment firm. "It's like the wild, wild West, all over again."

InterOil's gas find — which is unconfirmed and may be impossible to transport — caused the company's stock price to soar and its market capitalization to swell to $891 million from $572 million within three weeks of the announcement. Many of InterOil's financial backers, including Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs, Wells Fargo, and Boone Pickens's investment firm, increased their bets after the discovery was revealed. Stanley Druckenmiller, a former lieutenant of George Soros, disclosed three days after the announcement that his hedge fund had poured more than $30 million into InterOil stock.

The passion for unearthing energy riches goes well beyond InterOil, of course. Yet, as the tangled history and relationships behind InterOil demonstrate, fortune and merit do not always march in lockstep in today's energy scramble. In addition to enfranchising bold explorers, energy fever has empowered scrappy promoters and would-be kingmakers who are rushing to remake nations and economies in a flash, analysts say.

In a controversial move, the monarchy of Qatar, for instance, earned a shot at becoming a regional power broker after a collection of local magnates helped to persuade the government and ExxonMobil to pour more than $25 billion into the nation's gas fields. In Bolivia, President Evo Morales is trying to use his country's gas reservoirs to force neighboring Chile to give his landlocked country a corridor to the sea.

For small companies like InterOil, the possibilities for riches and influence are even more intoxicating. "I knew from the start this company would be great," said Wayne Andrews, an analyst at Raymond James who has long encouraged investors to buy

DOJ_NMG_0119632

InterOil. “These guys have moved mountains. They’re working in an area with huge documented reservoirs of crude oil and natural gas. This is how fortunes are made.”

Critics disagree. The company’s history of disappointing results cause some to worry that not everything at InterOil is as it seems.

“This is a very questionable company,” said Peter J. Hodson, a senior portfolio manager at Sprott Asset Management who has both owned and bet against InterOil’s stock, but is not currently invested in the company. “These are not the types of people who are supposed to win the energy race.”

INTEROIL was born in 1994, when Mr. Mulacek, a Texas oilman, bought a small Alaskan oil refinery and decided to relocate it halfway around the world.

Mr. Mulacek, who declined repeated interview requests, founded his first energy company in 1981 while he was still an undergraduate at Texas Tech University. In 1990, according to an interview with The Australian, the newspaper, he was processing oil waste in war-torn Kuwait when he met a group of Chevron executives. Four years later, they invited him to Alaska on a fishing trip that also included a tour of a small refinery that Chevron was trying to sell.

At the time, oil refineries were not in high demand. Global petroleum development had slowed to a relative standstill as energy companies faced record low oil prices. But Mr. Mulacek saw in the Alaskan refinery a unique opportunity: although the rugged terrain of Papua New Guinea, 6,000 miles away, was known to house oil and gas reserves — in some places, visitors could squeeze rocks until their hands were coated with an oily residue — the country had no domestic refining capacity. Mr. Mulacek, who is described by acquaintances as a uniquely intense and driven businessman, bought the refinery and started the move.

To find investors to finance the purchase, he enlisted the aid of Gaylen J. Byker, an oil executive who he had met through mutual acquaintances. Mr. Byker was about to become president of Calvin College, an educational affiliate of the Christian Reformed Church that is based in Grand Rapids, Mich. (Mr. Byker still holds that position.) But before taking the reins at Calvin College, Mr. Byker incorporated a small company to invest in Mr. Mulacek’s refinery. A few months later, in mid-1995, Mr. Byker sold a portion of that company to his previous employer, the Offshore Energy Development Corporation.

When Offshore Energy went public a few months after that, Mr. Byker sold his shares for $1.6 million, according to securities filings. Five months later, Offshore Energy’s stock had declined by more than 73 percent, and Offshore Energy announced that it was for sale. In 1997, Titan Exploration, controlled by the deal maker Richard Rainwater, and an Enron subsidiary named JEDI (an entity later implicated in Enron’s bankruptcy) bought the company and its stake in Mr. Mulacek’s refinery.

By the time Titan entered the scene, Mr. Mulacek and Mr. Byker were scrambling to find cash to finance the refinery’s relocation, according to Mr. Byker. Foremost among potential financiers was the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, a federal agency also known as OPIC that offers American companies loans and insurance for foreign projects with strategic value to the United States.

By 1999, when InterOil’s talks with OPIC were announced, Papua New Guinea was struggling to maintain a fragile peace achieved only a year earlier when a treaty ended a popular revolt that had claimed 20,000 lives. The United States had promised more than $1 million in direct aid to help quell unrest. In 2001, OPIC agreed to lend InterOil $85 million to finance the refinery’s rebuilding.

By then, the project was almost 10 years old and reconstruction was almost complete. But the refinery failed to meet expectations: although it began in 2004 to process crude bought from other oil companies, and has produced millions of barrels of gasoline and other products, it has never sold any of it at a profit. InterOil has booked about $893 million in revenue over the last three years, largely by selling the refinery’s output. But the company reported increasing losses, posting a net loss of $37 million in 2005 alone, the last full year for which data are available.

“When crude was $30 a barrel, this refinery made a lot of sense,” said Mr. Byker, who still serves as an InterOil director. But the market for nontransportation fuels produced in the refining process, like naphtha, became less profitable as the price of crude rose, said Mr. Byker, causing InterOil’s earnings to suffer. The company has spent millions of dollars making the refinery more efficient, but thus far “it hasn’t worked out as we hoped,” he said.

A dearth of profits, however, did not stop InterOil from raising wads of money from investors. InterOil raised more than $125 million from shareholders and $318 million from debt holders between 2003 and 2005, according to securities filings. It did so based on assets that consist primarily of the refinery, which Mr. Byker said InterOil bought for less than $10 million, about 60 Papua New Guinean gas stations and a handful of oil and gas exploration projects.

The company’s executives and analysts say investors are willing to overlook InterOil’s losses because they believe that its oil and gas exploration activities will eventually pay off.

DOJ_NMG_0119633

"While there hasn't been any real success in the company's history, I think they're on the brink of something huge," said Mr. Andrews at Raymond James, one of the few Wall Street analysts who has consistently followed the company. "I know it's controversial, and when people bash the company, I can't really say they're wrong, but I think it's going to be a great investment. It's happened with other energy explorers before."

In the last seven years, InterOil has drilled major wells in at least eight locations in Papua New Guinea. At the beginning of many of those projects, InterOil executives announced impressive preliminary results. With wells bearing such robust and bullish names as "Rhino," "Sterling Mustang" and "Triceratops," InterOil has announced tentative oil finds that topped 1.3 billion barrels.

And, as has always been the case on Wall Street, rosy announcements often provide more than enough fuel to ignite a stock surge.

A dollar invested in the company's stock in January 2002, when InterOil first said it discovered a major new oil system in Papua New Guinea, would be worth nearly $11.50 today. (By comparison, $1 invested in ExxonMobil would be worth $2.10.) During that time InterOil insiders, including Mr. Mulacek and Mr. Byker, have exercised stock options worth millions of dollars, and hedge funds have sold large blocks of shares to smaller, retail buyers, according to interviews with some of these large investors.

But none of InterOil's wells have ever produced any significant amounts of oil, according to securities filings. Almost all of its petroleum wells are now capped or dormant. InterOil remains dependent on buying crude from other Papua New Guinea oil explorers and foreign companies that it then refines. Mr. Byker said the company has always been forthright about its exploration activities, and has always been explicit in public statements that its business projections may be wrong. "Those press releases were very carefully couched," Mr. Byker said.

InterOil's vice president for investor and public relations, Anesti Dermedgoglou, agreed. "There is often a difference between expectations and results in life," he said. "I can't help if investors get too excited. I don't control the stock price."

Mr. Byker added that throughout the company's history, InterOil insiders have held onto most of their stock, showing that they are as dedicated as the investors they approached.

The company has also always urged inside shareholders to be forthright about their purchases and sales of the company's stock, he said.

"We're all pretty well committed," said Mr. Byker, who personally owns shares worth more than $8 million. Mr. Mulacek holds shares worth more than $25 million, according to securities filings.

But Mr. Byker acknowledges that the company's convoluted, labyrinthine ownership structure makes it difficult to know exactly who owns what at InterOil. For instance, a portion of InterOil's shares are owned by a series of different entities that Mr. Mulacek and his family partially own. There are also a number of other entities partially owned or affiliated with Mr. Mulacek or Mr. Byker that own InterOil stock.

"The company grew up over a long period of time, and so there were a lot of different groups involved," Mr. Byker said. Although identified in filings as one of InterOil's largest shareholders, Mr. Byker said that "there are lots of other people involved with this company who own more than I do."

"But it's hard to tell who they are or who owns what," he added, "because they work through limited partnerships and offshore companies."

Such explanations have not satisfied some short-sellers and analysts, such as Ira Zadikow at Great Eastern Securities in New York and Mr. Hodson of Sprott Asset Management, who say the company's complicated ownership structure is worrisome.

InterOil has obtained millions of dollars in loans from Clarion Finanz AG, the investment firm of Carlo Civelli, a Swiss businessman who has worked with Mr. Mulacek since 1996 as an investor or adviser. Last year, InterOil announced that Clarion and Merrill Lynch had agreed to lend the company $130 million. Mr. Civelli has a long history as an investor in Canadian energy, mining and technology companies, where he often takes director posts.

In 1994, according to news reports, two inspectors working for the British government reviewing insider-trading allegations accused Mr. Civelli of improperly working with a broker to disguise stock sales of companies involved in takeover talks. The inspectors also examined financial transactions that they believed were "akin to a money-laundering operation," according to the reports, for possible links to Mr. Civelli. Mr. Civelli was never charged with any crimes by the British government, and Vancouver Stock Exchange officials who reviewed the report decided not to pursue their own investigation.

In an interview, Mr. Civelli said that he would have been criminally charged if there had been any real evidence of wrongdoing. "They were interested in destroying my reputation," he said. "They were not interested in the truth."

In a second, unrelated case earlier this year, Canadian securities regulators said Mr. Civelli had covertly helped another executive gain control of a publicly traded energy company after regulators had banned the executive from running any public companies. Mr. Civelli said the regulators' claims were false, and that he was simply helping to broker a stock deal. Canadian regulators have not charged Mr. Civelli with any wrongdoing in the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0119634

Merrill Lynch, which had a banking relationship with Enron and is now one of InterOil's major lenders, declined to discuss its relationship with Mr. Civelli or InterOil. For his part, Mr. Byker asserted that Mr. Civelli's problems had nothing to do with InterOil. "He's been a very reliable and straightforward person in everything involving InterOil," he said.

InterOil has had other entanglements with controversial figures. In 2004, Mr. Mulacek hired an investor relations executive named Carl Caserta, whom the Securities and Exchange Commission had barred from the securities industry almost two decades earlier, after he was accused of buying hundreds of thousands of stock shares for clients without their authorization. Mr. Caserta, who declined to speak on the record, stopped working for InterOil in 2005, according to his former employer, Lighthouse Capital Ltd.

Mr. Byker said the InterOil board was not aware of Mr. Caserta's history when he was retained. Mr. Dermedgoglou of InterOil said he was not aware that the firm had hired Mr. Caserta.

THE tangled corporate structure at InterOil, and the skein of financial and business relationships propping it up, might not have generated much attention if the company had not unfurled its November announcement about the Mississippi-sized natural-gas fields it had found in Papua New Guinea. The timing of the announcement was impeccable, arriving amid a global transformation in energy exploration.

For years, foreign development of natural gas lagged behind the search for other resources like petroleum, because low natural-gas prices did not generate much interest. But earlier in this decade, energy prices began rising and natural-gas exploration became much more attractive. Previously discovered but undeveloped gas fields in Qatar, Nigeria, Indonesia, Algeria, Australia, Iran, Egypt and Trinidad and Tobago began drawing interest. Analysts at Cambridge Energy Research Associates forecast that production of liquefied natural gas, or L.N.G., will more than double by 2012.

InterOil's blue-chip backers, all of whom declined to speak about the company, are betting that some of that enthusiasm will spill into Papua New Guinea. But if InterOil's gas find is to become a gold mine, someone needs to build a plant nearby that can convert natural gas into a liquid, so it can be easily transported.

While InterOil bought its refinery for just $10 million, L.N.G. plants are a tad more pricey: the cost of such facilities starts at about $4 billion.

"The name of the game is creating the infrastructure to bring reserves to market," said Michael Zenker at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "There's a tremendous appetite for L.N.G. projects, and companies and development banks are lining up. Where that money goes may have as much to do with hype and politics as economic logic."

Almost every country with untapped gas fields is racing to convince major energy companies, international lenders and third-world development organizations that its gas finds justify extraction. In November, when InterOil tentatively reported its discovery of 4 trillion to 11 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, the company also said it had lined up $130 million for pre-engineering work on a liquefied natural gas plant. But to win the energy race, it obviously will need to raise much more.

To that end, InterOil executives have enlisted Papua New Guinea's prime minister, Sir Michael Somare, and its energy minister, Sir Moi Avei, to convince investors and foreign governments that the nation deserves their help. At InterOil's urging, the country has changed its tax laws to make natural-gas investments more profitable. InterOil executives are circling the globe to pitch investors on the company's stock and a major new refinery project.

Some independent engineers and analysts say InterOil's efforts may pay off.

"They've been very open with their data, and at first glance you can't help but be amazed," said Robb Moss, a geologist at Acumen Capital Finance Partners in Calgary, Alberta, who has reviewed InterOil's published findings. Acumen is not an investor in the company.

"But until you drill a lot of wells, you can't really measure anything," Mr. Moss added. "It's almost impossible to accurately forecast anything at this stage."

Furthermore, analysts say, given the enormous amount of natural gas development occurring elsewhere, it is unclear if developing even a large discovery makes sense. InterOil critics note that Australia, a neighbor of Papua New Guinea, is already the fifth-largest producer of liquefied natural gas in the world, and is expected to more than double its production by 2015, according to the United States Department of Energy. Such concerns helped persuade a consortium of investors to pull out of plans to build a pipeline from Papua New Guinea to Australia in August.

"High gas prices have seduced investors into overlooking concerns," said Mr. Boland at Peters & Company. "Energy is always cyclical, and the natural-gas market is particularly fickle."

If InterOil can convince investors to back an L.N.G. plant, the company is almost certain to profit from the gas fields, analysts say, because it will make the deposits cheaper to develop than fields in other countries.

To that end, Mr. Mulacek is working hard. A few years ago, he flew with a handful of Papua New Guinea ministers to Trinidad, a nation that won the natural-gas lottery when a plant was constructed there in the late 1990s. Today, the energy industry is one of Trinidad's largest employers.

DOJ_NMG_0119635

"We're making our case to organizations like OPIC, who want to help impoverished countries, and to groups like Merrill Lynch and foreign investors, who are very interested," Mr. Byker said.

If InterOil succeeds, the company's shares, which closed on Friday at $26.20, may climb. If executives fail, or the discovered gas reserves turn out to be too small to justify a pipeline or plant, the company may, like Enron, simply disappear.

InterOil's executives are undaunted, and enthusiastic, about the challenges of striking it rich in Papua New Guinea.

"This is a beautiful island, filled with amazing jungles and rainforest, spectacular animals and birds that are like something out of storybooks," Mr. Byker said. "It's like an unknown frontier. These areas need visionaries. That's how dreams become real."

Why Backdated Options Might Be Contagious (NYT)

By Mark Hulbert

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

DIRECTORS of corporations often form a tight-knit community, serving at more than one company and creating what are known as interlocking boards of directors. As a result of this chumminess, corporate practices that otherwise might remain confined to just a few companies can spread quickly.

That appears to have been the case with the backdating of stock options, according to a new statistical study of publicly traded American companies.

The study's authors are two finance professors, John M. Bizjak of Portland State University in Oregon and Michael L. Lemmon of the University of Utah, as well as one of Professor Lemmon's graduate students, Ryan J. Whitby. A version of the study, "Option Backdating and Board Interlocks," is at papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract-id=946787.

Options backdating, of course, involves retroactively granting options to executives and directors on dates when a company's stock price was lower. The practice has favorable monetary, accounting and tax consequences for the companies themselves, as well as for the recipients. It isn't necessarily illegal, but it must be disclosed under federal securities law. Federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission are investigating numerous companies in connection with options backdating.

How did the practice become trendy in boardrooms across America? According to the study, a big part of the answer may be found in interlocking boards, which the researchers describe as the biggest conduit for transferring information about options backdating.

The study looked at publicly traded companies that granted options at any point from 1996 through 2002, and it particularly examined those that began to engage in options backdating during this time. The researchers found that the probability that a company would start the practice rose by a third to a half if one of its directors was also on the board of a company that was already backdating options. The range in these probabilities depended on various factors, including the number of directors who served on other companies' boards.

The researchers would not have been able to reach statistically meaningful results based only on the 120 or so companies that regulators have publicly identified as under investigation for possible options backdating. As a result, the sample was expanded to include other companies where the odds of having engaged in the practice were overwhelming, according to the researchers.

To identify these additional companies, they looked at the behavior of the companies' stocks in the days before and after the option grant dates. If the price of a company's stock fell substantially just before the grant date, then rose substantially immediately after, the researchers flagged the grant as suspicious. That's because the odds are extremely small, they say, that a company would randomly pick a date so conveniently sandwiched between a large price drop and a subsequent price hike. Even so, the researchers didn't assume that a company had engaged in backdating unless at least 20 percent of its option grants were suspicious.

In an interview, Professor Bizjak said that though this hurdle was quite high, surpassing it wasn't proof that a company backdated options. There is a small theoretical possibility, he said, that the company was just lucky in picking very favorable days for granting at least 20 percent of its options. But he and his fellow researchers are confident, he said, that the number of companies that backdated at least some options is close to the total reached in their study. He also noted that this number — around 1,400, or 43 percent of the publicly traded companies that granted options from 1996 to 2002 — was in line with estimates reached by other academic researchers.

IF these estimates are even modestly close to correct, there are hundreds of companies that engaged in options backdating but whose identities are not yet public. The study didn't identify any likely companies by name, but it showed investors how to do so themselves. Such insight could be valuable, because a company's stock typically drops when previously undisclosed backdating is belatedly made known.

DOJ_NMG_0119636

Professor Bizjak advises investors to check whether the boards of any companies in their portfolios are heavily interlocked with those of companies where backdating is already public knowledge. There is a markedly increased chance that such companies have also engaged in the practice, making their stocks vulnerable.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Calif. Zone Tops In Porn Arrests (FRESBEE)

By John Ellis, The Fresno Bee

Fresno Bee, January 21, 2007

Area including Fresno leads nation in exploitation indictments.

When it comes to fighting child exploitation, no part of the nation has put up statistical numbers like the federal law enforcement zone centered on Fresno and Sacramento.

Over the past two fiscal years — including the one that ended Sept. 30 — the Eastern District of California has indicted more people for child pornography, molestation and related crimes than any other federal law enforcement zone in the nation.

In the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30, the number was 71. In the one that preceded it, the total was 67.

"It's something we're very proud of," said McGregor W. Scott, U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of California.

Proud, but also surprised. Such information, Scott said, isn't published regularly, and for the most part the various federal districts around the nation are unaware of any statistical crime totals from outside their own region.

This particular recognition came last month, during a Washington, D.C., conference on Project Safe Childhood. During a speech, Associate Attorney General Bill Mercer — who holds the No. 3 position at the Justice Department — singled out the Eastern District of California, which runs from Kern County to the Oregon border, as the national leader in child exploitation indictments.

Assistant U.S. Attorney David Gappa, who specializes in child exploitation cases in Fresno's federal courthouse, said, "We're always just looking for a way we can do a case, rather than ways we can't do it."

Scott cited four primary reasons for the high numbers in his district:

Weak state laws. Until recently, Scott said, California had weak child pornography and child exploitation laws.

That changed somewhat in September, when Gov. Schwarzenegger signed a package of bills that, among other things, allows possession of child pornography to be charged as a felony and extends prison sentences for Internet luring.

Before that, Scott pointed out, the federal government "was the only game in town" for "egregious cases where men posed a real threat to children."

Outreach. During his first six months on the job, Scott said, he visited all 34 counties in California's Eastern District, talking to sheriffs and police chiefs at every stop.

Because of the state's weak laws, he stressed that law enforcement officials should send child pornography and child exploitation cases to the federal level for prosecution. They responded, he said.

Making it a priority. Studies done among inmates at federal penitentiaries found a connection between possession of child pornography and child molestation.

It prompted a policy change at the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Eastern District, labeling such crimes as "crimes of violence" and making prosecution of them a priority.

Momentum. In the end, a snowball effect happened as local and federal law enforcement and federal prosecutors saw the results of their efforts — long prison sentences for those convicted of child pornography or child exploitation crimes.

Gappa said the cooperation between agencies was key in the effort.

"We're fortunate to have aggressive prosecution, but we're also benefitting from high-quality investigations at agencies that have also made it a priority."

He specifically cited Clovis police, the Fresno County Sheriff's Department and the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement for their efforts.

Rick Eaton, assistant special agent in charge of the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Sacramento office — which oversees Fresno — agreed that cooperation between law enforcement agencies has been critical to the successful child exploitation efforts.

"I have never had a better working relationship in 30 years of law enforcement than with the U.S. Attorney's Office," Eaton said.

"It makes you want to cooperate with everybody else."

The reporter can be reached at jellis@fresnobee.comor (559) 441-6320.

DOJ_NMG_0119637

Violent Crime Falls Sharply In Providence (PROJO)

By Gregory Smith, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 21, 2007

PROVIDENCE — With a crew of streetworkers calming gang feuds and a gun task force invading criminal haunts, the frequency of murder has fallen to a historic low in Rhode Island's capital city.

The number of slayings fell by half last year and violent crime overall declined sharply, Police Chief Dean M. Esserman said, as improved law enforcement strategy and tactics such as the streetworkers and gun task force had a cumulative effect.

While 22 people were killed in 2005, that fell to 11 in 2006, which Esserman said last week is the fewest in 31 years.

Violent crimes decreased by 18.6 percent last year, according to preliminary figures in a police document obtained by The Providence Journal. The number of such crimes — homicide, rape, robbery and aggravated assault — fell from 1,145 to 932, a decrease of 213.

Mayor David N. Cicilline and the chief are scheduled to announce final numbers for 2006 tomorrow, including figures for property crime and total crime. Excepting murders, the final figures for violent crime may vary slightly from the preliminary figures.

Killings in Providence, the second most-populated city in New England, peaked at 30 in 2000, then declined to 23 in 2001 and 2002, to 20 in 2003, and then to 18 in 2004. The next year there was a spike, to 22, but then the number plummeted last year.

Esserman has no explanation for what he called "a blip" in killings and violent crime in 2005. But since he became chief in January 2003, he contends, a disciplined, dedicated and properly staffed Police Department has brought down both violent and property crimes.

"We have focused on crime as never before over the last four years," Esserman said last week. "Even though we worked very hard in 2005, there was some terrible violence that was hard for us to intercept. … I think our strategies are working" overall.

Those strategies, among others, include the government-subsidized streetworker program, in which paid youth workers from the nonprofit Institute for the Study and Practice of Nonviolence mediate conflicts and try to head off violence; a concerted effort to separate criminals from their guns; and community policing.

Community policing entails the decentralization of the police command to delegate more decision-making authority to captains and lieutenants in neighborhoods, and the enlistment of community groups, other agencies inside and outside law enforcement, and residents to help solve problems and prevent crimes.

The decrease in killings and violent crime in Providence runs contrary to a national trend over the past few years in which cities comparable to Providence and larger cities generally have seen an increase. The severity of the violence has gotten worse and teenagers are becoming criminals at a younger age, according to law enforcement experts.

Violent crime nationwide surged by 2.5 percent in 2005 — the highest rate of increase in 15 years — according to the FBI. And for the first six months of 2006, violent crime was up nearly 4 percent. The FBI does not yet have a figure for the entire year.

Although a reason sometimes is never found, slayings generally stem from the illicit drug trade, money or street disputes and personal relationships that sour, such as cases of domestic violence. Gang activity can be a direct factor, although the police say gang-related violence in Providence has diminished, in part because of a gang task force that predates Esserman's tenure.

None of the 2006 homicide victims in Providence was younger than 20 years old, a phenomenon in which Teny Gross, director of the Institute for the Study and Practice of Nonviolence, takes some pride.

"We work on small conflicts. We don't wait for them to become huge," he said of the streetworkers.

"A lot of little detail works. If a kid gets robbed, we're trying to mediate, trying to get stuff returned."

"As a salesperson of a positive lifestyle," Gross said, "I still have very little to offer" compared with the lure of the streets and the camaraderie of gangs. Investing in youth programs pays off in the long run with a reduction in crime and other benefits, he said.

The streetworker program began in August 2003 with three streetworkers and expanded to five in 2005. Gross did a flurry of hiring in 2006, boosting his crew to 13, and he said the larger complement had an effect. But he cautioned that he is having trouble paying for them.

One of the factors in the decline in violent crime over time is fewer shootings, which fell to 44 in 2006. There were 105 people shot in 2002, 92 in 2003, 73 in 2004 and 65 in 2005. A five-member gun task force, according to Esserman, has had an impact.

Task force members watch criminal hangouts, waiting for suspects to do something suspicious so they can confront and frisk them in the hopes of finding a gun. However, more firearms actually are seized by the police Narcotics and Organized Crime Bureau in the course of drug investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0119638

The U.S. Justice Department collaborates with the city police, arranging for the assignment of agents from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to work on gun crime. Everyone caught with a gun is interviewed by a federal agent to determine if the suspect is eligible for federal prosecution, according to Esserman.

Gun-carrying criminals are dealt with more harshly in the federal criminal justice system than in the state system, with longer sentences and incarceration in prisons far away from family and friends. Although the federal system has a provision for sentence reduction called "good time," there is no parole.

A properly sized police force also has made a difference, according to Esserman.

"Most [sizeable] police departments in the country have suffered significant attrition in the last four years," Esserman said. For example, he pointed out, the New York City police force was reduced by several thousand officers, Boston by several hundred and New Haven, Conn., by several dozen.

The chief credited the mayor and City Council for maintaining Providence's force of 494, which currently has no vacancies.

"There is no me" in the anticrime achievements, said Esserman, who thanked state and federal officials and other groups that he counts as the department's partners. "There's only we."

"We have focused on crime as never before over the last four years."

Dean M. Esserman,

Providence police chief

"We have focused on crime as never before over the last four years."

Dean M. Esserman,

Providence police chief

WHO IS R. LINDLEY DeVECCHIO? (HTRIB)

By CAROL E. LEE

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), January 21, 2007

SARASOTA -- By the time R. Lindley DeVecchio settled in Sarasota, his days at the FBI had become gangland lore.

He worked Brooklyn turf alongside storied undercover agents like "Donnie Brasco," back when mobsters gunned each other down in the streets and children stumbled upon bullet-riddled corpses while playing outside.

Having sealed up a 33-year career with the FBI, DeVecchio bought a courtyard-style home set among hammocks of palms in virtually crime-free Palmer Ranch. He became a grandfather. He got elected president of a homeowners association where the major issue is landscaping.

And then he got indicted for murder.

The supervisory special agent who helped bring down the leaders of New York City's five organized crime families now faces four 25-years-to-life prison sentences in what a prosecutor at the Brooklyn District Attorney's Office has called "one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the history of this country."

As he awaits another pretrial hearing this month, DeVecchio, 66, has also been busy tending to some local matters, leading the search for a property manager at his deed-restricted community and coordinating elections to the homeowners association.

Some 1,200 miles north, in the chambers of a small Brooklyn courtroom, sits the bane of his golden years.

The foot-thick case file charges that when DeVecchio was investigating organized crime in the 1980s and 1990s, he gave a legendary capo in the Colombo family the addresses of his enemies and details about whom among his crew might be a rat.

The leaks led to the shooting deaths of a young woman, an 18-year-old kid, a mobster flirting with born-again Christianity and a bus company employee, court documents say.

DeVecchio, who declined to speak publicly about his pending trial or his life in Sarasota, pleaded not guilty to all four counts of second-degree murder at his March 30 arraignment in Brooklyn State Supreme Court.

And a 1994 internal Justice Department investigation into similar accusations found he had done nothing wrong.

"We deny the allegations in as strong a language as you can possibly deny anything," said one of DeVecchio's lawyers, Mark Bederow. "He's being falsely accused of the worst crimes imaginable."

But Brooklyn prosecutors say DeVecchio became too entwined with top-echelon informant Gregory Scarpa Sr., a "made" Colombo family mobster who once boasted that he stopped counting the number of murders he committed after reaching 50.

DeVecchio, prosecutors say, fed Scarpa confidential FBI information that kept the Colombo consigliere out of jail and helped him take out rivals. He took weekly payments in return and extracted inside information about the Mafia that aided his rise in the bureau, court files allege.

New York tabloids have since branded DeVecchio a "rogue," and his court appearances are main events. There, the case generates the pomp of blue-ribbon kinds on which prosecutors make names for themselves.

Here in Sarasota, DeVecchio's presence mostly goes unnoticed.

Taking the occasional note and wearing a sticker name tag, he sat quietly through a two-hour community meeting last week, where residents gave out certificates for best holiday decorations and a sheriff's deputy explained how he handles teenage disturbances.

In DeVecchio's community, Savannah at Turtle Rock, the rare mention of his legal woes falls on shrugged shoulders. His neighbors do not pry.

"It's not an issue. The folks here -- which is very, very nice -- judge you for what you're doing," said Ron Mingst, who lives next door to DeVecchio, whom he met at a New Jersey gym about five years ago. "You're doing a good job in the community. You're doing a good job as president of our association. That's what they see."

From clerk to agent

In 1963, DeVecchio was 23, with a political science degree from George Washington University and a clerk's job in J. Edgar Hoover's FBI. Scarpa was in his initial years as an informant.

DeVecchio became an agent a few years later and soon specialized in organized crime at the bureau's New York City office.

"He was one of the best informant analysts that we had," said James Kossler, one of DeVecchio's former bosses. "He was very good at developing informants and getting information that we needed."

Informants are paid FBI sources who are not allowed to participate in criminal activities without permission from the bureau.

But Gregory "The Grim Reaper" Scarpa dabbled in a medley of crimes: loan sharking, drug dealing, burglary, illegal gambling and murder.

One of his attorneys once told The New Yorker magazine that Scarpa being an FBI informant was as inconceivable as finding out that "Mother Teresa is assisting Saddam Hussein."

Handling the mobster was a touchy endeavor, and the FBI had a falling out with him in the mid-1970s.

DeVecchio brought Scarpa back into the fold in 1980 after getting permission from the bureau.

The charismatic agent with curly, dark hair and a mustache became the only one in the bureau to deal with the informant.

"Scarpa immediately became an important source of information in connection with the FBI's war on organized crime because he was highly placed in the Colombo crime family," DeVecchio stated in court records. "Moreover, Scarpa understood the inner workings of the Colombo crime family."

DeVecchio's informant finesse helped then-U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani jail leaders of the city's Cosa Nostra in the celebrated 1986 Commission case.

"Without Lin or without that informant, we wouldn't have been able to accomplish what we did," Kossler said.

But the Brooklyn District Attorney's office says that over the course of their 12-year relationship, Scarpa also gave DeVecchio rolls of rubber-band bound cash for confidential information, and DeVecchio kept $66,598 of FBI money intended for Scarpa.

DeVecchio has said he never took more than small gifts from Scarpa, such as a pan of lasagna and a Cabbage Patch doll when they were popular and scarce. He vehemently denies intentionally giving any information to Scarpa that could have led to the murders of which he stands accused.

"At no time did I ever instruct Scarpa to murder anyone," DeVecchio stated in an affidavit. "Nor did I ever conspire with him to plan any murder."

The murders

In late September 1984, DeVecchio walked up the four steps leading to Scarpa's two-story home on Avenue J in Brooklyn and suggested he "take care of" the girlfriend of Alphonse Persico, a fugitive and the brother of the Colombo family boss, court documents charge.

He said 31-year-old Mary Bari had talked to federal agents and might reveal the location of Persico, prosecutors allege.

A few days later, Scarpa and his crew lured Bari to a Brooklyn bar with the promise of a job offer. As she entered the club, one of them allegedly slid his arm around her and pushed her to the floor. She was shot three times in the head, the case charges.

Prosecutors say DeVecchio gave Scarpa a similar tip a year and a half later. He told him that one of his crewmen, Joseph DeDomenico, 44, had cut him out of profits from robbing jewelry and fur stores, and could be a liability because he was dating a born-again Christian, court documents allege. Being born again was one step from being a rat, prosecutors say Scarpa later told his right-hand man, and he ordered DeDomenico killed.

DeVecchio again warned Scarpa of a potential snitch among his ranks in May 1990, prosecutors charge. And a couple of Scarpa soldiers later shot 18-year-old Patrick Porco in the head and dumped his body on a street corner, the case alleges.

A bloody internal war broke out in the Colombo family the following year, in the wake of its boss's imprisonment.

DOJ_NMG_0119640

DeVecchio was a supervisor of the FBI squad investigating the Colombo family. Scarpa continued to pick off rivals.

One of them was Lorenzo Lampasi, 66, whom he shot with a rifle outside his Brooklyn home after DeVecchio gave Scarpa his address, prosecutors charge.

The war lasted about a year. Nearly a dozen people died.

Retired to Florida

Scarpa was convicted on gun charges in 1992. The FBI ordered DeVecchio to cut ties.

Around the same time, some of DeVecchio's colleagues began to question the orthodoxy of his relationship with Scarpa, who died in prison in 1994 while serving time for murder and racketeering.

The department conducted a two-year investigation and found DeVecchio innocent.

He retired from the FBI in October 1996.

He sold his home in Dumont, N.J., where he had lived for decades, and moved to Sarasota in 2004.

Here, he blends in as a typical retiree. He belongs to a motorcycle club. And like many who have chartered a new beginning in paradise, he shoots the breeze over the fence with his neighbor, Mingst, about their home building woes.

His prospects for another term on the homeowners' board appears untainted by the lawsuit. No one else has volunteered for the job, although the 82 homeowners probably would have elected DeVecchio anyway.

"No one has come up to me and wanted to discuss the situation, and I've never even heard that someone would say that we want to remove him from the board," said Burke Terhune, the board's secretary.

But for DeVecchio, the trial looms.

Unless he gets permission from a judge -- as he did to watch the July Fourth fireworks at Sarasota Bay -- he can always be found inside his three-bedroom home during a mandated curfew from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m.

He wears an electronic monitoring anklet. He has had to notify a judge of his plans to lunch with his fiancée, get a haircut or peruse the Ellenton outlet mall. And this summer he had to reschedule a homeowners board meeting because it conflicted with a court appearance.

DeVecchio simply told the group he had to "go and testify," Terhune said.

"It seemed like it was New York City or someplace. He said the next meeting will be at this time, if it's OK with the rest of you," Terhune said.

No one asked questions.

ANTITRUST:

Some Speculate On Future Of P-I, Purchase By Black (SEATIMES)

By Eric Pryne, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, January 21, 2007

Could David Black save the P-I?

With a decision looming in four months that might spell the beginning of the end for the smaller of Seattle's two daily newspapers, some speculate Black could ride to the Post-Intelligencer's rescue.

He kept an endangered daily alive before under similar circumstances, they note, in Honolulu.

Liz Brown, administrative officer for the Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild, said she mentioned the possibility to Don Kendall, who heads Black Press' new King County operations, at a meeting last month.

"I told him, 'You could save the day again,' " said Brown, whose union represents workers at both Seattle papers.

But Kendall said he's never discussed buying or printing the P-I with Black. What's more, he added, Seattle isn't Honolulu.

Here's the P-I's situation, and how Black conceivably could factor into it.

The P-I has pretty much been only a newsroom since 1983. That's when its owner, The Hearst Corp., entered into a federally sanctioned joint operating agreement (JOA) with The Seattle Times Co.

The Times prints, circulates and sells the advertising for both papers. In return, it gets most of the proceeds. But it has maintained in recent years that it is losing money under the arrangement and moved in 2003 to trigger an escape clause in the contract.

Hearst has said the P-I couldn't survive outside the JOA. It also says The Times' loss claims aren't valid.

After years of litigation, the companies agreed last spring to submit their dispute to binding arbitration. The arbitrator is scheduled to rule by May 31.

If The Times wins, the agreement calls for Hearst to shut down the P-I in six to 12 months. In return, it would get 32 percent of The Times' profits until 2083, when the JOA expires.

To comply with antitrust laws, however, the U.S. Justice Department or federal judges almost certainly would require Hearst to put the P-I up for sale before closing it. That's what happened in Hawaii in 2000.

The owner of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin had announced that, in return for a cash payout, it would close its paper and dissolve its JOA with the larger Honolulu Advertiser. After the courts stepped in, the Star-Bulletin was put up for sale

The Star-Bulletin then — like the P-I today — had no presses, no advertising sales force and no circulation network. "It was essentially a startup business," said Wayne Cahill of the Hawaii Newspaper Guild.

But Black stepped in when no one else in the industry would, buying the paper for $10,000 and building up the business and production end from scratch. Kendall, who headed Black's Hawaii operations at the time, says it wouldn't have happened if the company hadn't also been able to buy an Oahu weekly with presses that became the foundation for the Star-Bulletin's new printing operation.

In almost every other U.S. city, the dissolution of a JOA has meant the death of a paper. In Honolulu, the Star-Bulletin survives.

Black could do the same thing in Seattle, Brown and others say. The Times-Hearst arbitration agreement acknowledges Hearst could still collect its 32 percent of The Times' profits, even if it sells the P-I to a buyer willing to publish the paper outside the JOA.

Kendall said he doesn't know whether the Kent press Black acquired as part of the King County Journal Newspapers purchase is big enough to print the P-I. What's more, he said, he hasn't asked: "In this region, our focus is on community newspapers."

But others say it would be possible, perhaps by adding capacity at Kent and contracting out part of the press run.

"It's a business opportunity he [Black] might well be interested in," said Cahill, who once worked in The Times' circulation department.

The Seattle situation isn't identical to Honolulu's. For one, powerful political forces in Hawaii lined up to save the Star-Bulletin. That hasn't happened — at least not yet in Seattle.

Publishing the P-I would require a huge investment on Black's part, not just in equipment but in people, said John Morton, a leading national newspaper analyst.

"It would be a very daunting prospect," he said.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Blueprint To Beautify, Restore Yosemite Tangled Up In Court (SFC)

By Chuck Squatriglia, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 21, 2007

When the Merced River overran its banks and scoured Yosemite National Park a decade ago, many saw an unprecedented opportunity to restore the iconic park and cede more of the Yosemite Valley to nature.

A plan by the National Park Service to reinvent the valley and another to protect the Merced River drew broad support from environmentalists, the public and the government. Years of acrimonious debate over how to manage a crown jewel of America's national park system gave way to a consensus that the Park Service had finally gotten it right.

Yet 10 years after the flood, both plans remain tied up in court, challenged by a small but passionate group of activists who argue that the Park Service would render Yosemite an exclusive resort. A federal judge has rejected the river plan, the future of the valley plan is uncertain and, with several projects planned for the valley brought to a halt, frustrated park officials worry they'll be told to begin the planning process anew.

But many of the environmentalists who championed the plans have moved on to other issues. Public, not to mention governmental, priorities have shifted. There is mounting concern that the broad support for remaking Yosemite is gone.

"We are rapidly approaching a point where a historic opportunity will become a lost opportunity," said Jay Watson, who as regional director of the Wilderness Society was intimately involved in shaping the park plans before leaving the organization two years ago. "Everything was aligned. I'm not sure a similar effort could be mounted again."

The flood devastated Yosemite Valley during the first three days of 1997. The Merced River, swollen by rain and melting snow, raced past Pohono Bridge at 187,000 gallons per second and crested at 16 feet.

The water ripped up roads, washed out bridges and ruined the park's water and sewer systems. It felled trees, inundated cabins and swamped campgrounds. What wasn't soaked was carried away. Picnic tables, bear-resistant food lockers and even tent cabins washed up miles downstream.

DOJ_NMG_0119642

Bruce Babbitt, Interior secretary at the time of the disaster, called Yosemite "a national treasure" and vowed to rebuild. Congress appropriated $220.5 million for the task.

The Park Service had for decades worried that the place John Muir called "the incomparable valley" was being overwhelmed. Yosemite covers 1,169 square miles, but 95 percent of the 3.5 million or so people who visit each year don't venture out of Yosemite Valley, which is 7 miles long and 1 mile wide. So in 1980, the Park Service produced a blueprint, called the General Management Plan, to curtail traffic and push development to the park periphery. It was shelved for lack of money and political will.

The flood provided both.

Flush with cash, the Park Service used the general plan to frame the Yosemite Valley Plan released in March 2000. It outlined 250 projects that would reduce traffic, reclaim developed land and restore ecosystems at a cost of $442 million. It would, officials said, reduce the development footprint in the valley.

The valley plan came three months after the Park Service, responding to a 1999 federal court order, completed a plan to protect the Merced River, which wends 81 miles through the park.

Together, the documents provided an ambitious blueprint to reinvent Yosemite. The Wilderness Society, the National Parks Conservation Association, the American Alpine Club and the Natural Resources Defense Council eagerly endorsed them.

"We believed (the plans) would provide a strong and environmentally sound groundwork for the park's future and make, at long last, real progress toward fulfilling the goals of the original General Management Plan to restore the valley," defense council attorney Johanna Wald said recently.

Californians, too, overwhelmingly approved of the plans, according to a statewide poll commissioned by the defense council shortly after the plans were announced.

But two small environmental organizations, Friends of Yosemite Valley and Mariposans for Environmentally Responsible Growth, opposed the plans. They sued, arguing that the Merced River Plan was hastily written, used flawed data and favored development.

U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii agreed and rejected the plan in July. He ordered the Park Service to draft a new plan, a process the Park Service says will take 33 months. In October, Ishii shut down several construction projects until the new plan is drafted.

The U.S. Justice Department is expected to announce it will appeal Ishii's rulings, but now finds itself defending the Yosemite Valley Plan as well.

The plaintiffs filed another lawsuit on Dec. 28, arguing that the valley plan should be tossed because it was based upon a General Management Plan that was never adopted and a Merced River Plan that was invalidated.

"Yosemite should take a deep breath and do the work needed to develop a legally compliant river plan, and then use that to develop a valley plan," said Greg Adair, executive director of Friends of Yosemite Valley. He said the organization has several hundred active members, most of whom live in the communities surrounding Yosemite and visit the park regularly.

He praises the Park Service for developing an "excellent" wilderness management plan and said the plaintiffs simply want the agency to apply the same effort to the river and valley plans.

"If they would draft a solid Merced River plan and give it a chance, and then come back and draft the valley plan so it respects the river and works toward protection, we would step back and agree with it," he said. "But until they do that, we'll be in conflict."

The issue goes far deeper than the nuts and bolts of two highly technical documents. It is a fundamental question of how to manage the park, and the plaintiffs disagree with the Park Service on almost every point.

They believe the Park Service has crafted a plan to urbanize Yosemite and create a theme park resort. They argue it will expand Yosemite Lodge, cede the valley to tour buses and push traditional campers aside in favor of RVs. They say the plan does little to restore the valley's beauty.

Adair insists that he recognizes the Park Service must serve a broad constituency, but argues it has failed to do so.

"We see the proposals at Yosemite as benefiting the wealthy and the corporate interests over the people," he said. "It's mass-transit, tour-bus tourism."

The plaintiffs' reading of the plans stuns park officials and their supporters. Yosemite Superintendent Mike Tollefson says Adair's claims are "so bogus."

"Before the flood, we had twice the number of rooms at the lodge," he said. "Cutting the number of rooms in half is not urbanization. We've lost more than 300 camping spaces. That's not urbanization. We've got a plan to move 600 more employees out of the valley. That's not urbanization. We've got a shuttle system that gets people out of their cars. That's not urbanization."

Tollefson is proud of the work that was accomplished before Judge Ishii pulled the plug. Lower Yosemite Falls was remade with almost a mile of trails, five footbridges and other amenities. Sixty-eight acres of meadowland were restored. The park's dilapidated sewer system was rebuilt. Two dams spanning the Merced River were removed. A fleet of 18 hybrid shuttle buses replaced the park's entire diesel fleet.

DOJ_NMG_0119643

The park is "standing tall," Tollefson said, but he's frustrated that he hasn't done more since he was named superintendent four years ago. And he wonders how much longer his hands will be tied by litigation that has already cost the park as much as $15 million.

"They have squandered a lot of money and time," he said of the plaintiffs. "But the opportunity hasn't been totally squandered. We're dedicated to improving the resource and the visitor experience. The idea that B.J. Griffin, superintendent at the time of the flood, put forth was 'We need to put it back, so let's put it back better than it was.' She started that work, and it's been very frustrating that we haven't been able to finish."

Yosemite since the flood of '97

Heavy rain and snowmelt caused the Merced River to overrun its banks, flooding Yosemite Valley during the first three days of 1997. Ongoing litigation has halted several projects launched in the wake of the flood. Here's a look at the valley since the flood:

Lower Yosemite Falls

The park installed nearly 1 mile of paved trails, five footbridges, small stone amphitheater, new restrooms and other amenities to make it easier to navigate the park's most popular feature. The $13.5 million project was completed in 2005.

Yosemite Lodge

250 low- and moderately-priced rooms in cabins and cottages lost in the flood will not be replaced, and the land will be restored. Eighty-eight lodge rooms will be removed and replaced with 90 new rooms.

Lower and Upper River campgrounds

262 campsites were lost in the flood and will be replaced with sites outside the valley.

Cook's Meadow and Stoneman Meadow (numbered on map)

Asphalt trails were replaced with wood boardwalks traversing the meadows, and fill-dirt and invasive species were removed, restoring 68 acres of meadowland between 2003 and 2006.

Lower Pines

103 campsites destroyed in the flood will be replaced with sites elsewhere in the park.

Upper Pines

The park hopes to create 39 RV campsites and 59 traditional campsites.

Curry Village

Employee housing provided in tent cabins has been replaced with 27 buildings providing 219 beds.

Happy Isles footbridge

Heavily damaged in a 1996 rockslide and further damaged in the flood, it was removed in 2000 and has not yet been replaced.

Happy Isles dam

Small, obsolete hydroelectric dam was removed in 2004.

Other projects

Park sewer system: Completely overhauled in 2003.

Water and utility lines: Had crisscrossed the valley floor underground; were consolidated into one trench since last year.

Hybrid shuttle buses: Fleet of 18 replaced the park's diesel buses in 2005.

Shuttle bus stops: Erected at Yosemite Falls, Sentinel Bridge, LeConte Memorial Lodge, Awahnee Hotel and the Valley Visitor Center between 2004 and 2006.

Cascades Dam: Obsolete hydroelectric dam just west of the valley was removed in 2004.

Campsites: The park hopes to add as many as 800 outside the valley, including the 365 lost in the flood.

Sources: ESRI, TeleAtlas, USGS

The Chronicle

E-mail Chuck Squatriglia at csquatriglia@sfchronicle.com.

Page A - 1

One Tribal Family Lost Two Members In Unsolved Cases (YHR)

By Phil Ferolito, YAKIMA HERALD-REPUBLIC

Yakima (WA) Herald Republic, January 21, 2007

Authorities still have no clue about what happened to Donnie Sampson.

The 71-year-old Yakama tribal official left early Oct. 30, 1994, for the Wilson Charlie-Dry Creek area, one of his favorite hunting spots near Mount Adams.

Three days later, authorities found his 1992 four-wheel drive pickup in more than a foot of snow near the mouth of Holdaway Meadows north of Mount Adams in the closed area of the Yakama reservation.

A rifle, pickup keys, extra clothing and a sack lunch were found inside his truck, but no trace of Sampson, a member of the Yakama Nation Code of Ethics Committee, a watchdog board of tribal government.

His disappearance puzzled family and tribal authorities. A massive search involving helicopters, snowmobiles, dogs and nearly 100 people found no trace of him, and seven years later he was presumed dead, according to the Yakima County Coroner's Office.

His disappearance isn't the only grief his family suffers. Two years earlier, the body of Sampson's 30-year-old daughter, Shari Dee Sampson Elwell, was found strangled and sexually mutilated in an area not far from where her father later disappeared.

The family hadn't seen her for weeks before a group of hunters found her body.

Her death, which remains unsolved, capped a decade-long string of mysterious deaths involving at least a dozen women -- all but two were tribal members -- on the 1.2-million-acre Yakama reservation.

Those cases are just two of an unknown number involving either unsolved deaths or missing tribal members here.

It's hard to say just how many unsolved cases exist because case files are dispersed among tribal, federal, state and county law enforcement agencies, says Yakama tribal police Chief Davis Washines.

How cases are classified on the reservation often determines which jurisdiction they fall under, he says.

If it's classified a homicide on tribal land, it goes to the FBI. If it's a missing tribal member or accidental death, tribal police take it. If it's a death caused by an auto accident, either the Washington State Patrol or Yakima County Sheriff's Office could take it.

Without any central filing system, though, it's hard for tribal police to discern which cases remain unsolved or have been closed, says Washines, who worked on some of the cases in the rash of women's deaths that spanned the 1980s.

Washines says tribal detectives are now working with the FBI not only to determine the number of unsolved deaths here, but also to update the number of missing persons.

"It may be quite an extensive list," he says.

When it comes to the number of unsolved homicides on the reservation, federal authorities have provided conflicting information.

Last spring, they said only one homicide remained unsolved here, but later changed the number to possibly two.

Finally, FBI spokesman Ray Lauer in Seattle said the number of unsolved cases including deaths or missing people could be as high as 32, a number Smiskin estimates dating back to the early 1970s.

Reports gathered by the Yakima Herald-Republic nearly two decades ago accounted for at least 13 mysterious deaths here involving women, many of them classified as homicides. Now, those cases and others are the focus of a cold case review sparked by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Newspaper reports during the early 1990s reflected that tribal members and some investigators weren't convinced the FBI was doing all it could to solve the cases.

But FBI officials say that's not what happened. They say they had suspects in some of those cases, but they didn't have enough evidence to convict and the cases were subsequently closed, Lauer says.

FBI officials recently promised to discuss the unsolved cases involving women with the Yakima Herald-Republic, but changed their mind, saying they first needed to review the cases and couldn't say how long it would take.

Because of the lack of any central filing system on criminal cases on reservations, it's difficult to assess the FBI's efforts on Indian reservations in general or compile any statistics, says Gary Edwards, president of the national Native American Law Enforcement Association, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit organization that represents tribal police.

"It's still a problem that is going to have to be looked at," he says. "There hasn't been a clear boundary of who reports what to which agency."

Concurring with Edwards, Washines also blames much of it on a lack of resources and ability to conduct thorough follow-up investigations.

While describing the working relationship with the FBI as "generally good," Washines admits that the agency many times was shorthanded and often tribal police were left to investigate homicides.

"Which we did, which we were very successful in providing information to the Department of Justice office," he says. "I think the lack of resources, our ability to do a real thorough follow-up and our communication could have been better."

DOJ_NMG_0119645

Blinding Ourselves In Space (NYT)

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

You don't have to be a space or climate expert to recognize that this country's ability to track climate and environmental changes from space is heading in the wrong direction. At a time when concerns about global warming are rising, the Bush administration is sharply reducing the number of satellites that can measure the impact of rising temperatures and a host of other environmental trends.

The administration's hypocrisy is stunning. For years, the president and top officials have justified their refusal to grapple seriously with global warming by insisting that more research is needed. Now, after pledging that such research would be the centerpiece of a new climate change strategy, the administration is underfinancing some of the most important efforts to gather data.

A report issued last week by the National Academy of Sciences projected an alarming decline in vital studies and monitoring. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration currently has a sizable number of Earth-observing satellites and instruments in orbit, but since 2000 its budget for earth sciences has decreased over 30 percent when adjusted for inflation.

By 2010, the number of operating sensors and instruments on NASA satellites that observe the Earth is likely to drop by 40 percent as old equipment fails and is not promptly replaced. Meanwhile, at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, huge cost overruns and technical problems have delayed planned launchings of key climate and weather-monitoring satellites and forced the elimination of instruments essential for climate science.

The setbacks are bound to hobble efforts to understand whether hurricanes and heat waves are becoming more frequent and intense, whether ice sheets will collapse and drive sea levels dangerously high, and how fish stocks, deforestation, drinking water supplies and air pollution are affected as populations grow and economies take off. We clearly need more data in coming years, not less.

The academy's panel estimates that some $7.5 billion in new money is needed through 2020, mostly at NASA, to conduct high-priority observational missions. NASA's resources are already grievously overextended. It must finish building the international space station, keep flying the rickety shuttle fleet and start developing a follow-on spacecraft to explore the Moon and get ready to travel to Mars.

With little new money to carry out these costly tasks, the agency has been forced to rein in other parts of its budget, including earth science studies. Unless Congress gives NASA more funds, the agency should shift money internally to give Earth observations higher priority. Studies that could affect the livability of the planet seem vastly more consequential than completing a space station or returning to the Moon by an arbitrary date.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Officials Laud Transfer Of Mexican Drug Suspects (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 20 -- The extradition to the United States of four major drug traffickers, including Osiel Cardenas Guillen, head of the powerful Gulf cartel, was hailed Saturday by U.S. officials as a signal of a new era of cooperation.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called the extraditions "unprecedented," and the U.S. ambassador to Mexico, Antonio O. Garza Jr., proclaimed the transfer "a monumental moment in our two nations' battle with the vicious drug traffickers and criminals who threaten our very way of life."

For years, U.S. officials have criticized Mexico as a sometimes-difficult partner in the war against drugs because of its reluctance to extradite top drug lords to the United States. Mexico has long refused to extradite suspects who might face the death penalty. In 2001, Mexico's Supreme Court also barred extraditions of suspects facing possible life sentences, which were considered "cruel and unusual punishment" here. But the court reversed itself in November 2005, clearing the way for higher-profile extraditions. The ruling did not affect death penalty cases.

C?rdenas, who was suspected of running his drug empire from his prison cell, was one of 15 people extradited late Friday. A swaggering figure, he is known for his gold-plated rifle and for currying favor with the poor by lavishing children with thousands of dollars' worth of toys, cakes and milk.

C?rdenas faces drug distribution charges in southern Texas and is also charged with assaulting and threatening to kill agents of the FBI and the Drug Enforcement Administration, as well as a sheriff's deputy. Two brothers, Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero -- both former high-ranking members of the Arellano Felix drug cartel -- face drug trafficking and money laundering charges in Southern California. Hector "El Guero" Palma Salazar, a former top figure in the Chapo Guzman-Guero Palma cartel, also faces drug distribution charges in Southern California.

DOJ_NMG_0119646

Mexico extradited a record 63 suspects to the United States in 2006. But the administration of President Vicente Fox, who left office Dec. 1, was criticized for failing to turn over large numbers of high-ranking drug lords.

The latest extraditions coincide with a major crackdown on drug gangs in Mexico by the administration of President Felipe Calderon, who has been using the military to swarm regions of the country plagued by brazen violence, including beheadings. In the hours before the extraditions were announced, Calderon dispatched more than 7,000 soldiers to Acapulco, where drug violence threatens the lucrative tourist market. The offensive is the third ordered by Calderon, who also has sent troops to Tijuana and the state of Michoacan.

"Calderon is sending a message that he is going to be firm in combating the drug cartels. But on the other hand, the extraditions also allow him to get rid of hot potatoes from the Mexican penal system," said Jorge Chabat, an expert in Mexican criminal justice.

Mexico's prisons, which are notoriously corrupt, have struggled to handle drug kingpins. Mexico's most powerful drug lord, Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, escaped from prison in 2001 and remains at large despite a U.S. government reward for information leading to his arrest.

Mexican drug cartels have become some of the most powerful and violent in the world. Between 70 and 90 percent of cocaine destined for the United States passes through Mexico, according to the U.S. State Department's Bureau for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs.

Drug gangs are suspected in more than 2,000 killings in Mexico last year, including dozens of police officers and local political officials. Chabat said the cartels would probably respond to the extraditions with more killings.

Reputed Drug Lords Extradited To U.S. (WT/AP)

By Lisa J. Adams

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY -- Mexico has extradited a purported drug-cartel boss and three other reputed major traffickers to the United States, a move that Washington yesterday called "unprecedented" in the cross-border fight against organized crime.

Osiel Cardenas, the purportedGulf cartel leader who was thought still to be running his gang from jail in Mexico, was sent north Friday along with 13 others wanted by U.S. authorities after their appeals against extradition ran out, the office of Mexico's attorney general said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales praised Mexican President Felipe Calderon yesterday for the extradition, saying the United States had never before received from Mexico such a large number of drug suspects and others wanted for prosecution in the United States.

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," Mr. Gonzales said yesterday.

In the past, Mexico has been reluctant to extradite major Mexican drug lords to the United States, arguing they should face justice here first.

Officials also refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is barred in Mexico.

But that attitude changed under President Vicente Fox, who last September promised to extradite "all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice."

Mr. Fox extradited a record 63 reputed criminals to the United States in 2006 alone, including suspected drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix of the Tijuana-based Arellano Felix gang.

Mr. Calderon, who took office Dec. 1, promised to increase the flow drug-trafficking suspects sent to the United States and to do his share to fight the organized crime that has infiltrated all aspects of Mexican society, including nearly every level of law enforcement and government.

U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza said the latest extradition demonstrated the "courage and conviction" of Mexico's president, attorney general and law enforcement officers.

"Today, both the Mexican and the American people can celebrate a monumental moment in our two nations' battle with the vicious drug traffickers and criminals who threaten our very way of life," Mr. Garza said in a statement Friday night.

In addition to Cardenas, Mexico extradited Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers and former chiefs in the Arellano Felix cartel in Tijuana and Mexicali; and Hector Palma Salazar, a former leader in the Sinaloa cartel led by Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman.

Eleven others were extradited on a variety of U.S. charges, including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes, the two governments said.

DOJ_NMG_0119647

After taking office, Mr. Calderon almost immediately ordered widespread raids by federal police and army troops in states where rival drug-trafficking gangs have engaged in shootouts, executions and even beheadings in recent months.

More than 17,000 soldiers have been deployed in the city of Tijuana, across from San Diego; Mr. Calderon's native central state of Michoacan; and the Pacific coast state of Guerrero, which includes the resort city of Acapulco.

Many drug leaders remain at large. Guzman, the head of the Sinaloa cartel, who escaped from a Mexican prison in 2001, is described as Mexico's most powerful drug lord.

Mexican investigators say Guzman has formed an alliance with purported drug barons Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada and Juan Jose "El Azul" Esparragoza. Known as "the Federation," the alliance is engaged in a bloody turf war with the Gulf and Tijuana cartels, with the gangs using heavy weapons like rocket-propelled grenades.

Washington has offered rewards of $5 million each for information leading to the arrests of Zambada and Guzman.

Mexico Sends 4 Kingpins To Face Trial In The U.S. (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 20 — Breaking with longstanding practice, Mexico extradited four major drug traffickers to the United States late Friday and sent a signal that the country's newly elected president, Felipe Calderón, is serious about cooperating with his northern neighbor to dismantle cartels.

United States law enforcement officials have long complained about Mexican reluctance to hand over drug traffickers indicted in crimes north of the Rio Grande, as many drug kingpins have continued to operate their deadly networks from inside Mexican prisons, where they have been able to corrupt officials.

Until now, however, the Mexican government has resisted the extraditions, arguing that the drug cartel leaders must face justice here first. Also, until a recent Supreme Court ruling, Mexican officials were unable to extradite criminals because they face the death penalty in the United States, which is banned in Mexico. The court overturned that rule.

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," the United States attorney general, Alberto R. Gonzales, said in a statement on Saturday.

Osiel Cárdenas Guillén, the leader of the Gulf Cartel in Tamaulipas State, was among the 21 people flown under heavy armed guard to the United States on Friday night and handed over to federal authorities. He is under indictment in Texas for trafficking in marijuana and threatening to kill three law enforcement agents.

The Mexican government also turned over Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers who were high-ranking members of the Arellano-Félix cartel in Tijuana, as well as Hector Palma Salazar, a former leader in the Sinaloa cartel. All face racketeering and drug trafficking charges in Southern California.

The Sinaloa cartel controls the border around El Paso. Joaquín Guzman, known as El Chapo, escaped from prison in 2001 after bribing officials and still oversees the gang, along with several other important traffickers who have somehow eluded the Mexican police.

Former President Vicente Fox, who left office in December, created a special force to combat organized crime and arrested scores of high-ranking mobsters, weakening the three major cartels in Tijuana and Sinaloa State in the west and Tamaulipas State, along the eastern Texas border.

But his administration failed to break up the Sinaloa mob, and the arrests of people like Mr. Cárdenas and his counterpart in Tijuana, Benjamin Arellano-Félix, set off an underworld turf war that has increased in brutality and claimed thousands of lives in recent years.

Officials at the Drug Enforcement Agency privately voiced frustration with the Fox administration for not extraditing the drug kingpins to the United States, where they would be unable to run their networks from prison. A similar tactic proved effective in Colombia, Panama and other countries where drugs are produced and shipped.

Mr. Calderón and his attorney general, Eduardo Medina Mora, did not immediately say why they had switched course. The attorney general's office put out a statement saying simply that the people extradited had run out of appeals against extradition and that Mexico wanted them to face trial in the United States before the time limit ran out on the charges there.

But all are serving sentences or facing trials in Mexico. In the past, the Mexican authorities have said those were barriers to extradition.

A high-ranking federal prosecutor, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said President Calderón had decided to extradite the drug traffickers despite their pending legal proceedings. The aim is to make it difficult for them to communicate with their lieutenants in Mexico. "It breaks up the entire logistical structure of these organizations here," the prosecutor said.

Besides the four top drug traffickers, the Mexicans extradited seven other lower-level drug dealers, among them Gilberto Salinas Doria, who is wanted in the Southern District of New York on charges of helping to import 200 tons of cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0119648

They delivered four other prisoners wanted on charges of murder, drug trafficking and trafficking in prostitutes, officials said. One of these, Consuelo Carreto Valencia, is under indictment in New York City on charges of smuggling women and forcing them to become prostitutes.

Cartel Leader Handed To U.S. (DMN)

By Laurence Iliff, Alfredo Corchado

The Dallas Morning News, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY – The Gulf cartel leader alleged to have directed a violent turf war along the Mexico-Texas border from his Mexican prison now faces the law in the Lone Star State after President Felipe Calderón's unprecedented decision to extradite 11 drug traffickers to the U.S.

According to a video released by the Mexican government, Osiel Cárdenas Guillen, whose nickname "matamigos" means "friend-killer," was being held in Houston, where he will face charges that include threatening to murder three U.S. law enforcement officials.

AP/Mexico Attorney Generals Office Alleged Gulf cartel leader Osiel Cardenas, third from left, is moved during his extradition to the United States from Mexico.

In a landmark, top-secret operation, Mr. Cárdenas and 14 others were extradited to the U.S. late Friday, bringing lavish praise by U.S. officials and hope for a new era of cooperation in battling drug trafficking.

But it also prompted fear of retaliation by drug cartels that are heavily armed and well financed.

Although the extraditions seemed to signal a new policy, they actually were the culmination of several years' effort by the government to enable the transfers under Mexican law.

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," said U.S. Attorney General Al Gonzales, who met with his Mexican counterpart in Mexico City earlier this month. "Never before has the United States received from Mexico such a large number of major drug defendants and other criminals for prosecution in this country, including Osiel Cárdenas Guillen, the accused chief of the notorious Gulf cartel."

The controversial subject of extraditing high-level drug lords has been a source of debate and legal complications for decades. U.S. officials want the capos in their control, but Latin American leaders have faced nationalistic concerns at home. Law enforcement officials have long complained that the kingpins continue to run their drug empires from prison.

Mr. Cárdenas' cartel is active in Nuevo Laredo and along the Mexican border with Texas. Its enforcement arm, the Zetas, is a paramilitary group that includes former Mexican Army soldiers. The Zetas are suspected of having ordered killings in the United States, including in Dallas.

The 15 extraditions include four reputed top drug lords from three different cartels and seven lesser drug traffickers. The remaining four people are wanted in the U.S. for crimes such as human smuggling, homicide, and sexual assault against a child.

In a prepared statement, the Mexico attorney general's office blamed the drug lords for "generating a wave of violence and social decomposition in our country, in addition to damaging the health of thousands of Mexicans by turning them into prisoners of their drug addiction."

Possible return

While the extradited drug lords will now be charged and tried in the United States, some still may have to come back to Mexico to complete their sentences, said Jorge Chabat, an analyst who specializes in the drug war. Whether they will first serve out their sentences in Mexico or in the United States is not clear, he said.

An estimated 2,500 people died last year in the cartels' fight among themselves and with government forces. The killings included a level of violence never seen before, such as decapitations.

U.S. Ambassador to Mexico Tony Garza, who was critical of the previous administration of President Vicente Fox for not controlling the narco violence, congratulated Mr. Calderón.

"Today, both the Mexican and the American people can celebrate a monumental moment in our two nations' battle with the vicious drug-traffickers and criminals who threaten our very way of life," Mr. Garza said in a prepared statement Saturday. "Some of the most brutal criminals in the history of our two countries have been extradited from Mexico to the United States to face justice for the crimes they have committed."

But the bold move by Mr. Calderón, made possible by a 2005 Mexican Supreme Court decision that opened the door to more extraditions, could lead to more violence, particularly along the border with Texas as cartel leaders move in to fill a powerful vacuum.

A merchant in Nuevo Laredo, speaking by phone on the condition of anonymity because of possible repercussions, expressed fear the move would escalate violence in the border city across from Laredo, Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0119649

"This will get nastier," the merchant said. "I don't see an end to this unless tomorrow the American drug consumers, in unison, said, 'Hey, let's all kick the habit,' and I have more faith in hell freezing over before that happens."

One of the those extradited, Hector "El Guero" Palma, is a top associate of Mexico's most wanted man, Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, the reputed leader of the Sinaloa cartel that has been fighting a bloody turf war across Mexico with the Gulf cartel.

Court paved way

In Mexico, the law prevented the extradition of anyone who would face life in prison or the death penalty since those punishments do not exist in Mexico. But the country's Supreme Court ruled in 2005 that Mexico does have a de facto life sentence when multiple charges are considered, giving the green light for extraditions except when the defendant would face the death penalty.

One veteran U.S. law enforcement official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said: "No one believed this extradition would ever happen, so the fact that this is now a done deal is simply unbelievable. This has to be among the best things that's ever happened between our two countries."

But the law enforcement official also warned that repercussions, particularly in the short term, are likely – as happened in Colombia. In the 1980s, the government of Colombia began a policy of extraditing cartel leaders to the United States. The move led to a massive backlash, as bombings and assassinations ravaged the nation.

"There will definitively be serious repercussions and threats against Calderón, and U.S. officials," the U.S. official added. "But in the long term, it's the best thing that has ever happened. Mexico will gain a lot of respect worldwide and be seen as a country where rule of law is practiced."

The law enforcement official added that the move will likely force cartel leaders to reassess their violent action and come up with a new approach, like dividing up the country's drug routes evenly among leaders.

"The violence has to stop," the official said. "There's too much pressure from both governments for them to continue their violent ways. They have to start behaving like serious businessmen because one thing is clear: the drug demand will not end with these extraditions."

Mr. Chabat, the Mexican analyst, said that Mexican drug lords have generally avoided targeting politicians, the public or American tourists and are unlikely to start now.

"In Colombia, when they started extraditing drug kingpins, the narcos responded with violence, but in Mexico we don't have a history of the drug traffickers directly taking on the government like in Colombia, although I don't rule it out completely," said Mr. Chabat.

In terms of targeting the millions of American tourists who visit Mexico each year, Mr. Chabat said that was also unlikely given the magnitude of the United States' ability to retaliate.

"If you ask the drug traffickers whether they want to fight against the U.S. government or the Mexican government, they would certainly say against the Mexican government," said Mr. Chabat, who thinks Mr. Calderón's actions could also improve U.S.-Mexican relations and can't hurt the immigration reform efforts in the U.S. Congress.

The extradition was done under a cloud of secrecy, officials said, a sign that there was fear word could get to cartel leaders. One U.S. official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said there were reports that the Gulf cartel was in the process of breaking Mr. Cardenas from jail.

"The government had no choice but to act fast, and they did, and for that they should be praised," the official said.

Mexico's Extraditions Make A Point (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's decision to extradite 10 leaders of its most powerful drug-trafficking organizations to the U.S. is a landmark event that will boost the fortunes of new President Felipe Calderon, though the long-term effect on the drug business remains uncertain, Mexican analysts and U.S. officials said Saturday.

The extraditions took place late Friday night, just seven weeks after Calderon took office, but after several years of legal and diplomatic wrangling by officials on both sides of the border.

"The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance," U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales said in a statement Saturday. "Never before has the United States received from Mexico such a large number of major drug defendants and other criminals for prosecution in this country."

In all, Mexican authorities extradited 15 people. The most prominent was Osiel Cardenas, who was reputed to have been running the Gulf cartel from his cell at the maximum-security La Palma prison since his arrest in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0119650

A federal grand jury in Texas indicted Cardenas in 1999 on drug-trafficking and assault charges. The Bush administration singled him out for special treatment in 2001 under the Foreign Narcotics Kingpin Designation Act, which allows the government to freeze the assets of those who do business with drug lords and their families.

Three others extradited late Friday were on the White House kingpin list, including Hector Palma, said to be the top lieutenant of Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, leader of the Sinaloa cartel. Had he not escaped from a Mexican prison in 2001, Guzman too might have been extradited Friday.

Palma is a colorful figure who, it has been said, once paid $40 million in annual protection fees to the Guadalajara municipal police. When he was arrested in 1999 after his small plane crashed, he had in his possession a handgun encrusted with diamonds and emeralds.

The other two on the kingpin list extradited were Ismael Higuera Guerrero and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers and bosses in the Arellano Felix cartel, based in Tijuana.

Even inside their Mexican prisons, the kingpins were known for outrageous behavior. Cardenas treated 17,000 people to a Day of the Child party at a baseball stadium in the border city of Reynosa last year.

Columnist Ricardo Aleman wrote in the Mexico City newspaper El Universal that Cardenas was deliberately making the government of then-President Vicente Fox look ridiculous.

"In spite of being locked up in the most secure and strict of Mexico's prisons, the head of the cartel does what he wants," Aleman wrote last May. "It seems to confirm the fact that the most powerful cartels and criminal groups are beyond the control of the state."

Widespread corruption in the prison system made it nearly impossible for Mexican officials to control the drug bosses, said Jorge Chabat, an expert on the drug trade.

"Having them out of Mexico is one less headache for the Mexican government," Chabat said. The extraditions, coming on the heels of Calderon's decision to send federal troops to combat drug trafficking in Baja California and the southern states of Michoacan and Guerrero, add to the sense that the new president is trying to take charge of a seemingly intractable problem.

"We are determined not to tolerate any defiance to the authority of the state," Calderon said Friday.

The extraditions give Calderon increased credibility as he deals with the U.S. on contentious issues, including immigration reform and legislation approved last year in Washington to tighten the U.S.-Mexican border.

As well, the extraditions in effect end the kingpins' influence over the vast drug-trafficking organizations, although new leaders are almost certain to emerge. "It's like any big business," Chabat said. "If the CEO resigns, then a new CEO takes his place."

U.S. and Mexican officials say the drug-trafficking organizations are huge businesses in which no individual knows more than a handful of others — a cell-like structure that makes them especially difficult to break.

How the drug-trafficking organizations will react to the extraditions remains an open question. In Colombia in the 1980s, drug kingpins resisted extradition to the U.S. with a campaign of bombings and assassinations.

In recent years, analysts say, Mexico's drug-trafficking organizations have not sought an open confrontation with the federal government. Most of their firepower has been directed against one another, and against municipal and state officials. Last year, more than 2,000 people were killed as rival groups battled one another and the authorities.

Cardenas and the Gulf cartel, based in the northern Mexican state of Tamaulipas, have upped the ante in the war against their rivals from the western state of Sinaloa by recruiting highly trained soldiers from the Mexican army, known as the Zetas.

The rival Mexican syndicates are responsible for 80% of the cocaine that enters the United States, according to American officials.

Gonzales Lauds Mexico's Extradition Of 15 To U.S. (SDUT)

By Matthew T. Hall, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 21, 2007

Mexico's extradition of 15 reputed drug lords and violent criminals, four of whom have ties to San Diego, drew praise from the U.S. attorney general yesterday and signaled its new determination to keep traffickers from running their cartels from inside prison walls.

“The actions overnight by the Mexican government are unprecedented in their scope and importance,” U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement yesterday.

Osiel Cárdenas, the alleged Gulf cartel leader who was believed to be running his gang from prison in Mexico, was sent north late Friday along with 14 others wanted by the United States after their appeals against extradition ran out, the office of Mexico's attorney general said.

DOJ_NMG_0119651

Four of those extradited had been indicted years ago in San Diego. They include the reputed former leader of the Sinaloa drug cartel and three men connected to the Arellano Félix drug cartel. They will be transported to San Diego "relatively soon," perhaps within weeks, to answer the charges against them, Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said.

All of the suspects are being held in Houston and are expected to appear in court there early this week.

Gonzales applauded "the bold stance" of Mexican President Felipe Calderón and his government "in targeting the drug-related violence and corruption that affects both our nations."

The three men who worked for the Arellano Félix cartel are brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, indicted in 2003 on racketeering, drug-trafficking and money-laundering charges, and José Alberto Marquez Esqueda, indicted in 2002 on charges of importing and distributing marijuana and cocaine.

Ismael Higuera Guerrero was a chief lieutenant in the Arellano Félix cartel in charge of day-to-day operations, including the receipt and export of cocaine and marijuana, according to his indictment. He was arrested in Ensenada in 2000.

Gilberto Higuera Guerrero supervised drug trafficking from Mexicali and used kidnapping, torture and murder to enforce the cartel's work, according to the same indictment. Mexican authorities captured him in Mexicali in 2004 at a time when he was estranged from the cartel and appeared to be hiding from it.

José Alberto Marquez Esqueda worked as an enforcer, bodyguard and caretaker of the drug "stash houses" for the cartel, according to his indictment. He was arrested in Tijuana in 2003.

The fourth person who will appear in San Diego federal court is Hector Palma Salazar, indicted in 1995 on charges of conspiring to distribute large amounts of cocaine. He is said to be a past leader of the Sinaloa cartel. He was arrested in 1995 near Guadalajara, and a Mexican court denied an extradition request for him by the U.S. government three years ago.

The 10 other purported criminals are wanted in the United States on a variety of charges in Texas, New York and Washington, including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes.

Traditionally, Mexico has been reluctant to extradite major Mexican drug lords to the United States. Its officials also refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is barred in Mexico.

But that attitude changed under former President Vicente Fox, who in September promised to extradite "all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice."

Fox extradited a record 63 alleged criminals to the United States in 2006, including suspected drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Félix of the Tijuana-based Arellano Félix gang.

Calderón, who took office Dec. 1, promised to increase the flow of drug-trafficking suspects sent to the United States. He also vowed to fight the organized crime that has infiltrated all aspects of Mexican society.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Matthew Hall: (619) 542-4599; matthew.hall@uniontrib.com

Extraditing Reputed Drug Lords Earns Mexico Praise From U.S. (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, January 21, 2007

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's extradition of four reputed drug lords drew praise from the U.S. attorney general yesterday and signaled its new determination to keep traffickers from running their cartels from inside prison walls.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the extraditions on Friday were "unprecedented in their scope and importance."

Osiel Cardenas, the alleged Gulf cartel leader thought to be running his gang from prison in Mexico, was sent north late Friday along with 14 others wanted by the U.S. after their appeals against extradition ran out, the office of Mexico's attorney general said.

"Never before has the United States received from Mexico such a large number of major drug defendants and other criminals for prosecution in this country," Gonzales said in a statement yesterday.

The Mexican attorney general's office said the extraditions were also aimed in part at cracking down on turf battles between Mexican drug cartels, which have cost hundreds of lives in recent months in states such as Michoacan, Guerrero, Baja California and Sinaloa.

Recently, the government has sent thousands of soldiers and police to try to stem the drugfueled violence.

"This changes the rules, as far drug traffickers' impunity and the potential punishment they face," said Oscar Aguilar, a political-science professor at Mexico City's Iberoamerican University. "Before, the capos could say, 'Well, if they ever do catch me, I'll be in Mexico, my family and associates can visit me whenever they want, and I can keep running the business' " from prison.

DOJ_NMG_0119652

Mexican officials have said that Cardenas and top members of the Tijuana cartel forged an alliance while locked up at a maximum-security prison just west of Mexico City, where they organized to fight turf wars against rival drug lords.

Authorities also said Cardenas sought to control that prison and other jails through gangs of inmates, and might have organized killings both inside and outside prison. Authorities say he ran his cartel by passing messages to attorneys for him and dozens of associates.

The United States once offered a $2 million reward for Cardenas before his 2003 arrest. In 1999, U.S. officials said Cardenas held two U.S. agents at gunpoint in their car in a Mexican border city, then let them go, saying: "You gringos, this is my territory. You can't control it, so get the hell out of here."

In the past, Mexico has been reluctant to extradite major Mexican drug lords to the United States, arguing that they should face justice here first. They also refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is illegal in Mexico.

But that attitude changed under former President Vicente Fox, who last September promised to extradite "all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice." Fox extradited a record 63 alleged criminals to the U.S. in 2006, including the suspected drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix.

In addition to Cardenas, Mexico on Friday extradited Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers and former chiefs in the Arellano-Felix cartel in Tijuana and Mexicali, and Hector Palma Salazar, a former leader in the Sinaloa cartel led by Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman.

Eleven others were extradited on a variety of U.S. charges, including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Announce Health Care Tax Incentives (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

President Bush yesterday said he wants to expand health care coverage by putting incentives into the tax code for individuals to buy their own, and that he will lay out a detailed plan in Tuesday's State of the Union speech.

In his weekly radio address Mr. Bush said his plan will treat health insurance like a mortgage.

"The current tax code encourages home ownership by allowing you to deduct the interest on your mortgage from your taxes," he said. "We can reform the tax code so that it provides a similar incentive for you to buy health insurance."

The changes will require congressional action and Mr. Bush, now facing a Democratic majority in Congress, ruled out raising taxes or "creating a new federal entitlement program" as possible options for expanding health care.

The White House has told Republicans on Capitol Hill that Tuesday's address will make the most news on health care and energy policy. Aides have said the speech will forgo the usual laundry list of new programs and instead focus on those two areas and three others: the war on terrorism, immigration and education.

"President Bush will outline issues where he believes we can find common ground with the new Congress," spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

In his radio address Mr. Bush called for aiding states that are trying innovative programs to broaden health coverage.

In doing so, he is returning to a strength of the Republican Party in the 1990s, when governors pioneered welfare reform plans and the federal government followed their lead.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican now exploring a run for president, created a program in his state that sought to cover those eligible under existing programs such as Medicaid, subsidize coverage for the poor who are ineligible, and punish those who can afford it but don't sign up through penalties such as higher taxes.

And earlier this month, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, announced his own plan to require all residents to have health insurance and to force most companies to provide insurance for employees or face a higher tax rate.

With Democrats now in control of Congress and promising to push plans to expand health care coverage, Mr. Bush is trying to get out in front of them and set the parameters for the debate.

"Health insurance should be available, it should be affordable, and it should put you and your doctor in charge of your medical decisions," Mr. Bush said, calling on Congress to pass the package he will propose Tuesday.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, is not embracing the idea.

"This is a dangerous policy that ultimately shifts cost and risk from employers to employees and could result in a higher number of uninsured," Mr. Rangel said.

DOJ_NMG_0119653

Census Bureau data show that 46.6 million individuals, or 15.9 percent of the population, were without health insurance in 2005. That was 1.3 million more than in 2004.

The figures show that Medicare and Medicaid, the main government insurance programs, cover an increasing percentage of the population, while employer-sponsored health plans and plans bought by individuals both declined from 2004 to 2005.

Bush Seeks Shift In Health Coverage (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

President Bush will propose a deep tax break for Americans who purchase their own medical insurance and would finance it with an unprecedented tax on a portion of high-priced health-care plans that workers receive from their employers, according to the White House.

The initiative, which the president briefly previewed in his radio address yesterday, has a dual purpose: It would create a financial incentive for the estimated 46 million to 48 million Americans who lack health insurance to buy it. And it would rein in the soaring cost of health insurance by encouraging workers in high-priced plans to seek more modest coverage.

"Today, the tax code unfairly penalizes people who do not get health insurance through their job," Bush said. "It unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans. The result is that insurance premiums rise and many Americans cannot afford the coverage they need."

The proposal, which Bush plans to fully unveil in Tuesday's State of the Union address, marks a sharp departure for a president who has been criticized for advocating tax cuts that disproportionately benefit higher-income Americans.

Administration officials familiar with the plan say it reflects the new political order in Washington, where Democrats now control both chambers of Congress. They refuse to characterize the plan as a tax increase because it raises no new money for the federal government. Instead, it would add a new tax on employer-provided health-care plans worth more than $15,000 to subsidize those who buy modestly priced plans out of their pockets.

In addition, they say, the plan is consistent with the president's idea of increasing access to health insurance through the private market while encouraging people to be more cost-conscious as they purchase medical-care coverage.

In his speech Tuesday night, the president will also propose increasing the federal assistance to states that make private health-care plans available to low-income or chronically unhealthy people who are uninsured. The administration hopes to provide waivers under Medicaid -- the government health insurance program for the poor that is jointly funded by the federal government and the states -- to allow states to redirect money from hospitals and nursing homes to individuals to help them buy health insurance.

Some states are already moving to offer health-care coverage to the uninsured. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) recently announced a plan to provide coverage to about 6.5 million people, including many recent immigrants, who are uninsured. If the plan is approved by the state legislature, California would become the fourth state -- along with Massachusetts, Vermont and Maine -- to offer near-universal health insurance.

Taken together, Bush's proposals are his most ambitious attempt to address the health-care crisis. In the past, Bush had pushed for limited tax breaks to help people buy health insurance, but those initiatives never gained traction. He has also advocated health savings accounts, consumer-driven plans with higher deductibles and lower premiums than those in traditional insurance.

The new tax measure would attempt to roughly equalize the benefits of people who have health insurance, whether they buy it or receive it from employers.

The estimated 150 million people covered by employer-provided health insurance are not taxed on the value of their health insurance, regardless of how much it is worth. The average employer-provided family health insurance plan costs $11,500 a year, administration officials said -- three times what it cost 19 years ago.

Under the president's proposal, workers who receive employer-provided health insurance would have to pay a tax on the cost of their benefit above $15,000, the threshold proposed by Bush for the tax break. For instance, if a person's health insurance costs $16,000, he would pay a tax on the $1,000 difference.

People with families who buy low-cost policies, meanwhile, would have their taxable income reduced by $15,000, regardless of the cost of the plans and whether they itemize deductions on their tax returns. The deduction would be $7,500 for single individuals. The deduction, to be indexed to account for inflation, would also be extended to those with employer-provided plans, to be offset by the cost of their coverage.

"This is a huge incentive for the uninsured to get coverage, but, also, the vast majority of people with employer-provided coverage will benefit as well," a senior administration official said. "This is essentially a standard deduction for health care, and the size of the deduction will be significantly higher than the cost of an average policy."

DOJ_NMG_0119654

The Bush administration estimates that 80 percent of people with employer-provided plans would see their tax liability fall because the deduction would be larger than the value of their insurance plans.

The idea of ending the taxpayer subsidy for what some in the health industry call "Cadillac health insurance" policies and using the savings to subsidize insurance for those who do not have it has been around for at least two decades, experts said. Underlying the idea is the belief that the current tax structure essentially adds to the inflationary pressure on health care by subsidizing expensive health-care plans, making coverage even more unaffordable for those who do not have it.

But now may be an interesting moment to resurrect the idea because the new Democratic Congress has vowed not to initiate any new programs that cannot pay for themselves. Additionally, the idea of imposing a tax on those with generous coverage to help those without it has a progressive cast that could appeal to Democrats. "It is being proposed by a Republican, but it's kind of a Democrat idea," said Robert Laszewski, a health policy consultant. "It should be something that will interest a lot of Democrats."

Still, some leading Democrats are skeptical of the plan. "It is good that the president is finally talking about health care," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), chairman of the Senate committee that oversees health-care matters. "I question, however, why the president thinks the way to solve this problem is through the tax code."

Bush To Propose Health Insurance Changes (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush will propose in his State of the Union address a tax break for people who buy their own health insurance and a limit on how much coverage individuals can receive tax free at work.

The proposal to be announced Tuesday offers a tax deduction to people who purchase coverage and urges those with generous plans to either embrace cheaper insurance or pay taxes on part of it, according to a Bush administration official familiar with the proposals.

If passed by Congress, the plan would be the first time that workers could get a tax break for buying their own insurance. At the same time, it would be the first time that some employer-provided health care benefits could be taxed.

Bush also will announce steps next week to take some federal money now going to hospitals and institutions and give it to states for programs to reduce the number of uninsured people.

The cost of health care is growing more than two times faster than wages, making it harder for families to buy insurance and for employers to sponsor a health benefit for workers, Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address.

"Our challenge is clear: We must address these rising costs, so that more Americans can afford basic health insurance," Bush said. "And we need to do it without creating a new federal entitlement program or raising taxes."

Further details of the two proposals were to be announced in the State of the Union address.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity so as not to pre-empt the president's speech, would not disclose the amount of the proposed deduction or the top amount of coverage from employer-sponsored plans that would remain free of income and payroll taxes.

"The tax code unfairly penalizes people who do not get health insurance through their job," Bush said. "It unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans. The result is that insurance premiums rise, and many Americans cannot afford the coverage they need."

He said health insurance needs to be treated more like homeownership.

"The current tax code encourages homeownership by allowing you to deduct the interest on your mortgage from your taxes," Bush said. "We can reform the tax code, so that it provides a similar incentive for you to buy health insurance."

There are an estimated 46 million to 48 million people in the United States who are uninsured at some point during the year.

"Most of the uninsured are people who are working and they've got a little bit too high of income to qualify for Medicaid or other government programs. If they buy health insurance they have to pay for it entirely out of their own pocket," Dr. Mark McClellan, former administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services and former commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, said in a telephone interview. "This would be a significant amount of new help for them."

William Galston, a domestic policy adviser to President Clinton and a fellow at the Brookings Institution, said making health insurance more affordable for people on the individual market is a good idea. But he said he is worried that the proposal, taken by itself, could make it harder to argue for a more comprehensive measure for widening health care insurance to cover many more people.

"If it goes through as is, it's going to make the task of bargaining for a broader bill more difficult," Galston said, although he said he had not yet seen details of the proposals.

DOJ_NMG_0119655

Under a second proposal, the president is proposing to redirect federal dollars that hospitals and other institutions get to help cover costs for caring for the uninsured. With this money, states would set up programs to assist people in getting health coverage and help people with high-cost health conditions.

Several states are working to reduce the number of people living without health insurance.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, for instance, has announced a plan that would cost $12 billion a year to extend health care coverage to most of the state's 6.5 million uninsured. That would make it the second state, after Massachusetts, to require everyone to carry insurance.

"When somebody is uninsured and they come into the emergency room there are federal programs that provide some help with covering those costs," McClellan said.

"The idea would be to redirect that money to provide better subsidies and assistance for people to get affordable health insurance. If you've got more people with insurance, you don't need to have as much in the way of payments to the institutions," he said.

Hospital administrators are worried about what the president's plan will mean for their facilities. They fear they will be getting less money when they treat Medicare patients. They say the federal reimbursements already do not cover costs and that the president's plan will remove tens of millions of dollars for them.

Bush, who has begun rehearsing drafts of the speech, left Saturday for Camp David with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten. Before departing, he met with Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates to hear details of their recent foreign trips.

Rice was in the Middle East, and Gates returned to Washington on Saturday after a whirlwind tour that began last weekend in London and ended Friday in southern Iraq. In between he visited NATO headquarters in Brussels, met with troops and officials in Afghanistan and made stops in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Qatar.

To Expand Health Coverage, Bush Pitches Tax Code Change (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Saturday entered the growing debate about providing healthcare coverage for uninsured Americans, calling for a major change in the tax system to help those whose employers don't offer a plan.

Bush's proposal is a combination of carrots and sticks — and, if enacted, would create new winners and losers in the health insurance arena. It is likely to run into opposition in the Democratic-led Congress but could serve as a key element of a broader package dealing with rising healthcare costs and shrinking coverage.

The carrot in Bush's plan is the creation of a health insurance tax deduction that all taxpayers would receive — $7,500 a year for individuals and $15,000 for families.

But the proposal also comes with a stick: Those with insurance plans with an annual premium more than the deduction would have to pay income taxes on the difference. That would be a big change from current law, under which all employerprovided health insurance is tax-free for workers.

Bush wants to use tax revenue from people with benefit-rich plans — the healthcare haves — to pay for the new health insurance deduction. That would enable many of the estimated 47 million uninsured Americans — the healthcare have-nots — to buy coverage.

"One of the most promising ways to make private health insurance more affordable is by reforming the federal tax code," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

"Today, the tax code unfairly penalizes people who do not get health insurance through their job," he said. "It unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans. The result is that insurance premiums rise, and many Americans cannot afford the coverage they need."

Bush's plan may seem like a startling move from a president who has repeatedly vowed not to raise taxes. People with generous healthcare coverage would face the higher taxes, although they could avoid the hit by switching to a standard policy. Family coverage costs an average of $11,500 to $13,000 a year, according to industry surveys.

Defending the plan, a White House official said it would be a wash for federal coffers. Over 10 years, all the additional revenue would go toward the tax deduction to help people buy coverage.

Saturday's radio address signaled that healthcare will be a theme of the president's State of the Union message on Tuesday, in which he will also propose an initiative to help governors expand coverage.

Consumer groups, medical organizations, insurers, employers and state leaders have recently reopened the long- dormant debate over healthcare. In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is pursuing an ambitious plan to cover as many as 6 million uninsured residents.

DOJ_NMG_0119656

Though Bush focused Saturday on a plan to expand coverage, he stopped short of committing to the goal of coverage for all.

Congressional aides have privately expressed concern that the president's budget will call for tens of billions of dollars in cuts in healthcare programs such as Medicare and Medicaid as part of his pledge to balance the federal budget in five years.

On Capitol Hill, prominent Democrats issued statements saying they were glad Bush was talking about healthcare but were skeptical about his plan.

"To the extent that the president is now recognizing that all Americans need health coverage, that's positive," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles). "But it clearly cannot come at the cost of undermining comprehensive health coverage for those who do have insurance."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said he questioned "why the president thinks the way to solve this problem is through the tax code."

Many economists, however, say that Bush's plan deserves serious consideration.

"Given that we agree that we need some combination of individual and social responsibility, this is one key step in a total package that could bring coverage to all Americans," said Len Nichols of the nonpartisan New America Foundation think tank.

But Nichols would use the additional revenue to expand group coverage instead of individually purchased policies.

The current tax breaks for health insurance are worth about $147 billion a year, surpassing the mortgage interest deduction. Not only is employerprovided health insurance tax-free for employees, but companies can also deduct the cost as a business expense.

There are two main reasons many economists and healthcare experts believe this system is flawed.

One is that it gives no help to people without employerprovided coverage. In effect, that makes health insurance coverage even more prohibitive for small employers and the selfemployed.

"It's an unlevel playing field in terms of providing support," said Mark McClellan, who formerly headed Medicare and Medicaid and is a health economist and physician. "In the 21st century, we have more people working in self-employment, so there are more and more people who don't benefit from the tax exclusion."

The other reason is that many economists believe an unlimited tax deduction for employer-provided coverage encourages wasteful healthcare spending.

Many of those who would have to pay more under Bush's plan are union workers who have negotiated generous health insurance packages. The plan is likely to be opposed not only by organized labor, but also by big employers, which fear that unions would push for bigger wage hikes if health benefits were curtailed.

Some influential administration allies, such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, have already raised questions.

"Our concern … is that it would undermine the current system and become a disincentive for employers providing good, rich benefits for their employees," said Katie Mahoney, a healthcare policy expert for the business group.

Bush To Urge New Tax Plan For Health Care Coverage (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20 — President Bush intends to use his State of the Union address Tuesday to tackle the rising cost of health care with a one-two punch: tax breaks to help low-income people buy health insurance and tax increases for some workers whose health plans cost significantly more than the national average.

White House officials say Mr. Bush has decided to forgo the traditional formula for the State of the Union — a laundry list of ideas, many of them dead on arrival — in favor of a more thematic speech that will concentrate on a few issues, like health care, immigration and energy, on which he hopes to make gains with the new Democrat-controlled Congress.

The basic concept is that employer-provided health insurance, now treated as a fringe benefit exempt from taxation, would no longer be entirely tax-free. Workers could be taxed if their coverage exceeded limits set by the government. But the government would also offer a new tax deduction for people buying health insurance on their own.

“I will propose a tax reform designed to help make basic private insurance more affordable,” Mr. Bush said in his weekly radio address on Saturday, “whether you get it through your job or on your own.” He did not offer specifics, but an administration official provided details of the plan.

The proposed plan is a startling move for a president who has repeatedly vowed not to raise taxes. And it is certain to run into opposition from business groups, labor unions and, most of all, the Democrats who now run Capitol Hill.

“It’s a bad policy,” Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who is chairman of the House committee that writes tax legislation, said in an interview Friday night. “We are trying to bring tax relief to the middle class. The president is trying to increase their tax liability. This proposal is inconsistent with what the majority is seeking in the House and the Senate.”

DOJ_NMG_0119657

White House officials say the health tax plan would neither increase spending nor reduce tax revenues. Supporters say it would expand coverage to some of the 47 million uninsured. But critics say it would, in effect, tax people with insurance to provide coverage to those without it.

That would amount to a tectonic shift in the way people get and pay for their health coverage, and historically it has been all but impossible to win Congressional approval for such changes. When President Ronald Reagan made a proposal similar to Mr. Bush's in 1986, it died in Congress, with Mr. Rangel helping to lead the opposition.

As he heads into the address, his first delivered to a Congress controlled entirely by Democrats, Mr. Bush faces intense skepticism from lawmakers over his new strategy in Iraq. But while he will not be able to avoid the subject of Iraq in the speech, White House officials hope to use the address to shift the national conversation away from the war and toward the possibility of bipartisan cooperation in Washington.

"What they want to accomplish is to have the average American believe that Bush really does want to work across party lines and he's going to do it," said one Republican strategist close to the White House.

In his radio address on Saturday, Mr. Bush described his proposal as a way to "treat health insurance more like home ownership," giving people tax deductions for their health insurance in much the same way as they get tax deductions for home mortgage interest. He said the current system "unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans," driving up the overall cost of coverage and care.

The federal government does without tens of billions of dollars each year in potential tax revenue by making health coverage tax-free. The idea of limiting such tax-free coverage has circulated in various forms for more than two decades and is "quite controversial," said Dr. Mark B. McClellan, a former White House economist and Medicare administrator, who has consulted with Bush officials on the plan.

"The conventional wisdom is that there would be too much political opposition to propose" such limits, Dr. McClellan said.

In preparation for the president's speech, the White House has been shopping the idea around Capitol Hill, trying to sound out lawmakers like Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, the senior Republican on the Senate Finance Committee, and Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon.

The administration official said Mr. Wyden's plan contained tax provisions similar to the one proposed by the president. But in an interview, Mr. Wyden was skeptical. He said any tax changes must be coupled with regulations that would encourage private insurance companies to offer affordable coverage to people with pre-existing health conditions.

"The market is broken," Mr. Wyden said. "Private insurance companies cherry-pick. They're trying to take just healthy people and send fragile people over to government programs more fragile than they are, and I'm not sure what this does to fix the broken market."

The Census Bureau estimates that 175 million Americans obtain private health insurance through employers, while 27 million people are covered by insurance bought outside the workplace. The rest, with the exception of the 47 million uninsured, are covered through government programs like Medicare and Medicaid and military health care.

Under Mr. Bush's proposal, people buying health insurance on their own would receive a tax break similar to the one that has historically been available to people who receive coverage through their jobs. The plan is tied to the average cost of family health coverage, which is currently $11,500 a year.

It would work like this: The administration would cap the amount of benefits that can remain tax free at $15,000 for a family and $7,500 for an individual. Anyone whose health insurance cost more than that would pay taxes on the difference. For example, a family with coverage costing $16,000 a year would pay taxes on $1,000.

The cap would also be used to establish the amount of the new deduction for people who lack coverage. In this example, a family buying insurance on its own could take a $15,000 deduction — even if the insurance cost less. The cap would rise with some measure of overall inflation, but would not necessarily keep pace with the costs of medical care and health insurance.

A White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity so as not to upstage the president, said, "The vast majority of people with employer-provided coverage will benefit as well."

One of the nation's leading experts on tax policy, C. Eugene Steuerle, a Treasury official in the Reagan administration who is now a senior fellow at the Urban Institute, said the proposal "would probably help increase the number of people with health insurance at no cost to the budget."

The administration official said the White House envisioned health insurance companies offering new plans to meet a growing market. But employers expressed doubts.

"This is a classic case of robbing Peter to help Paul pay for coverage," said E. Neil Trautwein, a vice president of the National Retail Federation, which represents retailers of all sizes. "I do not think the president will find many backers in the employer community for this proposal."

DOJ_NMG_0119658

In trying to address the problems of the uninsured, Mr. Trautwein said, "we should not start by endangering coverage for people who already have it."

Senate Newcomer Is Designated To Encounter President Bush Yet Again (NYT)

By Francis X. Clines

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Senator Jim Webb, a spirited Democratic freshman from Virginia, looked uneasy as he hand wrote his very first letter of condolence to a grieving constituent who had just lost her soldier son in the Iraq war. The senator, a lantern-jawed Marine veteran with his own son at war, brightened noticeably as he discussed the surprising invitation from his party's leaders to deliver the main response for the Democrats to President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday.

Normally, no one pays much attention to the opposition's rebuttal to a State of the Union address. But the capital's mood as the war spirals downward is palpably, if not desperately, expectant of some change, somehow. And in Washington, fresh rhetoric must be invested to feed any chance of change.

With their narrow victory, the Democrats newly in control of Congress are being turned to as if they are the loyal opposition in the British system, expected to be ready with a shadow cabinet wielding dossiers of perfectly worded alternatives.

It won't work quite that way on Tuesday night when Senator Webb speaks for a perennially discordant party full of upholders of yes-buts and whereases and why-nots. But Mr. Webb, whose upset victory was fueled by stinging, uninhibited criticism of the Bush administration's bungling of its war, clearly has something closer to a glinting riposte in mind than some boilerplate response for the record.

"My sense is people really want to see something different here," said the senator, dismissing the administration's dispatch of another 20,000 troops as not even a doomed strategy, but a "flailing around" for public relations cover. "Sooner or later we are going to withdraw from Iraq," Mr. Webb explained. "The circumstances under which we withdraw are the debate."

Tuesday will not be the first time the president and Mr. Webb have had a close encounter. After the election, the senator-elect declined to stand in a reception line and be photographed with Mr. Bush. News reports told of how the president later sought him out, asking, "How's your boy?"

"I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President," Mr. Webb responded, broadening the question.

"That's not what I asked you," Mr. Bush replied, sounding snappish. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," said Mr. Webb, showing some of the instincts he honed as a former member of a Republican president's administration and a former boxer.

In choosing Mr. Webb, the party seems to be inviting some of his patented iconoclasm to tinge its image, particularly since he is not among the Democrats who first backed the war. Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who was against the war from the first, journeyed from the House to privately tell her Senate colleagues that the party has nothing less than a moral imperative to move the Iraq issue in a new direction.

And so expectations are being raised. Party leaders made sure that Representative Tim Walz of Minnesota, a combat veteran of Afghanistan who speaks knowingly of the troops and their families, had the radio rebuttal last weekend when President Bush accused the Democrats of "proposing nothing," for all their objections to the latest version of his war plan.

A former secretary of the Navy for Ronald Reagan, Mr. Webb says he ran as a Democrat because his own politics are rooted in national security interests, and he found that issue despoiled by the Bush administration. "Hurricane Katrina was the thing that pushed me over into running," he said. "Katrina and the war were parallel situations in terms of failed leadership."

For the senator, the way out of Iraq is "from the outside in" — the full-scale regional diplomacy eschewed by the administration — rather than from inside Washington's misplaced sense of being the center of all solutions.

He is not alone. Republicans have been talking to Democrats about the wording of nonbinding resolutions of disapproval of the president's troop increase. Senator Olympia Snowe of Maine joined Senator Chuck Hagel, a fellow Republican from Nebraska, in the protest. Others were privately dickering.

Maybe nobody will be listening on Tuesday. But as a freshman, Senator Webb likes the early feel of things. He has already presided at the head of the chamber, aided by stage cues from a parliamentarian.

"I closed the Senate down on Friday, and I was teasing the Republican staffers that since there was nobody on the floor, I was going to ask for unanimous consent to withdraw from Iraq." The recollection prompted a booming laugh from the new senator that rolled forth like a preamble to Tuesday night.

"Told them we're going to be out of Iraq by the time I'm done."

Energy Independence (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119659

BOTH CONGRESS and the Bush administration seem certain to return to energy policy this year. The subject is likely to be featured in President Bush's State of the Union address; a variety of energy bills have been proposed in Congress; and this year's reauthorization of the farm program may repackage agricultural handouts as ethanol-promoting energy policy. But there is a danger in the way political leaders are framing this issue. "Energy independence" is more elusive and less rewarding than is commonly perceived. It should not be allowed to take precedence over attempts to curb global warming.

The United States imports 60 percent of the petroleum it consumes, about double the share two decades ago. Those imports come mostly from countries whose governments are unstable, unsavory or overtly hostile to the United States: 60 percent of the world's oil reserves are in the Middle East, 10 percent in Africa, 6 percent in Venezuela and 5 percent in Russia. It sounds reasonable to argue that if the United States relied less on these regions for its fuel, it would be better off.

But consider this thought experiment: If the United States replaced all oil imports with domestically produced fuel, how much more secure would it be? Well, a Venezuelan or Iranian oil embargo could still hurt U.S. motorists and oil-consuming industries. An embargo would create a global scarcity of oil, and fuel prices would jump -- including the price of fuel in the United States. Admittedly, Americans would be paying those high prices to producers in their own country rather than to producers abroad, but the importance of this distinction is debatable. Some producers in the United States are foreign-owned, and many production operations abroad are U.S.-owned.

Some military planners say that, even so, energy independence would boost national security. The nation must be able to count on access to sufficient fuel to power its military machine and key industries. But two-fifths of the oil consumed in the United States is domestically produced, and the nation maintains a strategic petroleum reserve. Besides, it would take a truly formidable enemy to prevent the United States from buying oil simultaneously from the Middle East, West Africa and Latin America. True energy security comes not so much from energy independence as from diverse sources of supply.

Another security argument for energy independence is that by importing oil from radical Islamic regimes the United States is financing both sides in the struggle against terrorism. But it doesn't matter to Islamic radicals who buys their oil; the United States has banned Iranian oil imports since 1979, but Iran's crude still fetches the world price in the international market. It's true that, in pursuing energy independence, the United States would either restrict its consumption or boost its output; this would slightly alter the global balance of supply and demand, perhaps reducing the oil price and diminishing Iran's revenue. But even this effect is not certain: Saudi Arabia might respond by pumping less so that prices remained stable.

This is not to say that curing the American addiction to oil would bring no security benefits whatever. Over the long term it would probably exert a moderating influence on oil prices; this would reduce the influence of authoritarian petro-states such as Russia or Venezuela. But this distant and uncertain benefit should not be the prime driver of energy policy. Mr. Bush and Congress should focus their energy policy on mitigating climate change and accept security gains that may flow from that as a welcome byproduct.

Bush's Fourth Quarter (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

ON THE EVE of his seventh State of the Union address, President Bush's Texas swagger is muted. Not long ago, Bush famously called himself "the decider," but the drubbing he took in November's elections has reduced him to being "educator in chief," as he referred to himself on "60 Minutes" a week ago.

He wasn't referring to education, of course; he's realized that he's lost the support of most of the country (and Congress) on the war in Iraq and that he needs to "educate" them back into the fold. The problem for the administration, as it enters the fourth quarter, is that persuasion has never been its strength.

Quite the contrary — it's been anathema to its political approach. In the aftermath of the Clinton years, the Bush administration proudly stood against nuance and muddled compromise. The 9/11 attacks reinforced the White House's penchant for viewing the world in binary terms, and Bush's "with us or against us" mantra fit the moment. On issue after issue, from tax cuts to Iraq to its tactics against suspected terrorists, this administration has portrayed opponents as beyond the pale, while its own positions are crucial to the defense of Western civilization. Until recently, Bush also seemed pathologically incapable of conceding any failings or of deviating from campaign-style happy talk, even about the clearly deteriorating situation in Iraq.

Such absolutism is hard to sustain in a messy democracy (or a messy world, for that matter). It makes altering course all the more shocking — not just to those who support the administration, who feel misled or, worse, used, but to those who advocated for change. So, for instance, it was jarring to see the administration suddenly drop its insistence that judges should have no oversight over the National Security Agency's Terrorist Surveillance Program. It was the right thing to do, but it was hard to reconcile with the White House's previous hyperbolic narrative.

There have been other whiplash-inducing U-turns for Bush, along with more than a few policy dead-ends. Remember those ill-advised steel import tariffs? And whatever happened to all that talk of going to Mars and overhauling Social Security?

DOJ_NMG_0119660

After 9/11, the president initially opposed federalizing airport security and creating a Department of Homeland Security. He changed course on the military's interrogation methods and on whether Guantanamo detainees were covered by the Geneva Convention. In another departure, the administration engaged North Korea in bilateral talks last week, and there is talk of starting to take global warming seriously.

This isn't to say that Bush is exceptionally inconsistent. It's that he's exceptionally obstinate, and so changes in policy prove more damaging to his credibility than they might be otherwise.

On Iraq, of course, the president is still (though he would not put it this way) staying the course, insofar as he believes (rightly, in our view) that it would be disastrous for the United States to walk blithely away from the mess it created. That Bush himself only recently seems to have noticed the mess in Iraq — or acknowledged it — is one of those credibility-sapping traits that doesn't inspire much confidence in his ability to succeed.

To be fair, this is never an easy time for a second-term president. Bush is in the uncomfortable position of having to rely on the likes of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr to define his legacy. But then, at least he's not spending his days forced to deny having sex with "that woman," dealing with allegations that he illegally funneled arms to a Central American insurgency or fending off efforts to get at his incriminating tapes.

Bush will be with us for another two years, and this Tuesday, with the State of the Union address, he will attempt to begin engineering a fourth-quarter comeback. Iraq will remain at the forefront, of course, but Bush desperately needs to find ways to remain relevant on the domestic front as well. Comprehensive immigration reform would be one way to do that, and perhaps Bush will embrace environmentalism in the same way that Ronald Reagan improbably embraced arms control in his last years in office.

Regardless of the issue, the most worrisome aspect of the Bush administration at this point is the president's lack of stature. It sounds corny, but the president of the United States remains the leader of the free world, and it's essential for him to command respect and authority on the global stage. The unsettling question about Bush in his fourth quarter is whether anyone will take him seriously the next time he identifies a crisis — especially if, and when, it's a real crisis.

Pragmatic, Up To A Point (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

THE town almost missed the news late Wednesday afternoon when the White House announced President Bush was ending his warrantless wiretap program. It was initially hard to believe that a president who has held his ground on so many fronts, against so many prevailing forces, had reversed himself on a signature assertion of executive power.

There had to be a hitch.

But perhaps the move — which really did happen — should not have come as such a surprise.

It was the latest evidence of an emerging pragmatism inside the West Wing. In the last few months, the new White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, has switched out longtime Bush loyalists with a handful of so-called policy realists — and their appointments have cast a famously ideological White House inner circle in a more pragmatic light. And they have expressed a willingness to deal with a new Democratic Congress.

But Washington being Washington, there is skepticism. Just how pragmatic will they be on issues they hold dear?

Kenneth Duberstein, the former chief of staff to President Ronald Reagan who has welcomed the changes, said it was clear that Mr. Bolten had retooled the administration for a new era of “compromise and confrontation.” But, he added, “They may have changed their faces, but not what’s in their hearts.”

This goes to a fundamental debate over whether — or how far — the president will do a turnabout on issues which he had refused to budge on when dealing with a Republican Congress.

Evidence is ample that Mr. Bush will choose his battles more carefully in his final two years. After all, the war is taking up so much political oxygen and Congress is under Democratic management. And as Texas governor, Mr. Bush worked well with Democrats.

“He understands how to work with a majority and he understands how to work as part of a minority and he’ll adjust accordingly,” said Mark McKinnon, a political strategist for Mr. Bush’s presidential campaigns. “This is a president who still wants to get a lot done.”

Yet this new approach is not a wholesale about-face. In fact, the administration’s decisions in the last few weeks could be seen as a move to compromise now to avoid more serious setbacks to his agenda later. In other words, it is pragmatism at gunpoint.

Take, for instance, the administration’s agreement last week to submit the wiretap program to judicial review. Opponents of the program said the administration had finally folded, trying to avoid pending legal decisions that could find that presidents do not have the wartime executive authority to issue wiretaps without warrants. In the process, the administration may also have deflated Congressional plans to move against the program. In effect, critics say, the White House was trying to duck for now a debate on a crucial balance of power question.

DOJ_NMG_0119661

"They've changed the surveillance program under the pressure," said Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, a leading Republican opponent of the policy.

Mr. Specter said he did not think the administration would yield on its long-term goal, pushed most by Vice President Dick Cheney, to reclaim the executive authority that was lost after Watergate.

"I would expect the vice president to continue to insist on executive power," he said.

Mr. Specter is among the administration's many moderate allies who hopes that one of Mr. Bolten's new appointees, the incoming White House counsel Fred F. Fielding, will prevent what the administration's critics would call overreaching. Fairly or not, the woman he is succeeding, Harriet Miers, was seen as too often going along with — or being unable to rein in — some of the administration's more assertive impulses. Mr. Fielding, who has the stature of having worked for Presidents Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan, is perceived to be better able to counterbalance those impulses.

Mr. Specter said, "I think Fred is going to be much more" — here comes that word again — "realistic in his dealings."

The same has been said about Robert M. Gates, the successor to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who hails from the realist school of foreign policy.

Even Democrats praised his appointment. But they were decidedly less enthusiastic about the Iraq policy he ultimately endorsed — including an increase in troops — which many took as a rebuttal to the bipartisan approach recommended by the Iraq Study Group.

"What the president did on Iraq just sends a real signal that he's going to continue to basically do what he wants to do," said Leon Panetta, a former chief of staff to Bill Clinton and a member of the Iraq Study Group. A true test of how pragmatic Mr. Bush will be will come on Tuesday night when Mr. Bush presents his State of the Union address.

HIS team is clearly hoping to do in 2007 what Bill Clinton did in his penultimate address, in 1999: produce a rousing speech with a hefty set of goals that catch his opponents off guard and help put his second term on firmer footing.

Mr. Bush's strategists have already foreshadowed a more aggressive approach to end what the president last year called the nation's "addiction to oil." The president is expected to reaffirm his understanding of the human causes of global warming, and discuss ways to reduce emissions.

Yet some energy industry officials have said his proposals will be partly pre-emptive — adopting an environmental policy that hews to his anti-regulatory and free-market principles before someone with more liberal ideas on regulation can take over in 2009.

And, just as President Clinton in 1999 proposed a long-term fix for Social Security and challenged his Republican partners in Congress to join him, Mr. Bush is likely to do the same this year. Mr. Clinton had opened the door to investment of some Social Security funds in the stock market, a break from traditional liberal orthodoxy.

Some conservatives fear that Henry M. Paulson, Mr. Bush's new treasury secretary, will similarly try to seek common ground with Democrats, in this case by not categorically ruling out some sort of tax increase to help shore up the system. But Republicans close to the administration say Mr. Bush's longtime political adviser, Karl Rove, is focused on holding together the president's conservative coalition, and would be dead set against any such thing.

Yet all of this talk about deal making and pragmatism is enough to give Mr. Bush's longtime supporters a serious stomach ache. Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, who consults regularly with White House officials, suggested that Mr. Bush should avoid deal making, hold firm on his principles and help Republicans win back power in 2008 to finish out his vision thereafter.

"What you're sacrificing short term is approbation," Mr. Norquist said. "But you'll be able to say 'It didn't happen when I was in office, but it happened because I was in office.' "

Fragile Hopes For Bipartisan Rescue Of Social Security (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20 — President Bush is renewing his call for a bipartisan effort on Social Security, but few other issues so clearly highlight the limits of bipartisanship these days, the mistrust and ideological division just barely below the surface.

Many Democrats and Republicans agree that this period of divided government should, theoretically, be an opportune moment to find a solution to the long-term fiscal problems in Social Security, the 72-year-old government pension system. It is almost universally acknowledged that any fix — which would be likely to involve a politically risky mix of benefit reductions, tax hikes or other painful changes — would require broad and deep bipartisan support.

DOJ_NMG_0119662

"The American people have to sense on these types of issues that it's absolutely bipartisan and that the agreement was reached in an absolutely fair way," said Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, the senior Republican on the Budget Committee. "And that's one of the strengths of divided government."

But even the earliest efforts at a rapprochement have been vexed, in large part because of the memories of the Social Security battle of 2005, when Mr. Bush campaigned hard to create private investment accounts in the program but failed.

Efforts have been made: Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has talked to crucial lawmakers, including Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, "encouraging everyone to bring all their ideas to the table, and hoping that some kind of consensus can emerge," as Michele Davis, the assistant Treasury secretary, puts it.

Mr. Rangel said he had also been talking about the possibility of action on Social Security with the ranking Republican on his committee, Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana. And in the Senate, Mr. Gregg and Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the chairman of the Budget Committee, have proposed a bipartisan working group to explore broad entitlement and fiscal issues.

But the old fault lines have quickly re-emerged. Vice President Dick Cheney, in an interview with Fox News last week, said Mr. Paulson's openness to all ideas did not indicate that the administration was open to any increase in the payroll tax that supports Social Security. Raising the cap on income subject to payroll taxes — now at $97,500 — is one of the most commonly cited ways to shore up Social Security. "I think this president has been very, very clear on his position on taxes, and nothing's changed," Mr. Cheney said.

Mr. Conrad said that after those comments, his effort to move forward with his working group "is on life support." He added, "People have interpreted that to mean that the administration is not willing to alter their position one iota, and it's their way or the highway. Well, that's not going to work."

Democrats already mistrustful of negotiating with the administration were buttressed in their views, Mr. Conrad added. "They say, look, they're playing us for suckers."

Many Democrats say they still want the president to take private investment accounts explicitly off the table before serious negotiations can begin. Mr. Bush is expected to include those accounts in his budget again this year, although with their hypothetical creation pushed back a year.

Representative Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Caucus, said that in a climate of such uncertainty for many Americans' private pension programs, it was all the more important "not to take away the one solid cornerstone of their retirement." He added, "It's not good politics and it's not good economics."

Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the chairman of the Finance Committee, a critical venue for any Social Security plan, said he too believed the president must give up his private accounts before serious talks could occur. If so, he added, "I'm more than open, if the president is truly willing to look at all options."

It is, in short, a polarized debate, and likely to become all the more so as the parties head into the 2008 election. On left and right, advocacy groups are watching for any signs of a flinch. Grover Norquist, the antitax conservative, said he was vocally making a pre-emptive case against any payroll tax increase, although he had been assured by the president in December that he would hold the line.

Still, Mr. Norquist added, it is simply too dangerous to walk into negotiations with the Democrats without explicitly ruling out tax increases. "Mom didn't want you to have girls at the house after 10, not because she didn't trust you, but because she thought it was unwise," he said.

There is similar vigilance on the left. "There is no reason for us, as a campaign working on this issue, and there's no reason for the Democrats to compromise with this president on the most sacrosanct program to progressives after he lost the privatization debate and lost the election," said Brad Woodhouse of Americans United for Change, a liberal labor-backed organization.

Business Faces New Pressures On The Hill (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

For almost a year, business interests have had an inkling that their days of calling the shots in Washington were about to come to an end.

But last week, as the clocked ticked down on the symbolic first 100 hours of the 110th Congress, it was becoming pretty clear how hostile the political environment had become after 12 years of Republican rule.

DOJ_NMG_0119663

It wasn't just that key business lobbyists were no longer invited to the weekly meeting to set the agenda, plan strategy and coordinate the talking points. Or that much of the promised legislation was hostile to their interests, such as House passage last week of an energy bill that wiped out tax breaks and raised royalty fees for the oil industry and cut subsidies to banks and others making college loans. Or that, in pushing through their first six bills, House Democrats were able to get an average of 62 votes from the once-united Republican caucus.

More troubling for business interests was the fact that nearly every day seemed to bring news of some fresh new offensive -- a hostile hearing or a special new committee or some calculated retreat by the Bush administration, leaving them surprised and exposed.

"I don't think most people have grasped what they are facing yet," said Kenneth Kies, the go-to tax lobbyist, after the Senate Finance Committee unveiled an unexpected proposal to limit the amount of income that top corporate executives could defer tax-free.

And imagine the surprise of auto industry executives when House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said she would appoint a special committee on energy independence and global warming as a way around John Dingell, Detroit's main man in Washington and chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who could always be counted on to keep the lid on fuel economy and auto emission standards.

Meanwhile, small-business lobbyists were not pleased to see the head of the very big-business Business Roundtable standing before reporters with the heads of AARP and the Service Employees International Union, saying nice things about health-reform efforts that require all businesses to offer some kind of health insurance or pay an offsetting tax.

Just how far left the political center of gravity has moved on these issues may be clearer after President Bush delivers his State of the Union message this week, in which he will try to reestablish his centrality in the policy debate by stealing a march on the Democrats on a number of domestic initiatives, not all of which may be to business's liking.

But the early going has revealed that a business community that has spent a decade playing offense had become a bit rusty when playing defense. A strategy of playing to stalemate rather than compromise in the closely divided Senate may founder as Republicans respond to the public clamor for bipartisan accomplishment. And while Bush seems ready to begin wielding his veto pen, he may want to husband his political capital for issues relating to the war and presidential power rather than protecting business interests.

The Equality Engineer (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Barney Frank, the 14-term Massachusetts congressman who chairs the House Financial Services Committee, says it might be useful to "make it a misdemeanor to use metaphors in the discussion of public policy," such as "a rising tide lifts all boats." Against what he considers that too-complacent view of economic growth (the metaphor was John Kennedy's), Frank says: A rising tide is wonderful "if you have a boat."

Frank questions whether market-driven wealth creation is producing more inequality "than is either socially healthy or economically necessary." He favors much more government intervention in the economy to diminish inequality. Sometimes he means equal dependence on government. For example, he wants everyone enrolled in Medicare -- with larger co-payments for higher-income people -- in order to take health care "out of the wage system."

Frank mildly says that Congress should "pay a little more attention" to the seven governors of the Federal Reserve system, all of whom are confirmed by Congress. The Fed, says Frank less mildly, should not be considered "above democracy": "We can debate whether Terri Schiavo's life should be recognized as over" and other fundamental questions of existence, "but God forbid anybody in elected office should talk about whether or not we need a 25-basis-point increase" in interest rates. "Somehow that's sacrosanct. No, it isn't. It's public policy."

The late Sen. William Proxmire, a populist Democrat who represented Wisconsin for 32 years, said that all members of Congress should have written on their bathroom mirrors, so it is the first thing they read each day, this: "The Fed is a creature of Congress." Frank says Congress should not intervene in monetary policy . . . "unless." By monitoring whether the Fed's governors act as they said they would when they were being confirmed, Congress would be "setting the predicate for intervention if they act otherwise."

He wants the Fed to emphasize full employment as well as protect the currency as a store of value -- restraining inflation. But the Fed's stunning conquest of inflation since the early 1980s is almost a sufficient explanation of subsequent prosperity.

Three years ago, when unemployment was 5.8 percent, Frank outlined his doctrine of "capitalism plus" -- plus a lot of government -- in a House speech, warning that America was at "a major inflection point" where the economy's ability to create wealth is exceeding its ability to create jobs. Today, unemployment is 4.5 percent. How low can it go? He answers briskly: It fell to 3.8 percent during the Clinton administration. Could that become normal? And Frank says that when the New York Times wrote that the economy had exceeded its "normal rate of growth" for 11 years, he wrote to the Times wondering whether facts are redefining normality.

DOJ_NMG_0119664

Frank may be the most liberal member of Congress. His thinking is what today's liberalism looks like when organized by a first-class mind. He thinks he discerns cultural contradictions of conservatism: Some conservative policies -- free trade and tax and other policies that (he thinks) widen income inequalities -- undermine support for other conservative policies. When capitalism's "creative destruction," intensified by globalization, churns the labor market and deepens the insecurities of millions of families, conservatives should not be surprised by the collapse of public support for free trade and an immigration policy adequate to the economy's needs.

Frank's solution, "fair trade," is to use the threat of denying access to the American market to force less developed countries to adopt "minimal standards of civility," meaning more expansive -- more American -- labor rights and environmental protections. This is an economic version of George W. Bush's foreign policy. Bush's Wilsonian goal is "ending tyranny in our world." Frank's trade policy is "Wilsonianism without weapons." Or perhaps it is Johnsonian (Lyndon Johnson): Trade policy should impose semi-Great Society rules on less developed trading partners, thereby helping the poor in those countries -- and reducing those countries' competitive advantages.

Frank's committee has, he says, "a larger jurisdiction to talk than to legislate." Pay attention to the talk: In it liberalism's interest in diminishing inequality (using government power to regulate the economy's distribution effects) duels with conservatism's emphasis on freedom (incentives by which market forces rationally allocate wealth and opportunity).

Frank says he is fortunate to be "in a profession where a weakness of mine -- a short attention span -- is a strength." In a government with its fingers in far too many pies, legislators must flit from one subject to another. What distinguishes Frank, however, is the coherence -- which is not a synonym for persuasiveness -- of his argument for more government-engineered equality.

Democrats Seek To Avert Abortion Clashes (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Eager to avoid a resumption of the culture wars, the new Democratic leaders are trying to tiptoe around the abortion issue by promoting legislation to encourage birth control and assist women who decide to proceed with unwanted pregnancies.

Democrats acknowledge that they alienated many social conservatives and churchgoing voters during years of combat with Republicans over the explosive issue of reproductive rights, and they want to change their emphasis to woo some of those voters back into the fold.

On the opening day of the 110th Congress on Jan. 4, for instance, Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), an abortion foe, introduced a bill to increase funding for family planning and to improve access to emergency contraception. The measure has been endorsed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), a champion of abortion rights, and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), a leading Democratic presidential prospect.

These and other initiatives are a far cry from previous Democratic efforts that drew strong conservative opposition, including funding for abortions for women in the military serving overseas and U.N. family-planning programs in Third World countries.

"There are few more divisive issues in America today than abortion, but there is an opportunity to find common ground if we are willing to join together and seize it," Reid said recently. "The rate of unintended pregnancies is unacceptably high." Legislation such as his, he added, "can reduce the number of unintended pregnancies and the resulting abortions in America today."

During the past decade of Republican rule, Congress became a battleground for opposing forces in the abortion debate. Nearly 150 bills and amendments have been offered with the aim of restricting the procedure. Democrats and pro-abortion-rights Republicans blocked most of those measures, but in the process they alienated a vital group of voters -- religious moderates who support, in principle, the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide but who are morally squeamish about terminating pregnancies.

Now Democrats are seeking to reach these "abortion grays" through their own legislative proposals, all focused on preventing unwanted pregnancies. The initiatives, including several in development for more than a year, represent an attempt to broaden the discussion beyond the traditional framework of whether abortion should be legal. By recasting their approach, Democrats hope to appeal to "grays" in suburban areas and Midwestern towns who have voted Republican in recent elections.

"We believe deeply that we can do better than we're doing in our country when it comes to preventing unintended pregnancies and helping to support mothers and children," Clinton said in announcing her support for Reid's initiative.

DOJ_NMG_0119665

In the House, Reps. Tim Ryan (Ohio), a Democrat who opposes abortion, and Rosa DeLauro (Conn.), a member of the Democratic leadership who supports abortion rights, are backing measures to make contraception easier to obtain, while providing aid to women who proceed with unintended pregnancies. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) helped smooth the path for the Ryan-DeLauro bill, and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the fourth-ranking House Democrat, is a cosponsor. "This is something that Democrats are really into," Emanuel said.

At least four similar bills are circulating. Antiabortion Democrats who are reluctant to promote contraception use are backing a more limited effort to help pregnant women and single mothers.

"You're going to see a change in the tone of the debate, and a move toward more solutions, rather than the divisiveness," said Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, a leading abortion rights group that signed on early to the prevention agenda. "What we're going to see in this Congress is some problem-solving."

The 2006 election results sent mixed signals about where voters stand on abortion. On one hand, pro-abortion-rights Democrats won in 22 House districts that had been represented by antiabortion Republicans. Three Senate seats also flipped from anti- to pro-abortion-rights candidates, and antiabortion ballot initiatives failed in three states, including South Dakota, where voters blocked an effort to outlaw the procedure.

On the other hand, five antiabortion Democrats were elected to the House from districts in the industrial Midwest and South, conservative regions that the Democratic Party had been struggling to infiltrate. Robert P. Casey Jr. (Pa.), who is Catholic and opposes abortion, won a Senate seat with strong Democratic establishment backing -- although his father, the late Pennsylvania governor Robert P. Casey Sr., had been barred from addressing the 1992 Democratic National Convention because of his antiabortion views. A slim majority of the Senate leans toward favoring abortion rights, but the Democratic-led House remains antiabortion by a narrow margin. As one abortion rights activist put it, "We've made gains, but we don't have carte blanche on anything."

Democrats hope their proposals for preventing unwanted pregnancies will become a bridge within the party and even across the aisle to some Republicans, a way to reconcile moral reservations with legal rights.

Third Way, a moderate Democratic policy group, coined the term "abortion grays" to define the nearly two-thirds of voters who hold mixed views on the subject. Rachel Laser, Third Way's abortion expert, has counseled numerous Democratic candidates and lawmakers on prevention rhetoric. In a poll the group commissioned last summer, 69 percent of voters said they supported the goal of reducing the number of abortions "while still preserving the basic right to have one."

And yet Democrats have been reluctant even to mention abortion in recent years. Laser reviewed Senate Web sites and found that Democratic members used the word fewer than 350 times, while Republicans raised the issue 1,900 times. Democrats "also are prone to make conflicting statements about abortion or to couple their pro-choice voting records with a statement professing their personal opposition to abortion," one of her Third Way memos said. "This comes across as defensive, confusing and disingenuous."

The Reid bill, sponsored in the House by Rep. Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.), would increase funds for family-planning services, ensure contraception equity in health insurance plans and improve access to emergency contraception. The Ryan-DeLauro legislation would expand access to contraception, fund sex-education programs, improve health-care access for low-income women and children, and extend adoption tax credits.

There are still minefields, as Ryan discovered when he entered the abortion fray in the House. A 33-year-old Catholic who represents a working-class Ohio district, he has sought to jostle Democratic thinking on abortion since his service in the state legislature. After he was elected to Congress in 2002, Ryan reached out to the antiabortion group Democrats for Life. The group was devising what evolved into a foundation of the prevention agenda, a plan to lower the abortion rate by 95 percent over 10 years.

In late 2005, Democrats for Life discussed a possible collaboration with Third Way, but an alliance never materialized because many antiabortion Democrats, particularly Catholics, were reluctant to endorse contraception provisions.

"We wanted a bill that all pro-life Democrats could feel comfortable supporting," said Kristen Day, executive director of Democrats for Life. But Ryan decided that Democrats had to go further, and he shopped his bill around the House without the group's support. It has since become the leading Democratic vehicle in that chamber. "We cannot have a legitimate abortion-reduction bill without contraception," Ryan said.

But the Democrats for Life bill also has gained broad support and even has attracted some Republican backers. Among its provisions: expanding welfare and health benefits for pregnant women and closing health-insurance loopholes that limit prenatal care. At least three states -- Alabama, Michigan and Virginia -- are considering smaller versions of the House package, Day said.

"In the ideal world, there would have been just one bill," she said. "But it's a positive step that our party has been talking about this. Two bills is a good thing."

DOJ_NMG_0119666

The Socialist Senator (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times Magazine, January 21, 2007

When Bernie Sanders visits a high-school class, as he does regularly, students don't hear a speech, a focus-grouped polemic, a campaign pitch or, heaven forbid, practiced one-liners. Nor, in all likelihood, do they hear Sanders tell stories about his family, childhood or some hardship he has endured. He makes no great effort to "connect" emotionally in the manner that politicians strive for these days, and he probably doesn't "feel your pain" either, or at least make a point of saying so. It's not that Sanders is against connecting, or feeling your pain, but the process seems needlessly passive and unproductive, and he prefers a more dynamic level of engagement.

"I urge you all to argue with your teachers, argue with your parents," Sanders told a group of about 60 students at South Burlington High School — generally liberal, affluent and collegebound — one afternoon in mid-December.

The newly elected senator whipped his head forward with a force that shifted his free-for-all frizz of white hair over his forehead. (Journalistic convention in Vermont mandates that every Sanders story remark on his unruly hair as early on as possible. It also stipulates that every piece of his clothing be described as "rumpled.")

"C'mon, I'm not seeing enough hands in here," he said.

A senior named Marissa Meredyth raised hers, and Sanders flicked his index finger at her as if he were shooting a rubber band. She bemoaned recent cuts to college financial-aid programs.

Sanders bemoans these, too, but he'd rather provoke.

"How we going to pay for this financial aid?" Sanders asked. "Who in here wants us to raise taxes on your parents to pay for this?"

Not many, based on the show of hands.

"O.K., so much for financial aid," Sanders said, shrugging.

Next topic: "How many of you think it was a good idea to give the president the authority to go to war in Iraq?"

No hands.

"C'mon, anyone?"

He paused, paced, hungry for dissent, a morsel before lunch. Sanders says he thinks Iraq was a terrible idea, too, but he seemed to crave a jolt to the anesthetizing hum of consensus in the room.

"Iraq is a huge and very complicated issue," Sanders said, finally. ("Huge" is Sanders favorite word, which he pronounces "yooge," befitting a thick Brooklyn accent unsmoothed-over by 38 years in Vermont.) He mentioned that Vermont has had more casualties in Iraq per capita than any other state in the union, including one from South Burlington High School.

"O.K., last call for an Iraq supporter," he said. Going once, going twice.

By this point, Sanders's cheeks had turned a shade of dark pink with a strange hint of orange. It's a notable Sanders trait; his face seems to change color with the tenor of a conversation, like a mood ring. His complexion goes orangey-pink when he's impatient (often when someone else is speaking), purpley-pink when he's making a point or a softer shade of pink when at rest, "rest" being a relative term.

Next question from Sanders: "Should people in this country who want to go to college be able to go, regardless of income?"

Wall-to-wall hands, with the exception of one belonging to Andy Gower, a senior in a backward baseball cap who recently moved up from North Carolina. Relatively conservative, Andy is a conspicuous outlier in the class. Bernie knows how he feels, having spent eight terms as the lone Socialist in Congress, and the first to serve in the House since the 1920s.

"Why do you think that?" Sanders asked Andy.

He replied with a question of his own: "Why should people who can afford to go to college pay for people who can't?" He was sheepish at first but gained momentum. "Why should people who are successful in this society be burdened by people who aren't? It's just a fact of life. Some people will succeed, and some people won't. And it's just the way it's going to be and has always been."

A few classmates smirked, shook their heads. But Sanders was suddenly buoyant. He stomped forward, clapped twice — provocation achieved.

Hands were shooting up everywhere, and Sanders contorted his mouth into a goofy grin.

"At the end of the day, democracy is a tough process," Sanders said finally, arms restored to their flailing default positions.

"The discussion we've had in here is at a higher level than what we often have on the floor of the United States Congress," Sanders gushed, for as much as he ever gushes, which is not much.

And given some of the things Sanders has said about the United States Congress, maybe this wasn't such a gush after all.

DOJ_NMG_0119667

Sanders has always been an easier fit in Vermont than in Washington. Being a Socialist in the seat of two-party orthodoxy will do that. While he has generally championed liberal Democratic positions over the years — and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee endorsed his Senate campaign — Sanders has strenuously resisted calling himself a Democrat. And he has clung to a mantle — socialism — that brings considerable stigma, in large part for its association with authoritarian communist regimes (which Sanders is quick to disavow).

But he does little to airbrush the red "S" from his political profile. On the wall of his Congressional office hangs a portrait of Eugene V. Debs, the Socialist Party presidential candidate of the early 20th century. A poster in a conference room marks Burlington's sister-city relationship with Puerto Cabeza, Nicaragua — one of a few such alliances he forged with cities in Marxist states during his 10-year stint as mayor of Vermont's biggest city in the 1980s.

Socialism brings Sanders instant novelty in Washington and, in many circles, instant dismissal as a freak. But Sanders's outcast status in Washington probably owes as much to his jackhammer style as to any stubborn ideology. It is a town filled with student body president types — and Sanders, for his part, finished a distant third when he ran to be president of his class at James Madison High School in Brooklyn.

Few would describe Sanders's personality as "winning" in the classic politician's sense. He appears to burn a disproportionate number of calories smiling and making eye contact. "Bernie is not going to win a lot of 'whom would you rather live on a desert island with' contests," says Garrison Nelson, a professor of political science at the University of Vermont. No matter. Sanders's agitating style in Washington also constitutes a basic facet of anticharm, antipolitician appeal at home.

"I'm not afraid of being called a troublemaker," Sanders says, something he's been called many times, in many different ways, many of them unprintable. "But you have to be smart. And being smart means not creating needless enemies for yourself."

In this regard, Sanders has not always been smart, especially when he was first elected to the House in 1990. He called Congress "impotent" and dismissed the two major parties as indistinguishable tools of the wealthy. He said it wouldn't bother him if 80 percent of his colleagues lost re-election — not the best way to win friends in a new workplace.

"Bernie alienates his natural allies," Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat, said at the time. "His holier-than-thou attitude — saying in a very loud voice he is smarter than everyone else and purer than everyone else — really undercuts his effectiveness." The late Joe Moakley, another Massachusetts Democrat, waxed almost poetic in his derision for Sanders. "He is out there wailing on his own," Moakley said. "He screams and hollers, but he is all alone."

Frank says he came to like and work well with Sanders, with whom he served on the House Financial Services Committee. His early objections were over Sanders's railing against both parties as if they were the same. "I think when he first got here, Bernie underestimated the degree that Republicans had moved to the right," Frank told me. "I get sick of people saying 'a curse on both your houses.' When you point out to them that you agree with them on most things, they'll say, 'Yeah, well, I hold my friends up to a higher standard.' Well, O.K., but remember that we're your friends."

Among his House colleagues, "Bernie's not a bad guy," is something I heard a lot of. "You appreciate Bernie the more you see him in action," says Senator Chuck Schumer, the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, who served with him for several years in the House. A fellow Brooklynite who is nine years younger, Schumer attended the same elementary school as Sanders (P.S. 197) and the same high school (James Madison, which also graduated a third United States senator, Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota). "Bernie does tend to grow on people, whether it's in the House or in Vermont," Schumer says.

But he has clearly grown bigger in Vermont, and more seamlessly. "His bumper stickers just say, 'Bernie,' " says Senator Patrick Leahy, Vermont's senior Senator and a Democrat. "You have to reach a certain exulted status in politics to be referred to only by your first name."

Sanders is particularly beloved in Burlington, which elected the recovering fringe candidate as its mayor despite the Reagan landslide of 1980 — thus christening the so-called "People's Republic of Burlington." Some supporters called themselves "Sanderistas."

His election to the Senate in November came at the expense of a too-perfect Bernie foil — Richard Tarrant, a well-barbered, Bentley-driving Republican businessman who spent $7 million of his own money so he could lose by 33 percentage points.

"Congratulations, Bernie," a fan yells to Sanders outside his district office in Burlington. Sanders was out for a quick bagel on a balmy December morning, temperatures in the 60s — another day of Al Gore weather in the once-frozen north. He walked head down but kept getting stopped. "Now you gotta run for president, please," the congratulator added, something Sanders gets a lot of too.

It is a reception that any natural, eager-to-please politician would relish — and accordingly, Sanders dispatches these glad-handing chores with the visible joy of someone cleaning a litter box, coughing out his obligatory thank yous and continuing on his way.

DOJ_NMG_0119668

Sanders's popularity in Vermont brings up the obvious questions: to what degree is he a quaint totem of the state, like the hermit thrush (the state bird), and could a Socialist be elected to the Senate anywhere else?

In recent years, Vermont has joined — perhaps surpassed — states like Massachusetts and New York in the top tier of liberal outposts. Several distinctions nurture the state's credentials: It was the first place to legalize civil unions for same-sex partners; it is the home of Phish, the countercultural rock-folk band and contemporary analog to the Grateful Dead and of Ben and Jerry's ice cream (and its peacenik-themed flavors); and it is host to cultural quirks and ordinances like not allowing billboards, being the last state to get a Wal-Mart.

The state has also incubated several politicians who have achieved national boogie-man status among Republicans. They include Leahy, the Grateful Dead fan and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee; former Senator James Jeffords, the liberal Republican who became an Independent in 2001, giving Democrats a temporary majority; and Howard Dean, the former governor whose presidential campaign boom (and perhaps fizzle) was tied heavily to his association with Vermont's progressive politics.

Sanders fits snugly into this maverick's pantheon. But Leahy says his fellow senator appeals to an antiestablishment strain in Vermont that is not necessary liberal. Leahy notes that he himself is the only Democrat the state's voters have ever elected to the Senate. Before 1992, only one Democratic presidential candidate carried Vermont — Lyndon Johnson in 1964.

"A lot of the lower-income parts of our state are Republican," Leahy says, adding that many of them are populated by rural libertarians who are greatly suspicious of government intrusion into individual rights. "I saw Bernie signs all over those parts of the state."

Sanders opposes some federal gun-control laws, which has helped him in a state where "you grow up believing it is legal to shoot deer on the statehouse lawn in Montpelier," says Luke Albee, a South Burlington native who was Leahy's House chief of staff.

But again: Could Sanders be elected to the Senate anywhere else?

No, not as a Socialist, Schumer says. "Even in New York State it would be hard."

Massachusetts? "Maybe this year he could," Frank says, meaning 2006. "But if he were running in any other state, he probably would have to comb his hair."

Leahy says that just any Socialist probably couldn't get elected in Vermont, either. But Sanders has made himself known in a state small enough — physically and in terms of population — for someone, particularly a tireless someone, to insinuate himself into neighborly dialogues and build a following that skirts ideological pigeonholes. Indeed, there are no shortages of war veterans or struggling farmers in Vermont who would seemingly have no use for a humorless aging hippie peacenik Socialist from Brooklyn, except that Sanders has dealt with many of them personally, and it's a good bet his office has helped them procure some government benefit.

"People have gotten to know him as Bernie," Leahy says. "Not as the Socialist."

Sanders calls himself as a "democratic Socialist." When I asked him what this meant, as a practical matter, in capitalist America circa 2007, he did what he often does: he donned his rhetorical Viking's helmet and waxed lovingly about the Socialist governments of Scandinavia. He mentioned that Scandinavian countries have nearly wiped out poverty in children — as opposed to the United States, where 18 to 20 percent of kids live in poverty. The Finnish government provides free day care to all children; Norwegian workers get 42 weeks of maternity leave at full pay.

But would Americans ever accept the kinds of taxes that finance the Scandinavian welfare state? And would Sanders himself trade in the United States government for the Finnish one? He is curiously, frustratingly non-responsive to questions like this. "I think there is a great deal we can learn from Scandinavia," he said after a long pause. And then he returns to railing about economic justice and the rising gap between rich and poor, things he speaks of with a sense of outrage that always seems freshly summoned.

Sanders crinkles his face whenever a conversation veers too long from this kind of "important stuff" and into the "silly stuff," like clothes and style. "I do not like personality profiles," Sanders told me during our first conversation. He trumpets a familiar rant against the media, its emphasis on gaffes, polls and trivial details.

"If I walked up on a stage and fell down, that would be the top story," Sanders says. "You wouldn't hear anything about the growing gap between rich and poor."

When I first met Sanders in person on Church Street, there were big streaks of dried mud on his shoes and dried blood on his neck from what looked to be a shaving mishap. His hair flew every which way in a gust of wind. At six feet tall, he is wiry, but he walks with shoulders hunched and elbows out, like a big, skulking bird. From a distance, he looked as if he could be homeless.

DOJ_NMG_0119669

Closer in, the overwhelming impression made by Sanders is that of an acute worrier. He evinces the wearied default manner of a longtime insomniac, eyes weather-beaten with big lines and a perpetual slight cringe. His brow appears close to collapse beneath the weight of an invisible sandbag.

Richard Sugarman, a professor of religion at the University of Vermont and a longtime friend, recalls that during Sanders's days as mayor, constituents would sometimes call him at his listed home phone number in the middle of the night. "Someone would call at 3 a.m. and say, 'Hey Bernie, someone just threw a brick through my window, what should I do?' He was as hands on as anyone. ... Does he have an off-mode? Not really."

Luke Albee, Leahy's former chief of staff, says: "He has no hobbies. He works. He doesn't take time off. Bernie doesn't even eat lunch. The idea of building a fire and reading a book and going on vacation, that's not something he does."

As much as anything, this distills why Sanders has been an awkward fit in the chummy realm of Capitol Hill. He is no pleaser or jokester by anyone's prototype. I don't recall Sanders laughing more than two or three times in the 48 hours I spent with him in Vermont. His one memorably funny aside came when I asked if his Congressional office had a dress code.

"Yes," he said. "You can't come in if you're totally nude," he said. He instituted the rule, he said, when his outreach director, Phil Fiermonte, who is now sitting next to him, came to work naked.

"Totally nude," Sanders said. "On three occasions."

He was kidding, presumably.

Riding in the passenger seat of Fiermonte's car, Sanders was shouting into a brick-size cellphone, the likes of which were all the rage in the 1990s. He was talking to a staff person who was about to meet with someone from the office of Senator Edward Kennedy, chairman of Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, one of five committees that Sanders will sit on. Sanders voice filled the car.

"Dental care is yooge," Sanders boomed into the phone. This has been a leitmotif of my visit — Sanders's crusade to improve dental health among Vermont's rural poor. He views this as an employment and economic issue. "How many employers are going to hire someone who doesn't have teeth?" he asks. "You go around this state, and you will find a lot of people with no teeth. It is their badge of poverty."

Improving dental care for the poor is a classic Sanders issue: unsexy and given to practical solutions and his obsessive attention. Sanders sees bad dental care among the poor as a "pothole issue" in Vermont, meaning it is pervasive and something that government should be active in fixing (like potholes). Teeth are tangible, especially when they hurt.

Sanders's car pulled into the parking lot of H.O. Wheeler Elementary School in North Burlington, where he was visiting a drop-by dental clinic. The notion of "school-based dental care" excites Sanders immensely, and his gait speeds as he enters the school, past the main office, a classroom and several school officials he has come to know over multiple visits.

"If you're a kid, and you're having dental pain, you're not going to be learning a lot," said Joseph Arioli, of Burlington's Community Health Center and one of a half-dozen program administrators — including a dentist in scrubs — convened around a dentist chair.

The clinic provides free access to dental care for kids at high risk of neglecting their teeth. Students are typically seen during the school day, which means they miss minimal class time and their parents don't have to leave work to take them. Betsy Liley, a grant writer for the city, says that many households in Vermont own just one toothbrush.

"Lemme guess, a lot of the dietary habits you see here are not great," Sanders said. Nods all around. He said he'd do his best to secure more financing and vowed to return. And he told Liley that he might bring her to Washington to testify before a Senate committee.

Walking out, Sanders didn't bother with goodbye — just as he didn't with hello — only a thank you and a "what you're doing here is yooge" over his shoulder.

"Great program," Sanders said in the car. He likes to check in whenever possible. That's essentially what I did with Sanders in Vermont: check in, with programs that he's been involved with or wants to learn more about. He likes to hit lots of meetings, quick, businesslike transactions.

Only once in six discussions I sat in on did Sanders indulge in a personal anecdote. He was in his office talking to Sharon Moffat, Vermont's acting commissioner of health, and the topic turned to dental care.

"I have a personal story to tell you," Sanders said, and my ears perked up as I fantasized of learning the "Rosebud" episode that might explain Bernie's interest in teeth.

"I was in the House cloakroom about five years ago," Sanders said. "And I was thirsty. I took a drink of grape juice. Blawww."

He scrunched up his face.

"It was awful, awful. Then I looked at the label. The amount of junk they put in there is unbelievable."

Moffat nodded.

DOJ_NMG_0119670

"Anyway, I no longer drink that stuff," Sanders said.

Sanders's parents were Jewish immigrants from Poland. His father, Eli, a struggling paint salesman who saw his family wiped out in the Holocaust, worried constantly about supporting his wife and two sons. His mother, Dorothy, dreamed of living in a "private home," but they never made it beyond their three-and-a-half-room apartment on East 26th and Kings Highway. She died at age 46, when Bernie was 19. "Sensitivity to class was imbedded in me then quite deeply," Sanders told me.

Sanders spent a year at Brooklyn College before transferring to the University of Chicago, where he studied psychology and helped lead protests against racially segregated housing on campus. He spent time on a kibbutz in Israel after graduation and then moved to Vermont with his first wife. "I had always been captivated by rural life," he says. As a child, Sanders attended Boy Scout camp upstate and used to cry on the bus as it returned him to New York at the end of the summer.

In Vermont, Sanders worked many jobs for meager sums — as a freelance writer, filmmaker, carpenter and researcher, among other things. (Sanders has one son, Levi, and three stepchildren from his marriage to his second wife, Jane O'Meara Driscoll, the president of a small college in Burlington whom he met at a party on the night of his first mayoral victory.)

Politics came to dominate Sanders's life. He was an early member of Vermont's Liberty Union party, an offshoot of the antiwar movement in Vermont. He ran as the party's nominee for the Senate in a special election in 1971 and finished with 2 percent of the vote. The following year, he ran for governor and received 1 percent. He would run two more times for statewide office that decade as a third-party candidate and never come close.

That changed when he ran for mayor of Burlington in 1980, at Sugarman's urging. Sugarman studied the race and believed Sanders could win, if few others did. Sanders knocked on doors all over the city, campaigned day and night and beat a six-term Democratic incumbent by 12 votes.

"People generally assumed this was a fluke and that he would be gone in two years," said Peter Clavelle, a friend who succeeded Sanders as mayor.

Sanders spoke out against poverty in the third world and made good-will visits to the Soviet Union and Cuba, among other places that U.S. mayors generally didn't travel to during that time. But a funny thing happened on the way to what many had dismissed as a short-running circus. Sanders undertook ambitious downtown revitalization projects and courted evil capitalist entities known as "businesses." He balanced budgets. His administration sued the local cable franchise and won reduced rates for customers. He drew a minor-league baseball team to town, the Vermont Reds (named for the Cincinnatis, not the Commies).

Sanders's appeal in Vermont's biggest city blended the "think globally" sensibility of a liberal college town with the "act locally" practicality of a hands-on mayor. He offered sister-city relations with the Sandinistas and efficient snowplowing for the People's Republic of Burlington. Before Sanders's mayoral victory, Leahy says, it was easy not to take him seriously. "Then he got over that barrier, and got elected. He fixed the streets, filled the potholes, worked with the business community. He did what serious leaders do." He was re-elected three times.

In a sense, Sanders's stint as mayor become a template for his subsequent successes — and limitations — as a national officeholder. In the House, he gained great publicity and favor as an audacious critic with a geopolitical purview, but ultimately left his biggest mark with small-bore diligence to the local realpolitik.

I was reminded of this when I asked Sanders in early January what his immediate legislative goals would be in the Senate. He listed these broad-brush priorities: 1) ending the Iraq war; 2) reversing the "rapid decline of the middle class" (a corollary to "addressing the gap between rich and poor"); 3) reordering priorities in the federal budget; and 4) enacting environmental laws to thwart global warming. When I asked how he would translate any of his priorities into concrete legislation, he nodded sheepishly and said, "I'm in the process of trying to figure that out now." It is an unsatisfying response somewhat reminiscent of Sanders's all-purpose invocations of Scandinavia whenever he's pressed on how his socialist philosophy can be applied to the two-party system he exists in.

As a general rule, Sanders is much more convincing at proffering outrage than solutions. He can do this in Vermont, in part, because he is an entrenched political brand — "Bernie" — and voters will forgive a little blowhardedness (if not demagoguery) from someone they basically agree with and who has grown utterly familiar to their landscape, like cows. Sanders can also pull this off because, as he did in the mayor's office, he has buttressed his bomb-throwing with rock-solid attention to the pothole matters of dental clinics, veterans' benefits, farm subsidies, the kind of things an attentive politician operating in a tiny state (with a population of just 620,000) can fashion a formidable political base from.

After three terms as mayor, Sanders ran for Vermont's at-large House seat in 1988 as an Independent and lost by a small margin to Peter Smith, the Republican former lieutenant governor. He won a rematch in 1990.

"When I came into the House, no one knew what to do with me," Sanders says. "I was the only representative from Vermont, so I had no one to help me. And I was the only Independent, so no one knew where to put me in terms of committee."

Sanders was known as something of a pragmatic gadfly in the House. His grillings of former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan became a running burlesque, much awaited by many Hill and Federal Reserve watchers whenever Greenspan appeared before the House Financial Services Committee. ("Do you give one whit of concern for the middle class and working families of this country?" Sanders asked Greenspan in one representative exchange.)

DOJ_NMG_0119671

Sanders was not without his legislative triumphs. He was adept at working with people with whom he otherwise disagreed sharply — forging alliances with conservatives like Representative Ron Paul, Republican of Texas and a well-known libertarian, with whom he shared a common hostility to the U.S.A. Patriot Act. In what might have been Sanders's signature triumph of recent years, he was instrumental in striking a provision from the Patriot Act that would have required librarians to release data on what their patrons were reading.

But in keeping with his pragmatic gadfly's approach, Sanders was far more accomplished at filing amendments to House bills than actually writing and producing legislation of his own. He was also gifted at drawing attention to his issues and (just as important) to himself. He was the first congressman to lead a bus trip to Canada to help seniors buy cheaper prescription drugs.

As he makes the transition to his new job, Sanders says his former House colleagues have teased him about not becoming "like the rest of them" in the Senate. Sanders jokes about this, as much as he jokes about anything. He says he will be required to enter a machine that zaps his brain and transforms him "into a member in good standing in the House of Lords."

"We're talking about a completely different animal here," Sanders says. The House fosters a more hospitable habitat for the audacious and eccentric; their ranks tend to be camouflaged by its larger numbers, curtailed by strict time limits on floor speeches and reined in by the outsize power of the House leadership. Senators can speak for as long as they want and single-handedly buck the wishes of 99 other senators by placing "holds" on bills and nominations. Tradition dictates that senators exercise such privileges sparingly.

"There will be times when he causes the Democratic leadership some agita," Schumer predicts. "But knowing him, I think he's smart enough not to make any gratuitous enemies. He might make enemies, but they won't be gratuitous enemies."

Sanders told me, "You have to ask yourself, Did the people send me here to give long speeches, or did they send me here to get things done?"

By "you" Sanders means himself, as his sleepless Socialist adventure proceeds into the House of Lords.

On a quiet morning in mid-December, Sanders was sitting in his new office in the basement of a Senate office building — it is a temporary office he will inhabit before he moves to another temporary office that he will occupy until a permanent space opens up, probably around March. It's all very exasperating, he said, this office-space situation. But he asked that I keep the specifics of his exasperation out of the article. He is trying to meet a stepped-up standard of tact and decorum in his new home.

"Why can't we get these phone calls forwarded from the House office?" Sanders asked a staff person who is working temporarily at a temporary reception desk in the temporary-temporary office. Everything seems temporary, but not as temporary as before. Sanders has a six-year term now instead of a two-year one. Friends have advised him to pace himself, curb his impatience. He would seem ill wired for this, but he is trying. He even took a four-day vacation last month — and to Palm Springs.

But now he has work to do, beginning with getting to know his colleagues. "Personal relationships are very important in the Senate," he told me. He likes the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, a lot, appreciates that he gave him the committee assignments that he wanted — Health, Education, Labor and Pensions; the Environment and Public Works; Veterans' Affairs; Energy and Natural Resources; and the Budget. And wouldn't you know, Reid has an interest in dental care, too. He grew up dirt poor in Nevada, and his mother had no teeth. The first thing Reid did when he got his first job — at a gas station — was buy her a new set. So the Senate's leading Democrat gets the importance of dental care, which could help save teeth in Vermont.

"Let's go somewhere else to talk," Sanders said, as we headed out the door of his temporary-temporary office. "We can get some coffee."

We traversed a maze of hallways that lead into a Senate dining room. "Can we sit down in here?" he asked a busperson. Yes, but then Sanders looked at a bunch of tables covered in white linen table clothes, not what he had in mind.

We walked upstairs, in search of a quiet place in the new neighborhood, on the Senate side. He kept navigating short hallways and turning back. An elevator opened in front of Sanders. It said "Senators Only." The attendant invited him on, but he hesitated, turned away and began looking for another route to wherever he was going.

Sanders zigzags the Capitol this way barely recognized, or acknowledged (or congratulated, or urged to run for president). A few people stare at the new senator as he walks by — maybe because he looks lost, or famous, or maybe just because he looks like a strange bird out of Vermont.

Mr. Chips Goes To Congress (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119672

We're in bipartisan nirvana. Bills are passing through the House 356 to 71 and through the Senate 96 to 2. Nancy Pelosi is aglow, and this week President Bush will trot out a State of the Union speech so conciliatory in tone it'll sound like Gandhi on Quaaludes.

The question is, What is all this good cheer accomplishing? It's time to render judgments on the substance of all this legislation coursing through the Democratic Congress:

Ethics reform: A–. This is the best thing the Democrats have done. The bans on lobbyist-financed gifts, meals and travel are unimportant. Few legislators are corrupted by a steak or even a ride in a Gulfstream.

But there are measures in the tough Senate bill that will change behavior. Legislators will have to wait two years before becoming lobbyists. Lobbyists will have to disclose donations they collect and bundle. There will be more transparency on earmarks. If this bill becomes law, the Democrats will have done something significant to clean up Washington.

Minimum wage: B–. The traditional argument against raising the minimum wage is that higher labor costs mean that employers hire fewer workers. It's hard to believe this burden will cost many jobs, given how low the minimum wage is now.

On the other hand, raising the minimum wage won't be of much benefit to the working poor. Only 0.6 percent of all wage workers make the minimum, and many of those are middle-class teenagers or recent grads.

The economists Richard Burkhauser of Cornell and Joseph Sabia of the University of Georgia estimate that a mere 12.7 percent of the benefits of a federal minimum wage hike would go to poor families, while 63 percent would go to families earning more than twice the poverty line. In sum, a poorly targeted publicity measure that will nonetheless help some people in need. Raising the earned-income tax credit would have been better.

Prescription drugs: D. While they were the opposition, Democrats fulminated that the Republicans were so deep in the pockets of Big Pharma that they wouldn't even let the government negotiate lower drug prices. But governing is harder than kvetching, and the Congressional Budget Office has concluded that the Democratic plan would have a negligible effect on prices for the elderly.

The plan allows the government to negotiate, but doesn't take the politically difficult step of giving it any leverage to actually lower prices. A symbolic gesture.

Student loans: C–. House Democrats (and 124 Republicans) voted to cut the interest rates on student loans. This is a nice subsidy for middle-class grads, but will do almost nothing to help working-class kids complete college. Over the past three decades, the federal government has spent more than $750 billion on financial aid, with spending levels exploding over the past 10 years. This money has done little to improve graduation rates. That's because relatively few students can't complete college for financial reasons.

Study after study has failed to find any link between recent federal subsidy programs and college attendance. Democrats would have been better off streamlining existing aid or focusing their efforts on Pell grants.

Energy policies: A–. Democrats have voted to reduce some of the government's oil and gas subsidies and shift them toward renewable energy. As Jerry Taylor wrote in The National Review recently, the case for the existing oil subsidies is "laughably thin." In fact, it's too bad Congress didn't take an even bigger slice out of corporate pork.

Sept. 11 commission recommendations: C–. This is another case of governing being a lot harder than complaining. Democrats vowed to enact all the recommendations, but immediately backtracked on the one the commission said was "among the most difficult and important": strengthening Congressional oversight. No guts, no glory.

Stem cell research. B. The House voted 253 to 174 to reverse the Bush restrictions on embryonic stem cell research funding (not enough to overturn a veto). A good move, for most of us. But it's hard to judge the practical consequences, given how distant the benefits of this research are, and the fact that recent innovations like amniotic stem cells might alter the whole debate.

In conclusion, if a wonky Mr. Chips were to step back and render a judgment on the new Congress so far, he'd note that it's not a terribly ambitious student. It hasn't tried anything big. It has a weakness for showy symbolism and middle-class subsidies. Still, at least it hasn't humiliated the nation the way the last Congress did, and it looks set to do some modest good.

The Cause Bush Did Justice To (WP)

By Jan Crawford Greenburg

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The courtroom crackled with tension on the final day of the Supreme Court's 2004-05 session. It was shaping up to be a historic day, many believed, and the seats were packed with top government officials and people who had camped out overnight in the sticky heat of a Washington summer. They had come for one reason: to see Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist announce his retirement after 33 years on the court.

DOJ_NMG_0119673

Rehnquist was dying of thyroid cancer, and he appeared almost ghostly that morning as he pulled back his tall leather chair in the center of the bench. He was thin and stooped, his once-robust complexion now gray. His booming baritone, which had silenced many a lawyer, was weak, and he struggled even to briefly summarize the court's decision in a key religion case.

When he finished, he thanked the court for its work during a difficult year. The room grew still, and the other justices peered at Rehnquist. The chief justice paused briefly, then banged down the gavel and slowly rose. Most of his colleagues seemed confused. Only Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, his friend of five decades, appeared to have a sense of purpose. She already knew about his plans for the future -- and her own. She turned and stepped beside her old chief, ready to help him if he needed her arm, as he shuffled back to his chambers. There was no announcement.

The anticlimax that morning only reinforced unease among conservatives. Amid the rumors of retirement and change, they were facing an uncomfortable reality: The Rehnquist Court, with seven justices appointed by Republican presidents, had become a legal and ideological disappointment. The justices had consistently refused to set aside landmark liberal rulings of previous Supreme Courts and had declined to issue clear decisions on some of the most contentious matters of constitutional law. On issue after issue -- abortion, affirmative action, capital punishment, separation of church and state, and presidential power -- conservatives watched the court chart a liberal path, injecting itself into explosive public disputes and handing the left big victories.

Ironically, the court's decision on Bush v. Gore, in which the five most conservative justices voted to stop the Florida recounts in the 2000 presidential election and deliver victory to George W. Bush, was also a blow to conservatives: It opened the court to criticism for deciding the case on politics, not law, and those denunciations may have made the court's moderates, O'Connor and Anthony M. Kennedy, more wary of being cast as predictable votes on the right.

Once in the White House, however, President Bush was to ultimately get the openings that conservatives needed to remake the court for a post-Rehnquist era. When the chief justice announced his illness in the days before the 2004 election, the moment for change was at hand. And barely two months after Rehnquist banged his gavel for the last time, on June 27, 2005, Bush seized that moment and filled not one but two vacancies.

The departures of O'Connor and Rehnquist produced a titanic conflict over their successors, one that turned allies into enemies, damaged reputations and reopened old wounds. Yet, after bizarre missteps and strategic brilliance at the highest levels, Bush engineered lasting change in the court, succeeding where past Republican presidents -- including his own father -- had failed. And in so doing, he provided some redemption for the conservative movement, so dismayed by watching Republicans in the political branches flout ethics laws, expand government and indulge in runaway spending. If nothing else, they would get their court.

Bush was seared by his father's 1990 nomination of David H. Souter to the Supreme Court, and he vowed to avenge that mistake. Souter, an unknown New Hampshire jurist who edged out favored nominee Kenneth W. Starr, quickly became one of the court's most liberal justices. Conservatives consider his selection one of the biggest blunders of a Republican president in the 20th century.

Bush promised to nominate justices in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, and his advisers methodically looked for nominees who fit that bill. A group of advisers, including Vice President Cheney, had begun quietly interviewing prospective nominees after the extent of Rehnquist's illness became apparent. They were looking for solid judicial conservatives with proven track records. Determined to avoid a Souter redux, they looked for nominees with a clear paper trail. They did not want another Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate conservative who they believed had drifted to the left in his years on the court. They believed that service in the executive branch, which typically desensitized people to media coverage, would stiffen a justice's backbone once those critical newspaper editorials began rolling in.

John G. Roberts Jr., a highly regarded Supreme Court advocate who had served in two Republican administrations, was among the top candidates. He also had impressed conservative colleagues during his short tenure on the D.C.-based federal appeals court, an impression that liberal judges confirmed. Judge Harry Edwards, an outspoken liberal on that court, said privately that Roberts was "the most conservative judge" he had ever seen. (And Edwards has served with Scalia and Thomas.)

Also on the short list was Samuel A. Alito Jr., a Newark-based federal judge who had 15 years of experience on the bench and who deputy White House counsel William K. Kelley believed had "never written a wrong opinion."

Roberts wasn't an obvious choice after his screening interview with Cheney and other top advisers. He had carefully held his views on controversial issues (including abortion) close for so long that some in the administration were suspicious of those views. But Roberts had supporters in the White House, and Kelley was one of them. He knew Roberts held conservative views; he just didn't share them often. He and others pointed to Roberts's record under presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, as well as his opinions on the appeals court, to convince skeptics that he was the kind of conservative Bush wanted to nominate. Roberts edged onto the short list to meet with the president.

DOJ_NMG_0119674

Meanwhile, Alito had wowed the group in his interview with his quiet confidence and sparkling conservative record. He even joked about his nickname, "Scalito," which journalists used to compare him to Scalia. (Alito disliked the nickname, believing it had less to do with his opinions than with his Italian ethnicity.)

Then O'Connor shocked Washington by announcing her retirement in July 2005, with the ailing Rehnquist still serving as chief justice, and administration lawyers renewed efforts to find female and minority candidates. However, Bush eventually went back to his original list and interviewed five contenders: Alito, Roberts, Edith Brown Clement, J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson III. Bush told advisers that Roberts's qualifications "jumped off the page," and that Roberts's congenial nature would be an asset in a court packed with strong personalities. After interviewing Roberts in the West Wing, Bush quickly settled on him to replace O'Connor.

Six weeks later, on Sept. 3, the weekend before Roberts's confirmation hearings were to begin on Capitol Hill, Rehnquist died at home in Virginia. His death came at one of the lowest points of Bush's presidency. Only five days before, Hurricane Katrina had devastated the Gulf Coast, killing nearly 2,000 people and displacing many more. As the floodwaters rose and state and local officials floundered, neither Bush nor his administration seemed to grasp the scale of the disaster.

On the weekend of Rehnquist's death, Bush was in full damage-control mode, and he did not hesitate on his decision for the court's new leader. He called Roberts at his home in Chevy Chase less than 12 hours after the news of Rehnquist's death became public, and asked him to come to the White House that afternoon. The next morning, he introduced Roberts as his nominee for chief justice -- just moments before he boarded Air Force One for another trip back to the ravaged Gulf Coast.

Now Bush had to find a replacement for O'Connor, and this time he told advisers that it would be a woman or a minority. He was getting pressure, including from the first lady, to nominate a woman. And as new White House lawyers were to quickly learn, the president indeed cared about diversity and demanded that the lists of nominees to federal posts or lower courts always include women and minorities.

But as one candidate after another fell off the roster -- some were too old, some too liberal, some too unpredictable -- White House counsel Harriet Miers edged her way onto it. The Miers story -- how she became the nominee and then withdrew -- is a perfect storm of missteps and disconnect throughout the White House.

Bush's decision to nominate Miers was driven by his determination not to repeat his father's mistake with Souter. Of all the possible nominees, he knew Miers best, and he knew she would not change. She had been involved in the selection of Roberts; in fact, Miers had originally worried that he wasn't conservative enough. Bush was confident that she wouldn't disappoint.

Coincidentally, the opposition of conservative groups to Miers also was driven by the Souter nomination. To conservatives, Miers was an unproven and untested nominee, just as Souter had been. How could she stand up to the liberal intellectual heavyweights on the court, such as Stephen G. Breyer? Who could say she wouldn't change once Bush left town and headed back to Texas? Conservatives would not be fooled again.

Alito was waiting in the wings when Miers's nomination fell apart. Unlike Reagan, who appointed the more liberal Kennedy to the court in 1987 after his nominations of Robert H. Bork and Douglas H. Ginsburg went down in flames, Bush had no problem seeking another solid conservative. With a Republican majority in the Senate, he did not compromise. Alito was considered a solid conservative, though not combative like others, and he had hired liberal law clerks. Bush hoped that Alito, like Roberts, would prove effective in building coalitions.

The call from the White House surprised Alito. Living in New Jersey, he had been insulated from the negative Washington buzz over Miers. He had absorbed the disappointment about being passed over and had come to terms with remaining a federal appellate judge. Alito didn't know that he had been Miers's choice for the O'Connor vacancy after Roberts got the nod for the top spot. She liked his quiet confidence; he didn't seem to be pushing too hard for the job. When Alito was nominated just four days after Miers dropped out, she greeted him warmly in the White House, moments before Bush introduced him as his next nominee.

With the miasma in Iraq and a historic midterm election that wrested control of Congress from Republicans, many have labeled Bush's presidency an unmitigated failure. Yet no historian will be able to write that Bush failed to follow through on his campaign promises regarding the Supreme Court. His nominations of Roberts and Alito -- two of the most conservative justices to reach the court in many years -- will be felt for decades to come.

Bush fulfilled his early vow to appoint justices in the mold of Scalia and Thomas. Together with those two justices, Alito and Roberts make the Roberts Court the most conservative Supreme Court in half a century. Roberts and Alito will not be as forceful as Scalia and Thomas on the bench or in their opinions; they are unlikely to push moderates away with their strong views. For that reason, they may be more effective than Scalia or Thomas in finally removing the court from the contentious social issues that conservatives think belong in legislatures. With the court now poised to recede from some of those divisive cultural debates, George W. Bush and his lawyers at the White House and Justice Department will continue shaping the direction of U.S. law and culture long after many of them are dead.

DOJ_NMG_0119675

Jan Crawford Greenburg is the legal correspondent for ABC News and author of "Supreme Conflict: The Inside Story of the Struggle for Control of the United States Supreme Court" (Penguin Press).

OTHER NEWS:

States Act On Congressional Goals (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The newly Democratic House may think it responded swiftly to the populist message of the November elections with passage of Speaker Nancy Pelosi's 100-hour agenda. But out in the heartland, many state legislatures and governors hope to leave Congress in the dust.

Paying heed to voters' economic anxieties, governors of both parties and in all regions opened legislative sessions with proposals such as eliminating sales taxes on groceries, providing public kindergarten for low-income children, targeting tax relief to low- and moderate-income families and investing state dollars in job training for a new economy.

Stepping ahead of the Democratic-controlled House in attending to the growing gap between rich and poor, lawmakers in 17 states are moving to raise the minimum wage sooner or more than Congress proposes, or to tie it to inflation so it continues to rise. Under the House bill, the federal minimum wage would not reach its target of $7.25 an hour for more than two years and would not rise with inflation.

And California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) was hardly the sole governor calling for universal health insurance. His counterparts in Kansas, Illinois and Colorado did the same, while governors in Arizona, New Mexico, Indiana, New York and elsewhere called for covering hundreds of thousands of low-income, uninsured families.

"If you ask voters what do you want your state to do, that takes federal issues like the war in Iraq and the deficit off the table," said Bernie Horn of the Center for Policy Alternatives, which supports liberal policies in state legislatures. "So economic insecurity is the top issue."

While this partly reflects Democratic gains in the November elections in state legislatures and in governors' offices, it is hardly a one-party phenomenon.

Politicians of both parties are moving to eliminate state sales taxes on groceries in the cause of economic fairness. In his State of the State address, newly elected Arkansas Gov. Mike Beebe (D) invoked "a moral charge to rid our state of its most regressive tax, the state sales tax on food." A similar measure failed last year, but Beebe said 25 of 35 state senators are co-sponsoring his plan to halve the 6-cent tax this year and eventually eliminate it.

In Wyoming, the Republican-controlled House Revenue Committee passed a grocery tax exemption last week that would cost the state $50 million, rejecting alternative tax relief measures that would benefit the wealthy. And in Idaho, Gov. C. L. "Butch" Otter (R) called for a grocery tax credit for low-income residents.

Lawmakers in 17 states are moving to raise their minimum wages despite the pending congressional action. The majority-Democratic Mississippi House of Representatives passed a measure to raise the state minimum wage to $7.25 an hour by next January, at least a year ahead of the federal increase, and to index it to inflation so that it rises with the cost of living.

"I thought we needed to index it because Democrats control Congress now, but if Republicans ever get back even one house of Congress, they'll never raise the minimum wage again," said Mississippi state Rep. Ricky Cummings (D), sponsor of the measure, which faces strong resistance in the narrowly Democratic state Senate and from Gov. Haley Barbour (R).

Barbour said the indexing provision would eventually raise Mississippi's minimum wage above that of neighboring states, which he argued would drive jobs away. "Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, Tennessee must be laughing up their sleeves," he said.

Ray Keating, chief economist at the Small Business and Entrepreneurship Council, said businesses are concerned about the populist mood in legislatures, particularly surrounding minimum wage indexing and health care.

"The minimum wage indexing is especially troubling," he said. "You'll see it most clearly when the economy slows down and job creation slows down. States that pushed to get their minimum wage ahead of the federal wage are going to feel it."

Minimum wage indexing bills are pending in Kansas, Nebraska, Indiana, North Dakota, Minnesota, Rhode Island, Texas, Utah, Virginia and Wyoming, but analysts said it is too early to tell whether any of them will be enacted.

As for universal health care, Keating said it is not "the type of proposal we'd hope to come from Republicans, who usually believe in restrained government, lower taxes and less regulation." He was referring to Schwarzenegger and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), who steered a mandatory-coverage measure through his legislature and now is considering running for president.

DOJ_NMG_0119676

The free-market approach is alive and well in some states, however. In Georgia, where Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) and Republican majorities in both houses were re-elected by large margins, Perdue has proposed solving the health-care crisis by emphasizing preventive care, exercise, healthful diets and access to cost and quality comparisons for medical care. He also called for tax incentives to develop more health care in underserved rural areas.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who chairs the National Governors Association, said its annual meeting next month will focus on how to use government, particularly public schools and colleges, to foster an "innovation economy" that expands opportunity for people of all incomes.

Governors have called for expanded job training, pre-kindergarten and college scholarships for low-income students, all in the name of equipping more people to compete for higher-wage jobs.

In Arkansas, Beebe called for spending $111 million to provide preschool for all children whose families earn up to twice the poverty level. He also proposed scholarships for students in families earning under $25,000 a year. Colorado Gov. Bill Ritter (D) proposed a similar plan.

Napolitano linked health insurance to education in her State of the State address, saying healthy children are better learners and calling for state-subsidized coverage for children in families making up to $60,000. Republicans who control the legislature called the plan too generous and expensive.

"What I sense out there," Napolitano said, "is people asking: Where are we going as a country? What is the economic future that we're going to have? Are we really going to be the generation that hands off an economic future less bright than the one we were handed?"

Hillary Clinton Opens Presidential Bid (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton yesterday launched a long-anticipated 2008 presidential campaign that could make her the first female president in the nation's history and the only former first lady to follow her husband in the White House.

"I'm in and I'm in to win," Clinton said on her campaign Web site early in the morning, and then spent the day at her Washington home making calls to supporters, donors and friends. Her announcement was deliberately timed to come shortly before President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday night, campaign advisers said, so she can draw a contrast with the administration's record and help focus attention on the office of the presidency.

Their hope, they said, is to establish Clinton as the candidate best prepared to become the first Democrat in the White House since Bush succeeded Bill Clinton six years ago.

"The stakes will be high when America chooses a new president in 2008," she said in a statement that was posted on her Web site along with a video announcement. "As a senator, I will spend two years doing everything in my power to limit the damage George W. Bush can do. But only a new president will be able to undo Bush's mistakes and restore our hope and optimism."

Clinton begins the long campaign as the clear front-runner for the Democratic nomination, according to a nationwide Washington Post-ABC News poll completed Friday night. The poll showed her the favorite of 41 percent of Democrats, giving her more than double the support of any of her potential rivals.

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who established his exploratory committee last week, has generated enormous interest and attention, putting the Clinton camp on notice. The poll put him in second place among Democrats at 17 percent, but his support has not increased over the past month as he has moved toward a formal candidacy.

In hypothetical general election matchups against the two most prominent prospective GOP candidates, Clinton narrowly leads Arizona Sen. John McCain and is running about even with former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

In her video statement, Clinton made only a glancing reference to the war in Iraq. She has emerged as a vocal critic of the president and opposes his proposal to send more than 20,000 additional troops into the conflict. But she voted for the war in 2002 and angered some party antiwar activists by standing behind that vote until last month.

Regardless, Clinton brings considerable assets to the race.

As a former first lady now serving her second term in the Senate, she has one of the best-known names in American politics. She has a national network of supporters, the capacity to raise as much or more money than any of her rivals, and a r?sum? of political activity dating back decades that now includes six years in the Senate and a landslide reelection victory in November.

And for the past 15 years, she has shown an ability to weather sometimes harsh attacks from her critics, especially among conservatives.

DOJ_NMG_0119677

But those considerable assets have done nothing to ward off a sizable cadre of rivals. That group includes, in addition to Obama, former North Carolina senator John Edwards, Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, all of whom have established campaign committees.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson plans to declare his intentions today and Delaware Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. has said he will be a candidate. The field also includes Ohio Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich. On the sidelines are Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 nominee, who is considering becoming a candidate, and former vice president Al Gore, the 2000 nominee, who has said he is not likely to run again.

The size and experience of the Democratic field underscores the reality that, for all of her support, fundraising potential and political muscle, Clinton continues to face questions about whether she can win a general election.

The electability issue comes in different forms. Will she suffer from a sense of Clinton fatigue on the part of many voters, who may be looking for the kind of fresh face Obama offers? Is she too defined as a partisan Democrat to fit the mood of an electorate that may be hungry for a different style of politics after eight years of the Clinton presidency and six years of Bush? Have the attacks against her as a cold and calculating politician created an image that, correct or incorrect, will be difficult to overcome?

Wasting no time to confront the issue, Clinton's campaign posted on its Web site a 1,250-word memo from strategist and pollster Mark Penn that begins: "People are always asking, can Hillary Clinton win the presidency? Of course she can."

"The number one asset we have is Hillary Clinton, her strength and leadership," Penn said in an interview. "As more and more people get to know her -- as they know her in New York -- they will like the leadership and the experience she represents."

But many Democrats say she will have to work to overcome skepticism about her candidacy inside the party. "Can they [voters] finally see the reality of Hillary Clinton, not the myth of Hillary Clinton?" said Mickey Kantor, who was commerce secretary in the Clinton administration and supports the senator's candidacy. "The money will be there. . . . The experienced people will be there. All those things she will have. But the image [is something] she will have to turn around in some parts of the country."

Clinton loyalists describe her as the least-known famous person in politics, by which they mean they do not believe people know the real Hillary Clinton. They hope to use town hall meetings, living-room coffees and interactive Internet conversations to reintroduce her to voters. On her Web site yesterday, Clinton emphasized her Midwestern middle-class roots and her cooperation with Republicans in the Senate.

All that may help to personalize her, but her advisers say the most effective way of overcoming questions about her electability is to focus voters' attention on what it takes to be president -- strength, intelligence, discipline and toughness -- all of which they say she already exhibits.

"At the end of the day, people are going to make a decision about who would be the best president, and that's the person they're going to vote for," campaign spokesman Howard Wolfson said.

Campaign officials also believe that Clinton's potential for making history as the nation's first female president will give the campaign added energy, a talking point emphasized in a memo sent to supporters yesterday. "In particular, younger generation women believe it's time we had our first woman president and believe Hillary is the right choice," the memo states.

The Post-ABC News poll demonstrates that she remains the candidate to beat for the nomination. Clinton led the Democratic field with 41 percent, followed by Obama with 17 percent, Edwards with 11 percent and Gore with 10 percent.

She had significantly greater support among women (49 percent) than men (30 percent) and drew about the same support from liberals (38 percent) as moderates (37 percent). Her strongest support came among nonwhite Democrats, 56 percent of whom backed her, despite the presence of Obama, who is the son of a black Kenyan father and white American mother.

In general election tests, she led McCain 50 to 45 percent and was roughly even with Giuliani, with 49 percent to his 47.

More than half the respondents, 54 percent, gave Clinton a favorable rating, while 44 percent viewed her unfavorably. Giuliani, at 61 percent, had a higher rating, but McCain and Obama were both somewhat lower -- 49 and 45 percent, respectively. A quarter of those surveyed had no opinion about Obama and 16 percent had no opinion about McCain.

Sixty-one percent of Americans gave her husband, former president Bill Clinton, a favorable rating.

The poll also suggested that the New York senator may be less damaged by her position on the war than some analysts have suggested. Among Democrats who say the war is the most important issue facing the country -- the overwhelming percentage of whom oppose the war -- Clinton's favorable rating is 76 percent, almost identical among all Democrats, and she wins the support of 43 percent of that group, compared with 18 percent for Obama.

Clinton has more potentially serious problems in some of the early states where the nomination fight will begin. She trails either Edwards or Obama in recent polls in Iowa and has a much more fragile lead (or, in at least one case, is in second place) in New Hampshire. That is one reason campaign advisers want to get her to Iowa and New Hampshire as quickly as possible.

DOJ_NMG_0119678

She will appear publicly in New York this afternoon, and will answer questions from voters during live online chats Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights. Her first trip to Iowa, whose caucuses will kick off the nomination contest, will come next weekend.

Clinton Enters '08 Field, Fueling Race For Money (NYT)

By Patrick Healy, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton jumped into the 2008 presidential race yesterday, immediately squaring off against Senator Barack Obama and the rest of the Democratic field in what is effectively the party's first primary, the competition for campaign donations.

"I'm in," Mrs. Clinton said in an e-mail message to supporters early yesterday. "And I'm in to win."

If successful, Mrs. Clinton, 59, would be the first female nominee of a major American political party, and she would become the first spouse of a former president to seek a return to the White House.

Her entrance into the race followed Mr. Obama's by less than a week, and highlighted the urgency for her of not falling behind in the competition for money, especially in New York, her home turf, where the battle has already reached a fever pitch. It also set off rounds of e-mail messages and conference calls among both her allies and opponents.

George Soros, the billionaire New York philanthropist, has made maximum donations in the past to both candidates, for instance, and last week he faced a choice: support Mr. Obama, who created his committee on Tuesday, or stay neutral and see what Mrs. Clinton and others had to say. In this case, Mr. Obama won.

Mr. Soros sent the maximum contribution, $2,100, to Mr. Obama, the first-term senator from Illinois, just hours after he declared his plans to run.

"Soros believes that Senator Obama brings a new energy to the political system and has the potential to be a transformational leader," said Michael Vachon, a spokesman for Mr. Soros.

Mrs. Clinton's presidential operation is only one day old, but she already finds herself in a breakneck competition against Mr. Obama for fund-raising supremacy in two towns that she and her husband have mined heavily for political gold: New York and Hollywood. Mr. Obama's entrance into the race has also put up for grabs other groups that are primary targets for Mrs. Clinton, including African-Americans and women.

At this early stage in the nomination fight, securing donations and signing up fund-raisers are among the best ways of showing political strength in a crowded field (seven Democrats and counting). And Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton are looking to raise at least $75 million this year alone.

Advisers said yesterday that they had begun corralling donors to build quickly on the formidable $14 million that Mrs. Clinton already had in the bank. They predicted that they would outpace Mr. Obama, though they acknowledged that he is moving impressively to try to match Mrs. Clinton's national fund-raising network, which has been in the making far longer than his.

Mrs. Clinton faces some fatigue among donors after more than 15 years of Clinton fund-raising, Democratic contributors and strategists said, and some skepticism about whether she can win. Yet she has the Democrats' most popular rainmaker at her full disposal, former President Bill Clinton, and she has influential friends like the lawyer and power broker Vernon E. Jordan Jr. to help keep African-American donors and others by her side.

Notably, no prominent Clinton fund-raiser has moved to Mr. Obama's camp (though his aides are working on it). Mrs. Clinton has also lined up a powerful roster of fund-raising and economic advisers in New York, including the financiers Roger Altman, Steven Rattner, Blair W. Effron, Alan Patricof and Mr. Rattner's wife, Maureen White, a former finance chairwoman of the Democratic National Committee.

"Maureen and I will happily do everything we can to help her," Mr. Rattner said. "Based on our long relationship with her, we feel that she has demonstrated incontrovertibly that she would be an effective candidate and a terrific president."

For all of the attention swirling around Mr. Obama, meanwhile, he faces many obstacles as he seeks to become the nation's first black president. His background, including a father from Kenya and a mother from Kansas, has elevated his appeal, but it does little to answer questions about whether he has the experience to serve in the White House.

Picking off Clinton loyalists is no easy task, either. Hours after opening his fund-raising committee on Tuesday, Mr. Obama convened separate conference calls with donors in Chicago and on the East and West Coasts; in the East Coast phone call, according to participants, Mr. Obama asked them to keep an open mind about his candidacy even if they had been allies of Mrs. Clinton.

James Torrey, chairman of the global hedge fund Torrey Funds, said he signed on with Mr. Obama not as a snub to Mrs. Clinton, but because he believed that the Illinois senator had the best chance of inspiring Democrats and other voters.

DOJ_NMG_0119679

"I know it's perceived as an anti-Hillary thing," Mr. Torrey said in an interview Friday. "I think she's marvelous, I think she's a great senator, but I'd rather see Barack Obama as president. I think the Republicans will make it their life's work to bring her down."

Several New York and Hollywood donors offered a similar assessment: they liked Mrs. Clinton as a senator, but worried that her rating in a new Washington Post/ABC News Poll released Saturday was at 41 percent, despite having nearly 100 percent name recognition.

Some of her veteran supporters in New York are now on the fence, including the business executives Orin S. Kramer and Robert Zimmerman, who are active in Democratic politics. Others say they plan to play it safe and contribute to both candidates. In Los Angeles, the producers David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg are working to plan a fund-raiser for Mr. Obama after he officially enters the race, which he is scheduled to do on Feb. 10. Mr. Geffen has signed on with Mr. Obama, while Mr. Katzenberg and Mr. Spielberg have not decided which candidate to formally endorse.

Yet hedging bets with a spread of donations could prove perilous with the Clinton camp, said Bob Kerrey, the former Nebraska senator who is president of the New School University.

"The Clintons value loyalty, and I don't think they are going to risk offending her," Mr. Kerrey said of Mrs. Clinton's traditional supporters, noting that he spoke to several undecided Democrats last week. Referring to Mr. Obama, he added: "He's got to reach out to Hillary's supporters and hope he can persuade some of them. If he doesn't, she's the nominee."

Mr. Zimmerman said he was enthusiastic about Mrs. Clinton. Asked why he had not aligned with her yet, he said: "It's appropriate and respectful to hear every candidate's message."

Mr. Obama is putting together his own finance team to focus on New York. He has hired Julianna Smoot, who helped tap Wall Street money as part of a record-setting team at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee under Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York. He has also dispatched a fund-raiser, Jenny Yeager, to run his New York operation, and he is calling on Robert Wolf, chairman of UBS Americas, to raise money. (A spokeswoman for Mr. Wolf, who has donated to Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats, confirmed that he planned to help Mr. Obama.)

In New York, chief executives, lawyers, entertainers, gay men and lesbians, African-Americans and women have been prominent in political fund-raising for decades — though usually they are picking among outsiders, not hometown friends and allies. Yet the 2008 race will test personal and political loyalties, with Mrs. Clinton preparing to announce a run and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and perhaps former Gov. George E. Pataki moving to seek the Republican nomination. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is also being encouraged to run as an independent.

The attention given to Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama is making fund-raising that much more difficult for other Democrats. While former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina still hopes to tap into a network of supporters among trial lawyers, his former profession, and to build an army of grass-roots donors, strategists for other candidates conceded that raising money would be an uphill battle and said it was an open question whether there was room for more than one alternative to Mrs. Clinton.

"I just got off the phone with someone who said, 'It's between Edwards and Obama,' and with a little nudging I pushed him over to the Obama camp," said Jeh Johnson, a partner at the Paul, Weiss law firm in New York who has been making fund-raising calls on behalf of Mr. Obama.

Mr. Johnson, who was general counsel for the Air Force in the Clinton administration, said younger Democrats and women — crucial parts of Mrs. Clinton's base — were excited about Mr. Obama. "I haven't encountered many New Yorkers who say, 'No, I'm not interested, I'm a Hillary supporter,' " he said.

The competition for supporters — and contributors — extends well beyond New York. And Mr. Obama could complicate Mrs. Clinton's fund-raising efforts in Chicago, another lucrative base for Democrats. In her Senate re-election bid last year, she raised nearly $700,000 from Illinois, her native state.

One Democratic operative, who has knowledge of Mrs. Clinton's fund-raising operation in the Midwest, called donors in Chicago last week after Mr. Obama's announcement, asking whether it would be foolhardy to sign onto the Clinton campaign if he was in the race. While party officials say Mr. Obama will have an advantage in Chicago, they said Mrs. Clinton would still find considerable support there.

While Mr. Obama has never run a national campaign, his political action committee, the Hopefund, has attracted a broad base of contributors from across the country.

In the New York entertainment industry, too, Mr. Obama's candidacy has received raves. Hours after his announcement Tuesday, the Broadway producer Margo Lion sent out an e-mail message urging her friends to donate to him — making clear that the theater community was not locked down by Mrs. Clinton.

"Along with many others in the industry, I will be producing a fund-raiser at the St. James Theater later this spring" for Mr. Obama, Ms. Lion wrote. "We need to find a new direction for our country, and finally, we have the man to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0119680

Announcement Sends Race Into High Gear (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's entry into the 2008 presidential contest yesterday set off rounds of e-mail messages and conference calls among both her allies and opponents, some of whom were shaking their heads that a major political event was happening early on a Saturday morning.

Advisers to some of her top 2008 rivals — Senators John McCain and Barack Obama, and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts — replied within minutes to requests for comment, and signaled that the Clinton announcement meant that the 2008 race was truly under way.

"She's tough enough, smart enough and experienced enough to overcome a decidedly liberal philosophy," said John Weaver, a senior adviser to Mr. McCain, who is preparing to seek the Republican presidential nomination.

"The Clinton, Obama, Edwards chain match will be hard to avert my eyes from, speaking as a pure spectator, of course," Mr. Weaver added, referring to former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina. (At least four other Democrats are preparing to campaign as well.)

Clinton advisers said that they chose Jan. 20 as the target date for an announcement during a meeting in mid-December, and that Mrs. Clinton was "raring to go" on Friday.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," Mrs. Clinton said in announcing the formation of a presidential exploratory committee on her Web site, HillaryClinton.com. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them."

The advisers said she wanted to announce yesterday so that she would dominate the weekend news and Sunday talk shows, and to demonstrate a contrast in leadership with President Bush as he prepares for his State of the Union speech on Tuesday night.

Next weekend, she plans to campaign across Iowa, the site of the first presidential caucuses in January 2008, and visit the early primary state of New Hampshire soon after.

Mrs. Clinton appears at the head of the Democratic pack in many national polls, yet she is in a tighter spot in some voter surveys in Iowa and New Hampshire, which begin the presidential nominating process. Recent polls show Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards doing well in those states.

"She has not spent as much time in those state as in others, but this is a woman who is not a stranger for hard work, and who is prepared to go out and work hard for every vote," said one Clinton adviser, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not want to openly acknowledge that she was running behind to anyone.

Other than Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards, the 2008 Democratic field at this stage also includes Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut; former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa; and Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio. An eighth possible candidate, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, was expected to declare today that he is forming an exploratory committee.

Clinton Joins 2008 Race For President (LAT)

By Stephen Braun, Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton made her long-anticipated entrance Saturday into the 2008 presidential race, aiming to make history as the first woman elected to the White House after an audacious and turbulent political journey from first lady to a New York Senate seat.

"I'm in," she said in a statement accompanying a video airing on her newly unveiled campaign website. "And I'm in to win."

Clinton, 59, long has been viewed by most Democratic insiders as the odds-on favorite to capture her party's presidential nod. But doubts have surrounded her prospects of winning the general election. And of late, her status in the nomination race has become more clouded, in part by the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

She sets out with strong advantages — national name recognition, a command of the major issues, a crack campaign staff and a brimming war chest.

But she will also have to overcome her reputation for political calculation, an inconsistent stump presence and her intimate ties to the polarizing events of her husband's White House tenure, from the collapse of its healthcare initiative in 1994 to the 1998-99 impeachment crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0119681

Clinton held back from a formal announcement of her candidacy, taking the preliminary step of forming an exploratory committee. But her campaign quickly kicked into overdrive; a mass e-mail soliciting donations was sent to her vast base of support, and aides made preparations for her to make appearances in the coming days in Iowa and New Hampshire, sites of the crucial early contests in the nominating process.

In her video clip and written statement, Clinton lost no time in confronting two of the major questions that loom as hurdles to her drive for the nomination — how she will reckon with her early support for the war in Iraq and whether wary voters will look beyond the furors of her eight high-profile years as Bill Clinton's influential first lady.

"How do we bring the war in Iraq to the right end?" Clinton asked on the video.

Although she simply raised the question in her announcement, last week she waded more deeply into the intensifying debate over the war by proposing a cap on troop levels in Iraq. That suggestion was spurned by the Bush administration and questioned by some of her own party's antiwar activists as fainthearted.

Up against the GOP

In a message clearly aimed at Democratic primary voters, Clinton in her statement also declared that she was eminently electable and braced to ward off organized attempts by conservatives and Republican rivals to demonize her past.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," said Clinton, who breezed to reelection in November after easily first winning her Senate seat in 2000.

"After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them," she said.

The final vote in the 2008 election is almost two years away, however, and Clinton must first pass a potentially tough cast of Democratic challengers.

Her entry into the race came five days after a similar move by Obama, whose magnetic appeal and electrifying speeches have quickly positioned him as a threat to her prospects. In his bid to become the first black president, he has added his own historic dimension to the campaign that competes with Clinton's path-breaking effort.

Responding to Clinton's announcement, Obama said: "I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back to work."

What the polls say

A conflicting spate of recent polls suggested Clinton is poised at the top of the field, but they also showed Obama would be a formidable foe in the early contests, as would former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

A Washington Post-ABC News nationwide poll released Saturday of Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents showed Clinton far ahead of the pack. She was backed by 41%, compared with 17% for Obama and 11% for Edwards.

But a survey released last week by pollster John Zogby of likely Democratic voters in the New Hampshire primary showed Obama slightly ahead, with Clinton and Edwards tied.

Already in full campaign mode, Edwards has staked out a strong antiwar position, disavowing his 2002 Senate vote to authorize the Iraq invasion. His aides suggest that Clinton's refusal to do the same could harm her chances among Democratic activists in Iowa and New Hampshire, where sentiment against the war runs high.

In the primary campaign, Clinton can be expected to emphasize her political experience — especially in contrast to Obama, who has been in the Senate barely more than two years, and Edwards, who quit the chamber after one term.

Clinton has established a reputation as a hardworking lawmaker. She secured a seat on the Senate Armed Services Committee and, in the wake of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, concentrated on domestic security issues. She also has sought better benefits for members of the military and focused on improving the economy of upstate New York.

Often taking nuanced stances on hot-button issues, she has made a point of working with conservative Republicans. She joined with Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) — who as a House member had helped prosecute the impeachment case against her husband — in sponsoring legislation designed to aid domestic U.S. manufacturers.

Several Clinton supporters said her decision to announce her presidential intentions Saturday had been planned more than three weeks ago, with a target date carefully slotted to fall after she returned from last week's fact-finding trip to Iraq and Afghanistan and before President Bush's State of the Union speech Tuesday.

Clinton aides said Obama's announcement last Tuesday that he was establishing an exploratory committee was not a key factor in settling on the timing of her statement.

Her move was also carefully coordinated, aides said, so that an intricately designed website would spring to life at the same time the e-mail appeal for money was sent out. As part of the Internet effort, Clinton will take questions from prospective voters during three nightly Web sessions, starting Monday.

"Let's chat," she urged breezily.

Signals to women

DOJ_NMG_0119682

Clinton took care in her announcement to send signals to the constituency she and her aides hope will provide her campaign with much of its energy — women eager to send one of their own to the White House for the first time.

Clinton noted her role in working on "family" issues of healthcare and education, and pointedly referred to her 1998 trip to China as first lady "to affirm that women's rights are human rights."

Deputy campaign spokesman Phil Singer said, "This is a historic candidacy that will energize the largest voting bloc in America — women."

Even before her announcement, Clinton won an important nod from Ellen R. Malcolm, the director of Emily's List, a well-financed Washington political organization that provides support for pro-choice Democratic women running for office.

"Many of us have waited a lifetime for this opportunity," Malcolm said.

Clinton's campaign structure solidified in recent weeks as she debriefed key party officials across the country, hired veteran campaign aides and huddled almost daily with a star-studded circle of advisors that included her husband and many of his former top staffers.

During her 2006 Senate reelection campaign, Clinton invested more than $11 million to amass a list identifying hundreds of thousands of supporters and low-figure donors. Despite spending more than $35 million, Clinton still has $14 million on hand — far outstripping any of her rivals.

To raise the estimated $100 million or more that experts say the major campaigns will need, Clinton also has built a dependable pyramid of wealthy supporters. Her strongest bases are New York's financial center — where she can count on Wall Street heavyweights such as venture capitalist Alan J. Patricof, former Clinton deputy Treasury secretary Roger Altman and investment banker Steven Rattner — and Southern California, where staunch supporters include entertainment industry stalwarts Haim Saban and Sherry Lansing and billionaire businessman Ron Burkle.

"I spoke to her today and told her, 'We're ready to go,' " Saban said Saturday. "I'm awaiting instructions."

A field well set

With Clinton's move into the race — and the expected entry today of New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson — many political observers regard the field of serious Democratic presidential candidates as fairly well set. There is still some talk that former presidential nominees Al Gore and Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts may join the race. But even without them, Democrats will choose from an array of candidates.

Clinton is regarded with wary respect by aides to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), considered by many the early front-runner for the GOP nomination. "People underestimate her at their own political peril," John Weaver, McCain's top political advisor, said Saturday.

Weaver described Clinton as "diligent," a word that only begins to depict the habitual caution and steely preparation of a woman immersed in the minutiae of politics since her teenage years.

Path to the White House

Once a devotee of conservative icon Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Wellesley College and Yale Law School graduate drifted to the left by the early 1970s, working as a House Judiciary committee staffer during the Watergate investigation of President Nixon.

She moved to Arkansas, marrying Bill Clinton (whom she met at law school) and helping steer him toward the state's governorship and then the presidency. During his 1992 campaign against former President George H.W. Bush, Bill Clinton advertised their pairing as a political "twofer." And once in office, he gave his wife an important role in domestic policy, especially on family and children's issues.

But her push for a comprehensive national healthcare policy collapsed and was a factor in the GOP's winning control of Congress in 1994. From then on, the first lady was often on the defensive, dogged by GOP-sponsored investigations into White House travel abuses and an Arkansas land deal; the suicide of her close aide, Vince Foster; and finally, her husband's sexual relationship with intern Monica S. Lewinsky that led to the impeachment proceedings.

At first fiercely supporting her husband when news of the Lewinsky scandal broke, Clinton said they had been targeted by a "vast right-wing conspiracy." But as details of President Clinton's affair emerged, their marriage teetered, she later acknowledged in her autobiography.

2000 Senate victory

Even before her husband's administration officially ended in January 2001, Clinton had made history by winning her Senate seat in the 2000 campaign — becoming the first first lady to gain an elected office.

In the Senate, her delicate dance on Iraq helped her cut a more moderate profile, which could help her in a general election contest. But it remains a potential problem for Democratic primary voters.

Although she has opposed Bush's troop buildup, she has not set a timetable for withdrawal and remained silent as other Democratic lawmakers have repudiated their vote for the invasion of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0119683

Dissent from the left has created an opening for some of her rivals, but her commanding lead in fundraising and fame positions her to overcome such criticism.

"She is the 800-pound gorilla in this race," said Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster who is neutral in the primary. "Could [the Iraq issue] cost her something? Yes, but a 600-pound gorilla is still pretty big. Being the front-runner means she can afford to sustain some blows."

"I'm In To Win" White House, Hillary Says (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton -- newly re-elected to the Senate representing the state of New York -- formed a presidential exploratory committee yesterday with hopes of returning to the White House eight years after departing as first lady.

On her campaign Web site, she wrote: "I'm in. And I'm in to win."

"I'm not just starting a campaign, though, I'm beginning a conversation -- with you, with America," she said in a video announcement posted yesterday on the site. "Because we all need to be part of the discussion if we're all going to be part of the solution. And all of us have to be part of the solution."

A front-runner even before she entered the contest, Mrs. Clinton made her announcement just days after Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois said on his Web site that he, too, intends to run for president. New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson is expected to announce his own presidential bid today.

The announcements set up a historic race that will include Mrs. Clinton, who would be the first female president if elected; Mr. Obama, who would be the first black president; and Mr. Richardson, who would become the first Hispanic president.

The Clinton campaign quickly seized upon its front-runner status yesterday by going directly into full-campaign mode, issuing statements and updates throughout the day.

"Demonstrating the ground-swell of enthusiasm generated by her historic candidacy, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's announcement for president lit up the Internet today, garnering rave reviews in the blogosphere and thousands of supporters flocking to her Web site each hour," the campaign reported yesterday afternoon.

The air of inevitability that Mrs. Clinton will receive the Democratic nomination is crucial for fundraising, an art that Mrs. Clinton already has mastered. She has more than $14 million in her campaign account after spending more than $30 million in a decisive victory over her underfunded Republican challenger in November's election.

In another announcement yesterday, the Clinton campaign touted the latest poll conducted by The Washington Post and ABC News showing Mrs. Clinton with a commanding lead over the entire field of potential Democratic hopefuls.

Mrs. Clinton garnered 41 percent among Democrats; Mr. Obama took 17 percent; and former Sen. John Edwards, the North Carolina Democrat who was his party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, netted 11 percent. Former Vice President Al Gore garnered 10 percent, and Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, drew 8 percent. No other potential candidates earned more than 3 percent.

The poll, conducted last week among 561 Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents, shows virtually no change from last month, suggesting that the intense buzz surrounding Mr. Obama's candidacy has had little real impact.

Mr. Obama issued a statement welcoming Mrs. Clinton to the contest.

"Senator Clinton is a good friend and a colleague whom I greatly respect," he said. "I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track."

In her announcement, Mrs. Clinton laid out several key issues she hopes to address in her campaign, leading with an attempt to disarm one of the most explosive obstacles in her path to the nomination: her 2002 vote authorizing the war in Iraq.

"Let's talk about how to bring the right end to the war in Iraq and to restore respect for America around the world," she said, seated on a sofa beside a large cushion embroidered with a floral pattern.

Mrs. Clinton also mentioned her hope for energy independence, an "end to the deficits that threaten Social Security and Medicare," and "how every American can have quality, affordable health care."

Mrs. Clinton also tried tapping into the general exhaustion over the current administration.

"You know, after six years of George Bush, it is time to renew the promise of America," she said.

Also announcing his presidential intentions yesterday was Sen. Sam Brownback, the Kansas Republican whose staunch pro-life positions have endeared him to many Christian conservatives.

Last week, Mr. Brownback offered a bleak assessment of the Iraq war and said he opposes Mr. Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq. But in his announcement address yesterday, he sounded a more optimistic tone.

"It is a long fight. We will win," he told an audience in his hometown of Topeka. "We cannot lose our will to win. We must win to redeem our troops' sacrifice."

DOJ_NMG_0119684

The Washington Post/ABC poll showed Mr. Brownback lingering at the back of the pack, with about 1 percent support from Republicans.

Leading the Republican field was former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani with 34 percent, followed by Sen. John McCain of Arizona with 27 percent. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich each garnered 9 percent.

The survey of Democrats had a margin of error of 4 percentage points. The survey of Republicans had a margin of error of 5 percentage points.

Clinton Joins Race: "I'm In To Win" (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, January 21, 2007

NEW YORK – Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton launched a trailblazing campaign for the White House on Saturday, a former first lady turned political powerhouse intent on becoming the first female president.

"I'm in. And I'm in to win," she said.

In a videotaped message posted on her Web site, Mrs. Clinton said she was eager to start a dialogue with voters about challenges she hoped to tackle as president – affordable health care, deficit reduction and bringing the "right" end to the Iraq war.

"I'm not just starting a campaign, though, I'm beginning a conversation with you, with America," she said. "Let's talk. Let's chat. The conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think?"

Mrs. Clinton's announcement, while widely anticipated, was nonetheless historic in a fast-developing race that has already seen the emergence of a formidable contender, Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

In an instant, Mrs. Clinton became the most credible female candidate ever to seek the presidency and the first presidential spouse to attempt to return to the White House in her own right. Her husband, Bill, served two terms as president from 1993 to 2001.

With her immense star power, vast network of supporters and donors and seasoned team of political advisers, the 59-year-old Mrs. Clinton long has topped every national poll of potential Democratic contenders.

"The front-runner has just stepped on the stage," observed Charlie Cook, the nonpartisan political analyst and author of the authoritative Cook Political Report.

Pressure to decide

But since joining the field, Mr. Obama has secured the backing of a number of prominent fundraisers, including billionaire philanthropist George Soros, stepping up the pressure on Mrs. Clinton to disclose her plans.

Her controversial tenure as first lady left her a deeply polarizing figure among voters, leading many Democrats to doubt Mrs. Clinton's viability in a general election.

In a detailed statement posted on her Web site, Mrs. Clinton sought to acknowledge and bat away such doubts.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," she wrote. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate and how to beat them."

Recently, Mrs. Clinton has clashed with many in her own party over the Iraq war.

Mrs. Clinton supported the 2002 resolution authorizing military intervention in Iraq. She has refused to recant her vote or call for a deadline for the removal of troops. She has announced her opposition to President Bush's troop increase in Iraq and has introduced legislation capping troop levels.

"A woman candidate could find it easier to run in peacetime, rather than wartime, but Senator Clinton's tried to position herself as a serious person on national security," said Andrew Polsky, a presidential historian at Hunter College. "But that means she's staked out a difficult position on the war that won't make it easy for her to get the Democratic nomination."

With a $14 million campaign treasury, Mrs. Clinton starts with an impressive fundraising advantage over the rest of the Democratic field. But Mr. Obama and others have started to secure fundraising commitments from New York, California and other deep-pocketed, Clinton-friendly areas.

Her creation of a presidential exploratory committee, announced Saturday, allows her to raise money for the campaign; she already has lined up campaign staff.

In tone and substance, Mrs. Clinton's videotaped announcement recalled her first Senate race in New York in 2000, where she conducted a "listening tour" of the state's 62 counties before formally entering the contest.

She promised a three-day series of Web chats with voters beginning Monday and prepared a campaign swing late this coming week through the early caucusing state of Iowa, while a visit to New Hampshire was in the works.

Today, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson was also set to enter the Democratic field; if elected, he would be the first Hispanic president.

DOJ_NMG_0119685

John Edwards of North Carolina and several other veteran politicians are also running.

Outsize candidacies

The sizable field of candidates underscores the belief that, for all of Mrs. Clinton's experience and credentials, there are Democrats who question whether she can win a general election.

For the short term at least, the outsize candidacies of Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama are expected to soak up the lion's share of attention.

Mr. Obama, who launched his own presidential committee on Tuesday, praised Mrs. Clinton as a friend and colleague.

"I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track," he said in a statement.

An influential player in her husband's political career in Arkansas, Mrs. Clinton leapt to the national scene during the 1992 presidential campaign when husband and wife fought to survive the scandal over Gennifer Flowers' allegations of a lengthy affair with Mr. Clinton when he was the state's governor.

As first lady, Mrs. Clinton headed up a disastrous first-term effort to overhaul the health care insurance system. There was more controversy as the couple battled allegations of impropriety over land deals and fundraising, missing records from her former Arkansas law firm and even her quick and hefty profits from an investment in cattle futures.

There was no letup in the second term. The president found himself denying – then admitting – a sexual relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. As he battled impeachment and possible removal from office, his wife's poll numbers rose.

Her own political career began to take shape in late 1998 when New York Democrat Daniel Patrick Moynihan announced he would not seek re-election to the Senate seat he had held since 1976 and she decided to run.

The campaign trail was not always friendly. For almost every cheer, there was a shouted "Go home, Hillary!" and the emerging Republican theme that carpetbagger Clinton simply wanted to use New York as a launching pad for a later presidential run.

Republicans Party Over Prospect Of Her As Nominee (NYDN)

By Thomas M. DeFrank

New York Daily News, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - She's hardly a pushover, but top Republican leaders think Hillary Clinton's candidacy is a dream come true.

GOP strategists aren't silly enough to discount Clinton's impressive assets: rock-star appeal, enormous name recognition, a five-star political machine, bulging treasury and a trailblazer pedigree that will drive millions of proud women to the polls.

"Make no mistake about it, she will be the Democrat nominee and she can absolutely be elected President," one of President Bush's closest political confidants said yesterday.

Indeed, the standard line, heard from party leaders on down to precinct chairmen, is that the junior senator from New York is an exceedingly formidable opponent.

"I think she could win," Vice President Cheney said last October. "I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for President."

Even so, Republicans have been lying in wait for Clinton for months, honing their attack strategy and hoping those leaks from Democratic tacticians worried about Hillary's - and her husband's - political baggage wouldn't derail the senator's outsize ambitions.

Now that she's in to stay, Republicans know they're facing a huge, nasty brawl to hang onto the White House next year. But many party elders believe she can be had.

"She's the one Democrat capable of uniting and galvanizing every person in our party, even the ones mad at Bush," a senior GOP election strategist said recently.

Republicans say Hillary loses in the end for these factors:

The country wants the uniter, not a divider that Bush promised but wasn't - and Hillary is the most turbocharged polarizer on the planet.

Voters still aren't ready for a female President, but they're embarrassed to admit their bias to pollsters, so Hillary's numbers are inflated.

Elections are won in the middle, and Hillary is Ted Kennedy in a pantsuit. "She can zig and zag all she wants," a senior GOP planner said yesterday, "but she will never convince anyone she's anything but an oldfashioned liberal."

She and Bill Clinton's complicated personal life is the kind of below-the-radar drag that never goes away, no matter how many times Hillary scoffs at what she calls "mythology."

DOJ_NMG_0119686

Still, Hillary is a powerhouse of a candidate, and beating her won't be easy. "You are going to see the roughest, most hard-fought election in the history of America," another senior GOP strategist predicted, "and it will come down to one state or two."

Hillary Clinton Eyes Presidency (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON—Calling for a national conversation to undo what she sees as the damage wrought by President Bush, Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York launched her presidential campaign Saturday with a polished videotaped announcement, making history as the only former first lady to run for the nation's highest office.

"The frontrunner has just stepped on the stage," observed Charlie Cook, the non-partisan political analyst and author of the authoritative Cook Political Report.

With massive resources and a worldwide profile, she instantly became the most serious woman candidate ever to run for president. Her decision to form an exploratory committee for president is expected to swamp many of the other Democratic candidates as they hunt for money, organization and voter support that she has already locked up during years of preparation.

Still, Clinton faces many serious challenges. She has an image as divisive and polarizing; she made grave mistakes in taking the lead on trying to remake the health care system in the 1990s; and she has been considered slow to renounce her vote to go to war in Iraq, a touchstone issue for party activists who dominate the nominatng process.

Nevertheless, Clinton, who grew up in Park Ridge, made clear that her campaign is no mere symbol or quixotic venture.

"I'm in it," she said. "I'm in to win."

"This is the first woman in our history who will be taken seriously by everyone," said Ruth Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) announced his intention to run for president last Tuesday, creating his own wave of excitement about the historic nature of an African-American candidate for president. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina is running, too, with a focus on eradicating poverty. And New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who would be the first Latino to run for the White House, is expected to announce his candidacy Sunday.

"For all the excitement and focus on Obama, she's the one who almost has Obama and Edwards lapped in terms of poll numbers and very likely money," said Cook.

A new ABC-Washington Post poll showed Clinton leading Obama 41-17 among Democratic-leaning voters. Edwards received 11 percent support, while former Vice President Al Gore got 10 percent and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry received 8 percent. Neither Gore nor Kerry, the 2004 nominee, has said he is running for president in 2008.

Obama welcomed Clinton and other candidates into the race Saturday "as allies in the work of getting our country back on track."

Clinton struck just that theme in her announcement on her Web site, www.hillaryclinton.com.

"I want you to join me not just for the campaign but for a conversation about the future of our country—about the bold but practical changes we need to overcome six years of Bush administration failures," said Clinton, a New York senator since 2001 and first lady for eight years beginning in 1993.

Marking the growing importance of the Internet to political campaigns, Clinton asked voters to join her in a series of Web chats over three days beginning Monday at 7 p.m. to discuss the future of the nation. It is the virtual equivalent of the listening tours Clinton took throughout New York as she ran for Senate as a non-New Yorker.

"This is a big election with some very big questions," said Clinton, sitting on her living room couch in a warm red blazer. "How do we bring the war in Iraq to the right end? How can we make sure every American has access to adequate health care? How will we ensure our children inherit a clean environment and energy independence? How can we reduce the deficits that threaten Social Security and Medicare?"

She used her video announcement to introduce herself, but also to let voters know she believes she is tough enough to win, whatever attacks may come her way.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," said Clinton, who coined the phrase "vast, right-wing conspiracy" to denounce critics of her husband's presidential administration.

"After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them," she said.

Clinton has been elected easily in New York and won praise for her constituent services. In the Senate, she has worked with Republicans and has modulated her position on abortion, while continuing to favor abortion rights.

Emily's List, the nation's largest political action committee, immediately endorsed Clinton, pledging to raise as much money for her as possible from its 100,000 members. The PAC is dedicated to electing women candidates who support abortion rights.

DOJ_NMG_0119687

"She's been through the fires of the political wars and has shown that she's tough and doesn't rattle and can stay focused and be effective," said Ellen Malcolm, president of Emily's List. "Women across the country are going to be excited and energized and wanting to help elect the first woman president."

Clinton is making history in more than one way. She is the first woman to run who would be trying to win the same high office once held by her husband, former President Bill Clinton. And she is the first woman to run for president who is considered credible enough to win.

In recent history, Elizabeth Dole—now a North Carolina senator—ran for president in 2000 in the Republican primary, but she never gained traction and dropped out of the race early. In 1987, former Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.) ran for president, but failed to mount a serious campaign.

Expectations for Clinton, however, are far different given her longstanding political connections and her ability to raise money. She already has a campaign staff in place.

"She's been preparing for a long time, she has the experience, the background, knowledge, the ambition, the organization," said Mandel.

Still, top-tier candidates in the past have been unable to convert their charisma or their cash-on-hand into the votes required to win.

"There's something that can trip up any candidate, you never know," said Mandel.

For now, one of Clinton's biggest challenges may come from Obama, who has generated excitement among voters almost everywhere he goes. He's also drawn high-powered fundraising support from billionaire George Soros and lavish words of praise from talk-show host Oprah Winfrey.

But Obama has never been through a rigorous campaign, nor has he experienced the roughness of a presidential race as Clinton has.

"I think he's going to have a very, very hard time beating her," Cook said. "What you've got is a boxer from the YMCA level going into the world championship fight. He's never taken a punch, he's never had a tough race."

Clinton Gives Her Answer To Voters: I'm In (BOS)

By Susan Milligan

The Boston Globe, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, hounded for months with questions about her presidential ambitions, gave a two-word answer yesterday to voters: "I'm in."

In an Internet video statement, the New York Democrat and former first lady said she would be forming an exploratory committee to determine whether she will become a formal candidate for the Democratic nomination in 2008, the first step in launching a full-scale campaign.

"You know, after six years of George Bush, it is time to renew the promise of America -- our basic bargain that no matter who you are or where you live, if you work hard and play by the rules, you can build a good life for yourself and your family," Clinton said, addressing voters alone, with no sign of her husband, former president Bill Clinton.

Seated on a living room couch and speaking as though she were addressing a small gathering instead of millions of voters, Clinton promised to begin a "conversation" with Americans to solicit views on how to end the war in Iraq and deal with issues including energy independence, health care, and the federal deficit.

The tactic mirrors the "listening tour" Clinton took of New York State before her successful campaign for the US Senate seat in 2000. Clinton's nonstop travel to small towns around the state has been credited with winning over an initially skeptical upstate New York and delivering her the US Senate seat.

"So let's talk. Let's chat. Let's start a dialogue about your ideas and mine," Clinton said, gesticulating casually with her hands on a website that refers to the US senator by her first name. "Because the conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think? And we can all see how well that works."

The second-term senator joins a crowded pack of Democrats seeking the nomination, including several current and former colleagues. Her biggest threats, according to public opinion polls and political polls, are charismatic Illinois Senator Barack Obama and John Edwards , former North Carolina senator, who has been leading an antipoverty center since his unsuccessful run for the vice presidency in 2004.

Antiwar Democrats have complained Clinton has never categorically renounced her 2002 vote for the use of force in Iraq, as other candidates have done. Clinton last week laid out a plan for phased withdrawal of troops from Iraq.

Clinton, 59, has major advantages in fund-raising ability, name recognition, and the historic quality of her candidacy, one of the few launched by a woman for the White House. But both Obama, a newcomer whose message of unity has electrified crowds in his early campaign, and Edwards, an antiwar candidate who has highlighted the plight of the working poor, are strong rivals, analysts say.

DOJ_NMG_0119688

"She's the national front-runner, but she's not the runaway favorite anymore," said John Zogby , a pollster in upstate New York. "She's running against Jack Kennedy and Bobby Kennedy," he said, referring to Edwards and Obama.

Also running among Democrats are Senators Joseph Biden of Delaware and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, Representative Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, and Tom Vilsack, former Iowa governor. Governor Bill Richardson of New Mexico is scheduled to announce his plans today , while Senator John F. Kerry , Democrat of Massachusetts, is expected to reveal his intentions soon.

Senator Sam Brownback , a Kansas Republican, announced yesterday that he will seek the GOP nomination. Brownback, one of the most prominent antiabortion lawmakers in Congress, is competing against Mitt Romney , former Massachusetts governor, for the social conservative vote.

Clinton is scheduled to make a public appearance in New York today, and said she will participate in online video chats during the week starting tomorrow.

Obama, who also used a video Web format to announce his exploratory committee last week, said he welcomed Clinton into the race. "Senator Clinton is a good friend and a colleague whom I greatly respect. I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track," Obama said in a statement.

Long expected by both supporters and critics, Clinton's announcement yesterday captured an immediate endorsement from EMILY's List , an influential group that raises funds for Democratic women who are abortion rights activists . It was the group's first-ever presidential endorsement.

"I think some people had worries and concerns anticipating the run, but now that it's begun, there's a tremendous sense of excitement," said Ellen Malcolm , president of EMILY's List. "I think there's no question women will be tremendously excited about electing the first woman president."

The New York senator brings an impressive resume to the race, and has a vast network of political supporters and donors. Her political career has blossomed since 1992, when she was derided by some for saying, "I suppose I could have stayed home and baked cookies and had teas," but instead pursued a career in law while her husband was in the Arkansas governor's mansion.

As first lady, Clinton headed a health care task force that ultimately ended in a political debacle for both Clintons, with the plan rejected on Capitol Hill. After a painful public examination of her marriage after Bill Clinton's affair with former intern Monica Lewinsky was revealed, Hillary Rodham Clinton rallied in 2000, persuading New York voters to send an Illinois native and former Arkansas first lady to the US Senate.

In the Senate, Clinton has drawn respect from both parties for her knowledge and hard work. But she remains a divisive figure nationwide, a factor political consultants and pollsters say is her biggest early hurdle to capturing the Democratic nomination.

"There are people who might be looking for a change, who might not be comfortable with a Bush-Clinton-Bush-Clinton sequence" in the White House," said Lee Miringoff , director of the Marist Institute for Public Opinion in Poughkeepsie, N.Y. A recent Marist poll showed that 47 percent of American voters would never vote for Clinton, and "that doesn't leave a lot of room for error," Miringoff said.

Zogby -- whose polling last week showed Clinton trailing Obama in New Hampshire, site of the first primary, and behind Edwards in Iowa, the location of the first Democratic caucuses -- said Clinton looked "feminine enough, commanding enough, and smart enough" in her video. But he and other Democrats said Clinton must now assure the party that she is electable.

"She's got to prove to Democrats first that she is a winner," said Peter Fenn , a Washington-based Democratic consultant. "She's got to convince the people who like her, like what she stands for, who like the idea of a Clinton presidency, but are reluctant to go on the bandwagon because they're not sure she can win."

While other candidates, like Obama, are trying to become better known nationally, Clinton must counter negative impressions held by voters who have never seen her in person or heard her speak on issues -- a challenge Clinton has acknowledged.

"You may think you know about me, but I may be the most famous person you know very little about," Clinton said during a National Public Radio interview last month. "I'd like to make sure the record is clear and then people can make their own judgments."

Clinton Announces 2008 Presidential Bid (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, January 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119689

"I'm in. And I'm in to win."

With these words, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton Saturday launched a historic and hyped bid for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, a first step toward her goal of becoming the nation's first female commander in chief.

In a conversational two-minute video filmed in the parlor of White Haven, her Washington mansion, the former first lady announced a presidential exploratory committee -- then quickly added that she won't just be exploring, she's actually running.

Wasting little time, Clinton is traveling to Iowa next weekend, her first trip to an early primary or caucus state and, to some extent, an act of political self-preservation. She's currently running fourth among Iowa's liberal Democratic voters behind Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, former vice presidential candidate John Edwards and ex-Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

Clinton is likely to visit New Hampshire in the next several weeks, according to people familiar with her plans.

"As we campaign to win the White House, we will make history and remake our future," Clinton, 59, said in a statement posted along with the video on HillaryClinton.com. "This campaign is our moment, our chance to stand up for the principles and values that we cherish."

Receptionists at HILL PAC, the senator's sprawling Washington-based political action committee, began answering the phones "Hillary for president" Saturday.

Clinton, who has been criticized by many in the party's left wing for voting to authorize the Iraq war in October 2002, said she would use the campaign to "talk about how to bring the right end to the war in Iraq and to restore respect for America around the world."

The video was recorded last Wednesday, a day after Obama aired a similar video announcing his own exploratory committee on his campaign site, BarackObama.com. In that statement, Obama didn't go as far as Clinton, saying he'd announce his final plans Feb. 10.

Clinton's timing had nothing to do with Obama's announcement, staffers said. But it did come just in time to be discussed on the national Sunday morning news shows.

Still, Clinton's entry into the race comes as her sheen of inevitability has been stripped away by Obama and Edwards, who are battling her for big-money donors and leverage with interest groups, especially unions.

Saturday was the latest leg of what has surely been one of the longest, strangest trips in modern politics.

Born to a middle-class family in Chicago, Clinton achieved national renown as an anti-Vietnam activist at Wellesley College in the late 1960s and then as a student leader at Yale University Law School, where she met Bill Clinton.

Following a stint as a congressional lawyer on the Watergate committee, she married Clinton and served as first lady of Arkansas while moonlighting as a Rose Law Firm partner, Legal Services Corporation official and children's rights activist.

In 2000, after eight tumultuous years in the White House that included her failed health care reform attempt, she was elected to fill the New York Senate seat vacated by Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

Clinton was re-elected last year by a landslide, spending more than $50 million, much of it to develop a direct-mail and donor database that will be used for her presidential run.

She still has about $14 million in the bank. Clinton's fearsome fundraising operation, arguably the best of its kind in either party, will be officially back in business next week to raise the $75 million to $100 million she'll need for the primaries.

Clinton is the last of the major 2008 contenders to create an exploratory committee, a step already taken by Obama, Edwards, and Republicans John McCain and Rudolph Giuliani.

N.Y. Dems Cheer Clinton Announcement, GOP Says, "We Told You So" (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — Democrats in New York offered up whoopees while Republicans had scolding "we-told-you-so" reminders Saturday in the wake of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's entry into the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

"She understands the enormous challenges that America faces and she's going to make a great president," former state Democratic Party Chairwoman Judith Hope, who is close to both Clintons, told The Associated Press just minutes after New York's junior senator launched her website announcement.

"I think it's an exciting moment in history for New York women, for American women and, in fact, for women around the world," added Hope, who heads "Eleanor's Legacy," a New York-based political action committee named for former first lady Eleanor Roosevelt and dedicated to advancing the political careers of women candidates.

But John Spencer, the former Yonkers mayor who was crushed by Clinton as she won a second Senate term in November, said the announcement came as no surprise and simply proved what he had complained about throughout their campaign — that New York would have an "absentee senator."

DOJ_NMG_0119690

"Senator Clinton is not going to be in New York," he told the AP on Saturday when reached at his Yonkers home. "She's going to be in New Hampshire and Iowa and South Carolina and fighting with (Democratic presidential candidate rival) Barack Obama and others, and that takes away from the everyday needs of New Yorkers."

"Mrs. Clinton running for president, now there's a new story," former state GOP Chairman Stephen Minarik told the AP. "Mrs. Clinton should be embarrassed by her deceptive game she played out on New York voters last year."

In fact, during the campaign against Spencer, Clinton had said she realized there was a lot of talk about her possibly running for president and said if that bothered people they should take it into consideration when they voted. Unlike her first campaign for Senate in 2000, Clinton refused during her 2006 race to rule out a presidential run.

Hope, whose father was a two-term speaker of the Arkansas House of Representatives before Bill Clinton became governor there, said that while Sen. Clinton faced "a real contest' for the Democratic nomination, "she's got to give this a try and I think she will win the nomination."

With the nomination in hand, Hope predicted a general election victory in 2008 for Clinton based on her successful strategy in New York of reaching out to more conservative voters.

"She will confound her critics," Hope said. "She will win some of them over, as she did in New York, and the others she will simply leave in the dust."

Republican Spencer said he agreed with Hope that Clinton would win the Democratic nomination and thought that was a good thing.

"I hope she is the presidential candidate because I think she is easily beaten," Spencer said. "I know she's put the mask on in New York and she's pulled the wool over the people of New York's eyes, but she's a very, very liberal Democrat."

While GOP leaders in Clinton's adopted state — she only moved to New York in 1999 — were critical, New York Democrats were praising Clinton as someone who could become the first New Yorker to win the White House since Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

"Few candidates come with a better preparation and stronger base of support than Hillary," said New York's new Democratic governor, Eliot Spitzer, after receiving a Saturday morning call from Clinton during which they talked about her plans.

"Hillary has done a superb job both campaigning and serving the people of New York, and she'll do an even better job as president," said New York's senior senator, fellow Democrat Charles Schumer.

"She won over New Yorkers from every part of our state and we know she'll do the same across the country," said David Pollak, a current co-chairman of the state party.

"Senator Clinton has been a fabulous senator for us and will be an incredible president," said state Assemblyman Herman Farrell, who just resigned as state party chairman.

Hope said Clinton would be helped by the experience she and her husband gained during his two successful campaigns for the White House.

Asked about concerns that a new Clinton candidacy would resurrect the scandals that dogged Bill Clinton's presidential tenure, Hope said, "It raises a lot of issues, including that fact that under Bill Clinton this country was prosperous and peaceful and Americans were doing very well. That is, of course, what I would concentrate on."

Candidate Clinton Faces Tough Battle For Nation's Favor (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci, John Wildermuth

San Francisco Chronicle, January 21, 2007

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's leap into the 2008 presidential race Saturday sets up a high-priced, high-profile political melee that could make California, working to move its primary up to February, the decisive contest in the campaign for the Democratic nomination.

"I'm in. And I'm in to win," was the simple announcement Clinton posted on her campaign Web site Saturday morning. The long-expected announcement was a low-key opening to her historic effort to become the country's first female president and return to the White House where she spent eight years as first lady.

In a video aimed at her supporters across the nation, the former first lady said that she was forming an exploratory committee for a presidential run, although she made it clear she wasn't just testing the waters.

"I want you to join me not just for the campaign, but for a conversation about the future of our country," she said. "And I am forming my exploratory committee because I believe that together we can bring the leadership that this country needs."

Clinton's announcement probably will cement her spot as the front-runner in the scramble for the Democratic presidential nomination, both in California and across the nation. In a national Gallup Poll taken last week, 29 percent of Democrats and Democrat-leaning independents said they would be most likely to vote for Clinton in 2008, compared with 18 percent who backed Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who announced his own exploratory committee last week. Obama is an African American newcomer with enormous appeal to many Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0119691

The poll also showed Clinton easily winning a head-to-head matchup with Obama, 53 percent to 39 percent.

In California, where 58 percent of Democrats are women, Clinton has "a built-in advantage" among primary voters, said pollster Mark Baldassare, director of the Public Policy Institute of California. Baldassare, however, also noted that Clinton is not the current favorite in polls for Iowa and New Hampshire, the two states that traditionally open the 2008 primary season.

For years, some party strategists have quietly suggested that while Clinton's wild popularity among rank-and-file Democrats is enough to take the party nomination, she is too polarizing a figure to win a national election. They worry that all the scandals, complaints and gossip surrounding Bill Clinton's presidential years will take on new life if Hillary Clinton becomes the Democratic nominee.

"Hillary is no surprise. She's the front-runner in money," said Bruce Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at UC Berkeley. "But there isn't a Democratic group I've spoken to that isn't nervous about her. There is a real fear that her baggage will divert the campaign."

Clinton's efforts in recent years to become a more centrist Democrat also have brought her problems with the left wing of her party, especially with those most opposed to the war in Iraq.

"If Hillary Clinton is in the California primary, it becomes a tough contest" between her and Obama, said Phil Trounstine of the Survey and Policy Research Institute at San Jose State University. "Obama's stance against the war, and Hillary's (past vote) for it, could be her Achilles' heel in California."

Clinton faced many of those concerns in her announcement Saturday, talking about the need to bring the war "to the right end" and warning Republicans and Democrats that she's ready for a fight.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," she said in her video statement. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them."

Beating the other Democrats in the race is the first order of business, though. Besides Obama, six other Democrats already have entered the presidential derby and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson is expected to announce his own exploratory committee today.

"Hillary and Barack are the two front-runners ... and the problem for Hillary is that all the activists will flock to (him)," said Katie Merrill, a Democratic strategist. "People who have never been involved in a campaign have read his book ('The Audacity of Hope') and want to walk door to door for him."

Clinton has undeniable strengths, including $14 million in the bank, a battle-tested campaign organization, and more experience on the national scene.

But the 45-year-old Obama "has created a wave that is compelling," Merrill said, and against his fresh face, Clinton, 59, could find herself labeled -- and dismissed -- as the establishment candidate.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and a number of Democrats in the Legislature only last week started a new drive to move California's primary from its traditional slot in June -- months after many other states have conducted their primaries -- to the first week in February.

Republican strategist Matthew Dowd, who helped shape the Bush-Cheney 2004 campaign victory, said such a move would fundamentally alter the Democratic primary race.

"That will move California from being a vacuum for money to a place where (candidates) can appeal to a lot of voters," he said. "It will put a premium on the ability to get media attention -- and whoever has that ability" has an advantage.

In California, where Schwarzenegger was able to win office with virtually no electoral experience, voters may be far more open to a newcomer like Obama, Dowd said.

"This year's election, for both parties, was about the next generation of politics," he said. "Barack Obama represents a new language, the next generation ... and (Clinton) is a little bit of yesterday's news."

The proposed shift in the California primary date represents a potentially huge change in the 2008 race, Baldassare agreed.

"If Schwarzenegger is able to move up the California primary, it becomes the de facto national primary -- a heavyweight battle," he said.

A February primary in California instantly becomes more influential, because its diversity makes it "a microcosm of the national population," something that New Hampshire, Iowa, Nevada and many of the other early primary and caucus states aren't, said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst and senior scholar at the University of Southern California.

DOJ_NMG_0119692

The question, though, is exactly who would benefit if the state moves its presidential primary to February. Campaigning in a sprawling state like California takes lots of time and even more money, especially with the $1 million to $2 million-a-week cost of the type of TV ad campaign it typically takes to win in the state.

While Obama has started to build a fundraising organization in California and across the nation, Clinton has had years to work the state and make contacts with the financial and political movers and shakers.

Clinton has "accelerated the time frame" with her declaration, said Bill Carrick, a veteran Democratic consultant, which pressures all the candidates to get organized almost a year before the Jan. 14, 2008, New Hampshire primary.

"California is bigger and more open-minded than most other states, (which) gives a chance for somebody to walk in, like a Barack Obama," being a nontraditional fresh candidate, Carrick said. But because of the size of the state and its diverse population, "name ID and money will be a big thing, and Hillary has both of those."

Those longtime ties Clinton and her husband have in California also could make a difference come election day.

"Hillary Clinton is a very strong candidate in California," a state that was a strong backer of Bill Clinton, said Susan Kennedy, Schwarzenegger's chief of staff and the head of the Democratic Party's coordinated campaign effort in California in 1992, when Clinton was first elected president.

"These are loyal Clinton Democrats in California, where the center of gravity for Democrats is in the San Francisco Bay Area and Los Angeles," Kennedy said. "She has a strong base in both regions."

California Considers Moving Primary To February (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif., Jan. 20 (AP) — California is considering moving up the date of its presidential primary in hope of gaining more clout in picking White House nominees.

State Senator Ron Calderon said Friday that he planned to introduce a bill on Monday that would move the primary from June to February, making it one of the earliest in the country.

“California is the biggest and most influential state in the union, yet our current June presidential primary virtually ensures that the nominees will be determined long before our voters cast their ballots,” Mr. Calderon, the chairman of the Senate elections committee, said in a statement.

A similar bill was introduced in the Assembly on Thursday.

California, which has 55 electoral votes, has traditionally held its primary elections in June. But in 1996, it began experimenting with a March primary in hopes of giving its voters a bigger say in determining who wins the White House.

Other states moved up their primaries and caucuses, as well. By the time California’s elections were held, the nominations were locked up.

In 2004, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation moving the primary back to June.

But Mr. Schwarzenegger said this week that he would support a move to February, complaining that presidential candidates only visited California to raise campaign donations.

“We’re kind of an afterthought when it comes to the presidential campaign,” he told the Sacramento Press Club. “I mean, all those guys come out here, and they clean up, and they take the money and run. Millions and millions and millions of dollars — both parties.”

If the legislation passes, the election would be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in February.

Clinton: "I'm In To Win" White House (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, January 20, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) - Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton launched a trailblazing campaign for the White House on Saturday, a former first lady turned political powerhouse intent on becoming the first female president. "I'm in, and I'm in to win," she said.

In a videotaped message posted on her Web site, Clinton said she was eager to start a dialogue with voters about challenges she hoped to tackle as president - affordable health care, deficit reduction and bringing the "right" end to the Iraq war.

"I'm not just starting a campaign, though, I'm beginning a conversation with you, with America," she said. "Let's talk. Let's chat. The conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think?"

Clinton's announcement, while widely anticipated, was nonetheless historic in a fast-developing campaign that has already seen the emergence of a formidable black contender, Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois.

(AP) Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton greets fans in New York, in this Dec. 18, 2006, file photo. Democratic...

DOJ_NMG_0119693

Full ImageIn an instant, Clinton became the most credible female candidate ever to seek the presidency and the first presidential spouse to attempt to return to the White House in her own right. Her husband, Bill, served two terms as president from 1993 to 2001.

"I am one of the millions of women who have waited all their lives to see the first woman sworn in as president of the United States - and now we have our best opportunity to see that dream fulfilled," said Ellen Malcolm, president of EMILY's list, which raises money for Democratic women who run for office.

With her immense star power, vast network of supporters and donors and seasoned team of political advisers, the 59-year-old Clinton long has topped every national poll of potential Democratic contenders.

But since joining the field, Obama has secured the backing of a number of prominent fundraisers, including billionaire philanthropist George Soros, stepping up the pressure on Clinton to disclose her plans.

Her controversial tenure as first lady left her a deeply polarizing figure among voters, leading many Democrats to doubt Clinton's viability in a general election.

(AP) U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., reacts to applause before addressing the Association for...

Full ImageIn a detailed statement posted on her Web site, Clinton sought to acknowledge and bat away such doubts.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," she wrote. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate and how to beat them."

Recently, Clinton has clashed with many in her own party over the Iraq war.

Clinton supported the 2002 resolution authorizing military intervention in Iraq. She has refused to recant her vote or call for a deadline for the removal of troops. She has announced her opposition to President Bush's troop increase in Iraq and has introduced legislation capping troop levels.

"A woman candidate could find it easier to run in peacetime, rather than wartime, but Senator Clinton's tried to position herself as a serious person on national security," said Andrew Polsky, a presidential historian at Hunter College. "But that means she's staked out difficult position on the war that won't make it easy for her to get the Democratic nomination."

(AP) Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-NY, talks about her trip to Iraq during Capitol Hill news conference...

Full ImageWith a $14 million campaign treasury, Clinton starts with an impressive fundraising advantage over the rest of the Democratic field. But Obama and others have started to secure fundraising commitments from New York, California and other deep-pocketed, Clinton-friendly areas.

Her creation of a presidential exploratory committee, announced Saturday, allows her to raise money for the campaign; she already has lined up campaign staff.

In tone and substance, Clinton's videotaped announcement recalled her first Senate race in New York in 2000, where she conducted a "listening tour" of the state's 62 counties before formally entering the contest.

She promised a three-day series of Web chats with voters beginning Monday and prepared a campaign swing late this coming week through the early voting state of Iowa, while a visit to New Hampshire was in the works.

On Sunday, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson was also set to enter the Democratic field; if elected, he would be the first Hispanic president.

(AP) Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-NY, listens to speakers, in this Dec. 21, 2006, file photo in New York. In...

Full ImageFor the short term at least, the outsized candidacies of Clinton and Obama were expected to soak up the lion's share of attention.

Obama, who launched his own presidential committee on Tuesday, praised Clinton as a friend and colleague.

"I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track," he said in a statement.

Campaigning in New Hampshire, Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd did not comment specifically on Clinton's announcement, but said: "I'm not one for exploratory committees. You're in or you're not."

Other Democratic contenders include former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack; Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice-presidential nominee. Delaware Sen. Joe Biden has said he will run and planned to formalize his intentions soon. Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 standard bearer, is also contemplating another run.

An influential player in her husband's political career in Arkansas, Hillary Clinton leapt to the national scene during the 1992 presidential campaign when husband and wife fought to survive the scandal over Gennifer Flowers' allegations of a lengthy affair with Bill Clinton when he was the state's governor.

The Clintons appeared together on CBS'"60 Minutes" to talk about their marriage - Hillary Clinton's first famous "Stand by Your Man" moment.

DOJ_NMG_0119694

As first lady, Clinton headed up a disastrous first-term effort to overhaul the health care insurance system. There was more controversy as the couple battled allegations of impropriety over land deals and fundraising, missing records from her former Arkansas law firm and even her quick and hefty profits from an investment in cattle futures.

There was no letup in the second term. The president found himself denying - then admitting - having a sexual relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. As he battled impeachment and possible removal from office, his wife's poll numbers rose.

Her own political career began to take shape in late 1998 when New York Democrat Daniel Patrick Moynihan announced he would not seek re-election to the Senate seat he had held since 1976.

The campaign trail was not always friendly. For almost every cheer, there was a shouted "Go home, Hillary!" and the emerging Republican theme that carpetbagger Clinton simply wanted to use New York as a launching pad for a later presidential run.

Can Hillary Clinton Win In 2008? (BBC)

By Richard Allen Greene

BBC.com, January 20, 2007

Hillary Clinton has finally announced that she is considering running for president in 2008 - a declaration anticipated for the past six years that puts a heavyweight contender into the race.

Senator Clinton has already made history by becoming the first former First Lady to be elected to public office.

But all thoughts will now turn to whether the New York Democrat really has what it takes to become the first woman president of the United States.

It would be foolish to dismiss a woman who sits on an enormous war chest and is backed by some of the best political strategists in the country.

But it would be equally unwise to bet that the US will elect a woman president when the country is at war - much less one who is already reviled by a substantial minority of Americans for her perceived liberalism and association with Bill Clinton.

Warning to Republicans

Mark Corallo, a Republican strategist, reckons she has a good chance of capturing the White House in 2008 - and says he is constantly warning friends against underestimating her.

"Every time a Republican tells me: 'We want [to run against] Hillary', I say: 'Be careful what you wish for'.

"There is no other candidate on either side of the equation that has the instant party organisation and the ability to raise an enormous amount of money.

"She has the two most formidable strategists in the Democratic Party - Terry McAuliffe and Harold Ickes," Mr Corallo says before correcting himself: "No, three, because Bill Clinton is the most formidable. The guy is brilliant."

Mr Corallo, co-owner of the consultancy Corallo Comstock, says only one Democrat could take the party's nomination away from Senator Clinton: Barack Obama, the first-term senator from Illinois.

"He has the 'wow factor' that Bill had," the strategist says, which, he predicts, will make him Senator Clinton's first target.

"Hillary's partisans will start to whisper that he is an empty suit" without the experience to win or govern, he says.

"If Obama is tough enough, it is going to be an interesting primary season," he says.

Goliath and Davids

But Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics, is not so certain that Hillary Clinton will be waltzing into the White House any time soon.

"She's Goliath, but plenty of Goliaths have been downed by Davids," says Mr Sabato, who specialises in elections.

Senator Clinton regularly comes top in polls asking Democrats who they would like their 2008 White House candidate to be.

Mr Sabato argues that is simply because "everyone knows who she is".

In the states that are first to choose their preferred presidential candidate, he adds, she is not doing as well.

"It is surprising how weak she is in places like Iowa and New Hampshire, and they matter enormously."

He says the intensely committed party activists in those states may fear she cannot win a national election and will shy away from her.

"They realise she has serious problems - we are going to get a regurgitation of all those past scandals and controversies with new wrinkles and information."

He also thinks her personality does her no favours.

"People just don't warm up to her, including a lot of Democrats - they don't dislike her, but they don't feel warmly towards her at all," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0119695

"And I have never understood how someone could spend so much time around Bill Clinton and be such a wooden speaker," he adds.

"I'm not saying she can't get nominated or that she can't win a general election. But this is nowhere near the slam-dunk it is made out to be."

Hillary Clinton Launches White House Bid: "I'm In" (CNN)

CNN.com, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Sen. Hillary Clinton jumped into the fray as a 2008 presidential candidate with the words "I'm in" posted on her Web site.

"And I'm in to win," she added in a statement, announcing she has set up an exploratory committee that can gauge opinions and raise money for a presidential campaign.

Clinton's announcement comes on the same day that the next president will be inaugurated two years down the road: January 20, 2009.

The former first lady and Democratic senator from New York is considered her party's front-runner in what has become a diverse Democratic field.

Should she win, she would be the first woman to serve as president of the United States -- and the first presidential spouse to do so as well. President Bill Clinton served two terms from 1993 to 2001.

On Tuesday, Democrat Sen. Barack Obama announced that he was filing papers to form a presidential exploratory committee, a bid to become the first African-American president. And on Sunday, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, also a Democrat, is expected to announce his bid, one that could make him the first Latino president.Live 'Web chats' start Monday

Bringing "the right end" to the war in Iraq, reducing the deficit, making the country energy independent and health care affordable were issues Clinton touted in her announcement, speaking on a video posted on her site.

"After six years of George Bush, it is time to renew the promise of America," she said.

"I grew up in a middle-class family in the middle of America, and we believed in that promise," the 59-year-old Chicago native said.

"I still do. I've spent my entire life trying to make good on it, whether it was fighting for women's basic rights or children's basic health care, protecting our social security or protecting our soldiers."

On Sunday she'll appear at the Ryan Chelsea-Clinton Community Health Center to discuss legislation that would expand the State Children's Health Insurance Program. The center bears the names of the two Manhattan neighborhoods it serves -- Chelsea and Clinton -- coincidentally, Chelsea Clinton is the senator's daughter's name.

In the video, she invited Americans to join her in a three-night series of live video Web chats beginning Monday.

"So let's talk. Let's chat, let's start a dialogue about your ideas and mine, because the conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think?"

She'll travel next weekend to Iowa and later to New Hampshire, two kickoff states for the Democratic presidential nominating process in 2008, according to her campaign organizers.

When Clinton launched her Senate bid in New York in 1999, she began a "listening tour" around the state to explore views on education, business and health care issues.

Her Republican opponent, Rick Lazio, called her a "carpetbagger" because she had not previously lived in New York. But she beat him, becoming the first sitting first lady to win an elected office, and was re-elected last year with 67 percent of the vote.

A crowded field

Clinton's announcement puts her in a big Democratic crowd of candidates.

In a statement released Saturday, Obama said: "Senator Clinton is a good friend and a colleague whom I greatly respect. I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors, but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track."

In addition to Obama and Richardson, the field also includes former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, who declared his candidacy late last year; Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, a liberal critic of the war in Iraq; and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut have also said they will seek the nomination, and other Democrats mentioned as possible candidates include the party's 2004 presidential candidate, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts; retired Army Gen. Wesley Clark, and the Rev. Al Sharpton.Clinton wants troop cap, is wary of al-Maliki

Clinton, who just returned from a trip to U.S. military facilities in Afghanistan, Iraq and Germany, has urged the Bush administration to return its focus to Afghanistan.

She has proposed a bill to cap troop levels in Iraq and require congressional approval before the president may send more troops.

DOJ_NMG_0119696

She has also been highly critical of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, saying Washington should cut off financial support to the Iraqi government unless it shows commitment to stemming the sectarian violence there.

"I don't have any faith," she said of al-Maliki, when asked by CNN if she had any faith in him.

In 2002, Clinton was among the majority in Congress who voted in favor of authorizing Bush to attack Iraq if Saddam Hussein refused to give up weapons of mass destruction as required by U.N. resolutions.

In a 2005 letter to constituents posted on her Senate Web site, she said that she took responsibility for her vote, which she said she made "on the basis of the evidence presented by the administration."

In turn, she said, "I, along with a majority of Americans, expect the president and his administration to take responsibility for the false assurances, faulty evidence and mismanagement of the war."

Sen. Clinton Throws Hat Into Ring (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, January 20, 2007

"I'm in."

Six years after leaving 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue as first lady, Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) announced Saturday morning that she wants to return to the White House, this time as the country's first female president. Clinton said she is launching a presidential exploratory committee, eliminating the last doubts regarding her intentions in 2008. She cited the need for "bold changes" to fix the damage that "six years of Bush administration failures" had done to the country.

"The promise of America is that all of us will have access to opportunity, and I want to run a 2008 campaign that renews that promise, a campaign built on a lifetime record of results," she said.

Clinton pledged to take her campaign to the people and plans to hold web chats over the course of the coming days. The first such chat, in which people can ask Clinton questions about her bid, the platform of the campaign and the issues that face the country, will be held Monday at 7:00 pm. In her current job in the Senate, Clinton said she would spend the next two years "doing everything in my power to limit the damage George W. Bush can do.

"But only a new president will be able to undo Bush's mistakes and restore our hope and optimism," Clinton added. New York's junior senator jumps to the top of the list of announced Democratic contenders. Her ability to raise funds, a national profile and the Clinton political network are all major assets in her campaign. However, she is joining an already crowded field that is expected to get even more full over the course of this year.

This week, rising Democratic star Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) also announced he would make a run for the White House and 2004 vice presidential candidate John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, has also thrown his hat in the ring. In addition, several other Democrats have already begun campaigning.

Throwing Her Hat On The Web (WP)

By Ann Hornaday

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

If a Democratic primary were held on sheer production values, Hillary Rodham Clinton would win in a landslide.

In the video on Clinton's Web site yesterday, announcing the formation of a presidential exploratory committee, she chucked the formulaic genre of flag-draped backdrops and stiff monotones, instead delivering a 1-minute 45-second vlog-cast that arrived like a chintz-upholstered, sun-drenched blockbuster.

Perched almost-comfortably on a shabby-chic couch with a carefully rumpled pillow at her back, Clinton spoke in that intimate tone befitting her rhetoric, which focused on words like "conversation" and "chat."

Unlike other candidates (coughBarack Obamacough), whose videos might have been produced by a guy with a cellphone camera, Clinton's announcement was a veritable showpiece of Hollywood-style set design, lighting and cinematography. While Clinton, looking radiant in a red jacket and flattering makeup, affected the demeanor of a kaffe-klatching neighbor while speaking about the Iraq war, energy, Social Security and health care, the camera swung with pen dular subtlety between a background tableaux of framed family pictures and a fabulous table lamp exuding a warm glow. In fact, the background is so eye-catching, so crowded with totemic details, so bursting with semiotic potential, that I missed whole passages of Clinton's statement the first time around. (And yes, I do want that lamp.)

The effect was one of breathtaking political shrewdness and brilliant staging, like a mash-up between "The West Wing" and Diane Keaton's latest holiday heartwarmer. And for all its studied spontaneity, its air of having been pre-tested, choreographed, and managed to within a microfiber of Clinton's mascara, it worked, if only to provide a little eye candy within a grainy sea of canned speeches and awkward iChats. The aesthetic sophistication suited Clinton, who, as a former first lady and a U.S. senator, would look hopelessly out of place in most other contexts (rocking the mom jeans in the Ninth Ward? Uh-uh. Maybe an ornate Senate office, but where's the zazz in yet another wall of law books?), and the look and the script warmed up a woman portrayed as either an amoral ice queen or control-freaky dragon lady by her political opponents.

DOJ_NMG_0119697

Still, for all of Clinton's glitz, the best example of the announcement video genre is John Edwards's, which he staged like a news story in post-Katrina New Orleans. Seamlessly blending form and content, Edwards seemed to take a page from Anderson Cooper for character and setting, while he spoke passionately about his signature theme of "two Americas" and creating a fake-news video image that would look right at home amid the screen grabs, podcasts and bootlegs on the Web. (Meanwhile, Republican U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback made an announcement yesterday as well, but he kicked it old school, stating he was an actual presidential candidate, not an exploratory one, and delivering the news live in front of hundreds of supporters, with his Web site presumably receiving the official video by pneumatic tube.)

So candidates now find themselves thrust into a new target-shoots-first media universe, where to preempt leaks and take an early bite of the public-awareness apple, the Web site exploratory committee announcement has become the new hat in the ring. And while politicians navigate the Googley highways and Wiki byways, looking about as comfortable as Barbara Bush at a rave, the young and the viral that they're trying so desperately to win over are ready to chew up and spit out anything that smacks of the inauthentic, the unhip or the analog.

It remains to be seen whether any or all of these explorers decide to run, and then if any of them succeed in conquering YouTube political culture. On second thought, that one's easy -- the only remaining question is who will be the first presidential candidate to figure out how to combine their campaign kick-off with Diet Coke and Mentos.

Tops In Political Toolbox: Internet (LAT)

By Peter G. Gosselin

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — In choosing the Internet to announce she intends to run for the presidency in 2008, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton bowed to the burgeoning political power of the medium and offered a preview of how she hopes to harness it to her purposes.

In declaring "I'm in" the White House race in a video clip on her new campaign website, HillaryClinton.com, the New York Democrat did considerably more than simply appear before the cameras; she invited supporters to join an almost Oprah Winfrey-like session of give and take.

"Let's talk. Let's chat. Let's start a dialogue about your ideas and mine…. " she told viewers."With a little help from modern technology, I'll be holding live online video chats … starting Monday."

By doing this, Clinton signaled her intention of using the Internet to shore up one of her chief political weak points, what independent analyst Charlie Cook called the caricature of her as "this shrill, raving, partisan, liberal lunatic."

"She needs to build people's comfort level with her, and she's going to do that with [an Internet] conversation," Cook said.

Clinton's online declaration that she is forming a presidential exploratory committee came less than a week after similar news delivered online by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill).

It also follows even more elaborate use of the Internet by the third major presidential contender in the Democratic ranks, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

The website for Edwards, the party's vice presidential nominee in 2004, offers documentary-style video of him grousing about his political consultants and informally chatting about the campaign ahead.

The Internet's power both to make and break politicians has been vividly demonstrated in recent years.

In 2004, former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean jumped from political obscurity to grab the front-runner's position in the initial stages of the Democratic race largely on the strength of the interest and fundraising he generated online.

Last year, Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) watched his reelection campaign — and his hopes of emerging as a prime contender for the GOP presidential nomination — go down in flames after a video clip of him addressing a young man of Indian descent as "macaca" made the rounds on the Web.

Barely a factor in campaigning 11 years ago when Clinton's husband won reelection as president, the Internet has become an integral part of the political landscape, with every major candidate fielding a website and seeking to create a virtual community around his — or her — campaign.

But with the recent advent of YouTube and other video-sharing sites, analysts said the most intriguing aspect of the evolving use of the Web may be as part of an immense game of political "gotcha," in which campaigns seek to catch opposing candidates off-guard and off-message, as happened to Allen.

Analysts said Clinton's announcement and the accompanying rollout of her campaign website underscore the well-organized nature of her bid.

DOJ_NMG_0119698

In addition to the video clip, the site includes a political analysis of recent polls suggesting she can win, as well as invitations to contribute and sponsor local events to support her.

"This is an example of what's to come," Cook said. "It has lots of bells and whistles. There's nothing left to chance."

With Boots Or Suits, Candidates Carefully Craft First Impressions (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The announcement of a candidacy for president can leave a lasting impression.

While it's only a single day in a marathon campaign, it's also the first glimpse that many voters get of a candidate. And, as we all know, first impressions matter.

Democratic strategist Chris LeHane calls these announcements "the reality TV shows of politics," adding: "Each announcement is designed to out-entertain the prior announcements."

Take the declarations of candidacy by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.).

Edwards -- clad in jeans, a tan work shirt and boots -- entered the race just after Christmas, making his announcement in front of a New Orleans home, destroyed by Hurricane Katrina, that was being rebuilt.

Obama -- casual in a suit coat and an open-necked shirt -- countered with a low-key and decidedly serious video sent to supporters last week.

"The announcement strategies reflect the state of the candidacies," said Stephanie Cutter, a Democratic consultant well-versed in image politics, in an e-mail. "Sen. Obama's celebrity allows for him to control three news cycles with a simple and articulate internet video, while Sen. Edwards smartly took advantage of a slow news cycle and executed a multi-state tour to make national news."

And now Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is in the race, joining the fray with a two-minute video clip shot from her home in the District.

The understated tone of the Clinton announcement -- released on a Saturday via video -- ran counter to suggestions the Fix fielded earlier in the week about how the senator should make it official.

Jamal Simmons, a founder of Cherry Tree Mobile Media, suggested an aircraft carrier as an appropriate backdrop to convey Clinton's "serious times demand serious leaders" message. Unfortunately, "George Bush ruined that photo op," he said.

Matt Bennett, a partner in Third Way, a centrist Democratic advocacy group, suggested that Clinton go deliberately low-tech.

"High-tech announcements are totally last cycle," he said. "Clinton should go retro-chic. How about a slide show? Or maybe a filmstrip?"

2 days: Will Al Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth" be nominated for an Academy Award for best documentary film? And would such an accolade increase the pressure on the former vice president to consider a run for president in 2008? We'll know the answer to the first question in 48 hours.

19 days: Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R) makes a stop in Alabama to speak to the state's Republican Executive Committee. Why? No longer content with its spectator status in the nomination fights every four years, Alabama has moved its presidential primary from June 2008 to February 5, 2008.

Far From A Hindrance, Gender Could Be Key For Clinton (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton enters the presidential arena as the most viable woman ever to seek the office and at a propitious moment.

More women hold elected office than ever before, and 9 million more women than men voted in the last presidential election. The New York Democrat's candidacy will test whether she can turn excitement over gender into a powerful political advantage.

"Over the last 35 years, the political climate has changed to make women more acceptable to Americans at all levels of office," said Ruth B. Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University. "And now, finally, the moment has arrived when we have a candidate ready to make that leap and a public that can see a woman in that role."

After some rocky moments with female voters over the past 15 years, Clinton begins her historic race viewed favorably by 59 percent of women nationally, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll completed Friday night. She is viewed favorably among women of all age groups and educational backgrounds, and has especially large advantages among core pockets of Democratic women, including non-whites and lower-income women, and among Northeasterners.

DOJ_NMG_0119699

In primary and general election matchups as of today, Clinton has sizable advantages among women, the survey showed. Forty-nine percent of Democratic and Democratic-leaning women would support her in their state's caucus or primary if it were held today, compared with 18 percent who would support Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.). And against Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) or former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R), she has a big lead among women.

She is particularly popular among younger women, 18-34, who see her as a role model and who may not recall the negative publicity and partisan attacks that Clinton weathered as first lady over her health-care proposal and other issues. "I like her because she's a Democrat and a woman, and it's time for a female president," said Rene Davis, 23, of Gloucester, N.J . "If I have a daughter, I want to know that she can run for president."

For this reason, women's advocates see her candidacy as having the potential to create a cultural and political shift not unlike those under John F. Kennedy, the first Catholic president and a symbol of generational change, or during the Vietnam War.

"What is so exciting about this is that she will appeal to a whole new generation of women who will become political and get involved because of her," says Ellen Malcolm, the president of Emily's List, which raises money for female candidates. "We will see a dramatic shift in demographics that could affect the landscape for decades to come."

In the Post survey, Clinton made her most significant strides in the past 10 months among women 55 and older, 59 percent of whom have a favorable view of her, compared with 48 percent last year.

"I think you're seeing an overall warming up towards her," said Mark Penn, a longtime adviser and pollster for Clinton and her husband, former president Bill Clinton. "With older women, objections are beginning to melt because Senator Clinton is getting out there and saying, 'Here's what I can do,' and they are paying attention."

Clinton follows a path walked by other female presidential candidates, who either were dismissed as tokens or could not generate the support and funds to be competitive. In recent political history, a handful made the effort: Margaret Chase Smith in 1964, Shirley Chisholm in 1972, Patricia Schroeder in 1988 and Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) in 2000.

Clinton's relationship with women has been slow in developing. It took her a long time to recover from a remark she made during her husband's 1992 campaign, when she appeared to be scornful of those who stayed home and baked cookies. But she generated tremendous sympathy when she stoically dealt with the public humiliation of her husband's affair with Monica Lewinsky.

Today, the senator's advisers acknowledge that one hurdle for Clinton will be to convince women that she can actually win -- a fear that women often articulate.

In her first race for the Senate in New York, her campaign targeted those very women in an advertisement showing a woman who said she tells her friends who have doubts about Clinton that they should "get over it."

Eventually Clinton won over a highly skeptical female electorate through relentless public appearances, old-fashioned retail politics and advertising. She won with 55 percent of the vote, including what exit polls showed was 60 percent of female voters.

Sources say Clinton's presidential campaign will attempt to implement this same strategy on a grander scale, by exposing her to as many people as possible in the small groups in which she thrives.

It was no accident that her announcement came in the form of a personal video, where she called her effort the beginning of a "conversation." And last month, she ventured onto "The View," the daytime show by women for women.

"There's no question women are stepping back and taking a second look," said Terry McAuliffe, a friend and adviser.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger, Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Nancy Pelosi -- first female speaker of the House! Hillary Rodham Clinton -- first woman who maybe, kinda, has a chance of getting elected U.S. president! We haven't been so excited since . . . well, since Katie Couric became the first female solo anchor of a major American network evening newscast! Let's look back at some of our sister pioneers.

Dawn of Time: Eve, first woman to hear, "I told you so."

35 B.C.: Livia, wife of Augustus, first Roman woman allowed to handle her own money.

1872: Victoria Woodhull, first woman to run for president of the United States.

1899: Martha Place, first woman to die in the electric chair.

1901: Annie Edson Taylor, first person to survive trip over Niagara Falls in a barrel.

1903: Marie Curie, first woman to win a Nobel Prize in physics.{+1}

1910s: Madame C.J. Walker, first African American female self-made millionaire.

1916: Jeannette Rankin, first woman elected to Congress.

1928: Janet Gaynor, first woman to win an Oscar, Best Actress.{+2}

DOJ_NMG_0119700

1936: Wallis Warfield Simpson, Time's first female Man of the Year.

1952: Christine Jorgensen, first woman with an unassailable reason to shop for new clothes.{+3}

1958: Coya Knutson, first female member of Congress whose relationship wrecked her career, or vice versa.{+4}

1964: Margaret Chase Smith, first woman to have her name placed in nomination for president at a major party convention.{+5}

1969: Golda Meir, Israel, world's first female prime minister.

1970: Diane Crump, first female jockey to ride in the Kentucky Derby.

1974: Isabel Peron, Argentina, world's first female president.

1977: Michelle Triola, first to successfully sue for "palimony."{+6}

1978: Janice Dickinson, world's first female supermodel.{+7}

1980: Sherry Lansing, first female head of a major movie studio.

1981: Sandra Day O'Connor, first female Supreme Court justice.

1997: Madeleine Albright, first female secretary of state.

2006: Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Liberia, first woman elected head of an African nation, and Michelle Bachelet, first female president of Chile.{+8}

{+1} Dies before she can say "nyah, nyah" to Larry Summers.

{+2} Eighty years later, "separate but equal" still reigns in showbiz awards.

{+3} After ex-GI George Jorgensen got the world's first (highly publicized) sex change.

{+4} An opponent enlisted her drunk husband to write a "Coya, come home" letter. She lost, she went home to Minnesota, she divorced him.

{+5} She lost.

{+6} Won thousands from tough-guy actor Lee Marvin, her longtime live-in boyfriend, after he dumped her.

{+7} Or so she insists in every TV appearance.

{+8} That's right, and in the U.S. we're still waiting.

Hill's Bid Her-Storic: Feminists (NYPOST)

The New York Post, January 21, 2007

January 21, 2007 -- I am woman, watch me run.

A successful Hillary Clinton campaign would not just be a win for her, but for women everywhere, feminist leaders said yesterday.

"We are thrilled a prominent woman has entered the race," said Kim Gandy, the president of the National Organization for Women. "Every woman who runs opens another door."

"A woman's place is in the house - the White House!" said high-profile lawyer Gloria Allred.

On her campaign Web site, Clinton talked of the effect her candidacy would have on women everywhere. If she wins the Democratic nomination, it would be the first run of a woman on a major-party ticket since Rep. Geraldine Ferraro sought the vice presidency 1984.

"As we campaign to win the White House, we will make history and remake our future," she told supporters on the site yesterday. "We can only break barriers if we dare to confront them."

Mosemarie Boyd, president of American Women Presidents, said President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney had already "proven" that a woman can be president.

"Dick Cheney proved you don't have to have a heart and Bush proved that you don't have to have a brain," said Boyd.

Noted feminist Gloria Steinem echoed those sentiments.

"The question is whether she can accomplish the same thing [she has in New York] in a big country," said Steinem. "Certainly she would be a thousand times better than what we currently have."

Race May Revolve Around Clintons (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

Chicago Tribune, January 21, 2007

Shortly after breakfast Saturday, the country reverted to a familiar rhythm--Clinton Standard Time.

Hillary Rodham Clinton's bold splash into the presidential waters ensures that for the foreseeable future the race for her fellow Democrats and for Republicans will be about the Clintons--what she does, what he does--bringing with it all the brilliance, triumph, power, passion, drama and love-hate, place-called-Hope, didn't-inhale, flirt-with-disaster madness that defined the eight years of Bill Clinton's presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0119701

But make no mistake: In this race, at this point, Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York is the sun. Everyone else, including Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, revolves around her.

She will have the money, the organization and the most attention focused on her. It will be her blessing and may be her curse. She repels at least as much as she attracts. At least for now.

Saturday morning, on her Web site, she gave an "It takes a village" approach to her campaign, saying she wanted to engage voters in a "conversation" about the state of the country. It was a low-key pitch with high production values and bespoke a drive and confidence. This moment has been a long time in the planning.

She gave an early indication of her style last week when Obama announced his own White House intentions, refusing to even acknowledge his fitness to be commander in chief. Instead, she gave an icily perfunctory "let the voters decide" back of the hand.

Obama did not follow suit. In a statement, he said, "Senator Clinton is a good friend and colleague whom I greatly respect. I welcome her and all the candidates, not as competitors but as allies in the work of getting our country back on track."

Grace notes are the more common approach in the early rounds of a presidential campaign. Clinton is known for her upright bearing, and her bare knuckles.

She enters the competition as the candidate who is at once most potent and most polarizing. The good news for her is that it is hard to see how her negatives could go much higher. In New York, she started her Senate campaign in 2000 in a similar position and, through a focused campaign to deliver for the folks back home, she won over a huge part of the state, including traditionally Republican Upstate, home of her greatest skeptics.

She has been a star in the Senate, but won points for not seeking the spotlight. She has tacked to the center on some issues, even moderating her position on abortion. That approach is just another measure of the tactical brilliance the Clintons bring to any political race in which they choose to play.

The former president and potential "first man," Bill Clinton, has been talking up his wife's chances as he has rebuilt his own popularity among a wide swath of the American people.

Without question one of the most gifted politicians of the last 50 years, the former president could be an extraordinary asset to his wife, in effect doubling the capacity of her campaign. He also carries some obvious risks and his life will again be put under a spotlight.

A substantial segment of the public seems to have a near-fixed view of the former first lady, and it is not positive, representing perhaps the singular challenge of her candidacy: reversing a perception about someone who is so well known.

Even within the Democratic Party, she will have obstacles, and none likely to be more important than her early support for the war in Iraq and her reluctance to join those who are asking for an immediate drawndown of troops. It is a doubly difficult walk for Clinton who, as a woman, faces scrutiny that men do not on issues of national security. Bill Clinton, it seems, would find a way to recalibrate.

And that is another hurdle--having her political skills constantly compared to those of her husband.

The spur-of-the-moment polls--taken about a year before the first votes cast in the Iowa caucuses--look very good for the junior senator from New York. But they also are just this side of meaningless, given that they reflect her name recognition more than real support at this stage.

That in no way diminishes her position as this race begins, the position at the top. When the Clintons first became known nationally during the New Hampshire primary in 1992, Bill Clinton famously offered the couple as the ultimate two-for-the-price-of-one bargain.

That notion faded dramatically when Hillary Clinton was put in charge of the president's health care reform package and her popularity plummeted.

Interestingly, it was when she was seen as somewhat of a victim during the Clinton impeachment that America saw her in different light, and even started to embrace her.

Now, Hillary Clinton is testing whether the nation wants a sequel of the Clinton Era, and Clinton Standard Time.

Clinton Assembles A Seasoned Team (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Although Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) presidential campaign is just a day old, she already has a full stable of senior staffers in place. Here is a look at the people who will guide Clinton's White House bid.

Patti Solis Doyle: Unquestionably a first among equals in Clinton's inner circle, Solis Doyle will manage the campaign. She has been with Clinton since her days as the first lady of Arkansas.

DOJ_NMG_0119702

Mike Henry: A newcomer to the Clinton circle, Henry will be deputy campaign manager. He made a name for himself by leading Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) to victory in 2005 and then overseeing Senate Democrats' national ad campaign in 2006.

Howard Wolfson: Wolfson will oversee the communications operation for Clinton, reprising the role he played in her 2000 Senate race. Wolfson has deep roots in Democratic New York politics, having worked for Sen. Charles E. Schumer and Rep. Nita M. Lowey.

Evelyn S. Lieberman: Lieberman, a former undersecretary of state and senior aide in President Bill Clinton's White House, will be chief operating officer.

Jonathan Mantz: As finance director, Mantz has the Herculean task of raising the millions Clinton will need to compete in the four early-voting states and beyond. Before joining Clinton, Mantz oversaw fundraising for New Jersey Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D).

Neera Tanden: Tanden served as policy adviser to President Bill Clinton and went on to serve as the legislative director in Hillary Clinton's Senate office. She will be the campaign's policy director.

Kim Molstre: Fresh off a stint in the office of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), Molstre will serve as director of scheduling and long-term planning. In 2004, Molstre worked on the presidential efforts of former congressman Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) and Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

Mandy Grunwald: A veteran of Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign, Grunwald designed the ads for Hillary Clinton's 2000 and 2006 Senate races. She will be the lead media consultant in 2008 as well.

Mark Penn: The pollster of choice during President Bill Clinton's second term, Penn, like Grunwald, has been with Hillary Clinton since her run in 2000.

Phil Singer: Singer, the deputy communications director, is extremely close to Schumer, for whom he worked at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in the 2006 election. He also has experience in past presidential politics as a member of Kerry's rapid-response operation.

Leecia Eve: Eve, a black woman from Buffalo, will be a senior policy adviser to the campaign. She worked as counsel to Clinton in her Senate office, leaving to make an abbreviated bid for lieutenant governor in New York in 2006.

Minyon Moore: Moore served a stint as political director in the Clinton White House and will be a senior adviser in the campaign. Moore, an African American, oversaw minority outreach for Kerry's 2004 campaign.

Ann Lewis: Lewis is a longtime Clinton loyalist. She was deputy campaign manager for President Bill Clinton's 1996 reelection race and handled communications during Hillary Clinton's 2006 reelection contest. She will be a senior adviser to the '08 campaign.

In A Field Of Heavy Hitters, No Sure Thing (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

Compared with the other Democrats who plan to run for president in 2008, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is the most battle-tested, has the biggest fund-raising network and can walk into the job with a unique set of skills and perspectives gleaned from eight years in the White House as first lady.

Yet none of that guarantees Mrs. Clinton will steamroll her opponents, or manage and master the issues that have long vexed her, like the war in Iraq and universal health insurance. Far from it: she has told friends that she is more worried about winning the Democratic nomination than winning a general election against a Republican.

With this presidential campaign starting far earlier than any in history, Mrs. Clinton, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and their five Democratic rivals find themselves facing 400 more days before the nomination is sealed up. Each of those days could bring a surprise or flub or Senate vote or controversy that might change their political fortunes. The field is still growing, too: Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico is expected to jump in today. And whither John Kerry? Wesley Clark? Al Gore?

“Given the high velocity of the campaign at this early stage, it’s incredible to think what the race will look like a year from now, and who will be standing out,” said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic political consultant who supports Mrs. Clinton.

Mrs. Clinton has also told friends that she does not think of herself as the Democratic front-runner, nor does she like the word — which are both things that front-runners tend to say, political analysts note. (Her new campaign wasted no time yesterday sending an e-mail message about a new Washington Post-ABC poll giving Mrs. Clinton a 41 percentage point lead over her closest rival, Mr. Obama, who had 17 points.)

Still, unlike 1988, when the so-called seven dwarves were running for the Democratic nomination, the current field is full of heavy hitters, and Mrs. Clinton faces formidable challenges. Mr. Obama is Mrs. Clinton’s strongest rival thus far in attracting crowds of screaming fans; John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina, was the 2004 vice presidential nominee, and has staked out a clear antiwar position; and Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut are seasoned lawmakers who lead powerful committees, giving them access to donors and the media spotlight.

DOJ_NMG_0119703

"Democrats are going to have a real opportunity to see some of the best and brightest in the party," said Kathy Sullivan, the chairwoman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party. "We're a wait-and-see state, and while a lot of people are very excited about Senator Clinton — including me — very few people have made up their minds."

Mrs. Clinton's advisers say she knows full well, from long and sometimes painful experience, the challenges to come. She will have to convince people that another Clinton in the White House will bring more of the successes, and fewer of the shadows and scandals, that marked her husband's administration, her advisers say. She will have to figure out the role that Mr. Clinton will play, a question that Republicans will almost certainly highlight.

"I have never been afraid to stand up for what I believe in or to face down the Republican machine," Mrs. Clinton said in a statement on her new campaign Web site. "After nearly $70 million spent against my campaigns in New York and two landslide wins, I can say I know how Washington Republicans think, how they operate, and how to beat them."

In her statement, she also called for "bold but practical changes" in national policy, a four-word formulation that her advisers said was carefully chosen, given that she has sought to portray herself as both a pragmatist and someone who thinks big. Some Democrats dismiss the latter image, finding her too cautious. Yet her pledge of boldness reflects her well-known desire to disprove the notion that she is hesitant or calculating.

And she will have to show people that she is not the person her critics describe: radically liberal, ruthlessly ambitious, or ethically compromised. Her friends say she is none of these; some of them still chide her for being the "Goldwater girl" of her youth.

Political analysts say that part of her challenge will be letting voters see the full her and not just a rehearsed politician, no easy task for such a private person.

"People consider her to be capable and smart, even those who hate her, but have taken issue over the years with her hardness and lack of warmth," said Ruth Sherman, a political communications specialist who spent time yesterday watching Mrs. Clinton's video announcement on the campaign Web site. "If she can keep it up and persuade people it is authentic, they will have a hard time remembering the Hillary they loved to hate."

Mrs. Clinton will also have to persuade enough people to trust a woman as commander in chief at a time of war, and to view her as a steady, forward-thinking critic of the Iraq war and not as indecisive. Her years on the Senate Armed Services Committee, and her ties to military leaders on New York bases and in Washington, should help, advisers say.

"I would say she is more qualified to be commander in chief than any other Democrat or Republican running, given her years of international experience and her work with the military," said Ellen R. Malcolm, the president of Emily's List, a political and fund-raising organization that endorsed Mrs. Clinton yesterday.

Indeed, one reason Mrs. Clinton chose to make her announcement on a Saturday morning, when the political world is usually in slumber, was to dominate the news cycle, her advisers said, and contrast herself vividly as a leader with President Bush before his State of the Union speech on Tuesday night. They waved off the appearance that she was announcing to catch up with Mr. Obama, who declared his plans to run on Tuesday. They said they had determined in mid-December that, if Mrs. Clinton decided to run, they would announce the decision on the Saturday before the State of the Union address.

Mrs. Clinton spent yesterday at home in Chappaqua with Mr. Clinton, making calls to crucial Democratic officials across the country, including Michael Gronstal, the majority leader of the Iowa State Senate, as well as to some supporters.

She plans to attend Mr. Bush's speech on Tuesday and hit the campaign trail for the first time soon after, traveling next weekend to Iowa, the site of the first presidential caucuses in January 2008. After that, she will visit the early primary state of New Hampshire, where Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards have been recently. Mr. Dodd and former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa have visited the state in the last few days.

For Democratic Advisers, A Season Of Tough Choices (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Rep. Rahm Emanuel considers Sen. Barack Obama a close friend. The Illinois Democrats had dinner just last week. They are both from Chicago and socialize together with their wives. But Emanuel got his big break in national politics from Bill Clinton and worked for him in the White House. And now his worst-case scenario has come true -- both Obama and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton are running for president and want his support.

Emanuel was widely credited with engineering his party's takeover of the House in November. Now fellow White House veterans are pressing him to take a senior position in the former first lady's campaign. Meanwhile, Chicago allies, led by the powerful Daley family, are pressing him to take a senior position in his Illinois colleague's campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0119704

Torn by conflicting loyalties, Emanuel is ducking. "Maybe the witness protection program," he joked. "Or maybe I'll just stop answering the phone."

They still have Iowa and New Hampshire to conquer, but Clinton, Obama and the other Democratic presidential contenders already are squaring off in what might be called the Rahm Primary, an early contest to win over the movers and shakers from the only Democratic administration in the last quarter-century.

As Clinton kicks off a bid to follow in her husband's footsteps to the White House, she is trying to reconstitute much of his old team.

While it might seem like a simple loyalty test, loyalty in politics is not always defined in terms of who hired someone first or who someone worked for longest. Politics breeds complicated relationships. They are partly personal, partly ideological and partly transactional.

"It creates a dilemma for a lot of people," said Joe Lockhart, a former White House press secretary now at the Glover Park Group, a communications and lobbying firm with close ties to Hillary Clinton. "It would be easy if you had worked for a person who you knew wasn't up to the job, but that's not the case this year. It takes a little soul-searching on what you want to do."

Many familiar figures from the 1990s, such as Lockhart, are back in the Clinton corner formally or informally -- political advisers, fundraisers and policy aides such as James Carville, Harold Ickes, Mark Penn, Mandy Grunwald, Ann Lewis, Maggie Williams, Bruce Reed, John D. Podesta, Patti Solis Doyle and Terence R. McAuliffe.

But others are signing up with Obama or other candidates or staying on the sidelines, out of estrangement from the Clintons, skepticism about her chances, fealty to other patrons or some combination.

Former treasury secretary Robert E. Rubin, widely considered his party's economic wise man, has refused to sign up with Hillary Clinton or any of the other candidates. So has House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who first recruited Hillary Clinton to run for Senate from New York in 2000 but who lately has encouraged Obama to run for president.

"I don't know who the rest of the candidates are," Rangel said with a wry arch of an eyebrow last week when asked whether he would prefer Obama or Clinton.

Former commerce secretary William M. Daley, like his brother Richard M. Daley, the mayor of Chicago, is backing Obama, and so are former national security adviser Anthony Lake and former assistant secretary of state Susan E. Rice. A handful of junior Clinton White House aides are working for the Obama campaign as well.

Former White House political director Douglas B. Sosnik and Clinton pollster Stanley Greenberg are with Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.). Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) has Clinton administration veterans Ronald A. Klain, Tom Donilon, Antony Blinken and Evan Ryan. Jennifer Palmieri, a former White House spokeswoman, is helping former senator John Edwards (N.C.). And one former Clinton Cabinet member, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, is running against his former boss's wife himself.

"Most Democratic political professionals over the age of 25 who came to Washington passed through the Clinton administration at some point unless they spent their entire career on the Hill," said Reed, Bill Clinton's domestic policy adviser and now president of the Democratic Leadership Council. "It would be hard to fill a campaign without some people who had the '90s on their resumes."

For some, the choice was not that hard. "The Clintons, for me and for many of us who worked for him, we owe them our loyalty," said Steve Ricchetti, who was deputy White House chief of staff. "They have been very generous personally and gave me my biggest opportunities in public service. It's not something you forget."

Yet others have not forgotten the personal slights, policy struggles and turf battles; after eight years, the Clinton White House was left with its share of scar tissue. Hillary Clinton inspired deep affection and loyalty among her own staff, but she could be demanding, and her temper sometimes singed those outside her inner circle.

For that matter, her husband could be tough to work for as well. Some who served in the West Wing emerged bruised by the experience, disenchanted with the conduct that led to his impeachment and leery of returning for Clinton the Sequel.

They do not couch their decisions this year in those terms, though, at least not publicly. They explain their neutrality or affiliations by the complex rules of political allegiance -- an old boss who came calling, a new job that prevents partisan activity, more recent involvement with another candidate, the sorts of word-of-mouth encounters that can bring teams together by happenstance more than by design.

Sosnik and Greenberg went back to Dodd, their original sponsor in politics. Dodd was Greenberg's first client. Sosnik drove Dodd in his 1980 campaign and became his chief of staff. "I first worked for Chris Dodd over 25 years ago and have always considered him my mentor," Sosnik said. "He taught me that there is nothing more important in life as well as in politics than being loyal to your friends."

Others calculated that another candidate would be more likely to win or would be a better president than Hillary Clinton. Lake said he was impressed with Obama. "This is the first time I've been excited by somebody since 1992, when I was doing foreign policy with Bill Clinton," he said. As for Hillary Clinton, he said: "I think highly of her. It's not that I'm trying to help somebody run against her. I'm helping somebody I think can be a great president."

DOJ_NMG_0119705

Under other circumstances, Emanuel would be a natural for the Obama camp. But Emanuel was a rambunctious 31-year-old when he joined Clinton's campaign in 1991 as one of the original members of the Little Rock war room and followed the candidate to the White House. Although he was demoted at one point -- reportedly at the instigation of the first lady -- he eventually became one of the president's closest aides.

Emanuel declared on television early last year that he was supporting Clinton, but that was before Obama expressed interest in running. Now he is officially neutral. And both sides are lobbying him to take a top campaign post. "I'm going to call Rahm and talk the issue through with him and see what he thinks," said Mickey Kantor, who chaired Bill Clinton's campaign in 1992 and is now backing Hillary Clinton.

Obama has been calling, too. He had dinner with Emanuel on Thursday, which the congressman called a longstanding personal engagement. Asked where Emanuel will come down in the 2008 race, Obama recently told the Chicago Tribune: "Rahm knows the right thing to do."

If he does, he is not saying what the right thing is. "I have two friends in this. I just got off a two-year national campaign. It took everything out of me," Emanuel said. "There's a time for governing and a time for campaigning, and I'm in the governing mode right now."

As for picking sides, he said: "There will be an appropriate time. But now is not the appropriate time."

Hillary Runs For The White House As "new Thatcher" (LONT)

By Sarah Baxter

Times of London, January 21, 2007

HILLARY CLINTON is to be presented as America's Margaret Thatcher as she tries to become the first woman to win the White House. As she entered the 2008 presidential race yesterday, a senior adviser said that her campaign would emphasise security, defence and personal strengths reminiscent of the Iron Lady.

"Their policies are totally different but they are both perceived as very tough," said Terry McAuliffe, Clinton's campaign chairman. "She is strong on foreign policy. People have got to know you are going to keep them safe."

Clinton, 59, used her website to announce that she was taking the first step of her campaign by forming a presidential exploratory committee. "I'm in. And I'm in to win," she said.

It made the New York senator the instant frontrunner for the Democratic nomination. "She has the name recognition, the money, the glitz, she's got it all," McAuliffe said.

If she wins, she will return to the White House where she spent eight years as first lady during Bill Clinton's presidency from 1993-2001.

McAuliffe predicted a rough campaign. "She is going to fight for herself and she is going to have people around her who will fight," he said.

"They are going to play mean, nasty and dirty on the other side. You don't walk into a knife fight without adequate gloves."

The Clinton campaign intends to paint the Republican nominee as President George W Bush's political heir, particularly over the war in Iraq. "George Bush is going to be on the ticket whether they like it or not," McAuliffe added.

Clinton said she would talk to voters about "how to bring the right end to the war in Iraq and restore respect for America around the world". She also hopes to appeal to women voters in their twenties and thirties.

Clinton faces strong competition from Barack Obama, the charismatic but inexperienced 45-year-old Illinois senator. The race is already being billed "the magic v the machine".

Aides: Clinton Plans Weekend Swing Through Iowa (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

DES MOINES (AP) — New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the newest entrant in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, will make her initial foray into Iowa next weekend, aides said Saturday.

Details of the upcoming campaign swing were still being finalized, but spokeswoman Lorraine Voles said an official announcement would come within days.

Clinton's decision to enter the race, and to compete in Iowa's leadoff precinct caucuses, reshuffles the Democratic contest in the state.

"This is going to be a real donnybrook," said Jeff Link, a veteran Democratic strategist who is advising former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack in his bid for the nomination. "I think the race is completely up in the air."

DOJ_NMG_0119706

Former Iowa Democratic Chairman Gordon Fischer said he got a call from Clinton aides advising him of her plans, which were announced on her website early Saturday morning.

"She will be a very formidable candidate," Fischer said. "It's not a shock. She has been calling people and asking for advice."

While Clinton lags behind other Democrats in building a campaign organization for Iowa's caucuses, she is very well known and traveled to the state often during here husband's two terms in office, and afterward.

Some political onlookers had suggested she would use Vilsack's presence in the race as an excuse to skip past Iowa's leadoff caucuses, but she has clearly decided against that strategy.

Her move comes after Illinois Sen. Barack Obama announced he will form an exploratory committee to ponder seeking the Democratic nomination, with a final decision expected Feb. 10. Despite starting later, key Iowa activists said Clinton is certain to be a force.

"I think she'll be a serious player here in Iowa and other places," said veteran strategist Ron Parker. "Once she starts touring Iowa, she'll have some of the same star power as Sen. Obama, and then you add on top of that her fundraising ability."

Clinton is seeking to become the first female president, and her ability to raise money sets her apart from other women candidates, many of whom have struggled with raising campaign funds. Clinton raised more than $40 million in winning a second term in the Senate in November, and still has $13 million in the bank.

"I think the great intangible in all this is the appeal she will have as a female candidate, with experience, with fundraising ability and as somebody who has been battle tested in a real campaign," Parker said.

Clinton has been calling leading Democrats in Iowa to keep them posted about her intentions. Among them is Senate Majority Leader Michael Gronstal, a Democrat from Council Bluffs, who said he spoke with her Saturday.

"I kind of said, 'Well, welcome to the race in Iowa,'" Gronstal said. "I told her the field was open in Iowa and we're welcome to basically anyone."

Link said Vilsack welcomes the competition in his home state, saying there's plenty of time until activists attend caucuses early next year.

"Everything has been turned upside down in the last two weeks," Link said. "I don't even think there's been enough time passed for there to be a conventional wisdom."

Parker agreed that Iowa's backing for the Democratic presidential nomination is up for grabs.

"Twelve months is a long, long time for all of the candidates," he said.

Clinton's decision comes as the pace of campaigning in Iowa is beginning to quicken. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards swung through the state on Saturday holding a town hall meeting on the war in Iraq at the University of Iowa, and former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson was also spending time in eastern Iowa.

It's widely anticipated that Obama will make a stop in Iowa soon if he chooses to enter into the race early next month.

Kansas Senator Announces Bid For Presidency (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20 — Declaring himself a proud conservative before a crowd of cheering supporters waving American flags, Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, on Saturday announced his candidacy for president.

Mr. Brownback, an evangelical Protestant turned Roman Catholic and a former Kansas agriculture secretary, said he would focus on reviving faith and families in America; combating abortion, poverty and wasteful government spending; opposing same-sex marriage; and revamping Social Security and the federal tax system.

“The last thing we need in America is to take God out of our public lives and institutions,” Mr. Brownback said during his speech in Topeka, Kan. “We need to embrace our nation’s motto, ‘In God we trust,’ and not be ashamed of it.

“To walk away from the Almighty is to embrace decline for a nation,” he said. “To embrace him leads to renewal, for individuals and for nations.”

Mr. Brownback, 50, was first elected to the House in 1994. Two years later, he was elected to the Senate, to complete the unexpired part of Senator Bob Dole’s term when Mr. Dole left to run for president.

Mr. Brownback acknowledged that he would be one of the lesser-known candidates in what is expected to be a crowded field of Republican presidential hopefuls, including Senator John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York.

He said his bid might be “a long shot,” but he compared himself to other successful presidential candidates who had come from behind, including Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton. He said his ideas would separate him from the pack.

DOJ_NMG_0119707

"I start out with less name ID, but I've been there before," Mr. Brownback said at a news conference after his speech in Topeka, Kan. "My positions are at the heart of where the Republican Party is."

With his opposition to abortion, embryonic stem-cell research and same-sex marriage, Mr. Brownback hopes to establish himself as the dominant conservative in the race. The American Conservative Union, which hails him as one of "the best of the best" in the Senate, gave him a 100 percent conservative rating in its most recent survey of Congress.

In recent weeks, Mr. Brownback has been emboldened by the struggles of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, whose conservative credentials have come under attack because of questions about his evolving positions on abortion and gay rights. Mr. Brownback said Saturday that he planned to march in an anti-abortion rally in Washington on Monday.

But Mr. Brownback has also broken with Republicans on some issues. He supports putting most of the nation's 12 million illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship, for instance. And this month, he joined many Congressional Democrats in announcing that he opposed President Bush's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq.

Paul M. Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, a conservative research group, praised Mr. Brownback for his commitment to conservative principles. But he questioned whether the senator had the charisma to prevail. "If he can prove that, then he will have a shot," Mr. Weyrich said. "If not, then his conservatism will not be enough to carry him."

Brownback Announces Presidential Bid (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Sen. Sam Brownback, the son of a rural Kansas farmer who has become a leader among religious conservatives in Congress, formally launched his 2008 bid for president at a rally in Topeka yesterday.

Brownback, 50, became one of the first Republicans to announce the formation of an exploratory committee six weeks ago, and yesterday said he had decided "to take the first steps on the yellow brick road to the White House."

The Kansas Republican acknowledged being little known beyond his home state. A Washington Post-ABC News poll released yesterday shows he is supported by 1 percent of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. He was also unlucky to announce his candidacy on the same day as a better-known Democratic contender, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

But he may be the best-known among those who hope to be the choice of social conservatives and wield that power to break into a group of more visible GOP candidates.

"My positions are where the heart of the Republican Party is," he told reporters after his speech.

Brownback's supporters say the party's better-known contenders -- Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney -- offer weaker platforms for voters who strongly oppose abortion, same-sex marriage and stem cell research.

"There are really two primaries taking place simultaneously in the Republican party," said Gary Bauer, the family values activist who ran for president in 2000. "One, for center-left candidates, is being fought out between Giuliani and Senator McCain. On the conservative side, nobody has captured that crown yet, but Senator Brownback will be a major competitor."

Brownback was raised on a farm in tiny Parker, Kan., served as the state's youngest-ever secretary of agriculture and came to Congress in 1994. Two years later, he won the Senate seat that had been vacated by Robert J. Dole in advance of his run for president.

While in Congress, Brownback, a Methodist most of his life, converted to Catholicism and forged an alliance with conservative Christian leaders on the Hill. He began leading meetings of the Values Action Team, where advocacy groups meet to track socially conservative legislation, and speaking out sternly about a cultural decline.

"Senator Brownback is unrivaled as an advocate for the family and for life in Washington," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council. "What Sam has that is unique, is that he has a pro-life, pro-family record to go with his pro-life, pro-family message."

Brownback captured many of those themes yesterday as he addressed a raucous crowd of supporters in Topeka, Kan., telling them: "I am a conservative and I'm proud to be a conservative."

In his 17-minute speech, he touched on the sanctity of marriage, the protection of all life "whether elderly or in the womb," and the need to preserve religion's place in public institutions. But he also addressed other subjects, vowing for instance to "end deaths by cancer in 10 years," and to take the tax code "behind the barn" and kill it "with a dull ax."

After the speech, Brownback conceded that he "starts out with less name ID" than other candidates. According to the Post-ABC News poll, Giuliani is favored by 34 percent of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents, McCain by 27 percent and Romney by 9 percent, with former House speaker Newt Gingrich, who is also considering a run for the White House, at 9 percent as well.

DOJ_NMG_0119708

Giuliani, McCain and Romney also have hired teams of advisers seasoned in President Bush's two campaigns and signaled that they hope to raise $100 million by the time primary season begins early next year.

Brownback's Senate campaign account has $600,000 as he starts his fundraising drive. A key to his campaign's financial strength may rest with Tom Monaghan, founder of Domino's Pizza and a Roman Catholic philanthropist who started Legatus, a lay group of wealthy conservative business executives. Monaghan has been serving as a top adviser to Brownback's campaign.

The senator's chances may ultimately depend on his ability to ignite Christian conservatives, said John Green, senior fellow with the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. Religious activists "don't have a consensus candidate yet," he said, but Brownback is one "they're certainly paying a lot of attention to."

Sen. Brownback Joins Presidential Race (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

TOPEKA, KAN. — Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas jumped into the 2008 presidential race Saturday, a favorite of the religious right now in a battle against better-known rivals for the GOP nomination.

"My family and I are taking the first steps on the yellow brick road to the White House. It's a great journey," the two-term senator told hundreds of supporters. He pledged to fight for the nation's cultural values and to focus on rebuilding families.

The 50-year-old Brownback offers himself as a "full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative."

After Saturday's speech, he told reporters: "My positions are at the heart of where the Republican Party is. I'm willing to take those positions with all comers."

Brownback's announcement, planned weeks ago, came hours after Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) entered her party's 2008 race.

"I don't know why she did that. I guess she's scared of me," Brownback said.

Though he is on solid footing on social issues, Brownback has broken with some Republicans on the Iraq war and immigration. He opposes sending more troops to Iraq and favors a path to citizenship for some of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the U.S.

Conservative Kansan Starts White House Run (CNN)

By Sasha Johnson

CNN.com, January 20, 2007

TOPEKA, Kansas (CNN) -- On a day when the political world was consumed with Hillary Clinton, Republican Senator Sam Brownback made his official foray into an already crowded field of 2008 aspirants.

"It is with sincere humility and a determination to do good that I declare my candidacy for President of the United States," Brownback told a buoyant crowd of supporters in Topeka, Kansas, Saturday.

The two-term senator enters a Republican field already dominated by big names and money, most notably Arizona Senator John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney. McCain, Giuliani and Romney have yet to make their candidacies official but are raising money through exploratory committees.

Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican, became the second member of Congress on Saturday to formally announce a run for the White House when New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Clinton announced on her Web site that she is forming a presidential exploratory committee.

A break from Bush on Iraq

A self-described fiscal and social conservative, Brownback made headlines recently when he broke with President George W. Bush and came out against the president's plan to send 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq and called for more diplomatic efforts.

"The United States seems to care more about a peaceful Iraq than the Iraqis do," Brownback said in a senate floor speech last week after returning from a trip to Afghanistan and Iraq. "If that is the case, it is difficult to understand why more U.S. troops would make a difference."

Brownback briefly mentioned the Iraq war in his speech which mainly revolved around faith and family issues. "We must win to redeem our troops' sacrifice. Let us resolve to have a bipartisan strategy for the war. We need unity here to win over there," he said.

Breaking with the White House on Iraq could be politically risky among the Republican base Brownback needs to court and win in order to be a successful candidate, said Chuck Hurley, a member of his exploratory committee, said.

Brownback spent a good deal of time during a trip to Iowa last week meeting with various constituencies and explaining the "reasoning" behind his position, Hurley, an Iowa supporter, said.

DOJ_NMG_0119709

"As the debate unfolds, his position, if he's right will look prescient," said Hurley. Hurley concedes some "hardcore conservatives" will "initially recoil" at Brownback's stance but "among those willing to engage in an open debate, he'll be fine."Preempted by Clinton

Brownback appeared to take the news of Senator Clinton's newly formed exploratory committee in stride acknowledging her marquis name and political star power.

"I think this is just a confirmation of something people have pretty well already mentally processed would take place," Brownback told CNN's Candy Crowley. "I think it's way too early to handicap this, this is a long road with a lot of things to go."

Despite his underdog status, many political observers caution those who are quick to write Brownback off in the 2008 cycle. "There is a path for him to be a factor in this race," said Chuck Todd, editor-in-chief of "The Hotline," a daily political publication. Todd calls Brownback "not a predictable Republican," pointing to the Kansas senator's strong anti-abortion platform, his deep religious ties to the Christian community, and his willingness to buck the conservative base and support immigration reform and efforts to combat global warming. "Brownback is trying to say 'hey you can be culturally conservative and mainstream'" at the same time, Todd said.

Brownback's strong Catholic faith could help pave the way in the early caucus state of Iowa where Christian evangelicals are a highly organized voting bloc. According to supporters Brownback has regularly returned to the state since 2004 meeting activists in small house parties across the state. In that year's presidential election almost half of Iowa Republican voters said they were either evangelical or born again Christian according to exit polls.

After his speech in Topeka, Brownback is scheduled to travel to North Carolina and then to Washington, D.C. for Monday's March for Life.

Brownback Formalizes White House Bid (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, January 20, 2007

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan) on Saturday formally announced his intention to seek the presidency. "I am running to spread hope and ideas," Brownback said in his announcement. "We are a blessed nation at an important crossroads. War, corruption, disintegrating families, and for some, hopelessness, tear at the American Dream."

Brownback's bid is seen as an uphill battle because several high-profile, well-organized candidates with deeper pockets are expected to join the race for the GOP nomination. These include Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

But if Brownback can become the consensus choice of value conservatives, his candidacy could make waves and build momentum. Many members of the Christian conservative base have concerns over the views of the better known candidates on issues like abortion and gay marriage.

The senator's announcement showed that his campaign will strongly focus on traditional values. "We must renew our families and rebuild our culture!" Brownback said.

But his announcement, which was overshadowed by Sen. Hillary Clinton's declaration earlier Saturday that she would also seek the presidency, also showed that the campaign will not only be limited to promoting conservative values. The introduction of a flat tax is part of his platform, as is the aim to achieve energy independence. In addition, Brownback vowed to fight government waste and help the poor in the US and abroad.

McCain Contends With Vocal Critics (AR)

By Dan Nowicki

The Arizona Republic, January 21, 2007

On the national stage, Sen. John McCain is a political star and a front-runner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

But back home, he faces some vocal critics in his own party who seem determined to derail his White House chances.

McCain supporters, including Arizona GOP Chairman Matt Salmon, are fuming about the latest stunt to embarrass McCain: a presidential "straw poll" that found McCain coming in fourth. Duncan Hunter, a little-known congressman from El Cajon, Calif., finished first.

Hunter's exploratory committee helped distribute the straw-poll results under the headline "Arizona Republican presidential primary no lock for John McCain." The news release, which lists Maricopa County GOP Chairman Lyle Tuttle as the contact person, did not provide details about the unscientific survey's methodology.

A number of national and local media outlets and political blogs ran with the story, which carries the man-bites-dog appeal of McCain trailing in his home state's biggest county.

DOJ_NMG_0119710

Bruce Merrill, an Arizona State University political scientist and polling expert, said he caught a television blurb about McCain finishing fourth in an Arizona poll.

Initially intrigued, Merrill said he was surprised, and appalled, to learn the report was based on a dubious straw poll.

"I think it is, one, irresponsible journalism to even report on it," Merrill said. "And, number two, if I were McCain, I would be madder than hell."

Merrill said he intended to launch his own poll of Arizona Republicans to determine their sentiment toward potential GOP contenders.

"My concern is that this (straw poll) is a perfect case of where a poll could create public opinion rather than measure public opinion," Merrill said.

Sham or accurate gauge?

In general, straw polls at political events are a fairly common way to informally gauge support for a candidate or an idea.

Some Republicans called this one a sham orchestrated to hurt McCain. Others acknowledged irregularities with the way the survey was conducted but defended it as a legitimate expression of grass-roots dissatisfaction with McCain.

Maricopa County Republicans conducted the straw poll at their Jan. 13 organizational meeting.

The one-page ballot offered 12 Republican possibilities for president and asked precinct committeemen to pick their first choice as well as label certain candidates "acceptable" or "unacceptable."

Hunter finished first, with 96 of 458 ballots cast. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney was second with 82, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich was third with 53 and McCain was fourth with 50. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has said she will not run, came in fifth with 27 votes.

Tom Tancredo, a Colorado congressman known as a hard-line foe of illegal immigration, was sixth with 24 votes.

Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, also considered a national front-runner, was seventh with 22 votes.

In the "unacceptable" category, McCain was the top vote-getter.

Rob Haney, legislative District 11 Republican chairman and an outspoken McCain critic, said many "platform" Republicans have abandoned McCain over issues such as campaign-finance reform, gun control and immigration.

"I don't know how anybody could look at that survey and say it wasn't reflective of what the Republican base felt," Haney said. "That is the Republican base: your precinct committeemen."

Tensions between McCain and segments of the party faithful are not unique to Maricopa County or Arizona. During his 2000 presidential campaign, McCain alienated many conservatives.

The straw poll "does suggest that there is enduring enmity toward McCain in many conservative circles," said Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia. "They just don't like him, and they never will. McCain could walk on water, and their headline would be, 'McCain can't swim.' "

Salmon called the straw poll the latest salvo in an ongoing attack by a disgruntled few.

"We have a couple of people who are activists within the Republican Party who have made it their cause celebre to try to torpedo John McCain, and they play a lot of games," Salmon said. "They try to make it seem like the opposition is a lot bigger and broader than it really is."

Capitalizing on results

In the news release announcing the straw-poll results, Tuttle, the county GOP chairman, invited other Republicans to compete in Arizona's February 2008 presidential primary.

"This straw poll demonstrates that candidates who might be tempted to ignore campaigning here, thinking that our senior senator has it wrapped up, may make a big mistake," Tuttle says in the written statement. "Arizona is very much in play."

In a telephone interview, Tuttle acknowledged that the straw poll was unscientific and said nobody "tried to make it something that it wasn't."

The straw poll was not publicized, and ballots were hard to find at the meeting, said Tom Liddy, a former Maricopa County GOP chairman and radio talk-show host.

"I started asking around, and a lot of people didn't have them," he said. "Other people, I found, had five or six ballots. So it's kind of bogus."

Tuttle conceded that not everybody got a ballot. But he dismissed claims that the straw poll was rigged against McCain as "horse pucky."

"It was not manipulated in any way that I am aware of," Tuttle said. "The people who voted, I assume, voted their consciences."

Haney said some in attendance voted by proxy for absent committee members, while others did not. The proxy voting "wasn't handled as best as it could be," he said.

Hunter, the straw-poll winner, is the former chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0119711

Haney, who supports Hunter, said Hunter's candidacy started generating local "buzz" after Rep. Trent Franks, R-Ariz., announced his support.

"I expected him to do relatively well, but I didn't expect him to finish first," Haney said.

In 2000, McCain won Arizona's primary despite Republican Gov. Jane Hull's endorsement of George W. Bush.

"Senator McCain has tremendous support in Arizona and was re-elected (in 2004) with nearly 80 percent of the vote," said Danny Diaz, a spokesman for McCain's presidential exploratory committee. "The senator and his team will continue to communicate his message of 'common-sense conservatism' with supporters in the state."

Donna Reagan, a former legislative District 8 GOP chairwoman who attended the county meeting, is rooting for McCain.

"I'm proud that our state has a person who can make a run for the presidency," said Reagan, whose daughter, Michele, is a state lawmaker from Scottsdale.

"What's that saying? Sometimes you're not considered a king in your own country."

What Would Jeb Do? (WP)

By S.v. Date

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Tuesday would have marked his sixth State of the Union address -- and it might have been his best yet.

The nation is in great shape, President Jeb Bush would have reported: record tax cuts propelling the economy to greater heights; a revolutionary school-vouchers program for the first time granting low-income parents real education choices; and, five years after the capture of Osama bin Laden, the final 20,000 U.S. troops returning home from Iraq.

The president would break into his fluent Spanish and wave at his Mexican-born wife, Columba, gazing at him from the balcony. The cameras would settle on their eldest, George P. Bush, 30, and commentators would speculate on whether the dashing lawyer would soon run for Congress and carry on the Bush dynasty.

Yet contrary to the best-laid plans of the Bush family, it won't be John Ellis "Jeb" Bush addressing the nation this week, all because of that disastrous November Tuesday a dozen years ago. That was the day Jeb -- the articulate and handsome workaholic, the one who as a boy spoke of his White House ambitions, and the one the Bush family counted on to avenge the Great Usurpation of 1992 -- narrowly lost his bid to be governor of Florida. Meanwhile, his older brother George W. had overcome long odds and won the Texas governorship, putting George an insurmountable step ahead of Jeb in the race for the presidency.

But what if Jeb had won the Florida governorship in 1994, been reelected and then taken the White House in 2000? How would the nation be different? What sort of State of the Union would he deliver this week?

This is more than an exercise in alternative history. Because of Florida's term limits, Jeb stepped down as governor three weeks ago, but he should not be counted out of the national political scene. I've covered Jeb Bush for eight years as a state capital reporter, and I'm convinced that he remains the GOP conservative wing's best hope for a post-Iraq comeback. And his own political ambitions burn as brightly as ever. Perhaps 2012 or 2016 or -- why not? -- maybe even 2008, if things break right.

Jeb and George W. are seven years apart but have much in common. Both are stubborn. Both appear convinced that anything that government does the private sector can do better. Both are enamored of tax cuts. And both seem to believe that voters don't have the right to observe the workings of their administrations and should simply trust them to do the right thing. However, the two display real differences on issues spanning crisis management, fiscal policy, foreign policy and, perhaps most important, personal style. Jeb pays much more attention to detail than his brother, and is far more dogged and competent in advancing his agenda -- meaning that a Jeb presidency over the past seven years would have been distinct from his brother's -- and a future one would be as well.

Look first to the home front. On key domestic policy issues such as tax cuts and education reform, Jeb probably would have mirrored his brother's instincts and proposals, though he might have displayed greater staying power in seeing them through.

Under President Jeb, the nation still would have had large federal tax cuts, skewed heavily toward the rich -- or the "risk takers" and "job creators," in Bush family parlance. In Florida, he reduced taxes by $12.2 billion over his eight years, with more than half of that going to the wealthiest 4.5 percent of the population. That saved the average risk taker more than $1,500 a year by the time Jeb left office. And much as President George W. Bush cites tax cuts as the explanation for any positive economic results, Gov. Jeb Bush says that his tax cuts created jobs in Florida and gave us the best economy in the country. (In reality, Jeb had the lowest job-creation rate of any Florida governor dating to 1971.)

On education, Jeb quickly pushed into law a testing program, just as his brother did in Texas and later nationally through No Child Left Behind. Unlike George W., however, Jeb succeeded in introducing the nation's first statewide school-vouchers program. The results are unclear: Jeb says that students who used vouchers to attend private schools received better educations than they had been getting in public schools. But all we know is that the vast majority of such schoolchildren received religious educations at the public's expense. Gov. Bush refused to release the scores for the few voucher children who had to take the public-school standardized test, so whether their educations were superior or awful remains anyone's guess.

DOJ_NMG_0119712

For a brief period, George W. sought to include school vouchers in NCLB, but he eventually relented; Jeb, I believe, would never have let it drop. Indeed, much more than his older brother, Jeb seems to take pleasure in the business of governing, as opposed to just campaigning. Whereas George W. claims to stay at 30,000 feet and see the big picture, Jeb is all about the details. He kept long hours as governor, took home fat binders to study each night and knew enough about policy matters to make detailed and cogent arguments for his ideas. It's hard to imagine a President Jeb countenancing the explosion of pork-barrel earmarks in the federal budget the way his brother did, for example. During his eight years as governor, Jeb took the time to slash thousands of such projects out of Florida state budgets, most of them inserted by Republican lawmakers.

His willingness to delve into the nitty gritty probably would have made Jeb a radically different commander in chief than his brother during one of the most dramatic and tragic events of the Bush presidency: Hurricane Katrina.

When a spate of hurricanes struck Florida in the late summer of 2004, Jeb responded quickly. He didn't dream up schemes to give hurricane victims private-school vouchers for their children. He didn't try to privatize disaster response. Instead, he worked on obvious, sensible things: He implemented an effective and thorough evacuation, and then came in quickly with massive assistance, including search-and-rescue teams, water, ice, food, law enforcement -- in more or less that order.

This was Jeb's shining, nonpartisan leadership moment in Florida and, the tragedy notwithstanding, he relished the challenge. He loves to compete, and standing up to a category four or five storm is the ultimate challenge a Florida governor can face.

In the state-of-the-art Emergency Operations Center on the southern edge of Tallahassee, with its giant display screens and dozens of computers, Jeb was in his element, walking around, getting status reports about how many shelters were open, effortlessly issuing commands without worrying about obstructionist judges or meddlesome state legislators.

Had Jeb been president in the days before Katrina struck, he would have known that such a huge storm threatened catastrophe for New Orleans. He would have known that the levees could break -- and he would have made sure that the city and state governments got all the help they needed. Jeb would not have undermined the Federal Emergency Management Agency with cronyism and incompetence. He would have "federalized" Katrina while the storm was still in the Gulf, taking over the evacuation and even using the military to empty the Lower Ninth Ward ahead of the storm, if that's what it took.

"I have learned a lot during my tenure as governor," Jeb told the Pensacola News Journal during that hurricane season. "One is when to be partisan and when not to be. Storms don't hit just Rs and Ds or independents. They're all Floridians."

I believe Jeb was being candid. He would have responded just as vigorously if the storm had struck a predominantly black, poor and entirely Democratic town as he did when it hit Republican-rich cities such as Pensacola, Punta Gorda and Stuart. A poor Florida city is still a Florida city, and to let a hurricane kill hundreds of Floridians, or to allow it to destroy a town without quickly rebuilding, is to let the hurricane defeat him.

Jeb Bush doesn't do defeat.

That leads to the key question of a Jeb Bush presidency. In public, of course, Jeb has supported his brother's decision to invade Iraq. "It's tough," he said in a recent interview with Newsmax.com. "Thank God the president has been resolute, because it's not a popular war." But would Jeb have made the same choice? Would his state of the union speech this week have to include a lengthy discussion of a war in Iraq gone horribly wrong?

Unlike George, who ridiculed his classmates at Yale University for opposing the Vietnam War but then sought refuge in the National Guard, Jeb was troubled enough by that war that, according to his mother in a 1984 interview, he considered registering as a conscientious objector. Ultimately, he chose not to hurt his father's political career -- at the time, George H.W. Bush was President Richard M. Nixon's ambassador to the United Nations -- and registered for the draft. He was never called. "I had no compelling reason to go to Vietnam" he told the Miami Herald in 1994.

But he has grown more hawkish over time. Jeb Bush was a 1997 signatory to the Project for the New American Century, the neoconservative blueprint for a more "Reaganite" foreign policy. And his mother, Barbara, recalls in her memoirs a 1990 dinner gathering with President George H.W. Bush, their four sons and Air Force Chief of Staff Merrill McPeak. At the time, the president was pondering how to handle Saddam Hussein, who had invaded Kuwait, and Jeb (then 37) agreed with his brothers that their father should deal with Hussein harshly.

Yet Jeb did not sign on to PNAC's 1998 call to invade Iraq and depose Hussein. He also likes and respects former secretary of state Colin L. Powell; perhaps Jeb would have followed the "Powell Doctrine" in Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, pursuing the Taliban and al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden more zealously and using overwhelming force. With about 300,000 troops stabilizing Afghanistan, Iraq might not have become the imperative that it became under George W.

DOJ_NMG_0119713

Finally, there is a chance that Jeb's more internationally minded background -- he majored in Latin American studies in college and later lived in Venezuela for two years as a young bank officer -- might have made him open to a nuanced, more even-handed foreign policy, less susceptible to his neoconservative friends urging him to deal with Iraq once and for all.

It is impossible to know, but I suspect that the United States still would have gone to war in Iraq under President Jeb Bush. He would have been amenable to a compelling case from the same neocon camp that influenced George W., and Hussein's 1993 assassination attempt against George H.W. Bush could have clinched the deal. However, once in Iraq, Jeb would have been less prone to botch the job through inattention and cronyism. As with Florida's hurricanes, Jeb probably would have considered the task of invading, occupying and rebuilding a foreign country too important to outsource to political hacks or ideologues.

Once the family's brightest hope for this generation, Jeb may now prove a victim of the political ruin his older brother has brought to the Bush brand. Barely three in 10 Americans think that George W. is doing a good job. What are the chances that voters will gamble on the First Brother?

No one should write Jeb's political epitaph just yet. Even a 2008 presidential run should not be ruled out entirely. Should John McCain or Rudolph W. Giuliani or Mitt Romney fail to build a dominating presence by mid-summer, there is probably only one Republican who could come in at such a late date and still build an effective organization and a powerful fundraising machine in a matter of weeks: Jeb Bush. After all, Jeb raised about $35 million to win reelection as Florida governor four years ago. Pulling in $100 million in a few months is well within the realm of the possible.

In all likelihood, though, 2008 would be tough. The Iraq war is not getting any more popular, and U.S. troops may not be coming home quickly enough to allow Jeb a credible run.

A better fit for Jeb this time around is the number two slot. It would ensure his claim to be the GOP's front-runner in future contests. Coming on the heels of the George W. Bush presidency, the prospect of a Vice President Jeb Bush is not quite as scary as a President Jeb Bush. And the campaign trail is the ideal venue for Jeb to sell himself to the national media. The gap between Jeb, the Serious and Thoughtful Grownup, and George, the Perpetual Frat Boy, would become a major story line.

McCain swung by Tallahassee in December 2005 to sound out Jeb about running with him, and any Republican candidate would be foolish not to put him on the short list. He can raise money by the bucketfuls. Unlike his father and brother, Jeb does not tread gingerly through debates as though they were minefields, but uses them to his advantage. The fact that he has a Mexican-born wife could put Democrats on the defensive in California. And he remains popular in electoral-vote-rich Florida.

Jeb Bush will turn 54 next month. He has plenty of time. Given his personality and his sense of mission -- not to mention that his father and brother have already succeeded at this -- it seems impossible that Jeb would not run for president. Whether in two or six or 10 years, the United States will face the prospect of yet another Bush in the White House. Americans will then quickly learn what we in Florida already know: This Bush not only combines his father's interest in governing and his brother's permanent campaign but also brings a relentlessness to impose his will that seems entirely his own.

And ultimately, if Jeb is hobbled by the myth or reality of "Bush fatigue," one cure seems certain: Hillary Rodham Clinton. Should the junior senator from New York run away with the Democratic nomination, Jeb would have a ready answer for those who lament a Bush Dynasty.

"We're going to have a dynasty either way," he could respond. "The question is: Which one do you want? My family or hers?"

S.V. Dáte is the Tallahassee bureau chief for the Palm Beach Post and author of "Jeb: America's Next Bush" (Tarcher/Penguin).

Gut Check (WP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Colorado Sen. Wayne Allard's decision not to run for reelection last week gives Democrats a prime pickup opportunity in 2008. Is Allard's retirement a blip on the radar or a sign of things to come? Here's a look at the other Republican senators contemplating calling it quits in '08:

Sen. John Warner (Va.): Frustrated by his lack of power and still gasping at George Allen's drubbing in November, this five-term vet may take a pass -- especially if Democrats find a strong candidate.

The Betting: Slight tilt to retire.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.): One of President Bush's strongest GOP war critics, he has never come across as an enthusiastic senator -- and he still has an eye on the White House in '08.

The Betting: Lean retires.

Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.): The former Senate Republican campaign chair had a miserable 2006, but her colleagues believe she will tough it out to reinstate her icon status.

DOJ_NMG_0119714

The Betting: Lean runs.

Sen. Pete Domenici (N.M.): The official word is that he's running, but two years is a long time for a 74-year-old who has health problems and appears increasingly frail.

The Betting: Lean retires.

Sen. Larry Craig (Idaho): Another regular on the retirement rumor mill, but Democrats aren't paying much attention, because Idaho is Republican country.

The Betting: Lean runs.

Sen. Thad Cochran (Miss.): He recently suggested that a decision may be a year away. The longer a party loyalist such as Cochran waits, the more inclined he may be to stay.

The Betting: Lean runs.

Carter, Clinton Seek To Bring Together Moderate Baptists (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

Former presidents Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton are leading an effort to forge dozens of small and medium-size, black and white Baptist organizations into a robust coalition that would serve as a counterweight to the conservative Southern Baptist Convention.

The giant SBC, with more than 16 million members, has long dominated the political, theological and social landscape among Baptists, often spawning resentment among smaller Baptist groups. It has also been closely aligned with the Republican Party.

The new coalition, which is Carter's brainchild, would give moderate Baptists a stronger collective voice and could provide Democrats with greater entree into the Baptist community. But Carter and other organizers are trying to walk a fine line, insisting that the alliance is not directly political while touting its potential to recast the role of religion in the public square.

"We hope . . . to emphasize the common commitments that bind us together rather than to concentrate on the divisive issues that separate us," Carter said. "There's too much of an image in the Baptist world, and among non-Christians, that the main, permeating characteristic of Christian groups is animosity toward one another and an absence of ability to cooperate in a spirit of brotherhood and sisterhood."

The Rev. Richard Land, head of the SBC's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, said the smaller Baptist groups are in "a search for significance and relevance." He scoffed at the idea that the new coalition would be nonpartisan.

"I'm not going to question their motives. I just know that if I were them, I would be concerned about how it might appear to many people, the timing," Land said. "Purportedly they're going to hold a convention of several thousand people in Atlanta in early 2008, hosted by two former Democratic presidents, one of whom has a wife seeking the Democratic presidential nomination. Some would see that as an overtly political activity."

Carter and Clinton were raised as Southern Baptists but have expressed dismay over the SBC's increasingly conservative bent since traditionalists defeated modernists in a struggle for control of the denomination in the 1970s and '80s.

The leadership battle, which raged over issues such as biblical inerrancy, temperance, homosexuality, abortion and women's role in the church, culminated in 2000 with revisions to the "Baptist Faith and Message" that barred women from serving as pastors and called for wives to "submit graciously" to the leadership of their husbands.

Carter stopped calling himself a Southern Baptist that year. Clinton attended a Methodist church during his years in the White House.

On Jan. 9 at the Carter Center in Atlanta, the two ex-presidents brought together the heads of 40 Baptist denominations and organizations to launch a year-long organizing effort that they hope will climax with the celebration of a "New Baptist Covenant" in early 2008. Clinton described himself as just a "cheerleader" for the effort and declined to be interviewed.

One of the main organizers, William D. Underwood, president of Mercer University in Atlanta, said the covenant's members will spend the coming months identifying joint projects to undertake in international aid, domestic poverty relief and missionary work.

"We're not against any other group of people of faith," he said. "We're against the fact that 100,000 people died last month of malaria. We're against the fact that hundreds of thousands of Africans face starvation each year."

The covenant would not be not a new denomination but a coalition of four historically black Baptist churches -- including the 7.5-million-member National Baptist Convention USA and the 2.5-million-member Progressive National Baptist Convention -- and several predominantly white Baptist groups, including the 1.4-million-member American Baptist Churches USA and the 500,000-member Cooperative Baptist Fellowship.

Together, they have more than 20 million members, outnumbering the SBC, which was not invited to the Atlanta meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0119715

"The elephant is no longer in the room. There's been a convergence of the rest of the Baptists in North America," said the Rev. Daniel Vestal, national coordinator of the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, a group of present and former Southern Baptists unhappy with the SBC's course.

"The thrust here is for a voice of Baptists that has not been heard," said the Rev. William J. Shaw, president of the Nashville-based National Baptist Convention USA. "Most of the representations of Baptists have come from the prominent television personalities, and that's okay, but they don't represent the full sweep of Baptist understanding of the faith."

Shaw said broadcast evangelists such as the Rev. Jerry Falwell and the Rev. Pat Robertson, along with the Southern Baptist Convention, have "downsized the moral message" of the Bible "so that the dominant question has to do with sexuality."

Black Baptist churches, he said, are saying that "sexuality is not the only dimension of morality. The whole business of social justice, of a fair prosecution of offenders, caring for the environment, immigration, even the morality of our foreign policy, are things that really need to be put into the debate."

Land denied that Southern Baptists care only about sexual morality, noting that the SBC was heavily involved in relief efforts after Hurricane Katrina. But he agreed that there appear to be significant disagreements between the SBC and the new coalition.

"One of the areas where we would be in significant disagreement would be our view toward Israel, as highlighted by President Carter's new book," he said, referring to "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid," published in November by Simon & Schuster. Fourteen members of an advisory panel at the Carter Center have resigned over the book's depiction of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Another difference, he said, was made clear last week when Carter spoke of sexual orientation as an "ancillary issue." "Most Southern Baptists would disagree with that," Land said. "We're not going to affirm and accept all sexual orientations."

Although the SBC was not invited to the planning meetings, Carter said he is confident that "many full-fledged Southern Baptists" will join the new covenant.

"We want our whole concept to be receptive and positive and inclusive -- and not exclusive or rejecting any Baptist," he said.

With Rich Little, Press Corps Is Assured A Nice Impression (WP)

By Paul Farhi

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

The White House press corps last week found itself embroiled in controversy -- a controversy over its efforts to avoid controversy at an event whose guests include President Bush.

Stung by criticism that comedian Stephen Colbert went too far last year in his remarks at the White House Correspondents' Association annual dinner, the group announced last week that it had lined up a different kind of entertainer for its next dinner on April 21: impersonator Rich Little.

The choice elicited two general reactions: Who? And why?

While the name is probably unfamiliar to people under 40, Little was a popular Las Vegas performer and guest star on TV variety shows of the 1960s and 1970s. He's best known for impressions of celebrities (Johnny Carson, Jimmy Stewart, Jack Benny) and presidents (Nixon and Reagan) who are no longer with us.

But "edgy" Little isn't. Even in his heyday, he didn't do biting topical satire or searing political humor. As a performer, he's more "Ed Sullivan" than "Daily Show."

Which is why, according to Little, he was hired in the first place. "One of the reasons they picked me is because I'm not controversial," he said yesterday from his home in Las Vegas. "They did get some flak about the guy they had last year. I don't think they wanted someone political or controversial again."

Yet after Colbert made waves -- he compared the Bush administration to the Hindenburg disaster, among other things -- some wondered whether choosing Little indicated that the rough, tough White House press corps was going soft, ensuring that its honored guests from the White House would suffer not even the slightest slight.

That's more or less how MSNBC host Keith Olbermann read it; he nominated the entire correspondents' association as his "Worst Person in the World" on his program last week.

Little, 68, disavows comments attributed to him in the Las Vegas Review-Journal last week that seemed to suggest he had been told by the press group to go easy on the president and that he "wouldn't even mention the word 'Iraq' " at the dinner. "No one ever put restrictions on what I can do or say," Little said. "I wouldn't mention Iraq because there's nothing funny about it."

Nevertheless, Little's published comments put the WHCA on the defensive. The group's president, C-SPAN's Steve Scully, issued a statement saying: "The White House Correspondents' Association never dictates or censors the content of a press dinner entertainer's act . . . My advice to [Little's agency] when we booked [him] in December was to follow the time-honored Washington motto [of] the Gridiron Dinner: 'Singe, but never burn.' "

DOJ_NMG_0119716

On the other hand, Scully said in an interview, the group does want to avoid "an Imus moment," a reference to radio talk-show host Don Imus's monologue at the 1996 Radio and Television Correspondents' Association Dinner, in which Imus rankled some of the assembled with off-color cracks about President Clinton's extramarital behavior.

"I loved Colbert and thought he was outstanding," Scully said, "but some people don't get his brand of humor. Do you want to invite someone to a party and make them into a political pi?ata? That's not the purpose of the dinner. It's for [journalists] and their sources and contacts to have an enjoyable evening. That's what we're trying to do."

Scully said his group sought David Letterman, Jay Leno, Billy Crystal and Martin Short as performers for this year's dinner, but none was interested. Scully turned to Little after seeing him perform on Letterman's TV show in November. He accepted the gig, which Scully said pays "in the low five figures."

But even a nice paycheck doesn't make playing black-tie Washington worthwhile, says Lewis Black, comedian and "Daily Show" regular. "What they want at those events are [politically correct] jokes, and P.C. jokes just aren't funny," said Black, who grew up in Silver Spring. "You spend the rest of the year making fun of these people, and when you come to Washington, you have to turn your act into a series of innocuous knock-knock jokes. It's just painful."

When he performed at the Radio and Television Correspondents' Association dinner in 2005, Black said, he edited all of his usual material, even avoiding saying "nipple" in reference to the Janet Jackson "wardrobe malfunction" incident. He also thought it was inappropriate to use the word "laid" in the punch line of a joke about his high school prom, which had been held in the same Hilton Washington ballroom as the dinner.

As for Little's being hired this year by the White House Correspondents' Association, Black said: "It's like going from Jackson Pollock to paint-by-numbers. God love Rich Little, but he's not in this decade. He's in no position to pose any threat to anyone. He makes Bob Hope look like Lenny Bruce. It's sad that we've reached this point" with comedy as political expression.

Another reason to scrap the dinner altogether, suggests Rem Rieder, editor of the American Journalism Review. After the Colbert controversy last year, and an earlier one in which Bush joked about not finding weapons of mass destruction, Rieder wrote that such press-politico events reflect the "smugness" and arrogance of the news media, suggesting that they are "part of a wealthy elite, completely out of touch with ordinary Americans."

The hiring of "a controversy-free" Little underscores the point, he says: "Do we really need a neon sign to proclaim the coziness of the White House press corps and the White House's occupant? It's really hard for me to understand making a decision like this, particularly so close to the WMD debacle. The dinner must go."

George A. Smathers, 93; Former Florida Senator (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

George A. Smathers, 93, a former Democratic senator from Florida who forged friendships with presidents, waged war against communism, resisted civil rights legislation and was an early voice warning against Fidel Castro's rise to power in Cuba, died Jan. 20 at Indian Creek Village, an exclusive island community near Miami. He had a stroke earlier in the week.

Mr. Smathers was among a new breed of congressmen -- including John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon -- who arrived on Capitol Hill in the late 1940s and were shaped by their experience in World War II. Mr. Smathers used his during more than two decades in Washington to focus on international issues and to fight communism.

Early in his career he was considered a moderate, but by the time he left office in 1969, he had a tarnished legacy as an opponent of civil rights.

Charming, tall and handsome -- his opponents called him "Gorgeous George" -- Mr. Smathers easily won friends. He spoke on behalf of the groom at Kennedy's wedding rehearsal dinner. When Lyndon B. Johnson suffered his first heart attack, Mr. Smathers was at his side. And when Nixon sought a refuge from the White House, Mr. Smathers sold him a house on Key Biscayne in Florida.

In spite of his connections, Mr. Smathers sometimes found himself at odds with his party's leadership. Like other Southern Democrats, he coddled segregationist white voters. He supported voting rights for African Americans but sought to weaken other equal rights measures and voted against the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964.

He opposed Thurgood Marshall's nomination to the Supreme Court and called the Brown v. Board of Education decision, which declared school segregation illegal -- a "clear abuse of judicial power." When the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was jailed in St. Augustine, Fla., Mr. Smathers offered to pay King's bail, but only if he left the state.

As an expert on Latin America, Mr. Smathers supported the Alliance for Progress, which pumped billions of dollars in aid to the region. He was also among the earliest and loudest voices cautioning of Castro's communist leanings and urged a hard-line approach to Cuba and a total embargo on its goods.

DOJ_NMG_0119717

George Armistead Smathers was born Nov. 13, 1913, in Atlantic City. His father was a federal judge and his uncle a U.S. senator. His family moved to Miami when he was 6, and he won his first election, as student body president, while attending Miami Senior High School.

After graduating from the University of Florida, he received a law degree from there in 1938. He served as an assistant U.S. district attorney, then entered the Marine Corps during World War II.

In 1946, Mr. Smathers won his congressional seat by unseating a four-term representative. He and Kennedy, who was elected the same year, shared similar affluent backgrounds, wartime experiences and a passion for golf -- and women. Hampered by a bad back and other war injuries, Kennedy sometimes leaned on Mr. Smathers as they walked to the floor of Congress to cast votes.

When Mr. Smathers ran for the Senate in 1950, the race turned out to be among the most contentious in Florida's history. Mr. Smathers badgered incumbent Sen. Claude Pepper (D) on his support of civil rights and accused Pepper of being a communist sympathizer. Both sides issued scurrilous statements, but the most famous remarks may never have been uttered.

"Do you know that Claude Pepper is known all over Washington as a shameless extrovert?" Mr. Smathers was quoted as saying. "Not only that, but this man is reliably reported to practice nepotism with his sister-in-law and he has a sister who was once a thespian in wicked New York. Worst of all, it is an established fact that Mr. Pepper, before his marriage, habitually practiced celibacy."

The comments appeared in Time magazine and were forever etched into public memory, but Mr. Smathers denied ever having made them. Pepper's backers called Mr. Smathers a fearmonger and a bigot, but Mr. Smathers prevailed.

In Congress, Mr. Smathers helped pass bills to create Medicare, the Small Business Administration and Everglades National Park. He pushed for federal holidays to be moved to Mondays and ardently supported the war in Vietnam.

After voluntarily leaving office in 1969, Mr. Smathers made a fortune through lobbying and varied business ventures, ranging from orange groves to car dealerships. He gave tens of millions of dollars to the University of Florida and the University of Miami.

His first marriage, to Rosemary Townley Smathers, ended in divorce soon after his departure from politics.

Survivors include his wife, Carolyn Hyder Smathers, whom he married in the early 1970s, of Indian Creek Village; two sons from his first marriage, John Smathers of Arlington and Bruce Smathers, a former Florida secretary of state, of Jacksonville; a sister; and three grandchildren.

Talks On Palestinian Unity Postponed (AP)

By Zeina Karam, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 21, 2007

Key talks on forming a Palestinian unity government and ending deadly infighting were canceled Saturday night, dimming expectations for a planned meeting between the Palestinian president and the exiled leader of Hamas militants.

"The meeting was postponed until tomorrow (at the earliest). We hope that it will be held," Izzat Rashaq, a member of Hamas' politburo, told The Associated Press.

Rashaq said further preliminary negotiations were needed to resolve differences over forming a coalition government before Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal could meet. He did not elaborate.

Another senior member of a Palestinian faction also told AP the meeting had been postponed.

"There are difficulties facing such a meeting and there are current mediations to try and resolve the problems," he said, agreeing to discuss the matter only if not quoted by name or even by faction because of the sensitivity of the matter.

There had been hopes that the meeting — the first between Abbas and Mashaal since July 2005 — could end the yearlong political deadlock between the militant Hamas, which controls the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet, and Abbas' more moderate Fatah movement.

With the two sides unable to agree, tensions have repeatedly exploded into warfare in the Gaza Strip — a traditional Hamas stronghold — that has killed at least 62 people.

The thorniest issues are control of the two factions' security forces and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist.

Western nations are demanding that the militant Islamic group accept Israel's existence and renounce violence as a condition for ending an economic boycott they imposed on the Palestinian Authority after Hamas won legislative elections last year.

Abbas has been pushing Hamas for months to form a unity government of independent experts in hopes of ending the sanctions and has threatened to call early elections if the two sides can't agree.

Before Abbas arrived in Damascus on Saturday, he had billed the planned talks with Mashaal as a last-ditch effort to end the crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0119718

But, as Abbas began meeting with leading members of other Palestinian factions Saturday evening, his aide Saeb Erekat sought to play down the significance of any talks with Mashaal and would not confirm a meeting had been planned.

"The purpose of this visit is for President Abbas to meet with (Syrian) President (Bashar) Assad, though I'm not excluding the possibility of President Abbas meeting with Mr. Mashaal and other Palestinian leaders in Damascus," Erekat told reporters.

Abbas met with the Syrian-based leaders of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine and Islamic Jihad at his hotel in the Syrian capital.

Rashaq, the Hamas official, said Islamic Jihad leaders and the leaders of other Palestinian factions were involved in mediation efforts to try to resolve the problems between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement. "We hope an agreement can be reached," he said.

Mashaal has lived in Damascus since 1997, when he survived an Israeli assassination attempt in Jordan.

Abbas came to Damascus bolstered by Israel's release to him on Friday of $100 million in frozen Palestinian taxes that the Jewish state has refused to turn over to the Hamas-controlled Palestinian government.

Israel said the money would be used by Abbas for humanitarian purposes and to strengthen his security forces.

___

Associated Press writer Albert Aji contributed to this report.

Lawmaker's Tough Talk Rouses Fatah Faithful (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

RAMALLAH, WEST BANK — Once again, Mohammed Dahlan is playing the heavy.

The former Palestinian security chief gained a reputation for having an iron hand during a crackdown against Hamas a decade ago. Now he again is at the forefront of his Fatah movement's conflict with the radical Islamist group.

The 45-year-old lawmaker stoked tensions during a fiery speech at a rally in the Gaza Strip this month, angrily labeling Hamas "murderers" and vowing to strike back twice as hard if its gunmen carried out more attacks on his Fatah brethren.

The address, marking Fatah's 42nd anniversary, came three days after Hamas forces besieged the Gaza home of a senior Fatah security official, killing him and six others as the official pleaded for help in a telephone call aired live by Palestinian radio.

During the Jan. 7 rally, which drew tens of thousands of backers, Dahlan defiantly pushed his bodyguards away, reportedly telling them to "let Hamas shoot me."

Hamas activists call Dahlan a thug and say he is serving as a proxy for Israeli and U.S. efforts to oust them from power.

But the tough talk also generated an exhilarating shiver among many members of the once-dominant Fatah movement, still struggling to regain its balance a year after losing parliamentary elections to Hamas, and renewed speculation among Palestinians over Dahlan's ambitions.

"He wants to be the president of the Palestinians. It is very clear," said Hani Masri, a Palestinian commentator in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Poised and well groomed

Dahlan dismisses such speculation, even though he has helped fuel it by assuming a higher profile after many months in the background. Poised and always impeccably groomed, Dahlan lately has appeared nearly inseparable from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, also of Fatah, with whom he has had an up-and-down relationship.

Israeli media have reported that Abbas quietly named Dahlan to oversee Palestinian security forces, in effect putting him in command of Fatah's battle with Hamas. Dahlan has denied it.

"I'm just a member of Fatah and not more than that. I will carry out my responsibilities on that basis," he told foreign journalists in a briefing Friday. "I'm a person up the street."

Among the next generation of Fatah activists, polls generally show Dahlan and Marwan Barghouti, the jailed leader of the Palestinian uprising, as the favored potential successors to Abbas.

Many party members complain of a leadership vacuum since the death of Yasser Arafat in 2004. Abbas, 71, has not indicated any plans to step aside, nor made it clear whether he will run if early elections are held this year. Abbas has called for presidential and parliamentary elections to break the months-long impasse with Hamas, but he has not followed through.

Dahlan is popular in Gaza, where clan ties helped him win a legislative seat despite Hamas' near sweep and where he retains influence with thousands of members of the security forces loyal to Fatah. A canny political survivor and charismatic counterpoint to the drab Abbas, he receives a rock star's reception among admirers, especially women and young people.

But he has scant support in the more populous West Bank. Even Fatah members there regard him as potentially divisive and in too big a hurry for power. Moreover, ordinary Palestinians view Dahlan's lifestyle as lavish, possible evidence of his ties to the graft that was rampant under Arafat. Dahlan has denied corruption allegations.

But by standing up to Hamas, Dahlan appears to have provided his listless party with a fortifying jolt. His speech came during a spate of factional violence that killed more than 30 people.

"It was very important to Fatah. It gave them this push back by showing there was someone willing to stand up," said Diana Buttu, a political analyst and former legal advisor to the Palestine Liberation Organization. "For the first time in a long time, he energized the movement."

Analyst Ghassan Khatib, a former planning minister, said Dahlan had to step up when the Fatah-Hamas deadlock turned violent.

"Fatah needed a strong man in Gaza to lead," Khatib said. "He's the only one who can do that."

'Leading the coup'

Hamas has portrayed Dahlan as the embodiment of its fight with Fatah.

"Dahlan is leading the coup against the democratically elected government," said Ismail Radwan, a Hamas spokesman in Gaza.

Hamas officials accused Dahlan of orchestrating what they said was an assassination attempt against Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh in December. Hamas spokesmen say Dahlan has incited further factional violence, and they accused him of treason.

Dahlan depicts Hamas members as religious zealots bent on keeping power no matter the cost.

"If Hamas kills somebody from Fatah, I will not stay quiet. I will confront them," he told reporters.

The two sides have a history of bad blood.

Dahlan, who led a Fatah youth group in the Gaza Strip during the 1980s, recalls with disdain that the Islamists refused to join the Palestinian resistance movement. Hamas leaders, meanwhile, blame Dahlan for the torture and humiliation they said their members endured at the hands of his forces when Arafat ordered a crackdown in 1996.

Dahlan grew up in a refugee camp in Khan Yunis, in the southern Gaza Strip, and as a young Fatah activist repeatedly was jailed by Israeli authorities before being deported to Jordan in 1988. He later joined Arafat in Tunis, Tunisia, and returned in 1994 with the rest of the exiled Palestinian leadership after the signing of the interim peace agreement with Israel.

He has served as a negotiator, but came to be known for his role in security matters. Although Dahlan had a stormy relationship with Arafat, he never formally broke with the late leader.

Dahlan is viewed among Palestinians as the strongest man in Gaza, with thousands of guns at his command, and as a favorite of U.S. officials. Many Palestinians remain wary of Dahlan's past cooperation with Israel on security issues, saying he became too closely associated with the Jewish state even though he came under fire from Israeli forces after violence broke out in 2000.

"He is seen as a man who seems very close to America and Israel during a period when neither one is giving the Palestinians anything," said Masri, the commentator.

A senior U.S. State Department official described Dahlan as "a serious guy" who supports peace with Israel "on terms favorable to the Palestinians."

The Bush administration is seeking congressional approval for $86 million in what it describes as nonlethal aid to bolster security forces under the control of Abbas. Officials in Hamas consider the move part of an effort to undermine it.

Dahlan says his focus since Fatah's defeat has been to rebuild and rejuvenate the party, now led largely by men of advanced years, in anticipation of the next electoral battle.

"Wherever I can assist Fatah and can serve Fatah, I will do it," he said. "If Hamas gets upset, it's not my problem."

U.S. Troops To Protect Serbs In Kosovo (WT)

By John Phillips, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

BELGRADE, Serbia -- The United States has moved troops to northern Kosovo to protect the Serbian minority ahead of elections today in Serbia, where nationalists have pledged to prevent the province's ethnic-Albanian majority from obtaining independence.

Two U.S. military platoons, accompanied by one Austrian and one Georgian platoon were deployed in late December for a month to a NATO camp at Leposavic, close to the border with Serbia, Kosovo's peacekeepers' headquarters announced. The redeployment was part of NATO's plan for rapid intervention aimed at providing security for about 100,000 Serbs living in Kosovo.

A U.N. civil administration mission and about 16,000 NATO protection troops have been in Kosovo to curb ethnic conflicts since 1999, when an Allied bombing campaign expelled Serbian forces.

DOJ_NMG_0119720

The war ended a wave of brutal ethnic cleansing against the Kosovar civilian population by Serbian then-President Slobodan Milosevic's regime.

In the Kosovo capital of Pristina, leaders of ethnic Albanians, who make up 90 percent of the province's population of 1.8 million, insist on independence. Serbia Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica has said Kosovo will be part of Serbia and the historic cradle of Serbian culture forever.

After the election, Kosovo is expected to be offered limited independence from Belgrade.

The latest rotation of about 1,500 U.S. troops under Brig. Gen. Douglas Earhart, commander of the U.S. Army National Guard's 29th Infantry Division and of Kosovo Forces Multi-National Task Force (East) moved into position in Kosovo last month. Most are Guard troops from Virginia, Massachusetts, 20 other states and Puerto Rico.

The United Nations late last year delayed a recommendation by the U.N. special envoy for Kosovo, Martti Ahtisaari, on the future status of Kosovo so as not to prejudice the Serbian elections.

NATO said last week it is unlikely to reduce troop levels in the province until 2008. NATO has 16,500 soldiers from 35 countries deployed in Kosovo.

"We will maintain our mandate, our strength, our organization on 2007," Lt. Gen. Roland Kather, the German commander of NATO's Kosovo force, said at a press conference. "I think that there will be no change until early 2008, and then we'll have to look at how far we have come."

Kosovo Looms Over Serbian Vote (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, January 21, 2007

BELGRADE, SERBIA — Once the most powerful of the former Yugoslav republics and a kingdom that reached from the Adriatic to the Aegean, Serbia is about to lose the only vestige of its days of glory: Kosovo.

United Nations mediators say they will unveil their plan for the province, which is predominantly ethnic Albanian and Muslim, and has been governed as a U.N. protectorate since 1999, sometime after today's Serbian general elections.

Although the result of their deliberations appears to be a foregone conclusion and most outsiders have viewed Kosovo as a separate entity since a U.S.-led NATO air campaign forced the withdrawal of Serbian security forces, Serbs hardly see the same reality.

The imminent loss of the province has been a central issue in the parliamentary campaign. Serbian politicians, intent on proving their loyalty to the country's traditional identity, have pulled out the stops to convince the world that the province should remain within their nation's borders.

They have hired the high-powered Republican-affiliated lobbying firm of Barbour Griffith & Rogers in Washington. The Serbian Orthodox Church has allied itself with televangelist Pat Robertson, who shares its concern about the rise of Muslim influence in the West.

Serbian political leaders have been on the phone to the Russians, fellow Slavs who have veto power in the U.N. Security Council, which would have to approve any broad independence deal.

Symbol of righteousness

Why does the province exert such a hold on the Serbian imagination? Landlocked, poor and now populated mostly by ethnic Albanians hostile to Serbs, it nonetheless has become a symbol of Serbia's image of itself as a righteous nation, a beacon of the Orthodox Christian world.

"We were all raised on the Kosovo myth … and Serbs, even if they don't go there, see it as part of their country, part of our history," said Rade Stanic, editor of the newsweekly Evropa.

Every Serbian schoolchild studies the epic poetry that describes the 14th century battle of medieval Serbian princes against the Turks. Although the Turks won, Serbs believe they won in the eyes of heaven by martyring themselves on Kosovo Polje, the battlefield that gives the province its name.

Prince Lazar, the hero, is given a choice by a gray falcon on the eve of the battle: "Which kingdom is it that you long for most? / Will you choose a heavenly crown today? / Or will you choose an earthly crown?"

Lazar chooses heaven. "Earthly kingdoms are such passing things / A heavenly kingdom, raging in the dark, endures eternally," he says.

To this day, Kosovo is thought of as Serbia's Jerusalem. The seat of the Serbian Orthodox Church and the titular home of the patriarch, its spiritual leader, as well as some of its most beautiful and historic monasteries, are at Pec, deep in Kosovo.

However, Kosovo's population now is 90% ethnic Albanian. A majority of them are Muslims; most of the rest are Catholics.

Serb politicians' mantra

DOJ_NMG_0119721

The election campaign in Serbia has focused on many immediate issues such as unemployment and inflation, but talk of Kosovo's status has also been a mantra. On this issue, there is little difference in the positions of the leading parties, all of which support Kosovo remaining part of Serbia.

The likely outcome of the elections will be a split among the three leading parties: The Radical Party, led by Vojislav Seselj, who is being held in The Hague on war crimes charges, takes a nationalist stand and believes that Serbia must confront the West; the party of Vojislav Kostunica, the current prime minister, advocates a slow rapprochement with Europe and the West; and the party of President Boris Tadic is more Western-leaning.

Kostunica, a lawyer by training, has endeavored to make a strong case that under international law, no sovereign country has ever been forced to grant independence to part of its territory. Serbs argue that it is as if Florida wanted to be a separate country, and the world decided that the U.S. should be compelled to give it independence.

U.S. diplomats queried on the point said that lawyers had not looked at the precedents but that Kosovo's case was different because it had been a U.N. protectorate, and that the Serbian "ethnic cleansing" there in 1999 in effect ended Serbia's right to control the province.

But Kostunica's argument has resonated with Russian leaders, who fear that if Kosovo can be taken away from Serbia, they could lose areas of Russia that aspire to independence, such as Chechnya.

If Russia opposes independence at the Security Council, ethnic Albanian officials would have to declare independence and wait for countries to recognize Kosovo as a sovereign state, a far more unwieldy process.

Serbian political analysts believe that the West has failed to take into account the potential for a nationalist backlash if Kosovo separates. In that case, the Radical Party, with its more isolationist ideology, would gain significant support, they argue.

"It would be best if things stay as they are; Kosovo already has a sort of de facto independence. But political symbolism is very important, and the United States and the international community is wrong to push for a formal resolution of Kosovo's status," said Djordje Vukadinovic, a professor of political science at Belgrade University.

"The status quo leaves the illusion of sovereignty and allows Serbia not to lose face by having its territory shrink again," he said. "It's a mirage, but mirages are useful in politics and it would mean a reduction in radicalism, which Washington does not want and which would otherwise grow."

Waiting game

Diplomats said it was possible that the U.N. would delay an announcement of Kosovo's status until after Serbia forms a government, which could take a month or more.

In the meantime, Kosovo's Albanians have become increasingly frustrated with the slow movement on their province's status, and some experts warn that spring could bring a renewal of violence.

Vukadinovic and others point out that Serbs never refer to Kosovo's "final status," the terminology used by Kosovo's Albanians and by the West, but speak of its "future" status.

"Saying 'future' status suggests that there could be other futures after the next one, and it leaves open the possibility that the Serbs will control Kosovo again," said a political consultant in Belgrade, the capital of Serbia, who asked not to be named because of the subject's political sensitivity. He noted that it took more than four centuries after the Serbs' defeat by the Turks for them to regain control of Kosovo, but that eventually they succeeded.

"Serbs don't think in years," he said, "they think in centuries."

PM: U.S. Wants Base In Czech Republic (AP)

By Karel Janicek, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 21, 2007

The United States has asked the Czech Republic to host a radar base that would be part of a global missile defense system, the prime minister announced Saturday, drawing a warning from Russia of retaliatory actions.

U.S. officials contend the system could defend Europe against intercontinental missiles fired by states such as Iran and North Korea. But the Kremlin warned that the military balance in Europe could be at stake and said the development risked a new arms race.

Independent defense experts have said the ground-based missile defense system is still years from being able to protect against long-range missile attacks.

Washington declined comment on Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek's statement. But the U.S. has been negotiating with Poland and the Czech Republic, both former communist states now in NATO, as it explores setting up missile defense sites in Eastern Europe.

The U.S. has missile interceptor bases in Alaska and California. It activated a powerful X-band radar site in northern Japan as part of the system last September, but so far has no anti-missile weapons based outside U.S. territory.

DOJ_NMG_0119722

The U.S. request that the Czech Republic host only an X-band radar facility could indicate Washington is considering putting launchers for anti-missile missiles in Poland.

Czech authorities refused to comment on Poland's possible role. Topolanek said only that he would discuss the issue with his Polish counterpart, Jaroslaw Kaczynski.

Topolanek said his government would name a committee in the next week to consider the U.S. request and a decision could take several months. Czech opposition parties have spoken against the defense system, and the premier's governing coalition does not have enough parliament votes to pass measures on its own.

In Moscow, Andrei Kokoshin, the former Russian Security Council chief who now heads parliament's committee for ties with former Soviet bloc nations, warned that Czech approval of the plan would "not pass without consequences."

Russian lawmakers dealing with security issues "will recommend taking retaliatory measures" that would "help maintain strategic stability and ensure the national security of Russia and our friends and allies," Kokoshin was quoted as telling the Interfax news agency.

A State Department spokesman, Edgar Vasquez, told The Associated Press he could not confirm that the Czechs had been asked to host the radar site and Poles the missile interceptors. He only repeated that negotiations were under way.

"Depending on the result of the discussions, the U.S. will seek to field a limited number of ground-based missile defense silo launchers, with their associated interceptors, similar to those currently fielded at Fort Greely, Alaska, and to deploy an X-band radar for midcourse tracking and discrimination of ballistic missile threats out of the Middle East," he said.

Vasquez would not specify which countries in the Middle East are considered a threat, but U.S. officials and others worry about Iran's development of long-range missiles that can reach Europe.

The missile defense system is intended to begin tracking missiles early during their boost phase and then guide intercepter missiles that would destroy the threatening missiles in flight.

So far, the U.S. military has deployed only a small number of interceptor missiles — at least 11 at Fort Greely and two at Vandenberg Air Force Base on the central California coast.

Topolanek said that if the Czech Republic approves the U.S. request, some 200 American specialists would be deployed here and the base would become operational in 2011.

"We are convinced that a possible deployment of the radar station on our territory is in our interest," he said. "It will increase security of the Czech Republic and Europe."

___

Associated Press writers Maria Danilova in Moscow and John Heilprin in Washington contributed to this report.

Turkish Police Arrest Teenage Suspect In Editor's Killing (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

ISTANBUL, Jan. 20 — The Turkish police on Saturday arrested a 17-year-old suspect in the killing of a newspaper editor who championed Armenian rights, Turkish authorities said.

The editor, Hrant Dink, 52, a Turk of Armenian descent, was shot Friday afternoon outside the office of his newspaper, Agos. A gunman was recorded by a surveillance camera nearby, and the police appealed to the public for help in identifying him.

On Saturday night, Ogun Samast was captured in Samsun, a Black Sea port, after his father recognized his images from the surveillance video and notified the police in Trabzon, their hometown, said Muammer Guler, Istanbul's governor, at a news conference just before midnight.

"The suspect was captured in Samsun on a passenger bus destined to Trabzon, together with all the evidence, including his gun and the white beret" seen in the video, Mr. Guler said.

Mr. Samast, an unemployed secondary school graduate who arrived in Istanbul a week ago, admitted killing Mr. Dink, the Samsun police said.

The police are also looking into possible links between Mr. Samast and the killing of a Catholic priest, Andrea Santaro, last February. The assailant was a 16-year-old who, like the priest and Mr. Samast, was from Trabzon.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan praised the efforts of the security forces Saturday and expressed satisfaction that an arrest had been made before Mr. Dink's funeral on Tuesday. "We're going to continue investigations with the same determination," Mr. Erdogan told the reporters, assuring that the arrest was only the start.

Mr. Guler said at a news conference earlier Saturday that Mr. Samast had visited the Agos office on Friday. He apparently posed as a university student hoping to meet Mr. Dink, whose secretary told the young man he would need an appointment.

The secretary later saw him loitering outside the office before Mr. Dink was attacked, Mr. Guler said.

DOJ_NMG_0119723

Kazim Kolcuoglu, head of the Istanbul Bar Association, noting that Mr. Samast and the killer of Mr. Santaro were under 18, said that minors in Turkey are used in slayings because they face lower penalties than an adult convicted of the same crime.

As a 17-year-old, Mr. Samast will be interrogated by a public prosecutor instead of the police, and will be tried at a minors' court, which will lead to certain reductions on his possible jail term, Mr. Kolcuoglu said.

Mr. Dink's murder has shocked Turkey. Mr. Erdogan condemned the shooting as a direct attack on Turkey's stability, and analysts from diverse political backgrounds appeared to agree.

"If the trigger finger aimed at the air of stability and confidence in Turkey, it hit the bull's eye," wrote Mehmet Barlas, a columnist for the center-right newspaper Sabah.

Although analysts like Mr. Barlas saw the assassination as a politically motivated attack on Turkey's progress toward membership in the European Union, others blamed a controversial law under which Mr. Dink had been convicted of insulting the Turkish identity.

Mr. Dink, who angered many in Turkey by challenging the official Turkish version of the 1915 Armenian genocide, was given a six-month, suspended sentence. But in the eyes of many radical nationalists, it made him a target.

Meanwhile, people continued to flock to the Agos office in Istanbul. Chants of "We are all Armenians, we are all Hrants," filled the air.

"We're here because we lost one of us," said a 33-year-old woman. As a teacher, she declined to give her name because it is illegal in Turkey for public workers to make public comments. "I want to see the perpetrators be brought to justice and the plot behind this assassination clarified immediately," she said.

Agos, the only bilingual Armenian-Turkish newspaper in Turkey, was founded and run by Mr. Dink since 1996.

"We lost the voice that spoke for us, but Turkey lost as much as we did," said Nadya Ismezoglu, an Armenian woman standing outside the Agos office. "Our pain is indescribable."

Look Up! Is It A Threat? Or A Plea For A Ban? (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

THE nation's star warriors, frustrated that their plans to arm the heavens went nowhere for two decades despite more than $100 billion in blue-sky research, felt a shiver of hope last week with news that China had conducted its first successful test of an antisatellite weapon.

Having long warned of the Chinese threat, they now said their fears were vindicated and expressed optimism for their own projects, which range from new kinds of defensive satellites to flotillas of space weapons and orbital battle stations able to shatter all kinds of enemy arms.

China, a group of 26 "Star Wars" supporters warned in a recent report, has "begun to erode American space dominance" and will accelerate that slide with "both lasers and missiles capable of destroying satellites."

H. Baker Spring of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research group in Washington, said in an interview that the cost to the United States of new arms and defensive measures would most likely run to "billions or tens of billions of dollars a year, pretty much year in and year out," and added, "I don't think that's excessive."

But the prospect of a new arms race in space is also energizing an opposition, including arms control supporters and fiscal conservatives alarmed at the rising costs of the Iraq war. Treaties could short-circuit the costly game of measure-countermeasure on the high frontier before it expands any further, they say. Currently, no international treaty or domestic law forbids such developments.

An unfettered arms race could hurt the United States more than any other nation, arms control advocates argue. The United States owns or operates 443 of the 845 active satellites that now orbit the planet, or 53 percent. By contrast, China owns just 4 percent.

"We not only have the most satellites but they are more integrated into our economy and our way of making war than any other country," said Laura Grego, a staff scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, a private group in Cambridge, Mass., that takes liberal positions on arms issues and environmental issues. "We have the most to lose in an unrestrained arms race."

But that logic has not persuaded the Star Wars advocates, who say the United States needs to protect its huge investment in space satellites by being ahead of anyone else in shooting such devices out of the sky.

Diplomats from around the globe have gathered in Geneva for many years to hammer out a treaty on the "Prevention of an Arms Race in Outer Space," which would ban space weapons. Arms control supporters say China and Russia have backed the process, while the United States has dragged its feet.

DOJ_NMG_0119724

Last year, John Mohanco, a State Department official, told the diplomats in Geneva that as long as attacks on satellites remained a threat, "our government will continue to consider the possible role that space-related weapons may play in protecting our assets."

A Heritage Foundation analysis of such diplomacy says China is charging ahead to build space arms while "seeking to block the United States from developing its own anti-satellite weapons and space-based ballistic missile defense systems."

China's strategy, the analysis says, is clear: "Work on public opinion in the United States to make moral arguments against weapons in space, develop international coalitions to limit the way that the United States can use space, and develop China's own weapons systems and tactics to destroy American satellites and space-based weapons."

But Theresa Hitchens, a critic of the administration's space arms research who is director of the Center for Defense Information, a private group in Washington that tracks military programs, said that China's antisatellite test might be "a shot across the bow" meant to prod the Bush administration into serious negotiations. In the test, a Chinese missile pulverized an aging Chinese weather satellite more than 500 miles above Earth on Jan. 11.

Ms. Hitchens warned that an arms race in space could easily spin out of control, noting that India has been "rattling its sword" and some experts in that country are openly calling for antisatellite arms. A global competition that produced armadas of space weapons, she added, could raise the risk of accidental nuclear war if, for instance, a whirling piece of space junk knocked out a spy satellite.

"How do you know it's not a precursor to a nuclear attack?" she asked. "Do you have an itchy trigger finger? If you've got a lot of satellites out there, you probably do."

The Bush administration has conducted secret research that critics say could produce a powerful ground-based laser meant to shatter enemy satellites. The project, parts of which were made public through Air Force budget documents submitted to Congress last year, appears to be part of a wide-ranging administration effort to develop space weapons, both defensive and offensive.

John E. Pike, who is the director of GlobalSecurity.org, a group in Washington that conducts research on military and space topics, said that treaties and defensive measures were the smart, cheap way to counter antisatellite threats, and that the star warriors in the wake of the Chinese tests were playing a false card.

"They're trying to piggyback on a totally unrelated topic," he said. "This says nothing about space-based weapons, star wars or any of that."

But a report, "Missile Defense, the Space Relationship and the 21st Century," researched by a group of organizations that focus on national security issues and published late last year by the Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis, called the military development of the high frontier vital to the nation's protection from a wide variety of threats — including Chinese arms.

"Without the means to dissuade, deter and defeat the growing number of strategic adversaries now arrayed against it," the group warned, "the United States will be unable to maintain its status of global leadership."

Vatican Urges "Dialogue" With China To Rebuild Ties (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

ROME, Jan. 20 — The Vatican issued a measured statement on Saturday on its future relations with China, saying it wanted a "respectful and constructive dialogue" to rebuild diplomatic ties but still noting the "suffering" of Chinese Catholics.

The statement was issued after two days of high-level talks at the Vatican on rebuilding relations with China. The statement said Pope Benedict XVI intended to write a letter to Catholics in China, though it did not say when or hint at any message.

The pope and Chinese officials have expressed a desire to restore diplomatic ties broken in 1951 when the Communist government took over. But any concrete steps were frozen after the official Chinese church, which answers to the government, appointed several bishops last year without the Vatican's consent.

The pope issued statements protesting the appointment of the bishops, saying that China had violated a long-standing, if informal, agreement in which the Vatican was able to have a tacit role in the process.

But the statement on Saturday was even in its tone, avoiding harsh criticism of China as it spoke of "following the road of a respectful and constructive dialogue with the governing authority to overcome the misunderstandings of the past."

The reconciliatory tone seemed aimed at encouraging more talks with the government. Still, the statement strongly praised the bravery of Catholics in China who are loyal to Rome, rather than to the Chinese authorities. An "official church" of five million Catholics, presided over by the government, exists beside with an underground church of 10 million.

"It is noted, with deep recognition, the luminous testimony offered by bishops, priests and the faithful, who without ceding to compromises, have maintained their faith to Seat of St. Peter, at times even at the price of grave suffering," the statement read.

The pope did not take part in the meetings, though the statement said he was fully briefed.

DOJ_NMG_0119725

Benedict Seen As Isolated At Vatican (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, January 21, 2007

VATICAN CITY -- The forced resignation of Pope Benedict XVI's handpicked choice for archbishop of Warsaw, Stanislaw Wielgus, has exposed divisions within the Vatican, which insiders say have left the pontiff increasingly isolated.

"Benedict does not have a decisive temperament and must take into account his age," said the Italian Panorama newsmagazine. "The initiatives he has taken are meeting with much resistance."

Bishop Wielgus announced his resignation on Jan. 9, just two days after accepting the post, in the face of disclosures that he had been an agent for Poland's communist secret service for decades and twice attended its spy school.

Benedict had passed over six other candidates to select Bishop Wielgus for the post, actions that suggest he was at best poorly advised by his entourage, Vatican sources say.

The Vatican declined to comment for this article.

The controversy over Bishop Wielgus recalled the Muslim furor over a papal speech last year at the University of Regensburg in Germany. Afterward, Vatican watchers asked why the pope's aides had not spotted the potentially offensive remarks in the text and removed them in advance.

Marco Politi, the respected Vatican reporter for La Repubblica newspaper, said many officials in the Curia, the church's central government, resent the conservative pontiff and see him as "a man of the past."

As he prepares to celebrate his 80th birthday on April 16, Benedict evidently has fostered resentment by trying to sideline several Polish clerics appointed to senior Vatican posts by Polish-born John Paul II, who died in 2005.

Cardinal Edmund Szoka, a Polish-American, was replaced as governor of Vatican City, responsible for the day-to-day running of the tiny state in Rome.

Also planned is the transfer of Edward Nowak, the secretary for the Congregation of Saints, the body that rules on requests for sainthood, according to Panorama.

In another move, Benedict was expected to replace the archbishop of Moscow, Tadeusz Kondrusiewicz, also Polish, to improve the pope's chances of arranging a historic meeting with Russian Orthodox Patriarch Alexius II, Vatican sources say.

In recent months, the German pontiff has moved to reorganize his inner Cabinet around Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the extroverted Vatican secretary of state from the Salesian Order.

Cardinal Bertone, named in September, made headlines last month by suggesting that the Vatican could field a soccer team in Italy's first division.

Other key appointments include Dominique Mamberti as effective foreign minister of the Holy See and the elevation of Indian Cardinal Ivan Dias to head the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

But Benedict, who is more used to playing a low-key role as John Paul's personal theologian, evidently has had difficulty becoming a team leader.

"For months, Benedict appeared isolated, closed up in his study polishing his speeches, writing his book on Jesus of Nazareth to be published in April or playing the piano," said Ignazio Ingrao, who writes for Panorama.

"His only outings were dinners at the home of his former secretary, Monsignor Josef Clemens. He has paid dearly for not being a team player."

La Repubblica said the pope was furious when he was forced to accept Bishop Wielgus' resignation only hours before his formal installation.

Among those Benedict reportedly passed over for the Warsaw Archdiocese was Stanislaw Rylko, president of the Pontifical Council for the Laity and the reputed ghostwriter of the last books by John Paul II.

Bishop Wielgus at first denied cooperating with Poland's communist-era secret police, despite disclosures in a Polish weekly that his name was on a list of documents found at the National Remembrance Institute. He then acknowledged it, but said he "never informed on anyone and never tried to hurt anyone."

Hong Kong Tries To Stop Mainlander Baby Boom (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

HONG KONG, Jan. 19 — The plaintive cries of newborns never stop in the special care infant ward at Hong Kong's Queen Elizabeth Hospital — a ward designed for 30 babies but that has had as many as 60 at a time in recent weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0119726

The crowding is not a result of a baby boom among Hong Kong women, who have the world's lowest birthrate. Instead, the rows of bassinets are full because of an influx of mainland Chinese women who go to great lengths to make sure that their babies are born in Hong Kong.

The Hong Kong government wants to discourage them. Starting Feb. 1, pregnant women from the mainland will have to pay $5,000 for their hospital care before they are even allowed to enter Hong Kong, which has been a semiautonomous Chinese territory since Britain returned it in 1997.

Under rules the government announced Tuesday evening, immigration officers will be instructed to turn back any mainlander who appears to be at least seven months pregnant and has not paid.

The policy is expected to produce tearful showdowns at border points, and is already provoking an acrimonious debate in Hong Kong over what it means to be a citizen of this cosmopolitan metropolis on the South China Sea.

Just as many women from Mexico struggle to make sure their babies are born in the United States and are entitled to American citizenship, thousands of women from the mainland come to Hong Kong to give birth because it entitles their babies to permanent residency here. The benefits include a free education and subsidized health care as part of Hong Kong's British-inspired welfare policies. Hong Kong residents pay as little as $12.80 to give birth at a hospital because of extensive government subsidies.

The issue has divided the democracy movement here. Some, like Martin Lee, the founding chairman of the Democratic Party, agree with the city's Beijing-appointed leaders that Hong Kong needs more citizens because of its low birthrate — 0.9 per woman of child-bearing age, far below the replacement rate of 2.1. If the babies grow up and come live here, Hong Kong will have young people to care for an aging population. By having babies here, the mainland women "do what we cannot do ourselves," Mr. Lee said.

But others in the democracy movement, like Dr. Kwok Ka-ki, a surgeon who represents the medical profession in the legislature, say permanent residency should be restricted to babies born to Hong Kong parents.

"How could we stand the impact if huge numbers of mainland women come here to have babies?" he asked.

The number of babies born in Hong Kong to mainland mothers surged to 15,000 last year from several hundred a year in the late 1990s. Before the new restrictions were adopted, the number was poised to rise even more, as the Year of the Pig, which Chinese tradition holds to be an auspicious time for adding to a family, begins on Feb. 4 or Feb. 18, depending on which Chinese tradition is followed.

Every fifth Year of the Pig, falling once every 60 years, is considered especially auspicious and is known as a Year of the Golden Pig. The coming year is a Year of the Golden Pig, and is expected to produce an increase in births because marriage and birth statistics across China continue to show clear influences from such traditional beliefs, despite strong efforts by the Chinese Communist Party to dismiss them as superstitions.

Having a baby in Hong Kong, a city of 6.9 million people, can also help a family evade the mainland's one-child policy, although enforcement of that policy has been less stringent in recent years. Most of the women giving birth here return to the mainland initially to raise their babies because the mothers do not have the right to live here. The babies frequently have Hong Kong fathers, because Hong Kong companies now employ an estimated 11 million people on the mainland and send tens of thousands of Hong Kong citizens, mostly men, to manage them.

After marrying a Hong Kong man, a mainland woman can wait as long as seven years for the legal right to live here.

Beijing officials made it much easier in 2003 for mainlanders to visit Hong Kong, in a bid to help Hong Kong's struggling economy recover from SARS (severe acute respiratory syndrome) and thereby reduce pressures in Hong Kong for more democratic local rule.

Greater access has produced a tourism boom and throngs at shopping malls, but it has also made it much easier for pregnant women from the mainland to reach here.

Queen Elizabeth Hospital is on Kowloon Peninsula close to the train station where mainland Chinese arrive. It has been receiving a steady flow of women, many of whom show up in labor and with minimal medical records, making it hard to provide proper care.

"We have to be very cautious, very careful, because they've got complications as well" in some cases, said Dr. Cecilia Cheon, a consulting obstetrician at the hospital.

The special care infant ward handles babies born with jaundice and other problems not severe enough to require that they be placed in intensive care. The ward was so busy on Wednesday that the regular nurses were joined by retired pediatric nurses who had been called in to help give the babies bottles, burp them and change their diapers.

Dr. Terence Lao, an obstetrician at Queen Mary Hospital on Hong Kong Island, said the unexpected arrival of women in labor with few health records posed several risks. The women may be infected with influenza, asymptomatic tuberculosis or even H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS.

DOJ_NMG_0119727

"Even if we are suspecting something, we cannot get the tests back in time," Dr. Lao said.

It is also harder to treat a baby at birth for possible health problems if no ultrasound tests have been done in advance to determine the health of the fetus.

Dr. Anthony Hedley, a former chairman of the department of community medicine at Hong Kong University and a frequent critic of government health policies, said that discouraging pregnant women from the mainland from traveling to Hong Kong was a prudent health measure. "It's not good for mothers or infants to be shuttling long distances," he said.

But Dr. Kwok said that the new rules might prompt mainland women to enter the territory before their pregnancies show, and then to overstay their visas to give birth here.

Beijing officials have been quiet on Hong Kong's new restrictions. Mainland leaders seldom comment publicly on issues involving Hong Kong, to avoid being accused of interfering with the city's autonomy, but they wield enormous influence on a wide range of issues.

The new policy has attracted its share of jokes. A cartoon in the South China Morning Post on Wednesday showed a large-bellied woman walking past two immigration officers.

"You're letting her in?" one of the officers asked.

The other replied, "Apparently it's only heroin, which is a customs problem."

Thai Army Officers Held In Bombings (NYT)

By Seth Mydans, Thomas Fuller

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

SINGAPORE, Jan. 20 — Authorities in Thailand detained 15 people, including some military officers, in connection with a string of bombings that killed three people and disrupted celebrations on New Year's Eve, the police said Saturday.

Police sources said nearly 100 police officers and soldiers had searched 18 locations in and around the capital and detained eight military officers and seven civilians.

"I was informed by police that they have detained some suspects and it is very regrettable that some of the officers are involved," Prime Minister Surayud Chulanont told reporters in Bangkok. "It is the power of police to investigate and file charges if they have evidence."

The arrests were made under martial law imposed after a coup four months ago that ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra.

The police said no charges had been filed, and it remained unclear who was behind the bombings, which the government has said were done by supporters of Mr. Thaksin.

In separate televised comments on Saturday, Mr. Surayud said Mr. Thaksin, who was outside the country at the time of the coup and is now in Japan, could return to Thailand if he promised not to engage in politics.

"Mr. Thaksin should express clearly that he will stop all movements and express that his family wants to live in peace," Mr. Surayud said. "Then, we can talk and make arrangements."

The interim government, appointed by the military junta, has remained worried about a backlash from Mr. Thaksin's backers and has resisted the possibility of his return.

On Jan. 10 the government told television executives not to carry statements by Mr. Thaksin.

On Saturday the local cable provider, UBC, deleted from its broadcast a CNN interview done this week in Singapore.

In the interview, Mr. Thaksin denied involvement in the bomb blasts, saying: "I do everything for the good of the country and the people. I don't do something that's stupid."

He said that he did not want to return to Thailand if his presence would cause division or unrest and that he had no plans to become involved in politics.

"If I have to go to testify, I go," he said, referring to potential corruption cases against him. "But now the reason I'm not going back yet because I want unity in the country. I want the administration to do the reconciliation.

"I want everyone to unite, to move the country forward together," he said.

The ruling generals remain nervous, however.

Last week the coup leader, Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratglin, told fellow members of the junta not to talk on mobile telephones because they might be tapped.

"Our army has a problem now," he said. "When we make a call, the line goes to Singapore. When we talk secrets, they go straight to Singapore."

Early last year the family of Mr. Thaksin, a telecommunications tycoon, sold control of his company, Shin Corporation, to Temasek, the investment arm of the Singapore government.

The tax-free, $1.9 billion sale contributed to the building opposition against Mr. Thaksin that culminated in the coup.

DOJ_NMG_0119728

It also raised tensions between the governments that broke into the open last week when Mr. Thaksin visited Singapore and met with a government official.

Worried about Mr. Thaksin's possible return and about potential threats or violence by his supporters, the ruling generals now seem increasingly to be on the defensive.

"What General Sonthi said was they should be careful of confidential information they talk about on mobile phones," said a spokesman for the junta, Sunsern Kaewkumnerd. "They should switch to talk on fixed-line phones or in person."

Tanyapas Chuaycho, a company spokeswoman, denied that there had been any wiretapping.

"We are a business, we are not a spy," she told the Bloomberg news agency. "We can't do it, and the question is why would we?"

In recent months, Mr. Thaksin has been traveling through Asia, from Hong Kong to Bali to China to Singapore to Japan, meeting with supporters and keeping his name in the newspapers at home.

He is represented in Washington by Barbour Griffith & Rogers, a prominent lobbying firm, and he has hired the public relations firm Edelman of New York to help arrange meetings with the news media.

In a telephone interview from Hong Kong, Alan VanderMolen, vice president for Asia and the Pacific at Edelman, said, "We're working with him in his capacity as a private citizen and supporting some media outreach to support his efforts to return to Thailand."

Major Warlord Surrenders Arms To Somali Government (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 20 -- The last major warlord to withhold support from Somalia's government surrendered his weapons and militiamen on Saturday -- a boost for a fledgling leadership that still faces threats of guerrilla attacks from the Islamic movement that fled the capital.

Mohamed Dheere, one of the most feared rebel leaders in Somalia, gave the army chief 23 trucks mounted with heavy weapons and ordered 220 of his fighters to report for training at government camps. The handover took place during a ceremony in Dheere's stronghold of Jowhar, about 60 miles north of the capital of Mogadishu, said Abdirahman Dinari, the government spokesman.

But fears of an Islamic insurgency grew following an ambush Saturday morning on a convoy of Ethiopian troops in Mogadishu. The Ethiopians returned fire, killing a man and a woman on the side of the road, said Hawa Malin, a Mogadishu resident. Two other people died on the way to the hospital, officials said.

Late Friday, government troops also repelled an attack on the Somali president's palace.

A leader in Somalia's Islamic Courts movement said his group was responsible for the attacks, calling it part of a "new uprising."

"The only solution can be reconciliation and talks between the transitional federal government and the Islamic Courts," said Ahmed Qare, the movement's deputy chairman.

The U.N.-backed government -- with key military backing from Ethiopia -- drove the Islamic movement that had challenged it out of Mogadishu and much of the rest of southern Somalia weeks ago. But Islamic leaders have threatened a guerrilla war as long as Ethiopian troops remain in Somalia.

The United States and the European Union have called on the government to hold peace talks. So far, only clan leaders and warlords have been involved in the process, and religious leaders have been excluded.

The government has asked African peacekeepers to maintain security in the country, but they are unlikely to come if fighting continues. African Union officials approved an 8,000-peacekeeper mission Friday, but only Uganda has volunteered troops thus far.

Somalia has not had an effective central government since 1991 when warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on each other, reducing the Horn of Africa nation to anarchy and clan-based violence.

Expelled Bushmen Return Home (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, January 21, 2007

GABORONE, Botswana -- Several dozen Bushmen who had been expelled from the Central Kalahari Game Reserve have returned there under a landmark court ruling giving the traditional hunter-gatherers rights to land they and their ancestors occupied for thousands of years.

Ten families entered the vast, arid game reserve on Jan. 13, said Duma Gideon Boko, a lawyer who represented the Bushmen in their suit seeking to reverse years of government efforts to drive them out. The December judgment, which ended

DOJ_NMG_0119729

Botswana's longest-running legal battle, called the government's actions unconstitutional and ruled that the Bushmen were free to return to the game reserve.

The initial government response to the ruling suggested that only the 189 Bushmen named in the suit would be allowed to return, and park officials denied access to several others who sought to enter the park last month, according to Bushmen representatives and news reports.

But Jeff F. Ramsay, spokesman for President Festus Mogae, said Friday that all Bushmen, whether named in the suit or not, were free to enter the game reserve while the government developed a new permanent policy on the issue. Ramsay said 44 Bushmen, including several not named in the suit, entered this month.

"Those who wish to go into the park can do so," Ramsay said.

His comments were the latest sign that Botswana's government is seeking to defuse a standoff that has generated years of bad publicity for a country otherwise admired as a bastion of stability, prosperity and democracy on a troubled continent.

Disagreements remain over whether the Bushmen will be allowed to bring their livestock into the game reserve, which the government says is restricted to wild animals, and whether the government must provide services such as medical care to the people living there.

But Boko said government officials have been more conciliatory on most issues since the ruling.

"I think they are backing off," he said.

Bushmen, a catchall term for several related ethnic groups whose languages include distinctive clicks and pops, are descendants of hunter-gatherers who once roamed most of southern African before other groups relying on settled agriculture took control of the region. Bushmen long have been victims of discrimination and once were routinely shot as if they were vermin by farmers guarding their fields.

About 100,000 Bushmen remain in southern Africa, with the largest group in Botswana. Only a tiny minority is seeking to live traditionally in the Central Kalahari Game Reserve, an area larger than Switzerland.

Even before government relocation efforts, Bushmen living in the game reserve augmented their diets with livestock such as goats and some crops. Several Bushmen families had trucks for delivering water or making trips outside the reserve.

Major relocation campaigns happened in 1997, 2002 and 2005, and Bushmen alleged that police and park wardens destroyed their huts, dumped precious water supplies and used intimidation to drive the Bushmen to camps outside the reserve. The government also sharply restricted most forms of hunting, making it difficult for Bushmen to get crucial protein for their diets.

Bushmen advocacy groups have long said the government was motivated by a desire to control any diamonds -- the mainstay of the national economy -- that might be found in the park. The government, meanwhile, has said it was seeking to offer the Bushmen modern government services while also protecting the ecology of the game reserve.

On Thursday, Mogae visited with Bushmen at New Xade, a resettlement camp beyond the western border of the game reserve. New Xade has such amenities as schools, concrete homes and medical clinics, and Bushmen say it is impossible to maintain their ancient lifestyle there.

Mogae reportedly urged the Bushmen to embrace modernization, as most of the country has since independence from Britain in 1966.

Colombian Government Is Ensnared In A Paramilitary Scandal (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

BOGOTÁ, Colombia, Jan. 20 — The government of President Álvaro Uribe, the largest recipient of American aid outside the Middle East, has found itself ensnared in a widening scandal as revelations surface of a secret alliance between some of the president's most prominent political supporters and paramilitary death squads.

Testimony this week from Salvatore Mancuso, a former paramilitary commander who admitted to orchestrating the killing of more than 300 people, as well as a document made public on Friday implicating more than a dozen politicians in the pact with paramilitaries, have injected fresh detail into a slow-burning scandal that has caused Colombia's elite political class to shudder in recent weeks.

Senior members of Mr. Uribe's government and Mr. Uribe himself have said that anyone shown to have had illegal ties to the paramilitaries, which terrorized Colombian cities and the countryside in the nation's internal war, which has gone on for decades, and made fortunes in cocaine trafficking, should be prosecuted in courts of law.

The scandal has already touched Mr. Uribe's cabinet, with Senator Álvaro Araújo, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo Araújo, under investigation for collaborating with militias.

"If there's someone involved at the highest level, they will be fired," Francisco Santos, Colombia's vice president, said in an interview. "Scrutiny is fine for us," Mr. Santos said. "This country needs to know the whole truth."

Some of the details coming to light about the breadth of paramilitary activities are the result of a process set in motion by Mr. Uribe's own government, which has allowed paramilitary leaders to confess their crimes and pay reparations in exchange for reduced sentences of no more than eight years in prison.

Though some militia leaders have balked at the deal, much of Colombia has been gripped by the first such confession, that of Mr. Mancuso, a cattleman who helped found the paramilitary movement in the 1980s in an effort to combat leftist guerrillas.

Mr. Mancuso, 48, who studied English at the University of Pittsburgh, wept during the first days of his testimony at a special hearing in Medellín last month. This week, however, he simply read from a statement describing how he oversaw the assassinations of hundreds of people, with some operations made possible with information from military intelligence.

Mr. Mancuso also put Mr. Uribe in the spotlight by saying that militias pressured people to vote for the president in 2002, when Mr. Uribe was first elected. Mr. Uribe responded quickly by going on a national radio network to say he had never sent any emissaries to strike deals with the paramilitaries.

On the heels of Mr. Mancuso's testimony, a document rumored to exist in recent weeks was published in the daily newspaper El Tiempo on Friday. It describes a secret pact in 2001 between Mr. Mancuso, other paramilitary leaders and 11 congressmen, two governors and five mayors, in which those present agreed to work together to forge "a new social contract," largely in order to protect private property rights.

Senator Miguel de la Espriella, one of the signatories to the pact, helped bring the scandal to light last year by disclosing the ties between politicians and paramilitaries. Like other officials implicated in the pact, he said he was forced to sign, raising doubts as what type of legal punishment, if any, they might receive.

"At first we declined to sign, but when they put a man with a rifle next to the document we understood we had no choice," Mr. de la Espriella, a member of the Democratic Colombia party, said in an e-mail interview.

Asked why he was the only politician to come forward with details of the secret agreement, Mr. de la Espriella, alluding to widespread suspicions that legislators and government officials had for years worked in tandem with the paramilitaries, responded, "I told myself that a half-truth doesn't serve anybody, and we should all contribute to the enlightenment of the truth during so many years of war."

Those who signed the document included not only supporters of Mr. Uribe but also high-ranking officials in the political opposition, pointing to how a growing portion of the political establishment could be tarnished by the scandal.

Some 30,000 paramilitary members have been demobilized during Mr. Uribe's government in recent years. Colombia's military still receives more than $700 million a year in aid from the United States to combat drug trafficking and armed insurgencies.

Two guerrilla groups, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia and the National Liberation Army, still operate in the country. A truck carrying more than 600 pounds of explosives this week destroyed a dairy plant in southern Colombia owned by Nestlé, the Swiss food company, an act that the police attributed to the rebels.

Although the scandal has emerged as the most pressing political challenge to Mr. Uribe's presidency, his approval ratings remain high, at above 60 percent, after five years of rule and a re-election victory last year. Many Colombians credit Mr. Uribe for declining levels of murders and kidnappings and robust economic growth.

However, political analysts here say a steady stream of disclosures related to the paramilitary scandal could diminish Mr. Uribe's credibility, particularly if implicated officials are perceived to have close ties to the president. The scandal has already entangled a former ambassador to Chile and a former head of the intelligence service.

Equally pressing for Mr. Uribe's government could be the scandal's influence on discussions in the United States Congress of aid to Colombia and a trade agreement awaiting Congressional approval that has been signed by Mr. Uribe and President Bush. Political analysts say the Democratic-led Congress is expected to add greater scrutiny of human rights issues in Colombia.

Vast Pipelines In Amazon Face Challenges Over Protecting Rights And Rivers (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, January 21, 2007

URUCU, Brazil — In theory, the issue is a simple one: Brazil needs more sources of energy to keep its economy humming, and huge reserves of gas and oil are in the Amazon jungle. Problem solved.

Over the years, Petrobras, Brazil's state-controlled oil company, has, in fact, invested more than $7 billion in Amazon exploration and development, and in 1986 it made a major find here. But only now — after a seemingly endless sequence of geographic, logistical, environmental and political challenges were overcome — is the first in what is intended as a series of pipelines finally being constructed, this one to carry gas the 400 miles from here to Manaus, a port city of 1.5 million at the junction of the region's two biggest rivers that is emerging as an important industrial center.

DOJ_NMG_0119731

"Everything in the Amazon requires preparation that is big, long and complicated, especially a pioneering effort like this one," explained Joelson Falcão Mendes, the company's regional director here. "You've got a harsh climate that limits you to working only four months a year in some places. You're working in mud and crossing rivers that are not navigable, and there are 47 tropical diseases to worry about."

But oil pipeline leaks and the collapse of an offshore drilling platform in other parts of the country have damaged Petrobras's reputation, and there was initially strong resistance to the pipeline from local people, environmental and indigenous groups and archaeologists.

Some of them preferred that the gas be transported to Manaus by tankers from a terminal north of here, already connected by a pipeline, while others argued it would be cheaper and safer to buy the excess electricity generated by the Guri Dam in Venezuela.

Rather than steamrolling the opponents and skeptics, however, as often happens in Brazil, the company chose to woo them. The two million residents of Amazonas State have been promised economic benefits that have contributed to the project's $1.15 billion price, and scientists and environmentalists were consulted about how to minimize damage to the jungle that blankets the state, which is larger than Britain, France, Germany and Italy combined.

"They have really tried to minimize the impact, and the outcome is not as bad as we had feared," said Paulo Adário, director of Greenpeace's Amazon campaign. "Since they are taking oil and gas out of the heart of the Amazon, creating a model for what will be done in the future, that concern is quite understandable and necessary."

A second pipeline, which would head south to Porto Velho, a city more than 300 miles away, is a far more complicated matter. That project still faces challenges from advocates for the environment and rights of indigenous people because it will cross rivers and Indian lands, and is competing with two large dams for government money.

Farther west, near the Jurua River, Petrobras also has plans to develop oil and gas deposits first discovered in 1978. Company officials said they hoped to begin production in 2010, after construction of a pipeline that would run through dense and remote jungle to a refinery here.

Recent changes in energy policy in neighboring countries have added to the importance of the planned network of Amazon pipelines. For example, President Evo Morales of Bolivia, which has substantial reserves of gas that supply Brazil, has nationalized oil fields and refineries there, shutting out Petrobras, and has suggested quadrupling the price of some of the natural gas his country supplies to Brazil's industrialized south.

"All the research indicates that we are certain to find more gas in the Amazon," Eduardo Braga, the governor of Amazonas, said in an interview in Manaus, the state capital. "Brazil is going to need that gas over the next 30 years, so it is imperative that we develop those deposits. This is a strategic issue, not just for the Amazon but for all of Brazil."

The challenges Petrobras has had to confront also raise questions about the viability of the grand plan of Venezuela's president, Hugo Chávez, to build a 5,000-mile gas pipeline from Caracas to Buenos Aires, a cornerstone of his campaign to bring South America's economies together.

Initial estimates of the cost of that project, which would be longer than the Great Wall of China, run as high as $24 billion.

"The pipeline should be the locomotive of a new process of integration whose objective will be to defeat poverty and exclusion," Mr. Chávez said during a visit to São Paulo, Brazil's industrial capital, last year. "Unity is our only path."

[On Thursday, Brazil and Venezuela signed an agreement that calls for studies to begin this year on construction of a pipeline to cut through the northern Amazon to Manaus and then split in two directions.]

But environmental groups have complained that Mr. Chávez is trying to rush or even bypass the hearings and studies that are normally required and that his plan would worsen problems of deforestation and population migration.

"Just imagine the rivers and vast areas of forest they would have to cross," Mr. Adário said. "This is just something that just leaped out of Chávez's head. I don't know of a single technical expert or scientist who has done a serious analysis of the impacts that would have."

In the past, the construction of large energy projects in the Amazon, such as the mammoth Tucuruí dam, typically led to the migration of thousands of peasants seeking work and the creation of slum settlements in the jungle. When a project is finished, the workers will often remain, with no jobs, swelling social and environmental problems that are already intractable.

Small jungle settlements along the path of transmission lines have also complained that no provision is made for them to be supplied electricity. That alienates local residents and has even provoked some incidents of sabotage.

Urucu, however, is being built with a requirement that two-thirds of the labor force be hired from the population already in the region. That has created about 10,000 jobs, a significant advance in a region with fewer than 500,000 people, as well as job-training programs.

To prevent an influx of settlers, who typically carve out illegal homesteads along highways, almost no permanent roads have been built.

DOJ_NMG_0119732

Instead, the armed forces bring in supplies and equipment by helicopter or boat, and many construction workers live in floating dormitories that move from one site to the next as the work advances.

"There was a time when the only way to get in here was to come by helicopter and then rappel down," said Mauro Loureiro, the project's technical director. "It took hundreds of trips like that just to open a clearing to be able to do the initial soundings and then dig a test well."

In addition, the pipeline here will include spurs to seven smaller towns on its way to Manaus, adding $30 million and 78 miles to the project. As a result, diesel fuel will no longer have to be sent in by boat for local consumption, blackouts will diminish and businesses can be promised regular supplies of cheap, clean energy.

"Each municipality is using this to increase its economic potential," said Mr. Braga, the Amazonas governor. The projects, he said, include one to build a plant in Codajas to process açaí (pronounced ah-sigh-EE), an Amazon fruit whose purple pulp and juice Brazilians consume as a health and energy tonic, and another in, in Manacaparu, to expand the production of organic fibers there.

"The idea is not only to avoid repeating the errors committed in the past, but also to change the energy sources here in the north of the country," Mr. Braga said. "More than 90 percent of this state is forest, and I want to keep it that way."

DOJ_NMG_0119733

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 22, 2007 8:17 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, January 20, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070120.pdf; dojclips070120.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Administration Stays Course In Legal War (LAT) 3
Editorial: A Dubious Reversal (ERG) 5
Editorial: Ship Righted (CCT) 6
Editorial: Maintain Oversight Of Spying Program (DMR) 6
The Homeland Security Pageant (WP) 7

Homeland Response:

Man Who Reported False Threat Makes Plea Deal (LAT) 8
FBI Not Amused By Area Man's Terrorist Plot 'tip' (ONTDB) 9
Prosecutors Say Man Makes Plea Deal In Phony LA Terror Threat (MHCA) 9
Negroponte Calls Intelligence Restructuring A "Work In Progress" (WP) 10
U.S. Agency Tries To Fix No-Fly List Mistakes (WP) 10
Two Governors Appeal For Antiterror Aid (NYT) 12
Canadians Brace For Passport Rules (LAT) 12
Housing Aid Extended For '05 Storm Victims (WP) 13
Extension Granted To Hurricane Victims (NYT) 14

War News:

Top Dems Slam Bush On War Strategy (SFC) 14
Pelosi, White House Clash On Iraq (LAT) 15
Democrats Want Accounting On Iraq War Spending (WT) 16
Senators To Offer Centrist Proposal On Iraq (NYT) 17
Casey Urges Patience In Securing Baghdad (WP) 18
General Sees Summer Deadline For Troops (NYT) 19
Some "Surge" Troops May Return Soon (WSJ) 20
Iraq Aiding U.S. Surge, General Says (WT) 21
Casey: "Surge" Could Go Home By Summer (CHIT/AP) 22
Joseph Lieberman Unbowed (WSJ) 23
Key Aide To Sadr Arrested In Baghdad (WP) 26
Aide To Militant Shiite Cleric Held After U.S.-Iraqi Raid (NYT) 27
US Forces Seize Sadr Aide (FT) 27
Top Sadr Deputy Is Arrested (LAT) 28
Top Aide Of Muqtada Al-Sadr Arrested (AP) 30
Iran Complains About U.S. Detentions (AP) 31
Iran Reportedly Set For Talks With U.S. (AP) 32
Leading Senator Assails President Over Iran Stance (NYT) 33
Draft Law Keeps Central Control Over Oil In Iraq (NYT) 34
Temporary "Enjoyment Marriages" In Vogue Again With Some Iraqis (WP) 36
The Next Body Armor Design Gets A Show In Natick (BOS) 38
Missing In Antiwar Action (WP) 39

Corporate Scandals:

Feds Defend Siegelman Jurors, Question E-Mails Used By Defense (AP) 40
States Study Marketing Of Lilly Pill (NYT) 41
H.P. Chief Defends Timing Of Stock Sale (BLOOM) 42
Two Are Sentenced For Fraud Involving Trading Of Stocks (BLOOM) 42
Executives Get Bonuses As Firms Reprice Options (WSJ) 43

Criminal Law:

Ney Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison For Abramoff Deals (WP) 45
Ney Is Sentenced To 2½ Years In Abramoff Case (NYT) 46
Ney Will Serve 30 Months In Abramoff Hill Bribery (WT) 47
Ney Gets 30 Months In Corruption Case (LAT) 48
Ney Gets 30-Month Sentence (RC) 49
Latest Abramoff Casualty Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison (HILL) 49
Sizing Up The Libby CIA-Leak Trial (WSJ) 50
Fight Averted, For Now, Over U.S. Reporter's Notes In CIA Case (FINDLAW/AP) 51
The Libby Injustice (WSJ) 51
FBI Details Threat From Gangs In Military (CHIST) 53
Ex-FBI Agent Guilty Of Assault (PROJO) 53
Retired FBI Agent Convicted In Assault (CTPOST) 54
Former FBI Agent Wanted In Rhode Island Convicted Of Assault (AP) 54

Solid Data Scarce For Child Abductions (AP) 55

Civil Law:

High Court To Revisit Campaign Finance Law (WP) 55
Justices Revisit Campaign Finance Issue (NYT) 57
High Court To Review Campaign Finance Law (LAT) 58
High Court To Referee Campaign Finance Case (WT/AP) ... 59
High Court Takes "Issue Ad" Cases (CNN) 60
House Panel Opens Investigation Of GSA Chief's Deal With Friend (WP) 60
Legal Fight Resumes Over Guard's Back Pay (MR) 61
Plaintiffs' Team Takes Hit On Asbestos (WSJ) 62

Civil Rights:

San Francisco Police Are Criticized In Wake Of Fight Involving A Yale Singing Group (NYT) 63
Testimony To Be Heard On Shooting By The Police (NYT) .. 64
Editorial: A Tragedy Of Errors (WP) 64

Antitrust:

Plaintiffs In Microsoft Case Claim Firm Is Violating U.S. Antitrust Deal (AP) 65
Microsoft Eyed Apple In '03 (BLOOM) 66
Esmark To Buy West Virginia Tin-plate Plant (BLOOM) 66
Steelmaking Neighbors Eye Partial Merger (PPG) 67
Case Could Kill Mill (BRADV) 68
State Is Reviewing Deal For Hoover (COLDISP) 69
Caremark Shareholders Get Their Say (TENN) 70
Tribune Board Panel To Meet On Auction (WSJ) 70
Patent Trial Near, Bristol-Myers Counts On Resilience (NYT) 70
Suit By Record Companies Against XM Going To Trial (AP) 72

Environment:

Judge Orders Review Of Salamander Status (FINDLAW/AP) 73
Minerals Chief Defends Response To Lease Problem (BILLGAZ) 73

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Chief Likes New Facility (LAT) 74
NY Court: FBI May Have Coerced Filmmaker (FINDLAW/AP) 75
Pelosi Urges Halt To Prosecution Of Chronicle Writers Letter To Attorney General Also Calls For Federal Shield Law (SFC) 76
Top Lawmaker Demands Answers From Justice Department (NYS) 77
Physician Gets 2-year Prison Sentence (CINPOST) 78

Immigration:

Labor Groups, Business Seek Immigration Law Overhaul (WP) 78
Immigration Stagnation (WP) 79
Bush Comments On Agents Who Shot Suspected Drug Dealer (NYT) 80
Hunter Asks Congress To Pardon Border Agents (WT) 81

Tax:

W. Palm Commissioner Resigns (FLSUNSEN) 82
Exline Resigns Post Under Tax Cloud (PALMBEACHP) 83
Scandals Keep Growing (PALMBEACHP) 85
Justice Dept. Sues Local Tax Preparer (KZGAZETTE) 86
High Court Considers Tax Authority Case (AP) 86
IRS May Widen Probe Of Fees On Municipal Investment Contracts (BLOOM) 87
Railroads Seek Tax Aid (WSJ) 88

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Visit Democrats' Retreat (NYT) 89
Conservatives Slam Bush Policies (WT) 89
State Of The Union: The 3 Keys To Bush's Speech: Energy, Immigration And Iran (WSJ) 90
Salazar Sends Early Message To Bush (DENP) 91
Former VP Mondale Says Cheney Cooks Ludicrous Advice (AP) 91
Mondale: Cheney Not Serving Bush Well (UPI) 91
Senate Measure Puts Spotlight On Fund-Raising (NYT) 92
Senate Supports Transparency In Tariff Breaks (WP) 93
Senate Passes Ban On Lobbying By Some Spouses (WP) 94
New Rules Still Allow Congress Many Perks (WP) 95
Real Ethics Reform (WP) 97
Reform, Finally, In The Senate (NYT) 97
Senator's Condition Improves (NYT/AP) 98
"100-Hour" Agenda Is Completed (WP/AP) 98
House Votes To Reshape Page Board (WP/AP) 98
House Approves Reform Of Page Board (HILL) 99
House Votes To Expand Board Overseeing Teen Pages (LAT) 99
Measure Offers Norton More Voting Power (WP) 100
House Likely To Give Norton A Vote (WT) 101
In D.C., Perry Builds Bridges With Texas Dems (HC) 102
Stem Cell Policy Hampering Research, NIH Official Says (WP) 103
The Ballad Of Bushie And Flashy (NYT) 104
Sex And The Single-Minded (NYT) 105
The Biggest Man On Campus (NYT) 106
Archives Of Spin (NYT) 106

DOJ_NMG_0119736

Other News:

Shares Close Mixed As Earnings Reports Fail To Inspire (NYT/AP) 108
After The Dow's Record Run, Large Stocks May Be Tiring (WSJ) 109
Chilly Weather Sparks Crude-Oil Rally (WSJ) 110
Dollar Little Changed; Rate Cut Looks Unlikely (WSJ) 110
Trade Deficit Stubbornly Defies The Dollar's Slide (NYT) 111
Martinez Takes Over As Leader Of RNC (WP) 113
RNC Elects Martinez As Head (WT) 114
State Aims For Feb. 5 Primary To Boost Clout (LAT) 115
Conservative Core Seeks A Contender (LAT) 116
3 From The Bush Advertising Team Join McCain's '08 Advisers (NYT) 118
Richardson To Explore Presidential Bid (AP) 118
Sen. Dodd Not To Run For Re-Election In 2010, Uses PAC To Buy NH And IA Voter Files (CQPOL) 119
Can Voters Picture Good Mormons As Good Leaders? (DMN) 119
Pennsylvania Governor Pushes Health Plan (NYT) 121
Towns Tame Taxes By Keeping Children Out (WT/BLOOM) 122
Targeting Wal-Mart Again (LAT) 124
China Shows Assertiveness In Weapons Test (NYT) 124
U.S. Presses China On Anti-satellite Test (LAT) 126
China's Anti-satellite Missile Test Criticised (FT) 127
China Tries To Reassure The World On Space Missile "Aimed At Peace" (LONT) 127
Chinese Space Test Raises US Suspicions (FT) 128
China's Muscle Flex In Space (NYT) 130
China Sets Off A New Round Of Star Wars (FT) 130
N Korea Claims Progress In US Talks (FT) 131
N.Korea: Deal Reached In U.S. Nuke Talks (AP) 132
U.S. Says U.N. Agency Aided N. Korea (AP) 132
US Claims N Korea Syphoned Millions From UN Project (FT) 134
Embattled U.N. Agency Alters Aid To N. Korea (WT) 134
U.S. Suspicious Of Aid To North Korea (LAT) 135
U.N. To Audit Its Activities After Reports On North Korea Program (NYT) 136
U.N. To Examine Relief Agencies' Pay In N. Korea (WP) 137
A Product Of The U.N. System (NYT) 138
Israel Sends Promised $100 Million To Abbas (WP) 139
Israel Unfreezes $100M Before Summit (AP) 139
Israel Releases $100 Million Withheld From Palestinians (NYT) 140
Israel Releases Palestinian Funds (LAT) 141
Jimmy Carter's Jewish Problem (WP) 142
An Enigmatic Wild Card In Lebanon's High-Stakes Politics (NYT) 143
Outspoken Editor Is Slain In Turkey (WP/AP) 145
Journalist Killed By Gunman In Istanbul (FT) 146
Journalist Slain In Turkey (LAT) 147
Armenian Editor Is Slain In Turkey (NYT) 148
Insurgents Attack Palace In Somalia (NYT) 149
African Union Experts To Discuss Somalia (AP) 150
Blair Aide Arrested In Honors Probe (WP) 151
Senior Aide To Blair Is Arrested In Graft Inquiry (NYT) 152
Blair Aide Arrested In Honors-for-sale Probe (WT/AP) 152
Election Could Decide Serbia's Role In Europe (NYT) 153
Chavez Says Ailing Castro "Battling For His Life" (WT/AP) 154
Chavez: Castro "Fighting For His Life," Progressing Slowly (CNN) 154
Mercosur Set To Delay Expansion Plans (FT) 155
Congress And Foreign Policy Don't Mix (LAT) 155

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Stays Course In Legal War (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

Bush's team sees victory even in retreats in fights over anti-terror tactics.

WASHINGTON — In its legal war on terrorism, the Bush administration has proved itself undeterred by apparent setbacks.

Faced with challenges involving spying, military tribunals and other anti-terrorism efforts it devised after Sept. 11, 2001, the administration has revised its legal rationales and shifted tactics a bit. But to a remarkable degree, it has continued on the same course as before — to the frustration of its many critics.

DOJ_NMG_0119737

"From the start, the approach has been to take the most aggressive positions in defense of public safety and to retreat only for tactical reasons," said Washington attorney Brad Berenson, an associate White House counsel during President Bush's first term. "There's been no overall pullback."

The latest example of this strategy of winning-by-avoiding-defeat came this week, when Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales announced that a special Justice Department court had approved a new round of wiretaps.

Previously, the administration said the president had an "inherent authority" to order — without court approval — wiretapping of terrorism suspects' international calls, despite a 1978 law against such surveillance.

Bush's claim sparked outrage from civil libertarians and sharp criticism on Capitol Hill, particularly from Democrats. This month, those Democratic critics took control of the House and Senate. Even before that, a federal judge in Detroit had declared Bush's policy unconstitutional; that case is now before a U.S. appeals court.

Rather than continue toward a confrontation with the new Congress that could thwart the program, Gonzales told lawmakers Wednesday that Justice Department lawyers now would get court approval for their wiretaps. But while the change of course was seen by many as defeat for the administration, Bush and his attorney general treated it as a victory.

"Nothing has changed in the program, except the court has said, 'We've analyzed it and it's a legitimate way to protect the country,' " the president said in an interview with Tribune Broadcasting.

During a Senate hearing, Gonzales corrected critics who said the announcement meant the administration had "terminated" its efforts to intercept calls into and out of this country. He explained that the administration, to gain court approval, had changed its legal rationale for the wiretapping, rather than change the wiretapping program itself.

But he refused to explain this rationale, prompting anger and frustration among some Democrats.

"The attorney general was being purposely evasive," said Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank), who has worked on bills to overhaul and update the wiretapping law. "They are following the unilateralist approach again. They are saying, 'We are going to bring it within [the court system], and we are not going to tell you how we are going to do it.' "

This pattern has been repeated over the last five years. Bold administration claims of authority in the war on terrorism have been followed by slow and grudging retreats. And in nearly every instance, a setback or about-face has not seriously hampered the administration.

In June, the White House suffered what many saw as a historic rebuke when the Supreme Court struck down Bush's rules for military tribunals. The justices said the proposed system did not meet the standards of fairness set by the Geneva Convention or by the U.S. military code of justice.

Undaunted, the administration got the GOP-controlled Congress to write Bush's proposal into law. And, to prevent further interference from the courts, the new law said judges could not hear pleas from "aliens" held by the U.S. military. By the year's end, the Supreme Court defeat had been converted into a White House victory.

Four years ago, the Supreme Court took up a challenge to the administration's policy of holding men captured in Afghanistan or Pakistan. In a split decision, the court said the government could hold these men as war prisoners, but it must give them some sort of hearing.

Though civil libertarians called that ruling a defeat for the administration, White House lawyers saw a victory. As Berenson said, "The detention power is the most important issue."

Hundreds of men remain held at Guantanamo Bay, and they have been given only cursory hearings before a panel of military officers.

Regardless of how the administration views it, Georgetown University law professor David Cole said he believed this week's announcement on wiretapping showed the era of unchecked executive power had ended. With the Democrats in control of Congress and a challenge working its way through the courts, Bush could no longer claim he had an inherent power to ignore the wiretapping law, he said.

"If you look at it over five years, it's clear they have retreated on many fronts," said Cole, a longtime administration critic.

Still, in many cases it's hard to see how the retreats have substantively changed how the administration wages its war.

DOJ_NMG_0119738

In 2002, Bush's lawyers asserted that the president could order the arrest and imprisonment of Americans he deemed "enemy combatants." These people can be held in U.S. military prisons without charges and barred from even speaking to a lawyer, they said.

In a secret memo, Bush's lawyers also said the president could order the use of extreme pain to force captured men to talk, despite laws and treaties that bar the use of torture and cruelty.

Those policies, though widely condemned, still stand, revised but not repealed.

Last year, when the case of alleged enemy combatant Jose Padilla was due to come before the Supreme Court, the administration switched course and moved him from a military brig to a federal prison near Miami. He is being held there awaiting a trial.

A debate over torture and harsh treatment of prisoners had a similarly inconclusive end. Led by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War, Congress adopted a stricter ban on cruel and degrading treatment. Bush agreed to the bill but added a so-called signing statement last January saying he reserved the right to do what was necessary to "protect the American people from further terrorist attacks."

Bush's lawyers had argued that the CIA sometimes needed to use pressure and pain to force suspected terrorists to talk and to reveal plans for attacks.

david.savage@latimes.com

Editorial: A Dubious Reversal (ERG)

Eugene (OR) Register-Guard, January 20, 2007

Congress should take a skeptical approach to the Bush administration's announcement that it is reversing course and allowing a secret federal court to oversee a controversial electronic surveillance program.

Such a warning shouldn't be necessary. Since 9/11, Congress has repeatedly been thwarted, marginalized, and circumvented by an administration that is intent on calling every shot in the war on terror - and that is indifferent to the system of checks and balances required by the Constitution.

Five years ago, President Bush secretly ordered the National Security Agency to tap Americans' calls and e-mails without court approval. On Wednesday, the administration announced it will comply with the federal law that requires the agency to first obtain warrants before conducting such surveillance.

There was no explanation why the president has suddenly decided he can comply with a law that he once declared cumbersome, confining and a menace to national security. Bush simply said his Justice Department has sought warrants from the secret federal court established under the 1971 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and got them with the "necessary speed and agility."

In other words: "Nevermind. We've decided to obey the law, after all."

It's tempting to applaud this change as a prudent and long-overdue move by a president who saw the light after last November's election.

Tempting. But unwise.

One day after announcing the change, Bush clarified that the essential elements of the surveillance program remain intact. "Nothing has changed in the program except the court has said we've analyzed it and it's a legitimate way to protect the country," he said.

Meanwhile, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales disputed reports that the warrantless program run by the NSA had been "terminated." He also said the administration might block any effort by Congress to obtain copies of the court's decision to approve the administration's wiretaps.

As if all that weren't troubling enough, Gonzales also said the administration still believes the Constitution gives the president the authority to order eavesdropping without court approval during a time of war.

So, the administration now wants Congress and the American public to believe that it has changed a surveillance program that it says really hasn't changed at all. By the way, don't ask for details because none will be provided. And don't forget: The president still has the authority to snoop without warrants whenever he wants.

DOJ_NMG_0119739

Congress should demand details and answers about the surveillance program - and do whatever is necessary to obtain them. Meanwhile, the question of the wiretap program's constitutionality should continue to make its way through the courts. A federal judge ordered a halt to the program last year, declaring it unconstitutional. The government's appeal is scheduled for argument in two weeks, raising a question of whether the administration's announcement was timed to influence the outcome of the case.

The president should remember that he is a creature of the Constitution and is not immune from its authority. Whether the issue is surveillance, torture or the war in Iraq, Congress must make certain that truth is understood inside the White House.

Editorial: Ship Righted (CCT)

Cape Cod (MA) Times, January 20, 2007

With a simple change of mind, the Bush administration has made a bitter constitutional question moot.

Would they had done it five years ago, when the same tools, time-tested and true, were also available.

On Wednesday, the Justice Department announced it was letting the court established under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act â€“ FISA â€“ monitor the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the program that intercepted phone calls and e-mails between foreign callers and subjects in this country. At the time Attorney General Antonio Gonzalesâ€™ letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee was released Wednesday, the court had already approved one request for tapping a person believed to be linked to al-

Qaida or a similar group.

The spying program was started in 2001, in the aftermath of 9/11. When it was revealed, sticklers for constitutional protections cited the Fourth Amendment: â€œThe right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause. ...â€

Warrants â€“ the lack of them â€“ have been the issue all along. No one objected to the tactic of defending against terrorism by listening for suspicious calls. It was the fact such policing was being done without external review that violated separation of powers and alarmed conservatives as well as liberals. In our system, the judiciary is the third and co-equal branch of government. In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled the program unconstitutional and ordered it stopped. It continued under appeal.

The administrationâ€™s steadfast refusal to consider warrants had all the makings of a â€œslippery slopeâ€ away from the checks and balances of the Constitution. Warrants provide a paper trail. They are the working papers of accountability and transparency of government power.

The exasperating thing about President Bushâ€™s plan was that it served no useful purpose. The FISA court process has been established for 25 years as the mechanism for sensitive surveillance matters. FISA court proceedings â€“ usually only one judge â€“ are not held in public, so no secrets are compromised. As in the much-maligned Patriot Act, there are prudent exceptions for those cases when speed is of the essence â€“ the warrant can catch up with the wiretaps at a later date.

The White House, via spokesman Tony Snow, now embraces the FISA supervision: â€œThe Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court has put together its guidelines and its rules and those have met administration concerns about speed and agility when it comes to responding to bits of intelligence where we may to be able to save American lives.â€

The important thing is that the Constitution â€“ that American original â€“ once again acted as ballast to right the ship of state.

Editorial: Maintain Oversight Of Spying Program (DMR)

Des Moines Register, January 20, 2007

Congress must protect citizens' rights.

The Bush administration's back flip on the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretaps is a breathtaking example of chutzpah.

For more than a year, the administration fiercely defended the NSA practice of secretly tapping American citizens' phone calls without court approval or congressional oversight as vital to fighting terrorists. Critics were condemned for putting silly constitutional formalities above national security. Then, Wednesday, before U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was headed to Capitol Hill for a grilling by the Senate Judiciary Committee, he announced the government had decided to seek approval for wiretaps from a special federal court after all.

One day the party line is that the president, under the authority of an act of Congress following 9/11, has unfettered power to spy on American citizens without oversight by Congress or the federal courts. Then, it is, "Oh, never mind."

Actually, the first example of the administration's chutzpah was when it insisted the president could authorize secret searches of American citizens' private communications without a warrant from a court. As the founders understood based on their experience with the king's agents, no government should have the right to conduct random searches, without court supervision under the authority of Congress. That fundamental separation-of-powers framework, the foundation of our constitutional government, was arrogantly dismissed by the Bush administration in its wiretaps program.

Members of the Senate thought the timing - the day before Gonzales was scheduled to appear before a hostile committee - was curious. Gonzales, however, said the administration had been negotiating with the chief judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court for months on details of putting the "Terrorist Surveillance Program" under the jurisdiction of the court.

The administration's timing more likely was related to a Jan. 31 hearing before the 6th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in Cincinnati on the legality of the warrantless searches. That court is reviewing a decision by a federal district judge in Detroit who ruled in August that the spying is unconstitutional. This is reminiscent of the case of Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen held by the government for more than three years as a suspected terrorist, who was suddenly released to Florida authorities on minor charges just as his case was scheduled to be reviewed by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Could it be the administration saw that it was headed for a Supreme Court reversal and decided to pull the plug?

Either way, it is not entirely clear that with this change the administration is truly showing respect for the Fourth Amendment. The Justice Department has refused to release details of the order by the FISA court - even though the court's chief judge said in a letter to the Senate that she had no objections to releasing the order.

Congress should continue to press the administration for details of the FISA court process, and it should insist on having oversight of any NSA spying on American citizens.

The Homeland Security Pageant (WP)

By William Wan

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

First came duct tape. Then the airport liquid ban. And yesterday, officials unveiled the latest development in the country's war on terror: an American Idol-style contest for homeland security inventors.

Six finalists. One stage. Ten minutes each to win the hearts of the judges and walk away with $50,000. Or perhaps more important, a phone call from one of the defense contractors sitting in the audience.

Among the contestants:

-- A Russian scientist with his biological weapons detector. "All of Western civilization is at war," he proclaimed.

-- A team from Boston with a 300-degree steel furnace capable of killing biological threats.

-- A former Ohio police officer, frustrated with law enforcement's unwieldy Web networks and offering a way to fix them.

-- An inventor from Atlanta with an X-ray device able to detect everything from a vial of cocaine to nuclear waste.

-- And the hometown favorite, the Baltimore creators of a virtual reality helmet with 180-degree peripheral vision, for military and disaster-response training.

For two hours yesterday, they worked the stage at the Loews Annapolis Hotel, talking up their wares and how they might shield the nation from death and destruction.

The idea for the contest was hatched last year by the Chesapeake Innovation Center, a county-owned nonprofit organization charged with bringing homeland security firms to Anne Arundel. As the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks approached, the center's leaders wanted to contribute somehow -- to create something that would make the sobering, scary world a little bit safer. Business sponsors put up $25,000 toward the cash prize, and the state put up another $25,000.

DOJ_NMG_0119741

But the prize, many said, was almost incidental in an industry where contracts are measured by the million and sometimes billion. The high stakes had to do with the audience at yesterday's presentation: a rich assortment of security experts, military officials and defense contractors, all of them potential clients and investors.

The group received 50 applications for its Defend America Challenge, ranging from three-page outlines to 80-page volumes. Six were invited for the finals -- a 10-minute presentation and a two-minute Q&A.

And as they took to the stage yesterday, evil seemed to lurk everywhere: radioactive cargo containers, anthrax-tainted dollar bills, instant messages with secret instructions for mass destruction.

And yet, despite the doomsday scenarios, the event had all the makings of a beauty pageant -- the fierce rivalry and accompanying camaraderie, the big smiles and slick packaging. Presentation, after all, would count for a quarter of contestants' scores.

Before the contest started, Yuval Boger, the virtual reality guy from Baltimore, was talking up the hometown advantage. "Well, it's only human to check out the competition, to try to see how you'll measure up," he said. "And with all things being equal, maybe the judges will want to invest locally in Maryland rather than somewhere else."

The X-ray man nearby, however, played down any rivalry. "I don't view it so much as direct competition with them," said Dolan Falconer, who had come from Atlanta to talk about an X-ray machine that could detect everything from explosives to radioactive waste. "We're all winners already for being selected as one of the six finalists."

One company, BioDefense, had lugged along a working model of its massive mail decontamination machine. Sitting in the hotel lobby on the back of a Hummer was the 375-pound unit -- a large steel box that looked suspiciously like a washing machine.

"When you're dealing with something like white powder in the mail, you don't know what it is. Best thing is to just kill it all," said company rep Jonathan Morrone. He thrust a few letters into the machine's mouth and pointed out the microwave plates, the 300-degree convection heaters and the ultraviolet light.

Several in the audience hoped to test out the Baltimore virtual reality headgear. "We couldn't bring it," Boger said. The bulky equipment and computers would have taken too long to set up, and coping with long lines of people waiting to geek out on his company's system would have distracted from its main purpose -- winning.

But mindful of the presentation component, Boger had brought another, more low-tech prop -- two cardboard toilet paper tubes -- to illustrate how normal virtual reality helmets can offer only tunnel vision compared with his company's high-resolution models.

"You got to have the steak and the sizzle," he said with a sly smile. "You got to entertain them but tell them something substantial, too."

Alexander Asanov, the Russian scientist, took a more gloom-and-doom approach, speaking of a "war with the extremists," in a sober voice thick with accent. "It is a war of ideas. It cannot be won by bullets; so we need to empower our ideas."

Preferably his idea, he added, as he described technology that detects biomolecular threats like anthrax within minutes.

In the end the winner was announced with a sealed envelope and a dramatic pause: It was Falconer, the X-ray man from Atlanta, who ended up taking home the oversized check.

"I don't want to call it luck, because it took a lot of hard work, but on any given day, any of us could have won," he said graciously.

Another $50,000 prize, for the best invention by a Maryland company, went to Boger's virtual reality helmet.

There were smiles all around, business cards exchanged and all through the hotel ballroom a feeling that the nation was now perhaps a little safer.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Who Reported False Threat Makes Plea Deal (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119742

An Ontario man who falsely told the FBI that he overheard a co-worker talking about a terrorist attack that would "knock L.A. off the Earth" could face five years in prison.

In a plea deal with prosecutors announced Friday, Dennis Leon Kolupski, 54, admitted that three weeks before Sept. 11, 2005, he called FBI officials to say he had overheard a co-worker talking about the bombings in London and Madrid before stating that "9/11 is nothing like what will happen on 9/12."

Officials at the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles said Kolupski admitted that he never heard the person making threats and hoped his report would bring more scrutiny on the co-worker. Kolupski will appear in court Feb. 26.

FBI Not Amused By Area Man's Terrorist Plot 'tip' (ONTDB)

By Rod Leveque, Staff Writer

Ontario Daily Bulletin, January 20, 2007

If your shifty-eyed co-worker is hunched over his desk, conspiring on his cell phone to blow up the world, it's probably OK to call the FBI and report it.

If, on the other hand, you don't share a cubicle with the next Osama bin Laden, think twice before phoning in any bogus terrorist tips to the feds.

An Ontario man accused of falsely reporting that his colleague was plotting to wipe Los Angeles "off the earth" has discovered just how seriously federal investigators take such bogus reports.

Dennis Leon Kolupski, 54, faces up to five years in federal prison after agreeing to plead guilty to providing false information to the FBI about his co-worker's non-existent terrorist plot.

"The world changed on 9/11 and this type of conduct is not allowable," Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Lee said. "I would hope the average person wouldn't do something like this."

Prosecutors said Kolupski called the FBI in 2005 - three weeks before the anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks - and lodged the false reports.

He told investigators he overheard a co-worker on a cell phone make statements such as "9/11 is nothing like what will happen on 9/12," and that "this will knock L.A. off the earth."

Advertisement

The FBI dispatched agents to investigate the claim and interview the co-worker, Lee said. They ultimately concluded the report was groundless.

Kolupski later told investigators what he heard was in a language other than English, and that he intended his report to bring scrutiny to the co-worker, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Kolupski is set to make his first court appearance Feb. 26. If he follows through on his promise to plead guilty to the felony charge, he could avoid prison and be placed on probation.

His attorney, Rosa Mosley, declined to comment Friday.

Lee said the government has no tolerance for bogus terrorist reports because they drain the resources of the agencies that are forced to investigate them.

However, the prosecutor said he hopes Kolupski's case doesn't discourage anybody from reporting honest tips.

"If you have a legitimate bit of information, by all means, that should be passed on," he said. "But if you are just wholesale providing false info, that is an unnecessary use of government resources and that's a criminal act. It's my hope this case illustrates this is not the right choice to make."

Staff writer Rod Leveque can be reached by e-mail at r_leveque@dailybulletin.com, or by phone at (909) 483-9325.

Prosecutors Say Man Makes Plea Deal In Phony LA Terror Threat (MHCA)

Monterey (CA) Herald, January 20, 2007

LOS ANGELES - An Ontario man who claimed he overhead plans for a Sept. 11-style terrorist attack will plead guilty to providing false information to the FBI, authorities said Friday.

Dennis Leon Kolupski, 54, could be sentenced to five years in federal prison under a plea agreement filed Friday, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

He was scheduled to appear in court on Feb. 26 but he may enter his plea at a later date, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Y. Lee.

Kolupski called the FBI three weeks before the Sept. 11 anniversary in 2005 and claimed he overheard a cell phone conversation in which a co-worker threatened to knock Los Angeles "off the earth."

Kolupski said he overheard the man say: "9/11 is nothing like what will happen on 9/12."

However, Kolupski later acknowledged that he did not hear any threats to Los Angeles and that the conversation wasn't in English, prosecutors said.

Lee said Kolupski had been under stress for "personal reasons."

"In a moment of stress he called the FBI and relayed this information regarding this non-existing threat," Lee said.

It was a criminal act nonetheless, he said.

"Making these types of false reports is a tremendous drain on law enforcement," he said.

Negroponte Calls Intelligence Restructuring A "Work In Progress" (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The "complex and demanding" process of restructuring the U.S. intelligence community is still "a work in progress" after 22 months of effort, John D. Negroponte said yesterday in a farewell address wrapping up his tenure as the first director of national intelligence.

Negroponte, who is leaving to become deputy secretary of state, spoke in the lobby of the modernistic Defense Intelligence Analysis Center at Bolling Air Force Base before 400 senior intelligence community officials and a portion of the 1,700 employees that make up the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

He said one success was the way various organizations worked together during the 2006 Lebanon-Israel crisis to determine which agency was best positioned to gather certain types of intelligence and share it with others, reducing duplication of effort. That same "lift and shift" of intelligence is continuing in the ongoing Darfur crisis and with regard to Somalia, he said.

Another innovation he cited: the support an intelligence community science and technology team is giving to the group run by retired U.S. Army Gen. Montgomery C. Meigs that is coming up with new solutions to defeat the improvised explosive devices (IEDs) that are the most deadly killers of American troops in Iraq.

Additional integration of analysts and collectors is among the challenges still facing the community, particularly when it comes to so-called hard targets such as North Korea and Iran, he said.

CIA Director Michael V. Hayden, who was the first principal deputy national intelligence director before taking over the agency, praised the job Negroponte has done and said the former ambassador is returning to "his first calling" as a diplomat.

Hayden also used his time to praise how the restructuring has helped him focus solely on CIA problems without worrying about dividing his time with concerns about the rest of the community, as previous CIA directors had done when they had broader responsibilities. In a change from his prepared text, and in the spirit of collegiality, Haydon dropped a description of the CIA serving "in a leading role" in the intelligence community and just said the agency was serving "in our role" in the community.

U.S. Agency Tries To Fix No-Fly List Mistakes (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima, Alec Klein

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Every time Kiernan O'Dwyer arrived at the airport after traveling overseas in recent years, he was flagged as a potential terrorist. But his uniform was a dead giveaway to his true identity: He is a veteran pilot for American Airlines.

U.S. customs agents have stopped him about 80 times since 2003, apparently because his name and birth date nearly match those of an Irish Republican Army leader, one of at least 300,000 names on the U.S. government's watch lists. O'Dwyer falls under an unenviable category of false positives, people who are wrongly detained because some of their personal information matches that of a terrorist or other suspect.

The number of misidentifications is unknown, according to government auditors, but it has caused headaches for a cross-section of travelers, including nuns, infants and members of Congress. The U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency, under the jurisdiction of the Homeland Security Department, said it was trying to remedy the problem with a system to prevent unwarranted detentions on international flights.

DOJ_NMG_0119744

An agency official said in an interview that the system, launched in February 2006, has eliminated about 17,500 detentions involving people entering the country at airports, seaports and at land borders. It is part of what the government says is an effort to prevent terrorism while not inconveniencing travelers or violating their privacy and civil liberties, though it is not yet applied to domestic flights.

The challenge is complicated by the vast and growing databases of electronically stored personal information that draw on different agencies' records, which must be continually updated to be accurate. Federal agencies and airlines are using computer-driven algorithms to compare travelers' names against watch lists.

Under the new system, which overrides Customs and Border Protection's main database, people continue to be stopped if their name appears on a watch list. But if the follow-up screening clears them, customs agents make note of that so the next time they travel, those people should not be detained.

"It is certainly not in our interests to continually stop people when we have a system in place that can stop that," said John P. Wagner, the agency's director of passenger automation programs. "It's a waste of their time. A waste of our time."

The agency has another terrorist screening tool, the "automated targeting system" for passengers, that can potentially do the same thing, said Brian C. Goebel, former senior policy adviser to the U.S. Customs and Border Protection commissioner. "ATS is designed really to identify the red flags associated with potential risks -- terrorist indicators," he said. But it should also identify passengers who do not merit follow-up screening, Goebel said.

O'Dwyer, 51, of Pittsboro, N.C., is not convinced that the problem has been fixed. "I've been told that everything is fine before," he said. Even after Customs and Border Protection introduced the system to prevent misidentifications, O'Dwyer said he was detained about 30 times.

All his problems began in 2003, after O'Dwyer returned from a trip to Europe. Reaching the customs desk at John F. Kennedy International Airport, he was stunned when officials pulled him aside for further screening. He showed them his passport. He had no criminal record. Ninety minutes later, he was cleared.

But he kept getting detained -- so often that customs agents took to greeting him by his first name.

"They'd look at their screen and know I'd been screened and say, 'Oh boy, you've been through here a bunch,' " he recalled.

O'Dwyer even carried a letter from the Customs and Border Protection Office of Field Operations saying, "(Y)ou are not, nor have you ever been, on record as a criminal suspect."

But, he said, customs officers told him the letter could have been forged. He said he offered to submit to fingerprints, just as foreign flight crews do, but to no avail.

O'Dwyer become so frustrated that he gave up flying internationally in May, a move that he said cost him $10,000 a year in salary and expenses. He said he is still stopped when he reaches the domestic gate, and a supervisor must help him get cleared.

Christopher White, a spokesman for the Transportation Security Administration, which handles domestic passengers, declined to comment on O'Dwyer's case, saying that the agency does not publicly verify names on its watch lists. About 15,000 people per week apply for redress, saying they have been mistakenly placed on the TSA's rolls. About 33,000 have applied to be removed from those lists as of April, the most recent date available. Soon, TSA's no-fly list will be pared of names erroneously included, officials said.

The FBI also declined to discuss specific cases. FBI spokesman Paul Bresson noted that the agencies are "refining" their watch lists, "removing names when they're cleared."

Wagner, the customs official, said that though the system for eliminating false positives applies only to international flights, eventually it will extend to domestic travelers. And the Homeland Security Department, which houses both Customs and Border Protection and the TSA, will soon begin a Traveler Redress Inquiry Program for people who believe they have been wrongfully subjected to additional screening or denied permission to board flights to or from the United States.

O'Dwyer, for one, still does not know why he was detained, gleaning only through "offhand" comments from customs agents that his name nearly matched that of an IRA operative. One IRA leader with whom he could be confused is Ciaran O'Dwyer, according to World-Check, a British firm that maintains a global database of terrorists, high-risk individuals and political figures. The IRA leader, born about 1955, was convicted in June 2005 and sentenced to five years and nine months.

DOJ_NMG_0119745

O'Dwyer, the pilot, who also was born in 1955, has not lost all hope. In the spring, he intends to test the customs screening system when he goes on holiday to Italy.

Two Governors Appeal For Antiterror Aid (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

HOBOKEN, N.J., Jan 19 — Warning that it would be a "grave mistake" to further reduce antiterrorism financing to the nation's busiest urban center, Govs. Eliot Spitzer of New York and Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey pressed the Bush administration on Friday for a substantial increase in federal money to improve security for the region's highways and mass transit lines.

Appearing at a news conference in Hoboken Terminal that tens of thousands of commuters to Manhattan pass through each day, Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Corzine released a letter to the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff, saying that their efforts to deter another terror attack had been set back by substantial cuts in financing for counterterrorism announced in June.

Since the June announcement, the federal government has changed the guidelines used to determine aid, combining parts of New York and New Jersey, and officials in both states have said they worry that new classification system could foreshadow additional cuts.

Mr. Chertoff said this month that the new classification system would not necessarily mean that the region would receive less money because it would be distributed based on risk.

"To say, for example, the risk for New York is at this level and the risk if you cross the Hudson River is at a much lower level doesn't make a lot of sense," Mr. Chertoff said.

But Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Corzine, both Democrats, said they wanted to speak out now, while the financing levels are being determined in Washington.

"There could be a temptation through combining the risk analysis, to reduce the overall level of funding awards," the letter says. "That would be a grave mistake and would only serve to undermine the public's confidence."

Federal antiterrorism aid to New York City dropped to $127 million from $204 million in the 2006 fiscal year.

New Jersey fared slightly better: aid to its six densely populated northern counties climbed to $34.3 million, up from $19.4 million. For the rest of the state, there was a sharp cut in grants, to $17.7 million, down from $36.3 million last year.

The news conference was the first joint public appearance of the two governors since Mr. Spitzer took office. While Mr. Corzine has had several border disputes with Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, and previous New York and New Jersey governors have periodically jousted over Port Authority spending and sports franchises, Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Corzine say they have a cordial working relationship.

Neither Mr. Corzine nor Mr. Spitzer would cite a specific dollar amount they sought from Washington, but said that five years after the 9/11 attacks, the region's infrastructure remained vulnerable.

"I feel kind of like a college student calling home and saying, 'Just send money,' " Mr. Spitzer said.

Canadians Brace For Passport Rules (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

Starting Tuesday, air passengers into the U.S. will need the document.

TORONTO — Canadians are scrambling to get passports before new U.S. rules go into effect Tuesday requiring all air travelers coming into the United States from Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean to carry one. Tourism officials here worry that the restrictions will deter Americans from coming north.

The rules, designed to keep closer track of the millions of people who cross U.S. borders, were recommended by the Sept. 11 commission and mandated by Congress in 2004. They were supposed to take effect Jan. 1, but U.S. officials postponed their implementation until Jan. 23 to avoid disrupting holiday travel.

DOJ_NMG_0119746

Travelers coming into the U.S. by land or sea will not need a passport until January 2008 and can still enter using a birth certificate, driver's license or border crossing card that shows citizenship. But beginning Tuesday, airline passengers coming into the U.S. will have to produce a passport. Exceptions to the rules are those traveling between Canada and the U.S. for work who were issued special cards, merchant mariners with Coast Guard documents and permanent residents with "green cards."

Officials expect some glitches at first. "People will still be showing up with sorry stories and no passports, I guarantee you," said a Canadian customs official at the Toronto airport.

In December, there was a 31% increase in passport applications compared with the previous year, said Francine Charbonneau, a spokeswoman for Passport Canada. The department has added an extra shift at print centers to get passports out quickly.

So far this year, 96% of travelers from Canada have used passports, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials say. The majority were traveling on business.

"Anything that gets me through customs faster I'll do," said Brett Nelson, a Canadian engineering and sales manager who travels twice a month to the U.S. He has been using his passport for about a year, since a border official said the U.S. preferred it. But Nelson said he doesn't agree with the restriction.

"It's remnant paranoia from 9/11," he said. "They're still afraid of people hijacking an airplane. But you can still drive across the border with a truck bomb as long as you have a driver's license."

Canadian tourism officials worry that the new rules will give Americans another reason to go somewhere else. The country's $50-billion tourism industry has seen visits by U.S. travelers drop 28% over the last five years, especially as the Canadian dollar has grown stronger.

The staggered implementation of the rules — for air travel this year, for land and sea next year — is also causing uncertainty.

"It's the confusion over the requirements that is creating the biggest problem," said Randy Williams, president and CEO of the Tourism Industry Assn. of Canada.

Only 40% of Americans have passports, according to the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency.

maggie.farley@latimes.com

Farley, The Times' United Nations Bureau chief, was recently on assignment in Canada.

Housing Aid Extended For '05 Storm Victims (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The U.S. government will extend housing aid through August for hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents still displaced by hurricanes Katrina and Rita, officials said yesterday, acknowledging that wide swaths of New Orleans and parts of coastal Mississippi remain uninhabitable nearly 17 months after the 2005 storms.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said it would continue for six more months to pay for 130,000 households' trailers, mobile homes and apartments, aid that under federal law would have expired at the end of next month.

Officials in Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas and advocacy groups had urged FEMA for a decision since December, saying the historic housing crisis triggered by the devastating storms had not subsided. A delay or denial would have crippled rebuilding efforts and disrupted hundreds of thousands of lives, they said, as families living in trailers near their original homes would have had to move away and others in apartments would have been turned out by landlords seeking to rent to non-subsidized tenants.

The new Democratic Congress also stepped up pressure, frustrated at the Bush administration's improvised policies and the slow pace of recovery in New Orleans.

"This is very welcome news for the thousands of Louisianans still struggling with the everyday challenges of recovery and rebuilding," said Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.), who announced the decision after speaking with FEMA Director R. David Paulison. A formal announcement is set for early next week.

DOJ_NMG_0119747

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) and Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R) expressed gratitude but warned that the shortage of permanent housing will continue past August.

"Even though the number of Mississippians relying on this program is reduced each month as housing is rebuilt, it is clear thousands of our citizens will be without permanent housing six months from now," said Barbour, who sought a one-year extension.

Blanco called the recovery effort "beyond the scope of federal rules."

Housing advocates in Washington said they hope FEMA will notify recipients speedily and plan for longer-term housing. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, added, "I will await official word from FEMA before determining if its provisions are adequate."

The order covers about 100,000 households in Louisiana and 30,000 households in Mississippi. A breakdown of housing type or costs was not available, FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said.

In Houston, about 100,000 evacuees, mostly from New Orleans, live in privately owned apartments paid for by FEMA, a spokesman for Mayor Bill White said.

FEMA will pay for the extension through earlier appropriations to its disaster recovery fund, and no new spending by Congress is needed, McIntyre said.

Extension Granted To Hurricane Victims (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

The federal government will allow the 110,000 families still living in trailers because of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita to stay through August, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency said. The housing program had been scheduled to expire at the end of February, and some community groups had been expecting FEMA to start issuing eviction notices as early as next week. The six-month extension, announced by Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, also applies to displaced families living in apartments paid for by FEMA.

WAR NEWS:

Top Dems Slam Bush On War Strategy (SFC)

By Edward Epstein

San Francisco Chronicle, January 20, 2007

Washington -- The two top Democratic leaders of the new Congress blasted President Bush on his decision to send more troops to Iraq and warned him not to take military action against Iran without their approval, but they offered their bipartisan cooperation on domestic issues.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada also indicated Friday in their annual "pre-buttal" to Bush's State of the Union speech that they want Congress to take strong action on global warming, an issue that until recently the Bush administration has downplayed.

The Democratic leaders' comments on Iraq, however, left little doubt that the debate over the war will overshadow everything else this year on Capitol Hill.

That impression was reinforced by a sharp exchange of words between the White House and Pelosi.

Pelosi, appearing on ABC's "Good Morning America," reiterated her tough stand against Bush's handling of the war.

The president "has to answer for his war. He has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder," the speaker said.

Pelosi also said that keeping troops in Iraq in the midst of sectarian fighting "is not an obligation of the American people in perpetuity." The president has said he will send 21,500 more troops to Iraq, while many congressional Democrats have called for troop withdrawals.

DOJ_NMG_0119748

Pelosi indicated she thought Bush was rushing some of the extra troops to Iraq quickly to pre-empt possible congressional resolutions opposing such new deployments.

"The president knows that because the troops are in harm's way that we won't cut off the resources. That's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way," Pelosi said.

Those comments set off Dana Perino, deputy White House press secretary. She called Pelosi's comments "poisonous," especially for implying that Bush was using troops for political purposes.

"Speaker Pelosi was arguing in essence that the president is putting young men and women in harm's way for tactical political reasons. And she's questioning his motivations rather than questioning his policies," Perino told reporters.

"The one thing you can say about President Bush is that he's not moving forward with this new plan because he thinks it is popular. He is doing it because he thinks it is right," she added.

Opinion polls show fewer than 3 in 10 Americans support the president's announced policy to increase troop levels in Iraq.

In her appearance with Reid at the National Press Club, Pelosi again voiced support for the bipartisan, nonbinding Senate resolution introduced this week that opposes Bush's troop increase. The House will take up the resolution if it gets through the Senate.

Reid said "the president's new plan can be summed up in four words: more of the same. Like our military generals, the American people and a growing bipartisan chorus in Congress, I believe escalation is a serious mistake."

The Senate majority leader also warned Bush about recent speculation that the administration is considering military action against Iran because of its meddling in Iraq and because of its nuclear program.

"I'd like to be clear: The president does not have the authority to launch military action in Iran without first seeking congressional authorization," Reid said.

At the White House, Perino repeated the president's position that no military operations are contemplated against Iran. "There seems to be fanning of flames where there's no fire," she said of Reid's comments.

The atmosphere over cooperation on some domestic issues is brighter going into Tuesday's scheduled State of the Union, given comments by the two Democrats and the White House.

Pelosi listed numerous issues -- such as developing alternative energy sources, immigration policy, reauthorizing the "No Child Left Behind" education program, funding basic scientific research, curbing the federal budget deficit, reforming health care policy, helping the Gulf Coast recover from Hurricane Katrina, and combatting global warming -- on which Democrats will push legislation that she hopes can be bipartisan and get Bush's support.

She said Americans "want to see their leaders focus on American priorities, and they want us to work together for the American people."

Bush plans to address many of those topics in his annual speech -- the first the president will deliver before a Congress controlled by the opposition Democrats.

"Americans should expect a discussion of the commonsense principles that will provide the basis for President Bush's approach to governing with a new Congress," Perino said.

She said the speech will differ from the usual State of the Union in that it won't be the usual "laundry list of proposals."

Since the November election, Bush has shown a more conciliatory approach toward the Democratic Congress. The president replaced Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and United Nations Ambassador John Bolton. This week, he reversed his policy on warrantless wiretaps and has indicated he would sign a minimum wage increase, which was one of Pelosi's top priorities.

But if Bush hopes to move the focus off Iraq, he probably will be disappointed. His speech will be followed immediately on network television by the Democratic response, which this year will be delivered by new Democratic Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, who defeated Republican Sen. George Allen in November in part on an anti-war platform. Webb campaigned carrying the combat boots worn by his son, a Marine serving in Iraq.

Pelosi, White House Clash On Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

DOJ_NMG_0119749

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — With barely a nod to the bipartisan civility they have saluted since the last election, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and a White House spokeswoman traded sharp language Friday over President Bush's Iraq policy.

"He has to answer for his war. He has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder," said Pelosi, a Democrat from San Francisco.

"The president knows that because the troops are in harm's way, that we won't cut off the resources. That's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way," she said in an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America."

Bush has said he will put additional forces in Iraq, an effort largely aimed at stopping the sectarian violence in Baghdad. Some Democrats have said Congress should block Bush's plan by eliminating funding for the troop increase.

Deputy White House Press Secretary Dana Perino called Pelosi's comments "poisonous" and decried a "sound-bite war" emanating from Capitol Hill.

"Speaker Pelosi was arguing, in essence, that the president is putting young men and women in harm's way for tactical, political reasons. And she's questioning his motivations rather than questioning his policies," Perino said at the daily White House news briefing.

The exchange highlighted the difficulty the new Democratic leadership and the White House have faced in adhering to promises to stop the partisan quarreling that was common before the November election.

Pelosi, when asked whether she was saying that Bush deliberately timed the dispatch of troops so that Congress could not intervene, said, "I would certainly hope he didn't manipulate the timing of sending the troops in."

Democrats Want Accounting On Iraq War Spending (WT)

By Charles Hurt, Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

Conservative House Democrats yesterday announced a plan to investigate the awarding of contracts in Iraq, as the White House and Speaker Nancy Pelosi sparred over President Bush's new war strategy.

"It's long past time that we kept track of the money and the weapons that we're giving to the Iraqis and replace the waste, fraud and abuse with proper oversight, responsibility and accountability," said Rep. Patrick J. Murphy, Pennsylvania Democrat.

Mr. Murphy and the coalition Blue Dog Democrats drafted a resolution demanding a detailed accounting of where the $400 billion spent so far on the Iraq war has gone and where future expenditures will go.

It also would require that future requests by the administration for war money go through Congress' normal budget channels as opposed to the special "emergency supplemental" requests that bypass regular congressional appropriations.

"We're spending $8.4 billion a month in Iraq, $12 million an hour in Iraq," Rep. Mike Thompson, California Democrat, said. "We owe it not only to the American taxpayers ... but most important, we owe it to the men and women who are putting their life on the line in Iraq to make sure that money's being spent appropriately."

A number of government oversights -- including an Iraq special inspector general, the Pentagon inspector general and the military service's own financial watchdogs -- are stationed in-country. They have produced scores of reports and audits on U.S. spending.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Pelosi said Mr. Bush is swiftly enacting his plan to move 21,000 troops into Iraq solely to prevent opponents on Capitol Hill from blocking the new war strategy.

"The president knows that because the troops are in harm's way, that we won't cut off the resources; that's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way," she said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

The White House yesterday labeled Mrs. Pelosi's comments "poisonous."

Despite a pledge from the president and top Democrats to seek middle ground and try to work together, majority leaders are now engaging in "a sound-bite war," Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino said.

"[I]t's certainly not in keeping with the bipartisan spirit and civility that the Democrats pledged and that we looked forward to, and the president will again call for that in his State of the Union address," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0119750

Mrs. Pelosi also said that Mr. Bush "has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder," but she refused to say how Democrats would improve the situation.

"[I]t's the president's war, and he's the one without a plan," she said.

The White House struck back fiercely on that comment, too.

"To say that this is only the president's war makes a mockery of the notion that when we are a nation at war, we should all hang together," Mrs. Perino said.

"The president really hopes that in this time of an epic struggle against radical Islam, that when we are facing an enemy that is determined to hurt us in Iraq and to hurt us here at home, that we can come together and be constructive."

Mr. Murphy, an Iraq war veteran elected to Congress in November, said 20 cents of every dollar that's been spent in Iraq cannot be accounted for. And much of the money that has been accounted for was wasted, he said.

Taxpayers, for instance, spent $75 million to build a police academy in Baghdad.

"You know what they're going to do with it?" Mr. Murphy asked. "They're tearing it down."

Senators To Offer Centrist Proposal On Iraq (NYT)

By Carl Hulse, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Senator John W. Warner of Virginia is drafting a proposal on Iraq policy with two Senate centrists in an effort to provide an outlet for lawmakers uneasy with President Bush's troop buildup but unwilling to back a toughly worded resolution opposing the new strategy.

Aides said Friday that Mr. Warner, a Republican who just stepped down as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, was working with Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, to draw up a Senate resolution they will unveil Monday as an alternative to another bipartisan plan that flatly opposes troop increases in Iraq.

That measure, by Senators Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Carl Levin of Michigan, both Democrats, is scheduled to be considered by the Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday. But the emergence of a proposal embraced by Mr. Warner, an influential Republican leader on military issues, and other proposals circulating in the Senate showed there was no consensus yet.

The flurry of Iraq resolutions, coming from the political left, right and middle, raised the prospect of muddling the outcome of what Democratic leaders had hoped to keep a simple yes-or-no vote on Mr. Bush's plan. Now, some lawmakers could vote for multiple resolutions if they reached the Senate floor.

"Either you support an escalation of American forces in Iraq or you don't," Mr. Hagel said Friday. "You can try and dance on the pinhead of technicality and wordsmithing all you want, but it's going to come down to that."

The undercurrent of the 2008 presidential campaign is also pulling on the debate over the symbolic vote on Iraq. Democrats had originally planned to offer a single nonbinding resolution, but now at least four senators with presidential aspirations have put their own names on Iraq proposals.

In short order this week, Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut introduced a plan to cap troop levels in Iraq; Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York offered a similar proposal; and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois said he would present legislation as early as next week. All stopped shy of a proposal offered by Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, that would block spending for any troop increase, an idea favored by the staunchest opponents of the war.

With votes in the House and Senate still to come, Democratic Congressional leaders jousted with the White House on Friday over Mr. Bush's plan to add more than 20,000 troops to try to quiet violence in Iraq.

In an interview on "Good Morning America" on ABC, Speaker Nancy Pelosi accused Mr. Bush of moving quickly to put the added troops in place because he knew Congress would not limit spending for military personnel in the field.

"Democrats will never cut off funding for our troops when they are in harm's way," Ms. Pelosi said, "but we will hold the president accountable. He has to answer for his war. He has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder."

DOJ_NMG_0119751

That drew a sharp response from the White House, where Dana Perino, a spokeswoman, called Ms. Pelosi's comments "poisonous" and said Democrats had embarked on "sound bite war."

"Speaker Pelosi was arguing in essence that the president is putting young men and women in harm's way for tactical political reasons," Ms. Perino said. "And she's questioning his motivations, rather than questioning his policies."

Senators Warner, Collins and Nelson, in a move reminiscent of the "Gang of 14" meetings that helped avert a showdown over judicial filibusters in 2005, began meeting this week after they saw the language of the initial bipartisan resolution. Some lawmakers who had expressed resistance to the troop increase said the wording was too partisan and went far beyond the issue of Iraq to discuss the entire Middle East, North Korea and Afghanistan.

Aides to the three senators declined to elaborate on the proposal, but all three have expressed skepticism about the administration's plan to send more troops to Iraq. In an interview last week, Mr. Warner said Congress should move deliberately, but swiftly.

"Each of us are pained by the casualties that we are taking," Mr. Warner said. "We cannot dither around on it."

Mr. Biden and his allies have some advantages in making their resolution the center of the debate because he is now chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and can move his resolution quickly through that panel. And the Democratic leadership, which determines the floor schedule, has indicated its support for the concept as well.

"The president's plan will receive an up-or-down vote in both chambers of Congress," Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, said Friday in a speech at the National Press Club. "With that vote, our hope, really our prayer, is that the president will finally listen: listen to the generals, listen to the Iraq Study Group, listen to the American people and listen to a bipartisan Congress."

Casey Urges Patience In Securing Baghdad (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops in Iraq probably will last at least until the end of the summer, a top general said yesterday, urging patience with President Bush's strategy while a bipartisan group of U.S. legislators continued pressing for a new plan.

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. military officer in Iraq, said that the primary focus of the additional U.S. forces will be to secure a violent Baghdad and that their mission, if it goes as planned, could last well into 2007. He and other defense officials have said in recent days that the new battle for Baghdad could take some time but that it will be apparent in coming months whether progress is being made.

"That's not going to happen overnight either, and you're going to see some progress gradually over the next 60 to 90 days," Casey told reporters in southern Iraq yesterday, according to a transcript. "But I think it's probably going to be the summer, late summer, before we get to the point where the people in Baghdad feel safe in their neighborhoods. . . . The first troops are just arriving now, so we've got to wait and see the effect they have on the situation here before we even start thinking about when we might send them home."

The president's plan has drawn ire from Democrats who see the November elections as a mandate to change course in Iraq. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) lashed out in an ABC News interview aired yesterday, saying that Bush has "dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this" and calling the buildup "a stark blunder."

"The president knows that because the troops are in harm's way, that we won't cut off the resources," Pelosi told ABC. "That's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way, but we will hold the president accountable. He has to answer for his war."

White House officials bristled at Pelosi's comments, with spokeswoman Dana Perino calling them "poisonous."

"I think questioning the president's motivations and suggesting that he, for some political reason, is rushing troops into harm's way, is not appropriate, it is not correct, and it is unfortunate because we do have troops in harm's way," Perino said at a news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0119752

In a speech at the National Press Club yesterday with Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), Pelosi said the war has produced tens of thousands of casualties, cost hundreds of billions of dollars and damaged the country's standing internationally. She said it also has strained the U.S. military and thus threatens national security.

"Escalating our military involvement in Iraq will not reverse these negative effects. It will only add to them," Pelosi said.

Reid echoed Pelosi's position: "Unfortunately, the president's new plan can be summed up in four words: 'more of the same.' Like our military generals, the American people, and a growing bipartisan chorus in Congress, I believe escalation is a serious mistake . . . Interjecting more U.S. military forces will not end this civil war."

Yesterday, a bipartisan group from the Senate Armed Services Committee announced it will give a resolution on Monday "addressing the president's plan to augment U.S. military forces in Iraq."

The chief sponsor of the resolution, Sen. John W. Warner (Va.), the ranking Republican of the committee, has expressed reservations about putting U.S. forces in the middle of a sectarian fight in Baghdad and has openly questioned sending more troops. Warner's public comments suggest his plan will fall somewhere between the president's strategy and the Democrats' position.

Casey explained his request for more troops yesterday, indicating that he saw three reasons for a more robust presence: the deteriorating situation in Baghdad; the commitments from the Iraqi government that will allow free U.S. troop movement throughout the city; and the fact that Iraqi forces have not been reliable enough "where we could count on them to do the right thing without additional coalition support."

The increased demand for U.S. troops in Iraq is likely to lead to an early, involuntary call-up late this year or early next year of about four Army National Guard combat brigades with 3,500 to 4,000 troops each, Pentagon officials said.

The Army had planned to be able to supply 18 or 19 combat brigades for Iraq and other overseas duty continually, but the requirement is now for 23, placing a heavy burden on the active-duty Army, said Lt. Gen. Stephen M. Speakes, Army deputy chief of staff, in a Pentagon briefing yesterday. The mobilization of guard brigades will allow active-duty combat units to spend more time at home.

To further ease the strain, the Army and Marine Corps are starting a push to expand their ranks by 12,000 additional troops each year for the next five years, leading senior Pentagon officials to appeal for greater public support for military service. The increase will require a combination of retaining troops and recruiting.

General Sees Summer Deadline For Troops (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

TALLIL AIR BASE, Iraq, Jan. 19 — Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, said Friday that the additional troops being sent to Iraq under President Bush's new plan to stabilize the country could begin to be withdrawn by late summer if security conditions improve.

"I believe the projections are late summer," General Casey said, adding, "I think it's probably going to be the summer — late summer — before you get to the point where people in Baghdad feel safe in their neighborhoods."

The American buildup, which is expected to reach slightly more than 20,000 troops, is just beginning, and all the units may not be in place for several months, but General Casey said there could be signs of improvement in Baghdad in 60 to 90 days. He also said that the Iraqi Prime Minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, appeared to be carrying through on his side of the plan, which requires the Iraqi government to commit more troops and not to interfere with military operations aimed at cracking down on the Shiite militias that have been blamed for much of the sectarian violence in Baghdad.

"So far, so good," General Casey said. "We are seeing them come through on those commitments."

The three Iraqi brigades that Mr. Maliki promised have not yet arrived in Baghdad. But General Casey said that American and Iraqi units have arrested a number of insurgent and death squad members, including five or six death squad leaders in the last three or four weeks. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates, who is making his second trip to Iraq in less than a month, came to southern Iraq on Friday for talks with British commanders and General Casey.

DOJ_NMG_0119753

Britain has about 7,000 troops in southern Iraq, and officials in London told Mr. Gates earlier this week that they were making plans to withdraw most of them sometime this year.

"As we see the need for less troops, the surplus will go home," said Maj. Chris Ormond-King, a British military spokesman in Basra, where Mr. Gates held the talks with British commanders.

Major Ormond-King said that Britain maintains three bases inside Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, but that plans were moving forward to turn over the city to full Iraqi control, a step that he added was "probably achievable" by this spring.

He said that British commanders had no plans to disarm Shiite militia groups, including the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, that have been vying for power in the city, as long as they do not attack British forces. A critical part of the new American strategy for stabilizing Iraq is to persuade Mr. Maliki to disarm Shiite militias as well as Sunni insurgents. In the past, Mr. Maliki has been reluctant to crack down on the Mahdi Army, whose leader, Moktada al-Sadr, has been a pivotal member of his political coalition.

Mr. Gates said this week that Britain was making troop reductions at the same time Washington was building up forces in Iraq because conditions in southern Iraq are different than those in Baghdad and other parts of Iraq, where the United States has most of its troops.

Mr. Gates had lunch in Basra with General Casey and Maj. Gen. Jonathan Shaw, the recently arrived British commander. Later, Mr. Gates and General Casey traveled to this air base in southern Iraq to meet with Australian and Romanian commanders and to receive briefings on reconstruction efforts in the south.

Since taking office, Mr. Gates has pushed to ensure that the new American strategy to send additional troops also includes a renewed focus on reconstruction efforts.

Some "Surge" Troops May Return Soon (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

TALIL AIR BASE, Iraq -- Gen. George Casey, who is overseeing the addition of 21,500 troops to Iraq, said the U.S. may consider bringing some of those new forces home as soon as late summer.

"I think it will be late summer before people in Baghdad feel safer in their neighborhoods," he said.

Gen. Casey met with Defense Secretary Robert Gates here Friday. After Mr. Gates went out of his way not to reveal his opinion on troop levels in his first weeks in office, he seems to have decided that the best way to stem surging violence in Iraq and Afghanistan for now is more U.S. troops.

His statements over the past week -- as he toured the Persian Gulf, Afghanistan and Iraq -- suggest that even if the additional troops don't produce quick results in the coming months, he will exercise patience. Less clear is whether lawmakers on Capitol Hill and voters -- who in polls are skeptical about the force increases -- will be willing to tolerate the Bush administration's troop "surge" without quick results. If the strategy doesn't work, it isn't clear whether the administration has a backup plan.

Mr. Gates, making his second trip to Iraq in less than a month, spent most of his time here learning about southern Iraq, where British troops make up the preponderance of forces. His visit seemed to highlight the differences between the U.S. and British in Iraq.

In contrast to Baghdad -- where the U.S. is adding troops -- British commanders have told U.S. officials they will likely withdraw a number of their 7,000 troops in southern Iraq this year.

In Baghdad, U.S. officials talk frequently about the need to disarm Shiite militias such as the Badr Corps and the Mahdi Army. And American commanders are pushing U.S. troops deeper into Baghdad's densely populated conflict zones.

In the British zone, the opposite is happening. British troops already seem to be taking a less aggressive approach in the south, particularly when it comes to disarming the Shiite militias. They also seem to be pulling back from conflict zones and turning more of the fight over to Iraqi troops.

DOJ_NMG_0119754

A British spokesman says United Kingdom forces are going out of their way not to confront the Shiite militias. "We are not taking them on," said Maj. Chris Ormand-King, adding that "the militias are not necessarily a bad thing." He said the militias eventually will be folded into the police and army, but he cautioned the process "could take decades."

The British position is in large part a product of the fact that they have essentially committed to turning over control to the Iraqis in the next few months and to sending troops home or redirecting them to Afghanistan, where violence has also risen. With fewer troops, the British say there are limits to what they can do.

Earlier this fall, for example, the British pulled out of a base in al Amarah, where U.K. forces took frequent fire, and moved to a less populated area along the Iraq-Iran border. Within days of turning the base over to Iraqi army forces, it was looted by impoverished locals. The base hasn't been rebuilt.

"This is an extremely poor area," and what the Iraqis decide to do with the base will "be something the Iraqis will have to sort out for themselves," Maj. Ormand-King said.

Gen. Casey, speaking to reporters, said it is too early to know whether the new U.S.-Iraqi strategy to secure Baghdad will work. Much will depend on whether the Iraqi government provides adequate forces for the fight and doesn't prevent troops from entering key neighborhoods or arresting political figures involved in illegal activity.

Iraq Aiding U.S. Surge, General Says (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

TALIL AIR BASE, Iraq -- Iraq's government has begun to deliver on commitments it made to complement President Bush's plan for a new infusion of U.S. troops, but the results may not be fully felt in Baghdad for more than six months, the top U.S. commander said yesterday.

"So far, so good," said Gen. George Casey, talking to reporters after briefing visiting Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates on the security situation in Iraq.

Gen. Casey said the results on the ground will not be felt overnight for Baghdad, but that some of the extra U.S. troops could begin to pull out by midyear.

"It may be summer, late summer before the people of Baghdad can feel safe in their neighborhoods," he said.

Gen. Casey's optimism comes amid a crescendo of opposition in Congress to Bush's decision to send more troops, with both the House and Senate planning votes condemn and possibly block the move.

Meanwhile, the U.S. troop surge has started.

In addition, the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has begun to transfer three promised Iraqi brigades to Baghdad amid continued insurgent attacks and vicious sectarian killings by warring Shi'ite and Sunni militants.

In Baghdad yesterday, U.S. and Iraqi forces arrested one of militant cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's top aides, according to the Associated Press.

An adviser to Mr. al-Maliki, however, denied the government knew in advance about the raid, in which Sheik Abdul-Hadi al-Darraji was captured.

"There was no coordination with the Iraqi political leadership and this arrest was not part of the new security plan," the adviser, Sadiq al-Rikabi, told Al-Arabiya television, the AP reported. "Coordination with the Iraqi political leadership is needed before conducting such operations that draw popular reactions."

His comments reflected the differences between the United States and Iraq's Shi'ite-dominated government on U.S. demands for a crackdown on Shi'ite militias that have been blamed for much of the recent violence.

Mr. Gates, on his second visit to Iraq in less than a month, did not meet with Mr. al-Maliki or any other Iraqi officials on this trip, which focused on the relatively peaceful southern part of the country.

As he did in stops at three Arab capitals before coming to Iraq, Mr. Gates said there is a growing regional consensus that Iraq must not be allowed to descend into chaos.

"Given what is at stake here, failure is not an option," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0119755

Gen. Casey, who is wrapping up a 21/2-year stint as the top U.S. commander in Iraq. defended the pace of U.S. aid and support for Iraq's army.

Mr. al-Maliki had complained earlier this week that his security forces had not been given the equipment and training they needed to provide security for the country.

Gen. Casey said the job of equipping Iraq's 325,000-member security force was on track to be completed by the end of this year.

Mr. Gates began the day with a briefing at the British-run base near Basra, the country's second-largest city located in the southern Shi'ite heartland.

Britain, with about 6,200 troops in southern Iraq, mostly in Basra, plans to keep forces Iraq through 2007 and perhaps into 2008, a top British general said yesterday.

"Do I see ourselves being here throughout 2007? Yes," Army Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, deputy commander of Multi-National Force-Iraq, told reporters at the Pentagon in a teleconference from Iraq.

"Do I see that commitment being carried on to 2008? That will be for discussion among this sovereign government, my government, our part in the coalition and the like," Gen. Lamb said.

Levels of violence in the south have been lower than in Baghdad and central Iraq, although six British soldiers were wounded in a mortar attack in Basra shortly before Mr. Gates and Gen. Casey arrived.

Iraqi troops are in charge of security in two of the four provinces in the British-run sector.

Shi'ite militias remain a potent force in the south, but British military spokesman Maj. Chris Ormond-King said British commanders hope to co-opt the militias into the new national security forces.

"The militias are not a problem for us," he said. "What is a problem are some of the rogue elements in those militias."

A total of 129 British soldiers have been killed since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Mr. Gates' visit to Talil Air Base, located nearly 200 miles southeast of Baghdad and once used by forces of Saddam Hussein, was the final stop in a weeklong tour that included London, Brussels, Afghanistan, Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Bahrain.

With a close-to-the-vest manner and a preference for yellow index cards in delivering his public remarks, Mr. Gates has already proved a sharp contrast to colorful and quotable former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Briefing reporters with Gen. Casey, Mr. Gates remarked that he had learned at least one fact on his global fact-finding tour: "I'm getting too old to do seven countries in 51/2 days."

Casey: "Surge" Could Go Home By Summer (CHIT/AP)

By Robert Burns

Chicago Tribune, January 20, 2007

TALLIL AIR BASE, Iraq -- The top U.S. commander in Iraq predicted Friday that some of the extra troops President Bush is sending could make an impact and start returning home by late summer, an optimistic note in contrast to skepticism of the plan back home.

Gen. George Casey said security in the war zone should gradually improve during the next three months as the 21,500 added troops build up in Baghdad and in Anbar province. However, the plan's success depends on the Iraqi government fulfilling its own pledges of adding troops and taking an aggressive approach to sectarian militias and death squads, he said.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has failed to deliver on such promises before.

"I think it's probably going to be the summer, late summer, before we get to the point where the people in Baghdad feel safe in their neighborhoods," Casey told reporters at a news conference with Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Asked when he thought some of the extra U.S. troops could be pulled back, Casey replied, "I believe the projections are late summer, but the first troops are just arriving," so nothing is sure.

Sounding his optimistic note, he said, "You're going to see some progress gradually over the next 60 to 90 days."

Gates, making his second trip to Iraq since he took over for Donald H. Rumsfeld on Dec. 18, headed home after a daylong visit that was not announced in advance. Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, just back from the Middle East, will meet with Bush Saturday morning at the White House to report on their trips.

DOJ_NMG_0119756

His trip came as the Bush administration begins a new phase in the war including a troop buildup that has sparked widespread opposition in Congress and the general public, a reshuffling of Mideast commanders and diplomats and intensified military pressure on Iran. Congress is to take up nonbinding legislation opposing the buildup next week.

"Our goal is an Iraq that can defend itself, sustain itself, and govern itself and live free from the scourge of extremism," Gates said. "There's widespread agreement here that failure would be a calamity for American national interests and those of many other countries as well."

The first extra troops -- a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division -- have just arrived in Baghdad, and Gates said it was too early to predict how Bush's plan for quelling the sectarian violence in the capital will work.

Four other brigades are to arrive between now and May, assuming the Iraqis follow through on their commitment to bring three additional Iraqi army brigades into Baghdad and to allow raids against all illegal militias.

Administration officials have declined to estimate how long the extra troops will be needed in Iraq, saying it depends on conditions. Gates said earlier this month that the increase seemed likely to last months, but not 18 months or two years.

Casey had expressed reservations about adding U.S. troops in Baghdad before Bush announced the plan on Jan. 10. The general said several factors had changed recently, including commitments by al-Maliki to not prohibit U.S. and Iraqi security forces from arresting leaders of Shiite militias who have political connections in the Maliki government.

Casey also said he was encouraged at the prospect of al-Maliki fulfilling his promise to send an extra three Iraqi army brigades to the capital to help the reinforced U.S. contingent.

Asked how the Iraqi government was doing to meet its commitments, he said, "So far, so good."

Casey will soon leave his post as part of a house-cleaning Bush is conducting on his military and diplomatic teams for the Middle East.

The U.S. troop reinforcements are supposed to secure Baghdad, although 4,000 of the extra troops are for Anbar province in western Iraq, where a Marine-led force is fighting an Sunni Arab insurgency.

Gates stopped earlier in Basra, the country's second-largest city, where he and Casey met with Maj. Gen. Jonathan Shaw, the newly arrived commander of British forces in southern Iraq.

At Tallil Air Base, which is near the ancient city of Ur and had been a main air defense post of the Iraqi military under Saddam Hussein, Gates and Casey met with commanders from several coalition countries, including Australia, Romania, Denmark and Britain, as well as with U.S. trainers of Iraqi forces.

The Bush administration has accused Iran of meddling in Iraqi affairs and contributing technology and bomb-making materials for insurgents to use against U.S. and Iraqi security forces.

A British military spokesman in Basra told reporters that no hard evidence had been obtained of Iranian arms, money or weapons technology entering southern Iraq.

But the spokesman, Maj. Chris Ormond-King, added, "As a gut feeling we know there is Iranian influence" here. The predominantly Shiite Muslim areas of southern Iraq have historic ties to Iran, which is a predominantly Shiite nation.

Britain, which has the largest troop contingent among the U.S. allies with about 7,000 soldiers in the Basra area, is planning to withdraw a large portion of them this year.

Joseph Lieberman Unbowed (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The war in Iraq brings to Joe Lieberman's mind an old Mark Twain story. "When a cat jumps on a hot stove, the cat never jumps on the stove again because the cat always assumes the stove is hot," says the senator from Connecticut. "But we are smarter than that. OK, so Vietnam didn't work out. But there are times when you've got to use force, to protect your security and to protect your principles."

Try telling that to the nuisance of congressional felines now prowling around the Iraq debate, eyeing it like a cooker on high boil. Next week will witness a Senate vote on a resolution condemning President Bush's new plan to quell growing sectarian violence and terrorism in Iraq by increasing the number of troops. While that vote may be largely symbolic, it comes amid far more ominous congressional calls to cut off war funding, to leave the Iraqis to settle their differences, to bring the troops home.

DOJ_NMG_0119757

If ever the Iraq political debate was at a crossroads, it's now.

At the center of this fray is Sen. Lieberman, a sort of Horatio at the congressional bridge -- spiritedly trying to hold back a bipartisan stampede out of Iraq that he believes will result in devastating consequences for that country, the region, and, most importantly, U.S. national security.

"Iraq is the central part of a larger and ultimately longer-term conflict in the Middle East between moderates and extremists, between democrats and dictators, between Iran- and Iraq-sponsored terrorism and the rest of the Middle East . . . Are we going to surrender to them, surrender that country to them, and encourage people like them to be in authority and power all over the Middle East and in a better position to strike us again?" asks Mr. Lieberman. If only Livy had his quill today.

These are blunt words, and quite a few more flow from Mr. Lieberman throughout a lively interview in his office this past week. A born gentleman, he refrains from lobbing any pot shots at opponents. But he made clear that he felt Washington had been ducking an honest debate about the war and the consequences of abandoning it, hiding instead behind "cosmetic" resolutions and rhetoric. Four years into the conflict, Mr. Lieberman thinks there is value in remembering again why it is we're in Iraq.

This is well-trod ground for a man who supported not just the first Gulf War, but sponsored the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act that aimed to topple the regime. In 2003 "we did something that was right and courageous, which was to overthrow Saddam Hussein," says Mr. Lieberman. "He was a genocidal dictator, he tried to assassinate a former American president, he used chemical weapons [on his] . . . own people . . . He was a hater of the United States." Saddam was a danger, not to mention a barrier to creating a democratic Middle East that ceases to be a threat to the U.S.

This is why the senator remains unmoved today by those colleagues who have abandoned the cause, lamenting that they were "deceived" about the existence of WMD or that they have "lost confidence in the leadership of the president." Says Mr. Lieberman: "If you still think, not only that the original purpose of going in was right, but that how it ends will have a significant effect on American security for a generation or more to come, then you don't back away." And that, he says, counts even in the face of faltering public opinion. "I think we are elected to lead. . . . Americans are understandably responding to the carnage they see on TV every night, and what we have to urge them is not to surrender to the people who are causing that carnage."

Mr. Lieberman, who returned from his latest visit to Iraq in December, freely acknowledges what he believes were "the series of mistakes that were made after Saddam Hussein was overthrown," from the disbanding of the Iraqi army to our reluctance to send more troops (something he has advocated since the fall of 2003). Still, "we were getting to a point where we were making some significant progress -- and it is important not to overlook this. There were three elections held. Those were a powerful demonstration of what no one is able to deny, even those who now want to turn away and give up on Iraq. Which is that the majority of the Iraqi people want a better life for themselves and their families. The majority is not involved in sectarian violence and clearly not involved in terrorism."

There are still hopeful signs, he says. His recent trip included a stop in Ramadi in Anbar province -- an area thick with terrorist operatives -- where the senator saw evidence that "we've turned the tribal leaders to our side, against al Qaeda." Mr. Lieberman also felt from his discussions around the country that there were strong signs a "moderate, multiethnic coalition" was coming together among political leaders who would support Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in a renewed push to restore order. "This thing is still winnable," says Mr. Lieberman. "And it is critical that we take advantage of this opportunity to win."

Which gets to President Bush's proposal for more troops, a plan Mr. Lieberman enthusiastically endorses. "The people in Congress, and the public, were quite right in saying the president's got to come up with a different approach. And he did. It's better than any other plan I've seen because it holds the hope of success. Most of the other plans are effectively just giving up and walking away."

Are 21,500 additional troops really enough? "I wish it was more, truthfully," he answers, throwing his own wish of 35,000 or even 40,000. "But I believe it is adequate. What I hope is that it is implemented quickly." The troops will be vital to quelling what Mr. Lieberman sees as several very different conflicts currently raging in Iraq. In Baghdad, more U.S. soldiers will bolster more Iraqi forces who aim to hold neighborhoods wracked by violence between local Shiites and Sunnis. In Anbar, they will hunt down al Qaeda. More troops, says Mr. Lieberman, will also provide the opportunity "to change the dynamic" in the wider war on terrorism, by sending a message to Iran and others that the U.S. will not abandon the region's moderates who are struggling to create a new democratic order.

DOJ_NMG_0119758

And what of those Americans looking for some guarantee this will succeed? "None of us can be certain [the president's plan] is going to work; all the choices we have in Iraq right now are difficult. But by far, the one that is the worst, and would have disastrous consequences, is to pick up and leave, in small steps or in one large step, for all the reasons we know," he replies, emphatically. He also wants to speak beyond the proposal itself, to its author. "I have admiration for the president, because I believe he gets it. He understands the challenge of our time, which is from Islamic extremism . . . And he knows what he's doing is not popular. But he's doing it because he thinks it is right for the country." * * *

So what does that say about Mr. Lieberman's Senate brethren, those who now want to turn tail for Rome, abandoning Horatio and his damned bridge to the enemy? What, I ask, accounts for the growing numbers of senators -- including Republicans such as Nebraska's Chuck Hagel, Maine's Olympia Snowe, Oregon's Gordon Smith -- who could well provide the decisive votes to undermine their own president in a time of war?

Mr. Lieberman offers a few half-hearted (dare I say, gentlemanly) explanations for the Senate's frigid feet. Some feel let down because the WMDs were never found; others are "affected in a political context by the loss of public support." But he ends up back at a baser truth, conceding that "some people, I just think have been partisan about this -- and that, to me, is the worst reason."

Mr. Lieberman is also frustrated that those supporting the resolution are dodging the tough questions. "The resolution that is being talked about, in one sense I'd say it is offensive, because it is only cosmetic . . . It won't affect the implementation of a new plan to succeed, to win in Iraq. But at the same time it will send a mixed message to those who are fighting for us in Iraq, and those who are fighting against us in Iraq. It will be a very graphic example . . . that we are divided."

But what can Mr. Lieberman, President Bush and others do to stave off such a capitulation? For starters, he responds, his side needs to make sure the naysayers aren't allowed to just criticize. "Part of the case would be, look, if you are really against the war and you are really against what the president is proposing, have the nerve to do what Congress under the Constitution is authorized to do: Move to cut off the funding and then let's have a real head-to-head debate."

Critics of the president's approach might also be made to put forward an alternative, and justify their proposals -- beyond some vague notion that this must all be solved by the Iraqi parliament, which Mr. Lieberman explains isn't so much a solution as wish-fulfillment. "There is an attempt by some of my colleagues here to say that it is wrong to think a military victory is possible, and in the end this requires a political solution among Iraqis. Well, of course it does. But as President Bush said, and as I believe, you can't have a political solution, you can't have economic growth . . . unless you first have security. That's key. Security's basic."

The other alternative, of course, is to simply admit defeat. Some in Congress are working up the courage to say as much, and to further suggest that abandoning Iraq wouldn't be all that bad. "People say this is just like Vietnam, we could leave, and that would be that. That won't be that. We're in a war which has it origins in this part of the world, in the Middle East, in the conflict within Islam. If we pull out and essentially surrender to the extremists and terrorists, they are naturally going to follow us right back to our shores.

"If we leave the place collapses. And it's more than civil war, it's ethnic cleansing. The Iranians come in and dominate a good chunk of the country. Al Qaeda takes over a good part and uses it as a base. The Kurds [can sustain themselves] but it gets very ominous. . . . And then the same group of people who attacked us on 9/11, they achieve a victory, and they will use that victory to strike at us again."

Speaking of the threat posed by Iran, Mr. Lieberman has been equally unimpressed by the U.S.'s lack of resolve. "I'm troubled by this reflex reaction to talk with Iran. We're a strong enough country, when it seems productive we shouldn't hesitate to talk to anybody. But we ought to talk when it is in our interest, not theirs. And right now it is only in Iran's interest."

He says he's been encouraged by the administration's tougher stance in recent weeks, and in particular President Bush's decision to move another carrier battle group to the Gulf region -- "which sends a message to Iran."

Mr. Lieberman also notes that, "We know that some of our American soldiers are being killed by sophisticated IEDs from Iran. The evidence is just closed, clear, compelling. . . . I can't believe the concern expressed by some of my colleagues here about whether we have a right to take prisoner Iranians who we conclude are either supplying weapons to Iraqis who are using them to kill American troops, or training them to kill American troops." As for the rest of the world community, "they're in denial."

DOJ_NMG_0119759

What is remarkable, I think toward the end of our conversation, is how spry and feisty the senator looks. He did, after all, just come off a draining year fighting a bitter battle -- against his own party -- for his political life. Mr. Lieberman is now officially an "independent," yet he takes care to describe himself as an "independent Democrat." Why identify with a party that is so uniformly opposed to him on an issue so dear to his heart? He admits he frets that foreign policy is the "Achilles heel" of his politic al side, and that "unless the Democratic Party can prove to the people that as a party it is not either pacifist or isolationist, but is willing to stand up and protect the security of the American people, then we're going to have trouble electing a president."

His own Democratic heroes are Truman and Kennedy. "The Kennedy inaugural was the single . . . speech that brought me into public life. Those famous words 'Pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, in order to assure the survival and the success of liberty.' That's what it has meant to me to be a Democrat." Horatio's challenge now is to convince his party -- and more than a few Republicans -- to also remember just who they are.

Key Aide To Sadr Arrested In Baghdad (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 19 -- U.S.-backed Iraqi forces arrested a top aide to anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in eastern Baghdad on Friday, amid growing signs of stepped-up efforts to quell Sadr and his supporters.

U.S. military officials said in November that Sadr's Mahdi Army militia represents the greatest threat to Iraq's security. U.S. and Iraqi forces are preparing a renewed effort to pacify Baghdad, including the deployment of additional U.S. troops.

Abdul Hadi al-Daraji, Sadr's media director in Baghdad, was arrested at his house in the neighborhood of Baladiyat, near the Mahdi Army stronghold of Sadr City, shortly after midnight, said Sadr spokesman Abdul Razak al-Nadawi.

The spokesman said a guard was killed during the operation. At least two other aides were taken into custody, according to a statement released by the U.S. military.

The statement did not identify Daraji by name, but said the main suspect was involved in the assassination of numerous members of Iraq's security forces and is "affiliated with illegal armed group cells targeting Iraqi civilians for sectarian attacks." The military said the arrest was the result of an "Iraqi-led" operation.

Nadawi said "the occupation forces are provoking Sadr . . . by these daily operations or every-other-day operations." The spokesman added that the cleric's followers "are the only ones demanding and putting a timetable for the occupation withdrawal."

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has been pressured by the Bush administration to bring the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias under control, was not forewarned about the arrest, said Ali Dabbagh, a spokesman for Maliki. Dabbagh said the prime minister was not notified about every impending high-profile arrest.

"No one is untouchable for the security forces," Dabbagh said. "At the same time, no one was interested to go into a fight with the Sadr movement." Sadr, whose supporters hold 30 seats in parliament, is a key supporter of Maliki, who is a Shiite, but the cleric is also widely seen as an instigator of the country's sectarian violence.

Neither Dabbagh nor the U.S. military said whether Daraji had been charged with a crime. "Definitely, if he's not charged, he will be released in a respectful way," Dabbagh said.

Sadr said in an interview with an Italian newspaper published Friday that a crackdown had begun and that 400 of his men had been arrested, according to the Associated Press.

Maliki told reporters this week that 430 Mahdi Army members had been arrested in recent days, but Nadawi said Thursday that the arrests stretched back to August 2004.

In the interview, Sadr said his militiamen would not fight back during the Muslim holy month of Muharram, which started Friday for Sunnis and begins Saturday for Shiites, saying it was against the faith to kill at that time.

"Let them kill us. For a true believer there is no better moment than this to die: Heaven is ensured," he was quoted as saying. "After Muharram, we'll see."

DOJ_NMG_0119760

Also on Friday, the U.S. military reported the death of an American soldier killed Thursday by an improvised explosive device.

The soldier, who was not identified pending notification of relatives, was traveling in a convoy conducting an escort mission in a neighborhood in northwest Baghdad when the blast occurred. Three other soldiers were injured.

Aide To Militant Shiite Cleric Held After U.S.-Iraqi Raid (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 19 — A senior aide to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr was detained here in a joint American-Iraqi raid before dawn on Friday, Iraqi and American officials said, in the latest high-profile arrest of a Shiite militia member.

The aide, Abdel Hadi al-Daraji, a powerful cleric whose official position is as a spokesman for Mr. Sadr but who also is accused of running a Mafia-style crime empire in northeast Baghdad, was arrested in a mosque close to his house in the neighborhood of Baladiyad. He was detained with two of his guards. A third was shot dead in the raid.

The American military did not identify Mr. Daraji by name, saying only that it had captured "an illegal armed-group leader," and that he was suspected of having been involved in "the organized kidnapping, torture and murder of Iraqi civilians." A spokesman for Mr. Sadr confirmed that Mr. Daraji was the aide who was arrested and denied the charges of criminal activity.

Mr. Daraji, an elfin man who came from poverty into the Shiite religious community after the American invasion, had been in hiding since the fall, when the military began actively pursuing members of Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, a central driver of sectarian violence here.

The detention will be a test for the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Mr. Maliki has generally avoided confrontation with Mr. Sadr, whose tremendous political influence helped him win the prime minister post last year. And as recently as October, Iraqi government officials persuaded the top American military commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., to release a senior aide to Mr. Sadr from American custody.

Mr. Daraji was a central figure in Mr. Sadr's organization during its battles with the American military in 2004, leading his vast army of spokesmen and media advisers. But as the years passed, he staked out territory of his own in his native Sadr City, a sprawling grid of cement-block houses in northeast Baghdad, and local residents said he had been involved in some of the worst militia crimes.

Iraqis who knew him said he had grown rich from his power in the neighborhood. He was known as a middleman, arranging government contracts with local businessmen and taking commissions, and also receiving secret Iranian financing. He had built a fancy new house in Baladiyad, near the mosque where he was arrested Friday morning.

His involvement in crime became well known in the neighborhood and in recent months Mr. Sadr disavowed him, but some still consider him a top aide. He went into hiding, and in October had all but stopped answering his cellphone and responded only to previously arranged agreed-upon patterns of rings.

Many welcomed the news of his arrest.

"It's a good thing," said one Iraqi who knew people around Mr. Daraji and who spoke anonymously out of concern for his family's safety. "He's No. 1 in all this city."

In Sadr City, the arrest stirred some discontent, but not the mass protests that such an arrest would have provoked in past years. Muhammed al-Musawi, a cleric speaking at Friday Prayer, said the government should instead spend its time looking for Sunni militants, like those who engineered a bombing at a university this week.

US Forces Seize Sadr Aide (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

Key figures in Iraq's Sadrist movement said on Friday that US forces had detained one of its top members, the latest in a series of signs that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had authorised a crackdown on the radical Shia movement whose militias are blamed for a large share of the country's sectarian violence.

The arrest coincided with the arrival of US Secretary of Defense Robert Gates in Basra in the south of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0119761

The Sadrists identified the detainee as Abd al-Hadi al-Darraji, the movement's media director in Baghdad. The US military said special Iraqi army forces operating with coalition advisers captured a high-level suspect "based on credible intelligence that he [was involved in] the organised kidnapping, torture and murder of Iraqi civilians".

"The suspect allegedly leads various illegal armed group operations and is affiliated with illegal armed group cells targeting Iraqi civilians for sectarian attacks and violence," the statement said.

It said he was affiliated with Abu Diraa, a fugitive militia leader whom US officers say is responsible for the brutal murder of numerous Sunni civilians, but whom many Shia consider a folk hero, claiming he only targets terrorists.

Mr Maliki has been under heavy pressure from the US to crack down on Shia militias ever since he took power last summer and the beginning of this year is widely viewed as his last chance to demonstrate that is serious about imposing the authority of a non-sectarian state, as opposed to helping the Shia to win a sectarian civil war.

The prime minister, whose government has in the past been accused of protecting leaders of the Sadrists' Mahdi Army militia and blocking operations in their support base of Sadr City, has recently suggested that he may have authorised more wide-ranging operations against the radical Shia movement. Two days ago, he said that over 400 Mahdi Army fighters had recently been arrested.

The prime minister may be reluctant to explicitly declare an offensive against the Mahdi Army, which many Baghdad Shia have seen as their first line of defence against Sunni militants who have targeted Shia mosques, religious ceremonies and other civilian targets for the past three years.

The Sadrists for their part say that they are under a crackdown.

One resident of Sadr City said that the movement's rank-and-file had largely disappeared from the streets, and that the leaders believed that they were being hunted and were keeping a low profile.

The Sadrists also say that they have received instructions from Moqtada al-Sadr, the young radical cleric who at least nominally commands the movement, not to resist or provoke the Americans. Officials have also hinted that the group's 30-strong parliamentary bloc may end a boycott of parliament called in November to protest against a meeting between Mr Maliki and US President George W Bush.

In the past, Mr Sadr has built much of his legitimacy from his movement's vocal and militant opposition to the US military presence in Iraq.

However, his movement has long espoused deepening Sunni-Shia ties, and he has reportedly tried to rein in or replace commanders who are responsible for some of the worst abuses. He has also come under pressure from rival Shia groups to allow his militia to be dismantled, lest the United States cut support for the country's Shia-led government.

Top Sadr Deputy Is Arrested (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops on Friday arrested a top Shiite leader suspected of torturing and killing civilians. The capture of the man Iraqi officials identified as Sheik Abdul-Hadi Darraji, a chief aide of anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr, comes on the heels of a promised crackdown on Shiite militias by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

A spokesman for Sadr's office in Najaf quickly condemned the joint raid in Baghdad, promising countrywide demonstrations.

"Let the Americans know that in these provocative acts against the Sadr movement they are playing with fire," Sheik Abdel Razaq Nidawi said. "And we will wait for the orders of Sayed Muqtada regarding the arrest."

A recently unveiled Baghdad security plan involving the deployment of additional U.S. troops hinges on whether Iraqi forces can, or will, clamp down on Shiite militias such as Sadr's Al Mahdi army. Gunmen loyal to Sadr have long been suspected of fomenting much of the violence in the capital.

However, the significance of Darraji's arrest remains unclear. In the past, Maliki's government has forced U.S. troops to release suspected militiamen affiliated with Sadr, whom the prime minister relies upon for political support. And there seemed to be confusion Friday about whether Maliki had been informed of the raid that led to Darraji's arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0119762

One spokesman told the Al Arabiya TV news channel that the operation took place without the prime minister's knowledge. But another Maliki official said in a telephone interview that the Iraqi government supported the arrest.

The U.S. military did not name Darraji but said in a statement that special Iraqi army forces and their U.S. advisors detained "a high-level, illegal armed-group leader" in an east Baghdad neighborhood. Sadr officials and an Iraqi government spokesman said the man was Darraji.

In addition to leading a group suspected of torturing and murdering Iraqi civilians, Darraji has allegedly been involved in assassinating Iraqi security forces and government officials, the U.S. military said in a statement.

"He is believed to be affiliated with Abu Dura and other Baghdad death squad commanders," it said.

The leader known as Abu Dura is a notorious figure in the mostly Shiite slum of the capital known as Sadr City, reputedly responsible for numerous deaths and the most grisly torture. By several accounts, Abu Dura has split with Sadr and is running a renegade militia cell.

Shiite Muslim clerics used their pulpits during Friday prayers to criticize the arrest.

Sayed Muhannad Musawi told worshipers in Sadr City that the arrest was part of a Bush administration strategy to "cover their failure in Iraq" and he called upon the Iraqi government to release the detainees.

"We say to the government that we are not terrorists," said Musawi, responding to a recent statement by Maliki that the government had arrested 400 militiamen affiliated with Sadr. "We are not killers. Rather, we defend innocent citizens."

Among residents in the vast slum, the arrest was greeted with dismay.

"The arrest in Sadr City proves the brutality of the Americans against the safe cities in Iraq," said Ali Abdullah, a 40-year-old owner of an appliance shop. "As a resident of this city, I demand that the government play its role in stopping the operations against unarmed civilians."

Teacher Mohsin Asaidi, 37, called Darraji a symbol for Sadr's followers and his arrest "proof to the world that terrorism and the invasion [of Iraq] are two faces of the same coin."

Sheik Hassan Zarqani, a Sadr official in Najaf, a city holy to Shiites, demanded the release of all detainees associated with Sadr's group, calling the most recent arrest a "very bad message to the Sadr movement, which is trying very hard to stabilize the situation in Baghdad."

A Sadr official's account of the 2 a.m. raid at a Shiite holy site differed from the U.S. military's, saying that four others, not two, were arrested with Darraji. During a gunfight, one guard was killed and the holy site was damaged, said the official, who requested anonymity.

U.S. troops are not allowed to enter Muslim holy sites, including mosques. The U.S. military said its troops never set foot on the site.

Later Friday morning, mourners gathered for a funeral procession taking the body of Ali Raheem, the guard, to Najaf, witnesses said.

Also on Friday, U.S. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates arrived in Iraq, touching down in the southern city of Basra, where Shiite militias are engaged in a fierce campaign against the approximately 7,000 British forces there.

Britain has consolidated forces in a few bases around the city and plans a significant troop drawdown this year.

Gates met with Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and Maj. Gen. Jonathan Shaw, commander of British troops here.

In recent days, a palace housing British forces has come under heavy rocket bombardment. Attackers have also planted mines in the Shatt al Arab waterway, targeting river patrols, and buried roadside bombs aimed at convoys driving through the city. A spokeswoman for the British forces in Basra said six British troops were injured and two vehicles destroyed in an attack on their base that included rocket and machine-gun fire.

In a news conference with Gates at Tallil air base, northwest of Basra near the city of Nasiriya, Casey suggested that some of the extra troops President Bush plans to send could start returning home by late summer. But, he said, that depends on the Iraqi government fulfilling its pledges of adding troops and taking an aggressive approach to sectarian militias and death squads, the Associated Press reported. Gates added, "Our goal is an Iraq that can defend itself, sustain itself and govern itself and live free from the scourge of extremism."

DOJ_NMG_0119763

Elsewhere in Iraq, violence continued, authorities said.

Police patrols recovered the bodies of 18 people, including a politician from Sunni Arab-dominated Fallouja. Some of the corpses bore signs of torture.

Mortar fire killed three and injured seven in various neighborhoods of Baghdad. Armed men opened fire randomly at shoppers at a market, killing one and injuring two.

A roadside bomb killed a police officer and injured another.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, drive-by gunmen assassinated a cleric Thursday night.

An American soldier was killed and three others were wounded by a roadside bomb Thursday in northwestern Baghdad, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The U.S. military on Friday also confirmed that a suicide car bomber attacked near a compound housing Kurdish peshmerga forces earlier in the week, killing four and injuring 38.

Top Aide Of Muqtada Al-Sadr Arrested (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

U.S. and Iraqi forces swooped into a mosque complex in east Baghdad on Friday and detained a top aide to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the latest in a series of operations aimed at eviscerating the leadership of the Mahdi Army militia.

The raid drew immediate criticism from the Iraqi government, which complained it had not been consulted. An aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who owes his job as Iraqi leader to al-Sadr's backing, said the operation was not part of a coming joint U.S.-Iraq security drive.

Under the plan, to which President Bush has committed an additional 21,500 American troops, U.S. commanders have been promised a freer hand against both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen.

"There was no coordination with the Iraqi political leadership and this arrest was not part of the new security plan," Sadiq al-Rikabi, the al-Maliki adviser, told Al-Arabiya television. "Coordination with the Iraqi political leadership is needed before conducting such operations that draw popular reactions."

Abdul-Hadi al-Darraji was captured in the early morning raid and his bodyguard was killed in what Abdul-Zahra al-Suweiadi, a senior al-Sadr aide, called a "cowardly act." Al-Sadr's office said al-Darraji was media director for the cleric's political movement and demanded his immediate release.

"America is playing with fire and our patience is beginning to fade," said Abdul-Razzaq al-Nidawi, an al-Sadr aide in the Shiite holy city of Najaf. "This savage barbarian act will not pass peacefully."

The U.S. military, in a statement that did not name al-Darraji or mention the Mahdi Army by name, said special Iraqi army forces operating with U.S. advisers had "captured a high-level, illegal armed group leader" in Baghdad's Baladiyat neighborhood, which is adjacent to Sadr City, the Mahdi Army stronghold.

"Iraqi forces detained him based on credible intelligence that he is the leader of an illegal armed group (involved in) ... the organized kidnapping, torture and murder of Iraqi civilians. The suspect is also reportedly involved in the assassination of numerous Iraqi Security Forces members and government officials," the U.S. statement said.

It said two other suspects were detained for questioning.

Also Friday, the top American commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said he thought some of the extra troops might return home after a few months.

"I think it's probably going to be the summer, late summer, before you get to the point where people in Baghdad feel safe in their neighborhoods," Casey said at a news conference at Tallil Air Base in southern Iraq with visiting Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Asked how long the additional American forces would remain, Casey replied, "I believe the projections are late summer."

The first group of extra troops — a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division — has just arrived in Baghdad, and Gates said it was too early to predict how Bush's plan for quelling the sectarian violence in the capital will work.

DOJ_NMG_0119764

Four other brigades are to be sent to Iraq between now and May, assuming the Iraqis follow through on their commitment to bring three additional Iraqi army brigades into Baghdad and to allow raids against all illegal militias.

Gates' daylong visit was not announced in advance. The defense chief met with U.S. commanders and their allied counterparts as the Bush troop buildup was encountering widespread opposition in Congress.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Friday that the Iraq war "is not an obligation of the American people in perpetuity." The president, she said, "has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder."

Democratic support was building around a resolution that would rebuff Bush's plans for more troops to Iraq, and more Republicans were looking for ways to sign on to the measure.

In an interview with an Italian newspaper, al-Sadr said the U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown already has begun. And he confirmed reports that 400 Mahdi Army men have been arrested.

The La Repubblica interviewer quoted al-Sadr as saying he feared for his life and stayed on the move constantly. His aides have told The Associated Press he seldom sleeps in the same place for two nights in succession.

Al-Sadr said his militias would not fight back immediately because Islam forbids killing during the Muslim holy month of Muharram, which starts Friday for Sunnis and Saturday for Shiites.

"Let them kill us. For a true believer there is no better moment than this to die: Heaven is ensured," he was quoted as saying. "After Muharram, we'll see."

Al-Sadr said he is being targeted.

"For this reason, I have moved my family to a secure location. I even have had a will drawn up, and I move continuously in a way that only few can know where I am," he was quoted as saying by La Repubblica.

Some of al-Sadr's militia commanders have said al-Maliki has stopped protecting the Shiite fighters under pressure from Washington. They have claimed at least five top commanders were captured or killed in recent months.

While al-Maliki has vowed he will not interfere in U.S. attempts to rid the capital of militiamen, his aide al-Rikabi declared that "the new security plan does not target a specific militia, it targets everyone practicing killing and terrorism against civilians, whether Sunnis or Shiites."

At least 27 people were killed or found dead as a result of sectarian violence across Iraq on Friday, including a man working for the Ministry of Tourism and Archaeology Affairs who was shot and killed near his home in a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad. Gunmen also attacked a Shiite mosque in southern Baghdad, killing two guards and setting off explosives to damage the building.

A roadside bomb killed one U.S. soldier and wounded three others in an attack Thursday against a patrol that was escorting a convoy in northwestern Baghdad, the military said Friday.

___

AP military writer Robert Burns in Basra and Lolita C. Baldor in Washington contributed to this report.

Iran Complains About U.S. Detentions (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

Iran charged in a letter to U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon on Friday that the United States illegally attacked its consulate in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last week and demanded the immediate release of five detained Iranians.

The U.S. military accused the Iranians of links to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that is allegedly supporting insurgents in Iraq. It disputed Iranian claims that the men were diplomats and that the office is a consulate.

In its letter, Iran's deputy ambassador Mehdi Danesh-Yazdi strongly condemned the Jan. 11 raid and accused the U.S. of "another flagrant violation of the basic principles of international law" and diplomatic conventions which bar attacks on diplomatic missions.

The Foreign Ministry said U.S. forces also confiscated documents and other property. It said Iran has had an office in Irbil since 1992, and its status was officially changed to a consulate in the past year.

DOJ_NMG_0119765

Danesh-Yazdi called for the immediate release of the five Iranians, the return of the property seized by U.S. forces and compensation for damages to the consulate.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran holds the U.S. government fully responsible for the consequences of this unlawful act, and for the safety and security of the ... consular officers," Danesh-Yazdi said.

"Indeed, the said attack constitutes a matter of grave concern that requires an urgent and resolute response on the part of the United Nations, and in particular the Security Council," Danesh-Yazdi said.

He did not indicate what specific response Iran was seeking, but asked Ban to circulate his letter as an official document of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

Iran Reportedly Set For Talks With U.S. (AP)

By Bassem Mroue, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

President Jalal Talabani said in remarks published Friday that the Iranians were ready to meet with the U.S. for talks about security issues — part of an apparent effort by Talabani to encourage a dialogue between two nations that are increasingly at odds, and vital to Iraq.

Talabani's comments, in an interview with the respected pan-Arab daily Al Hayat, came amid escalating tensions between Washington and Tehran. In recent weeks, the U.S. has built up naval forces in the Persian Gulf and raided an Iranian liaison office in northern. Iran meanwhile has stepped up military operations along its border, Iranians arriving in Iraq say.

"During my last visit to Tehran, I discussed the matter with Iranian officials who said they are ready to meet the Americans but they said that the Americans should publicly announce their readiness," Talabani said in the interview. He was last in Iran in late November.

Talabani, currently on a visit to Syria, said "the Iranians showed flexibility. I will say it for history that they said they are ready for an understanding with America from Afghanistan to Lebanon. They are ready for discussions in order to reach results that please both sides."

Talabani's office confirmed the accuracy of the quoted comments.

Iranian officials were not immediately available for comment because Friday is the holy day in the Muslim world.

The United States accuses Iran of helping Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias in Iraq, and of trying to build a nuclear weapons program. Washington has also asked Tehran to end support for militant groups, including Hezbollah in Lebanon and the Palestinian group Hamas.

In his interview, Talabani described two failed efforts by U.S. and Iranian officials to hold secret talks last year.

At one point last year, Talabani said, the Iranians proposed a three-way meeting with U.S. and Iraqi officials, and the Americans accepted. The talks were to be held in the town of Dokan, in Iraq's northern Kurdish area.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, Talabani told the newspaper, traveled to Dokan a day before the scheduled meeting. But the Iranians boycotted, Talabani said, because they thought the secrecy of the meeting had been compromised.

The Iranians proposed another meeting before Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government took office in May, Talabani said, but the Americans wanted to wait until the Cabinet was formed. The Iranians "considered that procrastination and canceled the meeting," he said.

Earlier this week, Lawrence Wilkerson, former Secretary of State Colin Powell's chief of staff, told the British Broadcasting Corp. that Vice President Dick Cheney in 2003 rejected an Iranian offer to help the United States stabilize Iraq, and for Tehran to end its military support for Hezbollah and Hamas.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom H. Casey on Thursday said he had no knowledge of the offer. But he said the U.S. is open to talks with Tehran.

Meanwhile, Iranian reinforcements were reported along the Iraqi border in the northern Kurdish region in response to what residents said was an intensification of over-flights by U.S. warplanes in recent days.

Travelers arriving in Iraq's northern Sulaimaniyah province said they saw dozens of Revolutionary Guards with vehicles carrying 106 millimeter cannons. They chanted "death to American. Death to Israel."

DOJ_NMG_0119766

Mamosta Aziz, a senior official at the Kurdistan Ministry of Peshmerga, or militias, said Iranian forces had remained on their side of the border.

Iran's Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told state-run television Friday that Iran will file a formal complaint with the U.N. Security Council over the U.S.'s detention of five Iranians in northern Iraq.

The U.S. military stormed an Iranian government office in the Kurdish-controlled city of Irbil on Jan. 11 and arrested the Iranians, whom it accuses of links to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that is allegedly supporting insurgents.

Iran says the arrested men were diplomats and the office a consulate, but the U.S. disputes this.

Leading Senator Assails President Over Iran Stance (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — The new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee on Friday sharply criticized the Bush administration's increasingly combative stance toward Iran, saying that White House efforts to portray it as a growing threat are uncomfortably reminiscent of rhetoric about Iraq before the American invasion of 2003.

Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, the West Virginia Democrat who took control of the committee this month, said that the administration was building a case against Tehran even as American intelligence agencies still know little about either Iran's internal dynamics or its intentions in the Middle East.

"To be quite honest, I'm a little concerned that it's Iraq again," Senator Rockefeller said during an interview in his office. "This whole concept of moving against Iran is bizarre."

Mr. Rockefeller did not say which aspects of the Bush administration's case against Iran he thought were not supported by solid intelligence. He did say he agreed with the White House that Iranian operatives inside Iraq were supporting Shiite militias and working against American troops.

Mr. Rockefeller said he believed President Bush was getting poor advice from advisers who argue that an uncompromising stance toward the government in Tehran will serve American interests.

"I don't think that policy makers in this administration particularly understand Iran," he said.

The comments of Mr. Rockefeller reflect the mounting concerns being voiced by other influential Democrats, including the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, and Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, about the Bush administration's approach to Iran. The Democrats have warned that the administration is moving toward a confrontation with Iran when the United States has neither the military resources nor the support among American allies and members of Congress to carry out such a move.

Because Mr. Rockefeller is one of a handful of lawmakers with access to the most classified intelligence about the threat from Iran, his views carry particular weight. He has also historically been more tempered in his criticism of the White House on national security issues than some of his Democratic colleagues.

Mr. Rockefeller was biting in his criticism of how President Bush has dealt with the threat of Islamic radicalism since the Sept. 11 attacks, saying he believed that the campaign against international terrorism was "still a mystery" to the president.

"I don't think he understands the world," Mr. Rockefeller said. "I don't think he's particularly curious about the world. I don't think he reads like he says he does."

He added, "Every time he's read something he tells you about it, I think."

Last week, the Intelligence Committee heard testimony from John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, that an emboldened Iran was casting a shadow across the Middle East and could decide to send Hezbollah operatives on missions to hit American targets.

Mr. Negroponte testified the morning after President Bush had, in a televised address to the nation, said he was determined to confront what he called worrying activities by Iranian operatives in Iraq, and announced that the Pentagon was building up the American naval presence in the Persian Gulf and sending a battery of Patriot missiles to deter Iranian aggression.

Some Democrats have suggested that Mr. Bush's speech was the beginning of a meticulously choreographed campaign to demonize Iran, much the way the administration built its public case against Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0119767

In a speech on Friday, Mr. Reid warned the White House not to take military action against Iran without seeking approval from Congress.

Gordon D. Johndroe, a White House spokesman, said in response to Senator Rockefeller's comments that Iran was taking provocative actions both inside Iraq and elsewhere, and that American allies were united in efforts to end what intelligence officials believe is a covert nuclear weapons program inside the country.

"It has been clear for some time that Iran has been meddling in Iraq, and the Iraqis have made the concerns known to the Iranians," Mr. Johndroe said. He noted that the administration has said it would be willing to begin direct talks with Iran — which have not occurred since 1979 — if Iran agreed to suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, told lawmakers on Thursday that over the past year and a half he had come to a "much darker interpretation" of Iran's activities inside Iraq.

"I think there's a clear line of evidence that points out the Iranians want to punish the United States, hurt the United States in Iraq, tie down the United States in Iraq, so that our other options in the region, against other activities the Iranians might have, would be limited," he said.

Mr. Rockefeller's committee is working to complete a long-delayed investigation into the misuse of intelligence about Iraq in the months before the American-led invasion.

He said that the committee was nearing completion on one part of that investigation, concerning whether the White House ignored prewar C.I.A. assessments that Iraq could disintegrate into chaos.

That report, Mr. Rockefeller said, could be released within months and was "not going to make for pleasant reading at the White House."

Mr. Rockefeller said that with Democrats now in charge of the Intelligence Committee, he expected the panel to be much more aggressive, both in investigating the use of intelligence to fashion White House policy and in subjecting secret intelligence programs to new scrutiny. He mentioned the C.I.A's network of secret prisons and the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program as likely subjects of investigations.

"We weren't able to drill down on a lot of stuff" during the years in which the Intelligence Committee was under Republican control, Mr. Rockefeller said. "Now, there's a very different attitude."

Draft Law Keeps Central Control Over Oil In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 19 — After months of tense bargaining, a cabinet-level committee has produced a draft law governing Iraq's vast oil fields that would distribute all revenues through the federal government and grant Baghdad wide powers in exploration, development and awarding major international contracts.

The draft, described Friday by several members of the committee, could still change and must be approved by the Iraqi cabinet and Parliament before it becomes law. Negotiations have veered off track in the past, and members of the political and sectarian groups with interest in the law could still object as they read it more closely.

But if approved in anything close to its present form, the law would appear to settle a longstanding debate over whether the oil industry and its revenues should be overseen by the central government or the regions dominated by Kurds in the north and Shiite Arabs in the south, where the richest oil fields are located.

The draft comes down firmly on the side of central oversight, a decision that advocates for Iraq's unity are likely to trumpet as a triumph. Because control of the oil industry touches so directly on the interests of all Iraq's warring sectarian groups, and therefore the future of the country, the proposed law has been described as the most critical piece of pending legislation.

"This will give us the basis of the unity of this country," said Ali Baban, the Iraqi planning minister and a member of the Sunni-dominated Tawafaq party who serves on the negotiating committee. "We pushed for the center in Baghdad, but we didn't neglect the Kurds and other regions," Mr. Baban said.

Negotiators said that the final weeks of wrangling on the draft focused on a federal committee that would be set up to review the oil contracts. Kurdish, and to some extent Shiite, parties wanted to maintain regional control over the contracts, while

DOJ_NMG_0119768

Sunni Arabs, with few oil resources on territories they dominate, insisted that the federal committee have the power to approve contracts, rather than just reviewing them and offering advice.

The negotiators appear to have finessed that issue by allowing the regions to initiate the process of tendering contracts before sending them to Baghdad for approval. To limit the powers of the committee, they also have drawn up an exacting set of criteria to govern the deliberations of the committee rather than simply relying on its independent discretion. And in a bow to the Kurds, who objected to the use of the word "approve" in describing the committee's duties, the draft law says instead that the committee may review and reject contracts that do not meet the criteria.

The draft law would also radically restructure parts of Iraq's state-controlled oil industry by giving wide independence — possibly leading to eventual privatization — to the government companies that control oil exports, the maintenance of pipelines and the operation of oil platforms in the Persian Gulf.

The law would also revive the Iraqi National Oil Company, a countrywide umbrella organization that was essentially closed by Saddam Hussein.

At the same time, the law would place substantial administrative authorities outside Baghdad by allowing any region that produces at least 150,000 barrels of oil a day to create its own operating company, according to Hussain al-Shahristani, the Iraqi oil minister and member of a powerful coalition of Shiite political parties who also serves on the negotiating committee.

Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister and the chairman of the negotiating committee, said that the precise wording of clauses could still change. He was speaking by telephone from Iraqi Kurdistan, where Mr. Salih, a Kurd, said he was still working to cement support for some provisions in the draft law.

"This is the most important piece of legislation that Iraq will adopt, and it is not a surprise that it is taking long, tedious rounds of negotiations," Mr. Salih said. "We are close, but we have not yet closed the deal. We are making progress and need to continue."

The developments come with several additional cautions, not the least of which is that in Iraq's chaotic wartime environment, even laws that do get passed can have little impact. In one example of a document arrived at through similar negotiations, Iraq's Constitution, it remains unclear what effect many of the fastidiously negotiated clauses are having in the governance of the country.

And even though Iraq's main political and sectarian groups have been represented in the talks over the oil law, it is still possible that members of those groups could bridle as the draft is scrutinized more widely.

As a case in point, the Kurdistan regional government issued a statement on Friday criticizing an Oil Ministry spokesman for saying that the oil law had been agreed upon unanimously and put in final form.

"Although the process of drafting the oil law is nearing completion, the important annexes to the law are still pending," the statement said.

Some of those annexes will address how to deal with fields that are already producing oil under existing contracts, how to begin taking bids for drilling new wells in known fields and exploring areas where currently unknown oil fields could be located.

The committee achieved a breakthrough of sorts in December, when negotiators took a step toward central control by agreeing that all oil revenues should first go to the central government before being sent back to the regions in amounts proportional to population.

But the talks bogged down on the question of whether the committee, to be called the Federal Oil and Gas Council, would be called upon to approve contracts proposed by the regions or just review those contracts and offer advice. In its current form, the draft law avoids the word "approve" and in effect gives the committee veto power.

Whatever the language, Mr. Shahristani, the oil minister, said, the committee will in fact pass judgment on each contract, even when it originates in a proposed deal between a company and one of the oil-producing regions.

But the committee must make its decision based on specific guidelines, like a directive to maximize profits for Iraq and to keep the contracting process transparent, Mr. Shahristani said. And there are other checks and balances written into the law. For example, while the regions can propose their own deals, they will have to work with companies that have been "pre-qualified" in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0119769

Directives like that could still generate objections in Kurdistan, which wants as much freedom as possible to write its own contracts.

The draft law also specifies that technical experts in the Oil Ministry are to be included in the process at all levels. It is the ministry that will be called upon to write a plan for which oil fields will be developed and drilled first, and which ones will follow. The federal council would simply be called upon to endorse that plan or send it back for revisions.

The Oil Ministry would also be closely involved in developing "model contracts" to be used as templates at all levels of Iraq's oil industry.

Having an oil law will in principle make it easier to attract international companies with the resources and expertise that the country so desperately needs. Still, hovering over all the negotiations is the question of whether companies will want to do business in Iraq.

Mr. Shahristani, for one, says that because of the financial stakes, companies are already reaching out.

"The international companies keep contacting me — every week, without exception," Mr. Shahristani said. "They are all very, very keen."

Temporary "Enjoyment Marriages" In Vogue Again With Some Iraqis (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Fatima Ali was a 24-year-old divorcee with no high school diploma and no job. Shawket al-Rubae was a 34-year-old Shiite sheik with a pregnant wife who, he said, could not have sex with him.

Ali wanted someone to take care of her. Rubae wanted a companion.

They met one afternoon in May at the house he shares with his wife, in the room where he accepts visitors seeking his religious counsel. He had a proposal. Would Ali be his temporary wife? He would pay her 5,000 Iraqi dinars upfront -- about $4 -- in addition to her monthly expenses. About twice a week over the next eight months, he would summon her to a house he would rent.

The negotiations took an hour and ended with an unwritten agreement, the couple recalled. Thus began their "mutaa," or enjoyment marriage, a temporary union believed by Shiite Muslims to be sanctioned by Islamic law.

The Shiite practice began 1,400 years ago, in what is now Iraq and other parts of the region, as a way to provide for war widows. Banned by President Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led government, it has regained popularity since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq brought the majority Shiites to power, said clerics, women's rights activists and mutaa spouses.

"During Saddam's time, there was no religious freedom," said Faris al-Shareef, a sheik who lives in the mainly Shiite city of Hilla.

Opponents of mutaa, most of them Sunni Arabs, say it is less about religious freedom and more about economic exploitation. Thousands of men are dying in the sectarian violence that has followed the invasion, leaving behind widows who must fend for themselves. Many young men are out of work and prefer temporary over permanent wives who require long-term financial commitments. In a mutaa arrangement, the woman is entitled to payment only for the duration of the marriage.

"It's a cover for prostitution," said Um Akram, a women's rights activist in Baghdad. "Some women, because they don't want to be prostitutes, they think that this is legal because it's got some kind of religious cover. But it is wrong, and they're still prostitutes from the society's point of view." Um Akram, like the mutaa spouses interviewed, asked that only parts of her name be published.

Many intellectuals consider ancient traditions such as these an obstacle to Iraq's effort to become a more modern, democratic society. In recent years, extremist religious groups have gained more power in Iraq.

"These steps are taking the whole country backwards and are definitely hurdles to the advancement of the country," said Hamdia Ahmed, a former member of parliament and a women's rights activist in Baghdad. "The only solution is to separate Islam from politics."

Shiite clerics and others who practice mutaa say such marriages are keeping young women from having unwed sex and widowed or divorced women from resorting to prostitution to make money.

DOJ_NMG_0119770

They say a mutaa marriage is not much different from a traditional marriage in which the husband pays the wife's family a dowry and provides for her financially.

"It was designed as a humanitarian help for women," said Mahdi al-Shog, a Shiite cleric.

According to Shiite religious law, a mutaa relationship can last for a few minutes or several years. A man can have an unlimited number of mutaa wives and a permanent wife at the same time. A woman can have only one husband at a time, permanent or temporary. No written contract or official ceremony is required in a mutaa. When the time limit ends, the man and woman go their separate ways with none of the messiness of a regular divorce.

Although the temporary arrangements are becoming more common, they are still controversial, and people usually conduct them secretly.

Ali had a normal marriage once. It lasted only three months because the couple did not get along. Her chances for another permanent marriage, she said, were slim. Men often prefer virgins over widows and divorced women, she said.

She welcomed Rubae's proposal because he was a well-known sheik in her neighborhood. Her family was fond of him. "He was a good guy, and he was a religious man," she said.

Rubae had been in 15 mutaa marriages before. A year ago he entered into a permanent marriage with a woman who had been his mutaa wife for a day. When she became pregnant eight months ago, she suggested he take a temporary wife but asked him not to tell her if he did. She does not know about his involvement with Ali.

"As a pregnant woman, she cannot give me my needs," Rubae said. "She treats me real good and she wants me to be happy."

He chose Ali partly because her blond hair, light brown eyes and petite figure had always attracted him. "When she puts makeup on, it destroys her beauty," he said.

He also liked that she was religiously devout, and he said he wanted to keep her from a relationship outside of marriage.

Ali didn't think of him in a romantic way at first. "After we got married, I started loving him," she said.

The money he gave her helped. Her father owns a bakery but money has always been tight, so much so that she had to end her education after elementary school. But money wasn't her only reason for entering the enjoyment marriage. "I have needs just like any other woman," she said.

Both Shiite and Sunni Muslims allow men to have more than one permanent wife, but they disagree over mutaa.

Most Shiites believe that the prophet Muhammad encouraged the practice as a way to give widows an income. Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, has sanctioned it and offers advice on his Web site.

Um Ahmed, a 28-year-old woman from Najaf, lost her husband in 2005 when he was caught in the crossfire of a fight between two Shiite militias.

Soon after his death, she had her first mutaa relationship, with a man who was in a permanent marriage. He paid her 50,000 Iraqi dinars upfront -- or $38 -- and gave her money whenever she needed it during their six-month relationship.

She said she needed it often. She is a tailor and the only one in her family of 10 who works.

"When a human being needs money, the need will make a person do anything," she said. "It's better than doing the wrong things. This is religiously accepted."

Many Sunnis believe that the practice is outdated and ripe for abuse. They also see it as more evidence of Iranian influence on Iraqi life. Mutaa is widespread in Iran's Shiite theocratic state.

"It is a big insult to women," said Ibtsam Z. Alsha, a Sunni lawyer and the head of the organization Women for the Common Good of Women.

Women's rights activists also bemoan what they say is an increase in mutaa on college campuses. Some female students do it for money. Others do it for love when their parents forbid them to marry a man from another sect.

Amani, a 22-year-old Baghdad University engineering student, said she is a Sunni but agreed to enter into a mutaa relationship with her Shiite boyfriend because her parents disapproved of him. "I hated my family because they did not allow this marriage," she said. "I did this to spite my family."

Still, she has not told them about the relationship. "If they find out, it will be my end," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0119771

A woman cannot terminate a temporary marriage before it expires unless the man agrees, said four sheiks interviewed for this article.

Once the marriage is over, she has to wait at least two menstrual cycles before she can have another relationship so that paternity can be easily determined if she becomes pregnant, they said.

Most mutaa contracts stipulate that no children be produced. If a woman were to become pregnant anyway, Islamic law would require the man to support the child, the sheiks said. But the clerics disagreed over how much power they have to impose that rule.

Rubae said the man who refuses his child would be whipped or even killed. "We as the sheiks should be sure this thing will stay legitimate," he said.

Shareef, the sheik from Hilla, said some men take advantage of their rights under religious law but refuse to accept their responsibility when a child is born. In some of those cases, he said, a sharia court, using Islamic law, is not as effective as a secular court in enforcing the rules.

"I am supporting the idea of the government regulating mutaa marriages, just like the permanent marriages, so these man cannot run away," he said. "Otherwise the women are losing their rights."

Um Akram, the women's rights activist in Baghdad, said more women are asking her organization for help in getting national identification cards for children born of mutaa relationships. Parents must present a marriage certificate to obtain the identification cards, which are required by schools and employers.

Um Akram said some single women have given up their children for adoption to married couples who can use their marriage certificates to register them.

"The men just hit and run, and they don't want to have a family," she said. "The children are paying the price."

Ali and Rubae agreed not to have children. They simply wanted to enjoy each other.

On the days he could see her, he gave her flowers, perfume, clothing and a watch. They had meals together. Sometimes he could spend the whole day with her. Other times, just five or six hours.

Ali said she cried when the marriage ended early last week. "It's just like a permanent marriage," she said. "When he leaves, I become sad."

Her sorrow did not last long. Rubae said Jan. 12 that he had decided to marry her again. This time, he said, he would marry her for a year, enough time for his wife to fully recover from childbirth.

The Next Body Armor Design Gets A Show In Natick (BOS)

By Megan Woolhouse, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 20, 2007

New style is lighter and more protective

NATICK -- The Army's Natick research center showed off the next generation in body armor yesterday to Secretary of the Army Francis J. Harvey, but it's not scheduled to get on the battlefield for three years.

The new body armor hangs on a frame 2 inches from a soldier's body, a design that researchers say limits the impact and injury from a roadside bomb or mortar shell.

Sergeant Joshua Devereaux modeled the gear for Harvey, who asked what he thought of it.

"I'd take this system right now," the sergeant said. But Devereaux and other soldiers will have to wait.

The new armor remains under development and has not been funded by Congress. Harvey and General Benjamin S. Griffin, head of Army Materiel Command, held classified meetings on body armor during a one-day tour of the US Army Soldier Systems Center in Natick.

US Representative Martin T. Meehan, a Lowell Democrat, said that while the military has improved its performance, it still needs to find ways to get the new armor to soldiers and Marines sooner, especially with the additional troops headed to Iraq.

"We're still not giving soldiers the proper body armor to protect themselves," Meehan said. "The higher-ups are always saying we do, but when you talk to people, you find out we're not getting them the best technology. I think it's embarrassing."

DOJ_NMG_0119772

Such criticisms are not new. Early in the Iraq war, soldiers and their families were spending hundreds or even thousands of dollars on protective gear they said the military was not providing. In 2005, Pentagon leaders agreed to reimburse soldiers who bought their own body armor, but six months later the Pentagon reversed its stand, banning the practice. Officials said at the time that they had questions about commercial product quality and could not guarantee the equipment's effectiveness.

There have also been calls for side armor for additional protection. Last January, The New York Times reported that a secret Pentagon study found that as many as 80 percent of the Marines who have been killed in Iraq from wounds to the upper body could have survived if they had extra body armor. Such side armor has been available since 2003, the newspaper reported, but has not been routinely available to troops.

Meeting with reporters in Natick yesterday, Harvey defended the time it takes to get equipment to the field. He said the number of armored Humvees, for example, increased from hundreds to tens of thousands between 2003 and 2005.

"I come from private industry," he said. "And I don't think anybody in private industry could have responded that quickly."

The military currently issues Interceptor body armor, a vest that hangs over a soldier's torso and is made out of Kevlar and ceramic plates. When struck by mortar or gunfire, even at close range, it can absorb much of the impact.

But the plates still pack a punch, an impact that can crack a soldier's sternum, break a rib, or cause serious bruising, said Natick engineer Jean-Louis "Dutch" DeGay.

The next generation of body armor, called the Chassis, is also made of Kevlar and ceramic, but the plates are 12 percent larger, 2 to 4 pounds lighter, and hang from a shoulder frame inches from the body. The new body armor also includes two underarm panels about 8 inches long, which hang about an inch from the body and provide more protection.

"That was one of the lessons learned from the Interceptor," DeGay said.

The redesign is part of a broader effort by the Army to create the Future Force Warrior, rethinking everything from the design of helmets to T-shirts. Much of the emphasis is on how to incorporate more technology into standard uniforms, including heart rate monitors, computers, and global positioning systems.

The Natick center develops rations, clothing, and other equipment. Harvey also inspected the latest Meals Ready to Eat (such as chicken pesto with bowtie pasta) and saw a parade of new, wrinkle-free, fade-resistant uniforms. The center employs about 1,100 civilians, 750 contractors, and 150 military personnel.

Missing In Antiwar Action (WP)

By John McMillian

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Recently I finished teaching a freshman seminar at Harvard called "From Reform to Revolution: Youth Culture in the 1960s." When I built the syllabus, I asked students to ponder a single, overarching question: "How did the youth rebellion of the 1960s happen?" That is, what caused millions of young people to pierce the bland and platitudinous din that characterized the early Cold War years? Why did so many youths -- many of them affluent and college-educated -- suddenly decide that American society needed to be radically overhauled?

But as the semester progressed, my students frequently turned the question around: Why is there no rising protest movement among young people today? At the very least, they asked, shouldn't we be seeing more antiwar activity? According to a CNN poll this month, 67 percent of Americans oppose the war in Iraq, and more than half would like to see all U.S. troops home by year's end. Given that it was not until August 1968 that a majority of Americans began calling the Vietnam War a "mistake," this is a remarkable statistic. By 1968, of course, antiwar teach-ins, sit-ins and marches were commonplace on many campuses; demonstrators had violently clashed with soldiers on the steps of the Pentagon; and the Democratic National Convention had descended into chaos over the war.

Today, grass-roots antiwar activism has not been entirely absent. But one would be hard-pressed to argue that we're on the cusp of a rising protest movement. Why not?

First, the civil rights movement exerted a forceful influence on left-wing protesters in the 1960s. When African Americans bravely stood up against attack dogs, cattle prods and fire hoses, they dramatically demonstrated the power of collective action to foster social change.

DOJ_NMG_0119773

Second, the draft personalized the Vietnam War not just for the hundreds of thousands of young men who were conscripted but also for their loved ones. No matter how strained the U.S. military becomes, our all-volunteer army -- widely regarded as a lethal "third rail" in American politics -- isn't going away anytime soon. As a result, too many of us enjoy the luxury of regarding the Iraq war as an abstraction. Among my 12 students, only two personally knew someone serving in Iraq. One is a medic, the other a chaplain.

But my students suggested some other reasons today's youth seem so passive. Although this high-achieving group was hardly representative, many of them spoke plaintively about being pressured from an early age to begin building their credentials for college. "Students are expected to get perfect grades, excel in extracurricular activities, save the world and be home before dinner time," quipped one freshman. These demands seem to be common nationwide. The American Academy of Pediatrics warned this month of the physical and mental health problems that may arise from the competitive and hurried lifestyles of many youths. In such pressure-cooker environments, students are unlikely to become committed organizers.

Nor are many students likely to be socialized into antiwar activism. Every campus has its left-wing organizers, but today the gauzy idealism that circulated among teenagers in the 1960s seems almost freakishly anomalous. According to a recent U.S. Census report, 79 percent of college freshmen in 1970 said that "developing a meaningful philosophy of life" was among their goals, whereas only 36 percent said becoming wealthy was a high priority. By contrast, in 2005, 75 percent of incoming students listed "being very well off financially" among their chief aims.

Some of my students suggested that they might not even be capable of experiencing the kind of indignation and disillusionment that spurred many baby boomers toward activism. In the Vietnam era, the shameful dissembling of American politicians provoked outrage. But living in the shadow of Vietnam and Watergate, and weaned on "The Simpsons" and "The Daily Show," today's youth greet the Bush administration's spin and ever-evolving rationale for war with ironic world-weariness and bemused laughter. "The Iraq war turned out to be a hoax from the beginning? Figures!"

The students who took my seminar were a particularly serious-minded and delightful bunch. Most of them came to admire the pluck and panache of the New Leftists we studied, and they were quick to recognize how frequently the concerns of Vietnam-era protesters dovetailed with their own complaints against the Iraq war. Some even wistfully remarked that they would like to be part of a generational rebellion.

But they doubt that this is likely to happen. "Just like [in] the 1960s, we have an unjust war, a lying president, and dead American soldiers sent home everyday," one student wrote me in an e-mail. "But rather than fight the administration or demand a forum to express our unhappiness, we accept the status quo and focus on our own problems."

The writer is a lecturer in history and literature at Harvard University. He can be reached atmcmill@fas.harvard.edu.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Feds Defend Siegelman Jurors, Question E-Mails Used By Defense (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

Montgomery (AP) - Federal prosecutors defended jurors who convicted former Gov. Don Siegelman and former HealthSouth chief Richard Scrushy, claiming the latest purported e-mails from jurors were concocted and no cause for a new trial.

Acting U-S- Attorney Louis Franklin, in a brief filed late Friday, asked Montgomery Federal Judge Mark Fuller to deny the defense request to reconsider his earlier order denying a new trial.

Siegelman and Scrushy were convicted in June of bribery and conspiracy following a two month government corruption trial in federal court. Siegelman was convicted of a separate obstruction of justice charge. Both are appealing.

Arguing for a new trial, defense attorneys submitted copies of more e-mails that purportedly were sent between two jurors during the trial, alleging that the jurors deliberated improperly outside the presence of the full jury.

The defense lawyers said they received printed copies in December of the messages that were sent anonymously through the mail. The judge earlier had refused to order a new trial because of some earlier e-mail evidence submitted to the court.

DOJ_NMG_0119774

Siegelman attorney David McDonald says there are six e-mails -- five between two jurors and a sixth one between one of the same jurors and a third juror. He called on the Justice Department to investigate the e-mails.

Franklin accuses the defense of continuing its --quoting here -- "rolling, anonymous attacks on the jurors" that "fall far short of the well-settled standards for the extraordinarily relief of a new trial, or indeed for any further hearing, investigation, or other action" by the court.

States Study Marketing Of Lilly Pill (NYT)

By Alex Berenson

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Stepping up government investigations into Eli Lilly's marketing of its best-selling drug Zyprexa, state prosecutors in Illinois and Vermont have demanded that the company turn over information about the way it promoted the medication.

On Thursday, lawyers from the consumer protection division of the Illinois attorney general's office demanded that Lilly hand over marketing materials, e-mail messages, and other documents with information about promotion of Zyprexa. Vermont investigators issued a similar order yesterday morning.

The orders are the civil equivalents of criminal subpoenas, according to Deborah Hagan, the chief of the Illinois consumer protection division.

Illinois and Vermont are now part of a coordinated five-state civil investigation into the way Lilly promoted Zyprexa, a treatment for schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. The states are investigating whether Lilly tried to hide Zyprexa's risk of causing weight gain and other risks associated with diabetes and whether the company promoted Zyprexa for use in patients who do not have schizophrenia or bipolar disorder.

Federal laws prohibit such so-called "off label" marketing, although doctors may prescribe any drug for any disease that they believe the drug will help.

The orders on Thursday and yesterday are the first formal demands for Lilly documents from state attorneys and they indicate an escalation of the investigation, according to Ms. Hagan and Julie Brill, who is an assistant attorney general in Vermont.

"We can ask for documents; we can ask for answers to questions; and we can ask for people to come in and testify under oath," Ms. Hagan said. Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia have also recently accelerated their own investigation into Lilly's marketing of Zyprexa.

In a statement yesterday, Lilly said it would cooperate with the investigations and had done nothing wrong. "We intend to cooperate with the Illinois attorney general's civil investigative demand relating to Zyprexa," the company said. "We cannot comment further about this or other ongoing investigations."

While the investigation being led by Illinois is civil, other investigations into Lilly's conduct are both civil and criminal. Attorneys general in California and Florida may seek to recover Medicaid payments that the states made for Zyprexa. Medicaid represents a sizable percentage of the drug's overall sales because many people who take the medicine are disabled and do not work.

Any fine or cost recovery could be sizable, because Zyprexa has been a commercial success. The drug is by far Eli Lilly's largest-selling product, with sales of $4.2 billion last year and about $30 billion since its introduction in 1996. More than 20 million people have taken Zyprexa since Lilly began selling the drug.

The investigations could continue for months or possibly years, people involved in the cases say, as investigators sift through tens of thousands of documents from the company and talk to current and former employees.

Zyprexa, whose generic name is olanzapine, is a potent chemical that binds with receptors in the brain to reduce the symptoms of schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. But Zyprexa also causes severe weight gain and changes in blood sugar and cholesterol in many patients who take it.

Internal Lilly documents provided to The New York Times last month by a lawyer in Alaska who represents people with mental illness indicate that Lilly has engaged in a decade-long campaign to play down the seriousness of the side effects of Zyprexa.

DOJ_NMG_0119775

Lilly did not disclose to doctors that its own data showed that 16 percent of people taking Zyprexa for a year gained more than 66 pounds, according to the documents.

The documents also indicate that the company told its drug representatives to promote Zyprexa to doctors for the treatment of conditions other than bipolar disorder or schizophrenia.

Lilly has said it did not market Zyprexa off-label and said so again in its statement yesterday.

"Lilly is committed to the highest ethical standards and to promoting our medications only for approved uses," the company said.

But its marketing materials have repeated references to promoting the drug for other uses. And some sales representatives and doctors have also said they believed that the company was marketing off-label.

Still, any criminal prosecution of the company could face a high burden. While settlements of off-label marketing cases have led to large fines, such cases so far have fizzled if they reach juries.

And as long as drug makers comply with federal requirements to provide data about their products to the Food and Drug Administration, companies have a relatively strong defense against criminal prosecution, according to lawyers who are experts in drug marketing.

H.P. Chief Defends Timing Of Stock Sale (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

The chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, Mark V. Hurd, told Congressional lawmakers that his sale of company shares on Aug. 25 was "totally unrelated" to the fact that he was questioned the same day about an ill-fated internal investigation.

The sale of 100,000 shares of Hewlett-Packard was made during a scheduled window for trading by executives, Mr. Hurd wrote in a letter dated Dec. 21 that he sent to the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, John D. Dingell, a Michigan Democrat.

On the same day the trade was completed, Mr. Hurd was interviewed by lawyers from the law firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati. The lawyers were looking into techniques used by Hewlett-Packard to identify the source of boardroom leaks.

The disclosure of the internal investigation into the source of the leaks eventually lead to resignations of the H.P. chairwoman, C. Patricia Dunn, and four other executives.

Last week, an outside investigator hired by H.P., Bryan Wagner, 29, of Littleton, Colo., pleaded guilty to identification theft and conspiracy because he posed as a reporter and a director of the company to obtain private telephone records.

Mr. Hurd's defense of his stock sale came in response to a Dec. 12 letter from Mr. Dingell and Representative Bart Stupak of Michigan, a Democrat who heads the subcommittee on oversight and investigations. They asked him about the timing of the sale.

The letter from the lawmakers noted that revelations of improperly dated stock option grants at more than 180 companies have raised questions about whether executives are cashing in or dodging bullets "while in possession of potentially damaging material facts that shareholders do not know."

Mr. Hurd, who noted that shares of Hewlett-Packard had risen significantly since the sale, said the trade was not a case of "bullet dodging."

Mr. Dingell and Mr. Stupak forwarded Mr. Hurd's letter to the Security and Exchange Commission and asked for the agency's views on the matter.

Their letter also noted that the S.E.C. was conducting an investigation into Hewlett-Packard's use of false identities to secure private phone records, a practice known as pretexting.

The two lawmakers asked the agency to inform the committee when that investigation was completed and "whether any violations of the federal securities laws have occurred."

An S.E.C. spokesman, John Heine, said the agency did not comment on Congressional correspondence. Mr. Heine said that it was against agency policy to comment on a pending investigations or to even confirm that an investigation was under way.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard fell 34 cents yesterday, to $42.

Two Are Sentenced For Fraud Involving Trading Of Stocks (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

Two former traders at the New York Stock Exchange were each sentenced yesterday to six months in prison and fined $250,000 for improper stock trading.

The two traders, Michael J. Hayward and Michael F. Stern, former managers at Van der Moolen Specialists USA, were each convicted of securities fraud at a trial in July, part of a crackdown on illegal trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Judge Sidney H. Stein of Federal District Court in Manhattan also ordered Mr. Stern, 56, and Mr. Hayward, 53, to perform 320 hours of community service.

The case stems from a two-year investigation of trading specialists, who match buy and sell orders on the exchange floor to maintain an orderly market in specific securities. Specialists buy and sell for their own accounts and their clients'. Prosecutors said some specialists were using incoming orders to trade for their own firms, making millions of dollars at the expense of clients.

"This is intentional criminal conduct," Judge Stein said. "Deterrence is very important."

The case involved trading activity from 1999 to 2003. More than half a dozen former clerks testified that Mr. Hayward and Mr. Stern directed them to trade for Van der Moolen's account for a profit. Prosecutors also accused the defendants of "interpositioning," or buying stock from one customer and selling to another to profit on the price difference, instead of matching the orders.

Of the 15 specialists charged with fraud by federal prosecutors in April 2005, three, including Mr. Stern and Mr. Hayward, were convicted at trial, and two pleaded guilty. Two other specialists were acquitted. Prosecutors dismissed charges against seven others, and one defendant remains a fugitive.

The inquiry led to charges against stock exchange specialist firms. In March 2004, seven firms agreed to pay $247 million to settle claims by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the New York Stock Exchange that they profited on trades at the expense of customers from 1999 to 2003. Among the firms were Van der Moolen, Bear Wagner Specialists, Spear Leeds & Kellogg, and Banc of America Specialist.

Executives Get Bonuses As Firms Reprice Options (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

Aim Is to Offset Losses As Backdating Is Fixed; Mr. Deason's Windfall

The stock-options backdating scandal has prompted dozens of companies to fire top executives, take charges totaling billions of dollars against earnings and tell shareholders that they misrepresented how options were awarded.

Now, a number of companies are taking one more step: making special payments to executives or directors who received backdated options. Companies say the payments will compensate executives and directors who weren't involved in options wrongdoing, yet saw their potential profit reduced when their options were adjusted to reflect the actual dates they were issued. Several of the companies describe the payments as bonuses in regulatory filings.

But the practice has given critics more fodder for attacks on ballooning executive pay levels and special perks.

Federal authorities are scrutinizing the options practices of nearly 140 companies, and scores more companies are conducting internal reviews. A stock option typically gives its holder the right to buy a set amount of stock at some future time, at its price at the time the option was granted. The idea is to give recipients an incentive to help boost the company's share price. But a number of companies and executives changed the date on their grants to make them appear they had been granted at a time when the price was even lower, making them worth more to their holders.

Many companies that have acknowledged options-dating troubles are adopting the position that misdated options -- particularly those granted to top executives -- should be fixed without taking more out of shareholders' pockets. For instance, Sehat Sutardja, chief executive officer of microchip maker Marvell Technology Group Ltd., recently reimbursed his employer $5,355,001 for wrongly dated stock options he already had cashed in. He also agreed to forgo another $5.4 million from the value of options he still holds.

DOJ_NMG_0119777

But some companies are taking another course. At KLA-Tencor Corp., for instance, Chief Executive Richard Wallace is in line for an options-related "special cash bonus," according to a securities filing.

The semiconductor-equipment maker is adjusting some of Mr. Wallace's options to carry the share prices that correspond to the dates the options were awarded, rather than the wrong ones achieved through backdating. The adjustments shaved $368,618.36 from the value of those grants. According to the filing, Mr. Wallace will have that amount paid to him in cash.

In effect, Mr. Wallace may come out ahead now that backdating has been exposed, since he is swapping unrealized, potential profit -- which could evaporate if KLA-Tencor shares fall -- for cash. By keeping the repriced options, he retains the chance to profit from them if shares rise higher.

In most cases, the companies making the payments say the executives in question aren't the ones responsible for the options troubles. KLA-Tencor has said in filings that Mr. Wallace, a 19-year company veteran who became CEO last year, had "no involvement" in the improper options granting, which it says occurred primarily from July 1997 through June 2002, a period when Mr. Wallace was a lower-level executive.

KLA-Tencor has said it intends to cancel improper options held by former CEO Kenneth Schroeder, and it will reprice -- without compensatory payment -- improper options held by Ken Levy, its former chairman. Mr. Schroeder, a longtime executive who had taken an advisory role, was fired and Mr. Levy left in the wake of KLA-Tencor backdating revelations last year.

A KLA-Tencor spokeswoman, Kyra Whitten, says the bonuses are being paid to Mr. Wallace and two other officials because the company doesn't want employees not involved with the options trouble to be "adversely impacted." She said the company hasn't yet decided how it will treat backdated options held by nonexecutive employees.

With readjusted prices, most of Mr. Wallace's options are still "in the money" -- meaning their price is below the current market price. But a portion aren't -- meaning they wouldn't be profitable if cashed out. KLA-Tencor will pay Mr. Wallace $84,332.69 for that portion, according to the company's securities filings, meaning Mr. Wallace will be making money from so-called underwater options that otherwise wouldn't yield profit for him at all. The payment is due in January 2008.

The bonuses don't sit well with shareholder activists. "To do this in the context of the outrage over the practice [of backdating] is just shocking," says Ann Yerger, the executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors, who said she was stunned when informed of the payments. "It is a sign that something remains rotten in corporate America with regard to executive pay."

Brian Foley, a compensation consultant in White Plains, N.Y., says, "it seems to me that it [reimbursement] would really stick in one's craw if it goes to the CEO, CFO, general counsel, or anyone who was in the know or should have been in the know."

Mr. Foley adds that the cash payments are "awkward," since it means people get paid for options they haven't yet -- and might never -- exercise.

At Affiliated Computer Services Inc., a Dallas outsourcer that last year ousted two top executives because of extensive backdating, several of those who remain are in line for special bonuses to compensate them for the loss of value on their wrongly dated grants. At the top of the list: Chairman Darwin Deason, who was head of the company's compensation committee and CEO for much of time when backdating occurred. Mr. Deason, who founded ACS and holds more than $400 million of company stock, will get a payment of $650,000, according to an ACS securities filing.

Michael Buckley, a spokesman for ACS, said Mr. Deason isn't being treated differently than any other employee.

Another ACS executive, Thomas Burlin, will get just over $100,000 thanks to the repricing of a misdated option grant that is presently out-of-the-money. Mr. Burlin's options aren't worth anything at ACS's current stock price.

Meanwhile, Fossil Inc. has said seven officers of the clothing-and-accessories maker could be up for a "cash bonus" if their options were repriced. And microchip maker Broadcom Corp. said a top sales executive may be up for a "special" payment of $525,870 next January to compensate him for lost option value.

Top executives of Sonus Networks Inc., a Massachusetts-based telecommunications-equipment maker, also may have a payday coming. The company has said it likely will reprice wrongly dated options, though it hasn't yet done so. Sonus says in a filing that upon repricing, it intends to pay certain executives and directors for any lost value.

DOJ_NMG_0119778

Sonus's chairman and CEO, Hassan Ahmed, has some four million options covered by the payout agreement -- including one grant of 640,000 shares that is deeply under water. It now carries a grant date of April 3, 2001, with an exercise price of $13.875.

The stock was near a sharp low on that date, meaning a new price from a date even couple of days later would shrink Mr. Ahmed's potential profit. If the option is repriced to April 5, for example, the exercise price would change to $17.875 -- and Mr. Ahmed would be in line for a special payment of $2.6 million for an option that is otherwise very far from being profitable. (Sonus shares currently trade at $7.20.)

"All this really is is acknowledging a previous commitment" to grant an option at the originally agreed price, said Charlie Gray, Sonus's general counsel. He said Sonus hasn't determined whether the April 2001 grant carried an incorrect price, and he added that the company might seek to renegotiate the payment agreement in cases where the grant is well out of the money. He said Sonus's audit committee examined the granting practices and concluded that no current member of management, including Mr. Ahmed, did anything wrong.

The recent disclosures about the repricings come in large part thanks to a provision of Section 409A of the federal tax code. Section 409A slaps a 20% excise tax, along with other penalties, on certain "discount" stock options whose exercise price is below the level of the stock on the day the option was granted. Options backdated to a day with a low price are a type of discount option. By agreeing to reprice the options, an executive is saved from the big tax bill.

Executives who already have exercised backdated options may have to pay a penalty tax. But at least one company, j2 Global Communications Inc., a Los Angeles seller of telecom services, is relieving that burden. In a filing, the company says it "anticipates resolving the matter directly with the Internal Revenue Service on behalf of all such holders, including making any payments that are required." In addition to paying its executives' taxes, j2 Global also is offering a "compensating payment" to several because of repriced options. The company says in its filing that it had used "incorrect measurement dates" for some options but that "no willful backdating took place."

The bulk of companies that have admitted to options problems aren't being nearly so generous.

Every director and executive officer of chip maker Actel Corp. of Mountain View, Calif., for instance, will have wrongly dated options repriced with no reimbursement. Stephen Hemsley, who replaced William McGuire as CEO of UnitedHealth Group Inc. after Dr. McGuire's options-fueled ouster, is surrendering about $190 million in value, though the Minnetonka, Minn., insurer said it believes Mr. Hemsley did nothing wrong. (Dr. McGuire is forfeiting $200 million.) Boston Communications Group Inc. of Bedford, Mass., said in a filing that 13 current or former executives or directors are surrendering outright a total of more than 410,000 wrongly dated options, without compensation.

Write to Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com1

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison For Abramoff Deals (WP)

By Susan Schmidt, James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Former Ohio Republican congressman Robert W. Ney was sentenced to 30 months in prison yesterday, becoming the first elected official headed for jail because of corrupt dealings with now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

U.S. District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle handed down a tougher sentence than the 27 months recommended by prosecutors, telling Ney that, "as a member of Congress, you had the responsibility above all else to set an example and to uphold the law."

Ney became a symbol of the corruption that aroused voters and helped sweep into Congress a new Democratic majority promising ethics reform.

The former chairman of the House Administration Committee admitted that he performed official acts for Abramoff's lobbying clients between 2001 and 2004, receiving in exchange luxury vacation trips, skybox seats at sporting events, campaign contributions and expensive meals. Ney also admitted receiving tens of thousands of dollars in gambling chips from a businessman who sought his help with the State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0119779

In the continuing investigation, Ney and seven others have pleaded guilty or have been convicted, and several are cooperating as witnesses. In addition to the government's chief witness, Abramoff, they include Ney's former chief of staff, Neil G. Volz, and two other Capitol Hill staffers who once worked for former congressman Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). All three were part of Abramoff's lobbying team.

More charges are expected. Prosecutors recently notified a former deputy secretary of the interior, J. Steven Griles, that he is a target, sources familiar with the probe said.

Ney said yesterday that he regretted his actions and was sorry for disappointing his family and voters.

"I will continue to take full responsibility for my actions and battle the demons of addiction," he said, referring to the alcohol problem for which he has sought treatment.

In a letter to the judge, Matthew D. Parker, a friend and former aide, said that Ney began to drink more heavily in 2004 when he first came under federal scrutiny. "Bob was a functioning alcoholic who could rarely make it through the day without drinking and would often begin drinking beers as early as 7:30 a.m.," Parker said. But the judge rejected his plea for leniency.

"Whether or not you've served your constituents well, on some level you have seriously betrayed the public's trust and abused your power as a congressman," Huvelle told Ney. "You have a long way to go to make amends for what's happened."

Ney pleaded guilty to one count each of conspiracy and making false statements. Huvelle agreed to a request that he serve his term in a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va., where he can receive alcohol treatment. She ordered him to pay a $6,000 fine, remain on probation for two years after his release, and participate in community service.

"Today's sentence makes it clear that our government is not for sale," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said in a statement. "Former Congressman Ney now faces 30 months in prison for abusing his position of trust as a representative of the American people. The Justice Department will continue to pursue and prosecute public officials who compromise the integrity of elected office for private benefit."

The gifts Ney accepted from Abramoff included a golfing trip to Scotland and other travel that prosecutors valued at more than $170,000. In return, Ney sought to insert four amendments to benefit Abramoff's clients into a 2002 election reform bill. Ney also admitted helping another Abramoff client win a multimillion-dollar contract to provide wireless communication services to the U.S. Capitol.

The congressman twice inserted comments in the Congressional Record aimed at bolstering a bid by Abramoff to take ownership of a Florida casino company.

Along with acknowledging his dealings with Abramoff, Ney admitted accepting free air travel, luxury accommodations and thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips in 2003 from a foreign businessman who has been identified by Ney attorney Mark H. Tuohey as Fouad al-Zayat, a high-rolling London gambler. Zayat has been described in the media as an arms middleman. He sought Ney's help in getting a visa and an exemption to a U.S. law that bars the sale of airplane parts to other countries.

Ney and his staff also offered to aid Abramoff's clients in the summer of 2003 as Ney prepared for a trip to Russia. Abramoff's team got the congressman to intervene with the U.S. Consulate in Moscow to help resolve a passport issue for the daughter of an Abramoff client. Volz, then working for Abramoff, later paid for Ney's stay at a luxury hotel in Lake George, N.Y.

Huvelle is the second judge to show little sympathy for federal officials convicted in the scandal.

Earlier this month, Magistrate Judge Alan Kay issued a stiffer sentence than the one worked out by prosecutors and defense attorneys in the case of Roger G. Stillwell. An Interior Department employee, Stillwell gave Abramoff copies of internal agency documents and accepted football tickets from him. Prosecutors had sought six months of probation, but Kay extended it to two years, saying there is "no such thing as a free lunch, particularly as provided by lobbyists."

In response to what Democrats have dubbed the "culture of corruption," the House and the Senate this month passed ethics packages that would prohibit lawmakers from accepting gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists, and force them to put their names on the "earmarks" that they tuck into bills, often benefiting lobbyists' clients. Also pending is a measure that would take away congressional pensions from members convicted of corruption, but it would not be retroactive. Ney could collect up to $33,000 a year by age 62.

Ney Is Sentenced To 2½ Years In Abramoff Case (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Former Representative Bob Ney, the only member of Congress to admit guilt in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, was sentenced Friday to two and a half years in prison, longer than had been requested by the Justice Department.

Judge Ellen S. Huvelle of the Federal District Court in Washington said she had decided on her somewhat tougher sentence for Mr. Ney, an Ohio Republican, because his crimes involved a "significant and serious abuse of the public trust" over several years. The 30-month term she imposed was three months longer than prosecutors had asked.

"You have a long way to go to make amends," Judge Huvelle told the former lawmaker, citing tens of thousands of dollars' worth of luxury overseas travel and other gifts he accepted from Mr. Abramoff and the corrupt Republican lobbyist's partners in return for official favors.

Mr. Ney, who served six terms in the House before resigning in early November, will be able to keep his Congressional pension. Legislation now in Congress, similar to a bill for which he once voted that never became law, would deny pension payments to lawmakers convicted of crimes like bribery and fraud, but the measure would not apply retroactively.

The precise amount of Mr. Ney's pension cannot be independently known, because of a variety of factors, but it will not be as large as those of many senior members, given his relatively few years in office. Further, since he is only 52, he will not get any payments for at least four years.

In a brief statement to Judge Huvelle, Mr. Ney apologized Friday to his family and his former constituents and suggested that his crimes had resulted in part from alcoholism.

He said he was continuing to "battle with the demons of addiction that are within me," and requested through his lawyers that he serve his sentence at a federal prison in West Virginia that has a rehabilitation program.

The Justice Department had sought a 27-month term, the shortest possible under Judge Huvelle's interpretation of federal sentencing guidelines, because a plea bargain that Mr. Ney struck last year allowed the government to avoid a long trial. The judge could have sentenced him to as much as 33 months.

Judge Huvelle also ordered that Mr. Ney pay $6,000 in fines and that after serving his prison term, he be placed on two years' probation, during which he must abstain from alcohol.

In his plea bargain, Mr. Ney confessed that he had essentially sold his office to Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation and others. Mr. Abramoff himself pleaded guilty last year to conspiring to corrupt public officials, and the scandal surrounding him, which opinion polls suggest was a factor in the Democratic Congressional victory in last November's elections, has brought a number of officials under scrutiny.

Just last week a lawyer for J. Steven Griles, who formerly served the Bush administration as the No. 2 official at the Interior Department, confirmed that Mr. Griles had been notified that he was likely to be indicted in the Abramoff inquiry.

Ney Will Serve 30 Months In Abramoff Hill Bribery (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

Former Republican congressman Bob Ney was sentenced yesterday to 30 months in prison for providing political favors to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff in exchange for expensive trips, sports and concert tickets, and casino chips.

The six-term Ohio congressman and former chairman of the House Administration Committee apologized to his family and friends and told U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle he would continue "to battle the demons of addiction that are within me."

Judge Huvelle said Ney had betrayed the public's trust and his admitted problems with alcohol did not explain his illegal conduct.

"As a member of Congress, you had a responsibility to set an example," said Judge Huvelle, who recommended that Ney serve his time at a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va.

DOJ_NMG_0119781

Ney, 52, who pleaded guilty in October to charges of conspiracy to defraud the public, was the first member of Congress to admit peddling influence for Abramoff, now serving a five-year, 10-month sentence for fraud in the purchase of a Miami casino cruise line.

The Justice Department's investigation into suspected influence peddling on Capitol Hill is ongoing and other members of Congress are also expected to be named. Sources close to the probe told The Washington Times that Abramoff has given prosecutors incriminating information on "dozens of members of Congress and staff."

Ney had faced 10 years in prison but agreed to cooperate with the government in the investigation. He resigned from Congress on Nov. 2 after admitting he received expensive trips, sports tickets and casino chips from Abramoff in exchange for trying to win favorable legislative results.

Prosecutors said Ney improperly accepted trips to play golf, gamble or vacation in Scotland, New Orleans and New York between August 2002 and August 2003. The total cost of the trips by Ney and others exceeded $170,000, court papers said.

Ney's former chief of staff, Neil Volz, who left Ney's office in 2002 to join Abramoff's powerful Washington lobbying firm, pleaded guilty in May to being part of a conspiracy to provide Ney with the trip to Scotland and other pricey gifts from Abramoff.

Abramoff has been cooperating with Justice Department prosecutors for several months and was incarcerated in a federal institution in Maryland in the Miami case at the request of prosecutors to allow them to continue to interview him about their ongoing case.

The former Washington power broker also has pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion in connection with his lobbying activities in the nation's capital. He has yet to be sentenced on those charges, but prosecutors are recommending a prison term of nine years to 11 years and three months to run at the same time as his sentence in the Florida case.

When accusations first surfaced tying Ney to the Abramoff scandal, the Ohio congressman denied any involvement. He said at the time he "did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities."

Identified only as "Representative No. 1" in the initial Abramoff indictment, Ney received a "lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world-famous courses" and other benefits in exchange for support on various issues. The indictment said Abramoff arranged for a $50,000 check to be sent from Texas to pay for the Scotland trip.

Ney remains eligible to receive his congressional pension, said the National Taxpayers Union, which tracks pensions. It said Ney would be eligible for about $29,000 a year if he waits to draw it until 2016, when he turns 62.

Ney Gets 30 Months In Corruption Case (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — Former Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) on Friday became the second member of Congress to draw a prison term for his role in influence-peddling scandals that helped doom the GOP majority on Capitol Hill in November's election.

Ney, 52, was sentenced by a federal judge to 30 months in prison followed by two years of supervised release — during which he is to perform 200 hours of community service. He was also fined $6,000.

"You violated a host of laws that you, as a congressman, are sworn to enforce and uphold," U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle told Ney as she sentenced him.

Huvelle recommended that Ney enter a prison alcohol-rehabilitation program. Shortly after pleading guilty to the charges against him this fall, Ney acknowledged a drinking problem and checked into a rehabilitation program.

In brief remarks to the judge, Ney apologized to his family and constituents. "I will continue to take full responsibility, accept the consequence and battle the demons of addiction that are within me," he said.

Where Ney will serve and when he will report is to be determined later, but Huvelle recommended he be incarcerated at a minimum security federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va. Ney pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy to commit multiple offenses involving the use of his elected office for corrupt purposes and to making false statements to investigators.

Co-conspirators in Ney's case, all of whom pleaded guilty, included lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Ney's former chief of staff and two aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

DOJ_NMG_0119782

Ney admitted soliciting and accepting bribes from Abramoff and his lobbying staff in return for legislative actions that benefited Abramoff clients. He performed similar illegal favors for Fouad al Zayat, a Syrian-born businessman.

Among the items Ney accepted were a golfing trip to Scotland and thousands of dollars in casino gambling chips while on overseas junkets.

"Today's sentence makes it clear that our government is not for sale," said Assistant Atty. Gen. Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's criminal division.

Ney, who served six two-year House terms, will be eligible to draw a congressional pension of about $29,000 a year if he waits until he is 62 to draw it, the National Taxpayers Union estimated.

A wide-ranging ethics bill passed by the Senate on Thursday and sent to the House would deny pensions to members of Congress convicted of felonies in the future, but even if it becomes law it would not apply to Ney.

Ney is the second former House member sentenced to prison in the last year. Former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe) is serving an eight-year sentence in a separate case for bribery and tax evasion, stemming from help he provided defense contractors in obtaining lucrative federal contracts.

DeLay, once one of Washington's most powerful Republicans, and Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigned from the House last year because of ethics controversies. DeLay is fighting charges in Texas that he violated state campaign finance laws; Foley quit after revelations that over several years he made sexual overtures to congressional pages.

Ney Gets 30-Month Sentence (RC)

RollCall.com, January 19, 2007

Judge Ellen Huvelle sentenced former Ohio Rep. Bob Ney (R) to serve 30 months in prison and recommended that he be assigned to a residential alcohol substance abuse program in Morgantown, W.Va.

The judge's sentence was three months longer than recommended by prosecutors after they reached a plea agreement with Ney on charges of conspiracy and making false statements last October.

In imposing the 30-month sentence, the U.S. district judge cited Ney's four-year "abuse of the public trust" in accepting gifts and campaign contributions connected to the scandal surrounding then-lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

She said Ney would face two years of "supervised release" for each count of which he was convicted and would be required to pay a $6,000 fine during the first two years of his release.

Ney will be subjected to alcohol and drug tests during his parole and must participate in an alcohol treatment program. He must also perform 100 hours of community service during every two years he remains on parole.

A contrite Ney accepted responsibility for his crimes and hugged supporters after his sentencing.

"Moving forward, I will continue to take full responsibility for my actions and to battle the demons of addiction," he told the court. "Although my life and career have changed forever, I hope to continue my work helping and serving my community very soon."

Latest Abramoff Casualty Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison (HILL)

By By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, January 19, 2007

Ex-Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) was sentenced to 30 months in prison Friday, three months longer than the government recommendation, for his role in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle said the sentence was intended to reflect the gravity of the crimes and violation of the public trust.

"Constituents and the public trusted to you represent them," she said, adding that Ney "seriously abused" his position. Huvelle agreed to allow Ney to continue to seek treatment for alcohol addiction while he is incarcerated in Morgantown, W.Va.

Prior to hearing his sentence Ney, dressed in a gray suit and blue-and-yellow-striped tie, apologized to his constituents and his family for abusing his position as a member of Congress.

"I stand here sorrowful … I will no longer be able to serve the public," Ney said. "I hope and pray that with time our family will recover."

DOJ_NMG_0119783

Huvelle also imposed a $6,000 fine on Ney to be paid over his two-year probationary period.

A request by Ney's lawyer, Mark H. Tuohey, to extend the time period due to Ney's precarious financial situation was denied by Huvelle.

Ney pleaded guilty to charges on conspiracy and bribery in October and resigned from Congress in November.

Gifts that Ney received ranged from a trip to Scotland to thousands of dollars in gambling chips.

Sizing Up The Libby CIA-Leak Trial (WSJ)

By Nick Timiraos

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

Opening arguments in the trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the ex-chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, who is accused of lying to a grand jury in the government's leak investigation, get started next week.

The trial promises to be a high-profile event, with potential witnesses ranging from the vice president to television journalist Tim Russert. But it also represents a bizarre twist in a case that has tested the limits of laws to protect reporters and their sources and could spotlight how key players in the Bush administration defended the case for war in Iraq.

Here's a closer look at some of the issues:

What prompted the CIA-leak investigation? In 2002, the Central Intelligence Agency sent former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson to investigate claims that Iraq was seeking nuclear-weapons materials from Niger. He found no basis for the claims and said his advice was ignored. Mr. Wilson argued in an op-ed piece in the New York Times that the Bush administration had manipulated intelligence to sell the Iraq war.

Soon after, syndicated columnist Robert Novak reported that Mr. Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a Central Intelligence Agency agent and that she had arranged for him to get the job. The Justice Department assigned prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald to investigate whether Ms. Plame's identity as a covert CIA officer was blown by Mr. Novak's sources in retaliation for her husband's criticism.

Is the disclosure of an agent's identity a crime? In certain cases, yes. Under the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, investigators must prove that the agent's name was intentionally revealed by someone who knew that the agent was undercover and that the agent's identity was not previously disclosed. The law has rarely been used to prosecute anyone.

Was Mr. Libby responsible for the leak? It appears he wasn't. Prosecutors claim that Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Plame with at least three reporters. But last September, Richard Armitage, former deputy secretary of state, acknowledged publicly that he was the original source who told Mr. Novak that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Mr. Fitzgerald apparently knew that Mr. Armitage was the original source throughout his two-year investigation. Mr. Armitage was not charged with a crime because he didn't know Ms. Plame was a covert operative.

So why is Mr. Libby being prosecuted? The government claims Mr. Libby lied when he told investigators he learned of Ms. Plame's identity from Mr. Russert, Washington bureau chief of NBC News. The government alleges Mr. Libby learned of Ms. Plame's identity from his boss, the vice president.

The prosecution is expected to call the two reporters with whom Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Plame's role as a CIA agent. But because perjury cases require proof that the defendant lied on purpose, simply proving that he told a falsehood won't be enough for the government. They will try to show that Ms. Plame's role had Mr. Libby's attention with testimony from government officials who discussed the matter with the former aide.

What is Mr. Libby's defense? The defense says there was no orchestrated campaign to retaliate against Mr. Wilson. Instead, lawyers will argue that Mr. Libby got his facts wrong because he was facing weighty national security matters and didn't remember the details of every conversation that he had with every reporter.

If the vice president testifies, he may be asked about the copy of Mr. Wilson's op-ed that he gave to Mr. Libby with handwritten notes that questioned the rationale for Mr. Wilson's trip. Mr. Cheney wrote, "Do we ordinarily send people out pro bono to work for us? Or did his wife send him on a junket?"

What lasting effect could the case have on the media? The case initially alarmed press advocates because reporters were forced to reveal their sources during the investigation, fueling concerns that sources would be less willing to speak candidly with reporters in the future. But the prospect of both the prosecution and defense using reporters as key witnesses during the trial has fueled concerns that the public might see reporters as less independent, further eroding press credibility.

DOJ_NMG_0119784

What is the possible penalty? If convicted on all five counts, Mr. Libby faces a maximum fine of $1.25 million and 30 years in jail, though his sentence would likely be less because he has no criminal record. Mr. Libby's supporters, who say he is an honest man subjected to a prosecutorial witch-hunt, might lobby the president for a pardon.

Fight Averted, For Now, Over U.S. Reporter's Notes In CIA Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Defense attorneys are withdrawing, for now, their request to use NBC News reporter Andrea Mitchell's notes during the CIA leak case, heading off a potential fight leading to the trial of former White House aide I. Lewis Libby.

A federal judge said Friday that he probably would release Mitchell's notes to attorneys for Libby and scheduled a hearing on the issue Monday. Within hours, network spokeswoman Barbara Levin said the request for the notes had been withdrawn and the hearing canceled.

Mitchell's notes on her conversation with former vice presidential chief of staff Libby have been under subpoena for nearly a year, but U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton had ruled that because Mitchell was unlikely to testify at trial, her notes would not be released.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding outed CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame's identity was revealed shortly after her husband, Joseph Wilson, criticized the in a newspaper article the administration's use of false intelligence to ease the march to war in Iraq.

Attorneys for Libby, former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, said in court Friday they planned to call Mitchell as a defense witness during the perjury and obstruction trial.

Opening arguments are scheduled for Tuesday.

Walton reversed course and ordered attorneys for NBC to be in court Monday to discuss the notes. He said: "I don't see how I can deprive the defense of it."

Though the hearing was canceled, the notes remain under subpoena, and defense attorneys could raise the issue again during the four- to six-week trial.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding Plame, whose husband, former ambassador Wilson, emerged in 2003 as a vocal critic of the Bush administration's prewar intelligence use.

Libby told authorities that he learned Plame's identity from reporters, but prosecutors say Libby learned it during a series of high-level conversations about how to rebut Wilson's criticisms.

Mitchell's testimony and notes could help Libby's case by describing an atmosphere of tension and finger-pointing within the Bush administration regarding intelligence issues on Iraq. That could bolster Libby's claims about a hectic and tumultuous climate in which he could not accurately remember certain conversations.

The Libby Injustice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

Opening arguments begin next week in the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and, regardless of the verdict, it is our firm belief that this is a case that should never have been brought. While a tragedy for Mr. Libby and his family in personal terms, the case is among the most egregious examples we can recall of criminalizing political differences.

In the most important sense, this is a case without a crime. Yes, Mr. Libby is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice, which are serious offenses. But this seasoned, disciplined lawyer is accused of lying to cover up a leak he didn't commit, and which has long been proven not to have been a crime at all. One early bit of drama will be to see what motive prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald comes up with to explain why Mr. Libby would lie to the FBI and a grand jury when he had essentially nothing to hide.

All the more so because one of the mysteries of this case is Mr. Fitzgerald himself. He made his reputation as a tough prosecutor in Chicago who was nonetheless scrupulous about the law. But in this case, he knew from the very first day of his appointment in December 2003 that neither Mr. Libby nor the Vice President's office had orchestrated the leak of Valerie Plame's name to columnist Robert Novak.

He also knew -- based on earlier FBI interviews -- that the real leaker was Richard Armitage, the No. 2 man at the State Department and if anything a policy rival of Mr. Libby's inside the Bush Administration. The original theory of the case -- that the leak was a political vendetta against Ms. Plame's husband, Joe Wilson -- was thus demonstrably false from the start of his probe. The "crime," in short, had been solved.

Yet Mr. Fitzgerald has persisted for three long years, and only six weeks into his investigation sought and received an expansion of his authority in order to go after a senior administration official -- Mr. Libby -- who had had nothing to do with the leak Mr. Fitzgerald was investigating. And he pursued the case even to the extent of creating a Constitutional showdown over reporters and their sources. Why? * * *

As it happens, Messrs. Fitzgerald and Libby had crossed legal paths before. Before he joined the Bush Administration, Mr. Libby had, for a number of years in the 1980s and 1990s, been a lawyer for Marc Rich. Mr. Rich is the oil trader and financier who fled to Switzerland in 1983, just ahead of his indictment for tax-evasion by the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York. Bill Clinton pardoned Mr. Rich in 2001, and so the feds never did get their man. The pardon so infuriated Justice lawyers who had worked on the case that the Southern District promptly launched an investigation into whether the pardon had been "proper." One former prosecutor we spoke to described the Rich case as "the single most rancorous case in the history of the Southern District."

Two of the prosecutors who worked on the Rich case over the years were none other than Mr. Fitzgerald and James Comey, who while Deputy Attorney General appointed Mr. Fitzgerald to investigate the Plame leak. Mr. Fitzgerald worked in the Southern District for five years starting in 1988, at the same time that Mr. Libby was developing a legal theory of Mr. Rich's innocence in a bid to get the charges dropped. The prosecutors never did accept the argument, but Leonard Garment, who brought Mr. Libby onto the case in 1985, says that he believes Mr. Libby's legal work helped set the stage for Mr. Rich's eventual pardon.

This was all long ago, it's true. But Mr. Libby and Mr. Comey tangled more recently as well. In 2004, as Mr. Fitzgerald was gearing up his investigation, Mr. Libby was the Administration's point man in trying to get Justice to sign off on the NSA wiretapping program. In early 2004, Mr. Comey was acting Attorney General while John Ashcroft recovered from gall bladder surgery, and Mr. Comey reportedly refused to give the NSA program the greenlight, prompting the White House to seek out Mr. Ashcroft in the hospital in a bid to circumvent Mr. Comey.

Motive is a difficult thing to gauge. We don't know whether this long personal history played any role either in Mr. Fitzgerald's single-minded pursuit of Mr. Libby, or in Mr. Comey's decision to grant the prosecutor plenary power even though the central mystery of the case had already been resolved. But connecting the dots linking the three men at the heart of this case seems worth doing given the puzzling nature of this prosecution.

As for the trial itself, Mr. Fitzgerald will have to prove not only that Mr. Libby knowingly made false statements but that they served some larger purpose of obstructing justice. The evidence so far is thin. At a mega-press conference announcing his indictment, the prosecutor spoke piously about the need to indict officials who throw "sand . . . in the eyes" of the "umpire." But we know Mr. Libby had nothing to cover up, and his plausible defense will be in part that his recollections simply differed from those of the journalists he spoke with about Mr. and Mrs. Wilson.

At the same press event, Mr. Fitzgerald also made comments suggesting he bought into Joe Wilson's conspiratorial theory of the case -- remarks that now look both disingenuous and prejudicial to Mr. Libby. And this week, trial judge Reggie Walton seemed to acknowledge the extensive negative pretrial publicity about Mr. Libby by granting his lawyers their request for considerable leeway in questioning jurors during voir dire. Mr. Fitzgerald's main advantage may be a Washington, D.C., jury pool inclined to dislike anyone associated with the Bush Administration.

This case is really about a political fight over the Iraq War. In talking to reporters, Mr. Libby was doing his job and attempting to defend Administration policy against political attacks. He had no evident reason to lie to the grand jury. Once Mr. Armitage had fessed up as the leaker in October 2003, a wiser prosecutor than Mr. Fitzgerald would have realized he had entered the realm of politics and gone home.

DOJ_NMG_0119786

FBI Details Threat From Gangs In Military (CHIST)

By Frank Main, Crime Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, January 20, 2007

Says members of Illinois biker gangs in Iraq

Members of the Hells Angels, including an Army lieutenant colonel from Illinois, have served the U.S. military in Iraq. Another Iraq war veteran, a Marine who belongs to the Maniac Latin Disciples street gang, is charged with shooting three teens in Aurora.

They are examples of growing gang activity in the military, which "poses a threat to law enforcement officials and national security," according to a new FBI report obtained by the Sun-Times.

"The military enlistment of gang members could ultimately lead to the worldwide expansion of U.S.-based gangs," the report warned.

The report by the FBI's National Gang Intelligence Center said gang members sneak into the military by failing to report criminal convictions or using fake documents. Some have sealed juvenile records unavailable to recruiters. And most of the recruiters are not properly trained to recognize gang affiliation, the report said.

"Military recruiters under pressure to meet recruiting goals have engaged in criminal violations such as overly aggressive recruiting tactics and document falsification," said the report.

While gang members constitute a "fraction" of the military, the extent of the problem is difficult to gauge because the military is not required to provide the FBI with statistics on crime at military posts. Still, the FBI has documented disturbing examples of how gang members get into the military -- and the crimes they commit in the service.

In 2005, for instance, a Latin Kings member was allegedly recruited into the Army at a Brooklyn, N.Y., courthouse while awaiting trial for assaulting a New York police officer with a razor. He was reportedly instructed by the recruiter to conceal his gang affiliation, the report said.

Reportedly steal weaponsMany members of the Illinois-based Outlaw Motorcycle Gang and the Hells Angels have military experience and have been known to recruit soldiers due to their explosives and firearms experience, the report said. One of the most violent gangs -- the MS-13 -- is increasing its presence on or near U.S. military installations, the FBI said.

Some gang members use their military positions to steal weapons and other equipment.

Last year, an Army soldier who is a gang member identified 60 to 70 gang-affiliated military personnel in his unit allegedly involved in the theft and sale of military weapons and supplies, the report said. The soldier said many of them were sergeants in charge of ammunition and grenade distribution and that commanders were aware of their actions.

Training can be deadlyAnd earlier this month, two Illinois National Guard soldiers were charged with selling stolen body armor, night-vision goggles and other military equipment to undercover federal agents. A third, unnamed soldier may have intended to supply Chicago gangs with body armor he stole in Iraq, according to a conversation secretly recorded by the FBI.

Gang members in the military also are applying their battle training to the streets when they return home, the FBI warned. One Iraq veteran in California apparently relied on his Marine training in a shootout that killed a police officer and wounded another.

The Sun-Times began investigating gangs in the military last year after obtaining photos of gang graffiti on military equipment and buildings in Iraq. Some of the graffiti referred to Chicago-based gangs such as the Black Disciples and Latin Kings.

fmain@suntimes.com

Ex-FBI Agent Guilty Of Assault (PROJO)

By Katie Mulvaney, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 20, 2007

After a three-day trial in Bridgeport, Conn., a federal jury found a retired FBI special agent guilty of assaulting an officer, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

DOJ_NMG_0119787

U.S. marshals, working with the Rhode Island Sheriffs Department and Stratford, Conn., police, arrested Gary L. John after a struggle in Stratford, on Dec. 8, 2005, concluding a two-month probe into his whereabouts, according to Charles J. Wyant, of the U.S. Marshals in Rhode Island.

John, formerly of 110 Post Rd., Westerly, was wanted in Rhode Island for allegedly violating protective and no-contact orders barring him from contacting his ex-wife and for failing to appear in court. Superior Court Judge Melanie Thunberg issued a warrant for his arrest after he showed up at his ex-wife's workplace on Sept. 1, 2005, court records show.

The marshals received a tip that John was living with a woman in Stratford and supporting himself through odd jobs, such as splitting wood and driving a limousine, Wyant said.

John, 58, tried to punch a deputy marshal attempting to place him in custody, court records show. He was arrested after a struggle and charged with felony assault on a federal marshal, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Jurors in U.S. District Court in Connecticut deliberated three hours before finding John guilty on Thursday. He faces up to eight years in prison and a $250,000 fine at his sentencing before U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall on April 10, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

John has been held since his arrest after the court found that he posed a flight risk and a danger to his ex-wife and the community, said Thomas Carson, of the U.S. Attorney's office in Connecticut.

An FBI agent for 29 years, John has been in and out of jail since he separated from his wife in 2001. He has faced an array of charges, ranging from domestic disorderly conduct to repeatedly violating no-contact orders by harassing his ex-wife.

John worked as a surveillance specialist in the FBI's Boston field office until 2002.

Retired FBI Agent Convicted In Assault (CTPOST)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

Connecticut Post, January 20, 2007

BRIDGEPORT — A federal jury convicted a retired FBI agent of assaulting a deputy U.S. marshal during a Dec. 8, 2005, arrest in Stratford.

The jury took only three hours Thursday to deliberate the fate of retired FBI Special Agent Gary John before advising U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall that they had found him guilty.

John, 58, formerly of Piute Lane in Stratford's Oronoque Village, faces up to eight years in prison when he is sentenced April 10. He has been detained without bond since the arrest.

The verdict ended a two-day trial in which Deputy U.S. Marshal James Masterson accused John of failing to obey his commands and then throwing "roundhouse" punches while being placed under arrest. At the time, Rhode Island federal marshals had a warrant for John's arrest for violating a "no-contact" order obtained by his ex-wife.

Masterson, a former Milford police officer, said John repeatedly refused to show his hands, lie down on the ground and stay back after being confronted in the driveway of the home. Assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Kaplan played a sometimes frantic 911 call made by Masterson who was requesting backup at the arrest site.

John accused federal marshals of overreacting when one struck him with a metallic object and others piled on, punched him and ground his face into an ice-covered driveway.

He claimed he never punched Masterson but did reach out and grab someone's arms as he was being pushed to the ground.

John is 6 feet tall and 165 pounds, while Masterson, 37, has a muscular 5-foot, 9-inch, 200-pound frame.

John was represented by Robert Mann of Rhode Island. It is expected that he will file a civil suit claiming excessive force.

Former FBI Agent Wanted In Rhode Island Convicted Of Assault (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

UNDATED (AP) -- A former FBI agent wanted for violating restraining orders in Rhode Island is convicted of assaulting a deputy marshal.

Gary John was arrested in Stratford in 2005. Prosecutors say he tried to punch a U.S. deputy marshal during his arrest.

John formerly lived in Westerly and was wanted in Rhode Island for failing to appear in court and violating restraining orders by appearing at his ex-wife's workplace. He faces up to eight years in prison and a 250,000 dollar fine for the assault charge. A sentencing hearing is set for April tenth.

Solid Data Scarce For Child Abductions (AP)

By David Crary, Ap National Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

NEW YORK -- Few crimes rivet the public as much as the abduction of a child and yet -- unlike murder, rape or even car theft -- there are no authoritative national statistics on the offense.

Kidnapping is not among the crimes covered by the FBI's annual uniform crime reports, and the last major federal study of child abductions used data from 1999, leaving experts to only guess the trends since then even as concern mounts about a possible surge of abductions by sexual predators using the Internet.

The Justice Department says the most recent nationwide data on child abductions is National Incidence Studies of Missing, Abducted, Runaway and Throwaway Children, a report issued in 2002 and based on survey data mostly collected in 1999.

That report estimated that 58,200 children annually are victims of non-family abductions, with the vast majority held briefly for any number of reasons -- a dispute between girlfriend and boyfriend, for instance -- and returned safely, often without the filing of a police report.

The report estimated that there were 115 cases in 1999 of "stereotypical kidnappings" -- in which children were taken by non-family members for long periods, put up for ransom or killed by their abductors. In 40 percent of these cases, the child was killed.

However, the report said the actual number of stereotypical kidnappings could be anywhere from 60 to 170, and there has been no comprehensive federal effort since then to update the statistic.

University of New Hampshire sociologist David Finkelhor, a co-author of the 2002 report, believes the number of stereotypical kidnappings is stable or declining. But he remains dismayed at the lack of firm statistics to corroborate his suppositions and allay the fears of parents.

"You only have to think about a comparable situation in public health," he said. "If there were some disease killing even a few hundred kids a year, and parents were anxious, you know the Centers for Disease Control would have good statistics."

The Justice Department, using partial national statistics, estimated last year that 3,400 kidnappings of juveniles by strangers were reported to police in 2001. These would include many short-lasting abductions that did not rise to the level of the menacing "stereotypical kidnappings."

Police departments also are required to file prompt reports on any missing child, but these reports often do not provide details on whether an abduction might be involved.

Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said his organization is working with the Justice Department to develop a method for compiling annual data on missing and abducted children.

Like Finkelhor, Allen surmises that worst-case "stereotypical kidnappings" have declined in recent years, but he worries about a possible increase as more sexual predators use the Internet to contact youthful targets.

"Why we're pushing the Justice Department to provide annualized estimates is so we have the kind of data to track progress and variations from year to year," he said.

Allen expressed hope that a model of the new data-gathering system could be in place later this year.

CIVIL LAW:

High Court To Revisit Campaign Finance Law (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119789

The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to revisit the landmark 2002 legislation overhauling the nation's campaign finance laws, moving to settle the role of campaign spending by corporations, unions and special interest groups in time for the 2008 presidential primaries.

It would be the first time the court has reviewed the McCain-Feingold law of 2002 since justices ruled 5 to 4 three years ago that the act was constitutional. Since then, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was in the majority, has been replaced by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

At issue in the case is the question of whether so-called issue advocacy ads paid for by the general funds of special interest groups and broadcast in the period before a federal election may mention specific candidates. A three-judge panel in Washington last month overturned that prohibition, which is one of the key provisions of the law known formally as the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act.

"The stakes are enormous," said Michael E. Toner, a Federal Election Commission member who served on President Bush's campaign in 2000. "We're watching this case very closely."

The specific rule against naming a candidate -- 30 days before a primary and 60 days before a general election -- is one of the bright lines in the act governing the role special interest groups may play in the election and, to its supporters, one of the act's virtues.

"One of the advantages of McCain-Feingold is that it's clear," said Trevor Potter, an adviser to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the law's namesake, and president of the Campaign Legal Center.

If the justices uphold the lower-court ruling, Potter predicts additional disputes in the courts and at the FEC about when an independent group's commercial would be considered legitimate issue advocacy, and when it would be considered an attempt to influence the outcome of an election.

"You will have endless challenges to see where the line should be," he said.

But James Bopp Jr., the Indiana attorney and Republican National Committee member who brought the case on behalf of Wisconsin Right to Life, said the current prohibition cracks down on groups that are merely intending to influence lawmakers in the manner encouraged by the First Amendment.

The right to petition the government, Bopp said, should not be limited simply because it makes campaign finance laws too complicated.

"The court is perfectly capable of drawing a sensible and reasonable line between grass-roots lobbying and influencing an election," Bopp said.

The justices moved quickly to take the case, which they will hear in April, in time for a ruling by the end of the court's summer term. It will make for unusual political pairings.

The Republican National Committee has been one of the strongest critics of the law, although McCain is one of his party's leading presidential contenders and a party to the appeal of the lower court's decision. The Bush administration is defending the Federal Election Commission against the Wisconsin antiabortion group, which has been a strong supporter of the president.

And Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) is not only one of the sponsors of the law but also the subject of the ads in question.

The 2004 radio ads put out by Wisconsin Right to Life said that a group of senators in Washington was keeping Bush's judicial nominees from getting a vote in the Senate and asked listeners to tell Feingold and the state's other senator, Herb Kohl (D), not to participate. "Contact Sens. Feingold and Kohl and tell them to oppose the filibuster," the announcer said.

But because Feingold was up for reelection, the FEC said that the group could not run the ads in the closing weeks of the election.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, joined by U.S. Court of Appeals Judge David B. Sentelle, said the proper way to evaluate the ads was to look simply at what they said. They found that the ads neither endorsed nor opposed Feingold, did not mention his upcoming election and did not tell listeners whether the senator had been a part of the filibuster. They agreed with the antiabortion group's contention that the ads were "textbook" examples of issue ads.

But dissenting District Judge Richard W. Roberts said courts must view the ads in context. In this case, Wisconsin Right to Life was a longtime opponent of Feingold and had made his defeat one of its priorities. Although the language in the ad was neutral, it referred listeners to a Web site that contained highly critical reviews of the senator.

DOJ_NMG_0119790

And Roberts said there could be credence to the defendants' argument that the ads were a "sham" designed to test McCain-Feingold rather than to argue for a point of view. There were no filibusters at the time that the group wanted to run the ads, and the group could have paid for them through a political action committee, upon which the restrictions would not apply.

Richard L. Hasen, an election law expert at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said the Supreme Court challenge is "going to be a prime opportunity for opponents of campaign regulations to make some headway in watering down the standards."

He said the decision by the two-member majority of the lower court that context should not be considered in evaluating the ads is "opposite what the majority of the Supreme Court found" when upholding McCain-Feingold three years ago.

What could make the outcome different this time, he said, is "simply the replacement of Justice O'Connor with Justice Alito."

The consolidated case is Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life (06-969) and McCain v. Wisconsin Right to Life (06-970).

Justices Revisit Campaign Finance Issue (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — The Supreme Court stepped back into the debate over campaign finance regulation on Friday, announcing an expedited review of a ruling last month that substantially narrowed the application of a major provision of the McCain-Feingold federal campaign law.

At issue is a section of the 2002 statute that imposes a blackout period before elections on television advertisements that meet the law's definition of "electioneering communications" and that are paid for from the general treasuries of corporations or labor unions.

The question is how to reconcile that provision with the free-speech rights of groups that say they are engaged in grass-roots lobbying, the sort of genuine issue advertising the First Amendment protects.

The court heard the same case a year ago, shortly before Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. took his seat last January. Faced with the prospect of a 4-to-4 deadlock in the absence of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was days away from retirement and would not have been able to participate in a decision, the court then sent the case back to the lower court.

While that move postponed the court's encounter with the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act, as the McCain-Feingold law is formally known, an eventual encounter was inevitable because Congress, in passing the law, made Supreme Court review mandatory.

The plaintiff is a Wisconsin anti-abortion group that in 2004 sought to run three television commercials criticizing a Senate filibuster against President Bush's judicial nominees and urging viewers to ask the state's two senators to permit the nominations to come to a vote.

One of the senators, Russell D. Feingold, was up for re-election; the other, Herb Kohl, was not. The advertisements said nothing about voting for or against either man. Advised by the Federal Election Commission that the television spots would be barred as electioneering communications during the 60 days before the November election, the group, Wisconsin Right to Life Inc., filed a lawsuit intended to test the provision's constitutionality.

A special three-judge Federal District Court here at first turned back the challenge under the Supreme Court's ruling in 2003, which by a 5-to-4 vote upheld all major provisions of the McCain-Feingold law against a variety of challenges. But in their ruling last January, which was unanimous and unsigned, the justices said the district court had misinterpreted the 2003 decision as a blanket endorsement of the law.

The court said it had not meant to foreclose a finding that the electioneering-communication provision, which imposes a blackout 30 days before a primary and 60 days before a general election, might be found unconstitutional in particular applications.

That was a surprise to the Federal Election Commission and many election lawyers, who had regarded the constitutionality of the provision as settled. In a 2-to-1 decision issued on Dec. 21, the district court ruled that the statute's application to the Wisconsin Right to Life television spots would indeed be unconstitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0119791

Both the Federal Election Commission and several Congressional supporters of the law, including Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who was one of the chief sponsors, filed expedited appeals from that ruling. The federal agency said the district court's decision was based on a "seriously flawed" analysis that would undermine "a critical component of the campaign-finance reform that Congress enacted" and that the Supreme Court had declared to be constitutional on its face.

The election commission did suggest that the case might now be moot, a finding that the Supreme Court is free to make after it hears the argument in late April. Federal courts can retain jurisdiction over disputes that they deem moot but "capable of repetition," a plausible description of the Wisconsin Right to Life case because the group's lawyer, James Bopp Jr., has brought a number of such cases and is committed to continuing his challenge.

"Politicians should not be able to use campaign finance laws like McCain-Feingold to prohibit citizen groups from engaging in grass-roots lobbying," Mr. Bopp said.

The basic argument in the cases — Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life Inc., No. 06-969; and McCain v. Wisconsin Right to Life Inc., No. 06-970 — is over how the district court analyzed the advertisements in finding that they were genuine issue ads rather than thinly veiled campaign commercials.

The majority said that because judges "should not be in the business of trying to read any speaker's mind," courts should limit their analysis to "language within the four corners" of a commercial. Noting that the ads did not "promote, attack, support or oppose" any candidate, the court said it would accept Wisconsin Right to Life's assertion that the ads were not "intended to influence the voters' decisions" and so were not subject to the blackout period.

The dissenting judge said that the only way to separate a genuine issue ad from a "sham" was to examine the advertisement's "purpose and effect" in its full context.

Justice Alito may well be in a position to determine the outcome, or perhaps even the course of federal campaign regulation if he departs from Justice O'Connor's across-the-board support of the McCain-Feingold law. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. is not in that position, because his predecessor, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, was one of the four dissenters from the court's 2003 decision upholding the law.

Among other cases the court accepted on Friday was a challenge by two governments, those of India and Mongolia, to New York City's effort to collect property taxes on the portions of their United Nations missions that are used to house staff members.

The question in the case — Permanent Mission of India v. New York, No. 06-134 — is whether the city's suit to collect the taxes, some $18 million dating from 1981, should have been barred by sovereign immunity.

High Court To Review Campaign Finance Law (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court set the stage Friday for striking down a part of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law that bars the broadcast of corporate and union-funded ads just prior to an election.

Three years ago, the justices narrowly upheld the McCain-Feingold Act of 2002 and its rule against corporate-funded broadcast ads, which was adopted to prevent powerful interests from using their money to sway elections in the final weeks of a campaign. The now-retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor cast a deciding vote in favor of the law.

On Friday, the justices announced they would hear a free-speech challenge to the rule in April, this time before a court that is likely to be more skeptical of laws that restrict election-related spending.

Although advocates of campaign funding laws say they are trying to limit the influence of big money in politics, critics say the measures unconstitutionally restrict people and groups from voicing their political views.

The critics include Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Anthony M. Kennedy. They voted to strike down the McCain-Feingold Act as unconstitutional. If Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. join them, they will have a majority to limit or strike the rule against corporate-funded broadcast ads.

That would open the door to more special interest ads on radio and TV prior to the 2008 primary and general elections.

DOJ_NMG_0119792

For decades, corporations and unions have not been allowed to use their money to fund candidates or their campaigns. However, nothing prevents individuals, including corporate and union officers, from giving $2,000 to a candidate for federal office. They also may use their money to join with others to pay for ads for or against a candidate.

The McCain-Feingold Act specifically bans corporate and union-funded ads that mention a candidate for federal office within 30 days of the primary election or within 60 days of the general election. In upholding this rule in principle, the high court agreed with Congress that these ads are intended to influence an election, and therefore, they may be restricted because they amount to use of corporate and union money to sway an election.

But free-speech advocates have been eager to get a new challenge before the high court.

James Bopp Jr., an Indiana lawyer who represents free-speech and anti-abortion causes, brought a test case on behalf of the nonprofit Wisconsin Right to Life Inc. He proposed to run radio ads during the summer of 2004 that criticized Democratic Sens. Russell D. Feingold and Herb Kohl, both of Wisconsin, for refusing to approve all of President Bush's pending judicial nominees. Feingold, a co-sponsor of the campaign funding law, was then seeking reelection.

The Federal Election Commission said these ads would be illegal. Bopp sued, citing the 1st Amendment and arguing these ads amounted to "grassroots lobbying" of a federal office holders, not an election ad. In December, a three-judge panel in Washington agreed with Bopp and said "genuine issue ads" are protected as free speech.

Supporters of the campaign-funding law, including Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), fear that if the ruling is upheld, it would open a large loophole. Though Bopp represents a small, nonprofit group, large corporate interests could broadcast ads that fault candidates for their positions on important issues.

Bopp argues that the restrictions on campaign spending allow lawmakers to shield themselves from criticism. "Politicians should not be able to use campaign finance laws, like McCain-Feingold, to prohibit citizen groups from engaging in grass roots lobbying," he said Friday.

The justices voted to hear two appeals raising the same basic issue. They are Federal Elections Commission vs. Wisconsin Right to Life and McCain vs. Wisconsin Right to Life. The cases will be decided by late June.

High Court To Referee Campaign Finance Case (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to referee a challenge to limits on pre-election ads, a key provision of the landmark campaign finance law that the court upheld in 2003.

The justices will hear an appeal of a lower court decision that relaxed restrictions on mentioning candidates by name in issue ads run by corporations, labor unions and other special interest groups near the climax of a campaign.

The court will hear the case in April and almost certainly decide it by July, well before the first presidential voting takes place in the Iowa caucuses next January.

Issue ads are those that do not purport to influence an election, but rather focus attention on an issue their sponsors find important. A provision of the McCain-Feingold law prohibits mentioning a candidate in issue ads in the 60 days before a general election and 30 days before a primary.

Its purpose was to end the common practice of circumventing limits on contributions in federal elections by airing ads that avoided expressly advocating a vote for or against someone while making clear a preference for, or more often, disapproval of one candidate.

The Supreme Court previously said the provision complies with First Amendment guarantees of free speech. The 2-1 ruling by a special court here in December does not so much challenge the high court holding as carve out exceptions to it.

Yet if the justices were to adopt the lower court's reasoning, they would "really blow a hole" in the provision, said Richard Hasen, an election law specialist at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles.

"The purpose of the provision was to close a loophole that was allowing large amounts of corporate and union money to be spent on ads intended to influence federal elections," Mr. Hasen said. The court could reopen "that loophole for a large number of ads."

DOJ_NMG_0119793

The Supreme Court yesterday also said it will review a lower court ruling allowing New York City to sue countries that own property near the United Nations over unpaid taxes.

The city has battled over property taxes for years with countries that house their consulates and diplomatic missions in Manhattan skyscrapers.

Under U.S. treaties, embassies and other diplomatic buildings are generally tax-exempt, but the city claims some countries are refusing to pay taxes on real estate used for non-diplomatic purposes, such as restaurants and apartments.

High Court Takes "Issue Ad" Cases (CNN)

CNN.com, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Jumping into a heated free-speech dispute a year before the presidential primaries, the Supreme Court on Friday accepted a pair of appeals over a sweeping campaign-finance reform law that limits "issue ads."

Oral arguments in the cases will be held in late April, with a ruling expected by late June -- six months before the 2008 election officially kicks off with primaries and caucuses in such states as Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada.

The question for the high court is whether issue ads aired mainly on television -- and funded by businesses, labor unions, and other groups -- can be banned 60 days before a general election, and 30 days before a primary.

That restriction was a key part of the McCain-Feingold congressional bill setting strict limits on political spending and the message behind it.

The issue ads are widely used to promote particular causes such as environmental protection or tax reform, and they specifically cannot endorse or even mention any particular candidate or political party.

An anti-abortion group, Wisconsin Right to Life, had filed a lawsuit in 2004, demanding the right to air ads that urged viewers to contact their Democratic U.S. senators -- Herb Kohl and Russ Feingold -- and tell them to support President Bush's judicial nominees. Both lawmakers were running for re-election in 2004, and retained their seats.

The Supreme Court, in a series of rulings in recent years, has generally upheld the constitutionality of these campaign finance reform laws from Congress. But a federal court last month allowed the Wisconsin group's lawsuit to go forward. The justices will delve into a complicated legal dispute over the kinds of legal challenges that can be filed and heard by the courts.

The cases are FEC v. Wisconsin Right to Life (06-969) and McCain v. Wisconsin Right to Life (06-970).

In a separate case, the justices will hear oral arguments in an appeal by a staffer to Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minnesota. At issue was whether the staffer had the legal right to sue his boss over personnel policy. Federal law generally protects federal officeholders from individual lawsuits over their official duties.

The case is Office of Sen. Mark Dayton v. Hanson (06-618).

House Panel Opens Investigation Of GSA Chief's Deal With Friend (WP)

By Robert O'Harrow, Scott Higham

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee yesterday opened an investigation into a no-bid contract that the chief of the General Services Administration attempted to give to companies operated by her longtime friend.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) requested documents from GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan and others after The Washington Post reported yesterday that Doan had signed a $20,000 deal with her friend's companies for a 24-page report about the procurement agency's use of businesses owned by minorities and women.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (Iowa), the ranking GOP member of the Finance Committee, said it "is infuriating after all the problems in the past at GSA that this administrator would attempt to use tax money to give no-bid contracts to her friends."

The GSA's inspector general's office is conducting its own investigation into the arrangement between Doan and her friend, Edie Fraser, who runs Public Affairs Group Inc. and its divisions, according to sources who said they were not authorized to speak publicly about the investigation. The deal was terminated in August after agency lawyers and officials raised questions about possible procurement violations.

In three two-page letters issued to Doan, Fraser and the GSA's former general counsel, Waxman demanded an array of records, including "emails, calendars, office visitation logs, meeting notes, and other documents."

DOJ_NMG_0119794

Waxman asked Doan and Fraser for a copy of the contract and records of their communications. He asked former GSA general counsel Alan R. Swendiman for a briefing. Swendiman advised Doan to terminate the deal; he has since left the agency for a job at the White House.

The GSA issued a brief statement yesterday saying that Doan received the letter and spoke to Waxman. "As always, GSA will fully cooperate with Congress," the statement said.

In an e-mail to her staff, Doan said: "This incident has already been reviewed and no improprieties have been found."

In a statement yesterday, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said he expects the administrator of the GSA "to follow federal procurement regulations" and "possess better judgment than she has shown."

On July 25, two months after taking office, Doan signed the no-bid contract. Doan said in an interview that she "made a mistake."

Doan has had several clashes with GSA officials since taking over the agency in May. She compared the enforcement efforts of her inspector general's office to "terrorism," proposed cutting the budget of that office by $5 million and sought to curtail agency contract audits.

Doan also intervened in an effort to determine whether contractors accused of fraud should be suspended or debarred from doing business with the government. Contracting experts said in interviews that her intervention created the appearance of impropriety.

In the letters issued yesterday, Waxman demanded that Doan turn over documents related to her proposals to cut the inspector general's budget and curtail the contract audits. The letters also requested records pertaining to the debarment proceedings.

Legal Fight Resumes Over Guard's Back Pay (MR)

By Sean Reilly, Washington Bureau

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Following a congressional counterattack, lawyers are resuming a legal fight seeking back pay for National Guard members for time spent taking government-prescribed correspondence courses.

"The courts may have an entirely different view of what Congress can do in this particular situation," said Mobile lawyer Richard Dorman, part of the team representing Baldwin County resident William A. Clark and other Guard members in states ranging from North Carolina to Hawaii.

The federal lawsuit, filed in 2000, alleges that Guard members must take the courses to win promotions or even to keep their current rank.

Nonetheless, the military does not pay them for the time needed to complete the work, according to the lawsuit. Pentagon attorneys countered that Guard members could be paid only if they took correspondence courses while on active duty.

In 2003, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit in Washington, D.C., effectively sided with Clark, who is now a staff sergeant with almost 20 years of service, court papers indicate.

After added rounds of legal maneuvering, however, Congress -- apparently at the Pentagon's behest -- last year added an amendment to an annual defense bill aimed at overriding the appellate court decision.

In an unusual move, Dorman's firm, now known as Cunningham, Bounds, Crowder, Brown & Breedlove, LLC, hired a prominent Washington, D.C., lobbying shop to oppose the law change, according to a report filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

In a court filing last month, Clark's lawyers said the new provision would improperly interfere with the court's judgment, adding that the amendment "cannot properly be retroactively applied to limit this right to compensation for numerous reasons," including the U.S. Constitution's doctrine of separation of powers.

Citing the amendment, government lawyers have since asked U.S. Claims Court Judge Nancy Firestone to throw out the case. A response from the plaintiffs is due early next month. It is unclear how soon after that Firestone might rule. Dorman, who is handling the case with lawyers from two Washington, D.C., firms, is asking Firestone to certify the case as a class action.

DOJ_NMG_0119795

Approximately 400,000 past and present Guard members could be affected, with $550 million in compensation potentially at stake, he said in an interview Friday.

At the National Guard Bureau in northern Virginia, spokesman Manny Pacheco could not confirm those numbers on the case Friday.

"We would not know the ramifications of how many people it would involve until the case is obviously settled," he said, adding that the suit is being handled by the U.S. Justice Department, which customarily represents federal agencies in litigation.

Clark, who Dorman said lives in the Robertsdale area, could not be reached for comment Friday. A 2004 Press-Register article described him as a Guard musician. In 1999, he was demoted from staff sergeant to sergeant after failing to complete all of the "sub courses" required in the Basic Non-Commissioned Officer Course, the lawsuit states.

He later regained his earlier rank after successfully finishing the course "without pay," the suit states. If his side wins, he could receive at least $2,500 in compensation, his attorneys told the Press-Register three years ago.

Plaintiffs' Team Takes Hit On Asbestos (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

In the latest setback for plaintiffs' attorneys involved in large-scale asbestos litigation, an Ohio state court judge barred a California law firm from appearing in his court after finding that its lawyers had lied and obstructed the discovery process in a case involving an asbestos claim.

In a harshly worded opinion issued late Thursday, Judge Harry Hanna listed more than a dozen instances where attorneys from the Novato, Calif., law firm Brayton Purcell LLP either lied to the court, intentionally withheld key discovery materials, or distorted the degree of asbestos exposure alleged.

The ruling is one of a number in the past several years that have gone against asbestos plaintiffs, including several in Mississippi, for years regarded as a plaintiff-friendly state. Other states have erected legislative hurdles, making asbestos claims more difficult to win.

Judge Hanna's ruling stemmed from a lawsuit brought by Brayton Purcell against Lorillard Tobacco Co. on behalf of the estate of the late Harry Kananian. The suit claimed Mr. Kananian died from a type of cancer caused by asbestos contained in Kent brand cigarette filters in the late 1950s.

According to Judge Hanna's ruling, the attorneys for Mr. Kananian, who died in 2000, altered claim forms used in earlier suits, which led to inconsistent assertions as to the cause of his asbestos exposure. Mr. Kananian had previously sued and collected roughly $700,000 from other asbestos defendants.

Judge Hanna didn't dismiss the suit, however, finding that Mr. Kananian's family "did nothing improper." The judge did bar Brayton Purcell from appearing in the Ohio state court in Cuyahoga County, based in Cleveland.

Specifically, Judge Hanna signaled out Christopher Andreas, a junior partner at the firm. The judge questioned Mr. Andreas's "appearance, attitude and veracity" during a deposition in which he wore a T-shirt that read: "Killer smokes -- Kent cigarettes -- 1952-1956 -- made by Lorillard Tobacco."

An attorney for Mr. Andreas and Brayton Purcell said "none of the skirmishes were material to the substance of the case."

Lorillard said it hopes the judge's ruling "will benefit other companies that may be subject to unethical conduct in asbestos personal injury and mass tort litigation." Lorillard is an indirect subsidiary of the Loews Corp.

Lisa Rickard, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Institute for Legal Reform, said defendants should have a legal right to know when plaintiffs have alleged conflicting sources of exposure in multiple claims. "Defendants should also have a right to know how much money a plaintiff has collected from other sources for the same injury," she said.

A representative for the American Association for Justice, a trial lawyers' organization, couldn't be reached for comment.

Write to Paul Davies at paul.davies@wsj.com1

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ_NMG_0119796

San Francisco Police Are Criticized In Wake Of Fight Involving A Yale Singing Group (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 19 — Investigators from the San Francisco Police Department are expected to travel toConnecticut this weekend to interview victims of a New Year's Day street fight here that left several Yale University students injured and the department once again fending off criticism.

The investigation stems from an attack just after midnight on Jan. 1, when several members of the Baker's Dozen, an all-male a cappella group from Yale, were set upon by a group of young men. The latter were apparently envious of the attention the singers had received at a New Year's Eve party, those who gave the party say. Members of the Yale group said they were taunted with anti-gay slurs, and were later jumped and pummeled on a nearby street in the city's usually sedate Richmond neighborhood. Three members of the group were injured, including one whose jaw was broken in two places.

The police have made no arrests after detaining four suspects only briefly after the fight, a course of action that angered and confused families of the students. And that frustration has grown as almost three weeks have passed with no arrests.

"I don't have any idea why this is taking so long," said Laura Aziz, a schoolteacher in Manhattan who is the mother of Sharyar Aziz, the student whose jaw was broken. "It seems to me at this point, and from what we've heard from police, that charges would be filed."

The police have also been accused of being slow to respond because of a personality conflict with the party's hosts, a married couple — Leanna Dawydiak and Reno Rapagnani — who were members of the Police Department. (Mr. Rapagnani is a retired investigator; Ms. Dawydiak is on disability.) Ms. Dawydiak said they were not well liked in the department, in part because of accusations that they had leaked information during a previous police scandal known as Fajitagate, accusations they were cleared of.

"We were despised," said Ms. Dawydiak, who gave the New Year's Eve party for her 19-year-old daughter, Rose. "I hate to say it, but I kind of think that had an effect."

Sgt. Neville Gittens, a police spokesman, dismissed that accusation.

"We don't show up to a scene and gauge our investigation as to who a person is," Sergeant Gittens said. "That's not how we do business."

He also said that it was too early in the investigation to determine whether the attack could be characterized as a hate crime, in light of the anti-gay slurs during the attack.

Sergeant Gittens defended the department's initial response, saying that when officers arrived at the scene, a group of young men pointed out four potential suspects but then left before they themselves could be interviewed.

"People stand around and say 'those are the guys' and then leave," he said. "If people don't stick around, you can't make an arrest."

Sergeant Gittens said the chaotic scene after the fight had also complicated the investigation. There may have also been some underage drinking. Ms. Dawydiak, who was not at the party at the time of the attack, said that she and her husband hid all the alcohol in the house before the party, but that some uninvited guests — those believed to have started the fight — might have brought beer.

Whitney Leigh, a lawyer for two of the victims, said that at least two Yale students identified their assailants the night of the attack. "The police had enough information to arrest multiple individuals at the scene," Mr. Leigh said.

On Tuesday, investigators met with representatives of the San Francisco district attorney, who told the police that more evidence was needed before charges could be filed, a development that the police say is routine.

"Everyone needs to be patient and let us do what we do," Sergeant Gittens said. "Things take time."

Still, reports of the attack — and the pace of the police investigation — have buffeted the department, which has weathered several scandals in recent years, including Fajitagate, a 2002 incident involving three off-duty officers who were accused of accosting two men and using excessive force as they demanded that the men surrender a bag of fajitas.

The fajita scandal led to grand jury indictments, lawsuits and a turnover of the top command, even though the three officers initially accused in the attacks were acquitted of criminal charges.

DOJ_NMG_0119797

In 2005, the department also endured accusations of prejudice after homemade videos surfaced featuring uniformed and plainclothes officers in racially and sexually charged skits. The videos, made for a department Christmas party, led to an announcement on Nov. 30 by Chief Heather Fong that 35 officers would face disciplinary charges in front of the police commission and the police chief.

In the Yale case, the Aziz family has been particularly vocal, with Ms. Aziz and her son appearing on the Fox News Channel last week with Sean Hannity, the conservative talk show host. Mr. Hannity offered a $10,000 reward for information in the case, calling the Baker's Dozen "the national anthem singers" because the group had sung "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the party before being attacked.

On Friday, Ms. Aziz said the family was encouraged that the police were making the trip to interview her son, who has since returned to Yale, though with his jaw wired shut for the next five weeks. She said her son had not been cowed by the attack. "He's absolutely going back to everything he did before," Ms. Aziz said. "And he's still going to rehearsals with the group."

Testimony To Be Heard On Shooting By The Police (NYT)

By Al Baker

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

A Queens grand jury that will weigh evidence in the fatal police shooting of an unarmed black man on his wedding day in November will begin hearing testimony next week, lawyers involved in the case said yesterday.

Two months after the unarmed man, Sean Bell, was killed and two of his friends were wounded in a fusillade of 50 police bullets, prosecutors are expected to begin presenting evidence and calling witnesses before the panel, the lawyers said.

"My understanding is that they should begin presenting on Monday," said Michael Hardy, a lawyer who represents the woman Mr. Bell was to marry, Nicole Paultre Bell (she took his name after his death), and the two men wounded in the shooting.

The office of the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, declined to comment or answer questions about the grand jury process. "The investigation is continuing," said Meris Campbell, a spokeswoman.

Mr. Hardy, lawyers representing some of the five officers involved in the shooting and others said they expected the grand jury's work would last at least three weeks. The two men wounded in the Nov. 25 shooting, Trent Benefield and Joseph Guzman, intend to testify, said Mr. Hardy, and will most likely do so toward the end of the grand jury process.

"They are crucial witnesses," he said. "And that, obviously, will present a very significant challenge to whatever testimony is given by the officers who did the shooting, if any."

Of the officers who fired at Mr. Bell, two are black, one is black and Hispanic, and two are white.

In recent weeks, four of the five officers have given investigators for the Queens district attorney's office their version of events. The fifth, Detective Michael Oliver, who fired 31 of the shots, has not spoken to prosecutors, according to one lawyer involved in the case.

But it remained unclear yesterday if Detective Oliver planned to testify before the grand jury or speak with prosecutors, and his lawyer did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Paul P. Martin, a lawyer who represents Detective Marc Cooper, said his client would testify before the grand jury. "My client's actions were reasonable under the circumstances and justified," he said.

It is unclear if Detective Paul Headley will testify. A lawyer for another officer, the undercover detective who fired the first of the 50 shots, has said his client intended to testify. Stephen C. Worth, a lawyer for Officer Michael Carey, said he was "reserving judgment" on whether his client would testify.

Officers who face grand juries in Queens can find themselves in one of several rooms that look like college lecture halls, with seats in tiered rows. There are some grand juries that sit for a month at a time, and one that sits for six months, though each can be extended. It is unclear which type will hear the Bell case.

Editorial: A Tragedy Of Errors (WP)

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The police report on the killing of an unarmed man by a SWAT officer finds fault -- but raises too many questions.

DOJ_NMG_0119798

"OUR GOAL is to be as open and transparent as possible," Fairfax County Police Chief David M. Rohrer said last week as he released a report on the fatal police shooting a year ago of an unarmed, nonthreatening suspect. The report confesses to "gaps in decision-making guidelines" and questionable actions in what should have been a routine arrest of Salvatore J. Culosi, a 37-year-old optometrist suspected of being a sports bookmaker.

But the story still merits more explanation. In the report the police -- for the first time -- officially acknowledge the identity of the shooter: Officer Deval V. Bullock, a SWAT unit member with 17 years' experience. So why was the SWAT unit called in to help round up a man who had been taking bets from the same undercover detective for months -- and who had no criminal record? Exactly how did Officer Bullock's finger wind up on the trigger of his .45-caliber pistol, which fired a single deadly round into Mr. Culosi's chest?

Chief Rohrer's report does acknowledge what should have been obvious all along: that SWAT team power was unnecessary. Risk assessment policies have been inconsistent and are being revised, the report says. Good, because even Officer Bullock himself "was not comfortable with the original plan and challenged it prior to the briefing," the report notes.

As for the shooting, the report concludes that "based on the preponderance of the evidence," an "involuntary muscle contraction" caused Officer Bullock's finger to slip down to the trigger and fire the shot. The report says Officer Bullock's vehicle door apparently bumped his left side as he was climbing out, causing his right side to flinch involuntarily. Even if you buy this finding -- and medical experts say it can happen -- Mr. Culosi never should have been placed in a situation where this could happen.

The chief's report does not state what discipline was imposed on Officer Bullock. But what is passing for punishment so far is little more than a frown and a wink. As reported by The Post's Tom Jackman, a police internal affairs report shown to this newspaper recommended that Officer Bullock be suspended for 120 hours without pay and transferred out of the SWAT unit. On Jan. 8, sources say, the chief imposed both the suspension and the transfer. How tough is that?

The chief prosecutor in Fairfax, Robert F. Horan Jr. -- who has never prosecuted a police officer for wrongfully shooting a citizen -- remained true to the force, swiftly declining to prosecute Officer Bullock or even to refer the case to a grand jury. The Justice Department's Civil Rights Division has yet to release any results of its inquiry. So the case is not closed, nor should it be. Public confidence in the justice system still hangs in the balance.

ANTITRUST:

Plaintiffs In Microsoft Case Claim Firm Is Violating U.S. Antitrust Deal (AP)

By David Pitt, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 20, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa — The plaintiffs in Iowa's class-action antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp. claim they have uncovered information that indicates the software company is violating its 2002 agreement with the Justice Department.

The alleged misconduct surrounds Microsoft's duty to share software hooks known as application programming interfaces, or APIs, which let disparate programs work together. The Iowa plaintiffs' attorneys have alleged that Microsoft has not disclosed certain APIs to other software developers who want to make programs compatible with Microsoft software.

Plaintiffs' attorney Roxanne Conlin asked the judge in the Iowa case, Scott Rosenberg, for permission to tell the Justice Department and the Iowa attorney general what her side knows. Rosenberg responded that she could provide the information if a court order or a subpoena is issued for it.

The API issue also has landed Microsoft into trouble with the European Commission, which imposed a fine of 3 million euros ($3.9 million) a day last July for failure to provide proper software documentation. In response, the company provided 8,500 pages of documentation in November.

Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said he doubted the Iowa case had turned up any information that would surprise the federal government and its independent experts who monitor the 2002 antitrust settlement. Microsoft must appear before a federal judge quarterly on the matter, and at the most recent hearing, in December, the judge said Microsoft was complying.

The Justice Department declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0119799

Conlin represents thousands of Iowans who purchased Microsoft software between 1994 and 2006. They claim that the company engaged in anticompetitive conduct that caused customers to pay at least $300 million more for software than they would have if there had been competition.

Microsoft denies the allegations, and its attorneys said they'll show Iowa customers received quality products at a fair price.

Microsoft Eyed Apple In '03 (BLOOM)

By Dina Bass And Bob Van Voris, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

Software maker considered partnership, or creating player to rival iPod

Microsoft Corp., the world's largest software maker, considered as early as 2003 working with Apple Inc. or creating its own digital music player to rival Apple's dominant iPod.

Microsoft, displeased with hardware partners Creative Technology Ltd. and Dell Inc., which made players using Microsoft's Windows Media software, talked about building its own device, according to an e-mail exchange between Windows chief Jim Allchin and media software executive Amir Majidimehr. The correspondence, which was introduced into evidence in a civil antitrust trial against Microsoft in Des Moines, Iowa, was made public Friday.

Allchin, who started the exchange in an e-mail titled "sucking on media players," also suggested that he talk to Apple Chief Executive Steve Jobs to get the iPod to work with Microsoft's media software for fear the iPod would "drive people away from Windows Media Player." Microsoft introduced its music player, Zune, in November.

"My goodness it's terrible," Allchin wrote about one of Creative's devices. "What I don't understand is though is I was told the new Creative Labs device would be comparable to Apple. That is so not the case."

Majidimehr replied, "Now you feel our pain." He said Microsoft was providing cash incentives to get the partners to improve devices. If that doesn't work "it is time for us to roll up our sleeves and do our own hardware," he wrote.

Microsoft had been working with partners on music devices for at least a year before Apple introduced the iPod in 2001 and catapulted to a dominant position in the market. Microsoft and its partners failed to come up with compelling hardware and had difficulty getting software to properly connect music collections on computers with their devices.

In July, Microsoft announced that it would change course and sell its own device, software and music service under the brand Zune. A spokesman for Microsoft's digital media group declined to comment.

Microsoft sold "hundreds of thousands" of Zune devices during Christmas, according to Entertainment and Devices Division President Robbie Bach. Apple sold 21.1 million iPods last quarter.

Microsoft is defending itself in a private antitrust class action in Iowa that began in December. In the trial, a statewide class of consumers claims that Microsoft used its monopoly position in computer operating systems and software applications to overcharge for its software, including Windows, Word and Excel. The consumers claim $329 million in damages since 1994. That amount may be tripled under Iowa law.

Earlier this week, the trial judge gave permission for plaintiffs' lawyers to tell the Justice Department that they believe Microsoft violated a 2002 court order in the U.S. government's antitrust suit against the company. The lawyers say Microsoft hasn't disclosed certain application programming interfaces to other software developers who want to make programs compatible with Microsoft software.

The e-mails mark the second set of conversations exhibited in the trial in which Allchin, a 16-year Microsoft veteran, expresses concern about competition with Apple products. In a 2004 e-mail to Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer, made public during opening statements in December, Allchin criticized Windows and said "I would buy a Mac today if I was not working at Microsoft."

At the time, Allchin was leading development of Longhorn, the code name for Windows Vista, which reaches stores Jan. 30.

Allchin, who is retiring after Vista is released, referred to Longhorn as "a pig" and said "we have lost our way."

This report includes information from The Associated Press.

Esmark To Buy West Virginia Tin-plate Plant (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

Arcelor Mittal, the world's largest steel company, has agreed to sell its tin-plate plant in Weirton, W.Va., to Chicago Heights-based Esmark Inc. to satisfy U.S. antitrust concerns.

Esmark signed a memorandum of understanding to acquire the plant, Esmark Chief Financial Officer Craig Bouchard said Friday. The agreement is contingent on approval by the Justice Department, he said. Terms weren't disclosed.

Esmark "has entered into a memorandum of understanding with Mittal Steel to purchase the hot-strip mill and tin-finishing operations of Mittal's Weirton plant," Bouchard said. "We are working on finalizing the asset purchase agreement by Feb. 2."

The company's interest in Weirton increased after it acquired the steelworks of nearby Wheeling, W.Va.-based Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp. through a reverse takeover in November. Excluded from the deal with Arcelor Mittal are a Weirton blast furnace, caster and basic oxygen furnace, Bouchard said.

The steel- and iron-making facilities at Weirton have been idled since June 2005 .

Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union at the Weirton plant, says the facility is still "ready and able to make quality steel."

A clause in its labor contract gives the union veto power over a sale of the facility, Glyptis said.

William Steers, a Chicago-based spokesman with Arcelor Mittal, couldn't be reached.

The Justice Department demanded Arcelor Mittal sell some assets to preserve competition in the tin-plate market in the Eastern U.S. Arcelor Mittal is the world's largest maker of tin plate, a type of steel coated with tin that is used mostly in packaging such as cans.

Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman with the Justice Department, said the matter is "still under review" and declined to comment further.

Should the government approve the sale of the Weirton plant and the company completes arrangements with the union, a definitive agreement with Esmark would be reached no later than Feb. 2, Bouchard said.

Mittal originally had planned to satisfy U.S. antitrust concerns by selling a plant belonging to Dofasco, Canada's biggest steelmaker, which was acquired by Arcelor SA last March for $5.2 billion. Mittal completed its $38.3 billion takeover of Arcelor in November.

But after the original deal fell through, the Justice Department demanded that Mittal Arcelor sell Weirton or the Sparrows Point plant in Maryland.

Steelmaking Neighbors Eye Partial Merger (PPG)

By Len Boselovic, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 20, 2007

Required divestiture may put Weirton's rolling mills in Wheeling-Pitt's hands

Combining the Ohio Valley's two steel producers, long a topic of speculation in the small industrial towns along the river, took on renewed urgency yesterday when the Chicago-area steel distributor that wants to merge with Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel confirmed it expects to acquire portions of the former operations of Weirton Steel.

Esmark said it has a memorandum of understanding with Arcelor Mittal, the world's largest steel producer and owner of the Weirton mill. U.S. antitrust regulators are requiring Arcelor Mittal to divest one of its North American mills as a condition of Mittal's acquisition of Arcelor last year.

Esmark gained control of Wheeling-Pitt in November, when the steel distributor's shareholders elected its slate of directors over the incumbent board, led by former Chairman and Chief Executive Officer James G. Bradley. The successful proxy fight set the stage for a vote by Wheeling-Pitt shareholders on merging with Esmark.

Esmark's shopping list includes the Weirton mills that roll steel slabs into sheet steel and coat it to make food cans and other products, but not the blast furnaces and other equipment used to produce the slabs. The company expects to sign a definitive agreement with Arcelor Mittal by Feb. 2.

DOJ_NMG_0119801

That doesn't sit well with the leader of the union representing Weirton's workers. Independent Steelworkers Union President Mark Glyptis wants the steelmaking end of his plant to be included in any sale, saying it would put about 300 more workers on the payroll. He said steel executive Mitch Hecht is interested in acquiring the whole operation.

The ISU's labor agreement with Arcelor Mittal gives it the power to veto any sale of Weirton, Mr. Glyptis said.

Esmark would have to negotiate a contract with his union and so far talks have been mostly limited to brief telephone conversations.

"There have not been any meaningful, sit-down negotiations," Mr. Glyptis said.

Any contract with the ISU would affect the jobs of Wheeling-Pitt workers, who are represented by the United Steelworkers of America and operate the same kind of equipment Esmark hopes to acquire at Weirton. One of the stumbling blocks in past efforts to merge the two companies has been whether both of the unions would survive.

Those previous initiatives, including talks in 1999 when the industry was entering a severe depression that ultimately bankrupted both Weirton and Wheeling-Pitt, drew mixed reviews. Some thought combining two of the industry's weakest players would produce a stronger competitor, while longtime industry analyst Charles Bradford compared it to two garbage trucks colliding.

A Wheeling-Pitt/Weirton merger makes sense to James P. Bouchard, Esmark's chairman and chief executive officer.

"We are excited about the opportunities presented by the potential combination of three businesses," he said.

Wheeling-Pitt emerged from bankruptcy in 2003, the same year Weirton sought bankruptcy protection. Weirton was acquired a year later by International Steel Group, a Cleveland company cobbled together from the carcasses of Bethlehem Steel, LTV Steel and other bankrupt producers. Mittal acquired ISG in 2005 and subsequently shut down Weirton's steelmaking facilities. It continues to process steel sheet at the plant and employs about 1,275, Mr. Glyptis said.

Wheeling-Pitt employs about 3,100 at plants in Ohio, West Virginia and Allenport, Pa.

Any sale would have to be approved by the U.S. Department of Justice. The agency has given Mittal until Jan. 28 to sell Dofasco, its Canadian arm. That would take care of antitrust concerns. However, Arcelor put Dofasco into a trust before it was swallowed by Mittal. The trust prevents Arcelor Mittal from divesting the Canadian producer.

Unless the trust is broken, Mittal must sell either Weirton or its Sparrows Point plant near Baltimore, formerly operated by Bethlehem.

(Len Boselovic can be reached at lboselovic@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1941.)

Case Could Kill Mill (BRADV)

By Gary Perilloux, Advocate business writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 20, 2007

Antitrust remedy might make La. steel plant moot

A U.S. Justice Department case could kill a German steelmaker's desire to build a $3 billion mill in Louisiana.

Or it could open the door for St. James Parish to score a 3,000-job coup in Convent. Alabama and Arkansas also are vying for the steel mill.

Louisiana's chances of wooing ThyssenKrupp, amid a consolidating steel industry, may rest heavily with a Washington, D.C., federal court that's a week away from a key antitrust milestone.

After the world's two largest steel companies — Luxembourg-based Arcelor and Mittal Steel of The Netherlands — complete a merger this spring, a concentration of 84 percent of the tin production in the Eastern United States would result.

Here's why that matters to Louisiana: To break up the perceived tin monopoly, the Justice Department wants Arcelor Mittal to sell Canada's largest steelmaker, Dofasco, to ThyssenKrupp for $4.6 billion.

Should that happen, ThyssenKrupp would gain 3.9 million tons of annual steel production as it brings on line a 5-million ton Brazilian slab mill in 2009. The Canadian output is about what the proposed steel mill on the Gulf Coast would produce.

But if ThyssenKrupp doesn't acquire Dofasco, it likely would build the Gulf Coast mill to handle 3 million tons of the annual raw steel product from Brazil, with 2 million tons going to Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0119802

ThyssenKrupp's final public comments on the Gulf Coast project came in November. The company didn't return numerous messages left by The Advocate. And Louisiana economic development officials are remaining mum on the deal, citing confidentiality agreements.

Charles Bradford, a New York-based steel industry analyst, said the Gulf Coast mill is far from a sure thing even should the Dofasco deal fall through.

"It's not necessary they do the thing on the coast," he said, citing the high expense of the $3 billion project. "That's really hard to swallow. It wouldn't take much more to buy U.S. Steel."

Such a bid would cost about $12 billion, Bradford said, but could be reduced to $8 billion by selling off central Europe operations and $4 billion to $5 billion by selling off piping and tubing divisions.

The Justice Department isn't commenting on the antitrust case but its last public statement in November listed a strong preference that Arcelor Mittal divest Dofasco rather than two alternatives: selling plants in West Virginia or Maryland.

The explanation is simple, Bradford said: Dofasco is much more likely to thrive as a separate entity than the West Virginia or Maryland mills.

Constance Robinson of the Washington, D.C., law firm Kilpatrick Stockton agrees.

"In general, the Justice Department will strive to get a divestiture that cures the competitive harm they've identified," said Robinson, who worked 27 years as an antitrust attorney for the department until 2003. "They're looking for somebody who will be a long-term player, competitively."

But the most-baffling part of the case is Arcelor Mittal might not be able to accomplish what the Justice Department wants. In early 2006, when Arcelor was still attempting to thwart a Mittal buyout, it placed control of Dofasco's stock in a Dutch foundation controlled by three board members, two of them with strong Arcelor ties.

State Is Reviewing Deal For Hoover (COLDISP)

By James Nash, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, January 20, 2007

Attorney general raises antitrust issues in sale to rival company in Hong Kong

Ohio Attorney General Marc Dann is looking into antitrust concerns that have arisen based on a Hong Kong company's planned purchase of the North Canton-based Hoover vacuum-cleaner company.

Dann, a Democrat who led the antitrust division of the West Virginia attorney general's office earlier in his career, is investigating whether Techtronic Industries Co. Ltd. legally can purchase Hoover, which employs about 1,000 Ohio workers.

Techtronic manufactures the Dirt Devil, Regina, Royal and Vax brands of floor cleaners.

Dann's office had not filed an antitrust claim as of yesterday, said Edgar Simpson, the attorney general's administration and policy chief.

"The idea is to get some information to see if there's an impact on the competitive marketplace," Simpson said. "We have a feeling that we need to look at this pretty quickly. It is an Ohio company, and we feel that we have standing to do this."

The Federal Trade Commission and U.S. Justice Department also have regulatory oversight of the acquisition, but Simpson said Dann thinks that his office also should look at the deal.

In a Dec. 7 news release announcing the $107 million purchase of Hoover, Techtronic said the deal is scheduled to close by the end of the summer but could be final as early as March.

Hoover is a division of Whirlpool Corp., based in Benton Harbor, Mich.

A Whirlpool spokeswoman did not return a call for comment yesterday.

Techtronic has not announced whether it plans to keep Hoover's manufacturing jobs in Ohio.

The purchase has raised concerns that the company might shift the manufacturing operations to an Asian country with lower labor costs.

Hoover's Ohio roots go back to 1875, when the family settled in North Canton.

The company began manufacturing vacuum cleaners in 1908.

jnash@dispatch.com

Caremark Shareholders Get Their Say (TENN)

By Todd Pack, Staff Writer

Nashville Tennessean, January 20, 2007

CVS merger vote to be next month

CVS Corp. and Caremark Rx Inc. said Friday that the Securities and Exchange Commission has given the go-ahead for them to take their proposed "merger of equals" to a vote of shareholders next month even as a third company pushes its rival bid.

Caremark shareholders will vote on the CVS deal at a special meeting Feb. 20 at 8:30 a.m. at the Hilton Nashville Downtown.

CVS shareholders will vote at a special meeting Feb. 23 at the drugstore chain's headquarters in Woonsocket, R.I.

"We are very pleased that we have received clearance from the SEC to move forward with our shareholder vote next month. We remain on track to close our merger with Caremark by the end of February," Tom Ryan, CVS' chairman, president and CEO, said in a statement.

"We look forward to our respective shareholder meetings and to closing our strategic merger of equals with CVS," said Mac Crawford, Caremark's chairman, president and CEO.

CVS, the United States' secondlargest drugstore chain in sales, announced plans to merge with Caremark, the second-largest pharmacy benefits manager, or PBM, on Nov. 1.

Based on Friday's closing price, CVS' offer was worth almost $24.6 billion, or $57.58 a share including a special $2-per-share cash dividend that the combined firm would pay Caremark shareholders after the deal closes.

Hostile bid from St. Louis

Express Scripts Inc., the nation's third-largest PBM, made a hostile bid to buy Caremark on Dec. 18. Caremark's board of directors rejected it earlier this month, but Express is hoping Caremark's shareholders will overrule their own board.

The Express offer still faces several hurdles, including a federal antitrust review tied to concerns about the market share a combined Express-Caremark would have.

The initial Express offer was much higher than CVS', but that difference has narrowed in recent days with fluctuations in stock prices. Based on Friday's closing prices, its offer was worth $24.6 billion, or $57.69 a share — only 11 cents higher than CVS' bid with the $2 dividend included.

In a statement, Express Scripts said it "has made a superior proposal to acquire Caremark. We urge Caremark stockholders to vote down the CVS acquisition."

Tribune Board Panel To Meet On Auction (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

A special committee of Tribune Co.'s board overseeing an auction of the company is to meet with its advisers Saturday, three days after receiving three proposals, according to people familiar with the situation. The full board is also expected to meet, possibly to vote on the recommendation of the special committee. A Tribune spokesman declined to comment on the schedule.

None of the proposals offers what Tribune is looking for: a premium for the entire company, which owns newspapers such as the Los Angeles Times and TV stations.

It is unlikely that the special committee will recommend any of the offers in their current form, said a person familiar with the situation. The committee is likely to try to negotiate better terms on each of the offers, or might reject them out of hand. The company may decide to spin off its TV stations or take on added debt to fund a dividend on its own.

Meanwhile, Tribune is negotiating with Gannett Co. to sell two of its papers in Connecticut, the Stamford Advocate and Greenwich Time.

Patent Trial Near, Bristol-Myers Counts On Resilience (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

LAWRENCEVILLE, N.J., Jan. 19 — Bristol-Myers Squibb staggered, but the drug maker has remained on its feet.

DOJ_NMG_0119804

That is the view of the company's interim chief executive, James M. Cornelius, who on Friday compared the company's struggle with a generic competitor to a boxing competition.

"A less resilient, less solid management and employee base would have crumbled under a billion-dollar hit," Mr. Cornelius said during an interview at a company office here. "We took a body blow, but we didn't go down for the count."

Mr. Cornelius said the damage from last summer's market onslaught by a generic copy of Bristol-Myers's blockbuster drug Plavix, a blood thinner, would exceed $1 billion, but the company had "more or less" already made up the money.

The financial details of that comeback, he said, will be revealed next Thursday when the company releases its fourth-quarter results.

The blow was dealt last summer by the Canadian company Apotex, which sold its Plavix imitator for only three weeks in August, before a federal judge ordered a halt. But during that period an estimated six-month supply of generic Plavix flooded the United States market.

The episode followed bungled efforts to settle a patent dispute with Apotex. And it eventually cost the Bristol-Myers chief executive at the time, Peter R. Dolan, his job.

Apotex has hardly gone away, though. Even as Mr. Cornelius expressed optimism yesterday about the company's future, lawyers were making final preparations to begin a trial Monday in federal court in Manhattan. There, Bristol-Myers and its marketing partner, the French company Sanofi-Aventis, will defend the Plavix patent against the Apotex challenge.

The trial's outcome will be critical for Bristol-Myers, which derives nearly a third of its revenue from Plavix. The drug's 2005 sales in this country were $3.8 billion and its use is growing. Worldwide sales of Plavix exceeded $6 billion in 2005, making it the second-largest drug, behind Lipitor from Pfizer.

In a four-week trial where much of the testimony is expected to involve scientific minutiae, Bristol-Myers and Sanofi will be asking Judge Sidney H. Stein to uphold their Plavix patent.

"Starting Monday is an important historic event for this company," Mr. Cornelius said, adding that the company was so optimistic about its chances of winning the case that it is proceeding to break ground on a $750 million biologic drug plant in Devens, Mass.

Bristol-Myers plans to give more details of its 2006 performance, including how it has compensated for the lost Plavix sales, on Thursday. The company has been predicting that earnings for the year will wind up at 97 cents a share.

"I don't think we're going to disappoint anybody," said Mr. Cornelius, who is in some ways Bristol-Myers' accidental chief executive.

Nearly a year ago, after a long career at the drug maker Eli Lilly and then a stint as chairman and interim chief executive of the device maker Guidant, Mr. Cornelius thought he had engineered an early retirement from the pressured environment of big corporations.

After closing the $27 billion sale of Guidant to Boston Scientific, following an exhaustive takeover battle with Johnson & Johnson, Mr. Cornelius had planned to settle into a new life dominated by charity volunteering, long stretches at his second home in Maui and avid support for the Indianapolis Colts.

An Indianapolis resident, he owns Colts season tickets on the 42-yard line.

But Mr. Cornelius, who is 63, said he "parachuted in, a somewhat reluctant volunteer" to take the reins of Bristol-Myers in September after Mr. Dolan's ouster. Mr. Cornelius had served on the Bristol-Myers Squibb board.

Since then, the company's board has continued a search for a permanent replacement for Mr. Dolan — Mr. Cornelius said he was not interested in the job — and also has been exploring a sale or merger of the $52 billion company.

Even as the patent trial begins, the company is the target of a federal investigation focusing on whether it violated federal antitrust laws in its attempt earlier last year to settle the litigation with Apotex.

When those settlement talks unraveled, Apotex flooded the United States market with its generic version of the drug before Judge Stein ordered distribution to stop, ruling that it was likely that the Plavix patent would be upheld.

Despite the judge's ruling, Apotex had already shipped enough of its version of the drug that prescriptions for Plavix plunged 32 percent in the third quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0119805

The stock took a hit, too. Bristol-Myers shares, which had traded at nearly $26 in July, fell to just above $20 in August. The stock has since recovered, closing Friday at $26.63 — a level that Mr. Cornelius said was partly a result of the company's strong pipeline of new products.

Mr. Cornelius said yesterday that the market for blood thinners was still working through the remaining inventory of Apotex's drug, clopidogrel bisulfate, but that more than half of prescriptions were now being filled with the Bristol-Myers product, and its share was growing steadily.

The trial also comes at an important time for United States patent law, in which courts lately have generally favored innovator companies. Meanwhile, a Supreme Court ruling is expected this year on a patent case, KSR International v. Teleflex Inc., involving automotive gas pedals.

The key issue in that case — the question of what constitutes an "obvious" and, hence, invalid patent — could have a bearing on the Plavix patent.

Among other arguments, Apotex has claimed that the formula for Plavix would have been obvious to a scientist, based on an older patent that expired in 2003. Judge Stein had rejected that argument during preliminary proceedings.

"If KSR raises the bar for nonobviousness, Judge Stein may need to rethink his conclusion that the Plavix patent is not obvious," said C. Scott Hemphill, an associate professor of law at Columbia University.

Mr. Cornelius said the company had other options if Apotex won the Plavix case. "If we lose we have a backup plan that changes the nature of everything we do, but we don't plan on losing," he said.

Instead, he said, he sees 2007 as the beginning of a new era for the company, which recently signed a $1.35 billion deal with AstraZeneca to jointly develop two diabetes compounds. The company is also entertaining the idea of finding partners for some of its other products in the development pipeline, he said.

"When I first joined Eli Lilly, everybody said, 'I hope Lilly can someday be like Bristol-Myers Squibb,' " Mr. Cornelius said, acknowledging that Bristol-Myers was no longer the industry role model. "I'd like to get it back there. That's the target — '07 is going to be the beginning of that."

Suit By Record Companies Against XM Going To Trial (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press

AP, January 20, 2007

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 -- A lawsuit in which record companies allege XM Satellite Radio Holdings is cheating them by letting consumers store songs can proceed toward trial, a judge ruled Friday after finding merit to the companies' claims.

U.S. District Judge Deborah A. Batts made the finding in a case brought by Atlantic Recording, BMG Music, Capitol Records and other music distribution companies against the licensed satellite radio broadcaster.

In a lawsuit last year, the companies said XM directly infringes on their exclusive distribution rights by letting consumers record songs onto special receivers marketed as "XM + MP3" players.

XM has argued it is protected from infringement lawsuits by the Audio Home Recording Act of 1992, which permits individuals to record music off the radio for private use. The judge said she did not believe the company was protected in this instance by the act.

In a statement, XM said it remains confident that the lawsuit is without merit and it would prevail.

"At this stage of the proceeding, the court's ruling is required to be based on the false characterizations set forth in the plaintiffs' complaint. The real facts strongly support our view that the lawsuit is barred by the Audio Home Recording Act. We look forward to making our case in court," XM said.

Messages for comment left with lawyers on both sides were not immediately returned.

In refusing to toss out the lawsuit, the judge noted that the record companies consent to XM's use of their copyrighted material solely for the purposes of providing a digital satellite broadcasting service.

She said XM operates like traditional radio broadcast providers that cannot offer an interactive service, publish programming schedules prior to broadcast and play songs from an artist more often than specified within a three-hour period.

DOJ_NMG_0119806

But by broadcasting and storing copyrighted music for later recording by the consumer, the judge said, XM is both a broadcaster and a distributor, yet only paying to be a broadcaster.

"The record companies sufficiently allege that serving as a music distributor to XM + MP3 users gives XM added commercial benefit as a satellite radio broadcaster," Batts said.

Although XM argued in court papers that an XM + MP3 player is much like a traditional radio-cassette player, the judge said "it is not."

"It is manifestly apparent that the use of a radio-cassette player to record songs played over free radio does not threaten the market for copyrighted works as does the use of a recorder which stores songs from private radio broadcasts on a subscription fee basis," she said.

XM shares fell 73 cents, or 4.4 percent, to $15.72 on Friday.

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Orders Review Of Salamander Status (FINDLAW/AP)

By Terence Chea, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A federal judge on Friday ruled that the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service illegally rejected a petition by environmentalists to give protected status to two salamander species that live in old-growth forests in California and Oregon.

U.S. District Judge William Alsup ordered the agency to consider listing the Siskiyou Mountains and Scott Bar salamanders as threatened or endangered species.

The San Francisco-based judge said the service's decision last year to deny the petition was "arbitrary and capricious." Alsup gave the agency until March 23 to decide whether to conduct a more in-depth analysis of the salamanders' status.

If the two species are granted protected status, the U.S. Forest Service would be required to make sure that logging operations do not harm the salamanders or their habitat.

Both salamanders are about five inches long, colored black with speckles, and have no lungs, instead breathing through their skin. They live on rocky slopes under the canopy of old-growth trees in the Siskiyou Mountains and Klamath River basin in northern California and southern Oregon.

The Fish and Wildlife Service will comply with Judge Alsup's order, said agency spokeswoman Alexandra Pitts.

Environmentalists who filed the original petition in April 2004 were pleased with Friday's decision.

"We're delighted that they're going to be considered for protection," said Noah Greenwald, a biologist with the Center for Biological Diversity, one of five environmental groups that sued the service.

Minerals Chief Defends Response To Lease Problem (BILLGAZ)

By Noelle Straub, Gazette Washington Bureau

Billings Gazette, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON - Minerals Management Service Director Johnnie Burton defended herself Friday against charges by some lawmakers that she should have acted earlier upon hearing of a mistake in oil and gas drilling leases that could cost the government billions of dollars.

Deep-water leases signed in 1998 and 1999 during the Clinton administration omitted a clause triggering royalty payments if energy prices rose over a certain amount. Officials say they raised the matter with Burton in early 2004, although she does not remember it, a report by the Interior Department's inspector general found.

"I am now being held responsible for not remembering a passing mention of an issue in 2004, and for not doing anything to remedy a mistake made by the Clinton administration when, in fact, I wrote every company in June 2006 asking them if we could agree to an amendment to their leases," Burton wrote in a letter to the editor of the Casper (Wyo.) Star-Tribune.

"Unfortunately, only six of them agreed to an amendment," she added. "I cannot force anyone to change a valid lease signed by a representative of the U.S. government eight years after the fact, or had I acted in 2004, five years after the fact."

DOJ_NMG_0119807

The error in the leases has cost the government about $1 billion in revenue and if not fixed could cost $10 billion.

The inspector general found that MMS officials made a conscious decision to omit the language from the leases, but that the choice was simply a mistake and was not malicious. Officials decided to leave out the language in the mistaken belief that another regulation, the Royalty Relief Act, automatically covered it.

Burton testified before a House committee in September that she first learned about the issue in late 2005 or early 2006. But a former associate director said he was sure he had briefed Burton on the issue in early 2004, the inspector general's report said. Burton said that if she was informed then, she "may have simply dismissed the fact as a nonissue since she knew the application of price thresholds was discretionary," the report said. "She said she did not remember putting a great deal of thought into the matter," the report said. "She speculated that she was probably told of the mistake in conjunction with being informed that (the solicitor's office) had opined that nothing could be legally done to remedy the issue."

Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., asked why Burton wasn't moved to another position, given those findings. Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calif., who sits on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, suggested Burton should resign if she learned of the problems earlier than she told Congress. Issa last year chaired the subcommittee that investigated the leases and heard Burton's testimony.

Burton was appointed director in 2002. She noted that the problem was first discovered in 2000, the last year of the Clinton administration, but nothing was done about it at the time.

In 2000, some energy companies brought the matter to the attention of lower-level MMS employees in the Gulf of Mexico region and asked for clarification. But those employees for some reason did not report the matter to any higher-ups, the inspector general found. In 2004, when oil prices rose steeply, the issue came up again at the agency.

Some "casual discussions" took place then, but centered only on the fact that the solicitor's office had already made a decision on the issue and nothing could be done, Inspector General Earl Devaney said at a Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee hearing.

A more substantial discussion involving higher-ups or even the Justice Department should have taken place but did not, he said.

Addressing what happened in 2004, Burton said some companies asked the administrator of the offshore program and his staff whether royalties were due on the leases.

"The staff asked the department's attorneys for advice," Burton said. "The advice was clear: the leases did not require payment until the royalty-free volume had been produced, market price notwithstanding. The leases were valid; there was no legal question."

"Apparently the administrator of the program told his staff in an e-mail that he had advised me of this issue in 2004," she added. "There is no e-mail from me or to me on this issue. I absolutely do not remember this being mentioned to me at that time."

After being told about the issue in late 2005 or early 2006, Burton asked the inspector general in March of 2006 to investigate.

"The inspector general concluded there was a bureaucratic mistake omitting the thresholds and in the process told me there were e-mails that implied someone mentioned the issue to me in 2004," Burton said. "I stated I did not remember."

Burton said she is "gratified by the kind comments" of Wyoming members of Congress on her behalf. Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., strongly defended Burton at the Senate hearing, saying she has done a "great job" and didn't deserve the criticism.

He faulted the inspector general's report for the focus on Burton. Thomas wondered why the report didn't use such harsh language about the Clinton administration officials who made the blunder as it did about current officials.

The report said the mishandling of the leases stemmed from a "jaw-dropping example of bureaucratic bungling" and a "shockingly cavalier management approach." Asked about those phrases by Thomas, Devaney said he was not referring to Burton but rather to actions by MMS officials both in 2000 and 2004.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Chief Likes New Facility (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

Mueller calls the L.A. area's Joint Regional Intelligence Center, opened last summer to help fight terrorism, a model for federal and local cooperation.

The Los Angeles area's new counter-terrorism center drew high marks Friday from FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, who toured the high-tech facility in Norwalk and pronounced it a model for federal and local cooperation.

The Joint Regional Intelligence Center opened six months ago as a co-venture of the FBI, Los Angeles Police Department, Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department and other local law enforcement agencies as a hub for information gathering, analysis and sharing.

With 30 similar centers having opened or in the works in other parts of the country, Mueller said the use of cutting-edge technology and intelligence sharing by police officers on the streets of Southern California sets a good example and gives him confidence about efforts to head off terrorism here.

"It's a model for the rest of the country," Mueller said. "With the contribution of first responders and the law enforcement intelligence component, it's the type of fusion you need to prevent terrorist attacks and to follow up on any threats of any terrorist attacks."

Mueller said the center is tangible proof of improved cooperation among agencies in the post-9/11 era. "It enhances our partnership with the Los Angeles Police Department and Los Angeles [County] Sheriff's Department," he said. "They are doing a great job."

Mueller was accompanied on the tour and briefing by L.A. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton, who are lobbying federal officials to expand sharing of federal crime databases with agencies in Southern California.

The mayor called the center "the crown jewel of our effort to address counter-terrorism and homeland security here in Los Angeles."

About 30 analysts from federal and local law enforcement agencies work at the center, which has received about 500 tips from the public and other sources since opening in July.

Asked whether the center has foiled any terrorist plots since opening, Bratton said, "I can't speak to the terrorism issue with specificity other than the fact that since it's been up and running, there have been no major or significant incidents of concern."

Bratton said the effort to combat terrorism is part of a larger cooperative venture to have agencies share crime data. Officials from the LAPD and Sheriff's Department met Thursday with representatives of dozens of police departments in the county about pooling data through a computer system called CopLink. The system is already in use by the LAPD and Sheriff's Department.

That system would link all the disparate law enforcement databases to allow analysts at the center and police investigators to call up information from anywhere in the county, including the names of people arrested, cited or interviewed by officers or thought to be involved in crimes.

"It will be helpful to deal with not only terrorism concerns, but also crime concerns," Bratton said. "It will be a cornerstone of the local gang initiative we just announced. We will have the ability for the first time for agencies throughout the county to put information into the same file."

The police chief said he talked to Mueller on Friday about the desire of local law enforcement to connect CopLink to a federal crime database called Links.

"It would give us access to federal intelligence files, criminal and terrorism-related, so we would then have the most comprehensive set of intelligence files in the country," Bratton said.

The chief said he plans a trip to Washington, D.C., to follow up his talks with Mueller on gaining access to the federal database.

*

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

NY Court: FBI May Have Coerced Filmmaker (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-An effort by the FBI and federal prosecutors to remove a short fictional film about a military takeover of New York City from the Internet may have violated the First Amendment, a federal appeals court said Friday.

But the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan said a lower court was still correct to toss out a lawsuit brought against an FBI agent and a federal prosecutor by a web hosting service operator and Michael Zieper, who wrote, directed and produced the film.

The appeals court said in a written opinion that the FBI agent, Joseph Metzinger, and the assistant U.S. attorney, Lisa Korologos, were immune from the lawsuit because it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer in their position that they were doing anything wrong.

Metzinger and Korologos got involved Nov. 8, 1999, when the New York Police Department faxed information to the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force about the film, "Military Takeover of New York City."

The film includes various shots of Times Square as an unseen narrator who purports to be a military officer briefs other members of the military about plans for a military takeover of Times Square on New Year's Eve 1999.

The appeals court said Metzinger and Korologos were free to ask filmmaker Zieper and Web site operator Mark Wieger to take the film down - but Metzinger went too far when he said that FBI agents were heading to Zieper's home and he could not stop them.

"A reasonable juror could conclude that some of the defendants' actions here did cross the sometimes fine line between an attempt to convince and an attempt to coerce," the appeals court wrote.

While Metzinger spoke in a polite and non-threatening tone, and did not refer to criminal statutes or legal consequences, he never made it clear that Zieper's actions were lawful or that he would not face consequences for making the video public, the court said. It cautioned public officials "to make sure that the totality of their actions do not convey a threat even when their words do not."

Metzinger told Wieger he was worried the film could incite a riot. Wieger blocked web access to the film beginning Nov. 15, 1999, but restored it 11 days later.

Yusill Scribner, a spokeswoman for federal prosecutors in New York, said the government had no comment.

Aden Fine, an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer who represented the plaintiffs, said the decision shows that even if "government officials government officials use a polite tone and don't directly issue threats, they can violate an individual's First Amendment rights."

Pelosi Urges Halt To Prosecution Of Chronicle Writers Letter To Attorney General Also Calls For Federal Shield Law (SFC)

By Zachary Coile, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, January 20, 2007

Washington -- House Speaker Nancy Pelosi added her voice Friday to a growing list of lawmakers urging Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to drop the prosecution of two Chronicle reporters who face 18 months in prison for refusing to name their sources for stories about steroid use in professional sports.

Pelosi, in a three-paragraph letter, called on Gonzales to withdraw the subpoenas of Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada asking them to identify their confidential sources.

Pelosi was seeking to ratchet up the pressure after two top lawmakers -- new Democratic House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers of Michigan and Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, the top Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee -- asked Gonzales in a letter Thursday to rescind the subpoenas.

"I ask that you give favorable consideration to their bipartisan request for relief," Pelosi wrote in her letter to the attorney general. "Freedom of the press is critical for our democracy and for informing our citizens about public policy issues."

The Justice Department did not respond to a request for comment on the letter. But a spokeswoman said Thursday that the agency subpoenas journalists "only when absolutely necessary."

DOJ_NMG_0119810

Fainaru-Wada and Williams were ruled in contempt of court in September by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White for refusing to testify to a grand jury investigating who leaked transcripts in the steroid distribution case involving the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative.

White sentenced Fainaru-Wada and Williams to up to 18 months in prison and imposed a $1,000-a-day fine on The Chronicle, but he suspended those penalties pending an appeal.

A panel of the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco is scheduled to hear the case in March.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote articles in 2004 that quoted grand jury testimony of athletes describing their use of substances supplied by the lab known as BALCO.

Pelosi met Thursday with Fainaru-Wada and Chronicle Editor Phil Bronstein in her Capitol Hill office, where she "expressed admiration to the reporters for their stories and for the public service they have done, as well as her concern about some of these prosecutions and that reporters are going to jail," her spokesman Brendan Daly said.

Pelosi has pledged to support a federal media shield law, which would protect journalists in most cases from being forced to disclose their confidential sources. The measure stalled last year in the GOP-led Congress and faces major hurdles even in a Democrat-controlled Congress.

Pelosi insisted she sees the bill as vital to protecting the freedom of the press.

"That's why I have expressed support for a federal shield law, so that the policies and actions of the United States Government seek to protect and preserve that freedom," Pelosi told Gonzales in the letter.

E-mail Zachary Coile at zcoile@sfchronicle.com.

Top Lawmaker Demands Answers From Justice Department (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 20, 2007

The ranking member of a House committee is demanding answers from the Justice Department about recent reports in The New York Sun that intelligence agencies failed to cooperate with FBI investigations into leaks of classified material and that the FBI's files on some leak probes have disappeared.

The top Republican on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, Rep. Thomas Davis of Virginia, said he was troubled by the Sun's report last week that FBI documents showed at least three leak investigations appeared to have been closed after case agents repeatedly complained about a lack of cooperation from the "victim agency."

"The FBI holds itself out as the premiere investigative agency for the United States. As such, I find it hard to believe the FBI closes espionage leak investigations simply because another agency refuses to cooperate," Mr. Davis wrote Friday in a letter to Attorney General Gonzales.

At a press conference last month, President Bush again decried leaks of classified information. "It's an ongoing problem," the president said. "At some point in time, it would be helpful if we can find somebody inside our government who is leaking materials, clearly against the law, that they be held to account."

Mr. Davis wrote, "How can we ensure, as the President requested, those who leak classified information 'be held to account,' if the Department of Justice (DOJ) does not insist on pursuing investigative leads?"

The Sun's report about the alleged non-cooperation with leak probes was based on documents obtained under a federal Freedom of Information Act lawsuit brought by this reporter. The released records were heavily redacted to protect classified information, privacy, and investigative methods, the FBI said.

The Sun reported last month that a declaration filed by the FBI in connection with the Freedom of Information Act lawsuit indicated that 22 of 94 files believed to relate to recent leak investigations were missing from the bureau's file room with no indication of who had removed them.

Mr. Davis asked Mr. Gonzales to provide information on how the chief of the Justice Department's Counterespionage Section, John Dion, responded to the FBI's requests to close the leak investigations. The congressman also asked for details on what happened to the missing files.

DOJ_NMG_0119811

A Justice Department spokesman told the Sun last week that Mr. Dion believes agencies generally provide good cooperation with leak probes. Prosecutors declined to discuss ther individual cases in which problems were reported.

Mr. Davis's letter Friday questioning the Justice Department's actions on classified leaks came one day after the congressman joined with the Democratic chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, to complain that prosecutors were being too aggressive in pursuing leaks of secret grand jury testimony in an investigation into steroid use in professional sports. Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters are facing possible jail time for refusing to name their sources in that case.

"At most, the violation at issue is a breach of a court-sanctioned protective order," Messrs. Davis and Conyers wrote in a letter also addressed to Mr. Gonzales. "While the sanctity of a protective order is an important interest, this case is significantly different from others involving a breach of national security, terrorism, or serious criminal conduct."

The two congressmen asked Mr. Gonzales to withdraw the subpoenas to the journalists.

Physician Gets 2-year Prison Sentence (CINPOST)

Cincinnati (OH) Post, January 20, 2007

A Cincinnati doctor was sentenced to two years in prison Friday in connection with drug abuse in pain clinics where he worked.

Dr. Gregory L. Ebner, 55, pleaded guilty in June to money laundering and structuring money transactions illegally. He also faces three years supervised release and a $10,000 fine, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Starting in January 2001, Ebner worked in pain clinics in the southern Ohio towns of Lucasville, Chillicothe, Hanging Rock and Jackson.

A clinic would open for a short time, then move to another location in a nearby town after law enforcement officers started to investigate, prosecutors said.

Ebner worked in the clinics two or three days a week and saw 60 to 70 patients a day, according to federal court records.

He prescribed pain relievers such as Lorcet and Xanax after cursory exams, never checking the height, weight or blood pressure of patients. He never maintained any diagnostic equipment at the clinics.

Patients paid $175 to $200 per visit, with only cash payments allowed, prosecutors said. Patients who asked for refills were charged the same amount, but didn't have to make an office visit.

All patients received prescriptions called into a pharmacy. Many patients signed an agreement to use only the South Shore Pharmacy in South Shore, Ky., across the Ohio river from the clinics.

Ebner admitted his work at the pain clinics was below standards for medical practices, according to the Justice Department.

Ebner split the patient payments with the owner of the pain clinics, William Jewell Jr. Ebner broke the payments into smaller amounts, typically less than $10,000, and deposited them in his personal bank account to avoid reporting requirements.

Ebner took the illegal proceeds and wrote checks for investments, including a down payment on real estate and payment of his home mortgage.

Jewell and Nico Capurro, another Cincinnati doctor who worked in the clinics, were indicted in September on charges of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances.

Capurro, who resigned as Clermont County coroner in 2002 after 20 years in that post, also faces three counts of money laundering and three counts of structuring money transactions. Jewell also faces one count of money laundering.

They have pleaded not guilty to all charges and are free on bail pending trial.

Ebert is to surrender to the Bureau of Prisons on March 19.

IMMIGRATION:

Labor Groups, Business Seek Immigration Law Overhaul (WP)

By Krissah Williams

DOJ_NMG_0119812

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Worried that surprise raids are driving away workers who are their lifeblood, businesses are pooling their money and joining unusually broad alliances that include labor unions and civil rights groups to push Congress to overhaul the nation's immigration laws.

The coalition Alliance for Immigration Reform 2007 announced its formation this week, placing the force of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Service Employees International Union and the nation's largest Hispanic civil rights group behind a unified lobbying effort to get a law passed before the politics of the 2008 presidential campaign make a compromise on the contentious issue unworkable.

Pressure has been building on employers and labor as the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency becomes more active. Last month, its agents raided Swift & Co., a participant in a government pilot program that runs Social Security numbers through a federal database. The raids sent hundreds of undocumented immigrants to detention centers and jolted business groups.

"It proved that the current system doesn't work . . . and is failing everybody," R. Bruce Josten, executive vice president of the chamber, said during a conference call Thursday.

Business groups paint a dire picture of a U.S. economy without the country's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants. The National Restaurant Association says jobs in food service are growing one and a half times as fast as the U.S. labor force. And the construction industry needs 250,000 new workers per year to replace its aging workforce, according to Associated Builders and Contractors.

Proponents of a plan to legalize undocumented workers say this year offers an important window. President Bush and the Democratic-controlled Congress have called immigration reform a priority, and the coalition considers a Senate bill last year that provided a path to citizenship for undocumented workers a blueprint for the policy. That legislation stalled in November when the House and Senate could not hash out a compromise.

The table is now set, said Cecilia MuÃ±oz, vice president of the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights group. "Over the course of the last year the policy ideas have really come into focus."

To hold the marriage of business and labor and right- and left-leaning politics together, the coalition's ideal bill would include both a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already here and more visas for temporary workers, said Douglas G. Rivlin, spokesman for the National Immigration Forum, which is a member of the alliance.

The coalition splinters on the details. Labor unions advocate a new kind of visa that would not make the immigration status of temporary workers dependent upon their employers. Business groups want the visa program to be as simple as possible.

In opposition are groups such as the Minutemen, which raised nearly $1 million for its political action committee last year, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. The money was used primarily to back candidates who support building physical barriers to illegal immigration and deporting those who are here illegally.

Several of the candidates that the group supported, including Arizona Republican Randy Graf, lost in November, and the Republican Party in general ceded a large share of the Hispanic vote, a signal to some that tough enforcement policies are not politically popular. The Alliance for Immigration Reform said it has a significant budget and will marshal the coalition's resources to push its message.

"We can keep the heat on the back of the neck of the leadership to get this thing done," the chamber's Josten said.

Congress has not yet begun formally negotiating immigration legislation. Alliance members estimate they will need 70 to 80 percent of the Democrats and 30 to 50 percent of the Republicans in both chambers to get a law passed.

"This is not a Democratic slam dunk, and it's not a Bush slam dunk," Rivlin said. "It's going to take a lot of working together to get things done."

Immigration Stagnation (WP)

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119813

FOR MOST people living in the United States, the amount of time and money wasted in bureaucratic Washington is a distressing but distant annoyance. For some, however, the inefficiencies cause daily hardship -- and harm U.S. interests in the process.

Just ask Shmul Kaplan, an 80-year-old amputee and Ukrainian immigrant whom The Post's Darryl Fears wrote about last month. Granted asylum in 1997, Mr. Kaplan has waited -- and waited -- for his naturalization papers to come through. After seven years of patience, he lost his Supplemental Security Income because he did not gain citizenship in time to retain federal benefits. He currently lives on $215 a month for rent and $140 in food stamps. Now lawyers are pursuing a class action lawsuit on behalf of the Shmul Kaplans in this country against a range of federal agencies complicit in delaying their citizenship applications and denying them benefits.

The Post's Spencer S. Hsu reported that U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, a successor to the much-maligned Immigration and Naturalization Service, is overwhelmed and has failed to pursue basic administrative and technical reforms. A recent congressional investigation revealed that immigration officers had lost track of 111,000 files. A report released this month by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general faults Citizenship and Immigration Services as remaining "entrenched in a cycle of continual planning, with limited progress toward achieving its long-term transformation goals."

Despite these difficulties, Homeland Security lists its progress on immigration services as an accomplishment of the past year, pointing out that it has eliminated its backlog of applications, which stood at 3.8 million in 2004. Not so the FBI, which checks the names of those applying for citizenship. If an applicant's name is too similar to that of someone on a federal watch list, the FBI runs a background investigation, a procedure that can take months.

The FBI admits that 100,000 background checks have sat uncompleted for a year or longer. The bureau insists that it is speeding its work and that the immigration agency can tag names for expedited service. There is, it seems, plenty of blame to go around.

America hardly encourages foreigners to enter and live in the country legally when simply processing their naturalization forms can take years. Citizenship and Immigration Services needs to cut its wait times by making a rapid transition to electronic forms and better organizing reform efforts. And the FBI must conduct background checks more efficiently. The roughly 6,000 disabled asylum seekers who, the lawsuit alleges, lost their benefits will be suffering in the meantime.

Bush Comments On Agents Who Shot Suspected Drug Dealer (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — President Bush waded this week into the furor surrounding two former border patrol agents who were each convicted and sentenced to more than a decade in prison in the shooting of a suspected Mexican drug dealer in Texas.

The case has become something of a cause among some advocates for tougher border security, who argue that the agents should be pardoned because they were doing their jobs in 2005 when they fired on the man, an assertion that has been contested by the federal prosecutors overseeing the case.

In an interview with KFOX-TV in El Paso, Mr. Bush was asked on Thursday whether he would consider a pardon for the two former agents, Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who began serving their federal prison sentences of 11 years and 12 years respectively this week.

“There are standards that need to be met in law enforcement, and according to a jury of their peers, these officers violated some standards,” Mr. Bush said. “On this case, people need to take a hard look at the facts, at the evidence that the jury looked at, as well as a judge. And that’s — I will do the same thing.”

“Now, there’s a process for pardons,” he continued. “I mean, it’s got to work its way through a system here in government. But I just want people to take a sober look at the reality. It’s a case, as you said, it’s got a lot of emotions.”

Some interpreted Mr. Bush’s remarks to imply that he would consider a pardon for the two men. But Justice Department officials said on Friday that the two men were ineligible for consideration of a pardon at this time.

DOJ_NMG_0119814

Requests for pardons, which are screened by the Justice Department before being considered by the White House, are not considered until at least five years after a petitioner has been convicted or released from jail or prison, according to the department's guidelines.

A commutation of sentence, which reduces the period of incarceration, is not generally considered for people who are appealing their convictions, the guidelines said.

The two former agents have said they will appeal their convictions.

Johnny Sutton, the United States attorney who oversaw prosecution of the case, , dismissed the idea that the two men were simply doing their jobs or defending themselves. During their trial, the agents said they had scuffled with the suspected drug dealer, who they believed had a gun, before firing at him.

"Nothing could be further from the truth," Mr. Sutton said in a statement last week, noting that the two men did not report the shooting to their superiors.

"These agents shot someone who they knew to be unarmed and running away," Mr. Sutton said. "They destroyed evidence, covered up a crime scene and then filed false reports about what happened. It is shocking that there are people who believe it is O.K. for agents to shoot an unarmed suspect who is running away."

Hunter Asks Congress To Pardon Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

A California congressman has introduced legislation calling for a congressional pardon for two U.S. Border Patrol agents sent to prison this week for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks as he fled back into Mexico.

Rep. Duncan Hunter also asked that pending any legislative action of the Congressional Pardon for Border Patrol Agents Ramos and Compean Act, that the two agents -- Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28 -- be segregated from the general prison population to ensure their safety.

"The Border Patrol is America's first line of defense against the constant and unrelenting efforts of drug and human smugglers to illegally enter the United States," said the nine-term Republican. "Agents Compean and Ramos fulfilled their responsibilities as Border Patrol agents and rightfully pursued a suspected and fleeing drug smuggler.

"It is irresponsible to punish them with jail time," he said.

The two agents surrendered on Wednesday for shooting drug-smuggling suspect Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila after he refused their orders to halt, abandoned his van along the Rio Grande with 743 pounds of marijuana inside, assaulted Compean, who tried to block his dash into Mexico, and then fled to a waiting van in Mexico.

During the trial, Ramos' attorney, Mary Stillinger, had argued that her client shot in defense of Compean, saying Ramos saw his partner on the ground and that when Aldrete-Davila turned toward the agents Compean believed he was holding a weapon.

She and Maria Ramirez, one of Compean's attorneys, also told the jury that more than half a dozen other Border Patrol agents, including two supervisors, were at the scene of the shooting and did not report anything.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Diane Kanof said during trial that Ramos and Compean violated Aldrete-Davila's civil rights by shooting and that the agents had violated Border Patrol policies by chasing the fleeing suspect.

Aldrete-Davila has said he plans to file a $5 million civil rights lawsuit against the government.

The agents turned themselves over to U.S. marshals at the federal courthouse in El Paso, Texas, to begin 11- and 12-year sentences, respectively. Both were taken to the county jail where they will wait for transportation to their assigned federal prisons. Ramos is expected to serve his time in Mississippi and Compean in Ohio.

"We cannot turn our back on Agents Compean and Ramos or the rest of the men and women proudly serving in the U.S. Border Patrol," Mr. Hunter said. "These two agents deserve our full support and the congressional pardon provided by this legislation."

DOJ_NMG_0119815

Ramos, a 10-year Border Patrol veteran and former Agent of the Year nominee, and Compean, a five-year member of the force, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

The conviction came after Aldrete-Davila was found in Mexico by Department of Homeland Security investigators and given immunity by U.S. prosecutors against any drug charges in exchange for his testimony against the agents.

The immunity agreement protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in the United States with drug smuggling.

TAX:

W. Palm Commissioner Resigns (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina And Nancy L. Othón, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 20, 2007

West Palm Beach · City Commissioner James Exline resigned his seat Friday and will be charged with a single count of tax evasion in coming weeks, his attorney said.

Attorney Robert Gershman said Exline failed to report approximately $60,000 in income during the 2004 tax year but would not say where his client got that income.

The Palm Beach County State Attorney's Office is running a grand jury investigation into possible corruption and conflicts of interest among city officials. The charge Exline faces, however, is a federal charge, Gershman said.

Exline, 42, a former city planner who was first appointed to his seat in 1999, has been cooperating with law enforcement officials for several months and will not face further charges, Gershman said.

"He has been cooperating and has been honest and straightforward, and available to local, state and federal authorities for anything at any time," Gershman said. "The money had no bearing on his official actions as a city commissioner."

The tax evasion charge is punishable by up to five years in prison and $100,000 in fines. Exline will be allowed to surrender when the charge is filed, Gershman said.

"We are well aware West Palm Beach City Commissioner Exline is resigning [Friday]. However, our office is not going to be commenting on whether any charges are likely at this time," U.S. Attorney's Office spokeswoman Alicia Valle said.

Exline is the second city commissioner to resign under a cloud in the past year, and his departure is sure to fuel the distrust residents have expressed in recent months.

Former Commissioner Ray Liberti, 60, pleaded guilty in May to federal charges of mail fraud and obstruction of justice in a case that triggered the wider corruption investigation.

Liberti admitted he used his public office to help two real estate investors press the owners of a West Palm Beach massage parlor and a nightclub into selling their businesses at below-market prices. In return for his help, he received $66,000 in cash and an expensive TAG Heuer watch. He was sentenced in October to 18 months in prison.

Exline delivered his resignation letter to City Manager Edward Mitchell about 4 p.m. Friday. He made no mention of why he was resigning.

"I am thankful to have participated in the growth and redevelopment of the city's neighborhoods and downtown," Exline wrote. "I am certain the positive commission work will continue and the city will flourish."

Exline has a planning business, Urban Land Consulting, in downtown. City officials wiped his biography from the city's Web site within an hour of his resignation. He represented central and northern portions of the city.

He could face prison time or lesser sanctions such as house arrest or probation, Gershman said. Exline has already paid the roughly $18,000 in taxes that he owes, Gershman said.

Although Commissioner Kimberly Mitchell said she had heard Exline's resignation was imminent, she was almost at a loss for words Friday.

"I am just, I'm sad for the city. That's how I feel about it," Mitchell said. "I honestly have no idea what this particular issue revolves around, but I just think for the trust that sits out there -- and that is on shaky ground at best -- this serves as another blow to the people. And that part of it really makes me very sad, as a resident and as somebody who gives my heart and soul and brain to public service."

DOJ_NMG_0119816

The state grand jury investigation has been focusing primarily on the city's new $154 million city hall-library complex, City Center, now under construction downtown, as well as other city contracts. A number of city officials, including Mayor Lois Frankel and commissioners, have testified before the grand jury.

Within days of Liberti's charges, Frankel announced she had discovered Liberti was on the payroll of a consulting firm involved in the selection of contractors to build City Center. Frankel said she found that Liberti, beginning in 2003, was paid $5,000 a month and later $8,000 a month for consulting work. The city ended its contract with the consulting firm.

Palm Beach County State Attorney Barry Krischer launched the grand jury investigation a few weeks later. Krischer's spokesman, Michael Edmondson, said the grand jury was expected to finish its work in several weeks.

Frankel said she did not know the circumstances surrounding Exline's unreported income or whether it was connected to his actions in office.

"I would not know. My office talked to the U.S. Attorney's Office that the resignation involves a personal tax matter," Frankel said. "That is what Mr. Exline told me, and that was what we were told."

Commissioner Bill Moss said that as far as he knows, the charge has nothing to do with city business.

"If he was resigning because of something to do with corruption, then I would say, `What's going on here?'" Moss said. "I don't see this affecting the city. I hope we can get back to running the government like we were elected to do."

Exline Resigns Post Under Tax Cloud (PALMBEACHP)

By Thomas R. Collins, Susan Spencer-Wendel , Tony Doris, Palm Beach Post Staff Writers

Palm Beach Post (FL), January 20, 2007

WEST PALM BEACH — Jim Exline resigned from his city commission seat Friday and plans to plead guilty to a tax evasion charge that he said will be filed in the next few weeks by federal prosecutors, with whom he has been cooperating since June.

He could face a sentence ranging from five years in prison and a $100,000 fine all the way down to probation, said his attorney, Robert Gershman.

Exline's departure adds more intrigue to a busy election season in which Mayor Lois Frankel faces former City Commissioner Al Zucaro.

Commissioners will appoint a replacement, who will serve less than a month until voters choose a permanent successor in the March 13 election.

Exline is the second city commissioner to resign in response to federal charges in the past eight months, following Ray Liberti's departure in May.

Exline, 42, said he did not report $60,000 in income earned in 2004, avoiding a payment of $18,000 in taxes.

"I was going through my divorce, and I didn't disclose all my income," the former commissioner said. Neither he nor his attorney would say where that money came from, other than to say, in Gershman's words, that it was "ordinary business income."

Exline agreed to a lengthy interview with The Palm Beach Post on Friday afternoon in order to underscore his cooperation with federal authorities, try to salvage his reputation as a public servant in his hometown and attempt to avoid being lumped with recent public corruption cases involving former Palm Beach County Commissioner Tony Masilotti and Liberti, Exline's former colleague who is now serving a federal prison term.

Dressed casually in an untucked white shirt, blue jeans and brown loafers, Exline said in his attorney's office that he is optimistic he will avoid prison.

"I think the chances are very minimal," he said.

His attorney said, "I do not see the reason to punish him beyond the felony conviction he is already going to obtain."

But Gershman acknowledged the sentence ultimately will be up to a federal judge.

In terms of image, there is much for Exline to overcome. His resignation comes after open criticism and public demands for his resignation from city residents. They said they were troubled over his votes to annex property owned by developer and former Palm Beach County Administrator John Sansbury in 2004. The annexation boosted the property's value at a time when Exline was working as a sales agent for Sansbury's realty firm.

DOJ_NMG_0119817

Seven months after the annexation votes, Exline received 100 percent of the commission on a land sale as an agent for Sansbury's firm.

On Friday, Exline said he approached federal prosecutors about the unpaid taxes in June. He said he offered to resign on the spot, but the authorities wanted him to stay in his post while he cooperated with them.

"Jim has made himself available to state and federal investigators for any questions they had," Gershman said. "The authorities were asking questions about anything and everything."

He added, "It was not only limited to the recent headlines," referring to the public corruption cases that have engulfed Palm Beach County since May.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John Kastrenakas declined to comment on Exline.

Exline's first meeting with federal investigators came shortly after it was publicly disclosed, in the last week of May, that a federal grand jury was investigating a land deal involving Masilotti.

But Exline said he did not have any legal concerns other than the tax matter when he talked to federal officials.

"My issue has always been my taxes and not anything else," he said.

On the annexation matter, he said, "I didn't think I did anything wrong."

However, he now wishes he had disclosed his ties to Sansbury at the time of the annexation votes.

"If I look back now, to have been safe I would have disclosed it because I know now more than I knew then," he said. "I had never received any financial benefit, and that was my test."

State ethics officials would not issue a formal opinion because one was never formally requested.

Exline has been involved in a variety of business ventures, including his land planning firm, Urban Land Consulting; a tanning salon in Jupiter he has since sold; and a Rotelli Pizza & Pasta restaurant in Boca Raton that he owns along with his brother-in-law and nephew.

A Rotelli location in the Esperante building in downtown West Palm Beach, also partly owned by Exline, is set to open Tuesday or Wednesday, Exline said.

But he has had financial troubles. He was sued by the credit-card company MBNA for failing to pay more than $37,000 in charges. He blamed the troubles on spending by his ex-wife, Cuban-born Yusdaly Brito Gonzalez, 15 years his junior, from whom he was divorced in 2005.

In the divorce filing, Exline reported three unpaid credit-card balances, including the one with MBNA, totaling $97,593. MBNA is the only company that filed suit in Palm Beach County Circuit Court. The lawsuit was settled for an undisclosed amount.

Exline said he was addressing the other debt as well.

He bought Tan Lines of Jupiter in July 2002 for $20,000 and sold it for $85,000 in March 2005, he said. A divorce filing by Exline, filed about two weeks before the sale, estimated the current fair market value at $25,000 and said the business was losing $931 a month.

As a city commissioner, Exline earned $30,000 a year. Plus, Exline - like the other city commissioners, the mayor and other top city employees - has benefited from a premium health-care plan in which he is reimbursed for all of his out-of-pocket medical expenses, including up to $10,000 a year for dental work.

On Friday, Exline did his best to express hope for his future.

He is excited about the Rotelli restaurant's opening in West Palm Beach. His brother-in-law, Jeffery R. Smith, is the nationwide chain's chief operating officer.

Exline said he would probably have to sell his shares in the Rotelli restaurants once convicted on the tax charges because, with a felony record, he would not be able to hold a beer and wine license.

He hopes to participate in the chain's Rotelli Express concept, in which alcohol is not sold.

Nonetheless, he said, he would remain in West Palm Beach, devote more time to his planning firm and possibly branch out into development.

"I'll do other things. I'll be fine," Exline said. "I'm a very smart, very creative person."

DOJ_NMG_0119818

He said he would begin with modest development projects.

"I would like to start doing small retail and small office projects and start from there," he said.

He believes he can attract clients to his planning firm.

"My clients who know me and the people who knew me know I am honest and ethical and I do a good job."

Exline emphasized his years of work for the city. He worked in city hall as a planner from 1988 to 1994. In 1991, he made an unsuccessful run for mayor. He also has served as a member of the Treasure Coast Regional Planning Council and the traffic-planning board, the Metropolitan Planning Organization.

Aside from government work, he also has been a member of the board of the Salvation Army Community Center advisory board, giving guidance to a center serving children and teenagers.

But as a commissioner, Exline lately had found himself under siege. Residents, infuriated by what they saw as ethical transgressions, openly questioned why he was still on the dais and occasionally held up signs in the commission chambers demanding that he leave office.

Other residents, including Denise Smith-Barnes, his opponent in last March's election, described him as an ineffective representative for their district. In recent months, as north-end residents stormed city-hall chambers in public meetings to complain of rampant crime, Exline frequently did not have much to say.

Mayor Lois Frankel said Exline's resignation may bring a measure of relief to city affairs.

"I think that all these allegations, they create a cloud, and I, for one, I'm glad that we get this behind us," she said. "I'm not happy it happened, but there's been so much speculation. I don't know the merit of the speculation."

Exline said the group criticizing him was small.

"I would call them more of an opposition group," he said. "That was the only thing they could come up with - that I wasn't at enough city events."

He credits his help as a commissioner in creating "a new neighborhood downtown," peopled with new residents living in condos. He also says he helped clean up his north-end district, acting as the commission's liaison to a code enforcement task force.

Throughout his time as commissioner, Exline said, he sacrificed work in his planning business, lest he work with clients presenting a conflict of interest.

"Over the years, I've walked away from hundreds of thousands of dollars in planning fees," he said. "And I've never argued about it. It was my choice."

The bottom line, he said, was that he has a lot of basics in life to remain happy about.

"I'm very thankful for what I have," he said. "My friends are behind me. My family's behind me. I've got a good attorney. And I'm thankful."

Scandals Keep Growing (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), January 20, 2007

The unprecedented level of government scandal in Palm Beach County went higher Friday with the forced resignation of West Palm Beach City Commissioner Jim Exline, who faces a federal tax evasion charge over an alleged $60,000 in unreported income from 2004.

If convicted, Mr. Exline could be sentenced to as many as five years in prison and fined $100,000. He is the second city commissioner to resign because of criminal charges within the past year. Ray Liberti left office in May and is serving time in federal prison after pleading guilty to fraud and obstruction charges.

Federal investigators, including the FBI, also have forced the resignation of ex-County Commissioner Tony Masilotti, who last week pleaded guilty to a corruption charge stemming from a series of land deals in Martin County. He did those deals with falsified documents that The Palm Beach Post uncovered. Two of Masilotti's business associates also face charges, and the federal investigation is continuing. A state grand jury has been investigating allegations of a "pay-to-play" culture within West Palm Beach government for months, and Commissioner Exline's departure adds new interest to that work.

DOJ_NMG_0119819

In August, The Post reported a pattern of conflicted interests with Commissioner Exline that included using his position to advance real estate deals for himself and his own business associates. He used his vote as commissioner in 2004 to approve land annexation that benefited Sansbury Realty, where he was licensed as a sales associate. Six months after the vote, company owner John Sansbury paid him a $36,400 commission on the sale of a building a couple of blocks from City Hall. Mr. Exline also has admitted frequenting a Boynton Beach strip club whose owners were convicted as part of federal prostitution, money laundering and arson investigations.

Commissioner Exline's attorney, Robert Gershman, says his client intends to cooperate with authorities. That cooperation should include disclosing pay-to-play dealings that may have occurred in a city where conflicts of interest appear to be part of the culture of doing business. Clearly, federal investigators have no shortage of leads to follow in Palm Beach County. The longer they go after criminal activity by public officials, the better it will be for the public.

Justice Dept. Sues Local Tax Preparer (KZGAZETTE)

By Jane C. Parikh

Kalamazoo Gazette (MI), January 20, 2007

Portage resident Donald A. Gray is being sued by the U.S. Department of Justice for allegedly filing false income-tax returns on behalf of clients, resulting so far in an estimated $1.5 million in tax losses.

Justice department spokesman Andrew Ames said he did not know how many returns that may involve.

Gray is among four Michigan men being sued by the justice department for allegedly filing false income-tax returns for clients. The lawsuits seek to prevent the four men from filing more income-tax returns.

Gray, who lists himself as a certified public accountant in the telephone book, did not return phone calls Friday from the Kalamazoo Gazette seeking comment. The lawsuit against Gray was filed Jan. 16 in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Michigan in Grand Rapids.

It alleges that, ``Since 2004, Gray has been preparing false federal income-tax returns and related forms for customers to fraudulently under-report their income. On the returns he prepares for customers, Gray falsely states that he is a licensed CPA."

The lawsuit said Gray either ``falsely reports that his customer received no income or Gray substantially under-reports his customer's income, and fraudulently claims a refund of all federal taxes withheld from his customer's wages."

There was no immediate word on what would happen to, or what should be done by, individuals whose tax returns were prepared in such a manner.

According to documents, the other area men identified by the Department of Justice as having committed tax fraud are: Charles Conces, of Battle Creek; Peter Eric Hendrickson, of Commerce Township; and Robert L. Mosher, of Cedar Springs.

Justice department officials charge in the lawsuit that Gray is following a scheme promoted by Hendrickson who operates a Web site called losthorizons.com.

Ames declined to answer questions directly related to the lawsuits. He said Friday that since 2001 the justice department has issued about 215 injunctions against tax preparers who file false income-tax returns for clients.

``It's happening all across the country," Ames said. ``The (Internal Revenue Service) conducts audits and reviews, and if (the offense) is serious enough, it's turned over to us."

He said if criminal complaints are brought forth, the IRS would determine the penalties.

In a press release issued by the justice department about Gray's lawsuit, Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the justice department's tax division, said, ``People who prepare fraudulent tax returns expose themselves and their customers to the risk of substantial civil penalties and criminal prosecution."

High Court Considers Tax Authority Case (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON - Foreign countries fighting New York City's effort to collect property taxes will get the chance to make their case to the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0119820

The justices said Friday they will review a lower court ruling allowing the city to sue countries that own property near the United Nations over unpaid taxes.

The city has battled over property taxes for years with countries that house their consulates and diplomatic missions in Manhattan skyscrapers.

Under U.S. treaties, embassies and other diplomatic buildings are generally tax-exempt, but the city claims some countries are refusing to pay taxes on real estate used for non-diplomatic purposes, such as restaurants and apartments.

Two countries sued by the city, India and Mongolia, had argued that sovereign immunity meant they couldn't be sued in U.S. courts.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled last April, affirming a lower-court decision, that federal courts have the power to resolve such disputes.

The city is seeking $16.4 million in unpaid taxes and interest from India and $2.1 million from Mongolia, the Justice Department said in legal papers filed in support of the foreign governments.

New York City has singled out only a few countries with lawsuits. It has failed in attempts to collect taxes from other countries, including Hungary, Libya, Rwanda, Nigeria and Uganda. Turkey settled a lawsuit for $5 million, far less than the city initially said it owed.

A federal law requires the U.S. government to withhold some aid to nations that fail to pay real estate taxes on buildings in New York or Washington, D.C., but only if a U.S. court decides that the debts are valid.

The case is Permanent Mission of India v. New York, 06-134.

IRS May Widen Probe Of Fees On Municipal Investment Contracts (BLOOM)

By Darrell Preston

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

Jan. 19 (Bloomberg) -- The Internal Revenue Service may widen its examination of municipal bond reinvestment practices amid a U.S. criminal probe of whether financial firms rigged bids on investment contracts bought by local governments, the head of the agency's tax-exempt bond enforcement division said.

The IRS, which has focused its scrutiny on investment contract fees related to housing and non-profit debt, may broaden the scope of its audits to other types of municipal bonds, said Clifford Gannett, director of the IRS's tax-exempt bond enforcement office, in comments yesterday in Washington at a meeting of the Government Finance Officers Association.

IRS investigations have found that improper bidding practices by financial firms for investment contracts with local governments may have deprived the U.S. of money it was owed. The findings prompted the widest antitrust probe of the municipal bond market, where local governments have $2.3 trillion of debt outstanding.

``We're going methodically, there could be more out there," Gannett said.

The Justice Department, in connection with the IRS and Securities and Exchange Commission, is investigating whether bankers and brokers conspired to fix prices on the contracts. U.S. prosecutors in November subpoenaed more than a dozen financial firms and seized documents from three brokers.

Gannett said the 64 employees in his office have been helping with the criminal investigation.

Market Integrity

The IRS allows state and local governments to sell bonds exempt from federal income tax, requiring that municipalities rebate much of the earnings they reap from reinvesting tax- exempt bond proceeds to the Treasury. To ``ensure the integrity of the market," the IRS has a responsibility to seek out those who take advantage of the subsidy, Gannett said.

In 2006, the IRS examined 30 bond financings by charitable groups, mostly for low-income housing, Gannett said. In four, the IRS found no irregularities, he said. The other 26 are in ``various states of development."

Gannett said the IRS has ``seen all kinds of irregularities in bids" on investment contracts and ``mechanisms to pull fees out" and would like to see changes in how firms are awarded the business, such as by increasing the use of electronic bidding. The IRS also plans to look at non-profit corporations that sold tax-exempt bonds and then gave up their non-profit status. Some may still have outstanding tax-exempt bonds, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0119821

The IRS isn't limiting its review just to investment contracts and continues to look for other irregularities that may force it to examine the tax-exempt bond status of issues it finds abusive, Gannett said.

Railroads Seek Tax Aid (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The 400 small, often money-losing, railroads that connect isolated farm towns to major rail lines won a minor tax break from Congress in 2004 after strenuous lobbying -- only to see the Internal Revenue Service write rules last September that limited the subsidy so much it was almost worthless.

But the short-line railroad industry, as it's known, is the little industry that could. It quietly got Congress at the end of last year to undo what the IRS had done, a classic example of the lobbying clout a small industry can wield if its pieces are across congressional districts and states from Vermont to Kansas.

Next stop for the short-line railroads: getting Congress to extend the $100 million annual tax break beyond its scheduled expiration at the end of this year.

Some 65 members who endorsed the tax break have retired or were voted out of office. "We have all these new members in Congress who don't know anything about it," says Adam Nordstrom, lobbyist for the American Shortline and Regional Railroad Association, an organization of short-line operators. Mr. Nordstrom also worries about the new pay-as-you-go rules, put forth by Democrats in an effort to tighten deficit spending, will make it harder to get the tax break. "So whatever we get, it would have to be taken out of someone else's hide."

While short-line railroads may be seen as a relic of the past, they are increasingly integrated into the distribution of commodities that cross the country. In 1980, there were about 8,000 miles of short-line track in the U.S., generally with fewer than 350 miles of track and earning less than $40 million in annual revenue. Now there are about 43,000 miles of short-line track.

The growth reflects the tendency of big railroad corporations, which operate about 98,000 miles of track, to shed offshoot lines to concentrate on more profitable, long-haul routes. Short lines are a viable business, but maintaining and upgrading track lines is expensive and that led the industry to look to the government for help.

In a 2004 bill, Congress said the taxpayers would pay 50 cents of every $1 spent on track maintenance and upgrading. The tax credit equaled about $3,500 per mile.

Short lines, on their tax returns, were to use the credit on their tax bills. But since many short-line railroads don't earn enough taxable income to take full advantage of the credit, they began assigning the track maintenance work to related third-party businesses. Essentially the short lines would trade the tax credit to those construction companies that could use them.

Selling tax credits to companies that can use them isn't unheard of, but Congress traditionally writes a provision of any law to explicitly permit them. In this case, Congress, apparently unwittingly, left the provision open for interpretation, according to the IRS.

In September, after 22 months, the IRS finally published rules governing the tax credit. To the industry's surprise, the IRS essentially said short-line railroads that couldn't take full advantage of the credit couldn't give the full value of the tax credit to the other companies. The result: The tax credit was worth only 25 cents for every $1 spent on track upgrades and maintenance for the industry as a whole. The IRS also said the rules would apply retroactively.

But short lines already had completed millions of dollars of track work, and were counting on selling the tax credits to pay for it. Watco Cos., a holding company of 16 short lines fanned across the country, had spent $24 million upgrading 30 miles of track for the Kansas & Oklahoma railroad that connects Wichita, Kan., to the railroad's northwestern outpost in Henderson, Kan. Watco was counting on allowing half of that, $12 million, to go as a tax credit to the third parties who actually did the work, paying them with tax credits instead of cash.

"This was scary," said Ed McKechnie, chief commercial officer at Watco. "We did not have another $12 million."

In October, two weeks after the IRS rules were publicized, the short-line association met in Washington to map out strategy. They instructed their members to calculate how much they had spent so far on track upgrades -- nearly $380 million -- and began cold-calling key members of Congress to stop the IRS.

DOJ_NMG_0119822

Big railroad companies pitched in. "We support the tax credit for short lines and we partner with them on their legislative agendas," says Kelly Donley, spokeswoman for the Association of American Railroads, which represents major freight railroads, such as Norfolk Southern Corp. and Burlington Vermont Santa Fe Railway and also Amtrak.

In December, Rep. Jerry Moran (R., Kan.), Rep. Dave Camp (R., Mich.), and Rep. Phil English (R., Pa.) wrote to IRS chief Mark Everson and accused the IRS of overstepping its authority. "The regulations should be withdrawn immediately and retroactively, and no further guidance regarding such arrangements should be issued by the Treasury and the [Internal Revenue] Service until Congress has had an opportunity to address these areas."

The IRS wouldn't comment publicly about the short-line rules it drafted and its interpretation of the 2004 law.

But in the waning days, as Congress hustled to finish before adjourning for the year, Sen. Gordon Smith (R., Ore.) and Sen. Blanche Lincoln, (D., Ark.) led an effort to push the legislation through a change to undo the IRS rule. Short lines now can trade the tax credit -- and get full benefit of the 50% credit -- to any related business that it has an existing business relationship with, often a shipper, to pay for track maintenance or upgrades.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Visit Democrats' Retreat (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Who says bipartisanship is dead? President Bush has accepted an invitation from House Democrats to travel to Williamsburg, Va., in February to speak at their annual issues conference, a move that might have been unthinkable a few short months ago, when Republicans ran Capitol Hill.

Mr. Bush has addressed the Democratic retreat before, in 2001, the first year he was in office. His planned appearance this year, on Feb. 3, was announced by Representative Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic caucus, in an e-mail message to colleagues on Friday.

"I'm happy to announce that President Bush has accepted our invitation to address the conference on Saturday morning," Mr. Emanuel wrote, adding that former President Bill Clinton would also be there.

Mr. Bush's appearance is testimony to the changed climate on Capitol Hill, where Democrats have just pushed six major pieces of legislation through the House, on issues including student loans, Medicare prescription drugs and stem cell research, with some Republican support. A White House spokeswoman said Mr. Bush would deliver a speech to the Democrats and take five questions.

In the months since Democrats won the November midterm elections, members of both parties, and the president, have said they want to work together in a bipartisan way. But with Democrats strongly opposed to Mr. Bush's plan to send additional troops to Iraq, relations between the two sides have not exactly been lovey-dovey in recent days.

On Friday, Speaker Nancy Pelosi accused the president of moving quickly to put the troops "in harm's way" because he knew Democrats would not cut off financing once troops were sent into battle. That prompted a sharp response from Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, who called Ms. Pelosi's comments "poisonous."

Just hours later, Mr. Emanuel sent out his announcement.

Conservatives Slam Bush Policies (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

President Bush's policies, including the Iraq war, have left the country in a "disastrous" state, according to several prominent conservatives.

The leaders, including current and former presidential candidates, outlined their objectives for a revival of conservatism during a panel discussion yesterday hosted by the Free Congress Foundation, a conservative Washington-based advocacy group. The leaders' recommendations, covering economic, military and social policy, would be largely different from those implemented by the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0119823

"We disagree on a lot of things," Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, said of Mr. Bush. Mr. Hunter is seeking his party's 2008 presidential nomination on a platform of military expertise and a desire to confront China on economic and trade issues.

"We have a competition which is not free trade, it's not fair trade, it's rigged trade," he said of the China's trade tariffs, which many critics argue have hurt American businesses.

"The state of the union is disastrous," said William Lind, president of the foundation's Center for Cultural Conservatism. "We are fighting and losing two wars, in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Using language that at times mirrored that of liberal critics of Mr. Bush's foreign policy, Mr. Lind said an interventionist U.S. foreign policy is creating, "a hostile relationship with the growing world."

Former presidential candidate Gary Bauer was critical of Mr. Bush for what he described as the president's failure to more deeply inspire Americans after September 11.

"The president made a colossal mistake after 9/11 by simply asking people to shop," said Mr. Bauer, president of the conservative group American Values.

Some panelists did have kind words for the current administration.

Ambassador Henry F. Cooper, director of the Strategic Defense Initiative during the first Bush administration, praised Mr. Bush for backing out of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, which he said stood in the way of an American missile-defense program.

However, Mr. Cooper said he thinks "relatively limited progress has been made," on other issues.

Mr. Hunter also praised what he called Mr. Bush's record on fighting the war on terrorism.

"He was willing and he was aggressive," he said of the White House's response to the September 11 attacks. "He's kept them off balance."

State Of The Union: The 3 Keys To Bush's Speech: Energy, Immigration And Iran (WSJ)

By Gerald F. Seib

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

President Bush's last few State of the Union addresses have run at about 5,000 words each. He delivers this year's edition Tuesday night, and the White House suggests this one might be a bit shorter. Here's a way to cut through the verbiage even more. Listen especially closely for just three words: energy, immigration and Iran.

This will be the president's seventh State of the Union address, but he has never given one like this before. It will be his first given to a Congress controlled by Democrats. That doesn't change everything, but it changes a lot. Mr. Bush will be trying to lay out an agenda when, in fact, he no longer is in control of Washington's agenda. Democrats in Congress now have as much to say about what gets acted upon, and what is ignored. No longer will the president be able to compel Congress to consider one of his ideas simply by saying so, which was more or less within his power under Republican control.

That argues for more focus on fewer items that have some actual chance of success, and less focus on a wish list of items dear to the president but with little chance of bipartisan support. So you'll hear plenty about balancing the budget, but more interesting is how energy and immigration come into play. White House officials have been signaling that the president plans to aggressively pursue what everyone in Washington euphemistically calls "energy independence." That means reducing America's need for foreign oil.

Until now, Mr. Bush's focus has tended to be increasing domestic energy production, and Democrats' has been decreasing energy use. But both sides increasingly acknowledge that real energy independence requires both, and also requires government action to push alternative fuels. The twin threats of Middle Eastern upheaval and Venezuelan animosity should provide plenty of incentive.

Immigration may be the only issue where the change of power on Capitol Hill has brought Congress closer to the president, not farther away. Mr. Bush's view of immigration reform -- which includes creating a guest-worker program that would allow foreign workers to be temporary and legal, and put some of them on a path toward citizenship -- is a concept embraced more easily by Democrats than by Republicans these days. Mr. Bush's own Republicans are much more focused on simply securing the border to prevent foreigners from arriving in the first place, though the party's poor showing among Hispanics in last fall's election also may have many wondering how wise that position is politically. Take it all together, and there may be room for common ground.

DOJ_NMG_0119824

Which leaves foreign policy. Iraq can't be ignored, of course, but Mr. Bush said his piece on that in his recent address to the nation. Odds are he wants this time to prompt the Congress -- and the country -- to start thinking beyond Iraq to what he clearly sees as the next big problem. And that lies next door in Iran.

Salazar Sends Early Message To Bush (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 20, 2007

The Democratic-controlled Congress in upcoming months will focus on immigration reform, improving access to college, lowering gas and prescription drug prices, and changing direction in Iraq, Colorado's Ken Salazar said today in his preview address to the State of the Union.

Salazar, D-Colo., gave the speech today in both English and Spanish, the first time that has occurred.

Salazar, who grew up in San Luis Valley, referred to his family when he talked about the need to improve educational opportunities.

"I am a testament to the power of a higher education," he said in the speech. "My parents raised eight children in poor and humble circumstances. ...All of their eight children became the first generation of college graduates in our family. It has transformed our lives. Everyone should have that chance."

Former VP Mondale Says Cheney Cooks Ludicrous Advice (AP)

By Daniel Yee

AP, January 19, 2007

ATHENS, Ga. - Vice President Dick Cheney has bullied federal agencies and given absurd advice about the nation's risk and Iraq, Walter Mondale said Friday, adding that never would have been tolerated when Mondale was vice president.

"I think that Cheney has stepped way over the line," Mondale said at the opening of a three-day conference about former President Jimmy Carter at the University of Georgia.

Mondale, who served under Carter, said Cheney and his assistants pressured federal agencies as they prepared information for President Bush.

"I think Cheney's been at the center of cooking up farcical estimates of national risks, weapons of mass destruction and the 9/11 connection to Iraq," he said.

That does not serve the president, because he needs facts, Mondale said.

"If I had done as vice president what this vice president has done, Carter would have thrown me out of there," Mondale said. "I don't think he could have tolerated a vice president over there pressuring and pushing other agencies, ordering up different reports than they wanted to send us. I don't think he would have stood for it."

Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for Cheney, had this response to Mondale's comments: "Twice elected to serve with President Bush, the vice president is committed to protecting Americans from those who wish to do us harm." She also cited a September television interview in which Cheney said he would take issue with "any suggestion we've gone beyond where we should have."

Academics credit Carter with expanding the role of the vice presidency during his administration.

As vice president, Mondale served as the president's senior adviser. He held an office in the West Wing of the White House, had private meetings with the president and spoke on behalf of the president before influential groups.

Mondale: Cheney Not Serving Bush Well (UPI)

UPI, January 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119825

Walter Mondale, the first U.S. vice president with an office in the West Wing of the White House, says that Dick Cheney has made the office too powerful.

Mondale spoke at a three-day conference at the University of Georgia on the presidency of Jimmy Carter, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported.

He said that Cheney has created "almost a parallel National Security Council that operated almost on its own."

The vice presidency was once a powerless office with the incumbent given ceremonial functions and denied critical information. In one of the more notorious instances, Harry Truman only learned of the existence of the atomic bomb after he succeeded President Franklin Roosevelt who died.

Richard Moe, Mondale's former chief of staff, said that giving the vice president real responsibility was one of Carter's great accomplishments.

Mondale said that Cheney is too much an independent center of power in the Bush administration.

"I think that Cheney has probably been at the center of cooking up all these farcical estimates of national risk, weapons of mass destruction, 9/11's connection with Iraq...and I don't think that serves the president," he said.

Senate Measure Puts Spotlight On Fund-Raising (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Of all the new rules passed in Congress's recent ethics overhauls, the most sweeping is a barely debated provision in a Senate bill passed Thursday night that could alter one of the most time-honored campaign fund-raising practices in Washington.

Rushing to complete its promised reform bill, the Senate adopted a measure that, for the first time, would require registered lobbyists to disclose not only the limited money they can donate to candidates personally but also the tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars they raise from clients and friends and deliver as sheaves of checks — a tradition known as bundling.

If signed into law, the measure could expose a potent tool that lobbyists use to gain access on Capitol Hill and even at the White House. Although currently invisible in campaign finance disclosures, bundling is a pillar of the modern campaign. The ability to deliver an envelope of checks — each one in compliance with the federal limit — is one of the most valuable favors a lobbyist can provide a lawmaker. Bundling is also a major reason incumbents so easily outraise their challengers and so rarely lose their seats.

There are a host of uncertainties about the measure, including whether the House will agree to it. In addition, it is not clear whether lawmakers will shy from using lobbyists to collect money for their campaigns just because the extent of their reliance on lobbyists — and the special interests they represent — will be made more visible.

Still, the measure is causing ripples as interested parties learn details of what the Senate did.

"It is the most significant provision in the bill," said Marc Elias, a campaign finance lawyer who represents numerous senators. "They have essentially created a new campaign finance regulatory structure."

Since campaign finance laws cap individual contributions at $2,100 per election, or $4,200 for both a primary and a general election, lobbyists who can gather and bundle checks from scores of friends and clients stand out on a campaign team, sometimes earning hero status in a tight race.

"By the nature of what we do, you have to have people helping you to gather contributions," said Senator Mary L. Landrieu, a Louisiana Democrat who voted along with 95 others in favor of the ethics bill. "Otherwise you are raising $10 million or $20 million, $100 at a time."

And lobbyists, who earn their own income selling influence with the White House or Congress, have the most incentive to spend time holding fund-raisers or making calls to gather checks. "It is the capacity for fund-raising that gives lobbyists their power," said Meredith McGeehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center. "It is the currency of power in Washington."

As the money spent on presidential campaigns has swollen, candidates have formalized their networks of bundlers like a network marketing business. President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, for example, rewarded its fund-raisers with names like Pioneers, each of whom bundled at least $100,000, or Rangers, who bundled at least $200,000 apiece. Of the campaign's more than 500 bundlers, Public Citizen, the ethics advocacy group, identified more than 60 prominent lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0119826

Members of Congress, however, usually prefer not to call attention to their connections on K Street, where many lobbyists have offices. Some lawmakers have especially close ties to just a few lobbyists who play a big role in their fund-raising, and calling attention to those relationships could focus new scrutiny on their votes.

Given the reliance of many lawmakers on lobbyists as fund-raisers, the idea of requiring them to disclose their roles usually meets stiff resistance on Capitol Hill — all of it behind the scenes and almost none of it in public. House passage is far from assured, and its adoption by the Senate by a roll-call vote of 96 to 2 followed some backroom resistance among senators in both parties to allowing the idea to come up for a vote at all.

The Republicans who controlled the Senate last year refused to let it come up. And on Jan. 12, before the details of the proposal had been disclosed, Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat in charge of his party's fund-raising as head of the senatorial campaign committee, used a run-in on the Senate floor to deliver an angry rebuke to the disclosure idea's lead sponsor, Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, several people present or briefed on the confrontation said.

In a subsequent conversation, Mr. Schumer said he worried that the proposal could cramp fund-raising by placing an undue burden on potential bundlers, said aides who were briefed and a lawmaker familiar with their talk, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the nature of the talks.

"Senator Obama has not been the most popular person in our caucus in the last couple of weeks," said a Democratic aide involved in deliberations over the bill. Mr. Obama also this week started a bid for his party's presidential nomination.

Eric Schultz, a spokesman for Mr. Schumer, said the senator quickly supported the bill when he understood it would apply only to lobbyists. Registered lobbyists, of course, are not the only ones who seek to influence legislation, and the Senate measure would not affect other interested parties.

"As often happens when bills are on the floor, rumors swirl about what amendments contain or don't contain and that's what happened here," Mr. Schultz said. "But as soon as Senator Schumer saw the language and what was included, he supported it and in fact urged the Senate Democratic leadership to accept it."

A spokesman for Mr. Obama said the senator was pleased that the Democratic leaders made the legislation a priority but he would not comment on private discussions within the party.

In the House, Republicans quietly deleted a similar proposal, after it had passed in committee, before it could come to a floor vote. But on Friday, the proposal's previous sponsor, Representative Chris Van Hollen of Maryland, now chairman of the House Democrats' re-election committee, and Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, sent a letter to colleagues announcing plans to reintroduce it.

"Hopefully, requiring disclosure will begin to break the nexus between lawmaking and the efforts by lobbyists to enhance their influence by channeling money from special interests," Mr. Van Hollen said in an interview.

He said he saw no conflict with his new role as the House Democrats' chief fund-raiser. "It may make some kinds of fund-raising more difficult, but it will play at least as much on the Republican side as the Democratic side," he said. "From a political perspective, it is probably a wash."

The rules for bundling would require the approval of the House and the signature of the president. Many other elements of the Senate ethics overhaul do not require House approval because they change only Senate rules. But none of the Senate rules will take effect until a House and Senate conference harmonizes their respective rule changes.

Some lawmakers, however, acknowledged that anything addressing bundling was likely to face skepticism in both chambers.

"I am sick and tired of fund-raising," said Senator Bob Casey, a newly elected Pennsylvania Democrat who voted for the ethics bill. "When you sit in a room for four hours making calls, it kind of has a deadening effect on you."

He added, wryly, "Anything that reduces the amount of time that you are spending fund-raising is good for the country, and it is definitely good for me."

Senate Supports Transparency In Tariff Breaks (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0119827

By Joe Stephens

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The Senate joined the House this week by voting to make it easier for the public to track a stealthy form of trade legislation that has delivered hundreds of millions of dollars in tax savings to favored corporations.

As part of a broad ethics overhaul, the Senate voted 96 to 2 on Thursday to require lawmakers to publicly disclose details about tariff suspensions, which allow individual companies to escape paying import taxes on a range of products brought into the United States. The legislation would brand the tariff measures as a type of congressional earmark and would require the same disclosures now mandated for earmarks.

Under the new Senate rules, legislators would be required to disclose when they add a tariff suspension to a larger bill. Senators would have to justify the tax break in writing and name the company that would benefit. The information would have to be posted in a searchable form on the Internet at least two days before Congress votes on the measure.

Lawmakers would be barred from adding tariff suspensions to bills in exchange for another legislator's vote. Lawmakers also would not be allowed to add suspensions that would benefit them, their families, their staffs or their staff members' families.

"It certainly is going to shine a light into the dark recesses of Capitol Hill, where the tariff suspensions have lived for years," said Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "It will be a lot harder to game the system."

Ellis predicted that the changes would intensify pressure for more reform, as increased transparency led to additional questioning.

Tariff reform is a recent addition to the slate of proposed ethics changes in Congress. It surfaced as an issue in September, after a Washington Post investigation showed that the number of suspensions was skyrocketing and that those narrow measures primarily benefited large, foreign-based corporations. The Post showed how companies evaded a $500,000 cap on tariff savings by persuading lawmakers to file multiple bills with tax breaks aimed at the companies' imports. Small domestic companies struggled to keep abreast of proposals that foreign competitors could use to drive them out of business.

"I'm so excited," said Anita Dungey, a small-business owner from Upstate New York. "It's certainly keeping the legislature more accountable, and that's very, very important. It's good for U.S. workers and for U.S. companies."

Dungey said a tariff suspension initiated last year by Wal-Mart threatened to sink her family-owned business, Auburn Leathercrafters, which manufactures and sells dog collars and leashes.

In recent years, lobbyists have crafted most tariff suspensions to benefit just one corporation. Few of the measures identified the company that initiated the legislation. Many did not identify the product involved, instead using codes explained in a telephone-book-size tariff schedule.

That lack of transparency obscured the fact that the largest beneficiaries have been domestic subsidiaries of foreign corporations. In a study by The Post, eight of the 10 companies that stood to benefit most were owned by or affiliated with German and Swiss corporations.

Congressional sponsors of such bills said they are trying to lower consumer prices and create jobs by cutting costs for U.S. manufacturers and retailers. The sponsors said they generally dropped legislation if trade officials found a U.S. company that objected.

Under the Senate bill, the new tariff-suspension restrictions would apply to trade measures that would benefit 10 or fewer companies.

Before Thursday's vote, Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who was vice chairman of the House Republican Conference for the 109th Congress, derided the suspensions as "just good old-fashioned pork."

Senate Passes Ban On Lobbying By Some Spouses (WP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

For much of the past week, the prospects for a ban on lobbying by Senate spouses were uncertain.

DOJ_NMG_0119828

Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) wanted an exemption that excluded current spouses who already are registered to lobby. Sens. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) are among those who have spouses in that category.

But Thursday night, as the Senate enacted its ethics package, Reid dropped his insistence on a grandfather clause and agreed to an amendment sponsored by Sen. David Vitter (R-La.).

Vitter's amendment bans spouses from lobbying the Senate unless they were registered to lobby for at least one year before their husband or wife was elected. It was approved by unanimous consent.

The ban adopted by the Senate is specific to that chamber, but it still needs House approval before it can become law because it was part of a broader legislative package.

Neither chamber's ethics package deals with brothers, sisters or adult children of lawmakers who might lobby. Those issues might be addressed in a conference committee.

Former senator and presidential nominee Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) would not be affected by the ban because his wife, Elizabeth, was elected after Dole had begun lobbying. But the wives of Conrad and Stevens could be covered by the ban.

New Rules Still Allow Congress Many Perks (WP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

On the Monday that was supposed to start the new Congress's first five-day workweek, Minority Leader John A. Boehner helped persuade his Democratic colleagues to give House members the day off.

The Ohio Republican had his reasons. He was going to see Ohio State compete in the national championship football game in Arizona. Boehner had tickets for the stadium's nosebleed section. Then, Boehner's office said, Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. offered him a bird's-eye seat in one of the company's skyboxes.

In the skybox, Boehner mingled with lobbyists for the media giant, whose vast interests in Congress include broadcast-decency legislation and possible restrictions on its hugely popular MySpace Web site.

The perk for Boehner and the lobbying access for News Corp. are entirely permissible under the new ethics rules Congress imposed on itself this month -- provided Boehner personally reimburses the cost of the skybox ticket, which Boehner's office said he plans to do once the company sends him the bill. The lawmaker can use campaign funds, instead of personal money, to pay his airfare.

"He was there to support his home-state school," Boehner spokesman Brian Kennedy explained.

Voters in the last election demanded a change in Washington's ethics climate. The new Democratic congressional leadership responded with sweeping new prohibitions on gifts and travel from lobbyists, tough new limits on once-cheap corporate jet flights for lawmakers, and new requirements that lawmakers disclose the pet projects they earmark.

But the new rules, the toughest changes since Watergate, still leave lots of room for special interests to curry favor and lawmakers to raise big dollars.

The rules, which differ between the Senate and House, are aimed at some of the most attention-grabbing practices involving special interests. Experts such as Kenneth A. Gross, a lawyer who specializes in ethics and campaign issues, said they are designed to "significantly turn the volume down in terms of extravagance and in terms of what can be done." At the same time, they preserve, with some modification, some traditional practices.

For instance, lawmakers can still go to widely attended events or campaign events and accept freebies such as meals. Nonprofit organizations and universities can still provide lawmakers free travel in many cases. And lawmakers can still offer creative opportunities for special interests to meet with them -- for a price.

Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), the new chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, is offering special interests a chance next month to go skiing and snowmobiling in Big Sky country. All it takes is a $2,000 donation per person or a $5,000 donation from a political action committee, according to a "Save the Date" solicitation his Glacier PAC sent out to lobbyists.

If lobbyists miss the first outing, they can still catch Baucus this summer for fly-fishing or horseback riding at "Camp Baucus," the invitation promises.

DOJ_NMG_0119829

"It makes one pause when members of Congress raise one hand to vote on an ethics proposal to limit special interests and with the other hand outstretched behind their back ask for campaign contributions or perks from special interests," said Kent Cooper, a former federal election regulator who studies ethics and political money.

Rules that have been in force in the House and Senate for years say that members of Congress cannot promise an official act for a gift and must avoid the appearance of conflicts of interest. But when those rules apply can be murky, and the new ethics rules do not make it any clearer.

Around the time Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) was selected in November to be the new GOP whip, he flew with a company lobbyist aboard BellSouth's corporate jet from Washington to Jackson, Miss. The senator and lobbyist got to know each other better, discussed religion and talked generally about BellSouth's merger with AT&T that was pending at the Federal Communications Commission, company spokesman Bill McCloskey said. The next Sunday, Lott accepted the lobbyist's invitation to go to church together, McCloskey said.

A few weeks later, Lott was the highest-ranking lawmaker to sign a Dec. 8 letter in which 14 senators demanded that the FCC approve the BellSouth-AT&T merger before the end of the holidays. Regulators approved the deal on the eve of New Year's weekend.

McCloskey said there was no connection between the flight and the letter, noting Lott was a longtime supporter of BellSouth, had flown nearly a dozen times aboard its jet since 2001 and had written a letter last fall supporting the merger. That letter came six weeks after another flight Lott took courtesy of BellSouth.

"Lott has supported the merger as good for Mississippi for some time," McCloskey said.

Lott's office did not return repeated calls seeking comment.

For Lott's Nov. 13 trip, he had to pay $1,335, the equivalent of a first-class ticket. The money came from his campaign.

Under their new ethics rules, senators can continue to take corporate jets, but the cost to their campaign will be much higher because the new rules require reimbursement at full charter rates. House members, however, are essentially banned from using corporate jets.

Fact-finding trips paid for by special interests are another practice covered by the new rules, and although they will become less extravagant and less frequent, there will still be plenty of permissible opportunities to take them.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) took his wife, Victoria, with him when he gave a speech in Florence at an event sponsored by New York University, and they were driven around Florence in a car paid for by the school. Kennedy reported that the school paid $1,560 for car service and $257 for a hotel.

Half a dozen House Democrats did not travel quite as far as Kennedy but still took a free post-election trip to Panama City courtesy of the CaribNews Foundation.

The listed purpose of the travel was to attend a business conference, and some lawmakers brought relatives, whose expenses were also paid by the foundation. For instance, new House ethics committee chairwoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) took her sister along, and Reps. David Scott (D-Ga.) and Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) took their wives.

The new ethics rules will continue to allow for trips such as these that are paid by universities or nonprofit organizations that do not have registered Washington lobbyists. The length and costs of trips, however, could be trimmed, said Gross, who thinks that such trips can be valuable to members of congress. "The new rules," he said, "strike a balance, although on the edges, there can be some abuse still."

One area that was not addressed in the new rules was the use of campaign funds that can directly or indirectly benefit lawmakers or their families. Those practices were illustrated most recently by Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) and Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.).

Doolittle drew the scrutiny of federal investigators during the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal when it came out that the congressman's wife was getting paid both by Abramoff and by Doolittle's political action committee for fundraising work around the same time the congressman took actions favorable to Abramoff's clients.

Reports Doolittle filed with the Federal Election Commission through this month show his Superior California Federal Leadership PAC paid his wife's firm nearly $100,000 during the 2006 election cycle, including $4,000 in the weeks after the November election. Doolittle has said he will no longer pay his wife that way.

DOJ_NMG_0119830

Likewise, Mollohan reported that in the last two months of 2006 his campaign spent $140,000 on lawyers he had hired to deal with his legal problems. Mollohan was forced to step down from the House ethics committee last year over a federal probe into taxpayer money he steered to a network of nonprofit foundations connected to himself or other insiders.

Real Ethics Reform (WP)

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

THIS BEING a season for celebrating Shakespeare in Washington, perhaps the best way to describe the ethics and lobbying bill that passed the Senate on Thursday is to quote the Bard: "All's Well That Ends Well." The final package is the strongest ethics legislation to emerge from Congress yet. Like the rules changes the House adopted this month, it would bar lawmakers from taking free gifts, meals and entertainment. No longer would lobbyists and private interests be allowed to throw lavish parties honoring lawmakers at political conventions. Travel paid for by private interests would be dramatically curtailed. Lawmakers' cut-rate corporate jet flights would be grounded. The revolving door would be slowed, with lawmakers having to wait two years, not the current one year, before lobbying their former colleagues.

The bill would bring far more transparency to money in Washington: how lawmakers choose to spend it and how it is deployed to influence them. On the spending side, the measure calls for disclosure of an array of earmarked pet projects. On the influence side, lobbyists would not only have to report their own campaign contributions, but they also would have to list the fundraisers they held and the "bundled" contributions they arranged or collected for lawmakers, the real source of their power.

We've had our doubts about the commitment of Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) to a strong ethics bill; we've had our qualms about his conduct. But Mr. Reid, along with Sens. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), deserves credit for assembling and passing this package. Whether Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) was trying to sabotage passage of the bill when he temporarily blocked a move to end debate, as reformers contend, or whether he was simply trying to demonstrate to the new majority that Senate Republicans can't be muscled aside, what matters is that the measure passed 96 to 2.

As always, there are provisions we wish had been included. It was disappointing that senators voted to strip from the bill a requirement that lobbyists disclose the costs of grass-roots efforts to influence lawmakers. It was unfortunate that backers of an independent Office of Public Integrity to beef up enforcement of ethics rules insisted on a vote on their measure, which lost even more resoundingly than it did last year. As the House studies how to improve the current, inadequate enforcement system, we hope the Senate vote won't be the chamber's last word on some kind of independent enforcement mechanism.

The focus now moves to the House, which adopted new ethics rules but still needs to move on the lobbying changes. Following that, it's important that the resulting conference be held quickly to meld the two bills, not used as a behind-the-scenes vehicle to make quiet but crippling changes.

Reform, Finally, In The Senate (NYT)

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

The Senate has finally passed credible reforms of its shabby ethics code, reining in lawmakers' more egregious quid pro quo dealings with their fund-raising cohorts in the lobbying industry. The Republican minority had second thoughts about how its transparently obstructionist tactics would look to constituents. And an overwhelming majority then approved the first serious anticorruption strictures since the Watergate era, banning gifts, entertainment, travel and other inducements that lobbyists and their employers use in greasing privileged access to lawmakers and their staffs.

The Senate action is particularly praiseworthy for zeroing in on the money-sweet heart of the matter: lobbyists will have to disclose the way they "bundle" multiple corporate donations as campaign sweeteners for grateful lawmakers. Also, senators must henceforth pay full charter rates for the lobbyist-catered corporate jets they have been flying for token fees. And they will have to own up to the purpose and cost of their last-minute "earmarks" — lucrative contracts for favored pleaders that are stealthily approved without debate.

The Senate also voted to end the lavish parties paid for by fawning fat cats to "honor" key politicians at the presidential conventions. And it voted against a growing scandal closer to home, barring spouses of newly elected members from lobbying the Senate. Lawmakers also banned members from secretly negotiating for prized jobs in industries too often under their official purview.

DOJ_NMG_0119831

These are strong measures, and Harry Reid, the majority leader, deserves credit for prevailing with a bipartisan approach despite his lobbyist-friendly instincts. Unfortunately, the Senate again failed to create an independent anticorruption monitor to reach beyond the clubby traditions that have masked abusers. Mr. Reid should join House Speaker Nancy Pelosi in pursuing this needed measure.

It was heartening to see that the bill was toughened, not undercut, by amendments from two Democrats and a Republican. Notably absent from the infighting was John McCain of Arizona, a past advocate for reform who may be too busy placating G.O.P. powers for his expected bid for the presidency. The Senate did well enough without him.

Senator's Condition Improves (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Senator Tim Johnson is taking part in three hours of physical, occupational and speech therapy every day, and his tracheotomy tube has been removed, doctors at George Washington University Hospital said. Mr. Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat, suffered a brain hemorrhage more than a month ago. He is doing strengthening exercises to gain mobility on his right side, said Dr. Philip Marion, head of rehabilitation at the hospital.

"100-Hour" Agenda Is Completed (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Democrats completed their six-bill, 100-hour legislative agenda Thursday night, with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) proclaiming, "This was only the beginning."

The last of the "Six for '06" bills that Democrats promised voters in the fall passed about 87 hours after the 110th Congress opened Jan. 4.

The Democrats' clock, which counted only the time spent directly on the six bills, showed that 42 hours and 15 minutes had elapsed when the roll call ended on the last bill, energy legislation that would reimpose billions in fees, royalties and taxes on the oil industry.

Republicans complained that the bills were hammered through after Democrats reneged on a campaign promise to let the opposition offer amendments and help shape legislation.

"Many of the flawed 100-hours bills either face an uphill battle in the Senate or are destined for a veto pen," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Pelosi dismissed the complaints. "It was about keeping our promise, not about adhering to some process," she said.

House Votes To Reshape Page Board (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The House yesterday unanimously voted to overhaul the board supervising its teenage pages, responding to a scandal that helped Democrats win control of Congress.

The vote was 416 to 0 to expand the membership of the House Page Board, whose Republican chairman never told two board colleagues that he had been warned that then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) was a "ticking time bomb."

Foley became acquainted with the pages, high school students who run errands for lawmakers, while they worked in Congress and kept in touch after they left. He sent e-mails that House officials deemed "over-friendly." Others were sent sexually explicit instant messages.

Foley resigned Sept. 29 in the wake of news reports of his conduct.

DOJ_NMG_0119832

The expanded board now includes a former page and the parent of a current or former page. The eight-member body will include four House members -- two from each party -- as well as the clerk of the House and the sergeant-at-arms, who are permanent members.

The page board also would meet regularly under the legislation.

Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), a board member, said the equal party representation "takes it out of the political realm," adding: "There's no way there should be a partisan upper hand when talking about the governance of the page board."

House Approves Reform Of Page Board (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, January 19, 2007

Following close scrutiny and criticism of its page program, the House on Friday approved changes to the Page Board to prevent a repeat of the kind of scandal that led to Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) resignation.

Foley stepped down in September after inappropriate messages he had sent to a former page were brought to light. A House ethics committee investigation of the matter criticized the handling of early indications that Foley acted improperly, but absolved all lawmakers and staff of ethics violations.

The bill, which passed 416-0, changes the composition of the House Page Board, which had consisted of two members of the majority party and one of the minority party. Now, the board will include a second member of the minority, a parent of a current or former page, and a former page. The former page on the board can be neither a member of Congress nor the parent of a page.

The legislation also requires the Page Board meet "regularly," based on a schedule determined by the House Speaker and the minority leader.

House Votes To Expand Board Overseeing Teen Pages (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — Four months after the congressional page scandal rocked Capitol Hill and helped dash Republican hopes for holding their majorities in Congress, the House voted unanimously Friday to expand the board that oversees the teenage interns and require that it meet regularly.

The House voted 416 to 0 to reorganize the House Page Board so that it has two congressional members from each party, the House clerk, the sergeant at arms, one parent of a page and one former page.

The eight-member board will be responsible for oversight of the roughly 70 pages — usually 16-year-olds who spend a year running errands for members of Congress and their staffs while attending school in the nation's capital.

Passage of the measure, aimed at protecting a venerable program more than a century old, was the last item Democrats wanted to check off on a list of priorities for their first weeks in power. Their agenda was aimed at demonstrating their responsiveness to the ire that voters showed in November.

The page scandal began in late September, when it came to light that then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had written sexually explicit instant messages to several former male pages. Foley, who had also served as chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, quickly resigned, but the revelations snowballed as reporters tracked down former pages and outraged parents.

Before it was over, the scandal embroiled then-House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) in questions about his oversight of the program, and whether Foley had been protected by a coterie of high-ranking GOP officials who failed to rein him in.

The House Ethics Committee investigated the Foley case and released its findings in December. It said that as former House clerk, Jeff Trandahl had warned Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), then chairman of the page board, that Foley was a "ticking time bomb" who had been confronted repeatedly about his conduct. Shimkus did not call a meeting of the page board, and according to the committee's report, he told a colleague "he believed he had done the right thing in 2005 based on the information he had" when he told Foley not to contact one of the pages again.

DOJ_NMG_0119833

The ethics panel found "a significant number of instances where members, officers or employees failed to exercise appropriate diligence and oversight."

But the committee said that none had violated any House rules and recommended that no one be disciplined.

Exit polls from the 2006 election showed that 49% of voters cast their ballots out of concern for the war in Iraq, but 25% cited "moral issues."

During Friday's debate, several members expressed anger at Shimkus for not taking a more proactive approach.

"The board must not only be free of partisanship, but must function so all of the members have access" to allegations of misconduct, said House Administration Committee Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Carson).

Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), a page board member who was not told of the concerns about Foley, will remain on the reconstituted board.

"This legislation balances the partisan makeup of the page board," Capito said. "I believe this provision is important symbolically because it demonstrates that nothing the page board does in acting to keep children safe is partisan."

Measure Offers Norton More Voting Power (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

A senior House Democrat announced yesterday the party will introduce a measure next week that would allow D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton to vote on amendments on the floor of the chamber.

The D.C. delegate is allowed to vote only in House committees. Norton (D) has been fighting for a bill that would grant the District one full voting member in the House, and Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) announced yesterday a campaign to support that measure.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the House majority leader, announced yesterday that the chamber will vote Wednesday on a rule change that would grant the voting power to Norton and other non-state delegates. A similar measure was passed by the Democratic-controlled House in 1993, but it was rolled back by Republicans who took control two years later.

Norton said yesterday that she was grateful for Hoyer's move but that it wasn't enough and could even confuse supporters of broader voting powers for the District.

When she was given the vote on amendments in 1993, "it was a great leap forward," she said. "Today, of course, it would be a terrible setback to concentrate" on the more limited voting powers.

Norton spoke hours after Fenty (D) announced a "people's march" on Congress in April to press for full representation for the District. He also said he would call on volunteers to join a Feb. 15 lobbying day on Capitol Hill to push for action on the voting rights bill.

Fenty, who was sworn into office Jan. 2, has called voting rights "the city's Number One priority." The popular mayor has jumped on the issue, lobbying congressional representatives and joining Norton in meeting with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to urge her support.

But Norton clashed openly with Fenty at his news conference yesterday, saying the voting rights bill she reintroduced recently faces a crucial period in the next two months, and a large march shouldn't wait until April.

"Any action of D.C. on behalf of this bill has to happen in February and early March," Norton told the news conference. By April, she said, the House will be tied up with a raft of defense and appropriations bills.

The news conference reflected tensions between two of the city's top elected officials. Norton said she had not been informed of the date for the march -- April 16, Emancipation Day -- until she arrived at yesterday's event. Members of her staff said later that they had been told the exact date but mentioned only the month to Norton.

Most of the D.C. Council appeared with Fenty to express support for the campaign for voting rights. Also present were Hilary O. Shelton, director of the NAACP's Washington bureau, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), co-sponsor of the D.C vote bill.

"We want everyone on Emancipation Day to be talking about the fact D.C. has got to have full voting rights," Fenty said, announcing the march down Pennsylvania Avenue.

DOJ_NMG_0119834

Emancipation Day marks the day -- April 16, 1862 -- that President Abraham Lincoln signed an act freeing more than 3,100 slaves in the District of Columbia. The District made the day an official city holiday in 2005.

Norton thanked Fenty for his support but said April is too late to mobilize citizens. And she said the lobbying day in February isn't enough.

"A zillion groups come up to lobby," she said. The bill "will get attention from Congress when they see those citizens" in the streets.

Fenty then indicated he might switch course and turn the lobbying day into a mass event.

"We're going to make that as big as humanly possible," he said.

Mayoral aides and D.C. vote supporters said they were dismayed by Norton's public disagreement with Fenty. The mayor and Norton met after the news conference to iron out their differences and agreed to work together on the events, Norton said.

The bill co-sponsored by Norton and Davis would add two seats to the House -- one for the District, which is overwhelmingly Democratic, and one for heavily Republican Utah.

The measure was approved by one House committee in the last Congress, but it did not reach the floor for a vote.

Supporters say the bipartisan bill offers the city its best hope in years of getting a representative with full voting rights in the House. Opponents have questioned whether it is constitutional. And some people have said it does not go far enough because it would not give the District voting representation in the Senate.

The rule change to be introduced Wednesday would allow Norton and the other delegates to vote in the committee of the whole, which handles most major House votes -- except on the final passage of legislation.

The added voting power would have an important caveat, though: If the delegates cast the deciding votes, other legislators could disregard the decision and request a new vote, without the delegates' participation.

House Likely To Give Norton A Vote (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer yesterday said the chamber will consider a resolution next week to allow D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton to vote on changes to proposed legislation.

"The purpose is our democracy," Mr. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said on the House floor yesterday.

Democrats, now in the majority, likely have the votes to pass such a rule change when it comes up Wednesday.

Republican leaders, who for more than a decade have not allowed Mrs. Norton a vote, complained that Mr. Hoyer's speech was the "first notice" they had been given about the upcoming vote, which would require majority approval for passage.

Mrs. Norton said she is pleased with the plan and hopes it will inspire more changes. She said the small step pales in comparison with her priority of achieving full voting rights for the District.

"I think it's a good thing to do," said Mrs. Norton, a Democrat. "I suppose you could say it will hold me over till I get the whole vote."

If the measure is approved, Mrs. Norton would be able to add amendments and vote on legislation, except when it is before the House for final passage. Other members could request a new vote without Mrs. Norton's ballot if she casts a deciding vote.

Mrs. Norton, serving her ninth term in Congress, had similar privileges during the Democratic-controlled 103rd Congress. However, the Republican majority withdrew them in 1995.

The D.C. delegate said she was disappointed that congressional leaders did not just include the vote in the rules package adopted by the House earlier this year.

She also said her more pressing goal is to push for passage of the D.C. voting rights bill, which she hopes will be marked up next month and come to the House floor for a vote in March.

The rules change "was a big step forward in 1993," Mrs. Norton said. "If that was what we were left with this year, it would be a big step backward."

The voting rights bill -- originally introduced in May by Mrs. Norton and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican -- would give one vote to the District, which is predominantly Democratic, and another to Utah, a mostly Republican state.

DOJ_NMG_0119835

Mrs. Norton and Mr. Davis reintroduced the measure in the new Democratic-controlled Congress after the previous Republican-controlled Congress adjourned without bringing the bill to a vote.

Both Mr. Hoyer and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, have expressed support for giving the District a full vote in Congress.

Hoyer spokeswoman Stacey Farnen-Bernards said the change in rules is "not a substitute for the D.C. vote."

Davis spokesman Brian McNicoll said the congressman has supported the committee vote for Mrs. Norton since 2000, but he reiterated that the ultimate goal is for the District to have a full vote in Congress.

"Our focus is the whole enchilada, to get [Mrs. Norton] a vote in Congress," Mr. McNicoll said. "This certainly could get these guys in the habit of voting for this."

The rules change would also allow votes for delegates from the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa and Puerto Rico, and has sparked some debate on the House floor.

Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, said the move was "controversial" in the 1990s and wondered whether the purpose of the change was simply to add four Democratic votes on the House floor.

"The majority is in the majority. Four of these five delegates are on the majority's side," Mr. Blunt said.

Meanwhile, D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and other voting rights advocates yesterday announced several initiatives aimed at achieving full congressional voting rights.

Advocates released a copy of a letter sent yesterday to Mrs. Pelosi asking for early congressional action on the Norton-Davis bill. Plans are also in the works for voting rights volunteers to lobby members of Congress on Feb. 15.

Mr. Fenty is also planning a voting rights march from Freedom Plaza to the Capitol on April 16.

In D.C., Perry Builds Bridges With Texas Dems (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — Republican Gov. Rick Perry and Texas' 13 U.S. House Democrats sought to bury the hatchet Friday after years of chilly relations and mistrust aggravated by the redistricting battle that forced five Democrats from Congress in 2004.

Perry slipped quietly onto Capitol Hill for a breakfast meeting with the Texas Democrats, a first-of-its-kind summit that was not listed on his public schedule or mentioned beforehand by the congressional offices.

The Democrats emerged saying they had a chance to air their gripes with Perry and brief him on legislative priorities that could benefit from teamwork, such as improving the state Children's Health Insurance Program and increasing highway funding and higher-education grants.

"It was the first time for me in over a decade that I've had a reasonable word with the governor," Rep. Gene Green, D-Houston, said after the breakfast in the office of Rep. Solomon Ortiz of Corpus Christi.

"He got an earful," Ortiz, dean of the delegation, said.

Before the meeting, Perry defused one major irritant by terminating the state's controversial contracts with two Republican lobbying firms in Washington.

The Democrats had said hiring outside lobbyists was a waste of taxpayer money considering they are elected to represent the state's interests.

"I'm glad the governor felt the heat or saw the light," Green said.

Still, feelings remained raw about Perry's support of the unusual mid-decade redistricting engineered for the 2004 elections by then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land.

"Texas will pay a serious price in the years ahead" without the experience of the veteran Democratic lawmakers who lost their election bids, Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Waco, told Perry.

With no redistricting, Edwards said, Texans would now be chairing the Homeland Security, Agriculture and Rules committees.

The governor assured the members that he will not attempt to redraw district lines again before the end of the decade, said Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-El Paso.

DOJ_NMG_0119836

Perry, who met Friday with Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt and the Republican Governors Association, was unavailable for comment, spokesman Robert Black said.

Perry "is not looking back," Black said. "Others can — the governor is not going to."

Rep. Nick Lampson, swept out of office after the redistricting only to claim DeLay's old seat this year, welcomed Perry's overture to the Democrats, saying his prior relationship with him was "nonexistent."

Lampson said he told Perry, "You must build relationships and friendships and through that you can begin to look beyond personalities and do the things that are right for Texas."

As for the Democrats' complaint that Perry has frozen them out during his time in office, Black said: "All I can say is if the men and women of the Democratic congressional delegation think that's been lacking, then the governor's effort today, I hope, was an opportunity to restore" closer ties.

The governor will meet today in Dallas with the delegation's Republican members.

Returning gestureOrtiz said the Democrats will do some fence-mending of their own on a trip to Austin in the next few months to meet with state legislators,

Black said that last week the governor's office notified the Federalist Group and Cassidy & Associates, which receive monthly payments from the state of $10,000 and $15,000 respectively, that their contracts were being terminated Feb. 11.

The contracts were doubly irritating to the Democrats because the lobbying firms donated money to GOP candidates challenging Democratic congressional incumbents.

"It was almost like they were just turning money over to our opponents," Green said. "That just leaves a bad taste in my mouth."

During the fall gubernatorial campaign, Perry challenger Carole Keeton Strayhorn criticized the governor for hiring the lobbyists, who had ties to DeLay and to disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Perry's termination of the contracts is acknowledgment of the fact that Democrats have reclaimed power on Capitol Hill, Black said.

"We recognize that things have changed in Washington and we are going to change as well," Black said. The governor is contemplating going in "new directions," he added, and he declined to rule out the possibility that the state might hire lobbying firms with better connections to congressional Democrats.

Stem Cell Policy Hampering Research, NIH Official Says (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The National Institutes of Health official overseeing the implementation of President Bush's embryonic stem cell policy yesterday suggested that the controversial program is delaying cures, an unusually blunt assessment for an executive branch official.

In prepared Senate testimony, Story Landis, director of the NIH's National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke and interim chair of the agency's stem cell task force, closely mirrored previous testimony from other NIH officials, who have for years been careful not to criticize the Bush policy directly, even though that policy has infuriated many scientists because of the limits it places on embryo cell work.

But under questioning, Landis spoke more plainly. When Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) asked her how the policy was affecting medical research, she said, "We are missing out on possible breakthroughs." The ability to work on newly derived stem cell colonies -- precluded from federal funding under the Bush plan -- "would be incredibly important," she added.

Landis also declared that "science works best when scientists can pursue all avenues of research. If the cure for Parkinson's disease or juvenile diabetes lay behind one of four doors, wouldn't you want the option to open all four doors at once instead of one door?"

Those and related comments left at least some at the hearing wondering whether a Democratic majority in Congress had emboldened the NIH.

DOJ_NMG_0119837

But NIH spokesman John Burklow denied that the agency is getting uppity. Landis's testimony "reflects her scientific opinion," he said.

The House passed a bill this month that would loosen Bush's restrictions, and the Senate is poised to do so in February. Bush has promised to veto the bill.

The Ballad Of Bushie And Flashy (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

George Bush may have lost his swagger, but Harry Flashman hasn't.

Maybe the president presiding over a quicksand empire got a vicarious thrill out of the fictional Victorian brigadier general who roamed from Chillianwalla to Isandlwana to Abyssinia at the height of the British Empire, always making conquests in love and war despite his cowardly, caddish behavior.

In our continuing odyssey of discovery through the president's reading list, we learned that he perused two of George MacDonald Fraser's Flashman books, "Flashman at the Charge" and "Flash for Freedom."

There are those who are skeptical of the president's souped-up reading list, a result of a book-reading contest with Karl Rove.

"I don't think he understands the world," Jay Rockefeller, the new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, told The Times's Mark Mazzetti. "I don't think he's particularly curious about the world. I don't think he reads like he says he does. Every time he's read something he tells you about it."

I just wish W. had read more about the perils of empire before he naïvely dived into one. Mr. Fraser agrees that W. should have read the original "Flashman" before invading Afghanistan. It could have given him invaluable, if politically incorrect, insights that might have helped in the effort to catch Osama at Tora Bora and in the new push to stop the Taliban slouching toward Kandahar.

On a recent visit to Afghanistan, Robert Gates told nervous military commanders that he was open to sending more troops to thwart the Taliban from regrouping. Congressman John McHugh, who just returned from a trip to Afghanistan with Hillary Clinton and Evan Bayh, said that everyone they talked to had warned "that when the snows melt in the mountains, it will bring a new onslaught from Al Qaeda and the Taliban ... one that directly threatens not just the Karzai presidency, but threatens Afghanistan itself, and logically, it follows, threatens our investment in blood and treasure."

"Flashman" is based on a devastating British defeat during one of their wars in Afghanistan. After invading Kabul in 1839 and setting up an unpopular puppet shah, the British trekked through the snowy mountains to Jalalabad. Of more than 16,000 troops and camp followers, only one doctor survived; the rest were picked off in ambushes by Afghan warriors.

The lesson is that Afghanistan is a no man's land that can't be tamed by gringos. The British Empire, on which the sun never set, never succeeded in occupying Afghanistan even as it engaged in the Great Game with the Russians for influence there. It was terra incognita and terra fuggedaboutit.

"You could never forget that in Afghanistan you are walking a knife-edge the whole time," Harry Flashman notes, adding that, like himself, the Afghans could be "cruel and bloodthirsty," turning on you with no warning.

Mr. Fraser echoed those sentiments when I tracked him down at his home on the Isle of Man. "No one has ever succeeded in invading Afghanistan," the octogenarian who fought in Burma in World War II boomed with a trace of Scottish accent.

"The Afghans are extraordinary fighters, tough and resourceful and cruel, and they know their business inside out," he said. "On their own territory, they're unbeatable. They love fighting and dealing with invaders. It's almost a game to them. The country is Death Valley 10 times over. You see them on television in their robes with their weapons and that's all. The American and British troops are loaded with rubbishy equipment.

"Eventually, I suppose, we'll get out of Iraq and pretend it's been a success when it's just a mess. ... "Afghanistan is slightly different. You cannot ever win. When you consider the Russians put in more than 100,000 troops and couldn't do it. There's only one way to deal with the Afghans, and that's to buy them."

Mr. Fraser recites the end of Kipling's "The Ballad of the King's Mercy":

DOJ_NMG_0119838

Abdhur Rahman, the Durani Chief, of him is the story told,
He has opened his mouth to the North and the South,
They have stuffed his mouth
with gold ...
and sweet his favours are ...
from Balkh to Kandahar.
"It wouldn't do Bush any harm to read Kipling," he concluded before signing off.

Sex And The Single-Minded (NYT)

By Stacy Schiff
The New York Times, January 20, 2007

How to get a job in Washington, that balmy, bipartisan town: Direct an organization that opposes contraception on the grounds that it is "demeaning to women." Compare premarital sex to heroin addiction. Advertise a link between breast cancer and abortion — a link that was refuted in 1997. Rant against sex ed. And hatch a loony theory about hormones.

You're a shoo-in, and if your name is Eric Keroack you're in your second month as deputy assistant secretary for population affairs at the Department of Health and Human Services. Dr. Keroack, a 46-year-old Massachusetts ob-gyn, today oversees the $280 million Title X program, the only federal program "designed to provide access to contraceptive supplies and information to all who want and need them, with priority given to low-income persons."

It's not a job that plays to Dr. Keroack's talents, which happen to be prodigious. In the PowerPoint presentation that has cemented his reputation, he makes the case that premarital sex suppresses the hormone oxytocin, thereby impairing one's ability to forge a successful long-term relationship. If forced to mince words you might call this fanciful or speculative. Otherwise you'd call it wacko. "Really, really scary" and "utterly hilarious" were the first two reactions I heard from scientists.

Each of us owes a rather critical debt to oxytocin. It's what moves a new mother to comfort and nurse a squalling baby rather than to toss it from the window, as common sense might dictate. It is — you knew your husband was missing something — the hormone of intimacy. (No, you can't buy supplements across the border. And yes, OxyContin is something different. Rush Limbaugh was not working on his bonding instincts.)

Louann Brizendine, a neuropsychiatrist at the University of California, San Francisco, calls oxytocin the Glinda the Good Witch of her field. It is the drug of trust and partnership and attachment, commonly known by their street name: love. Oxytocin mellows, elates, and throws you into a mental fog. Rats prefer it to cocaine. While the rush at childbirth is particularly dramatic, the hormone swells with physical and emotional bonding of all kinds.

"Surge" has not always been a dirty word.

But no one has had as much good, clean fun with oxytocin as Dr. Keroack, for whom it is "God's superglue." Extrapolating in part from research with prairie voles, which are monogamous, he postulates that oxytocin cannot survive too much sex, at least with multiple partners, at least prior to marriage. By way of demonstration he proposes the duct tape test: you need only an adhesive and a hairy arm. The tape represents the brain. Press it down. Now reapply. See what happens? Less sticky, right? Concludes Keroack: "Basically, you will end up damaging your brain's ability to use the oxytocin system as a chemical mechanism that serves to help you successfully bond in future relationships." Don't ask about his illustrations. They are offensive.

Keroack presents this as gospel truth, though the scientists on whose research he bases his theory balk. One called it a wild leap. "A bungee jump without a cord," suggested another expert. Dr. Brizendine had a less kind word for it. She adds that while premarital sex cannot ruin your oxytocin response, it has been shown — in the absence of options — to ruin your life. Something tells me that Dr. Keroack is not planning a 34th anniversary bash on Monday for Roe v. Wade.

I know what you're thinking: if Dr. Keroack can write stuff this outlandish he's spelling his name wrong. As the other Keroua c said — arguably with a firmer grasp of neurochemistry — "I had nothing to offer anybody but my own confusion." Dr. Keroack may want to borrow the disclaimer that prefaces Michael Crichton's newest best-seller: "This novel is fiction, except for the parts that aren't." It takes an agenda rather than a medical degree to engage in this kind of science. Or an imagination.

DOJ_NMG_0119839

In all fairness, Dr. Keroack has long been a little clumsy as an analogist. In a 2001 letter to the Massachusetts Legislature he explained the logic of performing sonograms on women considering abortion: "Even Midas lets you look at your old muffler before they advise you to change it."

There are many ways to define demeaning.

The Biggest Man On Campus (NYT)

By James F. Hollifield

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WHEN I was a graduate student at Duke in 1981, the university was faced with a difficult decision: Should it accept the papers of its law school alumnus, Richard M. Nixon, and build a library and museum named for one of the most controversial presidents in American history? Some within the university said that to accept the papers would be to embrace a failed president who resigned in disgrace to avoid impeachment. Others argued that the documents would be a treasure trove for future scholars seeking to understand what happened during the turbulent years of the Nixon presidency.

At the time I had the luxury of watching this drama unfold from the sidelines. Today I do not. As the director of a center for political studies at Southern Methodist University, I was invited to sit on an academic planning committee for the George W. Bush presidential library. By agreeing to serve on this committee, I took a stand in favor of Southern Methodist University's bid for the library, in part because I think Duke made a mistake in not accepting the Nixon library.

George W. Bush — like Harry Truman, Richard Nixon, Lyndon Johnson and Jimmy Carter in their day — is a controversial president for difficult times. But we must put partisanship aside and strive for historical perspective. We must consider the importance of having presidential libraries to help generations of scholars understand the times in which we live, and to inform future policy debates.

Whether one supports or opposes the Bush policies, there is no question that they have been momentous for the country and the world. Precisely because of the controversial nature of this presidency, the question of how George W. Bush made his decisions begs for scholarly research and discourse. The library will be a gold mine for scholars, and its location on a university campus symbolizes the need for study.

At Duke more than 20 years ago and at Southern Methodist today, opponents of such libraries have said that by building a presidential library and creating schools or institutes, a university compromises its values and endorses the policies of the president whose papers it accepts. I do not think this is the case. It is legitimate for anyone to criticize the president and his policies, but it is presumptuous for us as scholars to say that we know in advance and with certainty what the legacy of a sitting president will be.

Campuses are good places to situate presidential libraries because universities are vital to the American marketplace of ideas, and they are bulwarks of our free society. They can serve as repositories of archives from which we will learn and grow as a nation. But the faculty is a university's heart and soul, and faculty members are not disconnected from the politics of the moment.

As bad as the situation may seem today, back in 1971, when the University of Texas dedicated a library and school named for Lyndon Johnson, the country was in even greater turmoil. A storm of controversy raged over the Johnson papers. But I think the University of Texas made the right decision to accept the papers and build the library and school.

Southern Methodist University should do the same. Yes, former presidents are interested in polishing their legacies, and universities must be careful to remain nonpartisan and protect freedom of inquiry. But we must also take the long view, and that means building institutions that will serve generations to come, giving historians the chance to do their work.

Archives Of Spin (NYT)

By Benjamin Hufbauer

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

SINCE Franklin D. Roosevelt dedicated the first federal presidential library — actually an archive and history museum — in 1941, each president has had a hand in developing his own memorial. The National Archives and Records Administration now oversees 11 presidential libraries that draw about two million tourists and thousands of scholars each year.

DOJ_NMG_0119840

The uproar over President Bush's plans to store his papers at Southern Methodist University has drawn new attention to the role of our system of presidential libraries. It is a system facing at least six challenges that need to be addressed by Congress, current and former presidents, host universities and the American public.

First, according to the Office of Presidential Libraries, it will take up to 100 years for the papers and records at the recent presidential libraries to be processed, primarily because of an explosion in the number of records created by the executive branch. The Roosevelt Library has 17 million pages of documents, while the Clinton Library has more than 76 million, but the number of archivists has not kept pace.

A wait of 100 years is unacceptable. To be able to learn from our history, scholars, journalists and the public need access to a majority of records in presidential libraries within 20 years after a president leaves office. To meet this challenge, the newer libraries must add a substantial number of archivists, as well as new processing protocols and systems.

Second, we should insist on historical accuracy, completeness and balance in the museums in presidential libraries. Although the federal government's Office of Presidential Libraries states that the museum exhibits in presidential libraries should be accurate, historical amnesia is common in relation to a president's mistakes and controversial policies. For example, the museum in the Reagan Library does not mention the Iran-contra scandal.

The exhibits in newer presidential libraries often amount to little more than extended campaign commercials in museum form, because the former president and his supporters essentially control the content. If a president wants a museum of political propaganda, let him make that plain by not asking the federal government to administer it, but instead raising the large endowment needed to run it as a private memorial.

Since 99 percent of visitors to presidential libraries are there for the museum exhibits, this is an important issue. The exhibitions in older libraries usually improve after the president dies and the power of his supporters slowly wanes, but it should not take 20 to 50 years to get historically accurate displays in taxpayer-supported museums.

The Office of Presidential Libraries, however, bows to presidents' wishes for whitewashed museums. Congress should pass appropriate legislation on this issue. Each museum should be evaluated in a non-partisan fashion by a group of historians, and then changes should be made to ensure that the public gets the quality of information expected from a branch of the National Archives.

Third, the fund-raising for presidential libraries needs to be made transparent. Starting with Roosevelt, presidents have raised money from private sources and then turned their libraries over to be administered by the federal government. Currently donations are unregulated, and donors — whether individuals, corporations or even foreign governments — can remain anonymous. These donors can potentially wield real influence over a sitting president, without the knowledge of the public. Congress should require the disclosure of the identities of large donors and of the amounts involved.

Fourth, only a few libraries have strong educational programs. The Truman Library, for one, has developed an innovative program for middle and high school students called the White House Decision Center. The Decision Center recreates some areas of the West Wing, where students play the roles of President Truman, his advisers and members of his cabinet while dealing with a variety of historical crises. The Decision Center curriculum meets state and national standards for social studies, sharpening students' skills in cooperative group work, problem solving, and communication, while teaching them history using copies of primary documents from the library's archive. Libraries and Congress should find the private and public funds to develop other educational programs with serious historical content.

Fifth, presidential policy institutes associated with universities should be subject to academic oversight. This oversight should involve the appointment of a significant number of people from a variety of departments from the sponsoring university to the institute's governing board. The administration of the institute should be designed so that the university and the institute both gain from the association.

Finally, President Bush's 2001 executive order limiting access to the records in presidential library archives needs to be overturned. This order allows current and former presidents to block the release of materials from their presidential libraries for any reason, even because they are politically damaging. Records that might compromise national security are already protected from release by other laws and statutes, so this directive is clearly about political expediency.

DOJ_NMG_0119841

President Bush's order is contrary to the spirit and letter of the laws that previously governed presidential libraries. Although so far only a small number of records have been blocked from release, the potential for the abuse of power exists. Congress should overturn this executive order.

Presidents are not required to have presidential libraries. Since Watergate, presidential records are not owned by each president but by the nation; a president could simply hand over his or her records to the National Archives. But if a president chooses to have a library, it is up to Congress, current and former presidents, host universities and the public to ensure that each library operates in the public interest.

At their best, presidential libraries are vital institutions that help us learn from our history. But if we give in to the worst impulses of presidents and their supporters, these libraries risk becoming temples of political propaganda.

OTHER NEWS:

Shares Close Mixed As Earnings Reports Fail To Inspire (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Shares closed narrowly mixed yesterday after profit reports and forecasts from companies like I.B.M. and General Electric left investors unimpressed.

Profit concerns have unnerved investors who are already skittish about whether stocks will continue the upward movement from last year.

"I think we're at an extremely pivotal psychological level," said T. J. Marta, economic strategist at RBC Capital Markets.

Earnings and economic figures support the Federal Reserve's notion that any decline in the economy will be soft and gradual, although Mr. Marta contended that a "fly-by" was a possibility.

The Fed is unlikely to lower short-term interest rates if the economy continues at a steady clip or if it begins to accelerate again. The central bank has left interest rates unchanged at its last four meetings after a string of 17 consecutive increases that began in 2004.

Last year, investors propelled stocks sharply higher partly on the widely held view that the Fed would cut rates perhaps as early as the first half of 2007.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed down 2.40 points, at 12,565.53. Broader stock indicators were higher. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 4.13 points, to 1,430.50, and the Nasdaq was up 8.10 points, at 2,451.31.

For the week, the Dow industrials rose 0.08 percent, while the S.& P. fell 0.02 percent, and the Nasdaq lost 2.1 percent.

Bonds fell as stocks tried to further their gains. The benchmark 10-year Treasury bonds was down 8/32, to 9826/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, rose to 4.78 percent, from 4.74 percent.

Oil settled up $1.51 at $51.99 a barrel. The increase follows sharp declines in recent sessions and could signal that investors are eager to buy oil to cover previous commitments as they head into the weekend.

Though the mood on Wall Street might have soured somewhat in the new year, consumers appear to have remained decidedly upbeat. Consumer sentiment, as tracked by the University of Michigan's survey, showed a preliminary reading of 98.0 for January compared with 91.7 in December. It is the highest showing since January 2004.

Since the start of this year, investors have been looking for reasons for a continuation of last year's sharp gains in stock prices.

The tepid gains this year reflect concerns over interest rates and the Fed's next move as well as whether profit growth will remain strong enough to push stocks upward.

Yesterday, I.B.M. fell $3.28, to $96.17 after the company's better-than-expected fourth-quarter profit met with little enthusiasm from investors. Part of the profit increase was a result of changes in the company's tax rates.

Alcoa helped offset some of the weakness in the Dow industrials. Alcoa, the world's largest aluminum maker, rose $1.10, or 3.6 percent, to $31.40, after it said it would repurchase up to 10 percent of outstanding shares and increased its annual dividend to 68 cents from 60 cents.

DOJ_NMG_0119842

General Electric slid $1.05, or 2.8 percent, to $36.95 after its first-quarter forecast disappointed some investors. G.E. also said it planned to restate financial results from 2001 through 2005 and the first three quarters of 2006 to adjust its accounting for some debt.

Citigroup , the investment bank, rose 11 cents, to $54.50, after posting a 26 percent drop in its fourth-quarter profit.

Fortress Sets Range for I.P.O.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 (Dow Jones/AP) — Underwriters on Friday set the terms for the initial public offering of the Fortress Investment Group at 34.29 million Class A common shares with an estimated price range of $16.50 to $18.50 each.

In early November, Fortress Investment filed for an offering of up to $750 million in Class A stock but did not detail the terms.

Fortress said it would be the first global alternative asset manager listed on the New York Stock Exchange. It has about $29.7 billion in assets under management.

All of the shares will be offered by the company, and none of the company's five principals will sell shares in the offering, according to the prospectus filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

After the offering, the principals — Wesley Edens, Peter Briger, Robert Kauffman, Randal Nardone and Michael Novograwill — will hold 77.7 percent of the voting power of the stock, according to the S.E.C. filing.

After The Dow's Record Run, Large Stocks May Be Tiring (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

After 25 record closes for the Dow Jones Industrial Average since Oct. 3, some Wall Street pros see the Dow's 8% rise since then as evidence that big-name stocks are best-suited to weather slowing U.S. economic growth.

But despite a record in the just-completed week, the increments are getting smaller. Tuesday's record close of 12582.59 was just 0.2% over its previous high-water mark. Friday, the Dow slipped 2.40 points, nearly unchanged in percentage terms, to 12565.53, up 0.1% for the week and up 0.8% this year.

Could that mean the latest bull market is running out of steam?

Garrett See, a trader at TransMarket Group who buys and sells futures contracts tied to the Dow, says the blue-chip average could move higher in the short run.

But he predicts it will be in the red by the end of the second quarter, continuing on to finish below 12000 on the year, which would be a decline of more than 3.5% for the year.

"I think a lot of the recent move up has been people getting in too late," says Mr. See, who is skeptical of Wall Street predictions of steady-but-modest economic growth this year.

A 3.3% drop in shares of International Business Machines, the biggest component in the price-weighted Dow, pushed the average lower Friday. General Electric, off 2.8%, was also among the average's biggest decliners. Both companies announced fourth-quarter earnings that exceeded analysts' expectations, but investors seemed to have bet on the big profits early rather than waiting for the actual announcements.

Stocks were also hurt by a jump in crude-oil prices, spurred by forecasts of colder weather in the Northeast, which will likely increase demand for heating oil and kerosene.

Crude futures for February delivery jumped $1.51, or 3%, to $51.99 a barrel, off 1.9% for the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Other stock-market measures fared better than the Dow. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 0.3%, or 4.13 points, to 1430.50 Friday and was nearly flat in percentage terms on the week. The technology-focused Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.3%, or 8.10, to 2451.31, off 2.1% on the week.

One measure of momentum in the broad market is sending mixed signals, says Ed Clissold, an analyst at Ned Davis Research in Venice, Fla. He notes that 207 stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange were trading at 12-month highs before Friday's market open. That is less than a third of the recent peak of 632 stocks in December 2003.

Higher readings are generally bullish for the market, Mr. Clissold says, because they indicate economic conditions are so favorable that an array of companies are benefiting. Still, he says the current total isn't low enough to be a reason to panic.

DOJ_NMG_0119843

Others are more upbeat. Analysts at research firm Thomson Financial note that only two of the 30 Dow components have gotten more expensive relative to their expected earnings for the coming 12 months since the average was at its past peak in January 2000.

In other words, the market is pretty cheap at the moment, which leaves a lot of room for investors to bid shares higher.

Using similar reasoning, Elizabeth Weymouth, global-investment specialist at J.P. Morgan Private Bank, says her firm expects stocks like those in the Dow and S&P 500 to post modest gains of less than 10% this year. Despite the Dow's three-day pullback in the just-ended week, she said her firm is still advising clients to switch out of small companies and into big-name stocks.

"We do expect a market correction at some point," said Ms. Weymouth. "But overall, the conditions are still pretty favorable."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed1; bond prices fell2. The 10-year note fell 6/32, pushing the yield up to 4.773%. The 30-year bond fell 8/32 to yield 4.862%.

The dollar rose.3 The dollar rose to 121.23 yen from 121.21 yen. The euro slipped to $1.2963 from $1.2965.

Chilly Weather Sparks Crude-Oil Rally (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar, Jeanine Prezioso

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

Energy futures rallied sharply Friday as crude-oil futures posted their biggest one-day gain in nearly three months and natural gas futures reached a one-month high, boosted by forecasts of continued cold weather.

The February crude contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange settled $1.51 a barrel higher at $51.99 after trading as low as $50.12 in overnight trading. The gain was the biggest in both percentage and dollar terms since Oct. 25. February natural gas settled 56.2 cents higher at $6.886 a million British thermal units, the highest closing price since Dec. 19, 2006, when front-month futures settled at $7.083/MMBtu.

Cold weather arrived in the Northeast this week for the first time this winter, with forecasters calling for continued below-normal temperatures through much of the region, which accounts for 80% of the nation's heating-oil consumption.

Unseasonably warm temperatures in December and much of January crimped heating-oil demand in the region and sent prices sharply lower.

"The weather is a big factor because it is going to increase demand for distillate fuels [such as heating oil] at the very moment production is dropping," said Peter Beutel, president of trading-advisory firm Cameron Hanover in New Canaan, Conn.

Traders and analysts said the gas market has been waiting on colder weather to break out of the range it has been trading in all week, between $6.20/MMBtu and $6.80/MMBtu.

Speculative traders who expected prices to drop as winter made a late arrival with a 20% surplus of gas in storage were left covering short positions ahead of a price increase.

"The market rallied partly on the weather, but it was mostly technical covering" by traders with short positions, or bets on falling prices, said Mike Guido, head of commodity research at Société Générale in New York.

Both private and government forecasts predict temperatures will be below average in February, and with Thursday's larger-than-expected storage withdrawal, gas-market participants think demand could be higher than anticipated.

Despite Friday's rally, crude futures finished the week about 2% lower, and analysts said the recent downward trend in prices is far from over.

Dollar Little Changed; Rate Cut Looks Unlikely (WSJ)

By Dan Molinski

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

The dollar was little changed against the yen and euro Friday after a strong U.S. consumer-confidence survey kept expectations for any rate change from the Federal Reserve low.

In a knee-jerk response to the data, the dollar climbed to 121.49 yen, just a few ticks below a four-year high of 121.60 yen that it reached earlier this past week. The euro briefly fell to as low as $1.2914.

DOJ_NMG_0119844

"The [University of Michigan consumer confidence] report beat expectations pretty convincingly," said Tim Mazanec, senior currency strategist at Investors Bank & Trust. "It's looking less and less like the Fed might cut rates anytime soon."

But the dollar's knee-jerk gains were erased later in the session as investors were again leery of stretching the dollar too far. The euro against the dollar had been stuck between $1.29 and $1.30 for most of the week.

Late Friday, the euro stood at $1.2963 from $1.2965 Thursday. The dollar stood at 121.23 yen from 121.21 yen late Thursday, while the euro was flat at 157.15 yen. The dollar has posted strong gains so far this year after a series of economic reports erased expectations the Fed would cut interest rates near term to spur more growth. Now, the rally appears to have run out of steam.

Interest-rate futures contracts Friday were pricing in a 16% chance of a Fed rate cut to 5.0% from the current 5.25% in the first quarter.

Trade Deficit Stubbornly Defies The Dollar's Slide (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter, Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Jessica Heyman's breakfast in Paris last month was nothing out of the ordinary: a modest repast of eggs, coffee and a side salad with her husband, Jonathan Podwil, at the popular Café de Flore. But the bill was memorable — 46 euros, or about $60, at the current exchange rate. Five years ago, when the dollar was strong, the same bill would have amounted to $42.

The sticker shock provided a powerful incentive to remain frugal the rest of the vacation. "We ate a lot of bread," Ms. Heyman said.

Shocking tourists into counting every penny, and getting Americans back home to spend less on costly imports, is part of what a weaker dollar is supposed to do to help pare America's outsize trade deficit, according to economic textbooks.

But, so far, the dollar's slide has not helped enough. Although the dollar has lost a lot of ground against many of the world's major currencies — including the euro, the British pound and the Canadian dollar — the nation's trade imbalance with the world has continued to rise, reaching $702 billion in the first 11 months of 2006, on track to easily outstrip the $717 billion of 2005 and set another record.

Officially, the United States government does not welcome the dollar's weakness. "A strong dollar is clearly in our interest," the Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., said last month.

But many economists say that the Bush administration is satisfied with the dollar's fall against the euro and some other currencies, counting on the decline to help improve the competitiveness of American manufacturers in global markets.

For several reasons, however, that may not happen anytime soon — even if the dollar continues to weaken against European currencies. For one thing, the dollar has not fallen much against the currencies of some crucial trading partners, including China and Japan. Critically, the value of China's yuan against the dollar has been carefully managed by Beijing so that it does not increase much more than 5 percent annually against the dollar. That is a reason China alone ran up a $214 billion surplus in its trade of goods with the United States from January to November last year.

Many foreign suppliers, moreover, are willing to absorb the impact of a declining dollar on their profit margins rather than pass it on to consumers as higher prices. That gives Americans less of an incentive to shift away from imports.

In the end, for the United States to begin to balance its trade, American consumers must spend less, while foreign consumers would have to buy a lot more.

"My U.S. colleagues tend to believe that exchange rates can carry out this adjustment painlessly which I, looking from the outside, find hard to believe," said Thomas Mayer, chief European economist at Deutsche Bank in London. "You would need to have unrealistically large changes in exchange rates to overcome that gap."

Free market economists argue that the deficit does not really matter — it is mostly a benign side effect of America's faster economic growth and its appeal as a destination for foreign investment. Trade imbalances are nothing to worry about, these economists say, reflecting private transactions that just happen to occur across borders.

Still, with the deficit now in excess of 5 percent of the nation's gross domestic product, many other economists worry that the foreign debt needed to finance the growing imbalance is accumulating at an unsustainable pace.

DOJ_NMG_0119845

To some extent, a weaker dollar has bolstered American exports to strong-currency nations. America's inflation-adjusted deficit in trading goods and services with the European Union declined by about 1 percent in the first three quarters of last year compared with the 2005 period, to about $84 billion.

And American producers are seeing some benefits. California wineries, for example, have shown double-digit sales growth in Canada every year since 2002, when the dollar started its fall against the Canadian dollar.

"There's a real price threshold of 10 Canadian dollars a bottle," said Joseph Rollo, director of the international department at the Wine Institute, the lobby group for California wineries. "A few years ago it was very difficult for California wineries to make that level. Now it's a lot easier."

The cheap dollar is also allowing some American companies to enter foreign markets for the first time. Phoenix Closures, a manufacturer of bottle caps in Naperville, Ill., exports very few of its caps to Europe. But a few months ago, it unexpectedly picked up a German client. "I assume these guys are getting a fairly large price reduction coming to us," said Bert Miller, president of the company.

The opposite side of Ms. Heyman's expensive breakfast in Paris is that America is now a bargain destination for Europeans.

"It was always too expensive for me to go to the States, but now it's a good time," said Sotirios Polytimis, 29, an architecture student in Berlin. "With the same money, I can do more in New York: buy drinks, see the night life, go shopping."

Some American companies that compete with foreign suppliers domestically have also benefited. "We are gobbling up market share," said Marty Staff, chief executive of JA Apparel, which makes Joseph Abboud suits and sports jackets at a plant in New Bedford, Mass. "Our products are as good as the European products, but for a lot less money."

Still, the shifting currency has moved far too little to alter entrenched habits.

"The intractability of consumer behavior is the key to the mystery," said Cliff Waldman, economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, a research group for American producers. "About half of the United States' deficit problem with Europe is the difference between the behavior of the European consumer, which is moribund, and the behavior of the American consumer, who never stops."

These days, a lot of foreign things do look ridiculously expensive to American eyes: the $4.15 Big Mac in Paris; the $16.50 ticket to see a movie at the multiplex in Leicester Square in London; $5.89 for a heavily taxed gallon of gas in Frankfurt.

But Europe remains irresistible. American purchases of travel services from European Union countries totaled $17.7 billion in the first three quarters of last year, almost 1 percent more than in the period in 2005, after inflation, and about 20 percent more than in the period in 2003.

The number of German tourists visiting the United States this winter is down approximately 20 percent compared with last year, according to TUI, the largest European tour operator. Robin Zimmermann, a spokesman for TUI, said Germans were favoring destinations in Southeast Asia, where currencies had also fallen against the euro.

Martin N. Baily, former chief economic adviser to President Bill Clinton, remains optimistic that the decline in the dollar will ultimately turn the United States' current-account deficit around. "I think we are poised for a gradual reduction," Mr. Baily said. "We are at a point where exports are starting to grow faster than imports."

Currency adjustments can take time to feed through into trade patterns. In fact, a slide in the dollar could initially worsen the nation's trade balance, as the price in dollars of imports would increase immediately while it could take time for American consumers to switch to domestic products.

But new factors arising from the increased globalization of production seem to be making the trade adjustment particularly slow. For instance, by moving more production out of Europe, into dollar-pegged regions like China and elsewhere in Asia, European companies have created natural hedges against a strong euro.

"With globalization, we now have a large network of plants all over the world," said Anton Börner, president of BFA, an association of German wholesalers and exporters based in Berlin. "So we are not as affected by changes in a single currency."

Hugo Boss, one of Joseph Abboud's main competitors, is based in the southern German town of Metzingen. But it also stitches garments at a factory in Cleveland and buys raw materials from Asia, where most of its transactions are in dollars or dollar-linked currencies.

DOJ_NMG_0119846

Sales of Boss suits and accessories rose 14 percent in Europe in the third quarter of 2006, but 17 percent in the United States, in volume terms. The company said it had not felt much of an impact from the strong euro.

"If the dollar stays in a reasonable range, say between $1.10 and $1.50, it will not affect us that much," said Bruno E. Sälzer, the chairman of Boss. "If it were to go to $1.60 or $1.70, that would mean there are bigger economic problems than just the exchange rate."

With Asian production now a big part of the equation for manufacturers all over the world, even big increases in the yuan and other Asian currencies would probably do little to shift output without causing major economic disruptions.

The People's Bank of China is holding about $1.01 trillion in reserves, the vast majority in dollars, which it has amassed as part of its strategy to keep the yuan from appreciating against the American currency to ensure Chinese products remain competitive in the United States market.

But even though Asian central banks are diversifying their holdings slightly, any big withdrawal from the Treasury market that slowed the flood of credit that has helped keep American interest rates low could harm the Chinese as well as Americans.

"With China," said Mr. Waldman, the manufacturing economist, "the capacity for trade imbalances to adjust is minimal."

Martinez Takes Over As Leader Of RNC (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida, who arrived in the United States as a teenage Cuban refugee, took his party's helm yesterday as general chairman of the Republican National Committee, vowing to reach out to minority voters and restore "the principles that have made us great."

Martinez was handpicked for the job by President Bush, and his ascendance was not without controversy. A small group of conservative RNC members had announced their opposition to the first-term senator because they viewed him as overly tolerant of illegal immigration.

But to many Republicans, Martinez represented a fresh face for the party, a first-generation American whose background and congenial personality could widen GOP appeal to vast new voter groups. Martinez called for greater tolerance for all groups during his inaugural address yesterday.

"To be the party of the future means that we also have to be a party that opens the door wide open so that all Americans feel welcome," he said.

Martinez said that as a Cuban American, "it was easy for me to understand that the Republican Party, the party of Ronald Reagan, was a party for us," because the two sides shared a strong opposition to the communist rule of Fidel Castro.

"I want to make sure that we take that message to the broader Hispanic community, to the African American community, and to all communities that may never have believed that Republican ideals spoke to them," Martinez said.

Martinez said he was encouraged that the 2008 Democratic field is likely to include a woman, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York; an African American, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois; and a Hispanic, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

"I do think that speaks to the evolution of American politics to be more inclusive, and I'm a part of that," said Martinez, who noted the strong showing of Michael S. Steele, the African American GOP candidate in last year's Maryland Senate race. "Both parties have taken a quantum leap," he said.

Outgoing chairman Ken Mehlman said that Martinez would "spread our message far and wide, to those like me who have been Republicans from the beginning and to the newest converts."

Martinez will share the top RNC job with Mike Duncan, a longtime party operative who will serve as chairman , overseeing day-to-day campaign, organizational and fundraising operations. It is an unusual arrangement, engineered in part by Bush, who recruited Martinez for a new general chairman post.

In an interview, Martinez said his immediate concern is lifting the gloomy mood that has gripped the party since it lost control of Congress in November. In recent weeks, the news has grown worse for Republicans, as conditions in Iraq worsen and Bush presses ahead with a controversial plan to increase U.S. troop levels.

DOJ_NMG_0119847

"Its spirits are a little down," Martinez said of the GOP. "That is going to be my first order of business, to try to rekindle a little bit of fire. It's time for renewal."

The best tonic, he said, is for Republicans to turn to some of the core conservative principles that rallied the party during Reagan's day, from making government more efficient to promoting volunteerism.

"People want practical solutions to everyday problems," Martinez said. "That's part of what our party has to get back to being focused on."

Martinez was sent to the United States by his parents in 1962 as part of a Catholic Church effort to relocate 14,000 Cuban children. His parents thought the separation would be temporary. But because of the Cuban Missile Crisis, "they were unable to leave and my return was unthinkable," Martinez explained. He lived with two Florida families for a total of four years, working and attending school while he waited for his parents to escape. When they finally arrived in Florida, he told RNC members, he had saved enough to buy the family a car and had lined up a job for his father, a veterinarian.

After stints as Bush's housing secretary, chairman of Orange County, Fla., and a personal injury lawyer, Martinez was elected to the Senate in 2004. He still speaks English with a slight accent and said he believes that his Florida roots give him an important edge, given the state's ethnic diversity and political mix. "We are a microcosm of the country," he said.

Martinez is sympathetic to his state's bid to move up its presidential primary date so that it follows the New Hampshire primary. The idea is contentious within the party, because it could turn the Sunshine State into a potentially decisive battleground, but Martinez said he would not intervene when the Florida legislature considers the change in March.

RNC Elects Martinez As Head (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

Sen. Mel Martinez was selected yesterday as the general chairman of the Republican National Committee, despite some members' public objections and considerable private grumbling.

The RNC leadership, loyal to President Bush and his choice for general chairman, used parliamentary procedures to end a brief floor skirmish over Mr. Martinez's election -- outmaneuvering members who opposed the creation of the new position and the nomination of the Florida senator to fill it.

Some members said publicly and privately that the senator from Florida would make RNC fundraising more difficult because he supports what critics say is Mr. Bush's desire to grant amnesty to illegal aliens.

"I do not support amnesty for illegal aliens," Mr. Martinez, a naturalized citizen who fled communist Cuba as a boy, insisted in an interview with The Washington Times after his election. "I do support strong border enforcement, and absolutely I support the rule of law [when it comes to] illegal aliens here."

Mr. Martinez was elected in a voice vote, instead of the secret ballot that opponents had sought.

"Senator Martinez will help our party effectively communicate the Republican message of hope and opportunity for all Americans," Mr. Bush said after Mr. Martinez's election.

Several outspoken opponents of Mr. Martinez made some effort at conciliation after the vote.

"While we disagree with Senator Martinez's support of amnesty for people who are in this country illegally, we must still look for the best ways to secure our border, keep our homeland safe and enforce our laws," said Texas Republican Chairman Tina Benkiser, who had voted against the creation of the general chairman's office and the senator's nomination.

"On issues we do agree on such as lowering our taxes, protecting our families, creating a strong economy and reforming our government, we look forward to his leadership," she said.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, in a luncheon address to the 168-member RNC, said that after Republicans lost the majority in Congress in November's midterm elections, "Mel Martinez is the one Republican senator left I can refer to as 'Mr. Chairman.' "

Before yesterday's vote, North Dakota RNC member Curly Haugland, one of the opponents of creating a general chairmanship, offered the written opinion of an accredited professional parliamentarian that the move violated RNC rules. The rules governing the RNC, adopted at the 2004 Republican National Convention, call only for an elected chairman and co-chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0119848

The wheels came off Mr. Haugland's drive to use Roberts Rules of Parliamentary Procedure and the RNC's own rules to have a secret ballot on the creation of a general chairman when Robert M. "Mike" Duncan, the newly elected day-to-day RNC chairman, quickly called for a voice vote.

While the vast majority of members voiced public satisfaction with the outcome, Mr. Haugland told The Times afterward: "They didn't follow the rules or the opinion of the independent certified parliamentarian. The breach of rules continues."

Mr. Duncan said his job as chairman "is not to make policy or headlines but to win elections," while Mr. Martinez "will be the voice of the party."

He said the November elections were a sobering reminder to Republicans that "we can't be arrogant or dismiss the message the voters sent us" on Iraq, domestic spending and scandals within the party's ranks.

The RNC annual meeting at the Grand Hyatt Hotel also issued what some said amounted to a rebuke of Arizona Sen. John McCain, a chief proponent of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law that Congress passed and Mr. Bush signed before the 2004 elections.

On Thursday, the committee passed a resolution -- authored by Indiana RNC member James Bopp Jr. and others -- condemning the 2002 passage of the McCain-supported bill, which restricts what political parties can do in conjunction with their own candidates for federal office. Its passage spawned the creation of so-called 527 groups often dominated by wealthy donors.

The RNC resolution urges Congress to deregulate campaign financing instead of further complicating it by attempting to solve unintended consequences with new regulations.

"I don't think it's a repudiation of McCain," said Michigan RNC member Chuck Yob, whose son works for Mr. McCain's unofficial presidential nomination campaign organization. "Even McCain feels the 527s need to be brought under the saddle."

State Aims For Feb. 5 Primary To Boost Clout (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

SACRAMENTO — With Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's backing, state lawmakers from both parties are moving rapidly to make California a player in choosing the nation's next president by holding the state's primary four months earlier.

A bipartisan group of state senators introduced legislation Friday to change the 2008 presidential primary from June 3 to Feb. 5. Another bill was introduced by an Assembly Republican on Thursday, the day after Schwarzenegger declared that moving up the primary date would make California "relevant" nationally and was "something to shoot for."

The February date — the earliest the state can choose under national party rules — would place California at the beginning of the election season, right after four states that have secured the most privileged spots in January for their Democratic caucuses or primaries: Iowa (Jan. 14), Nevada (Jan. 19), New Hampshire (Jan. 22) and South Carolina (Jan. 29). The Republican calendar has Iowa and New Hampshire first, with the rest of the schedule in flux.

Contenders, who now bypass California except to raise money, would be forced to establish real presences here.

The huge cost of competing in California — estimated by one veteran strategist to be $6 million to $8 million per candidate — would probably require all contenders to accelerate their fundraising and possibly give an edge to those candidates who have already amassed sizable war chests, such as Sens. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.), according to operatives in both parties.

Republican moderates such as former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, who might face opposition in Southern states for their liberal views on social issues, could benefit from the change.

"If California can succeed in moving up its primary, this truly is an earthquake in presidential national politics and the tremors will be felt through all 49 states," said Robert Zimmerman, a Democratic National Committee member from New York and presidential fundraiser.

DOJ_NMG_0119849

Elevating the clout of California's primary could change the dynamics of the race. It could push to the forefront issues such as immigration and global warming that might be more important and emotional here than in other areas of the country. But the daunting cost of competing here might also end up forcing candidates who did not win in the first primaries out of the race even earlier than in the past, strategists said.

Schwarzenegger and legislative leaders agree on the importance of an early primary, which they hope will make the presidential contenders pay attention to California and give it the political influence in Washington that they believe the most populous state deserves.

"I mean, right now, think about it: We are the No. 1 state in the union, we're the No. 1 place in the world, and yet we are kind of an afterthought when it comes to presidential campaigns," Schwarzenegger told the Sacramento Press Club at a luncheon Wednesday.

An earlier primary could heighten the king-making power of the state's most visible politicians, including Schwarzenegger and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, with presidential candidates vying for their support. That attention, though, could complicate relationships by pressuring leaders to choose sides and alienate other members of their parties.

The Democratic and GOP leaders of the state Assembly predicted in separate interviews Friday that the move, which leaders have been negotiating privately with Schwarzenegger, would pass with little trouble.

"We're serious about this, so we're doing it right," said Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles). "It makes us major players, and it allows us to put California on the federal map and the national agenda."

The Republican Assembly leader, Michael Villines of Clovis, agreed. "I don't think anything stands in our way," he said. "Have you heard of anyone who's against it? I haven't."

Beyond the first four states, most other primary dates are not yet established.

Two other large states, Florida and Michigan, are also talking about moving up their primaries, and the Democratic National Committee is setting rules to award more influence to states that don't try to front-load the primary calendar.

Nuñez and Senate President Don Perata (D-Oakland) sought to try to blunt such efforts by sending a letter Friday to Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

"We ask the committee to instead adopt rules ensuring that California's Democrats have a timely and meaningful opportunity to participate in choosing our party's standard-bearer in 2008," they wrote Dean, who was traveling and could not be reached for comment Friday evening.

Matthew Dowd, a GOP consultant who has advised both President Bush and Schwarzenegger, said he doubted there would be much resistance.

"The national parties don't really care except where Iowa and New Hampshire are," he said.

California's flirtation with presidential prominence has been turbulent.

The state moved all its primaries up to March for the 2004 election, but by then Sen. John F. Kerry had already effectively won the nomination. State candidates rebelled at the change, which lengthened the campaign season, and lawmakers pushed it back to June.

But the new plan would advance only the presidential primary, not the state primaries. Schwarzenegger and legislative leaders are also talking about placing on that February ballot propositions to try to remove politics from the way election districts are drawn, and to alter term limits for state lawmakers. That latter change is a priority for Nuñez, who otherwise will be forced out of the Assembly in 2008.

Negotiators said another key element remains undecided: whether the winner of the California primary would receive all the state's delegates or whether they would be meted out in proportion to the number of voters won.

Ken Khachigian, a veteran Republican strategist from California, said a winner-take-all primary "would certainly take any second-tier candidate who hit the California lotto, and would just explode them into the front tier. You can win New Hampshire like McCain … and still get whacked elsewhere."

Conservative Core Seeks A Contender (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

For decades, the conservative movement has been the animating force of the Republican Party, providing the ideas and energy that catapulted candidates to the GOP presidential nomination and, often, the White House.

But as conservatives survey the 2008 field — and, particularly, the early Republican front-runners — many are despairing. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani have all broken with conservative orthodoxy at one time or another. Many activists have neither forgiven nor forgotten.

"There's absolutely no contender that is a bona fide conservative," said K.B. Forbes, who has worked for a number of conservative candidates and causes since the 1990s. "We have insiders, squishes and moderates running for president."

The candidate closest to the heart of social conservatives, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, plans to formally launch his White House bid today with a speech in Topeka. But even those who admire Brownback, and especially his Senate leadership opposing abortion, same-sex marriage and stem-cell research, question the viability of his candidacy.

"Brownback has to prove he can win," said Richard Land, head of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, the nation's largest Protestant denomination.

Land sees different problems for the three leading GOP hopefuls. "Most social conservatives at present are uncomfortable with McCain," he said. "They're appalled by Giuliani." As for Romney, Land said, "He has to convince social conservatives he's become one of them."

It's a striking state of affairs, given the ascendance of the conservative movement since 1964. Although he was crushed in the general election that year, Arizona's Barry Goldwater wrested the Republican Party from its Midwest and Eastern roots, starting a realignment that eventually turned the GOP into the party of Ronald Reagan, the Sunbelt and the South.

The absence of a purebred conservative candidate this time, at least among the early leaders, is partly happenstance. Favorites such as Vice President Dick Cheney and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush have chosen not to run. Former Sen. George Allen of Virginia, who was positioning himself as heir to the Reagan mantle, was defeated for reelection in perhaps the biggest upset of 2006, as was ex-Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, a hero to many evangelicals.

But some believe more is at work. They blame the failings of the GOP-run Congress, which dimmed several rising stars and sank the presidential ambitions of one conservative favorite, former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. Beyond that, some see indications that, after 40-plus years, the conservative movement has reached a turning point. They cite growing tensions between economic and religious conservatives, as well as fallout from the war in Iraq, which a growing number of Republicans consider a mistake.

Craig Shirley, a Reagan biographer who has spent years in the conservative trenches, said the GOP has veered badly off course, running up record deficits, pursuing a Wilsonian foreign policy — "making the world safe for democracy" — and becoming overly intrusive in people's private lives, whether intervening in the Terri Schiavo right-to-die case or seeking to ban gambling on the Internet.

"The conservative movement was never about government virtue," said Shirley, who suggested Republicans may be destined for a time in the wilderness unless the party returns to its core principles of limited government and a more pragmatic foreign policy.

Others disagree.

"Each of these guys is jostling each other, McCain, Giuliani and Romney, to be dead center of where Reagan was. No one is competing to run as the Nixon Republican, or the Rockefeller Republican," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, which asks every presidential candidate to sign a pledge vowing never to raise taxes. So far, Brownback and Romney have taken the pledge, the latter after declining to do so while Massachusetts governor.

"Strong national defense, individual freedom and responsibility, traditional moral values — the ideas are still there," said Lee Edwards, a conservative scholar at the Heritage Foundation in Washington. "Still relevant. Still resonant."

But even Edwards conceded that many conservatives "are sort of holding back a little bit" before committing to any of the Republicans running. "We still have to wait and see what positions they do take," Edwards said.

Sensing opportunity, several candidates with strong conservative credentials — if not the name recognition or fundraising potential of a McCain, Giuliani or Romney — are looking to enter the Republican race. Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is expected to make an announcement by the end of the month. Former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore has formed an exploratory committee. Former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, who also served as secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, has as well. So has Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado, a crusader against illegal immigration. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who excites friends and foes like few other politicians, has said he might enter the race in the fall.

DOJ_NMG_0119851

Meantime, the front-running candidates are ceding nothing in the fight for conservative backing — even if it sometimes requires a sharp right-hand turn.

McCain, whose 2000 rivalry with President Bush lingered long after, has become one of the president's strongest supporters in Iraq and eased his opposition to tax cuts he once deemed excessive. He has signed up conservative activists in Iowa and South Carolina, states he lost in 2000 and, most conspicuously, reached out to religious conservatives — including the Rev. Jerry Falwell — whom he once dubbed "agents of intolerance."

Romney, who said he favored abortion rights when he ran for governor in 2002, now describes himself as "firmly pro-life." After once casting himself as a strong supporter of gay rights, Romney has become an outspoken foe of same-sex marriage.

Giuliani, who has favored legal abortion, gay rights and certain gun controls, is expected to stress leadership over ideology if he decides to run.

But many activists remain to be convinced. McCain's support for a friendlier immigration policy continues to rankle — the National Review dubbed him "Amnesty John" — as does the campaign-finance law he championed. Earlier this week, Christian leader James Dobson said he would not support McCain under any circumstance. The senator, who has a solid anti-abortion record but opposes a federal ban on same-sex marriage, said he would like to talk.

Land, of the Southern Baptist Convention, suggested that conservatives would eventually support the GOP nominee. "Social conservatives understand in their bones, in their genetic structure, that what's at stake in [2008] is probably the Supreme Court for the rest of their lifetimes," Land said. "I don't see social conservatives sitting this one out."

But Forbes is not so sure. "We really learned our lesson with Schwarzenegger," said Forbes, who worked on Bill Simon's 2002 campaign for California governor. "The Republicans wanted to win at any cost. They elected someone who claimed to be a conservative and look what you've got — a governor who's talking about state-controlled healthcare."

3 From The Bush Advertising Team Join McCain's '08 Advisers (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Senator John McCain of Arizona has enlisted strategists from President Bush's advertising team to work on the senator's nascent drive for the Republican presidential nomination, aides with his campaign exploratory committee said Friday.

Mr. McCain's aides said he was hiring those three strategists — Russ Schriefer, Stuart Stevens and Fred Davis — as part of a continuing accumulation of campaign advisers.

Mr. Schriefer and Mr. Stevens, partners at a consulting firm based in Washington, helped produce some of the most hard-charging advertisements of Mr. Bush's 2000 and 2004 campaigns.

Among their commercials in 2004 was one featuring Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic nominee, saying that he did vote for an $87 billion war appropriation "before I voted against it." Another had video of Mr. Kerry wind surfing back and forth, an image reflecting the Bush campaign's accusation that he was a flip-flopper.

Mr. Davis, based in California, has worked on commercials including those in the 2004 campaign in which Mr. Bush and the first lady spoke directly into the camera in the White House residence.

Richardson To Explore Presidential Bid (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson intends to say Sunday that he is taking the first step toward the Democratic presidential nomination, several officials with knowledge of his plans said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0119852

The former congressman, U.N. ambassador and Energy Department secretary is hoping his extensive resume will fuel an insurgent campaign to become the nation's first Hispanic president. He plans to announce Sunday that he will soon file the papers to create a presidential exploratory committee, the officials said.

Sen. Dodd Not To Run For Re-Election In 2010, Uses PAC To Buy NH And IA Voter Files (CQPOL)

CQ Politics, January 19, 2007

Sen. Christopher Dodd, through his counsel, has sent a letter to the Federal Election Commission stating he "is no longer a candidate in the 2010 election for the United States Senate in Connecticut."

This letter helps set the stage for his Senate campaign committee, Friends of Chris Dodd, to declare it has excess funds and transfer the funds to his presidential campaign committee, Chris Dodd for President Inc. His Senate campaign committee reported $1,855,961 cash-on-hand as of 9/30. This amount will probably change with financial activity during the fourth quarter of 2006. His year-end report is due by 1/31/07.

In addition to his Senate and presidential campaign committees, Sen. Dodd also has a leadership PAC, Citizens for Hope Responsibility Independence & Service PAC (CHRIS PAC). The PAC reported $167,526 cash-on-hand as of 11/27/06. However, this is after spending $1,198,998 during the 2005-2006 cycle.

The PAC disbursements in 2005-2006 included contributions totaling $134,500 into New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina.

Iowa $42,500 - The PAC gave a total of $11,000 to three federal candidates in Iowa. The PAC gave $31,500 to seven state candidate or party accounts.

New Hampshire $60,500 - The PAC gave a total of $10,000 to two federal candidates in New Hampshire. The PAC gave $50,500 to one state party account.

South Carolina $31,500 - The PAC gave a total of $1,000 to two federal candidates in South Carolina. The PAC gave $30,500 to twenty-nine state candidate or party accounts.

In addition, the PAC paid the Iowa Democratic Party $50,000 on 9/13/06 for a "voter file." It also paid the New Hampshire Democratic State Committee $50,000 on 9/7/06 for a "voter file."

Can Voters Picture Good Mormons As Good Leaders? (DMN)

By Jeffrey Weiss

The Dallas Morning News, January 20, 2007

On a national level, the question has never been more politically important: Does being Mormon matter?

When Nevada Democrat Harry Reid took his seat this month as U.S. Senate majority leader, he became the highest-ranking federal elected official ever from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. And former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's all-but-official run for the Republican presidential nomination has also raised the profile of his church.

So does it matter to voters that they're Mormons? Maybe, the experts say.

Distinctively Mormon values could have policy implications on issues including abortion, welfare, gay marriage and the role of federal judges. In addition to Mr. Reid, four other senators and 10 U.S. House members identify themselves as Mormons.

Also Online

Evangelicals: Voters may not go for Romney

The Mormon Church is generally against abortion, in favor of traditional families and supportive of patriotism. But the Latter-day Saints get to those positions using a different theology from that of other churches – and those differences could affect the way Mormon politicians govern.

That's not to say that observant Mormons run in political lockstep any more than members of any other faith.

Mr. Reid, left of center, and Mr. Romney, increasingly right of center, both credit their church with setting their values.

"Without the direction of the church, I would have been without a compass," Mr. Reid wrote for a book published in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0119853

But even among themselves, Mormons can read their compasses differently. For instance, Mormons are taught to avoid coffee and tea. But Mr. Romney has a coffeepot for his staff, a spokesman said. Mr. Reid does not. Both men declined through spokesmen to answer questions from The Dallas Morning News about specific aspects of Mormon theology.

Mr. Reid's spokesman said the senator's church "teaches him values that cross party lines – care for those in need, look out for our fellow man and do what is right."

Mr. Romney's spokesman said the former governor "is a person of strong faith, and his faith helps guide his values."

Church not involved

The LDS church is officially and emphatically not involved in partisan politics. But Mr. Reid and Mr. Romney are well aware of church teachings and how they could apply to public policy, said Ronald Scott, a Boston journalist working on a book about Mr. Romney.

"You have guys who have grown up thinking and talking like theologians," said Mr. Scott, a distant cousin of Mr. Romney's.

The two leaders came to their church by radically different routes.

Mr. Reid has written that he grew up in Searchlight, a rowdy Nevada mining town with no church and "13 bordellos." He converted in college.

Mr. Romney comes from a family that's been Mormon for generations. (He's the son of George Romney, the former Michigan governor and a contender for the 1968 GOP presidential nomination.) He has held several church positions, including stake president – something like a regional bishop.

So how are Mormon values different from, say, Baptist or Catholic values? Differences are rooted in Mormon history.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is an American-born faith, started in the 19th century by a New Yorker named Joseph Smith. God, Mr. Smith said, had instructed a small group of Israelites to head west about 2,600 years ago – a boat trip all the way to what is now America. They built a mighty civilization and were visited by Jesus after his resurrection.

The civilization collapsed four centuries after Jesus' visit, but the sacred texts of its prophets were saved on golden plates. In 1823, the church teaches, an angel revealed the plates to Mr. Smith. He is said to have translated the plates and used the text to reconstitute God's only true church, beginning with six members.(Polygamy, accepted in the church's early days, was officially renounced in 1890.)

Mr. Smith's followers consider the Book of Mormon, named after an angel, to be as sacred as the Bible. And they believe that Mr. Smith and his successors – current church president is Gordon B. Hinckley – are "prophets, seers and revelators" through whom God can issue new revelations.

'Continuing revelation'

This notion of "continuing revelation" distinguishes Mormon practice. When the pope, by comparison, speaks "infallibly," he's explaining what he says Catholic teachings have always been. A Mormon president, on the other hand, may claim a prophesy that results in significant doctrinal changes. Such was the case with Spencer W. Kimball's revelation in 1978 that transformed official church policy toward blacks, allowing them full membership in the church.So what if Mr. Hinckley or a successor declared that God said America should outlaw spinach or invade Australia? Would "good Mormon" elected officials feel compelled to obey?

In mid-2005, as talk of a run for presidency started to percolate, a spokesman for then-Gov. Romney addressed the question of obedience to Mormon leadership:

The spokesman told The Boston Globe that Mr. Romney's "obligation is to fulfill his duty of office, and that would take precedence over anything. "

Some Mormon experts say a revelation directed at Mormon politicians is possible but exceedingly unlikely. In the past, revelations haven't directly addressed American public policy. And before a new revelation is official, the president's two closest advisers and a "Quorum of the Twelve Apostles" are expected to confirm it. So it's nigh on impossible for one leader to claim a radical new word from the Almighty. And while individual Mormons are expected to confirm their belief in the new teaching, they are also obligated by their faith to evaluate it for themselves.

"The only way you can know for sure is if you have a personal revelation," said Boyd Petersen, a professor of Mormon studies at Utah Valley State College.

DOJ_NMG_0119854

Where they stand

Continuing revelation is not the only distinctively LDS belief that could have political implications. Some other examples:

• Abortion

Mormon theology calls for exemptions from an absolute ban – when the pregnancy results from rape or incest; a doctor decides that the mother's health is in serious jeopardy; or a doctor determines that the fetus has severe defects that will not allow the baby to survive beyond birth.

Mr. Reid generally opposes abortion but is in favor of the exceptions for rape, incest and the health of the mother. Mr. Romney said last year that he would sign a bill outlawing abortion, even in cases of rape or incest.

• The origin of the government.

Mormons are taught that the essential structure of the U.S. government was divinely inspired. This belief could influence attitudes toward possible constitutional amendments or the selection of federal judges.

• Gay rights.

Mormons are taught that each soul has an intrinsic gender and had it in a life before birth. "Gender is an essential characteristic of individual premortal, mortal, and eternal identity and purpose." And that identity, Mormons are taught, was never gay.The church supports a constitutional amendment defining marriage as being between one man and one woman. Mr. Reid opposes the amendment; Mr. Romney supports it.

• Gender roles.

In an ideal family, the church teaches, men are "to provide the necessities of life and protection for their families. Mothers are primarily responsible for the nurture of their children."

Legislation about gender pay equivalency, day care programs and family leave could be affected by this teaching.

"The bottom line for church leaders is to endorse whatever public policies that they perceive will favor traditional marriage, family and children," said Armand Mauss, former president of the Mormon History Association and a visiting scholar at California's Claremont Graduate School of Religion.

But fear of challenges to the traditional family, more than specific theology, may better explain Mormon political stands on gender roles, he said.

• Welfare.

Church teachings pull in two directions. On the one hand, LDS members are taught to be self-sufficient – to the point of having a year's worth of supplies in storage.

On the other hand, Mormons are taught to help the needy – without even asking why the person is in need.

Mr. Scott, the Boston journalist, said a universal health insurance program that Mr. Romney championed in Massachusetts is "quintessentially Mormon."

Other politicians have said their religion was important without drawing explicit connections to public policy. In a 2000 debate, George W. Bush identified Jesus Christ as his favorite political philosopher. But the president, like Mr. Reid and Mr. Romney, has demurred at explaining exactly how religious beliefs affect his governance.

Perhaps Mormon politicians will take their cue from Brigham Young, who led the church after Mr. Smith was assassinated in 1844.

Mr. Young offered a Mormon motto in one of his famous sermons:

"'To mind your own business,' " he said, "incorporates the whole duty of man."

Pennsylvania Governor Pushes Health Plan (NYT)

By Sean D. Hamill

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

PITTSBURGH, Jan. 19 — Gov. Edward G. Rendell arrived here Friday to rally support for his plan not only to extend health insurance coverage to the state's 760,000 uninsured adults, but also to cut billions of dollars in heath care costs and ban smoking in restaurants, bars and workplaces.

DOJ_NMG_0119855

Mr. Rendell said the plan would require 47 changes to state law and regulations. It follows efforts in several other states to offer some version of universal health coverage.

Though Pennsylvania has one of the lowest uninsured rates in the nation — about 7 percent, compared with 20 percent in California — Mr. Rendell said the proposal was crucial because "the system is near collapse."

At a meeting with business and civic leaders at the private Duquesne Club downtown, Mr. Rendell pointed to a chart indicating that health care costs grew 75 percent in the state over the past seven years, while wages rose 13 percent and inflation increased 17 percent.

"We can't go through another seven years of that," he said.

Mr. Rendell did not provide any cost estimates for the plan, but said that it relied on federal money, some redirected state money and a group of new taxes, including a 10-cent-per-pack increase in the cigarette tax and a fee on businesses that do not offer insurance to their employees. (A law approved last year is intended to extend health insurance to the state's 150,000 uninsured children.)

The governor's proposal also contains measures intended to make health care more efficient. One is an effort to reduce hospital-acquired infections, estimated to cost billions of dollars every year.

Though Mr. Rendell had previously said he would sign a bill authorizing a "single-payer system" whereby the state would be the insurer for the uninsured, nothing like that is in his proposal.

During his other stop Friday, at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center, he said such a plan would be "inordinately expensive" and ultimately "untenable to the legislature."

Mr. Rendell's proposal differs in significant ways from recent state-sponsored health care packages in California and Massachusetts.

Both those states require individual participation, but, under Mr. Rendell's plan, Pennsylvania would not.

In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, wants the Legislature to approve health insurance coverage for illegal immigrants. But Mr. Rendell, a Democrat, said he did not try to provide coverage for Pennsylvania's estimated 150,000 illegal immigrants because Republicans in the legislature had said they would not back it.

Lawmakers of both parties have expressed support for some parts of Mr. Rendell's proposal, but passage of the entire plan is likely to be difficult. Among the reasons are that Republicans control the State Senate.

Towns Tame Taxes By Keeping Children Out (WT/BLOOM)

By Bob Ivry

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

New Jersey towns have figured out a way to sidestep the highest property taxes in the U.S.

Keep children out.

Educating a child in New Jersey costs an average of $12,567 a year, the most in the nation and more than double the property tax parents typically pay. So local governments have hit upon a way to expand the tax base without the expense of higher enrollment: age-restricted housing.

New Jersey developers have responded by building an estimated one-fifth of the country's adults-only housing, making the state the leader in a national trend spurred by baby boomers seeking new homes after their children move out.

In New Jersey, where schools can command two-thirds of a municipal budget and state officials have failed to provide tax relief, building communities that don't allow children has as much to do with reducing taxes as it does with serving older home buyers.

"It's frustration on the part of some communities," said New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine, a Democrat. "The real problem is we have too much reliance on property taxes in how we finance public education."

Nationwide, 2.8 million households were part of age-restricted communities in 2005, up 29 percent from 2001. The number in New Jersey grew 37 percent in the same period. More than half the housing units started in the state in the past two years have excluded children, according to data compiled by the New Jersey Builders Association.

In one New Jersey town, Monroe Township, population 28,000, half the housing units are limited to senior citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0119856

As many as 95,000 such units will be built in the U.S. in 2007, according to an estimate by the National Association of Home Builders. New Jersey developers will build about 20,000 of them.

Exclusionary zoning is legal in the U.S. A 1998 exemption to the federal Fair Housing Act allows age restrictions if homes in a development are intended solely for residents age 62 and older, or if 80 percent of the units are occupied by one person who is at least 55.

New Jersey towns support their school systems mostly with property tax revenue, pushing the average tab to $5,153 in 2004, the highest in the U.S. New Jersey residents are older than in most states -- 12.5 percent are 65 and older, compared with the 12.1 percent average in the U.S.

Some home builders see age-restriction housing as protection against the wider housing slump. The National Association of Homebuilders estimates that profit from age-restricted housing was $1.2 billion in 2006.

For Pulte Homes Inc., the largest U.S. home builder by market value, 39 percent of its homes sold in 2005 had age restrictions, up from 33 percent in 2004, said spokeswoman Caryn Klebba. In 2001, the Bloomfield Hills, Mich., company was selling homes in 15 age-restricted communities in seven states, Miss Klebba said.

Today, Pulte has 56 such developments in 20 states, with eight more scheduled to open in 2007.

"Age-restricted housing is growing more than the general housing market," said Ara Hovnanian, chief executive officer of Hovnanian Enterprises Inc., New Jersey's largest home builder.

The Red Bank, N.J., company will have 16 adults-only developments on the market this year.

The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled last month that towns could condemn land for open space under eminent domain laws to stop development that might result in "overcrowded schools." That put children on a par with pollution and traffic congestion as valid reasons for seizing property.

"Exclusionary zoning is most prevalent in New Jersey, but it's pervasive in a lot of parts of the country, especially in the Northeast, where there isn't a lot of land to build on," said Robert Puentes, a fellow with the Brookings Institution's Metropolitan Policy Program in the District. "With property tax being such a big issue now, it's much more front and center."

Still, elected officials are reluctant to link age-restricted development to taxes, mindful that voters may view them as being anti-child.

"It's a backroom taboo thing that everybody talks about but nobody talks about," said Douglas Steinhardt, mayor of Lopatcong Township, which limits new housing to two bedrooms.

Lopatcong's zoning restriction is intended as a density-control measure and "not to keep kids out," Mr. Steinhardt said.

Age-restricted housing does help reduce property taxes, according to the state Department of Community Affairs. In Monroe Township, which has 8,878 age-restricted units, the most in the state, the property tax averaged $4,327 in 2004, the latest year statistics are available. That was 16 percent lower than the rest of Middlesex County and 22 percent less than the state average.

In comparison, South Brunswick, Monroe Township's neighbor, has just 731 units of age-restricted housing and an average property tax of $5,782.

"The unbalance that age-restricted housing brings is going to be a disaster for the state in the long run," said Lakewood Township Mayor Ray Coles. "New Jersey seems to be looking for ways to turn families away."

Other mayors, including Scott Rumana of Wayne, reject the idea that exclusionary zoning saves money, because having more senior citizens pushes up emergency response costs.

Developers, which can make more money building unrestricted housing, sometimes find it's more difficult to get those plans approved, said Patrick O'Keefe, chief executive officer of the New Jersey Builders Association.

"It's almost a prerequisite that a project pass the child-exclusion test before a planning board will consider it," Mr. O'Keefe said.

In Peapack-Gladstone, population 2,465, the land-use board twice denied Dennis Townsend permission to build 18 multimillion-dollar homes on 13 acres across a dirt road from his Hamilton Farm Golf Club.

DOJ_NMG_0119857

On a tour of the land, Mr. Townsend, chairman of Townsend Capital LLC of Towson, Md., pointed to the woods behind his proposed lots, where Peapack-Gladstone recently approved 55 duplexes a stone's throw from where he wants to build. The duplexes will be age-restricted.

Targeting Wal-Mart Again (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WHAT DO Johns Hopkins University, Northrop Grumman Corp., Giant Food Inc. and Wal-Mart have in common?

Answer: They are the four biggest private employers in Maryland. Yet last January, when the Maryland General Assembly passed its Fair Share Health Care Fund Act, requiring companies with more than 10,000 Maryland employees to spend at least 8% of their total payroll on workers' health insurance costs, it did something interesting. Though all four qualified under the law, legislators ensured that only one — Wal-Mart, the super-villain of documentary films, watchdog websites and countless news investigations — would have to obey it.

This week, the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld an industry group's challenge to the Maryland law, saying that it is preempted by the 1974 ERISA Act, a federal law that sets minimum standards for employee benefits plans. Although the court made a kind reference to Maryland's "noble purpose" (in trying to offload some of its swelling health coverage costs), it made clear that Wal-Mart faced substantial losses.

The Fair Share Act could hardly have been more clear in its intent to punish Wal-Mart specifically, and unfairly. The act was passed — over the veto of then-Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich — in an atmosphere of widespread public revulsion at the retailer's practices of discouraging unions and stinginess with benefits. Similar laws are on the books or under consideration in New York and Minnesota; and the super-retailer has certainly received its share of targeted legislative grief from city councils all over Southern California. But the Maryland law was so blatantly targeted at Wal-Mart as to amount to a "bill of attainder" — a legislative act pronouncing a person guilty of a crime. Such acts are prohibited by the Constitution.

Californians, who are digesting the opening course of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's healthcare overhaul, should take a special interest in the outcome of this case. Schwarzenegger's proposed mandate that employers devote at least 4% of payroll to health coverage is far less onerous than the Maryland law (the typical California employer already pays about 8% of payroll to health coverage). But the fate of the Fair Share Act demonstrates how easy it is for a statewide experiment to run afoul of federal regulations, even if that experiment is about solving a problem rather than aiming public opprobrium at a popular target.

China Shows Assertiveness In Weapons Test (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 19 — China's apparent success in destroying one of its own orbiting satellites with a ballistic missile signals that its rising military intends to contest American supremacy in space, a realm many here consider increasingly crucial to national security.

The test of an antisatellite weapon last week, which Beijing declined to confirm or deny Friday despite widespread news coverage and diplomatic inquiries, was perceived by East Asia experts as China's most provocative military action since it testfired missiles off the coast of Taiwan more than a decade ago.

Unlike in the Taiwan exercise, the message this time was directed mainly at the United States, the sole superpower in space.

With lengthy white papers, energetic diplomacy and generous aid policies, Chinese officials have taken pains in recent years to present their country as a new kind of global power that, unlike the United States, has only good will toward other nations.

But some analysts say the test shows that the reality is more complex. China has surging national wealth, legitimate security concerns and an opaque military bureaucracy that may belie the government's promise of a "peaceful rise."

"This is the other face of China, the hard power side that they usually keep well hidden," said Chong-Pin Lin, an expert on China's military in Taiwan. "They talk more about peace and diplomacy, but the push to develop lethal, high-tech capabilities has not slowed down at all."

DOJ_NMG_0119858

Japan, South Korea and Australia are among the countries in the region that pressed China to explain the test, which if real would make it the third power, after the United States and the Soviet Union, to shoot down an object in space.

China's Foreign and Defense Ministries declined to comment on reports of the test, which were based on United States intelligence data. Liu Jianchao, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, would say only that China opposed using weapons in space. "China will not participate in any kind of arms race in outer space," he told [a news organization].

China's silence on the test underscores how much its rapidly modernizing military — perhaps especially the Second Artillery forces, in charge of its ballistic missile program — remains isolated and secretive, answering only to President Hu Jintao, who heads the military as well as the ruling Communist Party.

Having a weapon that can disable or destroy satellites is considered a component of China's unofficial doctrine of asymmetrical warfare. China's army strategists have written that the military intends to use relatively inexpensive but highly disruptive technologies to impede the better-equipped and better-trained American forces in the event of an armed conflict — over Taiwan, for example.

The Pentagon makes extensive use of satellites for military communications, intelligence and missile guidance, and some Chinese experts have argued that damaging its space-based satellite infrastructure could hobble American forces.

Yet while China's research and development of such weapons has been well known, the apparent decision to test-fire an antisatellite weapon came as a surprise to many analysts.

"If this is fully corroborated, it is a very significant event that is likely to recast relations between the United States and China," said Allan Behm, a former official in Australia's Defense Ministry. "This was a very sophisticated thing to do, and the willingness to do it means that we're seeing a different level of threat."

China's military expenditures have been growing at nearly a double-digit pace, even after adjusting for inflation, for 15 years. China has begun to deploy sophisticated submarines, aircraft and antiship missiles that the Pentagon says could have offensive uses.

Yet with a few notable exceptions, Beijing has avoided sharp provocations that could prompt the United States or Japan to focus more on what some officials in each country regard as a potential threat.

Chinese leaders emphasize that they are preoccupied with domestic challenges and intend to focus their energy and resources on economic development, a policy they say depends heavily on cross-border investment, open trade and friendly foreign relations.

The country has denied that it intends to develop space weapons and sharply criticized the United States for experimenting with a space-based missile defense system. It forged a coalition of Asian countries to jointly develop peaceful space-based technologies.

Last month it published and heavily promoted a white paper on military strategy that emphasized its view that space must remain weapon-free. "China is unflinching in taking the road of peaceful development and always maintains that outer space is the common wealth of mankind," the paper said.

Some of such talk amounts to little more than propaganda. But Jonathan Pollack, a China specialist at the Naval War College in Newport, R.I., says the Chinese military does in fact act cautiously when it comes to improving its strategic capabilities, like long-range missiles and nuclear weapons, to avoid causing alarm in the United States.

"They have talked about antisatellite weapons," he said. "But we have always thought that the threat was ambiguous and that China probably wanted it that way. So what was the calculation to go ahead with an actual test?"

Some analysts suggested that one possible motivation was to prod the Bush administration to negotiate a treaty to ban space weapons. Russia and China have advocated such a treaty, but President Bush rejected those calls when he authorized a policy that seeks to preserve "freedom of action" in space.

Chinese officials have warned that an arms race could ensue if Washington did not change course.

At a United Nations conference in Vienna last June on uses of space, a Chinese Foreign Ministry official, Tang Guoqiang, called the policies of "certain nations" disconcerting.

"Outer space is the common heritage of mankind, and weaponization of outer space is bound to trigger off an arms race, thus rendering outer space a new arena for military confrontation," he said, according to an official transcript of his remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0119859

Even so, Mr. Pollack, of the Naval War College, said that if China hoped that demonstrating a new weapon of this kind would prompt a positive response in Washington, they most likely miscalculated.

"Very frankly, many people in Washington will find that this validates the view of a China threat," Mr. Pollack said. "It could well end up backfiring and forcing the U.S. to take new steps to counter China."

Other analysts said the test might have more to do with proving a technology under development for many years than a cold-war-style negotiating tactic.

China maintains a minimal nuclear arsenal that could inflict enough damage on an enemy to guard against any pre-emptive strike, these analysts said. But the increasing sophistication of American missile interceptors, which are linked to satellite surveillance, threatens the viability of China's limited nuclear arsenal, some in Beijing have argued.

That may have prompted the Second Artillery to show that it had the means to protect fixed missile sites and ensure China's retaliatory capacity by showing that it could take out American satellites.

At the annual military fair in Zhuhai, held in November, the Guangdong-based newspaper Information Times and several other state-run media outlets carried a short interview with an unidentified military official boasting that China had "already completely ensured that it has second-strike capability." The analyst said China could protect its retaliatory forces because it could destroy satellites in space.

American officials have also noted the development. This month, Lt. Gen. Michael Mapes of the Army testified before Congress that China and Russia were working on systems to hit American satellites with lasers or missiles. And over the summer, the director of the National Reconnaissance Office, Donald M. Kerr, told reporters that the Chinese had used a ground-based laser to "paint," or illuminate, an American satellite, a possible first step to using lasers to destroy satellites.

"China is becoming more assertive in just about every military field," said Mr. Behm, the Australian expert. "It is not going to concede that the U.S. can be the hegemon in space forever."

U.S. Presses China On Anti-satellite Test (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration demanded again Friday that China explain why it conducted a test of its growing anti-satellite capability last week, successfully destroying an obsolete orbiter in a move that alarmed many U.S. allies and brought diplomatic protests.

The United States, Canada, Australia and Japan have questioned China's motives in launching a ground-based missile that destroyed one of its aging weather satellites about 500 miles above Earth.

Beijing has declined to confirm the test but has said it supports the peaceful use of space. U.S. officials said no country should conduct tests that advance the potential for wars in space or result in explosions that create large areas of debris hazardous to other satellites.

"We know the Chinese have conducted this test," said Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman. "We certainly want to hear from them in a more detailed way exactly what their intentions are…. We don't want to see a situation where there is any militarization of space."

U.S. officials are seeking talks with their Chinese counterparts. Though some experts are calling for an expanded dialogue, more hawkish observers say the U.S. needs to take a tougher line.

State Department officials met with officials from the Chinese Embassy on Tuesday, and diplomats in Beijing met with Chinese officials Wednesday. Casey said one of the questions the test raised was whether this was a one-time incident or part of a broader initiative.

The U.S. has conducted similar tests to shoot down satellites, but the last was in 1985. America and the Soviet Union abandoned the tests over concerns about the debris they generated.

"Countries throughout the world are dependent on space-based technologies — you know, weather satellites, communication satellites and other devices," Casey said.

DOJ_NMG_0119860

The Chinese missile test was unsurprising given the U.S. position on the militarization of space and this country's military capabilities, said Michael Swaine, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

"There needs to be a sustained discussion between the U.S., China and other space-faring nations about how space can be used," Swaine said.

Other experts were skeptical about how much a dialogue with China would yield.

"Talking is swell, but don't expect to get anything from it," said James Andrew Lewis, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Other skeptics, such as John J. Tkacik Jr. of the Heritage Foundation's Asian Studies Center, have argued that China has rebuffed U.S. attempts to negotiate over space. The U.S., Tkacik said, should tell China there will be consequences for missile launches. The leverage America has, he said, is bilateral trade.

China's Anti-satellite Missile Test Criticised (FT)

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

China on Friday denied provoking a space arms race following international condemnation of its successful test of an anti-satellite weapon, the first such test by any country in two decades.

The US, Japan, Britain and Australia criticised Beijing for testing an anti-satellite system without warning by destroying a weather satellite in space orbit with a ballistic missile.

Japanese officials were among the first to react to the test. "We are concerned about it firstly from the point of view of peaceful use of space, and secondly from the safety perspective," said Yasuhisa Shiozaki, Japan's chief cabinet secretary.

A Chinese foreign ministry spokesman said on Friday he was not aware of any such test, but that whatever had happened, other countries did not have "any reason" to be concerned about China's space programme.

"The principled position of the Chinese government is that we stand for the peaceful use of space," said spokesman Liu Jianchao. "We are against the introduction of weapons into space."

A Bush administration official said the Chinese had conducted three other tests between September 2004 and February 2006. Another senior administration official said the earlier missile launches were "mostly successful" but were intended to test parts of the anti-satellite system before conducting a final test.

Asked whether the UK was concerned about the ramifications for world peace, a spokesman for Tony Blair, the British prime minister, said: "We believe this [test] does not contravene international law."

The US and former Soviet Union stopped testing kinetic anti-satellite weapons – which destroy targets by the force of impact – in the 1980s, partly out of concern over the effect of space debris on their satellites.

China and Russia in recent years have encouraged the US to enter negotiations about creating an international treaty that would ban the use of weapons in space. But Washington has argued that there was no need for a treaty because there were no weapons in space.

Some analysts said the Chinese move might have been designed to pressure the US to sign an agreement. Others said China might have decided to proceed because of a US policy that it would not allow other countries to restrict its activities in space.

Report by Demetri Sevastopulo in Washington, Mure Dickie in Beijing, Jean Eaglesham in London, Mariko Sanchanta in Tokyo and Neil Buckley in Moscow

China Tries To Reassure The World On Space Missile "Aimed At Peace" (LONT)

By Jane Macartney, Richard Beeston, Tim Reid

Times of London, January 20, 2007

China signalled yesterday that its first missile strike against an orbiting satellite was intended to force the US into talks aimed at abolishing weapons in space.

As it faced an international chorus of protest against its test — the first such launch for 20 years — its officials insisted that they wanted space to be free of weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0119861

"As the Chinese Government, our principle stand is to promote the peaceful use of space," a Foreign Ministry spokesman said. "We oppose the militarisation of space. In the past, in the present and in the future, we are opposed to any arms race in space. Of this everyone can be confident."

The reassurances failed to placate jittery Asian neighbours and Western powers, which fear that the surprise Chinese muscle-flexing is part of a campaign to raise its global military posture while raising the spectre of a space arms race.

China is the first country since 1985 to destroy a satellite in space and only the third — after America and the former Soviet Union — to master so-called Star Wars technology. The clear message is that if China can shoot down its own orbiter it could also attack satellites operated by other nations.

Beijing has increased defence spending by 10 per cent every year since 1990. Last year spending rose nearly 15 per cent to $35.5 billion (£18 billion). Experts believe that the true figure is far higher, in part because the official budget does not include military development costs.

Yesterday Britain and Japan added their voices to the growing criticism, which has included the US, Australia, South Korea and Canada. A Downing Street spokesman said that Britain was concerned about the impact of debris caused by the destruction of the satellite and the secretive manner in which the test had been carried out. A formal protest was made this week to the Chinese by the British Embassy in Beijing.

Alexander Downer, the Australian Foreign Minister, said that China's new-found capacity to shoot down satellites was "not consistent with ... the traditional Chinese position of opposition to the militarisation of outer space".

Washington's response will be crucial in determining what happens next: an arms race in space or an agreement to limit the use of Star Wars technology. American analysts said that the test had exposed the "soft underbelly" of America's national security apparatus, because most of the Pentagon's spy satellites orbit at a similar height to the weather satellite destroyed by the Chinese test.

White House critics said that the Chinese test was a result of President Bush's aggressive unilateralism, this time in his space policy. Last year the US expressly ignored Chinese and Russian calls for a global ban on the development of space weapons. Instead, a new policy preserved America's right to develop military space technology, while "dissuading" others.

Edward Markey, a Democrat congressman, said that President Bush should initiate an international agreement "to ban the development, testing and deployment of space weapons and anti-satellite systems".

But Jeffrey Kueter, president of the George C. Marshall Institute, said that the Chinese move should spur the Bush Administration to develop new space defence systems.

"We now know for certain that China has the direct capability to destroy satellites in space and the indirect capability to deny their use," he said.

Chinese analysts said that they doubted the action would damage China's relations with the US. Shi Yinhong, of the School of International Studies, said: "Every big power, if it wants to maintain its status as a big power, will get into the field of space."

Chinese Space Test Raises US Suspicions (FT)

By Mure Dickie, Stephen Fidler, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

China's test this month of an anti-satellite weapon, which Washington says was used to destroy an ageing Chinese satellite, is likely to carry a cost for Beijing, according to military analysts.

It is sure to raise further US suspicions about Beijing's intentions, heightened by previous launches in the past three years. Between September 2004 and February 2006, a US official said, China launched three rockets capable of destroying a satellite.

A senior US official said the Chinese had developed an anti-satellite system in which they had a "great deal of confidence" and which could "conceivably degrade or cripple key [US] systems". He said the weapon was based on an existing system that could be deployed with little warning.

The development appears to be the latest example of China surprising the US over the extent of its military capabilities.

The Pentagon last year warned that China was "pursuing" anti-satellite systems but concluded that they could only destroy or disable satellites using nuclear-armed missiles, which could carry "many risks".

DOJ_NMG_0119862

The US is sensitive to any potential threat to its space-based systems, as shown by Washington's complaint that the development and testing of such weapons is "in-consistent with the spirit" of Sino-US civil co-operation in space.

In the absence of any Chinese public statement, the motivation for the test remains unclear.

"China is committed to military modernisation and if it wants to modernise its military then it has to develop some limited space capability," said Shi Yinhong, a professor of international politics at Beijing's Renmin University.

Andrew Brookes of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, said: "China has a big space launch programme and they're talking about going to the moon. It may simply be a military department competing for its budget share by demonstrating its capability."

The senior US official said Beijing probably wanted to test its capabilities while demonstrating the progress it had made to the US.

Whatever the motivation, the consequences may be significant.

The US military is heavily dependent on satellites for surveillance, intelligence gathering, weapons guidance and communications.

While the Chinese test successfully demonstrated a technology that the US and the Soviet Union mastered more than two decades ago, it is likely to increase pressure from hawks in Washington for the US to spend more on the defence of its space assets.

That might include pressure to base defensive weapons in space – for example so-called space mines. However, A 2004 report from the Federation of American Scientists -concluded that the US could equally well use a number of -alternative defensive approaches that would avoid basing weapons in space.

The test is likely to bring calls from another direction too: that it is time for an international treaty to stop the use of space for military purposes. China and Russia have been pushing the US to agree to a pact banning the deployment or use of weapons in space.

The US responded that a treaty was unnecessary because no country was deploying or using weapons in space. The senior administration official yesterday said the US did not agree with the way China defined space weapons. "They want to define arms in space very broadly to include ballistic missile defence," he said. "That is not the way it is going to go."

Some analysts said the equation had now changed. "We just got our arms race," said Jeffrey Lewis, an arms control expert at Harvard University.

"The US has refused to engage in negotiations and this may be why the Chinese did this," said Theresa Hitchens, an expert on space militarisation at the Center for Defense Information.

The US and Soviet Union stopped testing kinetic anti-satellite weapons in the 1980s, partly because they were concerned about the physical impact of space debris on their own satellites, and partly due to the potential ramifications for the nuclear balance. Both sides feared that the destruction of a satellite by space junk could cause the other to conclude that a nuclear attack was about to occur.

Military analysts say China has been worried by the possible US deployment of space-based weapons such as "rods from God" – hyper-velocity bundles of tungsten bars that would destroy earth-based targets.

But Mr Lewis says China has misread the US political landscape, saying the White House would use the test to argue that China was not serious about preventing an arms race in space.

While the US has not used an anti-satellite weapon for two decades, it has continued to work on them. Congress is funding the kinetic energy anti-satellite programme started during the Reagan years and the air force is thought to be developing weapons using lasers and microwaves that could obliterate satellites with minimal debris.

The US space policy unveiled last year asserts the right to deny access to space to anyone deemed "hostile to US interests".

"Compared with traditional US space policy, the hegemonic flavour of the new version is less disguised and betrays an intense determination to exercise control over space," wrote Teng Jianqun, deputy head of the China Arms -Control and Disarmament Association.

China's first satellite kill, however, will make it harder for it to claim the moral high ground on the demilitarisation of space.

DOJ_NMG_0119863

China's Muscle Flex In Space (NYT)

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

China spread alarm and consternation among space powers when it destroyed one of its own satellites last week with a missile fired from the ground, thus becoming the first nation in more than two decades to successfully test an antisatellite weapon. This aggressive show of force puts a wide range of United States military and intelligence satellites at risk and holds the danger of starting an arms race in space. Too bad the Bush administration's own bellicose attitudes — and adamant refusal to consider an arms control treaty for space — give it scant standing to chastise the Chinese. The administration needs to reverse course promptly and join in talks aimed at banning further tests or use of antisatellite weapons.

The Chinese test, which Beijing has not acknowledged but was tracked by intelligence agencies, destroyed an aging communications satellite some 500 miles above the Earth. The missile smashed the satellite into hundreds of pieces large enough to pose a danger for a decade or more to spacecraft or satellites that pass through the debris.

The Chinese have now demonstrated that — should they ever choose — they could destroy essential American satellites used to conduct military reconnaissance, spot nuclear tests and direct smart weapons. A top intelligence official told reporters last August that China had used a ground-based laser to illuminate an American satellite. That could signal a nascent effort to develop a way to blind satellites or to guide a missile to a target in space.

The Bush administration has been flexing its own muscles in space. A national space policy issued in October declared that "freedom of action in space is as important to the United States as air power and sea power." It asserted a need to deter others from interfering with America's right to operate in space. The policy did not address whether Washington would place weapons in space — as some in the Pentagon have been urging — but the administration continues to oppose any restrictions.

Surely it would make military and diplomatic sense to pursue the opposite course and seek to ban all tests and any use of antisatellite weapons.

The United States and the Soviet Union successfully tested such weapons decades ago and have no overriding need to develop better versions, although the United States is clearly trying. China's success in matching the feat reportedly came after three earlier tests failed, so the Chinese could only benefit from additional testing. The United States, with many more satellites in orbit than any other power and a military that has become increasingly dependent on satellites, has the most to lose from an unbridled space arms race.

Some experts suggest that China's latest test is intended to prod the United States to join serious negotiations. The way to counter China or any other potentially belligerent space power is through an arms control treaty, not a new arms race in space.

China Sets Off A New Round Of Star Wars (FT)

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

A means of modern warfare the world had complacently come to see as at least informally off the table is now very firmly back on it – or, rather, scattered as metallic debris across miles of outer space.

China, in an alarming exhibition of its military muscle, has fired a ground-based ballistic missile into space to destroy one of its own weather satellites, hitting a 4 sq ft box at 530 miles and bringing to a dramatic end a two decades-long moratorium on the testing of weapons in space. Good shooting, yes, but is it good politics?

This experiment has drawn widespread condemnation. The US clearly sees it as part of an effort by China to develop anti-satellite capability that could threaten its extensive space assets. The Chinese test may or may not lead to a new arms race in space. But it will certainly strengthen the hand of hawks in Washington who regard Chinese power as a strategic threat to the US. Yet there is a long history behind this incident – and the leadership in Beijing is not known for foolhardy or precipitate action.

The last extensive use of anti-satellite weapons was by the US and former Soviet Union in the 1980s. The cold war slowly raged, heated up in 1983 by President Ronald Reagan with his Strategic Defence Initiative – the infamous Star Wars speech in which he announced plans to develop the capability to destroy missiles from space.

Those tests nonetheless ceased in 1985, not least because they created an uncontrollable fall-out of debris that threatened the network of satellites ever more densely carpeting the sky.

DOJ_NMG_0119864

Both Moscow and Beijing subsequently made efforts to take space out of the military equation. The US, with a military budget able to outspend almost the rest of the planet put together, was simply not interested.

To the extent that it bothered to explain its position, Washington argued that the demilitarisation of space would be impossible to verify: a self-serving argument similar to the Bush administration's reasoning for opposing the verification protocol of the Biological Weapons Convention.

In the past year, however, two developments may have rattled Beijing. First, the US nuclear co-operation agreement with nuclear-armed India is the clearest indication yet of Washington's wish to build up a counterweight to China in Asia and the Pacific. But second, last summer the Bush administration came out with a new policy asserting that the US regarded space as important a dimension for the nation's security as air or sea power. It may have been no coincidence that, within weeks, China ruffled American feathers by using a ground-based laser to illuminate a US satellite – and highlight its own reach into space.

The US is so dependent on satellites for surveillance, observation of the "battlespace", communications and defence against any incoming missiles (or son of Star Wars) that it has reason to feel alarmed. The National Security Council on Friday called China's test "inconsistent with the spirit of co-operation that both countries aspire to in the civil space area".

Ideally, that remark would translate into a realisation that hyperpower exceptionalism – America's sense of entitlement to rights it concedes to no ally, let alone competitor – comes at a cost. But the risk is that this episode will instead translate into a new surge of defence spending that will delight the arms industry but do nothing to enhance international security.

N Korea Claims Progress In US Talks (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

Efforts to make progress on the North Korean nuclear stand-off received a rare boost on Friday when Pyongyang said it had reached "certain agreement" during discussions with US diplomats this week.

Christopher Hill, the chief US nuclear negotiator, arrived in Seoul Friday and noted "very useful discussions" had been held but said he did not know to what "agreement" North Korea was referring.

However, the gulf between Washington and Pyongyang remains so wide that the mere fact they talked this week was viewed as a sign of progress.

Mr Hill and Kim Kye-gwan, North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator, held unprecedented bilateral talks in Berlin this week to discuss their considerable differences in opinion over Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions.

The chief US negotiator has reportedly offered Pyongyang a package of energy and economic aid and security guarantees if it agrees to abandon its nuclear weapons programme.

On Monday, bilateral talks on the US financial crackdown on North Korea – between US Treasury officials and North Korean financial authorities – are due to open, and the next round of six-party nuclear talks could resume early next month.

"We paid attention to the direct dialogue held by the [North] and the US in a bid to settle knotty problems in resolving the nuclear issue," the North Korean foreign ministry said in a statement published by the official Korean Central News Agency Friday.

The talks were held "in a positive and sincere atmosphere and a certain agreement was reached there," it said.

"What we now have to do is to see how those [Berlin] discussions can be folded into the six-party process, whether those discussions can help lead to some progress in Beijing," Mr Hill said. He will visit Tokyo and Beijing this weekend to hold further talks.

South Korea's Yonhap News on Friday reported that the next round of nuclear talks could begin on February 5.

The last round, held in Beijing in December after a year's hiatus, were bogged down by the disagreement over Washington's accusation in September 2005 that North Korean companies were counterfeiting US dollar and laundering money.

The crackdown has effectively frozen North Korea's ability to earn hard currency and has led analysts to suggest Washington is more interested in squeezing North Korea than talking to it.

The Bush administration has refused to enter into bilateral negotiations with Kim Jong-il's regime – something Pyongyang has long called for – and insists that this week's one-on-one talks do not constitute a change in that policy.

DOJ_NMG_0119865

"We're not going outside the six-party framework to bilateralise our discussions with the North Koreans," Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, said in Berlin this week.

N.Korea: Deal Reached In U.S. Nuke Talks (AP)

By Burt Herman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

North Korea said it reached an agreement with the U.S. during talks this week on its nuclear program, and the top U.S. nuclear envoy expressed optimism Friday that progress could be made when wider arms negotiations reconvene.

North Korea's Foreign Ministry said three days of talks in Berlin between U.S. envoy Christopher Hill and North Korea's main nuclear negotiator Kim Kye Gwan had been held "in a positive and sincere atmosphere and a certain agreement was reached there." No further details were given.

Washington, however, played down talk of an agreement.

"I think it's premature to say there is an agreement — premature to say the least," deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino said Friday.

Hill said the talks laid the foundation for progress when six-nation nuclear negotiations resume and that he had agreed with his North Korean counterpart "on a number of issues." He declined to elaborate.

"I am pretty convinced that we have the basis for a good session of the six-party talks," Hill told reporters in Seoul after meeting South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-soon and nuclear envoy Chun Yung-woo.

The last round of six-nation talks in Beijing in December — two months after the North conducted its first-ever nuclear test in October — ended without any breakthroughs.

The negotiating countries, which include South Korea, the U.S., Japan, China and Russia, had been seeking to outline how to implement a September 2005 agreement in which the North pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

But North Korea refused to discuss its arms program and again demanded the U.S. lift its blacklisting of a Macau bank. The U.S. had accused the bank of being complicit in the communist country's alleged counterfeiting and money laundering, leading the bank to freeze North Korean assets worth about $24 million.

The North did not directly mention the financial dispute in its statement Friday, but said progress was made in overcoming obstacles to the six-nation talks.

"We paid attention to the direct dialogue held by the (North) and the U.S. in a bid to settle knotty problems in resolving the nuclear issue," the North's ministry said in the statement, released by the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

A South Korean news report said the six-nation arms talks could resume early next month due to progress made at the Germany meetings. Yonhap news agency, citing an unnamed diplomat in Seoul, said Thursday there is a high possibility the talks would resume in Beijing the week of Feb. 5.

On arriving in Seoul earlier Friday, Hill said he hoped six-nation talks would be held again before the Lunar New Year holiday celebrated across Asia that falls this year on Feb. 18. "It's up to the Chinese (hosts) but I would think we'll have a six-party meeting pretty soon," he said.

The U.S. is holding separate negotiations with North Korea on the financial dispute, but the last session that was held alongside the nuclear talks in December made no progress.

___

Associated Press reporters Kwang-tae Kim and Bo-mi Lim contributed to this report.

U.S. Says U.N. Agency Aided N. Korea (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

The United States accused a U.N. agency of funneling millions of dollars in cash aid to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and questioned if the funds had been used for other activities including nuclear weapons development, U.S. officials said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0119866

U.S. deputy ambassador Mark Wallace charged that the U.N. Development Program in North Korea operated "in blatant violation of U.N. rules" for years. He demanded an immediate outside audit, focusing on concerns that Pyongyang converted development funds "to its own illicit purposes."

The program, known as UNDP, said the use of cash for its operations in North Korea "in difficult circumstances" was approved by its executive board. Following the U.N. imposition of sanctions against North Korea in October for conducting a nuclear test, UNDP said it was taking measures to prevent "unintended consequences" of the program's activities.

UNDP Associate Administrator Ad Melkert disputed allegations that the agency violated U.N. rules, insisting it followed UNDP financial rules. Nonetheless, he said that by March 1, all hard currency payments to the government, national partners, local staff and suppliers would be replaced by payments in North Korean won.

The North Korean won is not a hard currency that can be easily used to buy luxury goods or weapons parts — but Melkert stressed that the only place to buy the local currency was from the country's central bank.

Neither the U.S. nor UNDP would give a figure of how much money was involved, but Melkert said it wasn't hundreds of millions of dollars. In a Jan. 5 letter to Wallace, he said, from 2001 to 2005, UNDP spent an average of $2.3 million annually on both program and administration, including approximately $100,000 annually on local salaries.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon called for an urgent "external inquiry" into U.N. funds and programs around the globe, U.N. spokeswoman Michele Montas said. Many of the agencies — like UNDP — operate semi-independently and have their own boards.

Montas said the external audits will cover all funds and programs including the U.N. Children's Fund, the U.N. refugee agency, the World Food Program and the World Health Organization.

An exchange of letters between Wallace and senior UNDP officials goes back to November and was first reported by the Wall Street Journal.

U.S. officials said they first received indications there might be some irregularities in UNDP's North Korea program in the second half of 2006, and raised concerns that the cash might be misused, possibly for Pyongyang's nuclear program.

A Jan. 4 letter from Wallace to UNDP Administrator Kemal Dervis raised "U.S. concerns that UNDP has transferred hard currency directly to the regime of Kim Jong Il."

Wallace's harshest letter, dated Jan. 16, said that after examining several of the agency's internal audits, the U.S. concluded that UNDP's local staff is dominated by North Korean government employees who have managed the agency's programs and finances in violation of UNDP rules.

He cited three other violations of U.N. rules — the government's insistence that UNDP pay cash to North Korean government suppliers, and UNDP's failure to oversee projects it funds in the country or to audit its programs.

"The UNDP program has laudable goals of providing assistance to the North Korean peoples," said Wallace, who focuses on U.N. management issues. "Unfortunately, because of the actions of the DPRK (North Korean) government and the complicity of UNDP, at least since 1998, the UNDP DPRK program has been systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime — rather than the people of North Korea."

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro Wolff said the United States is still seeking answers and doesn't know the extent of the problem, or how much money was involved.

"It simply boggles the imagination that they simply dole out cash without controls," he said.

UNDP's Melkert said the agency was operating in North Korea in an environment reminiscent of the Cold War when many communist bloc countries selected staff employed by U.N. agencies, which often operated under severe financial and travel restrictions.

"Around 1999, there were many concerns expressed by internal auditors," Melkert told a news conference. "We've seen a gradual tendency of a diminishing number of issues brought to the attention of management by the (internal) auditors, but some very tough issues remain and those are the issues that we have addressed now."

In addition to ending cash payments, he said, UNDP will discontinue government recruitment of national staff "and we will put the right monitoring and audits in place addressing the issue of national execution."

DOJ_NMG_0119867

US Claims N Korea Syphoned Millions From UN Project (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

Lax controls in the United Nations Development Programme may have led to millions of dollars of currency being funnelled to North Korea, according to US officials.

In a letter sent to the UN agency this week Washington said that "at least since 1998 the UNDP [North Korea] programme has been systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime – rather than the people of North Korea".

"The programme has for years operated in blatant violation of UN rules...Importantly, UNDP apparently has failed to bring the widespread violation of UNDP rules...to the attention of the UNDP executive board," the letter said.

As of 1999, it said, there were 29 UNDP projects in North Korea with a total budget of $28m.

While US officials say they are not clear on the full extent or nature of the problem, the findings echo the UN's oil-for-food programme scandal, in which the Iraqi regime raised $1.8bn dollars in defiance of international sanctions.

The complaint comes amid allegations by UNDP insiders that procedures are not fully followed in the multi-billion dollar programme. UNDP executive board members are expected to call at a meeting next week for more transparency.

US officials say they have confidence that Ban Ki-moon, the new secretary-general who comes from South Korea, is intent on rooting out UN mismanagement. Mr Ban recently called on the US not to withhold funding from the world body.

But Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, the ranking Republican member of the US House Foreign Affairs Committee, called the findings "yet another example of the abuses made possible by the lack of accountability within the UN system".

"It is clear that the measures that have been taken to date are woefully inadequate. Only through outside pressure can meaningful change be ensured. I and other members are determined to apply that pressure in this Congress."

In a statement issued on Friday, the UNDP said its operations in North Korea (DPRK) were "in full compliance with the decisions of the member states on UNDP Executive Board and with resolutions passed recently by the UN Security Council".

"The Executive Board directly approved financial regulations on the basis of which authority was delegated to the Resident Co-ordinator in DPRK." But it said it would seek guidance at next week's meeting "on conducting a full independent and external audit of the current programme".

According to the US's January 16 letter, sent to Ad Melkert, associate administrator, UNDP's North Korean staff is dominated by government officials, who had "performed financial and programme managerial core functions in violation of UNDP rules".

The UNDP has been led since mid-2005 by Kemal Dervis, but much of the period in question was under the leadership of Mark Malloch Brown, who went on to become the UN's chief-of-staff and, later, its deputy secretary-general.

Embattled U.N. Agency Alters Aid To N. Korea (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Development Program (UNDP), which is under fire for sending millions of dollars to North Korea that it is unable to monitor, yesterday announced new operating procedures in an attempt to stave off opposition from the United States.

The UNDP said it will no longer pay North Korean suppliers and employees in hard currency after March 1, and will no longer allow the North Korean government to hire its in-country staff.

It also said it will put into place improved monitoring and auditing of funds.

The changes were prompted after Washington demanded a full audit of UNDP operations in North Korea, which is subject to U.S. economic sanctions for making nuclear weapons, money laundering and purported acts of terrorism.

The UNDP in North Korea "has for years operated in blatant violation of U.N. rules, served as a steady and large source of hard currency and other resources for the [North Korean] government with minimal or no assurance that UNDP funds and resources are utilized for legitimate development activities," wrote Mark Wallace, a management and budget analyst at the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, in a recent letter to UNDP Administrator Kemal Dervis.

DOJ_NMG_0119868

Washington fears some of the estimated tens of millions of dollars in the program that were exchanged through the country's central bank have been siphoned off by the regime to help make atomic bombs.

Ad Melkert, the UNDP associate administrator, told reporters yesterday that he had no assurance that UNDP funds had not been diverted by the regime into it's nuclear program.

But he urged reporters "not to put words in my mouth."

Mr. Melkert was unable to say exactly how much money had been spent in recent years by the UNDP and other U.N. agencies in the hermit country, which allows few foreigners to enter.

In the past two years, however, he said the UNDP had spent between $4 million and $6 million, less than the $22 million that had been budgeted, in large part because of the difficulty of monitoring approved programs.

The disclosure cast new doubts on the ability of the United Nations to function transparently in deeply repressive societies.

Moreover, management lapses in the humanitarian program appear to echo those in the oil-for-food program, which allowed Saddam Hussein and his close associates to pocket as much as $2 billion from companies doing business with the United Nations in Iraq.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon yesterday demanded "an urgent, systemwide and external inquiry into all activities done around the globe by the U.N. funds and programs" after the irregularities were first reported in the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Wallace, in correspondence to UNDP quoted in the Journal, estimated that the program had spent tens of millions since 1999 on dozens of programs to improve public health, agriculture and human development.

The Journal cited one source saying that up to $100 million had been spent by U.N. programs in North Korea since 1998.

UNDP is the lead U.N. agency in North Korea, coordinating work by UNICEF, the World Food Program, the U.N. Population Fund and other programs.

U.N. officials have long acknowledged difficulties in monitoring programs in repressive countries.

The subject is likely to dominate the annual UNDP Executive Committee meeting, which is convening in New York next week.

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the ranking Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, urged the UNDP to immediately suspend its North Korean efforts.

"The UNDP's so-called 'nationally executed programs' in North Korea do not meet even minimal standards of transparency," she said.

"[North Korean leader] Kim Jong-il has been very clear about his 'military first' policy of national development. As far as anyone knows, he is using this money to pay for his nuclear weapons program instead of feeding his people."

Mr. Melkert said that it is important for international relief agencies to maintain a presence in North Korea, despite the difficulties of working there, to better respond to emergencies such as famines and floods.

"You can't just come in when you don't have any infrastructure whatsoever," he said.

U.S. Suspicious Of Aid To North Korea (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — Concerned that North Korea may be siphoning millions of dollars in U.N. money for illicit purposes, the United States is demanding that the U.N. Development Program in North Korea be revamped and submit to external audits.

In response to the U.S. pressure, the UNDP will halt the transfer of hard currency to the government, local staff and vendors by March 1 and will stop reimbursing North Korean government officials' travel to the U.N. after next week.

The UNDP will also insist that Pyongyang stop selecting and controlling the agency's local staff, Ad Melkert, the program's associate administrator, said Friday.

The U.N. Development Program has been in North Korea since 1995, overseeing projects in agriculture and the environment. This United Nations presence has provided food, work and pay for people surviving in near-famine conditions.

Some U.S. officials — chief among them John R. Bolton, former ambassador to the U.N. — have argued that the world should let the North Korean regime collapse, even though that would cause a flood of refugees into China and South Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0119869

However, U.N. agencies, including UNICEF, the World Food Program and the U.N. Population Fund, are active in the isolated country — and all probably face similar problems in doing their work.

Because the North Korean financial system is not set up to handle purchasing orders, checks or credit, the U.N. Development Program pays most of its expenses in bundles of euros, including rent. That practice is contrary to rules, but administrators felt that they could more closely follow money flows by putting payments directly in people's hands, rather than allowing Pyongyang to convert them to local currency and then distribute them, spokesman David Morrison said.

But a series of internal audits by the accounting firm KPMG found lax controls and failure by international staffers to visit UNDP projects, raising questions about whether the U.N. funds were used as intended.

A Jan. 16 letter from Mark Wallace, the U.S. official overseeing U.N. management and reform, lauds the program's goals but says the U.S. is concerned that at least since 1998 the program has been "systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime — rather than the people of North Korea."

Wallace's letter to UNDP chief Kemal Dervis also says the program "has for years operated in blatant violation of U.N. rules [and] served as a steady and large source of hard currency and other resources for the North Korean government with minimal or no assurance that UNDP funds and resources are utilized for legitimate development activities."

The issue is expected to dominate the UNDP's executive board meeting next week, where a proposal of a $17.9-million budget for North Korea for the next three years will be on the table. Board members are already aware of the difficulty of executing projects in the country: Of the $22 million budgeted for the last two years, less than $3 million worth of projects was completed, Melkert said.

Top on the list of concerns is that foreign currency enables Pyongyang to bolster its nuclear weapons program. The U.S. has frozen North Korean funds overseas, and banned dealings in dollars with the regime as punishment for its alleged counter feiting of U.S. currency.

Washington also charges that Pyongyang traffics in drugs and provides illicit help for other countries' missile and nuclear weapons programs.

U.S. officials Friday said it was too early to suggest any deal had been made in three days of talks with North Korea in Berlin.

North Korea's official news agency had quoted negotiator Kim Kye Gwan as saying "a certain agreement" had been reached with U.S. envoy Christopher Hill and signaling that talks may have included ways to reconcile differences over U.S. sanctions against foreign banks doing business with North Korea.

North Korea has refused to negotiate the future of its nuclear weapons program until the sanctions are lifted.

U.N. To Audit Its Activities After Reports On North Korea Program (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 19 — Ban Ki-moon, the new secretary general, called Friday for outside examination of all United Nations activities after a published report that the United Nations Development Program in North Korea was making unaccountable payments in hard currency to local staff members and the North Korean government.

Mr. Ban sought “an urgent, systemwide and external inquiry into all activities done around the globe by the U.N. funds and programs.”

His prompt action, taken after a morning meeting with the program’s associate administrator, Ad Melkert, appeared to be an effort to head off the kind of problems that his predecessor, Kofi Annan, faced after muddled United Nations responses to reports of scandals.

“We are very pleased with the new team’s reaction,” said Richard A. Grenell, the spokesman for the American Mission. Mr. Ban, the former foreign minister of South Korea, began his five-year term on Jan. 1.

Complaints about the United Nations activities in North Korea were raised over the past month by the United States Mission in a series of letters to directors of the program and were made public on Friday on the op-ed page of The Wall Street Journal.

DOJ_NMG_0119870

In the latest letter, dated Tuesday, Mark D. Wallace, the deputy United States ambassador for management, said that the United Nations Development Program's operation had been "systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime rather than the people of North Korea."

Mr. Wallace said that the local staff of the development program was dominated by employees of the repressive government, that the United Nations had failed to conduct proper on-site audits and depended instead on "sham" ones by the North Korean government, and that all payments were made at the government's demand in hard currency — dollars or euros — rather than the won, the national currency.

"Simply put," Mr. Wallace wrote, "in the absence of real audits and site visits, it is impossible for U.N.D.P. to verify whether or not any of the funds paid to the D.P.R.K. for supposed use in U.N.D.P. programs have actually been used for bona fide development purposes or if the D.P.R.K. has converted such funds for its own illicit purposes." North Korea is officially called the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and sometimes referred to by its initials.

Mr. Melkert, the associate administrator, said that the program had spent $2 million to $3 million in North Korea annually in the past two years.

He said it would cease making hard currency payments to the government, local vendors and individuals as of March 1 and would also start hiring local staff members in North Korea the way it does elsewhere, by its own choice and on merit.

Even making payments in the won currency will not stop a flow of hard currency to the government, however, because the United Nations will have to buy the won from the central bank, he noted.

"The question — and it is an entirely legitimate one — comes down to whether you want to operate as the U.N. in a country like North Korea," Mr. Melkert said.

He said that he welcomed the call for external auditing of his agency's activities. Currently they are examined in internal audits, which are then given to the United Nations auditing board, which decides what to transmit to the General Assembly.

Asked about the American charge that funds might have been diverted to illicit ends, he said, "The audits have not given any reason for suspicion about money not being used for the purposes meant. Still, in order to make sure that there are no misperceptions or unintended consequences, we are supportive of an external independent audit."

It was not clear how quickly or effectively Mr. Ban could impose his order across the range of United Nations agencies, many of which have differing auditing procedures and over which he does not have direct budget authority.

"It's worldwide; it's not going to be done overnight," said Michèle Montas, his spokeswoman.

U.N. To Examine Relief Agencies' Pay In N. Korea (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

U.S. Charges That Workers' Salaries Go to Rulers

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 19 -- U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon on Friday ordered a broad inquiry into the financial practices of most of the United Nations' chief relief agencies, after a U.S. charge that the world body was inadvertently channeling foreign currency into the hands of North Korea's rulers.

Mark D. Wallace, the U.S. representative to the United Nations for management and reform, accused the U.N. Development Program in a letter Tuesday of violating rules by hiring North Korean government officials to carry out most of its work and by paying salaries in cash into an account controlled by the Pyongyang leadership. He called for an independent "forensic" audit of its operations in North Korea, citing concern that the U.N. payments could be diverted to unnamed illicit activities.

Development program officials denied they had violated U.N. rules and noted that it is impossible to work in a totalitarian state such as North Korea without pumping foreign currency into the economy. They said all U.N. agencies are required to pay their local staff through a government paymaster.

But the development agency's associate administrator, Ad Melkert, announced on Friday that the agency will halt all cash payments for its North Korean workers by March 1. He also echoed U.S. calls for an outside investigation, saying "a full, independent external audit is in order to make sure that we really understand what it means to work in a country like North Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0119871

Development program officials said they are also ending the practice of allowing the North Korean government to recruit local staff.

The U.N. development agency employs four international workers and 16 North Koreans in a program that costs $2 million to $3 million a year, including $100,000 in local salaries. The workers carry out activities such as delivering food or giving advice on trade activities.

Some U.N. officials said the United States is unfairly targeting the development program, noting that two other U.N. agencies headed by U.S. political appointees -- the U.N. Children's Fund and the World Food Program -- had engaged in similar practices in North Korea. One senior U.N. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the report was viewed by many at the world body as an effort to discredit Mark Malloch Brown, a former U.N. Development Program administrator. Malloch Brown, who later served as chief of staff to then-Secretary General Kofi Annan, frequently criticized John R. Bolton, then-U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. "This is payback," the official said.

Wallace, a political appointee who served as Bolton's top adviser on U.N. reform, began questioning development program officials about their North Korea efforts in mid-December. He said the program "has been systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime -- rather than the people of North Korea." The program, he added, has "for years operated in blatant violation of U.N. rules [and] served as a steady and large source of hard currency" for the government.

He also raised concern about the United Nations' payment of nearly $12,000 to fly a North Korean official in business class to New York to attend a meeting of the development program's board of directors. Melkert later assured Wallace that the agency would no longer "reimburse government officials travel or other costs for attending board meetings."

The contents of his letter were first reported by Fox News and the Wall Street Journal's opinion page.

During the Cold War, the United Nations routinely relied on handpicked Soviet bloc officials to carry out relief work and paid their salaries directly to the government. The United Nations continued that practice in China, Vietnam and Cuba until recently.

"We used people that were provided by the government for all support staff" in North Korea, said Catherine Bertini, a former executive director of the World Food Program. "That was not the only country. It was also done in China."

But the practice is being phased out everywhere but North Korea. "The essential way North Korea operates has not changed," Melkert said.

A Product Of The U.N. System (NYT)

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Benon Sevan no longer works for the United Nations. But his indictment on federal corruption charges stemming from his long maladministration of the Iraqi oil-for-food program points to a continuing problem in the U.N. appointments system that Secretary General Ban Ki-moon needs to tackle without further delay.

Three successive secretaries general chose Mr. Sevan for a series of important jobs, despite his decidedly mixed performance. He is a typical product of a system in which who you know and where you come from count far more than merit or vision.

Mr. Sevan, a Cypriot, is accused, together with Ephraim Nadler, an Egyptian-born American citizen, of taking kickbacks from an Egyptian oil trader to help him win Iraqi oil contracts. Mr. Nadler happens to be a relative of Boutros Boutros-Ghali, the former secretary general. And Mr. Boutros-Ghali happens to have been one of the key promoters of Mr. Sevan's United Nations career.

The legal question of Mr. Sevan's guilt or innocence cannot be properly resolved unless he returns to this country for trial. He may choose not to, since he faces a possible 50-year jail sentence. Some of the charges in the indictment are backed up by the scathing findings of the earlier Volcker commission investigation of the oil-for-food scandal.

There is plenty of blame to go round. The program actually succeeded in its main aim of helping to shield innocent Iraqis from the pain of prolonged international sanctions against Saddam Hussein's regime. But Security Council members, including the United States, failed to monitor its administration diligently and deliberately winked at Iraqi oil smuggling that benefited American allies.

DOJ_NMG_0119872

But eliminating the dirty little bargains that have always characterized international diplomacy will be a lot harder than reforming the United Nations' dysfunctional personnel system. That system's multiple failings, of which this is only the best-known example, has badly hurt the United Nations' credibility and effectiveness and handed a ready stick to its many enemies.

Mr. Ban has repeatedly talked about reforming this disastrous personnel system. But his early appointments show little sign of actually doing so. Mr. Sevan's indictment should be a reminder of why Mr. Ban needs to do better.

Israel Sends Promised $100 Million To Abbas (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 19 -- Israel released $100 million in tax revenue Friday to Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, fulfilling Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's pledge last month to do so.

Olmert agreed to transfer the money in a meeting with Abbas, a relative moderate, as a way of strengthening his position in a political struggle with the rival Hamas movement. Israel continues to hold more than $400 million in sales and customs revenue that it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority under an agreement reached as part of the 1993 Oslo accords.

Israel stopped making the monthly tax transfers after Hamas won parliamentary elections a year ago, giving it day-to-day control of the Palestinian Authority. The radical Islamic movement does not recognize Israel, and the international aid boycott that followed its election has crippled the Palestinian government.

The $100 million is equal to about two months of tax transfers, and falls short of covering one month of the Palestinian Authority's payroll. It is being transferred directly to accounts controlled by Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president and a leader of the Fatah movement, to avoid the Hamas-run Finance Ministry.

Olmert also pledged to eliminate some of the hundreds of checkpoints and obstacles to movement in the West Bank, some of which have been removed in recent days.

Meanwhile, Israel said Friday that it had halted plans to build a new West Bank settlement, the Associated Press reported.

Israel Unfreezes $100M Before Summit (AP)

By Steve Weizman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

Israel said Friday it had paid $100 million in frozen tax funds to the Palestinians and rescinded a contentious decision for a new West Bank settlement, strengthening the hand of moderate President Mahmoud Abbas ahead of crucial weekend talks in Damascus with his Hamas rivals.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office said the payment, the first such transfer since the militant Islamic Hamas won control of the Palestinian government in March 2006, was made Thursday night.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz, meanwhile, ordered plans for the Maskiot settlement frozen indefinitely "in order to look carefully at the implications," ministry officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

Israel drew international condemnation with its announcement last month that it had approved the construction of Maskiot to house those settlers removed from the Gaza Strip in Israel's 2005 pullout. It was the first new West Bank settlement officially approved since the early 1990s, when Israel promised to halt such construction as part of interim peace accords.

Israel has been trying to boost Abbas in his struggle with Hamas, which rejects the existence of a Jewish state in an Islamic Middle East. However, such efforts can backfire, as Palestinians of all stripes try to distance themselves from the Israelis.

In a development expected to further fan Arab anger, the 10-year-old daughter of a Palestinian peace activist, critically wounded by Israeli security forces during a demonstration earlier in the week, died of her injuries in a Jerusalem hospital Friday.

Abir Aramin's father, Bassam Aramin, was among the founders of Combatants for Peace, a group of former Israeli and Palestinian fighters who work for a peaceful resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. He said his daughter's death did not alter his commitment to work for peace.

"I'm going to continue in this role and not give up," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0119873

Abbas is to travel to Syria on Saturday for talks with Hamas chief Khaled Mashaal, aiming at forging a coalition government and ending a punishing international aid boycott. Talks have sputtered for months amid clashes between each side's loyalists, which have killed 35 people, but the fact that the two leaders were meeting hinted that an agreement might be finally at hand.

Abbas said Friday if the latest round of talks fails, he will call early elections, but acknowledged that Hamas could emerge the victor once again.

"We say either there is a (unity) government or elections," he said after a meeting with European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana in the West Bank town of Ramallah. "Elections don't mean we want to throw Hamas into the sea. It has been elected and can be elected again."

The financial transfer to Abbas was part of tax money Israel collects for the Palestinian Authority by mutual agreement. Israel halted payments when Hamas won parliamentary elections and set up its Cabinet.

Abbas aide Saeb Erekat welcomed the payment, but said it still only represented about 25 percent of Palestinian revenues Israel is holding.

"We need it badly, and we consider this a step in the right direction, hoping that the whole lot of money withheld will be transferred to the Palestinian Authority," he said.

Israel, the United States and the EU define Hamas as a terrorist group because of its suicide bombings against Israelis in the past decade, which have killed hundreds. Since the group took office, the international community has frozen foreign aid that kept the Palestinian Authority afloat since it was created in 1994.

An official in Olmert's office said the funds transferred Thursday were paid directly to Abbas for use in humanitarian efforts and to boost his security force. The official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the decision had not yet been announced, said Israel was satisfied by assurances that the money would not go to the Hamas-controlled Finance Ministry.

The scheduled Abbas-Mashaal meeting would be their first in years. Abbas' Fatah and Hamas are bitter enemies — their efforts to form a unity government must overcome deep ideological and political divides.

Only the hardships caused by the aid cutoff have pushed them together, forcing them to look for formulas both could live with — while satisfying Western demands that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous peace accords. So far, Hamas has refused.

In Gaza, the Popular Resistance Committees, a small local militant group linked to last year's abduction of an Israeli soldier, said it intended to carry out more kidnappings to pressure Israel for the release of what it said were at least 144 bodies of Palestinians killed by the Israeli army and buried around Israel.

"Kidnapping soldiers will be an effective way," said Abu Mujahed, a spokesman for the group, adding that seizing the bodies of dead soldiers to trade for the Palestinian remains was also an option.

The PRC is one of three militant groups that tunneled into Israel and captured Cpl. Gilad Shalit in a June 25 raid near the Gaza Strip. Shalit has not been seen since then, but he is believed to be alive, and Egypt has been trying to broker his release in exchange for Palestinians held in Israeli prisons.

Israel Releases $100 Million Withheld From Palestinians (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 19 — Israel transferred $100 million in Palestinian tax revenues to the office of the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, as part of a plan to bolster him and keep money out of the hands of the Hamas government, Israeli officials said Friday.

The money is intended to meet needs for food, medicine and other basic expenses but not to pay the overdue salaries of Palestinian government workers, according to Israeli officials.

It was transferred “to a special account to ensure the money does not reach the Hamas government and cannot be used for perpetrating terror against Israel,” according to a statement from the office of Israel’s prime minister, Ehud Olmert.

Israel collects more than $50 million a month in taxes and customs money on behalf of the Palestinians under an arrangement dating from the 1990s, when the two sides were holding peace negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0119874

However, Israel began withholding the money after Hamas won the Palestinian elections a year ago, gaining control of the cabinet and legislature. Israel has not said precisely how much money it has withheld, but it is believed to be over $500 million.

At a meeting last month, Mr. Olmert agreed to hand over $100 million as part of a package of moves designed to help Mr. Abbas in his power struggle with Hamas. Israel also has removed some West Bank roadblocks, but Palestinians say they still face many obstacles when they seek to travel.

Palestinians say that the money belongs to their government and that it is not up to Israel to dictate how it should be spent. "Israel can say whatever it wants," said Muhammad Dahlan, a Palestinian legislator and a leading member of Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement. "This is our money."

Israel has not said whether it would release more money in the future. Before Israel began withholding the money last year, it was sent to the Palestinian Finance Ministry.

Also on Friday, Defense Minister Amir Peretz of Israel suspended the establishment of a Jewish settlement in the West Bank.

When Mr. Peretz said on Dec. 26 that he had approved the Maskiot settlement in the Jordan Valley, it provoked sharp criticism by the Palestinians, as well as American concern.

Mr. Peretz ordered a "freeze in the plans for Maskiot in order to evaluate them thoroughly," his office said in a statement. The plans called for the construction of about 30 homes for settlers to be built on an old army base.

Israel has more than 100 formal settlements in the West Bank and many informal ones. Israel pledged to stop building new settlements in the 1990s, and the so-called road map, the stalled Mideast peace plan introduced in 2003, calls for Israel to freeze settlement activity.

Still, the population of the Israeli settlements on West Bank is increasing by more than 10,000 a year, and is now more than 250,000. The figure does not include residents of East Jerusalem, which Israel captured in the 1967 war and later annexed.

In another development, Mr. Abbas is traveling to Syria, where he will hold talks with President Bashar al-Assad. He will also be looking for a solution to the deadlock between his Fatah movement and Hamas, the two main Palestinian factions.

The factions have been trying, without success, to form a national unity government for months, while gunmen from the two groups have periodically battled in the streets.

Mr. Abbas's envoys have been holding talks with Hamas leaders in Damascus, the Syrian capital, including Hamas's exiled political chief, Khaled Mashal. Palestinian officials say a meeting between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Mashal is possible, though not certain.

In remarks on Friday, Mr. Abbas said again that the Palestinians should establish a government that would be acceptable to the international community, or hold new elections. "It is very clear how to get a national unity government that can break the siege," he said in the West Bank city of Ramallah after playing host to the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana.

A 10-year-old Palestinian girl, Abir Aramin, died Friday from wounds sustained when she was hit by fire from the Israeli border police on Tuesday in the West Bank town of Anata, near Jerusalem, Palestinian witnesses and relatives said. Abir and her classmates were on recess from school when the Israeli forces fired on stone-throwing Palestinians with rubber bullets and stun grenades, according to the Palestinians.

Abir was hit in the head and collapsed, the Palestinians said. The border police said they were investigating the report.

Israel Releases Palestinian Funds (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials said Friday that they had transferred $100 million in withheld revenues to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert agreed to the move during a meeting with Abbas last month. Israel began withholding about $50 million monthly in taxes and customs duties last year after the militant Hamas movement took control of the Palestinian government following elections.

DOJ_NMG_0119875

Israel described the transfer as part of an effort to bolster the weakened Abbas, a relative moderate from Hamas' main rival, Fatah. The $100 million represents less than one-third of the money Israel has collected on behalf of the Palestinian Authority and refuses to relinquish.

Israeli officials said the money was being channeled to Abbas' office rather than to any ministry of the Palestinian Authority in order to maintain an aid embargo against Hamas, which Israel and much of the West consider a terrorist group.

"The money is not to go to the Hamas-controlled government. The money is to support the Palestinian people, and [Abbas] will be distributing it," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

Palestinian officials said the funds would help pay companies that supply hospitals, schools and farms.

The transfer, one of several modest concessions promised by Olmert during the Dec. 23 summit, could help the Palestinian leader in his political standoff with Hamas.

Despite months of negotiations, Fatah and Hamas haven't agreed on terms of a power-sharing arrangement that would break the Western aid embargo.

Abbas is expected to meet today in Damascus, Syria, with Khaled Meshaal, the exiled Hamas political leader, amid fresh efforts to break the months-long impasse.

Abbas previously declared talks at a dead end, saying he would call early elections for the presidency and parliament. But mediators have continued trying to coax the two sides into agreeing on a joint government under terms that could satisfy the West.

Mohammed Dahlan, an Abbas confidant, said Friday that the president might meet with Meshaal but would not engage in negotiations. Abbas said Friday that he would proceed with elections if the latest efforts failed.

Past talks snagged over the distribution of ministerial posts and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel. Western nations demand that the government accept the Jewish state's right to exist, renounce violence and agree to abide by past Israeli-Palestinian accords.

Meshaal is considered more strident than some of his Hamas counterparts in the Gaza Strip and has torpedoed past proposals. He also holds veto power over a proposed prisoner swap under which Israel would free jailed Palestinians in return for the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was captured by Hamas militants in June.

In other developments Friday, Israeli officials said Defense Minister Amir Peretz had frozen plans for construction of new housing for Jewish settlers in the West Bank. The plans for up to 100 homes at a former base, called Maskiot, drew wide international criticism and protests from Palestinian officials and Israeli peace advocates.

Critics said the project would violate Israel's vow to freeze settlement activity under the U.S.-backed peace blueprint known as the road map. Israeli officials said Maskiot was approved more than 20 years ago.

The community, near the Jordanian border, would initially house settlers evicted from the Gaza Strip during Israel's unilateral withdrawal in 2005.

Security officials said Peretz ordered the freeze two weeks ago to further study the matter. He is locked in a struggle for control of the Labor Party.

Jimmy Carter's Jewish Problem (WP)

By Deborah Lipstadt

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

It is hard to criticize an icon. Jimmy Carter's humanitarian work has saved countless lives. Yet his life has also been shaped by the Bible, where the Hebrew prophets taught us to speak truth to power. So I write.

Carter's book "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid," while exceptionally sensitive to Palestinian suffering, ignores a legacy of mistreatment, expulsion and murder committed against Jews. It trivializes the murder of Israelis. Now, facing a storm of criticism, he has relied on anti-Semitic stereotypes in defense.

One cannot ignore the Holocaust's impact on Jewish identity and the history of the Middle East conflict. When an Ahmadinejad or Hamas threatens to destroy Israel, Jews have historical precedent to believe them. Jimmy Carter either does not understand this or considers it irrelevant.

DOJ_NMG_0119876

His book, which dwells on the Palestinian refugee experience, makes two fleeting references to the Holocaust. The book contains a detailed chronology of major developments necessary for the reader to understand the current situation in the Middle East. Remarkably, there is nothing listed between 1939 and 1947. Nitpickers might say that the Holocaust did not happen in the region. However, this event sealed in the minds of almost all the world's people then the need for the Jewish people to have a Jewish state in their ancestral homeland. Carter never discusses the Jewish refugees who were prevented from entering Palestine before and after the war. One of Israel's first acts upon declaring statehood was to send ships to take those people "home."

A guiding principle of Israel is that never again will persecuted Jews be left with no place to go. Israel's ideal of Jewish refuge is enshrined in laws that grant immediate citizenship to any Jew who requests it. A Jew, for purposes of this law, is anyone who, had that person lived in Nazi Germany, would have been stripped of citizenship by the Nuremberg Laws.

Compare Carter's approach with that of Rashid Khalidi, head of Columbia University's Middle East Institute and a professor of Arab studies there. His recent book "The Iron Cage" contains more than a dozen references to the seminal place the Holocaust and anti-Semitism hold in the Israeli worldview. This from a Palestinian who does not cast himself as an evenhanded negotiator.

In contrast, by almost ignoring the Holocaust, Carter gives inadvertent comfort to those who deny its importance or even its historical reality, in part because it helps them deny Israel's right to exist. This from the president who signed the legislation creating the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Carter's minimization of the Holocaust is compounded by his recent behavior. On MSNBC in December, he described conditions for Palestinians as "one of the worst examples of human rights deprivation" in the world. When the interviewer asked "Worse than Rwanda?" Carter said that he did not want to discuss the "ancient history" of Rwanda.

To give Carter the benefit of the doubt, let's say that he meant an ongoing crisis. Is the Palestinians' situation equivalent to Darfur, which our own government has branded genocide?

Carter has repeatedly fallen back -- possibly unconsciously -- on traditional anti-Semitic canards. In the Los Angeles Times last month, he declared it"politically suicide" for a politician to advocate a "balanced position" on the crisis. On Al-Jazeera TV, he dismissed the critique of his book by declaring that "most of the condemnations of my book came from Jewish-American organizations." Jeffrey Goldberg, who lambasted the book in The Post last month, writes for the New Yorker. Ethan Bronner, who in the New York Times called the book "a distortion," is the Times' deputy foreign editor. Slate's Michael Kinsley declared it "moronic." Dennis Ross, who was chief negotiator on the conflict in the administrations of George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, described the book as a rewriting and misrepresentation of history. Alan Dershowitz teaches at Harvard and Ken Stein at Emory. Both have criticized the book. Because of the book's inaccuracies and imbalance and Carter's subsequent behavior, 14 members of the Carter Center's Board of Councilors have resigned -- many in anguish because they so respect Carter's other work. All are Jews. Does that invalidate their criticism -- and mine -- or render us representatives of Jewish organizations?

On CNN, Carter bemoaned the "tremendous intimidation in our country that has silenced" the media. Carter has appeared on C-SPAN, "Larry King Live" and "Meet the Press," among many shows. When a caller to C-SPAN accused Carter of anti-Semitism, the host cut him off. Who's being silenced?

Perhaps unused to being criticized, Carter reflexively fell back on this kind of innuendo about Jewish control of the media and government. Even if unconscious, such stereotyping from a man of his stature is noteworthy. When David Duke spouts it, I yawn. When Jimmy Carter does, I shudder.

Others can enumerate the many factual errors in this book. A man who has done much good and who wants to bring peace has not only failed to move the process forward but has given refuge to scoundrels.

The writer teaches at Emory University. Her latest book is "History on Trial: My Day in Court With David Irving."

An Enigmatic Wild Card In Lebanon's High-Stakes Politics (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119877

IN this land of divisive politics and sectarian tension, few have embraced controversy quite the way the Christian leader Gen. Michel Aoun has.

Currently, General Aoun is one of the leaders of the opposition demonstrations that have overtaken Beirut and have threatened to bring down the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora. But this gambit is just the latest in a decades-long series of political surprises and controversies that have made him a political wild card here, breaking all the rules of Lebanese politics while charging the country's political debate.

To his supporters, he is a Lebanese de Gaulle seeking to unite a fractious country and rebuild trust in its institutions. To his critics, he is a divisive megalomaniac willing to stop at nothing to become Lebanon's president.

Some accuse him, a Christian, of splitting Christians in Lebanon into rival camps, further weakening them, while others blame him for abetting Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Shiite militia. But most of all, many say, General Aoun has embraced a populist agenda for personal gain.

General Aoun, as always, is unfazed by the critics. "You could say I brought Lebanese politics back to life," General Aoun, 71, said in his home atop the hills overlooking Beirut. "Until now, politics here has been moribund."

General Aoun's Free Patriotic Movement, Hezbollah and a handful of smaller groups began their protests on Dec. 1, accusing Mr. Siniora of corruption that has left the country tens of billions in debt, and saying that the current government is not representative of Lebanon's new realities.

The opposition wants Mr. Siniora either to step down or to broaden his cabinet to allow them greater say and even a veto power, but Mr. Siniora has rebuffed the demands, and insists he will not step down. Government officials accuse the opposition of pursuing an Iranian-Syrian agenda.

The irony of General Aoun, who has spent much of his life fighting Syrian domination of Lebanon, joining hands with Hezbollah, with its close ties to Syria, is not lost on his opponents, nor on followers in protests against the government. But such about-faces are nothing new to him.

TWO decades ago General Aoun rose to prominence as the head of the Christian-led Lebanese Army, taking on the Christian militias and the Syrians. He was appointed Lebanon's interim prime minister in a caretaker government and waged a fierce revolt against Syrian forces, before being bombed out of the presidential palace and into exile in France in 1990. Keeping to his word, he did not return to Lebanon until the last Syrian soldier had left the country.

General Aoun defends his ties to Hezbollah, saying the alliance will ward off Syria rather than allow it to return to Lebanon. He adds that he had always pledged that he would seek friendly relations with Syria once it ceased to be an occupier. But many accuse him of trying to ride the wave of Hezbollah's popularity after the war last summer in order to win the presidency when the pro-Syrian President Émile Lahoud's term ends later this year. The 34-day war was widely seen here as a victory for Hezbollah.

General Aoun makes no secret of his hope to become president, a role reserved for Christians in Lebanon's complex sectarian political system. But many doubt whether he would make the best compromise candidate, one who would effectively smooth over tensions once the latest crisis of sit-ins and boycotts ends.

"Of course, I want to be president," he said. "At first I was not that interested, but because there was so much stubbornness against me and because things got difficult, I am now intent on becoming president. I have the backing and popularity to do it." He has drawn his supporter base from the Christian middle class, which sees itself losing ground to Lebanon's other sects.

Unlike many in Lebanon's political stratum, General Aoun comes from humble origins, having been born into a poor Maronite family in Haret Hreik, which became a Hezbollah stronghold in Beirut's southern suburbs in the 1980s. His supporters play up that background, saying that it equips him to tackle issues like corruption, gerrymandering and inclusion in Lebanese politics.

"For us, he represents sovereignty and dignity," said Gebran Bassil, a longtime member of General Aoun's Free Patriotic Movement who is also married to the general's daughter. "The general is not part of the corrupt system here, which is why the politicians are so much against him."

Nayla Mouawad, Lebanon's minister of social affairs, said she was struck by General Aoun's ability to distill politics into slogans when she first met him in the mid-1980s, but long ago caught on to his oversize ambition. "He clearly wanted to be president," she said, noting that she once warned her husband, René, who was assassinated in 1989, to be wary of General Aoun's intentions. "I told my husband that when he gets it into his head to be president, be careful."

DOJ_NMG_0119878

FEW, however, expected the alliance with Hezbollah, a group that, on the surface, appears diametrically opposed to the Free Patriotic Movement's goals.

Backed by Iran, Hezbollah is the sole remaining armed militia in Lebanon; General Aoun is the champion of a strong state and an opponent of militias. General Aoun rails against foreign interference in Lebanon, but Hezbollah is almost completely financed by Iran.

General Aoun notes that the alliance should not be treated any differently than one between Hezbollah and the governing coalition that helped them garner numerous seats in the 2005 elections.

Still, the alliance surprised General Aoun's supporters as much as his opponents.

"Remember, Hezbollah was the devil a year and a half ago as far as we were concerned," Mr. Bassil said. "We were the only side that had had no dialogue with them."

Last year, General Aoun approached Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, and said he still intended to strip Hezbollah of its weapons, but only after the group's main complaints with Israel and with the government were answered.

"It's not like I love Hezbollah," General Aoun said in an interview. "I am not trying to defend Hezbollah as much as I am trying to find a solution with them, because a clash with them would ruin us."

That honesty, Hezbollah officials say, engendered trust in General Aoun. "It created a sense of trust between Shiites and Christians," said Ghaleb Abu Zeinab, a member of Hezbollah's politburo. "We don't want to establish an Islamic republic, we want diplomatic and normal relations with Syria, and we want a consensual democracy and so does the Free Patriotic Movement."

Some analysts credit the alliance with helping stabilize conditions in Lebanon after the war, as well as helping to change Hezbollah's focus from regional issues to local ones.

"It helped show Hezbollah's real position and its understanding of Lebanon," Mr. Abu Zeinab said. "It helped the party appear as a more Lebanese party than it used to before."

After years of playing third seat to Sunnis and Christians, Lebanon's Shiites have increasingly demanded a greater say in government, one proportional to their numbers. General Aoun had seized on that change, analysts agree.

Still, even his supporters are often uncomfortable with the alliance, and with the lack of progress of the demonstrations so far.

"If I was in their place I might not feel comfortable with how things are going either," General Aoun said. "But I have infrared — even infragreen. I can see what is ahead of me tomorrow, and I will eventually clarify things for them."

Outspoken Editor Is Slain In Turkey (WP/AP)

By Benjamin Harvey

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

ISTANBUL, Jan. 19 -- Hrant Dink, the most prominent voice of Turkey's shrinking Armenian community, a man who stood trial for speaking out against the mass killings of Armenians by Turks, was shot and killed in broad daylight Friday at the entrance to his newspaper's offices.

Just hours after a gunman shot the journalist twice in the head, thousands marched down the bustling street where he was slain, carrying posters of Dink and shouting slogans in favor of free expression.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan twice addressed the country to condemn the killing and vowed to capture those responsible. Late Friday, Istanbul's governor announced that three people had been arrested, CNN-Turk TV reported, without giving further details.

Many Turks assumed that the shooting was politically motivated, a reaction to Dink's public statements that the mass killings of Armenians during and after World War I constituted genocide. Nationalists see such statements as insults to the honor of Turks and as threats to national unity.

DOJ_NMG_0119879

In Turkey, people speak freely at their own peril despite generations of Western-looking reformers. The Committee to Protect Journalists said that in the past 15 years, "18 Turkish journalists have been killed for their work, many of them murdered, making it the eighth deadliest country in the world for journalists."

Dink, 52, was one of dozens of journalists, writers and academics who have been tried for expressing themselves, most under Article 301 of the penal code, which criminalizes insults to Turkey, its government or the national character.

In a rare conviction, Dink was found guilty in October 2005 of trying to influence the judiciary after his newspaper ran stories criticizing Article 301. He was given a six-month suspended sentence.

Dink, a Turkish citizen of Armenian descent who edited the bilingual Turkish-Armenian newspaper Agos, apparently sensed his life was in danger.

"My computer's memory is loaded with sentences full of anger and threats," Dink wrote Jan. 10 in his last newspaper column. "I am just like a pigeon. . . . I look around to my left and right, in front and behind me as much as it does. My head is just as active."

Dink, who is survived by his wife, Rakel, and their three children, was charming, soft-spoken and eloquent. He was respected and beloved by many Turks who disagreed with his views but admired his courage in stating them.

He was hated by just as many.

In the past few years, Turks had come to know Dink well, mostly because of the highly publicized legal cases opened against him, in which he faced jail time for talking of genocide.

In late 2005, Turks saw Dink lose his composure, crying on national television as he discussed his latest court case and what it was like to live among people who hated him and what he stood for.

"I'm living together with Turks in this country," he said in an October interview as he contemplated his trial. "I don't think I could live with an identity of having insulted them in this country. . . . If I am unable to come up with a positive result, it will be honorable for me to leave this country."

Turkey's relationship with its Armenian community has long been fraught with tension, controversy and painful memories of a brutal past. Much of Turkey's once-sizable Armenian population was killed or driven out beginning around 1915 in what an increasing number of countries are recognizing as the first genocide of the 20th century.

Turks vehemently deny that their ancestors committed genocide, however, and saying so is deemed tantamount to treason. In the 1970s and '80s, tensions were further inflamed as Armenians seeking revenge killed dozens of Turkish diplomats .

Turkey, which is 99 percent Muslim, and Armenia, which claims to be the first country to have officially adopted Christianity, share a border. But it is closed, and the two countries have no formal diplomatic relations.

The Washington-based Armenian Assembly of America issued a statement Friday calling Dink "one of the most prominent Armenian voices in Turkey."

"Hrant Dink was a man of principle, convictions and courage, and the Armenian community mourns him worldwide as a loss for humanity," the group's executive director, Bryan Ardouny, said in an interview.

Ardouny, who had met Dink in October when he addressed the Armenian-American Bar Association, described the slain journalist as an "outspoken activist who was a living bridge between Armenians and Turks in Turkey, a country where 70,000 Armenians still live and remain vulnerable and unprotected even 92 years after the Armenian genocide."

Journalist Killed By Gunman In Istanbul (FT)

By Vincent Boland

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

A prominent newspaper editor and leading figure in one of Turkey's most painful historical debates - the massacre of Armenians during the collapse of the Ottoman empire - was shot dead on Friday.

Hrant Dink, 53, was shot three times in the head outside the office of his weekly newspaper Agos in Istanbul. He died almost immediately. His murder brought swift condemnation from the prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who despatched the interior and justice ministers to the city as an investigation got under way.

DOJ_NMG_0119880

Mr Dink was a Turkish citizen of Armenian descent and had played a leading role in breaking a taboo in Turkey where debate on the fate of the Armenians had for years been an untouchable subject. He was widely credited with trying to bring Turks and Armenians together but had been given a suspended prison sentence in 2005 for allegedly insulting the Turkish state.

Armenians say the deaths of up to 1.5m Armenian citizens of the Ottoman empire were a deliberate genocide by the empire's rulers beginning in 1915. Turkey denies genocide and insists that hundreds of thousands of both Turks and Armenians died as a result of war, famine, ethnic cleansing and disease in that turbulent period.

Mr Dink's murder could have serious repercussions for Turkey in Washington. Both houses of the US Congress are due to debate a motion in the next few weeks that would recognise the Armenian massacre as genocide. Turkey is fighting a rearguard diplomatic action to prevent this and the White House has indicated that it would not approve such a motion. But the atmosphere in which the debate takes place will be clouded by Friday's events.

There was a heavy police presence in Istanbul last night as Mr Dink's friends gathered outside the office of his newspaper. Mr Erdogan said the murder was ''an attack on all of us'' and appealed for calm. Two men were under arrest last night in connection with the murder.

Mr Dink's murder will also have a big impact domestically. It is an election year in Turkey and all political parties are beginning to position themselves to capture the nationalist vote, which represents a sizeable portion of the electorate. Ultranationalists have succeeded many times in shutting off debate on the Armenian issue including academic debates at universities.

Most Turks are not aware of the fate of the Armenians because Turkish school history textbooks make no reference to it. But a debate has emerged in the past two years with Mr Dink as one of its most prominent proponents. Yet it remains the most sensitive issue in Turkey's 20th century history. The republic was created from the ruins of the Ottoman empire in 1923.

Mr Dink was known to have received many death threats in recent years but is understood to have refused police protection.

Journalist Slain In Turkey (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson, Yesim Borg

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

ISTANBUL, TURKEY — An outspoken journalist who repeatedly clashed with Turkish authorities here over recognition of the early 20th century slaughter of Armenians was shot to death Friday afternoon on a busy downtown street.

Hrant Dink, who as editor of a Turkish Armenian newspaper was the leading voice for his ethnic community, was killed a week after he wrote about threats from unknown forces who he said regarded him as "an enemy of the Turks."

Hundreds of people marched Friday evening from Istanbul's central Taksim Square to the offices of Dink's Agos weekly newspaper, near the spot on a sidewalk where he was shot in the head. They held candles and posters with his picture; a somber silence was interrupted periodically with applause and chants for "the brotherhood of peoples."

Istanbul Gov. Muammer Guler said late Friday that three people had been detained in connection with the shooting, but no additional details were released.

The slaying is likely to further darken Turkey's reputation for repressing critics of the government and for tightly controlling how its turbulent past is portrayed.

Dink, 52, was part of an elite group of writers and thinkers, including Nobel literature laureate Orhan Pamuk and novelist Elif Shafak, who have been tried on charges of insulting their country's "Turkishness" under a controversial and ambiguous law promoted by hard-line nationalists.

While most, including Pamuk, were cleared, Dink was convicted in 2005 for writing articles that criticized the law and explored questions of Turkish and Armenian identity. He was sentenced to a six-month term, which was suspended.

Last year, an Istanbul court opened a new case against him after he told a foreign news agency that the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of Armenians by Ottoman Turks before and during World War I was a genocide.

"Of course I say it was genocide," Dink had said. "With these events you see the disappearance of a people who lived on these lands for 4,000 years."

DOJ_NMG_0119881

Turkey maintains that the deaths and expulsions that Armenians say claimed 1.5 million victims at the end of the Ottoman Empire were part of a civil conflict in which both Christian Armenians and Muslim Turks were killed.

Dink helped promote a conference of academics in 2005 who gathered here to examine the era's mass killings. The government attempted to block the conference, and the justice minister accused participants of "stabbing Turkey in the back."

On Friday, however, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan was among the first to condemn Dink's "traitorous" and "disgraceful" slaying.

"Bullets have been fired at free thought and our democratic life," Erdogan said at a news conference. He urged calm.

European governments, Washington and intellectuals across the globe also deplored the killing.

"We are horrified," Larry Siems, an official with the international writers association PEN, said in a statement. "Hrant Dink was one of the heroes of the nonviolent movement for freedom of expression in Turkey, … one of the most significant human rights movements of our time."

U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said, "We certainly are concerned any time someone who has been very outspoken in their views is made to pay a price simply for their ability to speak their mind."

Turkish television Friday showed copies of letters containing death threats that Dink said he had received in the last year. He said his pleas for official protection went unanswered.

"We will silence you in a way that you will never speak again," one of the letters said.

Writing in his weekly column Jan. 10, Dink said his computer was full of "lines containing threats and rage.

"It is clear that those who try to alienate me, weaken me and leave me defenseless have been successful," he wrote. "They managed to form a group, with a serious number of people who see me as someone who 'insults Turkishness' with the dirty and wrong information they have been funneling to society."

His friends and colleagues say Dink cherished his Armenian ethnicity but remained loyal to his Turkish nation. His cause was freedom of expression and an honest confrontation of the past, they say.

Armenian Editor Is Slain In Turkey (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

ISTANBUL, Jan. 19 —A prominent newspaper editor, columnist and voice for Turkey's ethnic Armenians who was prosecuted for challenging the official Turkish version of the 1915 Armenian genocide, was shot dead as he left his office on a busy street in central Istanbul on Friday.

Television images showed the editor, Hrant Dink, lying on the crowded sidewalk covered with a white sheet outside the office of his bilingual Turkish-Armenian weekly, Agos. Officials said they detained three suspects. Investigators were monitoring surveillance tapes from nearby shops.

Mr. Dink, 53, a Turk of Armenian descent, often provoked widespread anger in Turkey for his comments on the genocide — which Turkey denies, saying the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Armenians resulted from hunger and other suffering in World War I. He also angered some ethnic Armenians for opposing their demand that Turkey recognize the genocide as a condition of entry to the European Union. He viewed entry into the Union as the clearest route to strengthening democracy in Turkey.

In recent articles, Mr. Dink (pronounced deenk) described increasing death threats against him. "I do not know how real these threats are," he wrote, "but what's really unbearable is the psychological torture that I'm living in, like a pigeon, turning my head up and down, left and right, my head quickly rotating."

Reaction to the daylight shooting, both here and abroad, was swift and deep. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan condemned the shooting as a direct attack on Turkey's peace and stability. "A bullet was fired at freedom of thought and democratic life in Turkey," he said in a nationally broadcast news conference. "Once again, dark hands have chosen our country and spilled blood in Istanbul to achieve their dark goals."

DOJ_NMG_0119882

In an unusual show of anger and regret, the prime minister's remarks were echoed by the head of the armed forces, the president and other officials. The Armenian patriarch in Istanbul, Archbishop Mesrob Mutafyan, declared 15 days of mourning for the small Armenian, Christian population of Turkey.

Several thousand people marched from Mr. Dink's office to Taksim Square on Friday evening to protest the killing. People held pictures of Mr. Dink, decorated his office door with flowers, waved black flags and chanted, "Shoulder to shoulder against fascism," and, "We are all Hrant; we are all Armenians."

European officials and human rights groups also expressed horror and called on Turkey to do more to protect free expression.

Mr. Dink was one of a number of intellectuals convicted under Article 301 of the Turkish Penal Code, which penalizes remarks against the state or the Turkish identity. It been harshly criticized by the European Union as a violation of freedom of expression, as Turkey moves toward membership.

Turkey has been changing some laws to try to meet the European Union's membership criteria, but faced a setback last month when ministers in Brussels decided to freeze talks on 8 of 35 areas of discussion because of Turkey's refusal to open its airports and seaports to Cyprus, a member of the Union.

Among the crowd that gathered Friday night, the common fear was that this assassination would be added to the list of unsolved murders. "This is an attack against our democracy," said Ayhan Aydin, an international financial consultant, who worked on the same street on which Mr. Dink was shot.

"We're here to show that sensible people wish this assassination to be clarified and want the perpetrators to be brought to justice," Mr. Aydin said, standing in the crowd. "We all fear that this insane attack might be swept under the carpet once it gets too complicated to resolve, like other murders did."

Turkey's ambition to become a European Union member requires further democratization and a better functioning legal system. The group has been particularly critical of Article 301.

Derya Sazak of the Milliyet newspaper said of the law, "This legal system brings forward the culture of hatred and lynching, in which Hrant became an open target. The murderers always go after the moderate voices, which Turkey needs the most."

Mr. Dink, a father of three, founded Agos in 1996. The bilingual community newspaper has a weekly circulation of 5,000.

Haluk Sahin, a columnist for the Radikal newspaper, a strong supporter of Mr. Dink's legal struggles, said Turkey had been hit in the heart.

"Those who wanted to harm Turkey couldn't have chosen a better target," Mr. Sahin said. "As opposed to other killings in the past, Turkish public reaction against this murder will show us where Turkey stands in the world."

Insurgents Attack Palace In Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 19 — Insurgents blasted Somalia's presidential palace with heavy explosives on Friday night, Somali officials said, but it appeared that no one was hurt.

It was the first time since Somalia's transitional government took control of Mogadishu, the capital, three weeks ago that the palace had come under attack.

Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, said 5 to 10 insurgents had detonated the explosives, possibly mortars, near the palace walls and then ran away.

"We don't know who they were," Mr. Hassan said. "But I think it is safe to say they were people not satisfied with the government."

The explosions set off an intense gun battle, witnesses said, with government troops spraying machine-gun fire into the dark streets around the palace, which is perched on a hill overlooking much of Mogadishu.

Insurgent attacks on Somalia's government forces seem to be intensifying. Last month, the transitional government, with the help of several thousand Ethiopian troops, routed Islamist forces that had controlled much of Somalia. The Islamists have vowed to regroup, and many members of the larger clans in Mogadishu still support them.

DOJ_NMG_0119883

Somalia's government concedes that it does not have the resources to maintain security in the capital, and Somali officials are urging international peacekeepers to arrive soon.

Ethiopia's prime minister, Meles Zenawi, told the BBC on Friday that he would withdraw the first Ethiopian troops "in the next few days."

African Union diplomats on Friday discussed a plan to send 7,700 African peacekeepers to Somalia for a six-month mission that would eventually be taken over by the United Nations. So far, only Uganda has stepped forward. Lawmakers from Uganda's governing party on Thursday approved the deployment of 1,500 troops and now Uganda's full Parliament must approve the decision.

"As Africans, we feel it is our duty to run to the rescue of any of our brothers in trouble," said Harry Bakowa, a governing party member, according to The Associated Press.

African Union Experts To Discuss Somalia (AP)

By Les Neuhaus, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

More than a decade after the U.S. and U.N. pulled failed peacekeeping missions out of Somalia, African governments are under growing pressure to mount a new intervention in one of the continent's most violent and unstable nations.

The continent's leaders may have a tough time succeeding, however, judging from past peacekeeping missions and the African-led force currently deployed to maintain security in Darfur, which has been beset by numerous problems.

Somalia has had no real peace since 1991, when warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and turned their guns on each other, plunging the Horn of Africa country into chaos.

A conservative Islamic movement brought some stability after it seized much of southern Somalia last year, but the group's hold on the country was short-lived. Ethiopian and Somali troops routed the movement's fighters in a lightning-quick campaign that began in late December.

Now Ethiopia is anxious to withdraw its troops, and many fear they may leave behind a power vacuum that could spawn yet more bloodshed.

Warlords agreed earlier this month to disarm and join a new army, but the peace is fragile. On Friday night, unidentified gunmen fired mortars at the presidential palace in Mogadishu, sparking a firefight with government forces. A government spokesman said no one inside the presidential compound was injured in the attack.

The U.N., U.S. and European Union have all called for the rapid deployment of African troops to prevent the country from slipping back into anarchy.

In Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, an African Union assessment team on Friday recommended deploying about 8,000 African peacekeepers for a six-month mission that would eventually be taken over by the United Nations. But significant obstacles stand in the way before the force can be deployed.

The African Union force would likely be charged with protecting the government and training Somali militiamen who would make up a new, national army. But Peter Takirambudde, director of New York-based Human Rights Watch's Africa program, said problems could arise due to the lack of time to prepare for a mission and Somalia's long history of brutal clan warfare.

That sentiment is reflected by a general reluctance on the part of African governments to provide troops to what could be a dangerous mission in a country notorious for the botched U.S. and U.N. operations in the early 1990s. No nation has publicly pledged soldiers except Uganda, whose promised 1,500 soldiers could only be dispatched if its parliament approves.

African nations also say they don't have many troops to spare because of their large contributions to U.N. missions elsewhere on the continent and worldwide.

In addition, any Somalia mission will require substantial logistic and financial support. Bearing the financial burden alone may also be prompting reluctance among African countries, although the U.S. and the European Union have already promised $33 million for the mission.

Another obstacle is the African Union's lack of experience in running peacekeeping missions. The group's current 7,000-strong peacekeeping venture in Sudan's war-wracked Darfur has been plagued by logistic troubles and criticized for not doing enough to protect civilians. Commanders say they simply don't have enough equipment, vehicles, helicopters and planes to do the job.

DOJ_NMG_0119884

Other regional peacekeeping missions have had better results in the past, albeit with the support of the U.N.

A West African peace force called ECOMOG led by Nigerian troops restored Sierra Leone's government to power in the mid-1990s after it had been ousted by a rebel junta. War started again several years later, prompting U.N. intervention backed by British firepower that finally ended the war in 2000.

A South African-led U.N. peacekeeping force in Burundi helped bring an end to a 12-year civil war dating back to 1993, though fighting continued outside the capital throughout their deployment.

In Ivory Coast, French and U.N. peacekeepers managed to prevent the government and rebels from engaging in an all-out war. The 18,000-member U.N. force currently deployed to Congo — the largest peacekeeping mission in the world — has also struggled to contain militiamen, but has kept a lid on wider violence in that country.

Takirambudde said the trend in Africa is toward all-African interventions, in part because the continent is perceived as having little strategic value to the rest of the world.

Senegal's army spokesman, Col. Antoine Wardini, said African governments had the will to carry out such missions. But logistics and funding will pose problems for the foreseeable future.

"They don't have enough means to conduct operations far away from their homeland," Wardini said of African troops. "But we do want to solve the conflicts on our continent. We have to be involved, because it's our business."

___

Dakar-based West Africa bureau chief Todd Pitman has covered Africa for more than a decade. Associated Press writers Les Neuhaus in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, and Mohamed Sheikh Nor in Mogadishu, Somalia, contributed to this report.

Blair Aide Arrested In Honors Probe (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 19 -- Police on Friday arrested an aide to Prime Minister Tony Blair as part of a continuing criminal investigation into whether his Labor Party traded seats in the House of Lords and other government honors for cash.

Ruth Turner, Blair's director of government relations, was arrested at her home in connection with alleged offenses under a 1925 law that prohibits the selling of government honors and titles and "also on suspicion of perverting the course of justice," a police statement said. Turner was interviewed in a London police station and released on bail, police said.

"I absolutely refute any allegations of wrongdoing of any nature whatsoever," she said in a statement.

Turner is the fourth person arrested in the investigation concerning seats in the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament. So far no one has been charged.

Turner's arrest brings the investigation closer to Blair and suggests police believe there has been an attempt to cover up information. Blair issued a statement saying that Turner had "the highest integrity" and that he "continued to have complete confidence" in her.

Last month, when Scotland Yard detectives spoke with him, Blair became the first sitting prime minister to be questioned in a criminal inquiry. But he was not interviewed "under caution," a British legal term that is applied to people who are viewed as suspects. He was therefore being treated as a witness.

Under British law, political parties must disclose the source of donations, but they do not have to declare the source of loans. The Labor Party has said it received $27 million in loans and therefore did not have to disclose the identities of the lenders. Investigations have found that some of those who gave the party loans were recommended for seats in the House of Lords.

Blair has denied that seats in the legislature and other honors were for sale.

Police have also interviewed members of the opposition Conservative Party, including former leader Michael Howard.

"It's pretty serious," said Tony Travers, a government specialist at the London School of Economics. "All three of the major political parties are desperate for money," he said, and the police are looking at whether rich people were tapped for cash "in the expectation that they would be put into the House of Lords, our equivalent of the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0119885

Travers said it was notable that Conservative Party leaders are not criticizing Labor in the scandal, or vice versa. This is a sign, he said, that they all may be caught up in it.

"This remains a cross-party investigation," Scotland Yard said in a statement issued Friday.

But because Blair is in office and once promised voters to be "purer than pure" on issues of ethics, he is taking the brunt of the scandal and it has further eroded his standing, which is already suffering from his support of the deeply unpopular war in Iraq. He has said he will step down as prime minister this year.

The others arrested to date are Michael Levy, a friend of Blair's and special envoy to the Middle East; Christopher Evans, an entrepreneur and major party donor; and Des Smith, a government adviser.

Senior Aide To Blair Is Arrested In Graft Inquiry (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 19 — The police arrested and questioned a senior aide to Prime Minister Tony Blair on Friday in what seemed to be a widening inquiry into allegations that political leaders had traded high honors for campaign contributions made as loans.

The aide, Ruth Turner, is the director of government relations in the prime minister's office at 10 Downing Street and, in a statement, denied "wrongdoing of any nature whatsoever."

Mr. Blair said he had "complete confidence" in Ms. Turner, 36, who was appointed as a special adviser in 2005. She is one of the officials who control access to Mr. Blair.

"Ruth is a person of the highest integrity for whom I have great regard," the prime minister said.

However, a police statement said that Ms. Turner had been questioned not just in connection with the honors inquiry, but also "on suspicion of perverting the course of justice." Under British law, that often means that someone has failed to cooperate with or has frustrated an investigation. The police statement seemed to suggest that the inquiry was breaking new ground, and it drew questions from opposition politicians about a possible cover-up. The police said this "new development" would require investigators to extend their inquiries.

Since last year, Mr. Blair has been embroiled in questions about campaign financing before the May 2005 national election. The police are investigating whether people who made loans to the ruling Labor Party did so in return for promises that they would be appointed to the House of Lords. The amount of the loans and other contributions was equivalent to $27 million.

Mr. Blair himself was questioned by investigators last month, adding to the potential stains on his record as he sought to mold a legacy after almost 10 years in office. When he took power in 1997, he promised voters that Labor would enshrine a commitment to corruption-free administration. He has said that he will step down later this year but has not given a date.

In Parliament, Edward Davey of the Liberal Democrats — the smaller of the two main opposition parties — said the "sorry saga" of the police inquiry showed that "the Blair government is in its dog days, increasingly mired in sleaze."

The inquiry was started after a complaint by a Scottish Nationalist member of Parliament, Angus MacNeil, who said Friday: "Water is now lapping around Blair's neck. The investigation is now right inside the door of No. 10," referring to the prime minister's office address.

The police said that Ms. Turner was arrested at her home in London early Friday and was released to allow time for further inquiries without charges being brought against her.

In her statement, issued by Mr. Blair's office, Ms. Turner said: "I have already given the police two lengthy interviews and made it clear to them that I was happy to speak to them at any stage. I have been completely open with the police throughout, and will continue to cooperate with them fully."

A spokeswoman for the prime minister said Ms. Turner remained in her post.

While many people, including Mr. Blair, have been questioned in the inquiry as potential witnesses, only four people have been arrested, including Ms. Turner and Mr. Blair's main fund-raiser, Lord Levy.

Blair Aide Arrested In Honors-for-sale Probe (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119886

LONDON (AP) -- An aide to Prime Minister Tony Blair was arrested yesterday in the investigation into whether political honors, such as seats in the House of Lords and knighthoods, were traded for cash.

Ruth Turner, Mr. Blair's director of government relations, was questioned on suspicion of being involved in the sale of honors -- illegal under British law -- and perverting the course of justice, police said.

Miss Turner, 36, is the first member of Mr. Blair's Downing Street staff to be arrested and the fourth person to be detained by police in their investigation. All four are on bail while inquiries continue, police said.

"I absolutely refute any allegations of wrongdoing of any nature whatsoever," Miss Turner said in a statement released by Mr. Blair's office.

Mr. Blair was interviewed by detectives last month, becoming the first serving prime minister interviewed in a criminal inquiry. However, he was not interviewed "under caution," meaning it is unlikely he is a suspect.

In a statement, police said Miss Turner, who has worked at Mr. Blair's office since 2004, was arrested at home.

Mr. Blair expressed confidence in the aide, who has not been charged. "Ruth is a person of the highest integrity for whom I have great regard," he said.

A police spokesman declined to confirm whether computers or documents had been seized from Downing Street.

Police are investigating claims that honors were given to people who loaned money to Mr. Blair's Labor Party. Police have also interviewed Conservative Party officials.

Mr. Blair has acknowledged some supporters who offered loans were later nominated for honors, but has insisted that he did nothing wrong.

He told police the backers were nominated for House of Lords seats under criteria allowing party leaders to put forward a small number of candidates in reward for their service to a political party -- rather than the general public, his spokesman said.

Election Could Decide Serbia's Role In Europe (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

BELGRADE, Serbia, Jan. 19 — While six years of democracy in Serbia have given its people ample opportunities to vote — in four presidential elections, two parliamentary elections and a nationwide referendum — many complain that the country has seen little change.

Serbia remains isolated from the European Union while most of its former Eastern bloc neighbors — Hungary to the north and most recently Romania and Bulgaria to the east — have become members.

Western governments are hoping, though, that parliamentary elections to be held Sunday will make a difference by uniting Serbia's notoriously divided democratic bloc and by preventing the ultranationalist Serbian Radical Party from consolidating its position as the largest group in Parliament.

The election's timing is particularly crucial. The parties that form the next government will be faced with the possible loss of Kosovo, the province that has been controlled by the United Nations since 1999 and whose Albanian majority is seeking independence.

Martti Ahtisaari, a former president of Finland who is overseeing talks on the future of Kosovo, is expected to unveil his proposals for a settlement soon after the election.

Since the fall of Slobodan Milosevic in 2000, successive governments have failed to substantially improve Serbia's ties with the West. The stumbling block has remained the surrender of war crimes suspects to the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in The Hague.

Last May, talks that were supposed to help forge closer ties with the European Union were suspended after the government of the Serbian prime minister, Vojislav Kostunica, a moderate nationalist, failed to locate Gen. Ratko Mladic — the former commander of the Bosnian Serb Army and one of the most notorious of the fugitives — after repeated deadlines set by the regional organization.

The ultranationalists are widely expected to receive the largest number of votes over all, but the outcome of the election will probably depend on the success of the party led by Boris Tadic, the Serbian president and a supporter of closer ties with Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0119887

In recent polls, Mr. Tadic's Democratic Party narrowly trails the Radical Party. Behind them is Mr. Kostunica's coalition, led by the Serbian Democratic Party.

There has been a substantial amount of diplomatic and political pressure from abroad to encourage the Democratic Party and the Serbian Democratic Party to work together and seriously consider forming a coalition government.

On Thursday, Gerhard Schröder, the former German chancellor, appeared at a Democratic Party rally alongside Mr. Tadic, calling him "the one who can ensure a European future for Serbia."

On Wednesday, the United States Senate passed a resolution expressing its support for Serbia's democratic forces.

"This is really a turning point," said Pierre Mirel, a European Commission envoy who visited Belgrade this week. "The time has come to embark the country on a different relationship with the E.U."

Chavez Says Ailing Castro "Battling For His Life" (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

RIO DE JANEIRO (AP) -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said yesterday that Fidel Castro is "battling for his life" and said he spoke with the Cuban leader for nearly half an hour several days ago.

Mr. Chavez compared Mr. Castro's attempt to recover from an unspecified medical condition to efforts in the 1950s, when Mr. Castro was a guerrilla in Cuba's eastern mountains fighting the government he would eventually overthrow.

"Fidel is in the Sierra Maestra again, battling for his life," Mr. Chavez said after attending a summit of South American leaders in Rio.

Mr. Castro, 80, has not been seen in public since shortly before July 31, when he announced he was temporarily stepping aside while he recovered from an operation.

He provisionally ceded power to his brother Raul, the 75-year-old defense minister.

Mr. Castro's medical condition is a state secret, but Cuban authorities deny he suffers from terminal cancer, as U.S. intelligence officials have claimed.

The El Pais newspaper in Spain reported Wednesday that Mr. Castro told surgeons not to perform a colostomy last year, opting instead for a course of surgery that produced a complication that left the Cuban leader in far worse condition.

After removing an inflamed piece of Mr. Castro's large intestine in an operation last year, doctors connected the remainder directly to his rectum, rather than attaching a colostomy bag, El Pais said, quoting two medical sources at Madrid's Gregorio Maranon hospital. The operation failed when a suture burst.

"The Cuban dictator and his advisers are the ones who decided on the surgical technique that has led to the complications," the paper said.

While the newspaper article did not name the sources, one of the journalists who wrote it told the Associated Press that both were doctors at the hospital.

Chavez: Castro "Fighting For His Life," Progressing Slowly (CNN)

CNN.com, January 19, 2007

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil (CNN) -- Cuban leader Fidel Castro is "fighting for his life," Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said in a speech to the state legislature in Rio de Janeiro.

Chavez, who said he spoke to Castro a few days ago by telephone, compared Castro's battle against a serious intestinal illness with the Cuban leader's time in the island's mountains heading the revolution against the Fulgencio Batista government.

"Fidel is again in the Sierra Maestra again," Chavez said Friday. "He's fighting for his life. We don't know; we want him to recover, and he continues progressing, although slowly."

Noting Castro's age, Chavez said that "he said it himself: the machine that they have to fix is 80 years old."

"He is going through a difficult situation," he said.

Castro has not been seen in public since before July 31, when he relinquished power to his brother Raul so that he could undergo intestinal surgery. The Cuban government has maintained secrecy about his condition.

DOJ_NMG_0119888

Earlier this week, the Spanish newspaper El Pais quoted unnamed medical sources saying Castro was in grave condition. But a Spanish surgeon who visited Castro in December -- and works at the same hospital as the sources -- said those reports were based on rumors and that Castro's condition shows "some progressive improvement."

"The only truthful parts of the newspaper's reports are the name of the patient, that he has been operated on, and that he has had complications. The rest is rumors," the surgeon, Dr. Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, told CNN in an exclusive interview.

He declined to go into specifics on Castro's health, or to discuss El Pais' reports point-by-point, but he said they "are not in line with reality, are not truthful and not real."

El Pais, one of Spain's largest and most reliable papers, reported Tuesday that two sources at the hospital in Madrid, Spain, told its reporters that Castro had suffered complications after three failed surgeries.

El Pais reported that Castro suffered from diverticulitis, an inflammation of sacs on the large intestine that can rupture and cause bleeding. The infection spread to the tissue on the walls of the abdomen, a condition called peritonitis.

The infections, the paper said, have impeded the healing process. On Wednesday, El Pais reported, citing sources, that Castro himself personally made a decision to undergo a type of operation that subsequently went wrong instead of a more routine surgery.

Mercosur Set To Delay Expansion Plans (FT)

By Richard Lapper, Jonathan Wheatley

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

Mercosur was on Friday expected to delay a controversial decision on expansion that would have strengthened the influence of Hugo Chávez, Venezuela's radical president, within the five-member trading bloc.

At a two-day presidential summit in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil had supported moves to give full membership of Mercosur to Bolivia, whose leftwing government is allied with Venezuela.

However, the proposal met with resistance from Argentina, as well as from the two smaller members of Mercosur, Uruguay and Paraguay, and has been put on hold pending the considerations of a working group which will meet over the next six to twelve months.

The development has added to multiple strains within the group. As early as next week, the US expects to sign a trade and investment framework with Uruguay. A full trade agreement would seem to be incompatible with continued Mercosur membership.

Venezuela itself became a full member of Mercosur last year after surprisingly little discussion in the group. On Thursday, Mr Chávez said that he was “decontaminating” the bloc of “neo-liberalism”.

In December Mr Chávez, a firm of opponent of President George W. Bush, began a new six-year term after winning a landslide election victory. Two weeks ago he announced sweeping nationalisation of his country's oil and utility industries. And more recently, members of the Venezuelan legislature - which is monopolised by Mr Chávez's supporters, after opponents boycotted an earlier poll - gave the Venezuelan leader new powers to rule by decree.

Mr Chávez is pushing a number of ambitious schemes to advance integration in the region, including the establishment of a Bank of the South, designed as an alternative source of finance to the International Monetary Fund and other existing multilateral organisations. On Thursday Brazil and Venezuela signed an agreement to co-operate on the building of a giant pipeline that would carry Venezuelan hydrocarbons to markets in the south of the region.

The dispute over full membership status for Bolivia - like four other Andean countries, Bolivia is currently an associate member - is centred on proposed exemptions from the group's common external tariff regime. Since Bolivia's average tariff rates are lower, membership would mean it would have to increase levels of trade protection. Mercosur has previously resisted attempts by both Paraguay and Uruguay for greater flexibility about the application of these arrangements.

Congress And Foreign Policy Don't Mix (LAT)

By George Weigel

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119889

BY AUGUST 1950, Secretary of State Dean Acheson had taken all he could stand from those congressional critics whom he privately dismissed as "the primitives." So when Nebraska Sen. Kenneth Wherry leaned across a hearing table and wagged a finger, Acheson blew up. He leaped to his feet and demanded that Wherry not "shake his dirty finger in my face." Wherry said he'd do as he pleased. "By God, you won't," Acheson hollered — and prepared to land a haymaker until restrained by State Department legal counsel Adrian Fisher, a former college football player.

I couldn't help thinking of that scene from Walter Isaacson and Evan Thomas' multi-biography, "The Wise Men," last week. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is, one suspects, far too polite to respond Acheson-style to the indignities she absorbed during her first appearance before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. But would anyone have blamed her if, in response to Chuck Hagel's ambitions or Barbara Boxer's personal nastiness, she had said something like this:

"Look, senators, there are real consequences to our 'ending the war' in Iraq, as the new speaker of the House has put it — rather glibly, if I may say. Those consequences include a bloodbath, chaos throughout the Mideast and perhaps the emergence of an apocalyptic maniac in Tehran as the regional hegemonist. Do you think that would play well in Omaha? Or Sacramento? I don't. In any event, I've got important things to do, and they don't include sitting here acting like my mother's pin cushion. I'll be back when you're ready to get serious. Impeach me if you like. They pay a lot better at Stanford."

The recent sound bites out of Congress, and the anti-surge resolution introduced in the Senate on Wednesday, may be comforting to Democratic partisans and Republicans who've bailed out on President Bush. And no doubt the administration made serious mistakes in Iraq after the major combat phase of the war ended. Yet one can make the case (though Republicans seem curiously reluctant to) that the November election led to genuine soul-searching in the executive branch. A new secretary of Defense is in office; Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, a man with a proven record in Iraq, will be the new military commander there; and the president has offered a new strategy for success. Since assembling on Jan. 4, Congress, however, seems stuck on last fall's script.

Modern history suggests that Congress is a particularly blunt — and not terribly effective — instrument for making foreign policy. Congressional skepticism and partisanship drove the United States back into isolationism after World War I, which probably made World War II more likely. The House of Representatives came close to dismantling the Army just four months before Pearl Harbor, passing by only one vote the bill that kept draftees in the service for more than just 12 months.

President Eisenhower had a hard time persuading a Republican Congress to provide funds adequate for waging the Cold War. On the one hand, Congress wrote a blank check for the executive branch with the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution. On the other, it encroached on the executive's sphere of responsibility by embracing the nuclear freeze movement in the 1980s.

Strategic myopia seems institutional. House members on a short electoral leash, and the many senators who imagine themselves president in an era of ever-shortening election cycles, are not well positioned to think in terms of long-term strategies or to fit appropriate tactics to those strategies.

Congress is a necessary and useful check on executive arrogance and a good barometer of the public's mood, to which any thoughtful president must attend. Still, in the midst of a global war against jihadism that's going poorly on one front — Iraq — it's disheartening to see senators grandstanding when genuine inquiry is required. It is also worrisome to watch the ethics committees ramping up, the usual Washington prelude to policy differences being turned into attacks on the integrity of individuals (or worse, criminalized).

Congress can do better than this. This Congress must do better, given the magnitude and complexity of the issues involved in a multi-front contest with global jihadism that has nonmilitary as well as military dimensions.

George Weigel Is A Senior Fellow Of Washington's Ethics And Public Policy Center.

DOJ_NMG_0119890

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Administration Stays Course In Legal War (LAT) ... 3
Editorial: A Dubious Reversal (ERG) ... 4
Editorial: Ship Righted (CCT) ... 5
Editorial: Maintain Oversight Of Spying Program (DMR) ... 5
The Homeland Security Pageant (WP) ... 6

Homeland Response:

Man Who Reported False Threat Makes Plea Deal (LAT) ... 7
FBI Not Amused By Area Man's Terrorist Plot 'tip' (ONTDB) ... 8
Prosecutors Say Man Makes Plea Deal In Phony LA Terror Threat (MHCA) ... 8
Negroponte Calls Intelligence Restructuring A "Work In Progress" (WP) ... 9
U.S. Agency Tries To Fix No-Fly List Mistakes (WP) ... 9
Two Governors Appeal For Antiterror Aid (NYT) ... 10
Canadians Brace For Passport Rules (LAT) ... 11
Housing Aid Extended For '05 Storm Victims (WP) ... 11
Extension Granted To Hurricane Victims (NYT) ... 12

War News:

Top Dems Slam Bush On War Strategy (SFC) ... 12
Pelosi, White House Clash On Iraq (LAT) ... 14
Democrats Want Accounting On Iraq War Spending (WT) ... 14
Senators To Offer Centrist Proposal On Iraq (NYT) ... 15
Casey Urges Patience In Securing Baghdad (WP) ... 16
General Sees Summer Deadline For Troops (NYT) ... 17
Some "Surge" Troops May Return Soon (WSJ) ... 17
Iraq Aiding U.S. Surge, General Says (WT) ... 18
Casey: "Surge" Could Go Home By Summer (CHIT/AP) ... 19
Joseph Lieberman Unbowed (WSJ) ... 20
Key Aide To Sadr Arrested In Baghdad (WP) ... 22
Aide To Militant Shiite Cleric Held After U.S.-Iraqi Raid (NYT) ... 23
US Forces Seize Sadr Aide (FT) ... 24
Top Sadr Deputy Is Arrested (LAT) ... 25
Top Aide Of Muqtada Al-Sadr Arrested (AP) ... 26
Iran Complains About U.S. Detentions (AP) ... 27
Iran Reportedly Set For Talks With U.S. (AP) ... 28
Leading Senator Assails President Over Iran Stance (NYT) ... 29
Draft Law Keeps Central Control Over Oil In Iraq (NYT) ... 30
Temporary "Enjoyment Marriages" In Vogue Again With Some Iraqis (WP) ... 31
The Next Body Armor Design Gets A Show In Natick (BOS) ... 33
Missing In Antiwar Action (WP) ... 34

Corporate Scandals:

Feds Defend Siegelman Jurors, Question E-Mails Used By Defense (AP) ... 35
States Study Marketing Of Lilly Pill (NYT) ... 35
H.P. Chief Defends Timing Of Stock Sale (BLOOM) ... 36
Two Are Sentenced For Fraud Involving Trading Of Stocks (BLOOM) ... 37
Executives Get Bonuses As Firms Reprice Options (WSJ) ... 38

Criminal Law:

Ney Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison For Abramoff Deals (WP) ... 39
Ney Is Sentenced To 2½ Years In Abramoff Case (NYT) ... 41
Ney Will Serve 30 Months In Abramoff Hill Bribery (WT) ... 41
Ney Gets 30 Months In Corruption Case (LAT) ... 42
Ney Gets 30-Month Sentence (RC) ... 43
Latest Abramoff Casualty Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison (HILL) ... 43
Sizing Up The Libby CIA-Leak Trial (WSJ) ... 43
Fight Averted, For Now, Over U.S. Reporter's Notes In CIA Case (FINDLAW/AP) ... 44
The Libby Injustice (WSJ) ... 45
FBI Details Threat From Gangs In Military (CHIST) ... 46
Ex-FBI Agent Guilty Of Assault (PROJO) ... 47
Retired FBI Agent Convicted In Assault (CTPOST) ... 47
Former FBI Agent Wanted In Rhode Island Convicted Of Assault (AP) ... 47
Solid Data Scarce For Child Abductions (AP) ... 48

Civil Law:

High Court To Revisit Campaign Finance Law (WP) ... 48
Justices Revisit Campaign Finance Issue (NYT) ... 49
High Court To Review Campaign Finance Law (LAT) ... 51
High Court To Referee Campaign Finance Case (WT/AP) ... 51
High Court Takes "Issue Ad" Cases (CNN) ... 52
House Panel Opens Investigation Of GSA Chief's Deal With Friend (WP) ... 52
Legal Fight Resumes Over Guard's Back Pay (MR) ... 53
Plaintiffs' Team Takes Hit On Asbestos (WSJ) ... 54

Civil Rights:
San Francisco Police Are Criticized In Wake Of Fight Involving A Yale Singing Group (NYT) ... 55
Testimony To Be Heard On Shooting By The Police (NYT) ... 56
Editorial: A Tragedy Of Errors (WP) ... 56

Antitrust:
Plaintiffs In Microsoft Case Claim Firm Is Violating U.S. Antitrust Deal (AP) ... 57
Microsoft Eyed Apple In '03 (BLOOM) ... 57
Esmark To Buy West Virginia Tin-plate Plant (BLOOM) ... 58
Steelmaking Neighbors Eye Partial Merger (PPG) ... 59
Case Could Kill Mill (BRADV) ... 59
State Is Reviewing Deal For Hoover (COLDISP) ... 60
Caremark Shareholders Get Their Say (TENN) ... 61
Tribune Board Panel To Meet On Auction (WSJ) ... 61
Patent Trial Near, Bristol-Myers Counts On Resilience (NYT) ... 62
Suit By Record Companies Against XM Going To Trial (AP) ... 63

Environment:
Judge Orders Review Of Salamander Status (FINDLAW/AP) ... 64
Minerals Chief Defends Response To Lease Problem (BILLGAZ) ... 64

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
FBI Chief Likes New Facility (LAT) ... 65
NY Court: FBI May Have Coerced Filmmaker (FINDLAW/AP) ... 66
Pelosi Urges Halt To Prosecution Of Chronicle Writers Letter To Attorney General Also Calls For Federal Shield Law (SFC) 67
Top Lawmaker Demands Answers From Justice Department (NYS) ... 67
Physician Gets 2-year Prison Sentence (CINPOST) ... 68

Immigration:
Labor Groups, Business Seek Immigration Law Overhaul (WP) 69
Immigration Stagnation (WP) ... 69
Bush Comments On Agents Who Shot Suspected Drug Dealer (NYT) ... 70
Hunter Asks Congress To Pardon Border Agents (WT) ... 71

Tax:
W. Palm Commissioner Resigns (FLSUNSEN) ... 71
Exline Resigns Post Under Tax Cloud (PALMBEACHP) ... 72
Scandals Keep Growing (PALMBEACHP) ... 74
Justice Dept. Sues Local Tax Preparer (KZGAZETTE) ... 75
High Court Considers Tax Authority Case (AP) ... 75
IRS May Widen Probe Of Fees On Municipal Investment Contracts (BLOOM) ... 76
Railroads Seek Tax Aid (WSJ) ... 76

Congress-Administration:
Bush To Visit Democrats' Retreat (NYT) ... 78
Conservatives Slam Bush Policies (WT) ... 78
State Of The Union: The 3 Keys To Bush's Speech: Energy, Immigration And Iran (WSJ) ... 79
Salazar Sends Early Message To Bush (DENP) ... 79
Former VP Mondale Says Cheney Cooks Ludicrous Advice (AP) 79
Mondale: Cheney Not Serving Bush Well (UPI) ... 80
Senate Measure Puts Spotlight On Fund-Raising (NYT) ... 80
Senate Supports Transparency In Tariff Breaks (WP) ... 82
Senate Passes Ban On Lobbying By Some Spouses (WP) ... 82
New Rules Still Allow Congress Many Perks (WP) ... 83
Real Ethics Reform (WP) ... 84
Reform, Finally, In The Senate (NYT) ... 85
Senator's Condition Improves (NYT/AP) ... 85
"100-Hour" Agenda Is Completed (WP/AP) ... 85
House Votes To Reshape Page Board (WP/AP) ... 86
House Approves Reform Of Page Board (HILL) ... 86
House Votes To Expand Board Overseeing Teen Pages (LAT) ... 86
Measure Offers Norton More Voting Power (WP) ... 87
House Likely To Give Norton A Vote (WT) ... 88
In D.C., Perry Builds Bridges With Texas Dems (HC) ... 89
Stem Cell Policy Hampering Research, NIH Official Says (WP) ... 90
The Ballad Of Bushie And Flashy (NYT) ... 90
Sex And The Single-Minded (NYT) ... 91
The Biggest Man On Campus (NYT) ... 92
Archives Of Spin (NYT) ... 93

Other News:
Shares Close Mixed As Earnings Reports Fail To Inspire (NYT/AP) ... 94
After The Dow's Record Run, Large Stocks May Be Tiring (WSJ) ... 95
Chilly Weather Sparks Crude-Oil Rally (WSJ) ... 96
Dollar Little Changed; Rate Cut Looks Unlikely (WSJ) ... 96
Trade Deficit Stubbornly Defies The Dollar's Slide (NYT) ... 97
Martinez Takes Over As Leader Of RNC (WP) ... 99
RNC Elects Martinez As Head (WT) ... 100
State Aims For Feb. 5 Primary To Boost Clout (LAT) ... 100
Conservative Core Seeks A Contender (LAT) ... 102
3 From The Bush Advertising Team Join McCain's '08 Advisers (NYT) ... 103
Richardson To Explore Presidential Bid (AP) ... 103
Sen. Dodd Not To Run For Re-Election In 2010, Uses PAC To Buy NH And IA Voter Files (CQPOL) ... 104
Can Voters Picture Good Mormons As Good Leaders? (DMN) 104
Pennsylvania Governor Pushes Health Plan (NYT) ... 106
Towns Tame Taxes By Keeping Children Out (WT/BLOOM) ... 107
Targeting Wal-Mart Again (LAT) ... 108
China Shows Assertiveness In Weapons Test (NYT) ... 108
U.S. Presses China On Anti-satellite Test (LAT) ... 110
China's Anti-satellite Missile Test Criticised (FT) ... 111
China Tries To Reassure The World On Space Missile "Aimed At Peace" (LONT) ... 111
Chinese Space Test Raises US Suspicions (FT) ... 112
China's Muscle Flex In Space (NYT) ... 113
China Sets Off A New Round Of Star Wars (FT) ... 114
N Korea Claims Progress In US Talks (FT) ... 114
N.Korea: Deal Reached In U.S. Nuke Talks (AP) ... 115
U.S. Says U.N. Agency Aided N. Korea (AP) ... 116
US Claims N Korea Syphoned Millions From UN Project (FT) ... 117
Embattled U.N. Agency Alters Aid To N. Korea (WT) ... 117

DOJ_NMG_0119892

U.S. Suspicious Of Aid To North Korea (LAT)..... 118
U.N. To Audit Its Activities After Reports On North Korea Program (NYT) 119
U.N. To Examine Relief Agencies' Pay In N. Korea (WP)..... 120
A Product Of The U.N. System (NYT) 121
Israel Sends Promised $100 Million To Abbas (WP)..... 121
Israel Unfreezes $100M Before Summit (AP) 121
Israel Releases $100 Million Withheld From Palestinians (NYT)122
Israel Releases Palestinian Funds (LAT) 123
Jimmy Carter's Jewish Problem (WP) 124
An Enigmatic Wild Card In Lebanon's High-Stakes Politics (NYT) 125
Outspoken Editor Is Slain In Turkey (WP/AP) 127
Journalist Killed By Gunman In Istanbul (FT) 128
Journalist Slain In Turkey (LAT)..... 128
Armenian Editor Is Slain In Turkey (NYT)..... 129
Insurgents Attack Palace In Somalia (NYT) 130
African Union Experts To Discuss Somalia (AP)..... 131
Blair Aide Arrested In Honors Probe (WP) 132
Senior Aide To Blair Is Arrested In Graft Inquiry (NYT)..... 132
Blair Aide Arrested In Honors-for-sale Probe (WT/AP) 133
Election Could Decide Serbia's Role In Europe (NYT)..... 134
Chavez Says Ailing Castro "Battling For His Life" (WT/AP) 134
Chavez: Castro "Fighting For His Life," Progressing Slowly (CNN)..... 135
Mercosur Set To Delay Expansion Plans (FT) 135
Congress And Foreign Policy Don't Mix (LAT) 136

TERRORISM NEWS:

Administration Stays Course In Legal War (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

Bush's team sees victory even in retreats in fights over anti-terror tactics.

WASHINGTON — In its legal war on terrorism, the Bush administration has proved itself undeterred by apparent setbacks.

Faced with challenges involving spying, military tribunals and other anti-terrorism efforts it devised after Sept. 11, 2001, the administration has revised its legal rationales and shifted tactics a bit. But to a remarkable degree, it has continued on the same course as before — to the frustration of its many critics.

"From the start, the approach has been to take the most aggressive positions in defense of public safety and to retreat only for tactical reasons," said Washington attorney Brad Berenson, an associate White House counsel during President Bush's first term. "There's been no overall pullback."

The latest example of this strategy of winning-by-avoiding-defeat came this week, when Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales announced that a special Justice Department court had approved a new round of wiretaps.

Previously, the administration said the president had an "inherent authority" to order — without court approval — wiretapping of terrorism suspects' international calls, despite a 1978 law against such surveillance.

Bush's claim sparked outrage from civil libertarians and sharp criticism on Capitol Hill, particularly from Democrats. This month, those Democratic critics took control of the House and Senate. Even before that, a federal judge in Detroit had declared Bush's policy unconstitutional; that case is now before a U.S. appeals court.

Rather than continue toward a confrontation with the new Congress that could thwart the program, Gonzales told lawmakers Wednesday that Justice Department lawyers now would get court approval for their wiretaps. But while the change of course was seen by many as defeat for the administration, Bush and his attorney general treated it as a victory.

"Nothing has changed in the program, except the court has said, 'We've analyzed it and it's a legitimate way to protect the country,' " the president said in an interview with Tribune Broadcasting.

During a Senate hearing, Gonzales corrected critics who said the announcement meant the administration had "terminated" its efforts to intercept calls into and out of this country. He explained that the administration, to gain court approval, had changed its legal rationale for the wiretapping, rather than change the wiretapping program itself.

But he refused to explain this rationale, prompting anger and frustration among some Democrats.

"The attorney general was being purposely evasive," said Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank), who has worked on bills to overhaul and update the wiretapping law. "They are following the unilateralist approach again. They are saying, 'We are going to bring it within [the court system], and we are not going to tell you how we are going to do it.' "

This pattern has been repeated over the last five years. Bold administration claims of authority in the war on terrorism have been followed by slow and grudging retreats. And in nearly every instance, a setback or about-face has not seriously hampered the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0119893

In June, the White House suffered what many saw as a historic rebuke when the Supreme Court struck down Bush's rules for military tribunals. The justices said the proposed system did not meet the standards of fairness set by the Geneva Convention or by the U.S. military code of justice.

Undaunted, the administration got the GOP-controlled Congress to write Bush's proposal into law. And, to prevent further interference from the courts, the new law said judges could not hear pleas from "aliens" held by the U.S. military. By the year's end, the Supreme Court defeat had been converted into a White House victory.

Four years ago, the Supreme Court took up a challenge to the administration's policy of holding men captured in Afghanistan or Pakistan. In a split decision, the court said the government could hold these men as war prisoners, but it must give them some sort of hearing.

Though civil libertarians called that ruling a defeat for the administration, White House lawyers saw a victory. As Berenson said, "The detention power is the most important issue."

Hundreds of men remain held at Guantanamo Bay, and they have been given only cursory hearings before a panel of military officers.

Regardless of how the administration views it, Georgetown University law professor David Cole said he believed this week's announcement on wiretapping showed the era of unchecked executive power had ended. With the Democrats in control of Congress and a challenge working its way through the courts, Bush could no longer claim he had an inherent power to ignore the wiretapping law, he said.

"If you look at it over five years, it's clear they have retreated on many fronts," said Cole, a longtime administration critic.

Still, in many cases it's hard to see how the retreats have substantively changed how the administration wages its war.

In 2002, Bush's lawyers asserted that the president could order the arrest and imprisonment of Americans he deemed "enemy combatants." These people can be held in U.S. military prisons without charges and barred from even speaking to a lawyer, they said.

In a secret memo, Bush's lawyers also said the president could order the use of extreme pain to force captured men to talk, despite laws and treaties that bar the use of torture and cruelty.

Those policies, though widely condemned, still stand, revised but not repealed.

Last year, when the case of alleged enemy combatant Jose Padilla was due to come before the Supreme Court, the administration switched course and moved him from a military brig to a federal prison near Miami. He is being held there awaiting a trial.

A debate over torture and harsh treatment of prisoners had a similarly inconclusive end. Led by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War, Congress adopted a stricter ban on cruel and degrading treatment. Bush agreed to the bill but added a so-called signing statement last January saying he reserved the right to do what was necessary to "protect the American people from further terrorist attacks."

Bush's lawyers had argued that the CIA sometimes needed to use pressure and pain to force suspected terrorists to talk and to reveal plans for attacks.

david.savage@latimes.com

Editorial: A Dubious Reversal (ERG)

Eugene (OR) Register-Guard, January 20, 2007

Congress should take a skeptical approach to the Bush administration's announcement that it is reversing course and allowing a secret federal court to oversee a controversial electronic surveillance program.

Such a warning shouldn't be necessary. Since 9/11, Congress has repeatedly been thwarted, marginalized, and circumvented by an administration that is intent on calling every shot in the war on terror - and that is indifferent to the system of checks and balances required by the Constitution.

Five years ago, President Bush secretly ordered the National Security Agency to tap Americans' calls and e-mails without court approval. On Wednesday, the administration announced it will comply with the federal law that requires the agency to first obtain warrants before conducting such surveillance.

There was no explanation why the president has suddenly decided he can comply with a law that he once declared cumbersome, confining and a menace to national security. Bush simply said his Justice Department has sought warrants from the secret federal court established under the 1971 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and got them with the "necessary speed and agility."

In other words: "Nevermind. We've decided to obey the law, after all."

It's tempting to applaud this change as a prudent and long-overdue move by a president who saw the light after last November's election.

DOJ_NMG_0119894

Tempting. But unwise.

One day after announcing the change, Bush clarified that the essential elements of the surveillance program remain intact. "Nothing has changed in the program except the court has said we've analyzed it and it's a legitimate way to protect the country," he said.

Meanwhile, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales disputed reports that the warrantless program run by the NSA had been "terminated." He also said the administration might block any effort by Congress to obtain copies of the court's decision to approve the administration's wiretaps.

As if all that weren't troubling enough, Gonzales also said the administration still believes the Constitution gives the president the authority to order eavesdropping without court approval during a time of war.

So, the administration now wants Congress and the American public to believe that it has changed a surveillance program that it says really hasn't changed at all. By the way, don't ask for details because none will be provided. And don't forget: The president still has the authority to snoop without warrants whenever he wants.

Congress should demand details and answers about the surveillance program - and do whatever is necessary to obtain them. Meanwhile, the question of the wiretap program's constitutionality should continue to make its way through the courts. A federal judge ordered a halt to the program last year, declaring it unconstitutional. The government's appeal is scheduled for argument in two weeks, raising a question of whether the administration's announcement was timed to influence the outcome of the case.

The president should remember that he is a creature of the Constitution and is not immune from its authority. Whether the issue is surveillance, torture or the war in Iraq, Congress must make certain that truth is understood inside the White House.

Editorial: Ship Righted (CCT)

Cape Cod (MA) Times, January 20, 2007

With a simple change of mind, the Bush administration has made a bitter constitutional question moot.

Would they had done it five years ago, when the same tools, time-tested and true, were also available.

On Wednesday, the Justice Department announced it was letting the court established under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act â€“ FISA â€“ monitor the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the program that intercepted phone calls and e-mails between foreign callers and subjects in this country. At the time Attorney General Antonio Gonzalesâ€™ letter to the Senate Judiciary Committee was released Wednesday, the court had already approved one request for tapping a person believed to be linked to al-

Qaida or a similar group.

The spying program was started in 2001, in the aftermath of 9/11. When it was revealed, sticklers for constitutional protections cited the Fourth Amendment: â€œThe right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause. ...â€

Warrants â€“ the lack of them â€“ have been the issue all along. No one objected to the tactic of defending against terrorism by listening for suspicious calls. It was the fact such policing was being done without external review that violated separation of powers and alarmed conservatives as well as liberals. In our system, the judiciary is the third and co-equal branch of government. In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled the program unconstitutional and ordered it stopped. It continued under appeal.

The administrationâ€™s steadfast refusal to consider warrants had all the makings of a â€œslippery slopeâ€ away from the checks and balances of the Constitution. Warrants provide a paper trail. They are the working papers of accountability and transparency of government power.

The exasperating thing about President Bushâ€™s plan was that it served no useful purpose. The FISA court process has been established for 25 years as the mechanism for sensitive surveillance matters. FISA court proceedings â€“ usually only one judge â€“ are not held in public, so no secrets are compromised. As in the much-maligned Patriot Act, there are prudent exceptions for those cases when speed is of the essence â€“ the warrant can catch up with the wiretaps at a later date.

The White House, via spokesman Tony Snow, now embraces the FISA supervision: â€œThe Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court has put together its guidelines and its rules and those have met administration concerns about speed and agility when it comes to responding to bits of intelligence where we may to be able to save American lives.â€

The important thing is that the Constitution â€“ that American original â€“ once again acted as ballast to right the ship of state.

Editorial: Maintain Oversight Of Spying Program (DMR)

Des Moines Register, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119895

Congress must protect citizens' rights.

The Bush administration's back flip on the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretaps is a breathtaking example of chutzpah.

For more than a year, the administration fiercely defended the NSA practice of secretly tapping American citizens' phone calls without court approval or congressional oversight as vital to fighting terrorists. Critics were condemned for putting silly constitutional formalities above national security. Then, Wednesday, before U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was headed to Capitol Hill for a grilling by the Senate Judiciary Committee, he announced the government had decided to seek approval for wiretaps from a special federal court after all.

One day the party line is that the president, under the authority of an act of Congress following 9/11, has unfettered power to spy on American citizens without oversight by Congress or the federal courts. Then, it is, "Oh, never mind."

Actually, the first example of the administration's chutzpah was when it insisted the president could authorize secret searches of American citizens' private communications without a warrant from a court. As the founders understood based on their experience with the king's agents, no government should have the right to conduct random searches, without court supervision under the authority of Congress. That fundamental separation-of-powers framework, the foundation of our constitutional government, was arrogantly dismissed by the Bush administration in its wiretaps program.

Members of the Senate thought the timing - the day before Gonzales was scheduled to appear before a hostile committee - was curious. Gonzales, however, said the administration had been negotiating with the chief judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court for months on details of putting the "Terrorist Surveillance Program" under the jurisdiction of the court.

The administration's timing more likely was related to a Jan. 31 hearing before the 6th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in Cincinnati on the legality of the warrantless searches. That court is reviewing a decision by a federal district judge in Detroit who ruled in August that the spying is unconstitutional. This is reminiscent of the case of Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen held by the government for more than three years as a suspected terrorist, who was suddenly released to Florida authorities on minor charges just as his case was scheduled to be reviewed by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Could it be the administration saw that it was headed for a Supreme Court reversal and decided to pull the plug?

Either way, it is not entirely clear that with this change the administration is truly showing respect for the Fourth Amendment. The Justice Department has refused to release details of the order by the FISA court - even though the court's chief judge said in a letter to the Senate that she had no objections to releasing the order.

Congress should continue to press the administration for details of the FISA court process, and it should insist on having oversight of any NSA spying on American citizens.

The Homeland Security Pageant (WP)

By William Wan

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

First came duct tape. Then the airport liquid ban. And yesterday, officials unveiled the latest development in the country's war on terror: an American Idol-style contest for homeland security inventors.

Six finalists. One stage. Ten minutes each to win the hearts of the judges and walk away with $50,000. Or perhaps more important, a phone call from one of the defense contractors sitting in the audience.

Among the contestants:

-- A Russian scientist with his biological weapons detector. "All of Western civilization is at war," he proclaimed.

-- A team from Boston with a 300-degree steel furnace capable of killing biological threats.

-- A former Ohio police officer, frustrated with law enforcement's unwieldy Web networks and offering a way to fix them.

-- An inventor from Atlanta with an X-ray device able to detect everything from a vial of cocaine to nuclear waste.

-- And the hometown favorite, the Baltimore creators of a virtual reality helmet with 180-degree peripheral vision, for military and disaster-response training.

For two hours yesterday, they worked the stage at the Loews Annapolis Hotel, talking up their wares and how they might shield the nation from death and destruction.

The idea for the contest was hatched last year by the Chesapeake Innovation Center, a county-owned nonprofit organization charged with bringing homeland security firms to Anne Arundel. As the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks approached, the center's leaders wanted to contribute somehow -- to create something that would make the sobering, scary world a little bit safer. Business sponsors put up $25,000 toward the cash prize, and the state put up another $25,000.

DOJ_NMG_0119896

But the prize, many said, was almost incidental in an industry where contracts are measured by the million and sometimes billion. The high stakes had to do with the audience at yesterday's presentation: a rich assortment of security experts, military officials and defense contractors, all of them potential clients and investors.

The group received 50 applications for its Defend America Challenge, ranging from three-page outlines to 80-page volumes. Six were invited for the finals -- a 10-minute presentation and a two-minute Q&A.

And as they took to the stage yesterday, evil seemed to lurk everywhere: radioactive cargo containers, anthrax-tainted dollar bills, instant messages with secret instructions for mass destruction.

And yet, despite the doomsday scenarios, the event had all the makings of a beauty pageant -- the fierce rivalry and accompanying camaraderie, the big smiles and slick packaging. Presentation, after all, would count for a quarter of contestants' scores.

Before the contest started, Yuval Boger, the virtual reality guy from Baltimore, was talking up the hometown advantage. "Well, it's only human to check out the competition, to try to see how you'll measure up," he said. "And with all things being equal, maybe the judges will want to invest locally in Maryland rather than somewhere else."

The X-ray man nearby, however, played down any rivalry. "I don't view it so much as direct competition with them," said Dolan Falconer, who had come from Atlanta to talk about an X-ray machine that could detect everything from explosives to radioactive waste. "We're all winners already for being selected as one of the six finalists."

One company, BioDefense, had lugged along a working model of its massive mail decontamination machine. Sitting in the hotel lobby on the back of a Hummer was the 375-pound unit -- a large steel box that looked suspiciously like a washing machine.

"When you're dealing with something like white powder in the mail, you don't know what it is. Best thing is to just kill it all," said company rep Jonathan Morrone. He thrust a few letters into the machine's mouth and pointed out the microwave plates, the 300-degree convection heaters and the ultraviolet light.

Several in the audience hoped to test out the Baltimore virtual reality headgear. "We couldn't bring it," Boger said. The bulky equipment and computers would have taken too long to set up, and coping with long lines of people waiting to geek out on his company's system would have distracted from its main purpose -- winning.

But mindful of the presentation component, Boger had brought another, more low-tech prop -- two cardboard toilet paper tubes -- to illustrate how normal virtual reality helmets can offer only tunnel vision compared with his company's high-resolution models.

"You got to have the steak and the sizzle," he said with a sly smile. "You got to entertain them but tell them something substantial, too."

Alexander Asanov, the Russian scientist, took a more gloom-and-doom approach, speaking of a "war with the extremists," in a sober voice thick with accent. "It is a war of ideas. It cannot be won by bullets; so we need to empower our ideas."

Preferably his idea, he added, as he described technology that detects biomolecular threats like anthrax within minutes.

In the end the winner was announced with a sealed envelope and a dramatic pause: It was Falconer, the X-ray man from Atlanta, who ended up taking home the oversized check.

"I don't want to call it luck, because it took a lot of hard work, but on any given day, any of us could have won," he said graciously.

Another $50,000 prize, for the best invention by a Maryland company, went to Boger's virtual reality helmet.

There were smiles all around, business cards exchanged and all through the hotel ballroom a feeling that the nation was now perhaps a little safer.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Who Reported False Threat Makes Plea Deal (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

An Ontario man who falsely told the FBI that he overheard a co-worker talking about a terrorist attack that would "knock L.A. off the Earth" could face five years in prison.

In a plea deal with prosecutors announced Friday, Dennis Leon Kolupski, 54, admitted that three weeks before Sept. 11, 2005, he called FBI officials to say he had overheard a co-worker talking about the bombings in London and Madrid before stating that "9/11 is nothing like what will happen on 9/12."

DOJ_NMG_0119897

Officials at the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles said Kolupski admitted that he never heard the person making threats and hoped his report would bring more scrutiny on the co-worker. Kolupski will appear in court Feb. 26.

FBI Not Amused By Area Man's Terrorist Plot 'tip' (ONTDB)

By Rod Leveque, Staff Writer

Ontario Daily Bulletin, January 20, 2007

If your shifty-eyed co-worker is hunched over his desk, conspiring on his cell phone to blow up the world, it's probably OK to call the FBI and report it.

If, on the other hand, you don't share a cubicle with the next Osama bin Laden, think twice before phoning in any bogus terrorist tips to the feds.

An Ontario man accused of falsely reporting that his colleague was plotting to wipe Los Angeles "off the earth" has discovered just how seriously federal investigators take such bogus reports.

Dennis Leon Kolupski, 54, faces up to five years in federal prison after agreeing to plead guilty to providing false information to the FBI about his co-worker's non-existent terrorist plot.

"The world changed on 9/11 and this type of conduct is not allowable," Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Lee said. "I would hope the average person wouldn't do something like this."

Prosecutors said Kolupski called the FBI in 2005 - three weeks before the anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks - and lodged the false reports.

He told investigators he overheard a co-worker on a cell phone make statements such as "9/11 is nothing like what will happen on 9/12," and that "this will knock L.A. off the earth."

Advertisement

The FBI dispatched agents to investigate the claim and interview the co-worker, Lee said. They ultimately concluded the report was groundless.

Kolupski later told investigators what he heard was in a language other than English, and that he intended his report to bring scrutiny to the co-worker, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Kolupski is set to make his first court appearance Feb. 26. If he follows through on his promise to plead guilty to the felony charge, he could avoid prison and be placed on probation.

His attorney, Rosa Mosley, declined to comment Friday.

Lee said the government has no tolerance for bogus terrorist reports because they drain the resources of the agencies that are forced to investigate them.

However, the prosecutor said he hopes Kolupski's case doesn't discourage anybody from reporting honest tips.

"If you have a legitimate bit of information, by all means, that should be passed on," he said. "But if you are just wholesale providing false info, that is an unnecessary use of government resources and that's a criminal act. It's my hope this case illustrates this is not the right choice to make."

Staff writer Rod Leveque can be reached by e-mail at r_leveque@dailybulletin.com, or by phone at (909) 483-9325.

Prosecutors Say Man Makes Plea Deal In Phony LA Terror Threat (MHCA)

Monterey (CA) Herald, January 20, 2007

LOS ANGELES - An Ontario man who claimed he overhead plans for a Sept. 11-style terrorist attack will plead guilty to providing false information to the FBI, authorities said Friday.

Dennis Leon Kolupski, 54, could be sentenced to five years in federal prison under a plea agreement filed Friday, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

He was scheduled to appear in court on Feb. 26 but he may enter his plea at a later date, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Y. Lee.

Kolupski called the FBI three weeks before the Sept. 11 anniversary in 2005 and claimed he overheard a cell phone conversation in which a co-worker threatened to knock Los Angeles "off the earth."

Kolupski said he overheard the man say: "9/11 is nothing like what will happen on 9/12."

However, Kolupski later acknowledged that he did not hear any threats to Los Angeles and that the conversation wasn't in English, prosecutors said.

Lee said Kolupski had been under stress for "personal reasons."

"In a moment of stress he called the FBI and relayed this information regarding this non-existing threat," Lee said.

It was a criminal act nonetheless, he said.

"Making these types of false reports is a tremendous drain on law enforcement," he said.

Negroponte Calls Intelligence Restructuring A "Work In Progress" (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The "complex and demanding" process of restructuring the U.S. intelligence community is still "a work in progress" after 22 months of effort, John D. Negroponte said yesterday in a farewell address wrapping up his tenure as the first director of national intelligence.

Negroponte, who is leaving to become deputy secretary of state, spoke in the lobby of the modernistic Defense Intelligence Analysis Center at Bolling Air Force Base before 400 senior intelligence community officials and a portion of the 1,700 employees that make up the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

He said one success was the way various organizations worked together during the 2006 Lebanon-Israel crisis to determine which agency was best positioned to gather certain types of intelligence and share it with others, reducing duplication of effort. That same "lift and shift" of intelligence is continuing in the ongoing Darfur crisis and with regard to Somalia, he said.

Another innovation he cited: the support an intelligence community science and technology team is giving to the group run by retired U.S. Army Gen. Montgomery C. Meigs that is coming up with new solutions to defeat the improvised explosive devices (IEDs) that are the most deadly killers of American troops in Iraq.

Additional integration of analysts and collectors is among the challenges still facing the community, particularly when it comes to so-called hard targets such as North Korea and Iran, he said.

CIA Director Michael V. Hayden, who was the first principal deputy national intelligence director before taking over the agency, praised the job Negroponte has done and said the former ambassador is returning to "his first calling" as a diplomat.

Hayden also used his time to praise how the restructuring has helped him focus solely on CIA problems without worrying about dividing his time with concerns about the rest of the community, as previous CIA directors had done when they had broader responsibilities. In a change from his prepared text, and in the spirit of collegiality, Haydon dropped a description of the CIA serving "in a leading role" in the intelligence community and just said the agency was serving "in our role" in the community.

U.S. Agency Tries To Fix No-Fly List Mistakes (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima, Alec Klein

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Every time Kiernan O'Dwyer arrived at the airport after traveling overseas in recent years, he was flagged as a potential terrorist. But his uniform was a dead giveaway to his true identity: He is a veteran pilot for American Airlines.

U.S. customs agents have stopped him about 80 times since 2003, apparently because his name and birth date nearly match those of an Irish Republican Army leader, one of at least 300,000 names on the U.S. government's watch lists. O'Dwyer falls under an unenviable category of false positives, people who are wrongly detained because some of their personal information matches that of a terrorist or other suspect.

The number of misidentifications is unknown, according to government auditors, but it has caused headaches for a cross-section of travelers, including nuns, infants and members of Congress. The U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency, under the jurisdiction of the Homeland Security Department, said it was trying to remedy the problem with a system to prevent unwarranted detentions on international flights.

An agency official said in an interview that the system, launched in February 2006, has eliminated about 17,500 detentions involving people entering the country at airports, seaports and at land borders. It is part of what the government says is an effort to prevent terrorism while not inconveniencing travelers or violating their privacy and civil liberties, though it is not yet applied to domestic flights.

The challenge is complicated by the vast and growing databases of electronically stored personal information that draw on different agencies' records, which must be continually updated to be accurate. Federal agencies and airlines are using computer-driven algorithms to compare travelers' names against watch lists.

Under the new system, which overrides Customs and Border Protection's main database, people continue to be stopped if their name appears on a watch list. But if the follow-up screening clears them, customs agents make note of that so the next time they travel, those people should not be detained.

"It is certainly not in our interests to continually stop people when we have a system in place that can stop that," said John P. Wagner, the agency's director of passenger automation programs. "It's a waste of their time. A waste of our time."

The agency has another terrorist screening tool, the "automated targeting system" for passengers, that can potentially do the same thing, said Brian C. Goebel, former senior policy adviser to the U.S. Customs and Border Protection commissioner.

DOJ_NMG_0119899

"ATS is designed really to identify the red flags associated with potential risks -- terrorist indicators," he said. But it should also identify passengers who do not merit follow-up screening, Goebel said.

O'Dwyer, 51, of Pittsboro, N.C., is not convinced that the problem has been fixed. "I've been told that everything is fine before," he said. Even after Customs and Border Protection introduced the system to prevent misidentifications, O'Dwyer said he was detained about 30 times.

All his problems began in 2003, after O'Dwyer returned from a trip to Europe. Reaching the customs desk at John F. Kennedy International Airport, he was stunned when officials pulled him aside for further screening. He showed them his passport. He had no criminal record. Ninety minutes later, he was cleared.

But he kept getting detained -- so often that customs agents took to greeting him by his first name.

"They'd look at their screen and know I'd been screened and say, 'Oh boy, you've been through here a bunch,' " he recalled.

O'Dwyer even carried a letter from the Customs and Border Protection Office of Field Operations saying, "(Y)ou are not, nor have you ever been, on record as a criminal suspect."

But, he said, customs officers told him the letter could have been forged. He said he offered to submit to fingerprints, just as foreign flight crews do, but to no avail.

O'Dwyer become so frustrated that he gave up flying internationally in May, a move that he said cost him $10,000 a year in salary and expenses. He said he is still stopped when he reaches the domestic gate, and a supervisor must help him get cleared.

Christopher White, a spokesman for the Transportation Security Administration, which handles domestic passengers, declined to comment on O'Dwyer's case, saying that the agency does not publicly verify names on its watch lists. About 15,000 people per week apply for redress, saying they have been mistakenly placed on the TSA's rolls. About 33,000 have applied to be removed from those lists as of April, the most recent date available. Soon, TSA's no-fly list will be pared of names erroneously included, officials said.

The FBI also declined to discuss specific cases. FBI spokesman Paul Bresson noted that the agencies are "refining" their watch lists, "removing names when they're cleared."

Wagner, the customs official, said that though the system for eliminating false positives applies only to international flights, eventually it will extend to domestic travelers. And the Homeland Security Department, which houses both Customs and Border Protection and the TSA, will soon begin a Traveler Redress Inquiry Program for people who believe they have been wrongfully subjected to additional screening or denied permission to board flights to or from the United States.

O'Dwyer, for one, still does not know why he was detained, gleaning only through "offhand" comments from customs agents that his name nearly matched that of an IRA operative. One IRA leader with whom he could be confused is Ciaran O'Dwyer, according to World-Check, a British firm that maintains a global database of terrorists, high-risk individuals and political figures. The IRA leader, born about 1955, was convicted in June 2005 and sentenced to five years and nine months.

O'Dwyer, the pilot, who also was born in 1955, has not lost all hope. In the spring, he intends to test the customs screening system when he goes on holiday to Italy.

Two Governors Appeal For Antiterror Aid (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

HOBOKEN, N.J., Jan 19 — Warning that it would be a “grave mistake” to further reduce antiterrorism financing to the nation’s busiest urban center, Govs. Eliot Spitzer of New York and Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey pressed the Bush administration on Friday for a substantial increase in federal money to improve security for the region’s highways and mass transit lines.

Appearing at a news conference in Hoboken Terminal that tens of thousands of commuters to Manhattan pass through each day, Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Corzine released a letter to the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff, saying that their efforts to deter another terror attack had been set back by substantial cuts in financing for counterterrorism announced in June.

Since the June announcement, the federal government has changed the guidelines used to determine aid, combining parts of New York and New Jersey, and officials in both states have said they worry that new classification system could foreshadow additional cuts.

Mr. Chertoff said this month that the new classification system would not necessarily mean that the region would receive less money because it would be distributed based on risk.

“To say, for example, the risk for New York is at this level and the risk if you cross the Hudson River is at a much lower level doesn’t make a lot of sense,” Mr. Chertoff said.

DOJ_NMG_0119900

But Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Corzine, both Democrats, said they wanted to speak out now, while the financing levels are being determined in Washington.

"There could be a temptation through combining the risk analysis, to reduce the overall level of funding awards," the letter says. "That would be a grave mistake and would only serve to undermine the public's confidence."

Federal antiterrorism aid to New York City dropped to $127 million from $204 million in the 2006 fiscal year.

New Jersey fared slightly better: aid to its six densely populated northern counties climbed to $34.3 million, up from $19.4 million. For the rest of the state, there was a sharp cut in grants, to $17.7 million, down from $36.3 million last year.

The news conference was the first joint public appearance of the two governors since Mr. Spitzer took office. While Mr. Corzine has had several border disputes with Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, and previous New York and New Jersey governors have periodically jousted over Port Authority spending and sports franchises, Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Corzine say they have a cordial working relationship.

Neither Mr. Corzine nor Mr. Spitzer would cite a specific dollar amount they sought from Washington, but said that five years after the 9/11 attacks, the region's infrastructure remained vulnerable.

"I feel kind of like a college student calling home and saying, 'Just send money,' " Mr. Spitzer said.

Canadians Brace For Passport Rules (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

Starting Tuesday, air passengers into the U.S. will need the document.

TORONTO — Canadians are scrambling to get passports before new U.S. rules go into effect Tuesday requiring all air travelers coming into the United States from Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean to carry one. Tourism officials here worry that the restrictions will deter Americans from coming north.

The rules, designed to keep closer track of the millions of people who cross U.S. borders, were recommended by the Sept. 11 commission and mandated by Congress in 2004. They were supposed to take effect Jan. 1, but U.S. officials postponed their implementation until Jan. 23 to avoid disrupting holiday travel.

Travelers coming into the U.S. by land or sea will not need a passport until January 2008 and can still enter using a birth certificate, driver's license or border crossing card that shows citizenship. But beginning Tuesday, airline passengers coming into the U.S. will have to produce a passport. Exceptions to the rules are those traveling between Canada and the U.S. for work who were issued special cards, merchant mariners with Coast Guard documents and permanent residents with "green cards."

Officials expect some glitches at first. "People will still be showing up with sorry stories and no passports, I guarantee you," said a Canadian customs official at the Toronto airport.

In December, there was a 31% increase in passport applications compared with the previous year, said Francine Charbonneau, a spokeswoman for Passport Canada. The department has added an extra shift at print centers to get passports out quickly.

So far this year, 96% of travelers from Canada have used passports, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials say. The majority were traveling on business.

"Anything that gets me through customs faster I'll do," said Brett Nelson, a Canadian engineering and sales manager who travels twice a month to the U.S. He has been using his passport for about a year, since a border official said the U.S. preferred it. But Nelson said he doesn't agree with the restriction.

"It's remnant paranoia from 9/11," he said. "They're still afraid of people hijacking an airplane. But you can still drive across the border with a truck bomb as long as you have a driver's license."

Canadian tourism officials worry that the new rules will give Americans another reason to go somewhere else. The country's $50-billion tourism industry has seen visits by U.S. travelers drop 28% over the last five years, especially as the Canadian dollar has grown stronger.

The staggered implementation of the rules — for air travel this year, for land and sea next year — is also causing uncertainty.

"It's the confusion over the requirements that is creating the biggest problem," said Randy Williams, president and CEO of the Tourism Industry Assn. of Canada.

Only 40% of Americans have passports, according to the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency.

maggie.farley@latimes.com

Farley, The Times' United Nations Bureau chief, was recently on assignment in Canada.

Housing Aid Extended For '05 Storm Victims (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0119901

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The U.S. government will extend housing aid through August for hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents still displaced by hurricanes Katrina and Rita, officials said yesterday, acknowledging that wide swaths of New Orleans and parts of coastal Mississippi remain uninhabitable nearly 17 months after the 2005 storms.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said it would continue for six more months to pay for 130,000 households' trailers, mobile homes and apartments, aid that under federal law would have expired at the end of next month.

Officials in Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas and advocacy groups had urged FEMA for a decision since December, saying the historic housing crisis triggered by the devastating storms had not subsided. A delay or denial would have crippled rebuilding efforts and disrupted hundreds of thousands of lives, they said, as families living in trailers near their original homes would have had to move away and others in apartments would have been turned out by landlords seeking to rent to non-subsidized tenants.

The new Democratic Congress also stepped up pressure, frustrated at the Bush administration's improvised policies and the slow pace of recovery in New Orleans.

"This is very welcome news for the thousands of Louisianans still struggling with the everyday challenges of recovery and rebuilding," said Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.), who announced the decision after speaking with FEMA Director R. David Paulison. A formal announcement is set for early next week.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) and Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R) expressed gratitude but warned that the shortage of permanent housing will continue past August.

"Even though the number of Mississippians relying on this program is reduced each month as housing is rebuilt, it is clear thousands of our citizens will be without permanent housing six months from now," said Barbour, who sought a one-year extension.

Blanco called the recovery effort "beyond the scope of federal rules."

Housing advocates in Washington said they hope FEMA will notify recipients speedily and plan for longer-term housing. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, added, "I will await official word from FEMA before determining if its provisions are adequate."

The order covers about 100,000 households in Louisiana and 30,000 households in Mississippi. A breakdown of housing type or costs was not available, FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said.

In Houston, about 100,000 evacuees, mostly from New Orleans, live in privately owned apartments paid for by FEMA, a spokesman for Mayor Bill White said.

FEMA will pay for the extension through earlier appropriations to its disaster recovery fund, and no new spending by Congress is needed, McIntyre said.

Extension Granted To Hurricane Victims (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

The federal government will allow the 110,000 families still living in trailers because of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita to stay through August, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency said. The housing program had been scheduled to expire at the end of February, and some community groups had been expecting FEMA to start issuing eviction notices as early as next week. The six-month extension, announced by Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, also applies to displaced families living in apartments paid for by FEMA.

WAR NEWS:

Top Dems Slam Bush On War Strategy (SFC)

By Edward Epstein

San Francisco Chronicle, January 20, 2007

Washington -- The two top Democratic leaders of the new Congress blasted President Bush on his decision to send more troops to Iraq and warned him not to take military action against Iran without their approval, but they offered their bipartisan cooperation on domestic issues.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada also indicated Friday in their annual "pre-buttal" to Bush's State of the Union speech that they want Congress to take strong action on global warming, an issue that until recently the Bush administration has downplayed.

DOJ_NMG_0119902

The Democratic leaders' comments on Iraq, however, left little doubt that the debate over the war will overshadow everything else this year on Capitol Hill.

That impression was reinforced by a sharp exchange of words between the White House and Pelosi.

Pelosi, appearing on ABC's "Good Morning America," reiterated her tough stand against Bush's handling of the war.

The president "has to answer for his war. He has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder," the speaker said.

Pelosi also said that keeping troops in Iraq in the midst of sectarian fighting "is not an obligation of the American people in perpetuity." The president has said he will send 21,500 more troops to Iraq, while many congressional Democrats have called for troop withdrawals.

Pelosi indicated she thought Bush was rushing some of the extra troops to Iraq quickly to pre-empt possible congressional resolutions opposing such new deployments.

"The president knows that because the troops are in harm's way that we won't cut off the resources. That's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way," Pelosi said.

Those comments set off Dana Perino, deputy White House press secretary. She called Pelosi's comments "poisonous," especially for implying that Bush was using troops for political purposes.

"Speaker Pelosi was arguing in essence that the president is putting young men and women in harm's way for tactical political reasons. And she's questioning his motivations rather than questioning his policies," Perino told reporters.

"The one thing you can say about President Bush is that he's not moving forward with this new plan because he thinks it is popular. He is doing it because he thinks it is right," she added.

Opinion polls show fewer than 3 in 10 Americans support the president's announced policy to increase troop levels in Iraq.

In her appearance with Reid at the National Press Club, Pelosi again voiced support for the bipartisan, nonbinding Senate resolution introduced this week that opposes Bush's troop increase. The House will take up the resolution if it gets through the Senate.

Reid said "the president's new plan can be summed up in four words: more of the same. Like our military generals, the American people and a growing bipartisan chorus in Congress, I believe escalation is a serious mistake."

The Senate majority leader also warned Bush about recent speculation that the administration is considering military action against Iran because of its meddling in Iraq and because of its nuclear program.

"I'd like to be clear: The president does not have the authority to launch military action in Iran without first seeking congressional authorization," Reid said.

At the White House, Perino repeated the president's position that no military operations are contemplated against Iran. "There seems to be fanning of flames where there's no fire," she said of Reid's comments.

The atmosphere over cooperation on some domestic issues is brighter going into Tuesday's scheduled State of the Union, given comments by the two Democrats and the White House.

Pelosi listed numerous issues -- such as developing alternative energy sources, immigration policy, reauthorizing the "No Child Left Behind" education program, funding basic scientific research, curbing the federal budget deficit, reforming health care policy, helping the Gulf Coast recover from Hurricane Katrina, and combatting global warming -- on which Democrats will push legislation that she hopes can be bipartisan and get Bush's support.

She said Americans "want to see their leaders focus on American priorities, and they want us to work together for the American people."

Bush plans to address many of those topics in his annual speech -- the first the president will deliver before a Congress controlled by the opposition Democrats.

"Americans should expect a discussion of the commonsense principles that will provide the basis for President Bush's approach to governing with a new Congress," Perino said.

She said the speech will differ from the usual State of the Union in that it won't be the usual "laundry list of proposals."

Since the November election, Bush has shown a more conciliatory approach toward the Democratic Congress. The president replaced Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and United Nations Ambassador John Bolton. This week, he reversed his policy on warrantless wiretaps and has indicated he would sign a minimum wage increase, which was one of Pelosi's top priorities.

But if Bush hopes to move the focus off Iraq, he probably will be disappointed. His speech will be followed immediately on network television by the Democratic response, which this year will be delivered by new Democratic Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, who defeated Republican Sen. George Allen in November in part on an anti-war platform. Webb campaigned carrying the combat boots worn by his son, a Marine serving in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0119903

Pelosi, White House Clash On Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — With barely a nod to the bipartisan civility they have saluted since the last election, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and a White House spokeswoman traded sharp language Friday over President Bush's Iraq policy.

"He has to answer for his war. He has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder," said Pelosi, a Democrat from San Francisco.

"The president knows that because the troops are in harm's way, that we won't cut off the resources. That's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way," she said in an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America."

Bush has said he will put additional forces in Iraq, an effort largely aimed at stopping the sectarian violence in Baghdad. Some Democrats have said Congress should block Bush's plan by eliminating funding for the troop increase.

Deputy White House Press Secretary Dana Perino called Pelosi's comments "poisonous" and decried a "sound-bite war" emanating from Capitol Hill.

"Speaker Pelosi was arguing, in essence, that the president is putting young men and women in harm's way for tactical, political reasons. And she's questioning his motivations rather than questioning his policies," Perino said at the daily White House news briefing.

The exchange highlighted the difficulty the new Democratic leadership and the White House have faced in adhering to promises to stop the partisan quarreling that was common before the November election.

Pelosi, when asked whether she was saying that Bush deliberately timed the dispatch of troops so that Congress could not intervene, said, "I would certainly hope he didn't manipulate the timing of sending the troops in."

Democrats Want Accounting On Iraq War Spending (WT)

By Charles Hurt, Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

Conservative House Democrats yesterday announced a plan to investigate the awarding of contracts in Iraq, as the White House and Speaker Nancy Pelosi sparred over President Bush's new war strategy.

"It's long past time that we kept track of the money and the weapons that we're giving to the Iraqis and replace the waste, fraud and abuse with proper oversight, responsibility and accountability," said Rep. Patrick J. Murphy, Pennsylvania Democrat.

Mr. Murphy and the coalition Blue Dog Democrats drafted a resolution demanding a detailed accounting of where the $400 billion spent so far on the Iraq war has gone and where future expenditures will go.

It also would require that future requests by the administration for war money go through Congress' normal budget channels as opposed to the special "emergency supplemental" requests that bypass regular congressional appropriations.

"We're spending $8.4 billion a month in Iraq, $12 million an hour in Iraq," Rep. Mike Thompson, California Democrat, said. "We owe it not only to the American taxpayers ... but most important, we owe it to the men and women who are putting their life on the line in Iraq to make sure that money's being spent appropriately."

A number of government oversights -- including an Iraq special inspector general, the Pentagon inspector general and the military service's own financial watchdogs -- are stationed in-country. They have produced scores of reports and audits on U.S. spending.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Pelosi said Mr. Bush is swiftly enacting his plan to move 21,000 troops into Iraq solely to prevent opponents on Capitol Hill from blocking the new war strategy.

"The president knows that because the troops are in harm's way, that we won't cut off the resources; that's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way," she said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

The White House yesterday labeled Mrs. Pelosi's comments "poisonous."

Despite a pledge from the president and top Democrats to seek middle ground and try to work together, majority leaders are now engaging in "a sound-bite war," Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino said.

"[I]t's certainly not in keeping with the bipartisan spirit and civility that the Democrats pledged and that we looked forward to, and the president will again call for that in his State of the Union address," she said.

Mrs. Pelosi also said that Mr. Bush "has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder," but she refused to say how Democrats would improve the situation.

"[I]t's the president's war, and he's the one without a plan," she said.

The White House struck back fiercely on that comment, too.

DOJ_NMG_0119904

"To say that this is only the president's war makes a mockery of the notion that when we are a nation at war, we should all hang together," Mrs. Perino said.

"The president really hopes that in this time of an epic struggle against radical Islam, that when we are facing an enemy that is determined to hurt us in Iraq and to hurt us here at home, that we can come together and be constructive."

Mr. Murphy, an Iraq war veteran elected to Congress in November, said 20 cents of every dollar that's been spent in Iraq cannot be accounted for. And much of the money that has been accounted for was wasted, he said.

Taxpayers, for instance, spent $75 million to build a police academy in Baghdad.

"You know what they're going to do with it?" Mr. Murphy asked. "They're tearing it down."

Senators To Offer Centrist Proposal On Iraq (NYT)

By Carl Hulse, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Senator John W. Warner of Virginia is drafting a proposal on Iraq policy with two Senate centrists in an effort to provide an outlet for lawmakers uneasy with President Bush's troop buildup but unwilling to back a toughly worded resolution opposing the new strategy.

Aides said Friday that Mr. Warner, a Republican who just stepped down as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, was working with Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, to draw up a Senate resolution they will unveil Monday as an alternative to another bipartisan plan that flatly opposes troop increases in Iraq.

That measure, by Senators Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Carl Levin of Michigan, both Democrats, is scheduled to be considered by the Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday. But the emergence of a proposal embraced by Mr. Warner, an influential Republican leader on military issues, and other proposals circulating in the Senate showed there was no consensus yet.

The flurry of Iraq resolutions, coming from the political left, right and middle, raised the prospect of muddling the outcome of what Democratic leaders had hoped to keep a simple yes-or-no vote on Mr. Bush's plan. Now, some lawmakers could vote for multiple resolutions if they reached the Senate floor.

"Either you support an escalation of American forces in Iraq or you don't," Mr. Hagel said Friday. "You can try and dance on the pinhead of technicality and wordsmithing all you want, but it's going to come down to that."

The undercurrent of the 2008 presidential campaign is also pulling on the debate over the symbolic vote on Iraq. Democrats had originally planned to offer a single nonbinding resolution, but now at least four senators with presidential aspirations have put their own names on Iraq proposals.

In short order this week, Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut introduced a plan to cap troop levels in Iraq; Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York offered a similar proposal; and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois said he would present legislation as early as next week. All stopped shy of a proposal offered by Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, that would block spending for any troop increase, an idea favored by the staunchest opponents of the war.

With votes in the House and Senate still to come, Democratic Congressional leaders jousted with the White House on Friday over Mr. Bush's plan to add more than 20,000 troops to try to quiet violence in Iraq.

In an interview on "Good Morning America" on ABC, Speaker Nancy Pelosi accused Mr. Bush of moving quickly to put the added troops in place because he knew Congress would not limit spending for military personnel in the field.

"Democrats will never cut off funding for our troops when they are in harm's way," Ms. Pelosi said, "but we will hold the president accountable. He has to answer for his war. He has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder."

That drew a sharp response from the White House, where Dana Perino, a spokeswoman, called Ms. Pelosi's comments "poisonous" and said Democrats had embarked on "sound bite war."

"Speaker Pelosi was arguing in essence that the president is putting young men and women in harm's way for tactical political reasons," Ms. Perino said. "And she's questioning his motivations, rather than questioning his policies."

Senators Warner, Collins and Nelson, in a move reminiscent of the "Gang of 14" meetings that helped avert a showdown over judicial filibusters in 2005, began meeting this week after they saw the language of the initial bipartisan resolution. Some lawmakers who had expressed resistance to the troop increase said the wording was too partisan and went far beyond the issue of Iraq to discuss the entire Middle East, North Korea and Afghanistan.

Aides to the three senators declined to elaborate on the proposal, but all three have expressed skepticism about the administration's plan to send more troops to Iraq. In an interview last week, Mr. Warner said Congress should move deliberately, but swiftly.

"Each of us are pained by the casualties that we are taking," Mr. Warner said. "We cannot dither around on it."

DOJ_NMG_0119905

Mr. Biden and his allies have some advantages in making their resolution the center of the debate because he is now chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and can move his resolution quickly through that panel. And the Democratic leadership, which determines the floor schedule, has indicated its support for the concept as well.

"The president's plan will receive an up-or-down vote in both chambers of Congress," Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, said Friday in a speech at the National Press Club. "With that vote, our hope, really our prayer, is that the president will finally listen: listen to the generals, listen to the Iraq Study Group, listen to the American people and listen to a bipartisan Congress."

Casey Urges Patience In Securing Baghdad (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops in Iraq probably will last at least until the end of the summer, a top general said yesterday, urging patience with President Bush's strategy while a bipartisan group of U.S. legislators continued pressing for a new plan.

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. military officer in Iraq, said that the primary focus of the additional U.S. forces will be to secure a violent Baghdad and that their mission, if it goes as planned, could last well into 2007. He and other defense officials have said in recent days that the new battle for Baghdad could take some time but that it will be apparent in coming months whether progress is being made.

"That's not going to happen overnight either, and you're going to see some progress gradually over the next 60 to 90 days," Casey told reporters in southern Iraq yesterday, according to a transcript. "But I think it's probably going to be the summer, late summer, before we get to the point where the people in Baghdad feel safe in their neighborhoods. . . . The first troops are just arriving now, so we've got to wait and see the effect they have on the situation here before we even start thinking about when we might send them home."

The president's plan has drawn ire from Democrats who see the November elections as a mandate to change course in Iraq. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) lashed out in an ABC News interview aired yesterday, saying that Bush has "dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this" and calling the buildup "a stark blunder."

"The president knows that because the troops are in harm's way, that we won't cut off the resources," Pelosi told ABC. "That's why he's moving so quickly to put them in harm's way, but we will hold the president accountable. He has to answer for his war."

White House officials bristled at Pelosi's comments, with spokeswoman Dana Perino calling them "poisonous."

"I think questioning the president's motivations and suggesting that he, for some political reason, is rushing troops into harm's way, is not appropriate, it is not correct, and it is unfortunate because we do have troops in harm's way," Perino said at a news conference.

In a speech at the National Press Club yesterday with Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), Pelosi said the war has produced tens of thousands of casualties, cost hundreds of billions of dollars and damaged the country's standing internationally. She said it also has strained the U.S. military and thus threatens national security.

"Escalating our military involvement in Iraq will not reverse these negative effects. It will only add to them," Pelosi said.

Reid echoed Pelosi's position: "Unfortunately, the president's new plan can be summed up in four words: 'more of the same.' Like our military generals, the American people, and a growing bipartisan chorus in Congress, I believe escalation is a serious mistake . . . Interjecting more U.S. military forces will not end this civil war."

Yesterday, a bipartisan group from the Senate Armed Services Committee announced it will give a resolution on Monday "addressing the president's plan to augment U.S. military forces in Iraq."

The chief sponsor of the resolution, Sen. John W. Warner (Va.), the ranking Republican of the committee, has expressed reservations about putting U.S. forces in the middle of a sectarian fight in Baghdad and has openly questioned sending more troops. Warner's public comments suggest his plan will fall somewhere between the president's strategy and the Democrats' position.

Casey explained his request for more troops yesterday, indicating that he saw three reasons for a more robust presence: the deteriorating situation in Baghdad; the commitments from the Iraqi government that will allow free U.S. troop movement throughout the city; and the fact that Iraqi forces have not been reliable enough "where we could count on them to do the right thing without additional coalition support."

The increased demand for U.S. troops in Iraq is likely to lead to an early, involuntary call-up late this year or early next year of about four Army National Guard combat brigades with 3,500 to 4,000 troops each, Pentagon officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0119906

The Army had planned to be able to supply 18 or 19 combat brigades for Iraq and other overseas duty continually, but the requirement is now for 23, placing a heavy burden on the active-duty Army, said Lt. Gen. Stephen M. Speakes, Army deputy chief of staff, in a Pentagon briefing yesterday. The mobilization of guard brigades will allow active-duty combat units to spend more time at home.

To further ease the strain, the Army and Marine Corps are starting a push to expand their ranks by 12,000 additional troops each year for the next five years, leading senior Pentagon officials to appeal for greater public support for military service. The increase will require a combination of retaining troops and recruiting.

General Sees Summer Deadline For Troops (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

TALLIL AIR BASE, Iraq, Jan. 19 — Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, said Friday that the additional troops being sent to Iraq under President Bush's new plan to stabilize the country could begin to be withdrawn by late summer if security conditions improve.

"I believe the projections are late summer," General Casey said, adding, "I think it's probably going to be the summer — late summer — before you get to the point where people in Baghdad feel safe in their neighborhoods."

The American buildup, which is expected to reach slightly more than 20,000 troops, is just beginning, and all the units may not be in place for several months, but General Casey said there could be signs of improvement in Baghdad in 60 to 90 days. He also said that the Iraqi Prime Minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, appeared to be carrying through on his side of the plan, which requires the Iraqi government to commit more troops and not to interfere with military operations aimed at cracking down on the Shiite militias that have been blamed for much of the sectarian violence in Baghdad.

"So far, so good," General Casey said. "We are seeing them come through on those commitments."

The three Iraqi brigades that Mr. Maliki promised have not yet arrived in Baghdad. But General Casey said that American and Iraqi units have arrested a number of insurgent and death squad members, including five or six death squad leaders in the last three or four weeks. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates, who is making his second trip to Iraq in less than a month, came to southern Iraq on Friday for talks with British commanders and General Casey.

Britain has about 7,000 troops in southern Iraq, and officials in London told Mr. Gates earlier this week that they were making plans to withdraw most of them sometime this year.

"As we see the need for less troops, the surplus will go home," said Maj. Chris Ormond-King, a British military spokesman in Basra, where Mr. Gates held the talks with British commanders.

Major Ormond-King said that Britain maintains three bases inside Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, but that plans were moving forward to turn over the city to full Iraqi control, a step that he added was "probably achievable" by this spring.

He said that British commanders had no plans to disarm Shiite militia groups, including the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, that have been vying for power in the city, as long as they do not attack British forces. A critical part of the new American strategy for stabilizing Iraq is to persuade Mr. Maliki to disarm Shiite militias as well as Sunni insurgents. In the past, Mr. Maliki has been reluctant to crack down on the Mahdi Army, whose leader, Moktada al-Sadr, has been a pivotal member of his political coalition.

Mr. Gates said this week that Britain was making troop reductions at the same time Washington was building up forces in Iraq because conditions in southern Iraq are different than those in Baghdad and other parts of Iraq, where the United States has most of its troops.

Mr. Gates had lunch in Basra with General Casey and Maj. Gen. Jonathan Shaw, the recently arrived British commander. Later, Mr. Gates and General Casey traveled to this air base in southern Iraq to meet with Australian and Romanian commanders and to receive briefings on reconstruction efforts in the south.

Since taking office, Mr. Gates has pushed to ensure that the new American strategy to send additional troops also includes a renewed focus on reconstruction efforts.

Some "Surge" Troops May Return Soon (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

TALIL AIR BASE, Iraq -- Gen. George Casey, who is overseeing the addition of 21,500 troops to Iraq, said the U.S. may consider bringing some of those new forces home as soon as late summer.

"I think it will be late summer before people in Baghdad feel safer in their neighborhoods," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0119907

Gen. Casey met with Defense Secretary Robert Gates here Friday. After Mr. Gates went out of his way not to reveal his opinion on troop levels in his first weeks in office, he seems to have decided that the best way to stem surging violence in Iraq and Afghanistan for now is more U.S. troops.

His statements over the past week -- as he toured the Persian Gulf, Afghanistan and Iraq -- suggest that even if the additional troops don't produce quick results in the coming months, he will exercise patience. Less clear is whether lawmakers on Capitol Hill and voters -- who in polls are skeptical about the force increases -- will be willing to tolerate the Bush administration's troop "surge" without quick results. If the strategy doesn't work, it isn't clear whether the administration has a backup plan.

Mr. Gates, making his second trip to Iraq in less than a month, spent most of his time here learning about southern Iraq, where British troops make up the preponderance of forces. His visit seemed to highlight the differences between the U.S. and British in Iraq.

In contrast to Baghdad -- where the U.S. is adding troops -- British commanders have told U.S. officials they will likely withdraw a number of their 7,000 troops in southern Iraq this year.

In Baghdad, U.S. officials talk frequently about the need to disarm Shiite militias such as the Badr Corps and the Mahdi Army. And American commanders are pushing U.S. troops deeper into Baghdad's densely populated conflict zones.

In the British zone, the opposite is happening. British troops already seem to be taking a less aggressive approach in the south, particularly when it comes to disarming the Shiite militias. They also seem to be pulling back from conflict zones and turning more of the fight over to Iraqi troops.

A British spokesman says United Kingdom forces are going out of their way not to confront the Shiite militias. "We are not taking them on," said Maj. Chris Ormand-King, adding that "the militias are not necessarily a bad thing." He said the militias eventually will be folded into the police and army, but he cautioned the process "could take decades."

The British position is in large part a product of the fact that they have essentially committed to turning over control to the Iraqis in the next few months and to sending troops home or redirecting them to Afghanistan, where violence has also risen. With fewer troops, the British say there are limits to what they can do.

Earlier this fall, for example, the British pulled out of a base in al Amarah, where U.K. forces took frequent fire, and moved to a less populated area along the Iraq-Iran border. Within days of turning the base over to Iraqi army forces, it was looted by impoverished locals. The base hasn't been rebuilt.

"This is an extremely poor area," and what the Iraqis decide to do with the base will "be something the Iraqis will have to sort out for themselves," Maj. Ormand-King said.

Gen. Casey, speaking to reporters, said it is too early to know whether the new U.S.-Iraqi strategy to secure Baghdad will work. Much will depend on whether the Iraqi government provides adequate forces for the fight and doesn't prevent troops from entering key neighborhoods or arresting political figures involved in illegal activity.

Iraq Aiding U.S. Surge, General Says (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

TALIL AIR BASE, Iraq -- Iraq's government has begun to deliver on commitments it made to complement President Bush's plan for a new infusion of U.S. troops, but the results may not be fully felt in Baghdad for more than six months, the top U.S. commander said yesterday.

"So far, so good," said Gen. George Casey, talking to reporters after briefing visiting Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates on the security situation in Iraq.

Gen. Casey said the results on the ground will not be felt overnight for Baghdad, but that some of the extra U.S. troops could begin to pull out by midyear.

"It may be summer, late summer before the people of Baghdad can feel safe in their neighborhoods," he said.

Gen. Casey's optimism comes amid a crescendo of opposition in Congress to Bush's decision to send more troops, with both the House and Senate planning votes condemn and possibly block the move.

Meanwhile, the U.S. troop surge has started.

In addition, the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has begun to transfer three promised Iraqi brigades to Baghdad amid continued insurgent attacks and vicious sectarian killings by warring Shi'ite and Sunni militants.

In Baghdad yesterday, U.S. and Iraqi forces arrested one of militant cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's top aides, according to the Associated Press.

An adviser to Mr. al-Maliki, however, denied the government knew in advance about the raid, in which Sheik Abdul-Hadi al-Darraji was captured.

DOJ_NMG_0119908

"There was no coordination with the Iraqi political leadership and this arrest was not part of the new security plan," the adviser, Sadiq al-Rikabi, told Al-Arabiya television, the AP reported. "Coordination with the Iraqi political leadership is needed before conducting such operations that draw popular reactions."

His comments reflected the differences between the United States and Iraq's Shi'ite-dominated government on U.S. demands for a crackdown on Shi'ite militias that have been blamed for much of the recent violence.

Mr. Gates, on his second visit to Iraq in less than a month, did not meet with Mr. al-Maliki or any other Iraqi officials on this trip, which focused on the relatively peaceful southern part of the country.

As he did in stops at three Arab capitals before coming to Iraq, Mr. Gates said there is a growing regional consensus that Iraq must not be allowed to descend into chaos.

"Given what is at stake here, failure is not an option," he said.

Gen. Casey, who is wrapping up a 21/2-year stint as the top U.S. commander in Iraq. defended the pace of U.S. aid and support for Iraq's army.

Mr. al-Maliki had complained earlier this week that his security forces had not been given the equipment and training they needed to provide security for the country.

Gen. Casey said the job of equipping Iraq's 325,000-member security force was on track to be completed by the end of this year.

Mr. Gates began the day with a briefing at the British-run base near Basra, the country's second-largest city located in the southern Shi'ite heartland.

Britain, with about 6,200 troops in southern Iraq, mostly in Basra, plans to keep forces Iraq through 2007 and perhaps into 2008, a top British general said yesterday.

"Do I see ourselves being here throughout 2007? Yes," Army Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, deputy commander of Multi-National Force-Iraq, told reporters at the Pentagon in a teleconference from Iraq.

"Do I see that commitment being carried on to 2008? That will be for discussion among this sovereign government, my government, our part in the coalition and the like," Gen. Lamb said.

Levels of violence in the south have been lower than in Baghdad and central Iraq, although six British soldiers were wounded in a mortar attack in Basra shortly before Mr. Gates and Gen. Casey arrived.

Iraqi troops are in charge of security in two of the four provinces in the British-run sector.

Shi'ite militias remain a potent force in the south, but British military spokesman Maj. Chris Ormond-King said British commanders hope to co-opt the militias into the new national security forces.

"The militias are not a problem for us," he said. "What is a problem are some of the rogue elements in those militias."

A total of 129 British soldiers have been killed since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Mr. Gates' visit to Talil Air Base, located nearly 200 miles southeast of Baghdad and once used by forces of Saddam Hussein, was the final stop in a weeklong tour that included London, Brussels, Afghanistan, Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Bahrain.

With a close-to-the-vest manner and a preference for yellow index cards in delivering his public remarks, Mr. Gates has already proved a sharp contrast to colorful and quotable former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Briefing reporters with Gen. Casey, Mr. Gates remarked that he had learned at least one fact on his global fact-finding tour: "I'm getting too old to do seven countries in 51/2 days."

Casey: "Surge" Could Go Home By Summer (CHIT/AP)

By Robert Burns

Chicago Tribune, January 20, 2007

TALLIL AIR BASE, Iraq -- The top U.S. commander in Iraq predicted Friday that some of the extra troops President Bush is sending could make an impact and start returning home by late summer, an optimistic note in contrast to skepticism of the plan back home.

Gen. George Casey said security in the war zone should gradually improve during the next three months as the 21,500 added troops build up in Baghdad and in Anbar province. However, the plan's success depends on the Iraqi government fulfilling its own pledges of adding troops and taking an aggressive approach to sectarian militias and death squads, he said.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has failed to deliver on such promises before.

"I think it's probably going to be the summer, late summer, before we get to the point where the people in Baghdad feel safe in their neighborhoods," Casey told reporters at a news conference with Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Asked when he thought some of the extra U.S. troops could be pulled back, Casey replied, "I believe the projections are late summer, but the first troops are just arriving," so nothing is sure.

Sounding his optimistic note, he said, "You're going to see some progress gradually over the next 60 to 90 days."

DOJ_NMG_0119909

Gates, making his second trip to Iraq since he took over for Donald H. Rumsfeld on Dec. 18, headed home after a daylong visit that was not announced in advance. Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, just back from the Middle East, will meet with Bush Saturday morning at the White House to report on their trips.

His trip came as the Bush administration begins a new phase in the war including a troop buildup that has sparked widespread opposition in Congress and the general public, a reshuffling of Mideast commanders and diplomats and intensified military pressure on Iran. Congress is to take up nonbinding legislation opposing the buildup next week.

"Our goal is an Iraq that can defend itself, sustain itself, and govern itself and live free from the scourge of extremism," Gates said. "There's widespread agreement here that failure would be a calamity for American national interests and those of many other countries as well."

The first extra troops -- a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division -- have just arrived in Baghdad, and Gates said it was too early to predict how Bush's plan for quelling the sectarian violence in the capital will work.

Four other brigades are to arrive between now and May, assuming the Iraqis follow through on their commitment to bring three additional Iraqi army brigades into Baghdad and to allow raids against all illegal militias.

Administration officials have declined to estimate how long the extra troops will be needed in Iraq, saying it depends on conditions. Gates said earlier this month that the increase seemed likely to last months, but not 18 months or two years.

Casey had expressed reservations about adding U.S. troops in Baghdad before Bush announced the plan on Jan. 10. The general said several factors had changed recently, including commitments by al-Maliki to not prohibit U.S. and Iraqi security forces from arresting leaders of Shiite militias who have political connections in the Maliki government.

Casey also said he was encouraged at the prospect of al-Maliki fulfilling his promise to send an extra three Iraqi army brigades to the capital to help the reinforced U.S. contingent.

Asked how the Iraqi government was doing to meet its commitments, he said, "So far, so good."

Casey will soon leave his post as part of a house-cleaning Bush is conducting on his military and diplomatic teams for the Middle East.

The U.S. troop reinforcements are supposed to secure Baghdad, although 4,000 of the extra troops are for Anbar province in western Iraq, where a Marine-led force is fighting an Sunni Arab insurgency.

Gates stopped earlier in Basra, the country's second-largest city, where he and Casey met with Maj. Gen. Jonathan Shaw, the newly arrived commander of British forces in southern Iraq.

At Tallil Air Base, which is near the ancient city of Ur and had been a main air defense post of the Iraqi military under Saddam Hussein, Gates and Casey met with commanders from several coalition countries, including Australia, Romania, Denmark and Britain, as well as with U.S. trainers of Iraqi forces.

The Bush administration has accused Iran of meddling in Iraqi affairs and contributing technology and bomb-making materials for insurgents to use against U.S. and Iraqi security forces.

A British military spokesman in Basra told reporters that no hard evidence had been obtained of Iranian arms, money or weapons technology entering southern Iraq.

But the spokesman, Maj. Chris Ormond-King, added, "As a gut feeling we know there is Iranian influence" here. The predominantly Shiite Muslim areas of southern Iraq have historic ties to Iran, which is a predominantly Shiite nation.

Britain, which has the largest troop contingent among the U.S. allies with about 7,000 soldiers in the Basra area, is planning to withdraw a large portion of them this year.

Joseph Lieberman Unbowed (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The war in Iraq brings to Joe Lieberman's mind an old Mark Twain story. "When a cat jumps on a hot stove, the cat never jumps on the stove again because the cat always assumes the stove is hot," says the senator from Connecticut. "But we are smarter than that. OK, so Vietnam didn't work out. But there are times when you've got to use force, to protect your security and to protect your principles."

Try telling that to the nuisance of congressional felines now prowling around the Iraq debate, eyeing it like a cooker on high boil. Next week will witness a Senate vote on a resolution condemning President Bush's new plan to quell growing sectarian violence and terrorism in Iraq by increasing the number of troops. While that vote may be largely symbolic, it comes amid far more ominous congressional calls to cut off war funding, to leave the Iraqis to settle their differences, to bring the troops home.

If ever the Iraq political debate was at a crossroads, it's now.

DOJ_NMG_0119910

At the center of this fray is Sen. Lieberman, a sort of Horatio at the congressional bridge -- spiritedly trying to hold back a bipartisan stampede out of Iraq that he believes will result in devastating consequences for that country, the region, and, most importantly, U.S. national security.

"Iraq is the central part of a larger and ultimately longer-term conflict in the Middle East between moderates and extremists, between democrats and dictators, between Iran- and Iraq-sponsored terrorism and the rest of the Middle East . . . Are we going to surrender to them, surrender that country to them, and encourage people like them to be in authority and power all over the Middle East and in a better position to strike us again?" asks Mr. Lieberman. If only Livy had his quill today.

These are blunt words, and quite a few more flow from Mr. Lieberman throughout a lively interview in his office this past week. A born gentleman, he refrains from lobbing any pot shots at opponents. But he made clear that he felt Washington had been ducking an honest debate about the war and the consequences of abandoning it, hiding instead behind "cosmetic" resolutions and rhetoric. Four years into the conflict, Mr. Lieberman thinks there is value in remembering again why it is we're in Iraq.

This is well-trod ground for a man who supported not just the first Gulf War, but sponsored the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act that aimed to topple the regime. In 2003 "we did something that was right and courageous, which was to overthrow Saddam Hussein," says Mr. Lieberman. "He was a genocidal dictator, he tried to assassinate a former American president, he used chemical weapons [on his] . . . own people . . . He was a hater of the United States." Saddam was a danger, not to mention a barrier to creating a democratic Middle East that ceases to be a threat to the U.S.

This is why the senator remains unmoved today by those colleagues who have abandoned the cause, lamenting that they were "deceived" about the existence of WMD or that they have "lost confidence in the leadership of the president." Says Mr. Lieberman: "If you still think, not only that the original purpose of going in was right, but that how it ends will have a significant effect on American security for a generation or more to come, then you don't back away." And that, he says, counts even in the face of faltering public opinion. "I think we are elected to lead. . . . Americans are understandably responding to the carnage they see on TV every night, and what we have to urge them is not to surrender to the people who are causing that carnage."

Mr. Lieberman, who returned from his latest visit to Iraq in December, freely acknowledges what he believes were "the series of mistakes that were made after Saddam Hussein was overthrown," from the disbanding of the Iraqi army to our reluctance to send more troops (something he has advocated since the fall of 2003). Still, "we were getting to a point where we were making some significant progress -- and it is important not to overlook this. There were three elections held. Those were a powerful demonstration of what no one is able to deny, even those who now want to turn away and give up on Iraq. Which is that the majority of the Iraqi people want a better life for themselves and their families. The majority is not involved in sectarian violence and clearly not involved in terrorism."

There are still hopeful signs, he says. His recent trip included a stop in Ramadi in Anbar province -- an area thick with terrorist operatives -- where the senator saw evidence that "we've turned the tribal leaders to our side, against al Qaeda." Mr. Lieberman also felt from his discussions around the country that there were strong signs a "moderate, multiethnic coalition" was coming together among political leaders who would support Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in a renewed push to restore order. "This thing is still winnable," says Mr. Lieberman. "And it is critical that we take advantage of this opportunity to win."

Which gets to President Bush's proposal for more troops, a plan Mr. Lieberman enthusiastically endorses. "The people in Congress, and the public, were quite right in saying the president's got to come up with a different approach. And he did. It's better than any other plan I've seen because it holds the hope of success. Most of the other plans are effectively just giving up and walking away."

Are 21,500 additional troops really enough? "I wish it was more, truthfully," he answers, throwing his own wish of 35,000 or even 40,000. "But I believe it is adequate. What I hope is that it is implemented quickly." The troops will be vital to quelling what Mr. Lieberman sees as several very different conflicts currently raging in Iraq. In Baghdad, more U.S. soldiers will bolster more Iraqi forces who aim to hold neighborhoods wracked by violence between local Shiites and Sunnis. In Anbar, they will hunt down al Qaeda. More troops, says Mr. Lieberman, will also provide the opportunity "to change the dynamic" in the wider war on terrorism, by sending a message to Iran and others that the U.S. will not abandon the region's moderates who are struggling to create a new democratic order.

And what of those Americans looking for some guarantee this will succeed? "None of us can be certain [the president's plan] is going to work; all the choices we have in Iraq right now are difficult. But by far, the one that is the worst, and would have disastrous consequences, is to pick up and leave, in small steps or in one large step, for all the reasons we know," he replies, emphatically. He also wants to speak beyond the proposal itself, to its author. "I have admiration for the president, because I believe he gets it. He understands the challenge of our time, which is from Islamic extremism . . . And he knows what he's doing is not popular. But he's doing it because he thinks it is right for the country." * * *

DOJ_NMG_0119911

So what does that say about Mr. Lieberman's Senate brethren, those who now want to turn tail for Rome, abandoning Horatio and his damned bridge to the enemy? What, I ask, accounts for the growing numbers of senators -- including Republicans such as Nebraska's Chuck Hagel, Maine's Olympia Snowe, Oregon's Gordon Smith -- who could well provide the decisive votes to undermine their own president in a time of war?

Mr. Lieberman offers a few half-hearted (dare I say, gentlemanly) explanations for the Senate's frigid feet. Some feel let down because the WMDs were never found; others are "affected in a political context by the loss of public support." But he ends up back at a baser truth, conceding that "some people, I just think have been partisan about this -- and that, to me, is the worst reason."

Mr. Lieberman is also frustrated that those supporting the resolution are dodging the tough questions. "The resolution that is being talked about, in one sense I'd say it is offensive, because it is only cosmetic . . . It won't affect the implementation of a new plan to succeed, to win in Iraq. But at the same time it will send a mixed message to those who are fighting for us in Iraq, and those who are fighting against us in Iraq. It will be a very graphic example . . . that we are divided."

But what can Mr. Lieberman, President Bush and others do to stave off such a capitulation? For starters, he responds, his side needs to make sure the naysayers aren't allowed to just criticize. "Part of the case would be, look, if you are really against the war and you are really against what the president is proposing, have the nerve to do what Congress under the Constitution is authorized to do: Move to cut off the funding and then let's have a real head-to-head debate."

Critics of the president's approach might also be made to put forward an alternative, and justify their proposals -- beyond some vague notion that this must all be solved by the Iraqi parliament, which Mr. Lieberman explains isn't so much a solution as wish-fulfillment. "There is an attempt by some of my colleagues here to say that it is wrong to think a military victory is possible, and in the end this requires a political solution among Iraqis. Well, of course it does. But as President Bush said, and as I believe, you can't have a political solution, you can't have economic growth . . . unless you first have security. That's key. Security's basic."

The other alternative, of course, is to simply admit defeat. Some in Congress are working up the courage to say as much, and to further suggest that abandoning Iraq wouldn't be all that bad. "People say this is just like Vietnam, we could leave, and that would be that. That won't be that. We're in a war which has it origins in this part of the world, in the Middle East, in the conflict within Islam. If we pull out and essentially surrender to the extremists and terrorists, they are naturally going to follow us right back to our shores.

"If we leave the place collapses. And it's more than civil war, it's ethnic cleansing. The Iranians come in and dominate a good chunk of the country. Al Qaeda takes over a good part and uses it as a base. The Kurds [can sustain themselves] but it gets very ominous. . . . And then the same group of people who attacked us on 9/11, they achieve a victory, and they will use that victory to strike at us again."

Speaking of the threat posed by Iran, Mr. Lieberman has been equally unimpressed by the U.S.'s lack of resolve. "I'm troubled by this reflex reaction to talk with Iran. We're a strong enough country, when it seems productive we shouldn't hesitate to talk to anybody. But we ought to talk when it is in our interest, not theirs. And right now it is only in Iran's interest."

He says he's been encouraged by the administration's tougher stance in recent weeks, and in particular President Bush's decision to move another carrier battle group to the Gulf region -- "which sends a message to Iran."

Mr. Lieberman also notes that, "We know that some of our American soldiers are being killed by sophisticated IEDs from Iran. The evidence is just closed, clear, compelling. . . . I can't believe the concern expressed by some of my colleagues here about whether we have a right to take prisoner Iranians who we conclude are either supplying weapons to Iraqis who are using them to kill American troops, or training them to kill American troops." As for the rest of the world community, "they're in denial."

What is remarkable, I think toward the end of our conversation, is how spry and feisty the senator looks. He did, after all, just come off a draining year fighting a bitter battle -- against his own party -- for his political life. Mr. Lieberman is now officially an "independent," yet he takes care to describe himself as an "independent Democrat." Why identify with a party that is so uniformly opposed to him on an issue so dear to his heart? He admits he frets that foreign policy is the "Achilles heel" of his political side, and that "unless the Democratic Party can prove to the people that as a party it is not either pacifist or isolationist, but is willing to stand up and protect the security of the American people, then we're going to have trouble electing a president."

His own Democratic heroes are Truman and Kennedy. "The Kennedy inaugural was the single . . . speech that brought me into public life. Those famous words 'Pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, in order to assure the survival and the success of liberty.' That's what it has meant to me to be a Democrat." Horatio's challenge now is to convince his party -- and more than a few Republicans -- to also remember just who they are.

Key Aide To Sadr Arrested In Baghdad (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

DOJ_NMG_0119912

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 19 -- U.S.-backed Iraqi forces arrested a top aide to anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in eastern Baghdad on Friday, amid growing signs of stepped-up efforts to quell Sadr and his supporters.

U.S. military officials said in November that Sadr's Mahdi Army militia represents the greatest threat to Iraq's security. U.S. and Iraqi forces are preparing a renewed effort to pacify Baghdad, including the deployment of additional U.S. troops.

Abdul Hadi al-Daraji, Sadr's media director in Baghdad, was arrested at his house in the neighborhood of Baladiyat, near the Mahdi Army stronghold of Sadr City, shortly after midnight, said Sadr spokesman Abdul Razak al-Nadawi.

The spokesman said a guard was killed during the operation. At least two other aides were taken into custody, according to a statement released by the U.S. military.

The statement did not identify Daraji by name, but said the main suspect was involved in the assassination of numerous members of Iraq's security forces and is "affiliated with illegal armed group cells targeting Iraqi civilians for sectarian attacks." The military said the arrest was the result of an "Iraqi-led" operation.

Nadawi said "the occupation forces are provoking Sadr . . . by these daily operations or every-other-day operations." The spokesman added that the cleric's followers "are the only ones demanding and putting a timetable for the occupation withdrawal."

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has been pressured by the Bush administration to bring the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias under control, was not forewarned about the arrest, said Ali Dabbagh, a spokesman for Maliki. Dabbagh said the prime minister was not notified about every impending high-profile arrest.

"No one is untouchable for the security forces," Dabbagh said. "At the same time, no one was interested to go into a fight with the Sadr movement." Sadr, whose supporters hold 30 seats in parliament, is a key supporter of Maliki, who is a Shiite, but the cleric is also widely seen as an instigator of the country's sectarian violence.

Neither Dabbagh nor the U.S. military said whether Daraji had been charged with a crime. "Definitely, if he's not charged, he will be released in a respectful way," Dabbagh said.

Sadr said in an interview with an Italian newspaper published Friday that a crackdown had begun and that 400 of his men had been arrested, according to the Associated Press.

Maliki told reporters this week that 430 Mahdi Army members had been arrested in recent days, but Nadawi said Thursday that the arrests stretched back to August 2004.

In the interview, Sadr said his militiamen would not fight back during the Muslim holy month of Muharram, which started Friday for Sunnis and begins Saturday for Shiites, saying it was against the faith to kill at that time.

"Let them kill us. For a true believer there is no better moment than this to die: Heaven is ensured," he was quoted as saying. "After Muharram, we'll see."

Also on Friday, the U.S. military reported the death of an American soldier killed Thursday by an improvised explosive device.

The soldier, who was not identified pending notification of relatives, was traveling in a convoy conducting an escort mission in a neighborhood in northwest Baghdad when the blast occurred. Three other soldiers were injured.

Aide To Militant Shiite Cleric Held After U.S.-Iraqi Raid (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 19 — A senior aide to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr was detained here in a joint American-Iraqi raid before dawn on Friday, Iraqi and American officials said, in the latest high-profile arrest of a Shiite militia member.

The aide, Abdel Hadi al-Daraji, a powerful cleric whose official position is as a spokesman for Mr. Sadr but who also is accused of running a Mafia-style crime empire in northeast Baghdad, was arrested in a mosque close to his house in the neighborhood of Baladiyad. He was detained with two of his guards. A third was shot dead in the raid.

The American military did not identify Mr. Daraji by name, saying only that it had captured “an illegal armed-group leader,” and that he was suspected of having been involved in “the organized kidnapping, torture and murder of Iraqi civilians.” A spokesman for Mr. Sadr confirmed that Mr. Daraji was the aide who was arrested and denied the charges of criminal activity.

Mr. Daraji, an elfin man who came from poverty into the Shiite religious community after the American invasion, had been in hiding since the fall, when the military began actively pursuing members of Mr. Sadr’s militia, the Mahdi Army, a central driver of sectarian violence here.

The detention will be a test for the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Mr. Maliki has generally avoided confrontation with Mr. Sadr, whose tremendous political influence helped him win the prime minister post last year. And as recently as October, Iraqi government officials persuaded the top American military commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., to release a senior aide to Mr. Sadr from American custody.

DOJ_NMG_0119913

Mr. Daraji was a central figure in Mr. Sadr's organization during its battles with the American military in 2004, leading his vast army of spokesmen and media advisers. But as the years passed, he staked out territory of his own in his native Sadr City, a sprawling grid of cement-block houses in northeast Baghdad, and local residents said he had been involved in some of the worst militia crimes.

Iraqis who knew him said he had grown rich from his power in the neighborhood. He was known as a middleman, arranging government contracts with local businessmen and taking commissions, and also receiving secret Iranian financing. He had built a fancy new house in Baladiyad, near the mosque where he was arrested Friday morning.

His involvement in crime became well known in the neighborhood and in recent months Mr. Sadr disavowed him, but some still consider him a top aide. He went into hiding, and in October had all but stopped answering his cellphone and responded only to previously arranged agreed-upon patterns of rings.

Many welcomed the news of his arrest.

"It's a good thing," said one Iraqi who knew people around Mr. Daraji and who spoke anonymously out of concern for his family's safety. "He's No. 1 in all this city."

In Sadr City, the arrest stirred some discontent, but not the mass protests that such an arrest would have provoked in past years. Muhammed al-Musawi, a cleric speaking at Friday Prayer, said the government should instead spend its time looking for Sunni militants, like those who engineered a bombing at a university this week.

US Forces Seize Sadr Aide (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

Key figures in Iraq's Sadrist movement said on Friday that US forces had detained one of its top members, the latest in a series of signs that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had authorised a crackdown on the radical Shia movement whose militias are blamed for a large share of the country's sectarian violence.

The arrest coincided with the arrival of US Secretary of Defense Robert Gates in Basra in the south of the country.

The Sadrists identified the detainee as Abd al-Hadi al-Darraji, the movement's media director in Baghdad. The US military said special Iraqi army forces operating with coalition advisers captured a high-level suspect "based on credible intelligence that he [was involved in] the organised kidnapping, torture and murder of Iraqi civilians".

"The suspect allegedly leads various illegal armed group operations and is affiliated with illegal armed group cells targeting Iraqi civilians for sectarian attacks and violence," the statement said.

It said he was affiliated with Abu Diraa, a fugitive militia leader whom US officers say is responsible for the brutal murder of numerous Sunni civilians, but whom many Shia consider a folk hero, claiming he only targets terrorists.

Mr Maliki has been under heavy pressure from the US to crack down on Shia militias ever since he took power last summer and the beginning of this year is widely viewed as his last chance to demonstrate that is serious about imposing the authority of a non-sectarian state, as opposed to helping the Shia to win a sectarian civil war.

The prime minister, whose government has in the past been accused of protecting leaders of the Sadrists' Mahdi Army militia and blocking operations in their support base of Sadr City, has recently suggested that he may have authorised more wide-ranging operations against the radical Shia movement. Two days ago, he said that over 400 Mahdi Army fighters had recently been arrested.

The prime minister may be reluctant to explicitly declare an offensive against the Mahdi Army, which many Baghdad Shia have seen as their first line of defence against Sunni militants who have targeted Shia mosques, religious ceremonies and other civilian targets for the past three years.

The Sadrists for their part say that they are under a crackdown.

One resident of Sadr City said that the movement's rank-and-file had largely disappeared from the streets, and that the leaders believed that they were being hunted and were keeping a low profile.

The Sadrists also say that they have received instructions from Moqtada al-Sadr, the young radical cleric who at least nominally commands the movement, not to resist or provoke the Americans. Officials have also hinted that the group's 30-strong parliamentary bloc may end a boycott of parliament called in November to protest against a meeting between Mr Maliki and US President George W Bush.

In the past, Mr Sadr has built much of his legitimacy from his movement's vocal and militant opposition to the US military presence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0119914

However, his movement has long espoused deepening Sunni-Shia ties, and he has reportedly tried to rein in or replace commanders who are responsible for some of the worst abuses. He has also come under pressure from rival Shia groups to allow his militia to be dismantled, lest the United States cut support for the country's Shia-led government.

Top Sadr Deputy Is Arrested (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops on Friday arrested a top Shiite leader suspected of torturing and killing civilians. The capture of the man Iraqi officials identified as Sheik Abdul-Hadi Darraji, a chief aide of anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr, comes on the heels of a promised crackdown on Shiite militias by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

A spokesman for Sadr's office in Najaf quickly condemned the joint raid in Baghdad, promising countrywide demonstrations.

"Let the Americans know that in these provocative acts against the Sadr movement they are playing with fire," Sheik Abdel Razaq Nidawi said. "And we will wait for the orders of Sayed Muqtada regarding the arrest."

A recently unveiled Baghdad security plan involving the deployment of additional U.S. troops hinges on whether Iraqi forces can, or will, clamp down on Shiite militias such as Sadr's Al Mahdi army. Gunmen loyal to Sadr have long been suspected of fomenting much of the violence in the capital.

However, the significance of Darraji's arrest remains unclear. In the past, Maliki's government has forced U.S. troops to release suspected militiamen affiliated with Sadr, whom the prime minister relies upon for political support. And there seemed to be confusion Friday about whether Maliki had been informed of the raid that led to Darraji's arrest.

One spokesman told the Al Arabiya TV news channel that the operation took place without the prime minister's knowledge. But another Maliki official said in a telephone interview that the Iraqi government supported the arrest.

The U.S. military did not name Darraji but said in a statement that special Iraqi army forces and their U.S. advisors detained "a high-level, illegal armed-group leader" in an east Baghdad neighborhood. Sadr officials and an Iraqi government spokesman said the man was Darraji.

In addition to leading a group suspected of torturing and murdering Iraqi civilians, Darraji has allegedly been involved in assassinating Iraqi security forces and government officials, the U.S. military said in a statement.

"He is believed to be affiliated with Abu Dura and other Baghdad death squad commanders," it said.

The leader known as Abu Dura is a notorious figure in the mostly Shiite slum of the capital known as Sadr City, reputedly responsible for numerous deaths and the most grisly torture. By several accounts, Abu Dura has split with Sadr and is running a renegade militia cell.

Shiite Muslim clerics used their pulpits during Friday prayers to criticize the arrest.

Sayed Muhannad Musawi told worshipers in Sadr City that the arrest was part of a Bush administration strategy to "cover their failure in Iraq" and he called upon the Iraqi government to release the detainees.

"We say to the government that we are not terrorists," said Musawi, responding to a recent statement by Maliki that the government had arrested 400 militiamen affiliated with Sadr. "We are not killers. Rather, we defend innocent citizens."

Among residents in the vast slum, the arrest was greeted with dismay.

"The arrest in Sadr City proves the brutality of the Americans against the safe cities in Iraq," said Ali Abdullah, a 40-year-old owner of an appliance shop. "As a resident of this city, I demand that the government play its role in stopping the operations against unarmed civilians."

Teacher Mohsin Asaidi, 37, called Darraji a symbol for Sadr's followers and his arrest "proof to the world that terrorism and the invasion [of Iraq] are two faces of the same coin."

Sheik Hassan Zarqani, a Sadr official in Najaf, a city holy to Shiites, demanded the release of all detainees associated with Sadr's group, calling the most recent arrest a "very bad message to the Sadr movement, which is trying very hard to stabilize the situation in Baghdad."

A Sadr official's account of the 2 a.m. raid at a Shiite holy site differed from the U.S. military's, saying that four others, not two, were arrested with Darraji. During a gunfight, one guard was killed and the holy site was damaged, said the official, who requested anonymity.

U.S. troops are not allowed to enter Muslim holy sites, including mosques. The U.S. military said its troops never set foot on the site.

Later Friday morning, mourners gathered for a funeral procession taking the body of Ali Raheem, the guard, to Najaf, witnesses said.

DOJ_NMG_0119915

Also on Friday, U.S. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates arrived in Iraq, touching down in the southern city of Basra, where Shiite militias are engaged in a fierce campaign against the approximately 7,000 British forces there.

Britain has consolidated forces in a few bases around the city and plans a significant troop drawdown this year.

Gates met with Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and Maj. Gen. Jonathan Shaw, commander of British troops here.

In recent days, a palace housing British forces has come under heavy rocket bombardment. Attackers have also planted mines in the Shatt al Arab waterway, targeting river patrols, and buried roadside bombs aimed at convoys driving through the city. A spokeswoman for the British forces in Basra said six British troops were injured and two vehicles destroyed in an attack on their base that included rocket and machine-gun fire.

In a news conference with Gates at Tallil air base, northwest of Basra near the city of Nasiriya, Casey suggested that some of the extra troops President Bush plans to send could start returning home by late summer. But, he said, that depends on the Iraqi government fulfilling its pledges of adding troops and taking an aggressive approach to sectarian militias and death squads, the Associated Press reported. Gates added, "Our goal is an Iraq that can defend itself, sustain itself and govern itself and live free from the scourge of extremism."

Elsewhere in Iraq, violence continued, authorities said.

Police patrols recovered the bodies of 18 people, including a politician from Sunni Arab-dominated Fallouja. Some of the corpses bore signs of torture.

Mortar fire killed three and injured seven in various neighborhoods of Baghdad. Armed men opened fire randomly at shoppers at a market, killing one and injuring two.

A roadside bomb killed a police officer and injured another.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, drive-by gunmen assassinated a cleric Thursday night.

An American soldier was killed and three others were wounded by a roadside bomb Thursday in northwestern Baghdad, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The U.S. military on Friday also confirmed that a suicide car bomber attacked near a compound housing Kurdish peshmerga forces earlier in the week, killing four and injuring 38.

Top Aide Of Muqtada Al-Sadr Arrested (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

U.S. and Iraqi forces swooped into a mosque complex in east Baghdad on Friday and detained a top aide to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the latest in a series of operations aimed at eviscerating the leadership of the Mahdi Army militia.

The raid drew immediate criticism from the Iraqi government, which complained it had not been consulted. An aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who owes his job as Iraqi leader to al-Sadr's backing, said the operation was not part of a coming joint U.S.-Iraq security drive.

Under the plan, to which President Bush has committed an additional 21,500 American troops, U.S. commanders have been promised a freer hand against both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen.

"There was no coordination with the Iraqi political leadership and this arrest was not part of the new security plan," Sadiq al-Rikabi, the al-Maliki adviser, told Al-Arabiya television. "Coordination with the Iraqi political leadership is needed before conducting such operations that draw popular reactions."

Abdul-Hadi al-Darraji was captured in the early morning raid and his bodyguard was killed in what Abdul-Zahra al-Suweiadi, a senior al-Sadr aide, called a "cowardly act." Al-Sadr's office said al-Darraji was media director for the cleric's political movement and demanded his immediate release.

"America is playing with fire and our patience is beginning to fade," said Abdul-Razzaq al-Nidawi, an al-Sadr aide in the Shiite holy city of Najaf. "This savage barbarian act will not pass peacefully."

The U.S. military, in a statement that did not name al-Darraji or mention the Mahdi Army by name, said special Iraqi army forces operating with U.S. advisers had "captured a high-level, illegal armed group leader" in Baghdad's Baladiyat neighborhood, which is adjacent to Sadr City, the Mahdi Army stronghold.

"Iraqi forces detained him based on credible intelligence that he is the leader of an illegal armed group (involved in) ... the organized kidnapping, torture and murder of Iraqi civilians. The suspect is also reportedly involved in the assassination of numerous Iraqi Security Forces members and government officials," the U.S. statement said.

It said two other suspects were detained for questioning.

DOJ_NMG_0119916

Also Friday, the top American commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said he thought some of the extra troops might return home after a few months.

"I think it's probably going to be the summer, late summer, before you get to the point where people in Baghdad feel safe in their neighborhoods," Casey said at a news conference at Tallil Air Base in southern Iraq with visiting Defense Secretary Robert Gates.

Asked how long the additional American forces would remain, Casey replied, "I believe the projections are late summer."

The first group of extra troops — a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division — has just arrived in Baghdad, and Gates said it was too early to predict how Bush's plan for quelling the sectarian violence in the capital will work.

Four other brigades are to be sent to Iraq between now and May, assuming the Iraqis follow through on their commitment to bring three additional Iraqi army brigades into Baghdad and to allow raids against all illegal militias.

Gates' daylong visit was not announced in advance. The defense chief met with U.S. commanders and their allied counterparts as the Bush troop buildup was encountering widespread opposition in Congress.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Friday that the Iraq war "is not an obligation of the American people in perpetuity." The president, she said, "has dug a hole so deep he can't even see the light on this. It's a tragedy. It's a stark blunder."

Democratic support was building around a resolution that would rebuff Bush's plans for more troops to Iraq, and more Republicans were looking for ways to sign on to the measure.

In an interview with an Italian newspaper, al-Sadr said the U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown already has begun. And he confirmed reports that 400 Mahdi Army men have been arrested.

The La Repubblica interviewer quoted al-Sadr as saying he feared for his life and stayed on the move constantly. His aides have told The Associated Press he seldom sleeps in the same place for two nights in succession.

Al-Sadr said his militias would not fight back immediately because Islam forbids killing during the Muslim holy month of Muharram, which starts Friday for Sunnis and Saturday for Shiites.

"Let them kill us. For a true believer there is no better moment than this to die: Heaven is ensured," he was quoted as saying. "After Muharram, we'll see."

Al-Sadr said he is being targeted.

"For this reason, I have moved my family to a secure location. I even have had a will drawn up, and I move continuously in a way that only few can know where I am," he was quoted as saying by La Repubblica.

Some of al-Sadr's militia commanders have said al-Maliki has stopped protecting the Shiite fighters under pressure from Washington. They have claimed at least five top commanders were captured or killed in recent months.

While al-Maliki has vowed he will not interfere in U.S. attempts to rid the capital of militiamen, his aide al-Rikabi declared that "the new security plan does not target a specific militia, it targets everyone practicing killing and terrorism against civilians, whether Sunnis or Shiites."

At least 27 people were killed or found dead as a result of sectarian violence across Iraq on Friday, including a man working for the Ministry of Tourism and Archaeology Affairs who was shot and killed near his home in a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad. Gunmen also attacked a Shiite mosque in southern Baghdad, killing two guards and setting off explosives to damage the building.

A roadside bomb killed one U.S. soldier and wounded three others in an attack Thursday against a patrol that was escorting a convoy in northwestern Baghdad, the military said Friday.

___

AP military writer Robert Burns in Basra and Lolita C. Baldor in Washington contributed to this report.

Iran Complains About U.S. Detentions (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

Iran charged in a letter to U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon on Friday that the United States illegally attacked its consulate in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last week and demanded the immediate release of five detained Iranians.

The U.S. military accused the Iranians of links to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that is allegedly supporting insurgents in Iraq. It disputed Iranian claims that the men were diplomats and that the office is a consulate.

In its letter, Iran's deputy ambassador Mehdi Danesh-Yazdi strongly condemned the Jan. 11 raid and accused the U.S. of "another flagrant violation of the basic principles of international law" and diplomatic conventions which bar attacks on diplomatic missions.

The Foreign Ministry said U.S. forces also confiscated documents and other property. It said Iran has had an office in Irbil since 1992, and its status was officially changed to a consulate in the past year.

DOJ_NMG_0119917

Danesh-Yazdi called for the immediate release of the five Iranians, the return of the property seized by U.S. forces and compensation for damages to the consulate.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran holds the U.S. government fully responsible for the consequences of this unlawful act, and for the safety and security of the ... consular officers," Danesh-Yazdi said.

"Indeed, the said attack constitutes a matter of grave concern that requires an urgent and resolute response on the part of the United Nations, and in particular the Security Council," Danesh-Yazdi said.

He did not indicate what specific response Iran was seeking, but asked Ban to circulate his letter as an official document of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

Iran Reportedly Set For Talks With U.S. (AP)

By Bassem Mroue, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

President Jalal Talabani said in remarks published Friday that the Iranians were ready to meet with the U.S. for talks about security issues — part of an apparent effort by Talabani to encourage a dialogue between two nations that are increasingly at odds, and vital to Iraq.

Talabani's comments, in an interview with the respected pan-Arab daily Al Hayat, came amid escalating tensions between Washington and Tehran. In recent weeks, the U.S. has built up naval forces in the Persian Gulf and raided an Iranian liaison office in northern. Iran meanwhile has stepped up military operations along its border, Iranians arriving in Iraq say.

"During my last visit to Tehran, I discussed the matter with Iranian officials who said they are ready to meet the Americans but they said that the Americans should publicly announce their readiness," Talabani said in the interview. He was last in Iran in late November.

Talabani, currently on a visit to Syria, said "the Iranians showed flexibility. I will say it for history that they said they are ready for an understanding with America from Afghanistan to Lebanon. They are ready for discussions in order to reach results that please both sides."

Talabani's office confirmed the accuracy of the quoted comments.

Iranian officials were not immediately available for comment because Friday is the holy day in the Muslim world.

The United States accuses Iran of helping Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias in Iraq, and of trying to build a nuclear weapons program. Washington has also asked Tehran to end support for militant groups, including Hezbollah in Lebanon and the Palestinian group Hamas.

In his interview, Talabani described two failed efforts by U.S. and Iranian officials to hold secret talks last year.

At one point last year, Talabani said, the Iranians proposed a three-way meeting with U.S. and Iraqi officials, and the Americans accepted. The talks were to be held in the town of Dokan, in Iraq's northern Kurdish area.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, Talabani told the newspaper, traveled to Dokan a day before the scheduled meeting. But the Iranians boycotted, Talabani said, because they thought the secrecy of the meeting had been compromised.

The Iranians proposed another meeting before Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government took office in May, Talabani said, but the Americans wanted to wait until the Cabinet was formed. The Iranians "considered that procrastination and canceled the meeting," he said.

Earlier this week, Lawrence Wilkerson, former Secretary of State Colin Powell's chief of staff, told the British Broadcasting Corp. that Vice President Dick Cheney in 2003 rejected an Iranian offer to help the United States stabilize Iraq, and for Tehran to end its military support for Hezbollah and Hamas.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom H. Casey on Thursday said he had no knowledge of the offer. But he said the U.S. is open to talks with Tehran.

Meanwhile, Iranian reinforcements were reported along the Iraqi border in the northern Kurdish region in response to what residents said was an intensification of over-flights by U.S. warplanes in recent days.

Travelers arriving in Iraq's northern Sulaimaniyah province said they saw dozens of Revolutionary Guards with vehicles carrying 106 millimeter cannons. They chanted "death to American. Death to Israel."

Mamosta Aziz, a senior official at the Kurdistan Ministry of Peshmerga, or militias, said Iranian forces had remained on their side of the border.

Iran's Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told state-run television Friday that Iran will file a formal complaint with the U.N. Security Council over the U.S.'s detention of five Iranians in northern Iraq.

The U.S. military stormed an Iranian government office in the Kurdish-controlled city of Irbil on Jan. 11 and arrested the Iranians, whom it accuses of links to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that is allegedly supporting insurgents.

Iran says the arrested men were diplomats and the office a consulate, but the U.S. disputes this.

DOJ_NMG_0119918

Leading Senator Assails President Over Iran Stance (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — The new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee on Friday sharply criticized the Bush administration's increasingly combative stance toward Iran, saying that White House efforts to portray it as a growing threat are uncomfortably reminiscent of rhetoric about Iraq before the American invasion of 2003.

Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, the West Virginia Democrat who took control of the committee this month, said that the administration was building a case against Tehran even as American intelligence agencies still know little about either Iran's internal dynamics or its intentions in the Middle East.

"To be quite honest, I'm a little concerned that it's Iraq again," Senator Rockefeller said during an interview in his office. "This whole concept of moving against Iran is bizarre."

Mr. Rockefeller did not say which aspects of the Bush administration's case against Iran he thought were not supported by solid intelligence. He did say he agreed with the White House that Iranian operatives inside Iraq were supporting Shiite militias and working against American troops.

Mr. Rockefeller said he believed President Bush was getting poor advice from advisers who argue that an uncompromising stance toward the government in Tehran will serve American interests.

"I don't think that policy makers in this administration particularly understand Iran," he said.

The comments of Mr. Rockefeller reflect the mounting concerns being voiced by other influential Democrats, including the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, and Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, about the Bush administration's approach to Iran. The Democrats have warned that the administration is moving toward a confrontation with Iran when the United States has neither the military resources nor the support among American allies and members of Congress to carry out such a move.

Because Mr. Rockefeller is one of a handful of lawmakers with access to the most classified intelligence about the threat from Iran, his views carry particular weight. He has also historically been more tempered in his criticism of the White House on national security issues than some of his Democratic colleagues.

Mr. Rockefeller was biting in his criticism of how President Bush has dealt with the threat of Islamic radicalism since the Sept. 11 attacks, saying he believed that the campaign against international terrorism was "still a mystery" to the president.

"I don't think he understands the world," Mr. Rockefeller said. "I don't think he's particularly curious about the world. I don't think he reads like he says he does."

He added, "Every time he's read something he tells you about it, I think."

Last week, the Intelligence Committee heard testimony from John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, that an emboldened Iran was casting a shadow across the Middle East and could decide to send Hezbollah operatives on missions to hit American targets.

Mr. Negroponte testified the morning after President Bush had, in a televised address to the nation, said he was determined to confront what he called worrying activities by Iranian operatives in Iraq, and announced that the Pentagon was building up the American naval presence in the Persian Gulf and sending a battery of Patriot missiles to deter Iranian aggression.

Some Democrats have suggested that Mr. Bush's speech was the beginning of a meticulously choreographed campaign to demonize Iran, much the way the administration built its public case against Iraq.

In a speech on Friday, Mr. Reid warned the White House not to take military action against Iran without seeking approval from Congress.

Gordon D. Johndroe, a White House spokesman, said in response to Senator Rockefeller's comments that Iran was taking provocative actions both inside Iraq and elsewhere, and that American allies were united in efforts to end what intelligence officials believe is a covert nuclear weapons program inside the country.

"It has been clear for some time that Iran has been meddling in Iraq, and the Iraqis have made the concerns known to the Iranians," Mr. Johndroe said. He noted that the administration has said it would be willing to begin direct talks with Iran — which have not occurred since 1979 — if Iran agreed to suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, told lawmakers on Thursday that over the past year and a half he had come to a "much darker interpretation" of Iran's activities inside Iraq.

"I think there's a clear line of evidence that points out the Iranians want to punish the United States, hurt the United States in Iraq, tie down the United States in Iraq, so that our other options in the region, against other activities the Iranians might have, would be limited," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0119919

Mr. Rockefeller's committee is working to complete a long-delayed investigation into the misuse of intelligence about Iraq in the months before the American-led invasion.

He said that the committee was nearing completion on one part of that investigation, concerning whether the White House ignored prewar C.I.A. assessments that Iraq could disintegrate into chaos.

That report, Mr. Rockefeller said, could be released within months and was "not going to make for pleasant reading at the White House."

Mr. Rockefeller said that with Democrats now in charge of the Intelligence Committee, he expected the panel to be much more aggressive, both in investigating the use of intelligence to fashion White House policy and in subjecting secret intelligence programs to new scrutiny. He mentioned the C.I.A's network of secret prisons and the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program as likely subjects of investigations.

"We weren't able to drill down on a lot of stuff" during the years in which the Intelligence Committee was under Republican control, Mr. Rockefeller said. "Now, there's a very different attitude."

Draft Law Keeps Central Control Over Oil In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 19 — After months of tense bargaining, a cabinet-level committee has produced a draft law governing Iraq's vast oil fields that would distribute all revenues through the federal government and grant Baghdad wide powers in exploration, development and awarding major international contracts.

The draft, described Friday by several members of the committee, could still change and must be approved by the Iraqi cabinet and Parliament before it becomes law. Negotiations have veered off track in the past, and members of the political and sectarian groups with interest in the law could still object as they read it more closely.

But if approved in anything close to its present form, the law would appear to settle a longstanding debate over whether the oil industry and its revenues should be overseen by the central government or the regions dominated by Kurds in the north and Shiite Arabs in the south, where the richest oil fields are located.

The draft comes down firmly on the side of central oversight, a decision that advocates for Iraq's unity are likely to trumpet as a triumph. Because control of the oil industry touches so directly on the interests of all Iraq's warring sectarian groups, and therefore the future of the country, the proposed law has been described as the most critical piece of pending legislation.

"This will give us the basis of the unity of this country," said Ali Baban, the Iraqi planning minister and a member of the Sunni-dominated Tawafaq party who serves on the negotiating committee. "We pushed for the center in Baghdad, but we didn't neglect the Kurds and other regions," Mr. Baban said.

Negotiators said that the final weeks of wrangling on the draft focused on a federal committee that would be set up to review the oil contracts. Kurdish, and to some extent Shiite, parties wanted to maintain regional control over the contracts, while Sunni Arabs, with few oil resources on territories they dominate, insisted that the federal committee have the power to approve contracts, rather than just reviewing them and offering advice.

The negotiators appear to have finessed that issue by allowing the regions to initiate the process of tendering contracts before sending them to Baghdad for approval. To limit the powers of the committee, they also have drawn up an exacting set of criteria to govern the deliberations of the committee rather than simply relying on its independent discretion. And in a bow to the Kurds, who objected to the use of the word "approve" in describing the committee's duties, the draft law says instead that the committee may review and reject contracts that do not meet the criteria.

The draft law would also radically restructure parts of Iraq's state-controlled oil industry by giving wide independence — possibly leading to eventual privatization — to the government companies that control oil exports, the maintenance of pipelines and the operation of oil platforms in the Persian Gulf.

The law would also revive the Iraqi National Oil Company, a countrywide umbrella organization that was essentially closed by Saddam Hussein.

At the same time, the law would place substantial administrative authorities outside Baghdad by allowing any region that produces at least 150,000 barrels of oil a day to create its own operating company, according to Hussain al-Shahristani, the Iraqi oil minister and member of a powerful coalition of Shiite political parties who also serves on the negotiating committee.

Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister and the chairman of the negotiating committee, said that the precise wording of clauses could still change. He was speaking by telephone from Iraqi Kurdistan, where Mr. Salih, a Kurd, said he was still working to cement support for some provisions in the draft law.

DOJ_NMG_0119920

"This is the most important piece of legislation that Iraq will adopt, and it is not a surprise that it is taking long, tedious rounds of negotiations," Mr. Salih said. "We are close, but we have not yet closed the deal. We are making progress and need to continue."

The developments come with several additional cautions, not the least of which is that in Iraq's chaotic wartime environment, even laws that do get passed can have little impact. In one example of a document arrived at through similar negotiations, Iraq's Constitution, it remains unclear what effect many of the fastidiously negotiated clauses are having in the governance of the country.

And even though Iraq's main political and sectarian groups have been represented in the talks over the oil law, it is still possible that members of those groups could bridle as the draft is scrutinized more widely.

As a case in point, the Kurdistan regional government issued a statement on Friday criticizing an Oil Ministry spokesman for saying that the oil law had been agreed upon unanimously and put in final form.

"Although the process of drafting the oil law is nearing completion, the important annexes to the law are still pending," the statement said.

Some of those annexes will address how to deal with fields that are already producing oil under existing contracts, how to begin taking bids for drilling new wells in known fields and exploring areas where currently unknown oil fields could be located.

The committee achieved a breakthrough of sorts in December, when negotiators took a step toward central control by agreeing that all oil revenues should first go to the central government before being sent back to the regions in amounts proportional to population.

But the talks bogged down on the question of whether the committee, to be called the Federal Oil and Gas Council, would be called upon to approve contracts proposed by the regions or just review those contracts and offer advice. In its current form, the draft law avoids the word "approve" and in effect gives the committee veto power.

Whatever the language, Mr. Shahristani, the oil minister, said, the committee will in fact pass judgment on each contract, even when it originates in a proposed deal between a company and one of the oil-producing regions.

But the committee must make its decision based on specific guidelines, like a directive to maximize profits for Iraq and to keep the contracting process transparent, Mr. Shahristani said. And there are other checks and balances written into the law. For example, while the regions can propose their own deals, they will have to work with companies that have been "pre-qualified" in Baghdad.

Directives like that could still generate objections in Kurdistan, which wants as much freedom as possible to write its own contracts.

The draft law also specifies that technical experts in the Oil Ministry are to be included in the process at all levels. It is the ministry that will be called upon to write a plan for which oil fields will be developed and drilled first, and which ones will follow. The federal council would simply be called upon to endorse that plan or send it back for revisions.

The Oil Ministry would also be closely involved in developing "model contracts" to be used as templates at all levels of Iraq's oil industry.

Having an oil law will in principle make it easier to attract international companies with the resources and expertise that the country so desperately needs. Still, hovering over all the negotiations is the question of whether companies will want to do business in Iraq.

Mr. Shahristani, for one, says that because of the financial stakes, companies are already reaching out.

"The international companies keep contacting me — every week, without exception," Mr. Shahristani said. "They are all very, very keen."

Temporary "Enjoyment Marriages" In Vogue Again With Some Iraqis (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Fatima Ali was a 24-year-old divorcee with no high school diploma and no job. Shawket al-Rubae was a 34-year-old Shiite sheik with a pregnant wife who, he said, could not have sex with him.

Ali wanted someone to take care of her. Rubae wanted a companion.

They met one afternoon in May at the house he shares with his wife, in the room where he accepts visitors seeking his religious counsel. He had a proposal. Would Ali be his temporary wife? He would pay her 5,000 Iraqi dinars upfront -- about $4 -- in addition to her monthly expenses. About twice a week over the next eight months, he would summon her to a house he would rent.

The negotiations took an hour and ended with an unwritten agreement, the couple recalled. Thus began their "mutaa," or enjoyment marriage, a temporary union believed by Shiite Muslims to be sanctioned by Islamic law.

DOJ_NMG_0119921

The Shiite practice began 1,400 years ago, in what is now Iraq and other parts of the region, as a way to provide for war widows. Banned by President Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led government, it has regained popularity since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq brought the majority Shiites to power, said clerics, women's rights activists and mutaa spouses.

"During Saddam's time, there was no religious freedom," said Faris al-Shareef, a sheik who lives in the mainly Shiite city of Hilla.

Opponents of mutaa, most of them Sunni Arabs, say it is less about religious freedom and more about economic exploitation. Thousands of men are dying in the sectarian violence that has followed the invasion, leaving behind widows who must fend for themselves. Many young men are out of work and prefer temporary over permanent wives who require long-term financial commitments. In a mutaa arrangement, the woman is entitled to payment only for the duration of the marriage.

"It's a cover for prostitution," said Um Akram, a women's rights activist in Baghdad. "Some women, because they don't want to be prostitutes, they think that this is legal because it's got some kind of religious cover. But it is wrong, and they're still prostitutes from the society's point of view." Um Akram, like the mutaa spouses interviewed, asked that only parts of her name be published.

Many intellectuals consider ancient traditions such as these an obstacle to Iraq's effort to become a more modern, democratic society. In recent years, extremist religious groups have gained more power in Iraq.

"These steps are taking the whole country backwards and are definitely hurdles to the advancement of the country," said Hamdia Ahmed, a former member of parliament and a women's rights activist in Baghdad. "The only solution is to separate Islam from politics."

Shiite clerics and others who practice mutaa say such marriages are keeping young women from having unwed sex and widowed or divorced women from resorting to prostitution to make money.

They say a mutaa marriage is not much different from a traditional marriage in which the husband pays the wife's family a dowry and provides for her financially.

"It was designed as a humanitarian help for women," said Mahdi al-Shog, a Shiite cleric.

According to Shiite religious law, a mutaa relationship can last for a few minutes or several years. A man can have an unlimited number of mutaa wives and a permanent wife at the same time. A woman can have only one husband at a time, permanent or temporary. No written contract or official ceremony is required in a mutaa. When the time limit ends, the man and woman go their separate ways with none of the messiness of a regular divorce.

Although the temporary arrangements are becoming more common, they are still controversial, and people usually conduct them secretly.

Ali had a normal marriage once. It lasted only three months because the couple did not get along. Her chances for another permanent marriage, she said, were slim. Men often prefer virgins over widows and divorced women, she said.

She welcomed Rubae's proposal because he was a well-known sheik in her neighborhood. Her family was fond of him. "He was a good guy, and he was a religious man," she said.

Rubae had been in 15 mutaa marriages before. A year ago he entered into a permanent marriage with a woman who had been his mutaa wife for a day. When she became pregnant eight months ago, she suggested he take a temporary wife but asked him not to tell her if he did. She does not know about his involvement with Ali.

"As a pregnant woman, she cannot give me my needs," Rubae said. "She treats me real good and she wants me to be happy."

He chose Ali partly because her blond hair, light brown eyes and petite figure had always attracted him. "When she puts makeup on, it destroys her beauty," he said.

He also liked that she was religiously devout, and he said he wanted to keep her from a relationship outside of marriage.

Ali didn't think of him in a romantic way at first. "After we got married, I started loving him," she said.

The money he gave her helped. Her father owns a bakery but money has always been tight, so much so that she had to end her education after elementary school. But money wasn't her only reason for entering the enjoyment marriage. "I have needs just like any other woman," she said.

Both Shiite and Sunni Muslims allow men to have more than one permanent wife, but they disagree over mutaa.

Most Shiites believe that the prophet Muhammad encouraged the practice as a way to give widows an income. Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, has sanctioned it and offers advice on his Web site.

Um Ahmed, a 28-year-old woman from Najaf, lost her husband in 2005 when he was caught in the crossfire of a fight between two Shiite militias.

Soon after his death, she had her first mutaa relationship, with a man who was in a permanent marriage. He paid her 50,000 Iraqi dinars upfront -- or $38 -- and gave her money whenever she needed it during their six-month relationship.

She said she needed it often. She is a tailor and the only one in her family of 10 who works.

DOJ_NMG_0119922

"When a human being needs money, the need will make a person do anything," she said. "It's better than doing the wrong things. This is religiously accepted."

Many Sunnis believe that the practice is outdated and ripe for abuse. They also see it as more evidence of Iranian influence on Iraqi life. Mutaa is widespread in Iran's Shiite theocratic state.

"It is a big insult to women," said Ibtsam Z. Alsha, a Sunni lawyer and the head of the organization Women for the Common Good of Women.

Women's rights activists also bemoan what they say is an increase in mutaa on college campuses. Some female students do it for money. Others do it for love when their parents forbid them to marry a man from another sect.

Amani, a 22-year-old Baghdad University engineering student, said she is a Sunni but agreed to enter into a mutaa relationship with her Shiite boyfriend because her parents disapproved of him. "I hated my family because they did not allow this marriage," she said. "I did this to spite my family."

Still, she has not told them about the relationship. "If they find out, it will be my end," she said.

A woman cannot terminate a temporary marriage before it expires unless the man agrees, said four sheiks interviewed for this article.

Once the marriage is over, she has to wait at least two menstrual cycles before she can have another relationship so that paternity can be easily determined if she becomes pregnant, they said.

Most mutaa contracts stipulate that no children be produced. If a woman were to become pregnant anyway, Islamic law would require the man to support the child, the sheiks said. But the clerics disagreed over how much power they have to impose that rule.

Rubae said the man who refuses his child would be whipped or even killed. "We as the sheiks should be sure this thing will stay legitimate," he said.

Shareef, the sheik from Hilla, said some men take advantage of their rights under religious law but refuse to accept their responsibility when a child is born. In some of those cases, he said, a sharia court, using Islamic law, is not as effective as a secular court in enforcing the rules.

"I am supporting the idea of the government regulating mutaa marriages, just like the permanent marriages, so these man cannot run away," he said. "Otherwise the women are losing their rights."

Um Akram, the women's rights activist in Baghdad, said more women are asking her organization for help in getting national identification cards for children born of mutaa relationships. Parents must present a marriage certificate to obtain the identification cards, which are required by schools and employers.

Um Akram said some single women have given up their children for adoption to married couples who can use their marriage certificates to register them.

"The men just hit and run, and they don't want to have a family," she said. "The children are paying the price."

Ali and Rubae agreed not to have children. They simply wanted to enjoy each other.

On the days he could see her, he gave her flowers, perfume, clothing and a watch. They had meals together. Sometimes he could spend the whole day with her. Other times, just five or six hours.

Ali said she cried when the marriage ended early last week. "It's just like a permanent marriage," she said. "When he leaves, I become sad."

Her sorrow did not last long. Rubae said Jan. 12 that he had decided to marry her again. This time, he said, he would marry her for a year, enough time for his wife to fully recover from childbirth.

The Next Body Armor Design Gets A Show In Natick (BOS)

By Megan Woolhouse, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 20, 2007

New style is lighter and more protective

NATICK -- The Army's Natick research center showed off the next generation in body armor yesterday to Secretary of the Army Francis J. Harvey, but it's not scheduled to get on the battlefield for three years.

The new body armor hangs on a frame 2 inches from a soldier's body, a design that researchers say limits the impact and injury from a roadside bomb or mortar shell.

Sergeant Joshua Devereaux modeled the gear for Harvey, who asked what he thought of it.

"I'd take this system right now," the sergeant said. But Devereaux and other soldiers will have to wait.

The new armor remains under development and has not been funded by Congress. Harvey and General Benjamin S. Griffin, head of Army Materiel Command, held classified meetings on body armor during a one-day tour of the US Army Soldier Systems Center in Natick.

DOJ_NMG_0119923

US Representative Martin T. Meehan, a Lowell Democrat, said that while the military has improved its performance, it still needs to find ways to get the new armor to soldiers and Marines sooner, especially with the additional troops headed to Iraq.

"We're still not giving soldiers the proper body armor to protect themselves," Meehan said. "The higher-ups are always saying we do, but when you talk to people, you find out we're not getting them the best technology. I think it's embarrassing."

Such criticisms are not new. Early in the Iraq war, soldiers and their families were spending hundreds or even thousands of dollars on protective gear they said the military was not providing. In 2005, Pentagon leaders agreed to reimburse soldiers who bought their own body armor, but six months later the Pentagon reversed its stand, banning the practice. Officials said at the time that they had questions about commercial product quality and could not guarantee the equipment's effectiveness.

There have also been calls for side armor for additional protection. Last January, The New York Times reported that a secret Pentagon study found that as many as 80 percent of the Marines who have been killed in Iraq from wounds to the upper body could have survived if they had extra body armor. Such side armor has been available since 2003, the newspaper reported, but has not been routinely available to troops.

Meeting with reporters in Natick yesterday, Harvey defended the time it takes to get equipment to the field. He said the number of armored Humvees, for example, increased from hundreds to tens of thousands between 2003 and 2005.

"I come from private industry," he said. "And I don't think anybody in private industry could have responded that quickly."

The military currently issues Interceptor body armor, a vest that hangs over a soldier's torso and is made out of Kevlar and ceramic plates. When struck by mortar or gunfire, even at close range, it can absorb much of the impact.

But the plates still pack a punch, an impact that can crack a soldier's sternum, break a rib, or cause serious bruising, said Natick engineer Jean-Louis "Dutch" DeGay.

The next generation of body armor, called the Chassis, is also made of Kevlar and ceramic, but the plates are 12 percent larger, 2 to 4 pounds lighter, and hang from a shoulder frame inches from the body. The new body armor also includes two underarm panels about 8 inches long, which hang about an inch from the body and provide more protection.

"That was one of the lessons learned from the Interceptor," DeGay said.

The redesign is part of a broader effort by the Army to create the Future Force Warrior, rethinking everything from the design of helmets to T-shirts. Much of the emphasis is on how to incorporate more technology into standard uniforms, including heart rate monitors, computers, and global positioning systems.

The Natick center develops rations, clothing, and other equipment. Harvey also inspected the latest Meals Ready to Eat (such as chicken pesto with bowtie pasta) and saw a parade of new, wrinkle-free, fade-resistant uniforms. The center employs about 1,100 civilians, 750 contractors, and 150 military personnel.

Missing In Antiwar Action (WP)

By John McMillian

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Recently I finished teaching a freshman seminar at Harvard called "From Reform to Revolution: Youth Culture in the 1960s." When I built the syllabus, I asked students to ponder a single, overarching question: "How did the youth rebellion of the 1960s happen?" That is, what caused millions of young people to pierce the bland and platitudinous din that characterized the early Cold War years? Why did so many youths -- many of them affluent and college-educated -- suddenly decide that American society needed to be radically overhauled?

But as the semester progressed, my students frequently turned the question around: Why is there no rising protest movement among young people today? At the very least, they asked, shouldn't we be seeing more antiwar activity? According to a CNN poll this month, 67 percent of Americans oppose the war in Iraq, and more than half would like to see all U.S. troops home by year's end. Given that it was not until August 1968 that a majority of Americans began calling the Vietnam War a "mistake," this is a remarkable statistic. By 1968, of course, antiwar teach-ins, sit-ins and marches were commonplace on many campuses; demonstrators had violently clashed with soldiers on the steps of the Pentagon; and the Democratic National Convention had descended into chaos over the war.

Today, grass-roots antiwar activism has not been entirely absent. But one would be hard-pressed to argue that we're on the cusp of a rising protest movement. Why not?

First, the civil rights movement exerted a forceful influence on left-wing protesters in the 1960s. When African Americans bravely stood up against attack dogs, cattle prods and fire hoses, they dramatically demonstrated the power of collective action to foster social change.

Second, the draft personalized the Vietnam War not just for the hundreds of thousands of young men who were conscripted but also for their loved ones. No matter how strained the U.S. military becomes, our all-volunteer army -- widely regarded as a lethal "third rail" in American politics -- isn't going away anytime soon. As a result, too many of us enjoy the luxury of regarding the Iraq war as an abstraction. Among my 12 students, only two personally knew someone serving in Iraq. One is a medic, the other a chaplain.

DOJ_NMG_0119924

But my students suggested some other reasons today's youth seem so passive. Although this high-achieving group was hardly representative, many of them spoke plaintively about being pressured from an early age to begin building their credentials for college. "Students are expected to get perfect grades, excel in extracurricular activities, save the world and be home before dinner time," quipped one freshman. These demands seem to be common nationwide. The American Academy of Pediatrics warned this month of the physical and mental health problems that may arise from the competitive and hurried lifestyles of many youths. In such pressure-cooker environments, students are unlikely to become committed organizers.

Nor are many students likely to be socialized into antiwar activism. Every campus has its left-wing organizers, but today the gauzy idealism that circulated among teenagers in the 1960s seems almost freakishly anomalous. According to a recent U.S. Census report, 79 percent of college freshmen in 1970 said that "developing a meaningful philosophy of life" was among their goals, whereas only 36 percent said becoming wealthy was a high priority. By contrast, in 2005, 75 percent of incoming students listed "being very well off financially" among their chief aims.

Some of my students suggested that they might not even be capable of experiencing the kind of indignation and disillusionment that spurred many baby boomers toward activism. In the Vietnam era, the shameful dissembling of American politicians provoked outrage. But living in the shadow of Vietnam and Watergate, and weaned on "The Simpsons" and "The Daily Show," today's youth greet the Bush administration's spin and ever-evolving rationale for war with ironic world-weariness and bemused laughter. "The Iraq war turned out to be a hoax from the beginning? Figures!"

The students who took my seminar were a particularly serious-minded and delightful bunch. Most of them came to admire the pluck and panache of the New Leftists we studied, and they were quick to recognize how frequently the concerns of Vietnam-era protesters dovetailed with their own complaints against the Iraq war. Some even wistfully remarked that they would like to be part of a generational rebellion.

But they doubt that this is likely to happen. "Just like [in] the 1960s, we have an unjust war, a lying president, and dead American soldiers sent home everyday," one student wrote me in an e-mail. "But rather than fight the administration or demand a forum to express our unhappiness, we accept the status quo and focus on our own problems."

The writer is a lecturer in history and literature at Harvard University. He can be reached atmcmill@fas.harvard.edu.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Feds Defend Siegelman Jurors, Question E-Mails Used By Defense (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

Montgomery (AP) - Federal prosecutors defended jurors who convicted former Gov. Don Siegelman and former HealthSouth chief Richard Scrushy, claiming the latest purported e-mails from jurors were concocted and no cause for a new trial.

Acting U-S- Attorney Louis Franklin, in a brief filed late Friday, asked Montgomery Federal Judge Mark Fuller to deny the defense request to reconsider his earlier order denying a new trial.

Siegelman and Scrushy were convicted in June of bribery and conspiracy following a two month government corruption trial in federal court. Siegelman was convicted of a separate obstruction of justice charge. Both are appealing.

Arguing for a new trial, defense attorneys submitted copies of more e-mails that purportedly were sent between two jurors during the trial, alleging that the jurors deliberated improperly outside the presence of the full jury.

The defense lawyers said they received printed copies in December of the messages that were sent anonymously through the mail. The judge earlier had refused to order a new trial because of some earlier e-mail evidence submitted to the court.

Siegelman attorney David McDonald says there are six e-mails -- five between two jurors and a sixth one between one of the same jurors and a third juror. He called on the Justice Department to investigate the e-mails.

Franklin accuses the defense of continuing its --quoting here -- "rolling, anonymous attacks on the jurors" that "fall far short of the well-settled standards for the extraordinarily relief of a new trial, or indeed for any further hearing, investigation, or other action" by the court.

States Study Marketing Of Lilly Pill (NYT)

By Alex Berenson

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119925

Stepping up government investigations into Eli Lilly's marketing of its best-selling drug Zyprexa, state prosecutors in Illinois and Vermont have demanded that the company turn over information about the way it promoted the medication.

On Thursday, lawyers from the consumer protection division of the Illinois attorney general's office demanded that Lilly hand over marketing materials, e-mail messages, and other documents with information about promotion of Zyprexa. Vermont investigators issued a similar order yesterday morning.

The orders are the civil equivalents of criminal subpoenas, according to Deborah Hagan, the chief of the Illinois consumer protection division.

Illinois and Vermont are now part of a coordinated five-state civil investigation into the way Lilly promoted Zyprexa, a treatment for schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. The states are investigating whether Lilly tried to hide Zyprexa's risk of causing weight gain and other risks associated with diabetes and whether the company promoted Zyprexa for use in patients who do not have schizophrenia or bipolar disorder.

Federal laws prohibit such so-called "off label" marketing, although doctors may prescribe any drug for any disease that they believe the drug will help.

The orders on Thursday and yesterday are the first formal demands for Lilly documents from state attorneys and they indicate an escalation of the investigation, according to Ms. Hagan and Julie Brill, who is an assistant attorney general in Vermont.

"We can ask for documents; we can ask for answers to questions; and we can ask for people to come in and testify under oath," Ms. Hagan said. Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia have also recently accelerated their own investigation into Lilly's marketing of Zyprexa.

In a statement yesterday, Lilly said it would cooperate with the investigations and had done nothing wrong. "We intend to cooperate with the Illinois attorney general's civil investigative demand relating to Zyprexa," the company said. "We cannot comment further about this or other ongoing investigations."

While the investigation being led by Illinois is civil, other investigations into Lilly's conduct are both civil and criminal. Attorneys general in California and Florida may seek to recover Medicaid payments that the states made for Zyprexa. Medicaid represents a sizable percentage of the drug's overall sales because many people who take the medicine are disabled and do not work.

Any fine or cost recovery could be sizable, because Zyprexa has been a commercial success. The drug is by far Eli Lilly's largest-selling product, with sales of $4.2 billion last year and about $30 billion since its introduction in 1996. More than 20 million people have taken Zyprexa since Lilly began selling the drug.

The investigations could continue for months or possibly years, people involved in the cases say, as investigators sift through tens of thousands of documents from the company and talk to current and former employees.

Zyprexa, whose generic name is olanzapine, is a potent chemical that binds with receptors in the brain to reduce the symptoms of schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. But Zyprexa also causes severe weight gain and changes in blood sugar and cholesterol in many patients who take it.

Internal Lilly documents provided to The New York Times last month by a lawyer in Alaska who represents people with mental illness indicate that Lilly has engaged in a decade-long campaign to play down the seriousness of the side effects of Zyprexa.

Lilly did not disclose to doctors that its own data showed that 16 percent of people taking Zyprexa for a year gained more than 66 pounds, according to the documents.

The documents also indicate that the company told its drug representatives to promote Zyprexa to doctors for the treatment of conditions other than bipolar disorder or schizophrenia.

Lilly has said it did not market Zyprexa off-label and said so again in its statement yesterday.

"Lilly is committed to the highest ethical standards and to promoting our medications only for approved uses," the company said.

But its marketing materials have repeated references to promoting the drug for other uses. And some sales representatives and doctors have also said they believed that the company was marketing off-label.

Still, any criminal prosecution of the company could face a high burden. While settlements of off-label marketing cases have led to large fines, such cases so far have fizzled if they reach juries.

And as long as drug makers comply with federal requirements to provide data about their products to the Food and Drug Administration, companies have a relatively strong defense against criminal prosecution, according to lawyers who are experts in drug marketing.

H.P. Chief Defends Timing Of Stock Sale (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

The chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, Mark V. Hurd, told Congressional lawmakers that his sale of company shares on Aug. 25 was "totally unrelated" to the fact that he was questioned the same day about an ill-fated internal investigation.

The sale of 100,000 shares of Hewlett-Packard was made during a scheduled window for trading by executives, Mr. Hurd wrote in a letter dated Dec. 21 that he sent to the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, John D. Dingell, a Michigan Democrat.

On the same day the trade was completed, Mr. Hurd was interviewed by lawyers from the law firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati. The lawyers were looking into techniques used by Hewlett-Packard to identify the source of boardroom leaks.

The disclosure of the internal investigation into the source of the leaks eventually lead to resignations of the H.P. chairwoman, C. Patricia Dunn, and four other executives.

Last week, an outside investigator hired by H.P., Bryan Wagner, 29, of Littleton, Colo., pleaded guilty to identification theft and conspiracy because he posed as a reporter and a director of the company to obtain private telephone records.

Mr. Hurd's defense of his stock sale came in response to a Dec. 12 letter from Mr. Dingell and Representative Bart Stupak of Michigan, a Democrat who heads the subcommittee on oversight and investigations. They asked him about the timing of the sale.

The letter from the lawmakers noted that revelations of improperly dated stock option grants at more than 180 companies have raised questions about whether executives are cashing in or dodging bullets "while in possession of potentially damaging material facts that shareholders do not know."

Mr. Hurd, who noted that shares of Hewlett-Packard had risen significantly since the sale, said the trade was not a case of "bullet dodging."

Mr. Dingell and Mr. Stupak forwarded Mr. Hurd's letter to the Security and Exchange Commission and asked for the agency's views on the matter.

Their letter also noted that the S.E.C. was conducting an investigation into Hewlett-Packard's use of false identities to secure private phone records, a practice known as pretexting.

The two lawmakers asked the agency to inform the committee when that investigation was completed and "whether any violations of the federal securities laws have occurred."

An S.E.C. spokesman, John Heine, said the agency did not comment on Congressional correspondence. Mr. Heine said that it was against agency policy to comment on a pending investigations or to even confirm that an investigation was under way.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard fell 34 cents yesterday, to $42.

Two Are Sentenced For Fraud Involving Trading Of Stocks (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

Two former traders at the New York Stock Exchange were each sentenced yesterday to six months in prison and fined $250,000 for improper stock trading.

The two traders, Michael J. Hayward and Michael F. Stern, former managers at Van der Moolen Specialists USA, were each convicted of securities fraud at a trial in July, part of a crackdown on illegal trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Judge Sidney H. Stein of Federal District Court in Manhattan also ordered Mr. Stern, 56, and Mr. Hayward, 53, to perform 320 hours of community service.

The case stems from a two-year investigation of trading specialists, who match buy and sell orders on the exchange floor to maintain an orderly market in specific securities. Specialists buy and sell for their own accounts and their clients'. Prosecutors said some specialists were using incoming orders to trade for their own firms, making millions of dollars at the expense of clients.

"This is intentional criminal conduct," Judge Stein said. "Deterrence is very important."

The case involved trading activity from 1999 to 2003. More than half a dozen former clerks testified that Mr. Hayward and Mr. Stern directed them to trade for Van der Moolen's account for a profit. Prosecutors also accused the defendants of "interpositioning," or buying stock from one customer and selling to another to profit on the price difference, instead of matching the orders.

Of the 15 specialists charged with fraud by federal prosecutors in April 2005, three, including Mr. Stern and Mr. Hayward, were convicted at trial, and two pleaded guilty. Two other specialists were acquitted. Prosecutors dismissed charges against seven others, and one defendant remains a fugitive.

The inquiry led to charges against stock exchange specialist firms. In March 2004, seven firms agreed to pay $247 million to settle claims by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the New York Stock Exchange that they profited on trades at the expense of customers from 1999 to 2003. Among the firms were Van der Moolen, Bear Wagner Specialists, Spear Leeds & Kellogg, and Banc of America Specialist.

DOJ_NMG_0119927

Executives Get Bonuses As Firms Reprice Options (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

Aim Is to Offset Losses As Backdating Is Fixed; Mr. Deason's Windfall

The stock-options backdating scandal has prompted dozens of companies to fire top executives, take charges totaling billions of dollars against earnings and tell shareholders that they misrepresented how options were awarded.

Now, a number of companies are taking one more step: making special payments to executives or directors who received backdated options. Companies say the payments will compensate executives and directors who weren't involved in options wrongdoing, yet saw their potential profit reduced when their options were adjusted to reflect the actual dates they were issued. Several of the companies describe the payments as bonuses in regulatory filings.

But the practice has given critics more fodder for attacks on ballooning executive pay levels and special perks.

Federal authorities are scrutinizing the options practices of nearly 140 companies, and scores more companies are conducting internal reviews. A stock option typically gives its holder the right to buy a set amount of stock at some future time, at its price at the time the option was granted. The idea is to give recipients an incentive to help boost the company's share price. But a number of companies and executives changed the date on their grants to make them appear they had been granted at a time when the price was even lower, making them worth more to their holders.

Many companies that have acknowledged options-dating troubles are adopting the position that misdated options -- particularly those granted to top executives -- should be fixed without taking more out of shareholders' pockets. For instance, Sehat Sutardja, chief executive officer of microchip maker Marvell Technology Group Ltd., recently reimbursed his employer $5,355,001 for wrongly dated stock options he already had cashed in. He also agreed to forgo another $5.4 million from the value of options he still holds.

But some companies are taking another course. At KLA-Tencor Corp., for instance, Chief Executive Richard Wallace is in line for an options-related "special cash bonus," according to a securities filing.

The semiconductor-equipment maker is adjusting some of Mr. Wallace's options to carry the share prices that correspond to the dates the options were awarded, rather than the wrong ones achieved through backdating. The adjustments shaved $368,618.36 from the value of those grants. According to the filing, Mr. Wallace will have that amount paid to him in cash.

In effect, Mr. Wallace may come out ahead now that backdating has been exposed, since he is swapping unrealized, potential profit -- which could evaporate if KLA-Tencor shares fall -- for cash. By keeping the repriced options, he retains the chance to profit from them if shares rise higher.

In most cases, the companies making the payments say the executives in question aren't the ones responsible for the options troubles. KLA-Tencor has said in filings that Mr. Wallace, a 19-year company veteran who became CEO last year, had "no involvement" in the improper options granting, which it says occurred primarily from July 1997 through June 2002, a period when Mr. Wallace was a lower-level executive.

KLA-Tencor has said it intends to cancel improper options held by former CEO Kenneth Schroeder, and it will reprice -- without compensatory payment -- improper options held by Ken Levy, its former chairman. Mr. Schroeder, a longtime executive who had taken an advisory role, was fired and Mr. Levy left in the wake of KLA-Tencor backdating revelations last year.

A KLA-Tencor spokeswoman, Kyra Whitten, says the bonuses are being paid to Mr. Wallace and two other officials because the company doesn't want employees not involved with the options trouble to be "adversely impacted." She said the company hasn't yet decided how it will treat backdated options held by nonexecutive employees.

With readjusted prices, most of Mr. Wallace's options are still "in the money" -- meaning their price is below the current market price. But a portion aren't -- meaning they wouldn't be profitable if cashed out. KLA-Tencor will pay Mr. Wallace $84,332.69 for that portion, according to the company's securities filings, meaning Mr. Wallace will be making money from so-called underwater options that otherwise wouldn't yield profit for him at all. The payment is due in January 2008.

The bonuses don't sit well with shareholder activists. "To do this in the context of the outrage over the practice [of backdating] is just shocking," says Ann Yerger, the executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors, who said she was stunned when informed of the payments. "It is a sign that something remains rotten in corporate America with regard to executive pay."

Brian Foley, a compensation consultant in White Plains, N.Y., says, "it seems to me that it [reimbursement] would really stick in one's craw if it goes to the CEO, CFO, general counsel, or anyone who was in the know or should have been in the know."

Mr. Foley adds that the cash payments are "awkward," since it means people get paid for options they haven't yet -- and might never -- exercise.

DOJ_NMG_0119928

At Affiliated Computer Services Inc., a Dallas outsourcer that last year ousted two top executives because of extensive backdating, several of those who remain are in line for special bonuses to compensate them for the loss of value on their wrongly dated grants. At the top of the list: Chairman Darwin Deason, who was head of the company's compensation committee and CEO for much of time when backdating occurred. Mr. Deason, who founded ACS and holds more than $400 million of company stock, will get a payment of $650,000, according to an ACS securities filing.

Michael Buckley, a spokesman for ACS, said Mr. Deason isn't being treated differently than any other employee.

Another ACS executive, Thomas Burlin, will get just over $100,000 thanks to the repricing of a misdated option grant that is presently out-of-the-money. Mr. Burlin's options aren't worth anything at ACS's current stock price.

Meanwhile, Fossil Inc. has said seven officers of the clothing-and-accessories maker could be up for a "cash bonus" if their options were repriced. And microchip maker Broadcom Corp. said a top sales executive may be up for a "special" payment of $525,870 next January to compensate him for lost option value.

Top executives of Sonus Networks Inc., a Massachusetts-based telecommunications-equipment maker, also may have a payday coming. The company has said it likely will reprice wrongly dated options, though it hasn't yet done so. Sonus says in a filing that upon repricing, it intends to pay certain executives and directors for any lost value.

Sonus's chairman and CEO, Hassan Ahmed, has some four million options covered by the payout agreement -- including one grant of 640,000 shares that is deeply under water. It now carries a grant date of April 3, 2001, with an exercise price of $13.875.

The stock was near a sharp low on that date, meaning a new price from a date even couple of days later would shrink Mr. Ahmed's potential profit. If the option is repriced to April 5, for example, the exercise price would change to $17.875 -- and Mr. Ahmed would be in line for a special payment of $2.6 million for an option that is otherwise very far from being profitable. (Sonus shares currently trade at $7.20.)

"All this really is is acknowledging a previous commitment" to grant an option at the originally agreed price, said Charlie Gray, Sonus's general counsel. He said Sonus hasn't determined whether the April 2001 grant carried an incorrect price, and he added that the company might seek to renegotiate the payment agreement in cases where the grant is well out of the money. He said Sonus's audit committee examined the granting practices and concluded that no current member of management, including Mr. Ahmed, did anything wrong.

The recent disclosures about the repricings come in large part thanks to a provision of Section 409A of the federal tax code. Section 409A slaps a 20% excise tax, along with other penalties, on certain "discount" stock options whose exercise price is below the level of the stock on the day the option was granted. Options backdated to a day with a low price are a type of discount option. By agreeing to reprice the options, an executive is saved from the big tax bill.

Executives who already have exercised backdated options may have to pay a penalty tax. But at least one company, j2 Global Communications Inc., a Los Angeles seller of telecom services, is relieving that burden. In a filing, the company says it "anticipates resolving the matter directly with the Internal Revenue Service on behalf of all such holders, including making any payments that are required." In addition to paying its executives' taxes, j2 Global also is offering a "compensating payment" to several because of repriced options. The company says in its filing that it had used "incorrect measurement dates" for some options but that "no willful backdating took place."

The bulk of companies that have admitted to options problems aren't being nearly so generous.

Every director and executive officer of chip maker Actel Corp. of Mountain View, Calif., for instance, will have wrongly dated options repriced with no reimbursement. Stephen Hemsley, who replaced William McGuire as CEO of UnitedHealth Group Inc. after Dr. McGuire's options-fueled ouster, is surrendering about $190 million in value, though the Minnetonka, Minn., insurer said it believes Mr. Hemsley did nothing wrong. (Dr. McGuire is forfeiting $200 million.) Boston Communications Group Inc. of Bedford, Mass., said in a filing that 13 current or former executives or directors are surrendering outright a total of more than 410,000 wrongly dated options, without compensation.

Write to Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com1

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison For Abramoff Deals (WP)

By Susan Schmidt, James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Former Ohio Republican congressman Robert W. Ney was sentenced to 30 months in prison yesterday, becoming the first elected official headed for jail because of corrupt dealings with now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0119929

U.S. District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle handed down a tougher sentence than the 27 months recommended by prosecutors, telling Ney that, "as a member of Congress, you had the responsibility above all else to set an example and to uphold the law."

Ney became a symbol of the corruption that aroused voters and helped sweep into Congress a new Democratic majority promising ethics reform.

The former chairman of the House Administration Committee admitted that he performed official acts for Abramoff's lobbying clients between 2001 and 2004, receiving in exchange luxury vacation trips, skybox seats at sporting events, campaign contributions and expensive meals. Ney also admitted receiving tens of thousands of dollars in gambling chips from a businessman who sought his help with the State Department.

In the continuing investigation, Ney and seven others have pleaded guilty or have been convicted, and several are cooperating as witnesses. In addition to the government's chief witness, Abramoff, they include Ney's former chief of staff, Neil G. Volz, and two other Capitol Hill staffers who once worked for former congressman Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). All three were part of Abramoff's lobbying team.

More charges are expected. Prosecutors recently notified a former deputy secretary of the interior, J. Steven Griles, that he is a target, sources familiar with the probe said.

Ney said yesterday that he regretted his actions and was sorry for disappointing his family and voters.

"I will continue to take full responsibility for my actions and battle the demons of addiction," he said, referring to the alcohol problem for which he has sought treatment.

In a letter to the judge, Matthew D. Parker, a friend and former aide, said that Ney began to drink more heavily in 2004 when he first came under federal scrutiny. "Bob was a functioning alcoholic who could rarely make it through the day without drinking and would often begin drinking beers as early as 7:30 a.m.," Parker said. But the judge rejected his plea for leniency.

"Whether or not you've served your constituents well, on some level you have seriously betrayed the public's trust and abused your power as a congressman," Huvelle told Ney. "You have a long way to go to make amends for what's happened."

Ney pleaded guilty to one count each of conspiracy and making false statements. Huvelle agreed to a request that he serve his term in a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va., where he can receive alcohol treatment. She ordered him to pay a $6,000 fine, remain on probation for two years after his release, and participate in community service.

"Today's sentence makes it clear that our government is not for sale," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said in a statement. "Former Congressman Ney now faces 30 months in prison for abusing his position of trust as a representative of the American people. The Justice Department will continue to pursue and prosecute public officials who compromise the integrity of elected office for private benefit."

The gifts Ney accepted from Abramoff included a golfing trip to Scotland and other travel that prosecutors valued at more than $170,000. In return, Ney sought to insert four amendments to benefit Abramoff's clients into a 2002 election reform bill. Ney also admitted helping another Abramoff client win a multimillion-dollar contract to provide wireless communication services to the U.S. Capitol.

The congressman twice inserted comments in the Congressional Record aimed at bolstering a bid by Abramoff to take ownership of a Florida casino company.

Along with acknowledging his dealings with Abramoff, Ney admitted accepting free air travel, luxury accommodations and thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips in 2003 from a foreign businessman who has been identified by Ney attorney Mark H. Tuohey as Fouad al-Zayat, a high-rolling London gambler. Zayat has been described in the media as an arms middleman. He sought Ney's help in getting a visa and an exemption to a U.S. law that bars the sale of airplane parts to other countries.

Ney and his staff also offered to aid Abramoff's clients in the summer of 2003 as Ney prepared for a trip to Russia. Abramoff's team got the congressman to intervene with the U.S. Consulate in Moscow to help resolve a passport issue for the daughter of an Abramoff client. Volz, then working for Abramoff, later paid for Ney's stay at a luxury hotel in Lake George, N.Y.

Huvelle is the second judge to show little sympathy for federal officials convicted in the scandal.

Earlier this month, Magistrate Judge Alan Kay issued a stiffer sentence than the one worked out by prosecutors and defense attorneys in the case of Roger G. Stillwell. An Interior Department employee, Stillwell gave Abramoff copies of internal agency documents and accepted football tickets from him. Prosecutors had sought six months of probation, but Kay extended it to two years, saying there is "no such thing as a free lunch, particularly as provided by lobbyists."

In response to what Democrats have dubbed the "culture of corruption," the House and the Senate this month passed ethics packages that would prohibit lawmakers from accepting gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists, and force them to put their names on the "earmarks" that they tuck into bills, often benefiting lobbyists' clients. Also pending is a measure that would take away congressional pensions from members convicted of corruption, but it would not be retroactive. Ney could collect up to $33,000 a year by age 62.

DOJ_NMG_0119930

Ney Is Sentenced To 2½ Years In Abramoff Case (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Former Representative Bob Ney, the only member of Congress to admit guilt in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, was sentenced Friday to two and a half years in prison, longer than had been requested by the Justice Department.

Judge Ellen S. Huvelle of the Federal District Court in Washington said she had decided on her somewhat tougher sentence for Mr. Ney, an Ohio Republican, because his crimes involved a "significant and serious abuse of the public trust" over several years. The 30-month term she imposed was three months longer than prosecutors had asked.

"You have a long way to go to make amends," Judge Huvelle told the former lawmaker, citing tens of thousands of dollars' worth of luxury overseas travel and other gifts he accepted from Mr. Abramoff and the corrupt Republican lobbyist's partners in return for official favors.

Mr. Ney, who served six terms in the House before resigning in early November, will be able to keep his Congressional pension. Legislation now in Congress, similar to a bill for which he once voted that never became law, would deny pension payments to lawmakers convicted of crimes like bribery and fraud, but the measure would not apply retroactively.

The precise amount of Mr. Ney's pension cannot be independently known, because of a variety of factors, but it will not be as large as those of many senior members, given his relatively few years in office. Further, since he is only 52, he will not get any payments for at least four years.

In a brief statement to Judge Huvelle, Mr. Ney apologized Friday to his family and his former constituents and suggested that his crimes had resulted in part from alcoholism.

He said he was continuing to "battle with the demons of addiction that are within me," and requested through his lawyers that he serve his sentence at a federal prison in West Virginia that has a rehabilitation program.

The Justice Department had sought a 27-month term, the shortest possible under Judge Huvelle's interpretation of federal sentencing guidelines, because a plea bargain that Mr. Ney struck last year allowed the government to avoid a long trial. The judge could have sentenced him to as much as 33 months.

Judge Huvelle also ordered that Mr. Ney pay $6,000 in fines and that after serving his prison term, he be placed on two years' probation, during which he must abstain from alcohol.

In his plea bargain, Mr. Ney confessed that he had essentially sold his office to Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation and others. Mr. Abramoff himself pleaded guilty last year to conspiring to corrupt public officials, and the scandal surrounding him, which opinion polls suggest was a factor in the Democratic Congressional victory in last November's elections, has brought a number of officials under scrutiny.

Just last week a lawyer for J. Steven Griles, who formerly served the Bush administration as the No. 2 official at the Interior Department, confirmed that Mr. Griles had been notified that he was likely to be indicted in the Abramoff inquiry.

Ney Will Serve 30 Months In Abramoff Hill Bribery (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

Former Republican congressman Bob Ney was sentenced yesterday to 30 months in prison for providing political favors to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff in exchange for expensive trips, sports and concert tickets, and casino chips.

The six-term Ohio congressman and former chairman of the House Administration Committee apologized to his family and friends and told U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle he would continue "to battle the demons of addiction that are within me."

Judge Huvelle said Ney had betrayed the public's trust and his admitted problems with alcohol did not explain his illegal conduct.

"As a member of Congress, you had a responsibility to set an example," said Judge Huvelle, who recommended that Ney serve his time at a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va.

Ney, 52, who pleaded guilty in October to charges of conspiracy to defraud the public, was the first member of Congress to admit peddling influence for Abramoff, now serving a five-year, 10-month sentence for fraud in the purchase of a Miami casino cruise line.

The Justice Department's investigation into suspected influence peddling on Capitol Hill is ongoing and other members of Congress are also expected to be named. Sources close to the probe told The Washington Times that Abramoff has given prosecutors incriminating information on "dozens of members of Congress and staff."

DOJ_NMG_0119931

Ney had faced 10 years in prison but agreed to cooperate with the government in the investigation. He resigned from Congress on Nov. 2 after admitting he received expensive trips, sports tickets and casino chips from Abramoff in exchange for trying to win favorable legislative results.

Prosecutors said Ney improperly accepted trips to play golf, gamble or vacation in Scotland, New Orleans and New York between August 2002 and August 2003. The total cost of the trips by Ney and others exceeded $170,000, court papers said.

Ney's former chief of staff, Neil Volz, who left Ney's office in 2002 to join Abramoff's powerful Washington lobbying firm, pleaded guilty in May to being part of a conspiracy to provide Ney with the trip to Scotland and other pricey gifts from Abramoff.

Abramoff has been cooperating with Justice Department prosecutors for several months and was incarcerated in a federal institution in Maryland in the Miami case at the request of prosecutors to allow them to continue to interview him about their ongoing case.

The former Washington power broker also has pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion in connection with his lobbying activities in the nation's capital. He has yet to be sentenced on those charges, but prosecutors are recommending a prison term of nine years to 11 years and three months to run at the same time as his sentence in the Florida case.

When accusations first surfaced tying Ney to the Abramoff scandal, the Ohio congressman denied any involvement. He said at the time he "did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities."

Identified only as "Representative No. 1" in the initial Abramoff indictment, Ney received a "lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world-famous courses" and other benefits in exchange for support on various issues. The indictment said Abramoff arranged for a $50,000 check to be sent from Texas to pay for the Scotland trip.

Ney remains eligible to receive his congressional pension, said the National Taxpayers Union, which tracks pensions. It said Ney would be eligible for about $29,000 a year if he waits to draw it until 2016, when he turns 62.

Ney Gets 30 Months In Corruption Case (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — Former Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) on Friday became the second member of Congress to draw a prison term for his role in influence-peddling scandals that helped doom the GOP majority on Capitol Hill in November's election.

Ney, 52, was sentenced by a federal judge to 30 months in prison followed by two years of supervised release — during which he is to perform 200 hours of community service. He was also fined $6,000.

"You violated a host of laws that you, as a congressman, are sworn to enforce and uphold," U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle told Ney as she sentenced him.

Huvelle recommended that Ney enter a prison alcohol-rehabilitation program. Shortly after pleading guilty to the charges against him this fall, Ney acknowledged a drinking problem and checked into a rehabilitation program.

In brief remarks to the judge, Ney apologized to his family and constituents. "I will continue to take full responsibility, accept the consequence and battle the demons of addiction that are within me," he said.

Where Ney will serve and when he will report is to be determined later, but Huvelle recommended he be incarcerated at a minimum security federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va. Ney pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy to commit multiple offenses involving the use of his elected office for corrupt purposes and to making false statements to investigators.

Co-conspirators in Ney's case, all of whom pleaded guilty, included lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Ney's former chief of staff and two aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

Ney admitted soliciting and accepting bribes from Abramoff and his lobbying staff in return for legislative actions that benefited Abramoff clients. He performed similar illegal favors for Fouad al Zayat, a Syrian-born businessman.

Among the items Ney accepted were a golfing trip to Scotland and thousands of dollars in casino gambling chips while on overseas junkets.

"Today's sentence makes it clear that our government is not for sale," said Assistant Atty. Gen. Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's criminal division.

Ney, who served six two-year House terms, will be eligible to draw a congressional pension of about $29,000 a year if he waits until he is 62 to draw it, the National Taxpayers Union estimated.

A wide-ranging ethics bill passed by the Senate on Thursday and sent to the House would deny pensions to members of Congress convicted of felonies in the future, but even if it becomes law it would not apply to Ney.

Ney is the second former House member sentenced to prison in the last year. Former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe) is serving an eight-year sentence in a separate case for bribery and tax evasion, stemming from help he provided defense contractors in obtaining lucrative federal contracts.

DeLay, once one of Washington's most powerful Republicans, and Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigned from the House last year because of ethics controversies. DeLay is fighting charges in Texas that he violated state campaign finance laws; Foley quit after revelations that over several years he made sexual overtures to congressional pages.

Ney Gets 30-Month Sentence (RC)

RollCall.com, January 19, 2007

Judge Ellen Huvelle sentenced former Ohio Rep. Bob Ney (R) to serve 30 months in prison and recommended that he be assigned to a residential alcohol substance abuse program in Morgantown, W.Va.

The judge's sentence was three months longer than recommended by prosecutors after they reached a plea agreement with Ney on charges of conspiracy and making false statements last October.

In imposing the 30-month sentence, the U.S. district judge cited Ney's four-year "abuse of the public trust" in accepting gifts and campaign contributions connected to the scandal surrounding then-lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

She said Ney would face two years of "supervised release" for each count of which he was convicted and would be required to pay a $6,000 fine during the first two years of his release.

Ney will be subjected to alcohol and drug tests during his parole and must participate in an alcohol treatment program. He must also perform 100 hours of community service during every two years he remains on parole.

A contrite Ney accepted responsibility for his crimes and hugged supporters after his sentencing.

"Moving forward, I will continue to take full responsibility for my actions and to battle the demons of addiction," he told the court. "Although my life and career have changed forever, I hope to continue my work helping and serving my community very soon."

Latest Abramoff Casualty Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison (HILL)

By By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, January 19, 2007

Ex-Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) was sentenced to 30 months in prison Friday, three months longer than the government recommendation, for his role in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle said the sentence was intended to reflect the gravity of the crimes and violation of the public trust.

"Constituents and the public trusted to you represent them," she said, adding that Ney "seriously abused" his position. Huvelle agreed to allow Ney to continue to seek treatment for alcohol addiction while he is incarcerated in Morgantown, W.Va.

Prior to hearing his sentence Ney, dressed in a gray suit and blue-and-yellow-striped tie, apologized to his constituents and his family for abusing his position as a member of Congress.

"I stand here sorrowful … I will no longer be able to serve the public," Ney said. "I hope and pray that with time our family will recover."

Huvelle also imposed a $6,000 fine on Ney to be paid over his two-year probationary period.

A request by Ney's lawyer, Mark H. Tuohey, to extend the time period due to Ney's precarious financial situation was denied by Huvelle.

Ney pleaded guilty to charges on conspiracy and bribery in October and resigned from Congress in November.

Gifts that Ney received ranged from a trip to Scotland to thousands of dollars in gambling chips.

Sizing Up The Libby CIA-Leak Trial (WSJ)

By Nick Timiraos

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

Opening arguments in the trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the ex-chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, who is accused of lying to a grand jury in the government's leak investigation, get started next week.

The trial promises to be a high-profile event, with potential witnesses ranging from the vice president to television journalist Tim Russert. But it also represents a bizarre twist in a case that has tested the limits of laws to protect reporters and their sources and could spotlight how key players in the Bush administration defended the case for war in Iraq.

Here's a closer look at some of the issues:

What prompted the CIA-leak investigation? In 2002, the Central Intelligence Agency sent former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson to investigate claims that Iraq was seeking nuclear-weapons materials from Niger. He found no basis for the claims and said his advice was ignored. Mr. Wilson argued in an op-ed piece in the New York Times that the Bush administration had manipulated intelligence to sell the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0119933

Soon after, syndicated columnist Robert Novak reported that Mr. Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a Central Intelligence Agency agent and that she had arranged for him to get the job. The Justice Department assigned prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald to investigate whether Ms. Plame's identity as a covert CIA officer was blown by Mr. Novak's sources in retaliation for her husband's criticism.

Is the disclosure of an agent's identity a crime? In certain cases, yes. Under the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, investigators must prove that the agent's name was intentionally revealed by someone who knew that the agent was undercover and that the agent's identity was not previously disclosed. The law has rarely been used to prosecute anyone.

Was Mr. Libby responsible for the leak? It appears he wasn't. Prosecutors claim that Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Plame with at least three reporters. But last September, Richard Armitage, former deputy secretary of state, acknowledged publicly that he was the original source who told Mr. Novak that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Mr. Fitzgerald apparently knew that Mr. Armitage was the original source throughout his two-year investigation. Mr. Armitage was not charged with a crime because he didn't know Ms. Plame was a covert operative.

So why is Mr. Libby being prosecuted? The government claims Mr. Libby lied when he told investigators he learned of Ms. Plame's identity from Mr. Russert, Washington bureau chief of NBC News. The government alleges Mr. Libby learned of Ms. Plame's identity from his boss, the vice president.

The prosecution is expected to call the two reporters with whom Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Plame's role as a CIA agent. But because perjury cases require proof that the defendant lied on purpose, simply proving that he told a falsehood won't be enough for the government. They will try to show that Ms. Plame's role had Mr. Libby's attention with testimony from government officials who discussed the matter with the former aide.

What is Mr. Libby's defense? The defense says there was no orchestrated campaign to retaliate against Mr. Wilson. Instead, lawyers will argue that Mr. Libby got his facts wrong because he was facing weighty national security matters and didn't remember the details of every conversation that he had with every reporter.

If the vice president testifies, he may be asked about the copy of Mr. Wilson's op-ed that he gave to Mr. Libby with handwritten notes that questioned the rationale for Mr. Wilson's trip. Mr. Cheney wrote, "Do we ordinarily send people out pro bono to work for us? Or did his wife send him on a junket?"

What lasting effect could the case have on the media? The case initially alarmed press advocates because reporters were forced to reveal their sources during the investigation, fueling concerns that sources would be less willing to speak candidly with reporters in the future. But the prospect of both the prosecution and defense using reporters as key witnesses during the trial has fueled concerns that the public might see reporters as less independent, further eroding press credibility.

What is the possible penalty? If convicted on all five counts, Mr. Libby faces a maximum fine of $1.25 million and 30 years in jail, though his sentence would likely be less because he has no criminal record. Mr. Libby's supporters, who say he is an honest man subjected to a prosecutorial witch-hunt, might lobby the president for a pardon.

Fight Averted, For Now, Over U.S. Reporter's Notes In CIA Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Defense attorneys are withdrawing, for now, their request to use NBC News reporter Andrea Mitchell's notes during the CIA leak case, heading off a potential fight leading to the trial of former White House aide I. Lewis Libby.

A federal judge said Friday that he probably would release Mitchell's notes to attorneys for Libby and scheduled a hearing on the issue Monday. Within hours, network spokeswoman Barbara Levin said the request for the notes had been withdrawn and the hearing canceled.

Mitchell's notes on her conversation with former vice presidential chief of staff Libby have been under subpoena for nearly a year, but U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton had ruled that because Mitchell was unlikely to testify at trial, her notes would not be released.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding outed CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame's identity was revealed shortly after her husband, Joseph Wilson, criticized the in a newspaper article the administration's use of false intelligence to ease the march to war in Iraq.

Attorneys for Libby, former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, said in court Friday they planned to call Mitchell as a defense witness during the perjury and obstruction trial.

Opening arguments are scheduled for Tuesday.

Walton reversed course and ordered attorneys for NBC to be in court Monday to discuss the notes. He said: "I don't see how I can deprive the defense of it."

Though the hearing was canceled, the notes remain under subpoena, and defense attorneys could raise the issue again during the four- to six-week trial.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding Plame, whose husband, former ambassador Wilson, emerged in 2003 as a vocal critic of the Bush administration's prewar intelligence use.

Libby told authorities that he learned Plame's identity from reporters, but prosecutors say Libby learned it during a series of high-level conversations about how to rebut Wilson's criticisms.

Mitchell's testimony and notes could help Libby's case by describing an atmosphere of tension and finger-pointing within the Bush administration regarding intelligence issues on Iraq. That could bolster Libby's claims about a hectic and tumultuous climate in which he could not accurately remember certain conversations.

The Libby Injustice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

Opening arguments begin next week in the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and, regardless of the verdict, it is our firm belief that this is a case that should never have been brought. While a tragedy for Mr. Libby and his family in personal terms, the case is among the most egregious examples we can recall of criminalizing political differences.

In the most important sense, this is a case without a crime. Yes, Mr. Libby is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice, which are serious offenses. But this seasoned, disciplined lawyer is accused of lying to cover up a leak he didn't commit, and which has long been proven not to have been a crime at all. One early bit of drama will be to see what motive prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald comes up with to explain why Mr. Libby would lie to the FBI and a grand jury when he had essentially nothing to hide.

All the more so because one of the mysteries of this case is Mr. Fitzgerald himself. He made his reputation as a tough prosecutor in Chicago who was nonetheless scrupulous about the law. But in this case, he knew from the very first day of his appointment in December 2003 that neither Mr. Libby nor the Vice President's office had orchestrated the leak of Valerie Plame's name to columnist Robert Novak.

He also knew -- based on earlier FBI interviews -- that the real leaker was Richard Armitage, the No. 2 man at the State Department and if anything a policy rival of Mr. Libby's inside the Bush Administration. The original theory of the case -- that the leak was a political vendetta against Ms. Plame's husband, Joe Wilson -- was thus demonstrably false from the start of his probe. The "crime," in short, had been solved.

Yet Mr. Fitzgerald has persisted for three long years, and only six weeks into his investigation sought and received an expansion of his authority in order to go after a senior administration official -- Mr. Libby -- who had had nothing to do with the leak Mr. Fitzgerald was investigating. And he pursued the case even to the extent of creating a Constitutional showdown over reporters and their sources. Why? * * *

As it happens, Messrs. Fitzgerald and Libby had crossed legal paths before. Before he joined the Bush Administration, Mr. Libby had, for a number of years in the 1980s and 1990s, been a lawyer for Marc Rich. Mr. Rich is the oil trader and financier who fled to Switzerland in 1983, just ahead of his indictment for tax-evasion by the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York. Bill Clinton pardoned Mr. Rich in 2001, and so the feds never did get their man. The pardon so infuriated Justice lawyers who had worked on the case that the Southern District promptly launched an investigation into whether the pardon had been "proper." One former prosecutor we spoke to described the Rich case as "the single most rancorous case in the history of the Southern District."

Two of the prosecutors who worked on the Rich case over the years were none other than Mr. Fitzgerald and James Comey, who while Deputy Attorney General appointed Mr. Fitzgerald to investigate the Plame leak. Mr. Fitzgerald worked in the Southern District for five years starting in 1988, at the same time that Mr. Libby was developing a legal theory of Mr. Rich's innocence in a bid to get the charges dropped. The prosecutors never did accept the argument, but Leonard Garment, who brought Mr. Libby onto the case in 1985, says that he believes Mr. Libby's legal work helped set the stage for Mr. Rich's eventual pardon.

This was all long ago, it's true. But Mr. Libby and Mr. Comey tangled more recently as well. In 2004, as Mr. Fitzgerald was gearing up his investigation, Mr. Libby was the Administration's point man in trying to get Justice to sign off on the NSA wiretapping program. In early 2004, Mr. Comey was acting Attorney General while John Ashcroft recovered from gall bladder surgery, and Mr. Comey reportedly refused to give the NSA program the greenlight, prompting the White House to seek out Mr. Ashcroft in the hospital in a bid to circumvent Mr. Comey.

Motive is a difficult thing to gauge. We don't know whether this long personal history played any role either in Mr. Fitzgerald's single-minded pursuit of Mr. Libby, or in Mr. Comey's decision to grant the prosecutor plenary power even though the central mystery of the case had already been resolved. But connecting the dots linking the three men at the heart of this case seems worth doing given the puzzling nature of this prosecution.

DOJ_NMG_0119935

As for the trial itself, Mr. Fitzgerald will have to prove not only that Mr. Libby knowingly made false statements but that they served some larger purpose of obstructing justice. The evidence so far is thin. At a mega-press conference announcing his indictment, the prosecutor spoke piously about the need to indict officials who throw "sand . . . in the eyes" of the "umpire." But we know Mr. Libby had nothing to cover up, and his plausible defense will be in part that his recollections simply differed from those of the journalists he spoke with about Mr. and Mrs. Wilson.

At the same press event, Mr. Fitzgerald also made comments suggesting he bought into Joe Wilson's conspiratorial theory of the case -- remarks that now look both disingenuous and prejudicial to Mr. Libby. And this week, trial judge Reggie Walton seemed to acknowledge the extensive negative pretrial publicity about Mr. Libby by granting his lawyers their request for considerable leeway in questioning jurors during voir dire. Mr. Fitzgerald's main advantage may be a Washington, D.C., jury pool inclined to dislike anyone associated with the Bush Administration.

This case is really about a political fight over the Iraq War. In talking to reporters, Mr. Libby was doing his job and attempting to defend Administration policy against political attacks. He had no evident reason to lie to the grand jury. Once Mr. Armitage had fessed up as the leaker in October 2003, a wiser prosecutor than Mr. Fitzgerald would have realized he had entered the realm of politics and gone home.

FBI Details Threat From Gangs In Military (CHIST)

By Frank Main, Crime Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, January 20, 2007

Says members of Illinois biker gangs in Iraq

Members of the Hells Angels, including an Army lieutenant colonel from Illinois, have served the U.S. military in Iraq. Another Iraq war veteran, a Marine who belongs to the Maniac Latin Disciples street gang, is charged with shooting three teens in Aurora.

They are examples of growing gang activity in the military, which "poses a threat to law enforcement officials and national security," according to a new FBI report obtained by the Sun-Times.

"The military enlistment of gang members could ultimately lead to the worldwide expansion of U.S.-based gangs," the report warned.

The report by the FBI's National Gang Intelligence Center said gang members sneak into the military by failing to report criminal convictions or using fake documents. Some have sealed juvenile records unavailable to recruiters. And most of the recruiters are not properly trained to recognize gang affiliation, the report said.

"Military recruiters under pressure to meet recruiting goals have engaged in criminal violations such as overly aggressive recruiting tactics and document falsification," said the report.

While gang members constitute a "fraction" of the military, the extent of the problem is difficult to gauge because the military is not required to provide the FBI with statistics on crime at military posts. Still, the FBI has documented disturbing examples of how gang members get into the military -- and the crimes they commit in the service.

In 2005, for instance, a Latin Kings member was allegedly recruited into the Army at a Brooklyn, N.Y., courthouse while awaiting trial for assaulting a New York police officer with a razor. He was reportedly instructed by the recruiter to conceal his gang affiliation, the report said.

Reportedly steal weaponsMany members of the Illinois-based Outlaw Motorcycle Gang and the Hells Angels have military experience and have been known to recruit soldiers due to their explosives and firearms experience, the report said. One of the most violent gangs -- the MS-13 -- is increasing its presence on or near U.S. military installations, the FBI said.

Some gang members use their military positions to steal weapons and other equipment.

Last year, an Army soldier who is a gang member identified 60 to 70 gang-affiliated military personnel in his unit allegedly involved in the theft and sale of military weapons and supplies, the report said. The soldier said many of them were sergeants in charge of ammunition and grenade distribution and that commanders were aware of their actions.

Training can be deadlyAnd earlier this month, two Illinois National Guard soldiers were charged with selling stolen body armor, night-vision goggles and other military equipment to undercover federal agents. A third, unnamed soldier may have intended to supply Chicago gangs with body armor he stole in Iraq, according to a conversation secretly recorded by the FBI.

Gang members in the military also are applying their battle training to the streets when they return home, the FBI warned. One Iraq veteran in California apparently relied on his Marine training in a shootout that killed a police officer and wounded another.

The Sun-Times began investigating gangs in the military last year after obtaining photos of gang graffiti on military equipment and buildings in Iraq. Some of the graffiti referred to Chicago-based gangs such as the Black Disciples and Latin Kings.

DOJ_NMG_0119936

fmain@suntimes.com

Ex-FBI Agent Guilty Of Assault (PROJO)

By Katie Mulvaney, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 20, 2007

After a three-day trial in Bridgeport, Conn., a federal jury found a retired FBI special agent guilty of assaulting an officer, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

U.S. marshals, working with the Rhode Island Sheriffs Department and Stratford, Conn., police, arrested Gary L. John after a struggle in Stratford, on Dec. 8, 2005, concluding a two-month probe into his whereabouts, according to Charles J. Wyant, of the U.S. Marshals in Rhode Island.

John, formerly of 110 Post Rd., Westerly, was wanted in Rhode Island for allegedly violating protective and no-contact orders barring him from contacting his ex-wife and for failing to appear in court. Superior Court Judge Melanie Thunberg issued a warrant for his arrest after he showed up at his ex-wife's workplace on Sept. 1, 2005, court records show.

The marshals received a tip that John was living with a woman in Stratford and supporting himself through odd jobs, such as splitting wood and driving a limousine, Wyant said.

John, 58, tried to punch a deputy marshal attempting to place him in custody, court records show. He was arrested after a struggle and charged with felony assault on a federal marshal, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Jurors in U.S. District Court in Connecticut deliberated three hours before finding John guilty on Thursday. He faces up to eight years in prison and a $250,000 fine at his sentencing before U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall on April 10, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

John has been held since his arrest after the court found that he posed a flight risk and a danger to his ex-wife and the community, said Thomas Carson, of the U.S. Attorney's office in Connecticut.

An FBI agent for 29 years, John has been in and out of jail since he separated from his wife in 2001. He has faced an array of charges, ranging from domestic disorderly conduct to repeatedly violating no-contact orders by harassing his ex-wife.

John worked as a surveillance specialist in the FBI's Boston field office until 2002.

Retired FBI Agent Convicted In Assault (CTPOST)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

Connecticut Post, January 20, 2007

BRIDGEPORT — A federal jury convicted a retired FBI agent of assaulting a deputy U.S. marshal during a Dec. 8, 2005, arrest in Stratford.

The jury took only three hours Thursday to deliberate the fate of retired FBI Special Agent Gary John before advising U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall that they had found him guilty.

John, 58, formerly of Piute Lane in Stratford's Oronoque Village, faces up to eight years in prison when he is sentenced April 10. He has been detained without bond since the arrest.

The verdict ended a two-day trial in which Deputy U.S. Marshal James Masterson accused John of failing to obey his commands and then throwing "roundhouse" punches while being placed under arrest. At the time, Rhode Island federal marshals had a warrant for John's arrest for violating a "no-contact" order obtained by his ex-wife.

Masterson, a former Milford police officer, said John repeatedly refused to show his hands, lie down on the ground and stay back after being confronted in the driveway of the home. Assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Kaplan played a sometimes frantic 911 call made by Masterson who was requesting backup at the arrest site.

John accused federal marshals of overreacting when one struck him with a metallic object and others piled on, punched him and ground his face into an ice-covered driveway.

He claimed he never punched Masterson but did reach out and grab someone's arms as he was being pushed to the ground.

John is 6 feet tall and 165 pounds, while Masterson, 37, has a muscular 5-foot, 9-inch, 200-pound frame.

John was represented by Robert Mann of Rhode Island. It is expected that he will file a civil suit claiming excessive force.

Former FBI Agent Wanted In Rhode Island Convicted Of Assault (AP)

AP, January 20, 2007

UNDATED (AP) -- A former FBI agent wanted for violating restraining orders in Rhode Island is convicted of assaulting a deputy marshal.

Gary John was arrested in Stratford in 2005. Prosecutors say he tried to punch a U.S. deputy marshal during his arrest.

John formerly lived in Westerly and was wanted in Rhode Island for failing to appear in court and violating restraining orders by appearing at his ex-wife's workplace. He faces up to eight years in prison and a 250,000 dollar fine for the assault charge. A sentencing hearing is set for April tenth.

Solid Data Scarce For Child Abductions (AP)

By David Crary, Ap National Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

NEW YORK -- Few crimes rivet the public as much as the abduction of a child and yet -- unlike murder, rape or even car theft -- there are no authoritative national statistics on the offense.

Kidnapping is not among the crimes covered by the FBI's annual uniform crime reports, and the last major federal study of child abductions used data from 1999, leaving experts to only guess the trends since then even as concern mounts about a possible surge of abductions by sexual predators using the Internet.

The Justice Department says the most recent nationwide data on child abductions is National Incidence Studies of Missing, Abducted, Runaway and Throwaway Children, a report issued in 2002 and based on survey data mostly collected in 1999.

That report estimated that 58,200 children annually are victims of non-family abductions, with the vast majority held briefly for any number of reasons -- a dispute between girlfriend and boyfriend, for instance -- and returned safely, often without the filing of a police report.

The report estimated that there were 115 cases in 1999 of "stereotypical kidnappings" -- in which children were taken by non-family members for long periods, put up for ransom or killed by their abductors. In 40 percent of these cases, the child was killed.

However, the report said the actual number of stereotypical kidnappings could be anywhere from 60 to 170, and there has been no comprehensive federal effort since then to update the statistic.

University of New Hampshire sociologist David Finkelhor, a co-author of the 2002 report, believes the number of stereotypical kidnappings is stable or declining. But he remains dismayed at the lack of firm statistics to corroborate his suppositions and allay the fears of parents.

"You only have to think about a comparable situation in public health," he said. "If there were some disease killing even a few hundred kids a year, and parents were anxious, you know the Centers for Disease Control would have good statistics."

The Justice Department, using partial national statistics, estimated last year that 3,400 kidnappings of juveniles by strangers were reported to police in 2001. These would include many short-lasting abductions that did not rise to the level of the menacing "stereotypical kidnappings."

Police departments also are required to file prompt reports on any missing child, but these reports often do not provide details on whether an abduction might be involved.

Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said his organization is working with the Justice Department to develop a method for compiling annual data on missing and abducted children.

Like Finkelhor, Allen surmises that worst-case "stereotypical kidnappings" have declined in recent years, but he worries about a possible increase as more sexual predators use the Internet to contact youthful targets.

"Why we're pushing the Justice Department to provide annualized estimates is so we have the kind of data to track progress and variations from year to year," he said.

Allen expressed hope that a model of the new data-gathering system could be in place later this year.

CIVIL LAW:

High Court To Revisit Campaign Finance Law (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to revisit the landmark 2002 legislation overhauling the nation's campaign finance laws, moving to settle the role of campaign spending by corporations, unions and special interest groups in time for the 2008 presidential primaries.

It would be the first time the court has reviewed the McCain-Feingold law of 2002 since justices ruled 5 to 4 three years ago that the act was constitutional. Since then, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was in the majority, has been replaced by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0119938

At issue in the case is the question of whether so-called issue advocacy ads paid for by the general funds of special interest groups and broadcast in the period before a federal election may mention specific candidates. A three-judge panel in Washington last month overturned that prohibition, which is one of the key provisions of the law known formally as the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act.

"The stakes are enormous," said Michael E. Toner, a Federal Election Commission member who served on President Bush's campaign in 2000. "We're watching this case very closely."

The specific rule against naming a candidate -- 30 days before a primary and 60 days before a general election -- is one of the bright lines in the act governing the role special interest groups may play in the election and, to its supporters, one of the act's virtues.

"One of the advantages of McCain-Feingold is that it's clear," said Trevor Potter, an adviser to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the law's namesake, and president of the Campaign Legal Center.

If the justices uphold the lower-court ruling, Potter predicts additional disputes in the courts and at the FEC about when an independent group's commercial would be considered legitimate issue advocacy, and when it would be considered an attempt to influence the outcome of an election.

"You will have endless challenges to see where the line should be," he said.

But James Bopp Jr., the Indiana attorney and Republican National Committee member who brought the case on behalf of Wisconsin Right to Life, said the current prohibition cracks down on groups that are merely intending to influence lawmakers in the manner encouraged by the First Amendment.

The right to petition the government, Bopp said, should not be limited simply because it makes campaign finance laws too complicated.

"The court is perfectly capable of drawing a sensible and reasonable line between grass-roots lobbying and influencing an election," Bopp said.

The justices moved quickly to take the case, which they will hear in April, in time for a ruling by the end of the court's summer term. It will make for unusual political pairings.

The Republican National Committee has been one of the strongest critics of the law, although McCain is one of his party's leading presidential contenders and a party to the appeal of the lower court's decision. The Bush administration is defending the Federal Election Commission against the Wisconsin antiabortion group, which has been a strong supporter of the president.

And Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) is not only one of the sponsors of the law but also the subject of the ads in question.

The 2004 radio ads put out by Wisconsin Right to Life said that a group of senators in Washington was keeping Bush's judicial nominees from getting a vote in the Senate and asked listeners to tell Feingold and the state's other senator, Herb Kohl (D), not to participate. "Contact Sens. Feingold and Kohl and tell them to oppose the filibuster," the announcer said.

But because Feingold was up for reelection, the FEC said that the group could not run the ads in the closing weeks of the election.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, joined by U.S. Court of Appeals Judge David B. Sentelle, said the proper way to evaluate the ads was to look simply at what they said. They found that the ads neither endorsed nor opposed Feingold, did not mention his upcoming election and did not tell listeners whether the senator had been a part of the filibuster. They agreed with the antiabortion group's contention that the ads were "textbook" examples of issue ads.

But dissenting District Judge Richard W. Roberts said courts must view the ads in context. In this case, Wisconsin Right to Life was a longtime opponent of Feingold and had made his defeat one of its priorities. Although the language in the ad was neutral, it referred listeners to a Web site that contained highly critical reviews of the senator.

And Roberts said there could be credence to the defendants' argument that the ads were a "sham" designed to test McCain-Feingold rather than to argue for a point of view. There were no filibusters at the time that the group wanted to run the ads, and the group could have paid for them through a political action committee, upon which the restrictions would not apply.

Richard L. Hasen, an election law expert at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said the Supreme Court challenge is "going to be a prime opportunity for opponents of campaign regulations to make some headway in watering down the standards."

He said the decision by the two-member majority of the lower court that context should not be considered in evaluating the ads is "opposite what the majority of the Supreme Court found" when upholding McCain-Feingold three years ago.

What could make the outcome different this time, he said, is "simply the replacement of Justice O'Connor with Justice Alito."

The consolidated case is Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life (06-969) and McCain v. Wisconsin Right to Life (06-970).

Justices Revisit Campaign Finance Issue (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0119939

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — The Supreme Court stepped back into the debate over campaign finance regulation on Friday, announcing an expedited review of a ruling last month that substantially narrowed the application of a major provision of the McCain-Feingold federal campaign law.

At issue is a section of the 2002 statute that imposes a blackout period before elections on television advertisements that meet the law's definition of "electioneering communications" and that are paid for from the general treasuries of corporations or labor unions.

The question is how to reconcile that provision with the free-speech rights of groups that say they are engaged in grass-roots lobbying, the sort of genuine issue advertising the First Amendment protects.

The court heard the same case a year ago, shortly before Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. took his seat last January. Faced with the prospect of a 4-to-4 deadlock in the absence of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was days away from retirement and would not have been able to participate in a decision, the court then sent the case back to the lower court.

While that move postponed the court's encounter with the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act, as the McCain-Feingold law is formally known, an eventual encounter was inevitable because Congress, in passing the law, made Supreme Court review mandatory.

The plaintiff is a Wisconsin anti-abortion group that in 2004 sought to run three television commercials criticizing a Senate filibuster against President Bush's judicial nominees and urging viewers to ask the state's two senators to permit the nominations to come to a vote.

One of the senators, Russell D. Feingold, was up for re-election; the other, Herb Kohl, was not. The advertisements said nothing about voting for or against either man. Advised by the Federal Election Commission that the television spots would be barred as electioneering communications during the 60 days before the November election, the group, Wisconsin Right to Life Inc., filed a lawsuit intended to test the provision's constitutionality.

A special three-judge Federal District Court here at first turned back the challenge under the Supreme Court's ruling in 2003, which by a 5-to-4 vote upheld all major provisions of the McCain-Feingold law against a variety of challenges. But in their ruling last January, which was unanimous and unsigned, the justices said the district court had misinterpreted the 2003 decision as a blanket endorsement of the law.

The court said it had not meant to foreclose a finding that the electioneering-communication provision, which imposes a blackout 30 days before a primary and 60 days before a general election, might be found unconstitutional in particular applications.

That was a surprise to the Federal Election Commission and many election lawyers, who had regarded the constitutionality of the provision as settled. In a 2-to-1 decision issued on Dec. 21, the district court ruled that the statute's application to the Wisconsin Right to Life television spots would indeed be unconstitutional.

Both the Federal Election Commission and several Congressional supporters of the law, including Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who was one of the chief sponsors, filed expedited appeals from that ruling. The federal agency said the district court's decision was based on a "seriously flawed" analysis that would undermine "a critical component of the campaign-finance reform that Congress enacted" and that the Supreme Court had declared to be constitutional on its face.

The election commission did suggest that the case might now be moot, a finding that the Supreme Court is free to make after it hears the argument in late April. Federal courts can retain jurisdiction over disputes that they deem moot but "capable of repetition," a plausible description of the Wisconsin Right to Life case because the group's lawyer, James Bopp Jr., has brought a number of such cases and is committed to continuing his challenge.

"Politicians should not be able to use campaign finance laws like McCain-Feingold to prohibit citizen groups from engaging in grass-roots lobbying," Mr. Bopp said.

The basic argument in the cases — Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life Inc., No. 06-969; and McCain v. Wisconsin Right to Life Inc., No. 06-970 — is over how the district court analyzed the advertisements in finding that they were genuine issue ads rather than thinly veiled campaign commercials.

The majority said that because judges "should not be in the business of trying to read any speaker's mind," courts should limit their analysis to "language within the four corners" of a commercial. Noting that the ads did not "promote, attack, support or oppose" any candidate, the court said it would accept Wisconsin Right to Life's assertion that the ads were not "intended to influence the voters' decisions" and so were not subject to the blackout period.

The dissenting judge said that the only way to separate a genuine issue ad from a "sham" was to examine the advertisement's "purpose and effect" in its full context.

DOJ_NMG_0119940

Justice Alito may well be in a position to determine the outcome, or perhaps even the course of federal campaign regulation if he departs from Justice O'Connor's across-the-board support of the McCain-Feingold law. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. is not in that position, because his predecessor, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, was one of the four dissenters from the court's 2003 decision upholding the law.

Among other cases the court accepted on Friday was a challenge by two governments, those of India and Mongolia, to New York City's effort to collect property taxes on the portions of their United Nations missions that are used to house staff members.

The question in the case — Permanent Mission of India v. New York, No. 06-134 — is whether the city's suit to collect the taxes, some $18 million dating from 1981, should have been barred by sovereign immunity.

High Court To Review Campaign Finance Law (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court set the stage Friday for striking down a part of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law that bars the broadcast of corporate and union-funded ads just prior to an election.

Three years ago, the justices narrowly upheld the McCain-Feingold Act of 2002 and its rule against corporate-funded broadcast ads, which was adopted to prevent powerful interests from using their money to sway elections in the final weeks of a campaign. The now-retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor cast a deciding vote in favor of the law.

On Friday, the justices announced they would hear a free-speech challenge to the rule in April, this time before a court that is likely to be more skeptical of laws that restrict election-related spending.

Although advocates of campaign funding laws say they are trying to limit the influence of big money in politics, critics say the measures unconstitutionally restrict people and groups from voicing their political views.

The critics include Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Anthony M. Kennedy. They voted to strike down the McCain-Feingold Act as unconstitutional. If Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. join them, they will have a majority to limit or strike the rule against corporate-funded broadcast ads.

That would open the door to more special interest ads on radio and TV prior to the 2008 primary and general elections.

For decades, corporations and unions have not been allowed to use their money to fund candidates or their campaigns. However, nothing prevents individuals, including corporate and union officers, from giving $2,000 to a candidate for federal office. They also may use their money to join with others to pay for ads for or against a candidate.

The McCain-Feingold Act specifically bans corporate and union-funded ads that mention a candidate for federal office within 30 days of the primary election or within 60 days of the general election. In upholding this rule in principle, the high court agreed with Congress that these ads are intended to influence an election, and therefore, they may be restricted because they amount to use of corporate and union money to sway an election.

But free-speech advocates have been eager to get a new challenge before the high court.

James Bopp Jr., an Indiana lawyer who represents free-speech and anti-abortion causes, brought a test case on behalf of the nonprofit Wisconsin Right to Life Inc. He proposed to run radio ads during the summer of 2004 that criticized Democratic Sens. Russell D. Feingold and Herb Kohl, both of Wisconsin, for refusing to approve all of President Bush's pending judicial nominees. Feingold, a co-sponsor of the campaign funding law, was then seeking reelection.

The Federal Election Commission said these ads would be illegal. Bopp sued, citing the 1st Amendment and arguing these ads amounted to "grassroots lobbying" of a federal office holders, not an election ad. In December, a three-judge panel in Washington agreed with Bopp and said "genuine issue ads" are protected as free speech.

Supporters of the campaign-funding law, including Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), fear that if the ruling is upheld, it would open a large loophole. Though Bopp represents a small, nonprofit group, large corporate interests could broadcast ads that fault candidates for their positions on important issues.

Bopp argues that the restrictions on campaign spending allow lawmakers to shield themselves from criticism. "Politicians should not be able to use campaign finance laws, like McCain-Feingold, to prohibit citizen groups from engaging in grass roots lobbying," he said Friday.

The justices voted to hear two appeals raising the same basic issue. They are Federal Elections Commission vs. Wisconsin Right to Life and McCain vs. Wisconsin Right to Life. The cases will be decided by late June.

High Court To Referee Campaign Finance Case (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119941

The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to referee a challenge to limits on pre-election ads, a key provision of the landmark campaign finance law that the court upheld in 2003.

The justices will hear an appeal of a lower court decision that relaxed restrictions on mentioning candidates by name in issue ads run by corporations, labor unions and other special interest groups near the climax of a campaign.

The court will hear the case in April and almost certainly decide it by July, well before the first presidential voting takes place in the Iowa caucuses next January.

Issue ads are those that do not purport to influence an election, but rather focus attention on an issue their sponsors find important. A provision of the McCain-Feingold law prohibits mentioning a candidate in issue ads in the 60 days before a general election and 30 days before a primary.

Its purpose was to end the common practice of circumventing limits on contributions in federal elections by airing ads that avoided expressly advocating a vote for or against someone while making clear a preference for, or more often, disapproval of one candidate.

The Supreme Court previously said the provision complies with First Amendment guarantees of free speech. The 2-1 ruling by a special court here in December does not so much challenge the high court holding as carve out exceptions to it.

Yet if the justices were to adopt the lower court's reasoning, they would "really blow a hole" in the provision, said Richard Hasen, an election law specialist at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles.

"The purpose of the provision was to close a loophole that was allowing large amounts of corporate and union money to be spent on ads intended to influence federal elections," Mr. Hasen said. The court could reopen "that loophole for a large number of ads."

The Supreme Court yesterday also said it will review a lower court ruling allowing New York City to sue countries that own property near the United Nations over unpaid taxes.

The city has battled over property taxes for years with countries that house their consulates and diplomatic missions in Manhattan skyscrapers.

Under U.S. treaties, embassies and other diplomatic buildings are generally tax-exempt, but the city claims some countries are refusing to pay taxes on real estate used for non-diplomatic purposes, such as restaurants and apartments.

High Court Takes "Issue Ad" Cases (CNN)

CNN.com, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Jumping into a heated free-speech dispute a year before the presidential primaries, the Supreme Court on Friday accepted a pair of appeals over a sweeping campaign-finance reform law that limits "issue ads."

Oral arguments in the cases will be held in late April, with a ruling expected by late June -- six months before the 2008 election officially kicks off with primaries and caucuses in such states as Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada.

The question for the high court is whether issue ads aired mainly on television -- and funded by businesses, labor unions, and other groups -- can be banned 60 days before a general election, and 30 days before a primary.

That restriction was a key part of the McCain-Feingold congressional bill setting strict limits on political spending and the message behind it.

The issue ads are widely used to promote particular causes such as environmental protection or tax reform, and they specifically cannot endorse or even mention any particular candidate or political party.

An anti-abortion group, Wisconsin Right to Life, had filed a lawsuit in 2004, demanding the right to air ads that urged viewers to contact their Democratic U.S. senators -- Herb Kohl and Russ Feingold -- and tell them to support President Bush's judicial nominees. Both lawmakers were running for re-election in 2004, and retained their seats.

The Supreme Court, in a series of rulings in recent years, has generally upheld the constitutionality of these campaign finance reform laws from Congress. But a federal court last month allowed the Wisconsin group's lawsuit to go forward. The justices will delve into a complicated legal dispute over the kinds of legal challenges that can be filed and heard by the courts.

The cases are FEC v. Wisconsin Right to Life (06-969) and McCain v. Wisconsin Right to Life (06-970).

In a separate case, the justices will hear oral arguments in an appeal by a staffer to Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minnesota. At issue was whether the staffer had the legal right to sue his boss over personnel policy. Federal law generally protects federal officeholders from individual lawsuits over their official duties.

The case is Office of Sen. Mark Dayton v. Hanson (06-618).

House Panel Opens Investigation Of GSA Chief's Deal With Friend (WP)

By Robert O'Harrow, Scott Higham

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119942

The chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee yesterday opened an investigation into a no-bid contract that the chief of the General Services Administration attempted to give to companies operated by her longtime friend.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) requested documents from GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan and others after The Washington Post reported yesterday that Doan had signed a $20,000 deal with her friend's companies for a 24-page report about the procurement agency's use of businesses owned by minorities and women.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (Iowa), the ranking GOP member of the Finance Committee, said it "is infuriating after all the problems in the past at GSA that this administrator would attempt to use tax money to give no-bid contracts to her friends."

The GSA's inspector general's office is conducting its own investigation into the arrangement between Doan and her friend, Edie Fraser, who runs Public Affairs Group Inc. and its divisions, according to sources who said they were not authorized to speak publicly about the investigation. The deal was terminated in August after agency lawyers and officials raised questions about possible procurement violations.

In three two-page letters issued to Doan, Fraser and the GSA's former general counsel, Waxman demanded an array of records, including "emails, calendars, office visitation logs, meeting notes, and other documents."

Waxman asked Doan and Fraser for a copy of the contract and records of their communications. He asked former GSA general counsel Alan R. Swendiman for a briefing. Swendiman advised Doan to terminate the deal; he has since left the agency for a job at the White House.

The GSA issued a brief statement yesterday saying that Doan received the letter and spoke to Waxman. "As always, GSA will fully cooperate with Congress," the statement said.

In an e-mail to her staff, Doan said: "This incident has already been reviewed and no improprieties have been found."

In a statement yesterday, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said he expects the administrator of the GSA "to follow federal procurement regulations" and "possess better judgment than she has shown."

On July 25, two months after taking office, Doan signed the no-bid contract. Doan said in an interview that she "made a mistake."

Doan has had several clashes with GSA officials since taking over the agency in May. She compared the enforcement efforts of her inspector general's office to "terrorism," proposed cutting the budget of that office by $5 million and sought to curtail agency contract audits.

Doan also intervened in an effort to determine whether contractors accused of fraud should be suspended or debarred from doing business with the government. Contracting experts said in interviews that her intervention created the appearance of impropriety.

In the letters issued yesterday, Waxman demanded that Doan turn over documents related to her proposals to cut the inspector general's budget and curtail the contract audits. The letters also requested records pertaining to the debarment proceedings.

Legal Fight Resumes Over Guard's Back Pay (MR)

By Sean Reilly, Washington Bureau

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Following a congressional counterattack, lawyers are resuming a legal fight seeking back pay for National Guard members for time spent taking government-prescribed correspondence courses.

"The courts may have an entirely different view of what Congress can do in this particular situation," said Mobile lawyer Richard Dorman, part of the team representing Baldwin County resident William A. Clark and other Guard members in states ranging from North Carolina to Hawaii.

The federal lawsuit, filed in 2000, alleges that Guard members must take the courses to win promotions or even to keep their current rank.

Nonetheless, the military does not pay them for the time needed to complete the work, according to the lawsuit. Pentagon attorneys countered that Guard members could be paid only if they took correspondence courses while on active duty.

In 2003, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit in Washington, D.C., effectively sided with Clark, who is now a staff sergeant with almost 20 years of service, court papers indicate.

After added rounds of legal maneuvering, however, Congress -- apparently at the Pentagon's behest -- last year added an amendment to an annual defense bill aimed at overriding the appellate court decision.

In an unusual move, Dorman's firm, now known as Cunningham, Bounds, Crowder, Brown & Breedlove, LLC, hired a prominent Washington, D.C., lobbying shop to oppose the law change, according to a report filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0119943

In a court filing last month, Clark's lawyers said the new provision would improperly interfere with the court's judgment, adding that the amendment "cannot properly be retroactively applied to limit this right to compensation for numerous reasons," including the U.S. Constitution's doctrine of separation of powers.

Citing the amendment, government lawyers have since asked U.S. Claims Court Judge Nancy Firestone to throw out the case. A response from the plaintiffs is due early next month. It is unclear how soon after that Firestone might rule. Dorman, who is handling the case with lawyers from two Washington, D.C., firms, is asking Firestone to certify the case as a class action. Approximately 400,000 past and present Guard members could be affected, with $550 million in compensation potentially at stake, he said in an interview Friday.

At the National Guard Bureau in northern Virginia, spokesman Manny Pacheco could not confirm those numbers on the case Friday.

"We would not know the ramifications of how many people it would involve until the case is obviously settled," he said, adding that the suit is being handled by the U.S. Justice Department, which customarily represents federal agencies in litigation.

Clark, who Dorman said lives in the Robertsdale area, could not be reached for comment Friday. A 2004 Press-Register article described him as a Guard musician. In 1999, he was demoted from staff sergeant to sergeant after failing to complete all of the "sub courses" required in the Basic Non-Commissioned Officer Course, the lawsuit states.

He later regained his earlier rank after successfully finishing the course "without pay," the suit states. If his side wins, he could receive at least $2,500 in compensation, his attorneys told the Press-Register three years ago.

Plaintiffs' Team Takes Hit On Asbestos (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

In the latest setback for plaintiffs' attorneys involved in large-scale asbestos litigation, an Ohio state court judge barred a California law firm from appearing in his court after finding that its lawyers had lied and obstructed the discovery process in a case involving an asbestos claim.

In a harshly worded opinion issued late Thursday, Judge Harry Hanna listed more than a dozen instances where attorneys from the Novato, Calif., law firm Brayton Purcell LLP either lied to the court, intentionally withheld key discovery materials, or distorted the degree of asbestos exposure alleged.

The ruling is one of a number in the past several years that have gone against asbestos plaintiffs, including several in Mississippi, for years regarded as a plaintiff-friendly state. Other states have erected legislative hurdles, making asbestos claims more difficult to win.

Judge Hanna's ruling stemmed from a lawsuit brought by Brayton Purcell against Lorillard Tobacco Co. on behalf of the estate of the late Harry Kananian. The suit claimed Mr. Kananian died from a type of cancer caused by asbestos contained in Kent brand cigarette filters in the late 1950s.

According to Judge Hanna's ruling, the attorneys for Mr. Kananian, who died in 2000, altered claim forms used in earlier suits, which led to inconsistent assertions as to the cause of his asbestos exposure. Mr. Kananian had previously sued and collected roughly $700,000 from other asbestos defendants.

Judge Hanna didn't dismiss the suit, however, finding that Mr. Kananian's family "did nothing improper." The judge did bar Brayton Purcell from appearing in the Ohio state court in Cuyahoga County, based in Cleveland.

Specifically, Judge Hanna signaled out Christopher Andreas, a junior partner at the firm. The judge questioned Mr. Andreas's "appearance, attitude and veracity" during a deposition in which he wore a T-shirt that read: "Killer smokes -- Kent cigarettes -- 1952-1956 -- made by Lorillard Tobacco."

An attorney for Mr. Andreas and Brayton Purcell said "none of the skirmishes were material to the substance of the case."

Lorillard said it hopes the judge's ruling "will benefit other companies that may be subject to unethical conduct in asbestos personal injury and mass tort litigation." Lorillard is an indirect subsidiary of the Loews Corp.

Lisa Rickard, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Institute for Legal Reform, said defendants should have a legal right to know when plaintiffs have alleged conflicting sources of exposure in multiple claims. "Defendants should also have a right to know how much money a plaintiff has collected from other sources for the same injury," she said.

A representative for the American Association for Justice, a trial lawyers' organization, couldn't be reached for comment.

Write to Paul Davies at paul.davies@wsj.com1

DOJ_NMG_0119944

CIVIL RIGHTS:

San Francisco Police Are Criticized In Wake Of Fight Involving A Yale Singing Group (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 19 — Investigators from the San Francisco Police Department are expected to travel toConnecticut this weekend to interview victims of a New Year's Day street fight here that left several Yale University students injured and the department once again fending off criticism.

The investigation stems from an attack just after midnight on Jan. 1, when several members of the Baker's Dozen, an all-male a cappella group from Yale, were set upon by a group of young men. The latter were apparently envious of the attention the singers had received at a New Year's Eve party, those who gave the party say. Members of the Yale group said they were taunted with anti-gay slurs, and were later jumped and pummeled on a nearby street in the city's usually sedate Richmond neighborhood. Three members of the group were injured, including one whose jaw was broken in two places.

The police have made no arrests after detaining four suspects only briefly after the fight, a course of action that angered and confused families of the students. And that frustration has grown as almost three weeks have passed with no arrests.

"I don't have any idea why this is taking so long," said Laura Aziz, a schoolteacher in Manhattan who is the mother of Sharyar Aziz, the student whose jaw was broken. "It seems to me at this point, and from what we've heard from police, that charges would be filed."

The police have also been accused of being slow to respond because of a personality conflict with the party's hosts, a married couple — Leanna Dawydiak and Reno Rapagnani — who were members of the Police Department. (Mr. Rapagnani is a retired investigator; Ms. Dawydiak is on disability.) Ms. Dawydiak said they were not well liked in the department, in part because of accusations that they had leaked information during a previous police scandal known as Fajitagate, accusations they were cleared of.

"We were despised," said Ms. Dawydiak, who gave the New Year's Eve party for her 19-year-old daughter, Rose. "I hate to say it, but I kind of think that had an effect."

Sgt. Neville Gittens, a police spokesman, dismissed that accusation.

"We don't show up to a scene and gauge our investigation as to who a person is," Sergeant Gittens said. "That's not how we do business."

He also said that it was too early in the investigation to determine whether the attack could be characterized as a hate crime, in light of the anti-gay slurs during the attack.

Sergeant Gittens defended the department's initial response, saying that when officers arrived at the scene, a group of young men pointed out four potential suspects but then left before they themselves could be interviewed.

"People stand around and say 'those are the guys' and then leave," he said. "If people don't stick around, you can't make an arrest."

Sergeant Gittens said the chaotic scene after the fight had also complicated the investigation. There may have also been some underage drinking. Ms. Dawydiak, who was not at the party at the time of the attack, said that she and her husband hid all the alcohol in the house before the party, but that some uninvited guests — those believed to have started the fight — might have brought beer.

Whitney Leigh, a lawyer for two of the victims, said that at least two Yale students identified their assailants the night of the attack. "The police had enough information to arrest multiple individuals at the scene," Mr. Leigh said.

On Tuesday, investigators met with representatives of the San Francisco district attorney, who told the police that more evidence was needed before charges could be filed, a development that the police say is routine.

"Everyone needs to be patient and let us do what we do," Sergeant Gittens said. "Things take time."

Still, reports of the attack — and the pace of the police investigation — have buffeted the department, which has weathered several scandals in recent years, including Fajitagate, a 2002 incident involving three off-duty officers who were accused of accosting two men and using excessive force as they demanded that the men surrender a bag of fajitas.

The fajita scandal led to grand jury indictments, lawsuits and a turnover of the top command, even though the three officers initially accused in the attacks were acquitted of criminal charges.

In 2005, the department also endured accusations of prejudice after homemade videos surfaced featuring uniformed and plainclothes officers in racially and sexually charged skits. The videos, made for a department Christmas party, led to an announcement on Nov. 30 by Chief Heather Fong that 35 officers would face disciplinary charges in front of the police commission and the police chief.

DOJ_NMG_0119945

In the Yale case, the Aziz family has been particularly vocal, with Ms. Aziz and her son appearing on the Fox News Channel last week with Sean Hannity, the conservative talk show host. Mr. Hannity offered a $10,000 reward for information in the case, calling the Baker's Dozen "the national anthem singers" because the group had sung "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the party before being attacked.

On Friday, Ms. Aziz said the family was encouraged that the police were making the trip to interview her son, who has since returned to Yale, though with his jaw wired shut for the next five weeks. She said her son had not been cowed by the attack. "He's absolutely going back to everything he did before," Ms. Aziz said. "And he's still going to rehearsals with the group."

Testimony To Be Heard On Shooting By The Police (NYT)

By Al Baker

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

A Queens grand jury that will weigh evidence in the fatal police shooting of an unarmed black man on his wedding day in November will begin hearing testimony next week, lawyers involved in the case said yesterday.

Two months after the unarmed man, Sean Bell, was killed and two of his friends were wounded in a fusillade of 50 police bullets, prosecutors are expected to begin presenting evidence and calling witnesses before the panel, the lawyers said.

"My understanding is that they should begin presenting on Monday," said Michael Hardy, a lawyer who represents the woman Mr. Bell was to marry, Nicole Paultre Bell (she took his name after his death), and the two men wounded in the shooting.

The office of the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, declined to comment or answer questions about the grand jury process. "The investigation is continuing," said Meris Campbell, a spokeswoman.

Mr. Hardy, lawyers representing some of the five officers involved in the shooting and others said they expected the grand jury's work would last at least three weeks. The two men wounded in the Nov. 25 shooting, Trent Benefield and Joseph Guzman, intend to testify, said Mr. Hardy, and will most likely do so toward the end of the grand jury process.

"They are crucial witnesses," he said. "And that, obviously, will present a very significant challenge to whatever testimony is given by the officers who did the shooting, if any."

Of the officers who fired at Mr. Bell, two are black, one is black and Hispanic, and two are white.

In recent weeks, four of the five officers have given investigators for the Queens district attorney's office their version of events. The fifth, Detective Michael Oliver, who fired 31 of the shots, has not spoken to prosecutors, according to one lawyer involved in the case.

But it remained unclear yesterday if Detective Oliver planned to testify before the grand jury or speak with prosecutors, and his lawyer did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Paul P. Martin, a lawyer who represents Detective Marc Cooper, said his client would testify before the grand jury. "My client's actions were reasonable under the circumstances and justified," he said.

It is unclear if Detective Paul Headley will testify. A lawyer for another officer, the undercover detective who fired the first of the 50 shots, has said his client intended to testify. Stephen C. Worth, a lawyer for Officer Michael Carey, said he was "reserving judgment" on whether his client would testify.

Officers who face grand juries in Queens can find themselves in one of several rooms that look like college lecture halls, with seats in tiered rows. There are some grand juries that sit for a month at a time, and one that sits for six months, though each can be extended. It is unclear which type will hear the Bell case.

Editorial: A Tragedy Of Errors (WP)

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The police report on the killing of an unarmed man by a SWAT officer finds fault -- but raises too many questions.

"OUR GOAL is to be as open and transparent as possible," Fairfax County Police Chief David M. Rohrer said last week as he released a report on the fatal police shooting a year ago of an unarmed, nonthreatening suspect. The report confesses to "gaps in decision-making guidelines" and questionable actions in what should have been a routine arrest of Salvatore J. Culosi, a 37-year-old optometrist suspected of being a sports bookmaker.

But the story still merits more explanation. In the report the police -- for the first time -- officially acknowledge the identity of the shooter: Officer Deval V. Bullock, a SWAT unit member with 17 years' experience. So why was the SWAT unit called in to help round up a man who had been taking bets from the same undercover detective for months -- and who had no criminal record? Exactly how did Officer Bullock's finger wind up on the trigger of his .45-caliber pistol, which fired a single deadly round into Mr. Culosi's chest?

DOJ_NMG_0119946

Chief Rohrer's report does acknowledge what should have been obvious all along: that SWAT team power was unnecessary. Risk assessment policies have been inconsistent and are being revised, the report says. Good, because even Officer Bullock himself "was not comfortable with the original plan and challenged it prior to the briefing," the report notes.

As for the shooting, the report concludes that "based on the preponderance of the evidence," an "involuntary muscle contraction" caused Officer Bullock's finger to slip down to the trigger and fire the shot. The report says Officer Bullock's vehicle door apparently bumped his left side as he was climbing out, causing his right side to flinch involuntarily. Even if you buy this finding -- and medical experts say it can happen -- Mr. Culosi never should have been placed in a situation where this could happen.

The chief's report does not state what discipline was imposed on Officer Bullock. But what is passing for punishment so far is little more than a frown and a wink. As reported by The Post's Tom Jackman, a police internal affairs report shown to this newspaper recommended that Officer Bullock be suspended for 120 hours without pay and transferred out of the SWAT unit. On Jan. 8, sources say, the chief imposed both the suspension and the transfer. How tough is that?

The chief prosecutor in Fairfax, Robert F. Horan Jr. -- who has never prosecuted a police officer for wrongfully shooting a citizen -- remained true to the force, swiftly declining to prosecute Officer Bullock or even to refer the case to a grand jury. The Justice Department's Civil Rights Division has yet to release any results of its inquiry. So the case is not closed, nor should it be. Public confidence in the justice system still hangs in the balance.

ANTITRUST:

Plaintiffs In Microsoft Case Claim Firm Is Violating U.S. Antitrust Deal (AP)

By David Pitt, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 20, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa — The plaintiffs in Iowa's class-action antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp. claim they have uncovered information that indicates the software company is violating its 2002 agreement with the Justice Department.

The alleged misconduct surrounds Microsoft's duty to share software hooks known as application programming interfaces, or APIs, which let disparate programs work together. The Iowa plaintiffs' attorneys have alleged that Microsoft has not disclosed certain APIs to other software developers who want to make programs compatible with Microsoft software.

Plaintiffs' attorney Roxanne Conlin asked the judge in the Iowa case, Scott Rosenberg, for permission to tell the Justice Department and the Iowa attorney general what her side knows. Rosenberg responded that she could provide the information if a court order or a subpoena is issued for it.

The API issue also has landed Microsoft into trouble with the European Commission, which imposed a fine of 3 million euros ($3.9 million) a day last July for failure to provide proper software documentation. In response, the company provided 8,500 pages of documentation in November.

Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said he doubted the Iowa case had turned up any information that would surprise the federal government and its independent experts who monitor the 2002 antitrust settlement. Microsoft must appear before a federal judge quarterly on the matter, and at the most recent hearing, in December, the judge said Microsoft was complying.

The Justice Department declined to comment.

Conlin represents thousands of Iowans who purchased Microsoft software between 1994 and 2006. They claim that the company engaged in anticompetitive conduct that caused customers to pay at least $300 million more for software than they would have if there had been competition.

Microsoft denies the allegations, and its attorneys said they'll show Iowa customers received quality products at a fair price.

Microsoft Eyed Apple In '03 (BLOOM)

By Dina Bass And Bob Van Voris, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

Software maker considered partnership, or creating player to rival iPod

Microsoft Corp., the world's largest software maker, considered as early as 2003 working with Apple Inc. or creating its own digital music player to rival Apple's dominant iPod.

Microsoft, displeased with hardware partners Creative Technology Ltd. and Dell Inc., which made players using Microsoft's Windows Media software, talked about building its own device, according to an e-mail exchange between Windows chief Jim Allchin and media software executive Amir Majidimehr. The correspondence, which was introduced into evidence in a civil antitrust trial against Microsoft in Des Moines, Iowa, was made public Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0119947

Allchin, who started the exchange in an e-mail titled "sucking on media players," also suggested that he talk to Apple Chief Executive Steve Jobs to get the iPod to work with Microsoft's media software for fear the iPod would "drive people away from Windows Media Player." Microsoft introduced its music player, Zune, in November.

"My goodness it's terrible," Allchin wrote about one of Creative's devices. "What I don't understand is though is I was told the new Creative Labs device would be comparable to Apple. That is so not the case."

Majidimehr replied, "Now you feel our pain." He said Microsoft was providing cash incentives to get the partners to improve devices. If that doesn't work "it is time for us to roll up our sleeves and do our own hardware," he wrote.

Microsoft had been working with partners on music devices for at least a year before Apple introduced the iPod in 2001 and catapulted to a dominant position in the market. Microsoft and its partners failed to come up with compelling hardware and had difficulty getting software to properly connect music collections on computers with their devices.

In July, Microsoft announced that it would change course and sell its own device, software and music service under the brand Zune. A spokesman for Microsoft's digital media group declined to comment.

Microsoft sold "hundreds of thousands" of Zune devices during Christmas, according to Entertainment and Devices Division President Robbie Bach. Apple sold 21.1 million iPods last quarter.

Microsoft is defending itself in a private antitrust class action in Iowa that began in December. In the trial, a statewide class of consumers claims that Microsoft used its monopoly position in computer operating systems and software applications to overcharge for its software, including Windows, Word and Excel. The consumers claim $329 million in damages since 1994. That amount may be tripled under Iowa law.

Earlier this week, the trial judge gave permission for plaintiffs' lawyers to tell the Justice Department that they believe Microsoft violated a 2002 court order in the U.S. government's antitrust suit against the company. The lawyers say Microsoft hasn't disclosed certain application programming interfaces to other software developers who want to make programs compatible with Microsoft software.

The e-mails mark the second set of conversations exhibited in the trial in which Allchin, a 16-year Microsoft veteran, expresses concern about competition with Apple products. In a 2004 e-mail to Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer, made public during opening statements in December, Allchin criticized Windows and said "I would buy a Mac today if I was not working at Microsoft."

At the time, Allchin was leading development of Longhorn, the code name for Windows Vista, which reaches stores Jan. 30.

Allchin, who is retiring after Vista is released, referred to Longhorn as "a pig" and said "we have lost our way."

This report includes information from The Associated Press.

Esmark To Buy West Virginia Tin-plate Plant (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

Arcelor Mittal, the world's largest steel company, has agreed to sell its tin-plate plant in Weirton, W.Va., to Chicago Heights-based Esmark Inc. to satisfy U.S. antitrust concerns.

Esmark signed a memorandum of understanding to acquire the plant, Esmark Chief Financial Officer Craig Bouchard said Friday. The agreement is contingent on approval by the Justice Department, he said. Terms weren't disclosed.

Esmark "has entered into a memorandum of understanding with Mittal Steel to purchase the hot-strip mill and tin-finishing operations of Mittal's Weirton plant," Bouchard said. "We are working on finalizing the asset purchase agreement by Feb. 2."

The company's interest in Weirton increased after it acquired the steelworks of nearby Wheeling, W.Va.-based Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp. through a reverse takeover in November. Excluded from the deal with Arcelor Mittal are a Weirton blast furnace, caster and basic oxygen furnace, Bouchard said.

The steel- and iron-making facilities at Weirton have been idled since June 2005 .

Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union at the Weirton plant, says the facility is still "ready and able to make quality steel."

A clause in its labor contract gives the union veto power over a sale of the facility, Glyptis said.

William Steers, a Chicago-based spokesman with Arcelor Mittal, couldn't be reached.

The Justice Department demanded Arcelor Mittal sell some assets to preserve competition in the tin-plate market in the Eastern U.S. Arcelor Mittal is the world's largest maker of tin plate, a type of steel coated with tin that is used mostly in packaging such as cans.

Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman with the Justice Department, said the matter is "still under review" and declined to comment further.

DOJ_NMG_0119948

Should the government approve the sale of the Weirton plant and the company completes arrangements with the union, a definitive agreement with Esmark would be reached no later than Feb. 2, Bouchard said.

Mittal originally had planned to satisfy U.S. antitrust concerns by selling a plant belonging to Dofasco, Canada's biggest steelmaker, which was acquired by Arcelor SA last March for $5.2 billion. Mittal completed its $38.3 billion takeover of Arcelor in November.

But after the original deal fell through, the Justice Department demanded that Mittal Arcelor sell Weirton or the Sparrows Point plant in Maryland.

Steelmaking Neighbors Eye Partial Merger (PPG)

By Len Boselovic, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 20, 2007

Required divestiture may put Weirton's rolling mills in Wheeling-Pitt's hands

Combining the Ohio Valley's two steel producers, long a topic of speculation in the small industrial towns along the river, took on renewed urgency yesterday when the Chicago-area steel distributor that wants to merge with Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel confirmed it expects to acquire portions of the former operations of Weirton Steel.

Esmark said it has a memorandum of understanding with Arcelor Mittal, the world's largest steel producer and owner of the Weirton mill. U.S. antitrust regulators are requiring Arcelor Mittal to divest one of its North American mills as a condition of Mittal's acquisition of Arcelor last year.

Esmark gained control of Wheeling-Pitt in November, when the steel distributor's shareholders elected its slate of directors over the incumbent board, led by former Chairman and Chief Executive Officer James G. Bradley. The successful proxy fight set the stage for a vote by Wheeling-Pitt shareholders on merging with Esmark.

Esmark's shopping list includes the Weirton mills that roll steel slabs into sheet steel and coat it to make food cans and other products, but not the blast furnaces and other equipment used to produce the slabs. The company expects to sign a definitive agreement with Arcelor Mittal by Feb. 2.

That doesn't sit well with the leader of the union representing Weirton's workers. Independent Steelworkers Union President Mark Glyptis wants the steelmaking end of his plant to be included in any sale, saying it would put about 300 more workers on the payroll. He said steel executive Mitch Hecht is interested in acquiring the whole operation.

The ISU's labor agreement with Arcelor Mittal gives it the power to veto any sale of Weirton, Mr. Glyptis said.

Esmark would have to negotiate a contract with his union and so far talks have been mostly limited to brief telephone conversations.

"There have not been any meaningful, sit-down negotiations," Mr. Glyptis said.

Any contract with the ISU would affect the jobs of Wheeling-Pitt workers, who are represented by the United Steelworkers of America and operate the same kind of equipment Esmark hopes to acquire at Weirton. One of the stumbling blocks in past efforts to merge the two companies has been whether both of the unions would survive.

Those previous initiatives, including talks in 1999 when the industry was entering a severe depression that ultimately bankrupted both Weirton and Wheeling-Pitt, drew mixed reviews. Some thought combining two of the industry's weakest players would produce a stronger competitor, while longtime industry analyst Charles Bradford compared it to two garbage trucks colliding.

A Wheeling-Pitt/Weirton merger makes sense to James P. Bouchard, Esmark's chairman and chief executive officer.

"We are excited about the opportunities presented by the potential combination of three businesses," he said.

Wheeling-Pitt emerged from bankruptcy in 2003, the same year Weirton sought bankruptcy protection. Weirton was acquired a year later by International Steel Group, a Cleveland company cobbled together from the carcasses of Bethlehem Steel, LTV Steel and other bankrupt producers. Mittal acquired ISG in 2005 and subsequently shut down Weirton's steelmaking facilities. It continues to process steel sheet at the plant and employs about 1,275, Mr. Glyptis said.

Wheeling-Pitt employs about 3,100 at plants in Ohio, West Virginia and Allenport, Pa.

Any sale would have to be approved by the U.S. Department of Justice. The agency has given Mittal until Jan. 28 to sell Dofasco, its Canadian arm. That would take care of antitrust concerns. However, Arcelor put Dofasco into a trust before it was swallowed by Mittal. The trust prevents Arcelor Mittal from divesting the Canadian producer.

Unless the trust is broken, Mittal must sell either Weirton or its Sparrows Point plant near Baltimore, formerly operated by Bethlehem.

(Len Boselovic can be reached at lboselovic@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1941.)

Case Could Kill Mill (BRADV)

By Gary Perilloux, Advocate business writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 20, 2007

Antitrust remedy might make La. steel plant moot

A U.S. Justice Department case could kill a German steelmaker's desire to build a $3 billion mill in Louisiana.

Or it could open the door for St. James Parish to score a 3,000-job coup in Convent. Alabama and Arkansas also are vying for the steel mill.

Louisiana's chances of wooing ThyssenKrupp, amid a consolidating steel industry, may rest heavily with a Washington, D.C., federal court that's a week away from a key antitrust milestone.

After the world's two largest steel companies — Luxembourg-based Arcelor and Mittal Steel of The Netherlands — complete a merger this spring, a concentration of 84 percent of the tin production in the Eastern United States would result.

Here's why that matters to Louisiana: To break up the perceived tin monopoly, the Justice Department wants Arcelor Mittal to sell Canada's largest steelmaker, Dofasco, to ThyssenKrupp for $4.6 billion.

Should that happen, ThyssenKrupp would gain 3.9 million tons of annual steel production as it brings on line a 5-million ton Brazilian slab mill in 2009. The Canadian output is about what the proposed steel mill on the Gulf Coast would produce.

But if ThyssenKrupp doesn't acquire Dofasco, it likely would build the Gulf Coast mill to handle 3 million tons of the annual raw steel product from Brazil, with 2 million tons going to Germany.

ThyssenKrupp's final public comments on the Gulf Coast project came in November. The company didn't return numerous messages left by The Advocate. And Louisiana economic development officials are remaining mum on the deal, citing confidentiality agreements.

Charles Bradford, a New York-based steel industry analyst, said the Gulf Coast mill is far from a sure thing even should the Dofasco deal fall through.

"It's not necessary they do the thing on the coast," he said, citing the high expense of the $3 billion project. "That's really hard to swallow. It wouldn't take much more to buy U.S. Steel."

Such a bid would cost about $12 billion, Bradford said, but could be reduced to $8 billion by selling off central Europe operations and $4 billion to $5 billion by selling off piping and tubing divisions.

The Justice Department isn't commenting on the antitrust case but its last public statement in November listed a strong preference that Arcelor Mittal divest Dofasco rather than two alternatives: selling plants in West Virginia or Maryland.

The explanation is simple, Bradford said: Dofasco is much more likely to thrive as a separate entity than the West Virginia or Maryland mills.

Constance Robinson of the Washington, D.C., law firm Kilpatrick Stockton agrees.

"In general, the Justice Department will strive to get a divestiture that cures the competitive harm they've identified," said Robinson, who worked 27 years as an antitrust attorney for the department until 2003. "They're looking for somebody who will be a long-term player, competitively."

But the most-baffling part of the case is Arcelor Mittal might not be able to accomplish what the Justice Department wants. In early 2006, when Arcelor was still attempting to thwart a Mittal buyout, it placed control of Dofasco's stock in a Dutch foundation controlled by three board members, two of them with strong Arcelor ties.

State Is Reviewing Deal For Hoover (COLDISP)

By James Nash, THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Columbus Dispatch, January 20, 2007

Attorney general raises antitrust issues in sale to rival company in Hong Kong

Ohio Attorney General Marc Dann is looking into antitrust concerns that have arisen based on a Hong Kong company's planned purchase of the North Canton-based Hoover vacuum-cleaner company.

Dann, a Democrat who led the antitrust division of the West Virginia attorney general's office earlier in his career, is investigating whether Techtronic Industries Co. Ltd. legally can purchase Hoover, which employs about 1,000 Ohio workers.

Techtronic manufactures the Dirt Devil, Regina, Royal and Vax brands of floor cleaners.

Dann's office had not filed an antitrust claim as of yesterday, said Edgar Simpson, the attorney general's administration and policy chief.

"The idea is to get some information to see if there's an impact on the competitive marketplace," Simpson said. "We have a feeling that we need to look at this pretty quickly. It is an Ohio company, and we feel that we have standing to do this."

The Federal Trade Commission and U.S. Justice Department also have regulatory oversight of the acquisition, but Simpson said Dann thinks that his office also should look at the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0119950

In a Dec. 7 news release announcing the $107 million purchase of Hoover, Techtronic said the deal is scheduled to close by the end of the summer but could be final as early as March.

Hoover is a division of Whirlpool Corp., based in Benton Harbor, Mich.

A Whirlpool spokeswoman did not return a call for comment yesterday.

Techtronic has not announced whether it plans to keep Hoover's manufacturing jobs in Ohio.

The purchase has raised concerns that the company might shift the manufacturing operations to an Asian country with lower labor costs.

Hoover's Ohio roots go back to 1875, when the family settled in North Canton.

The company began manufacturing vacuum cleaners in 1908.

jnash@dispatch.com

Caremark Shareholders Get Their Say (TENN)

By Todd Pack, Staff Writer

Nashville Tennessean, January 20, 2007

CVS merger vote to be next month

CVS Corp. and Caremark Rx Inc. said Friday that the Securities and Exchange Commission has given the go-ahead for them to take their proposed "merger of equals" to a vote of shareholders next month even as a third company pushes its rival bid.

Caremark shareholders will vote on the CVS deal at a special meeting Feb. 20 at 8:30 a.m. at the Hilton Nashville Downtown.

CVS shareholders will vote at a special meeting Feb. 23 at the drugstore chain's headquarters in Woonsocket, R.I.

"We are very pleased that we have received clearance from the SEC to move forward with our shareholder vote next month. We remain on track to close our merger with Caremark by the end of February," Tom Ryan, CVS' chairman, president and CEO, said in a statement.

"We look forward to our respective shareholder meetings and to closing our strategic merger of equals with CVS," said Mac Crawford, Caremark's chairman, president and CEO.

CVS, the United States' secondlargest drugstore chain in sales, announced plans to merge with Caremark, the second-largest pharmacy benefits manager, or PBM, on Nov. 1.

Based on Friday's closing price, CVS' offer was worth almost $24.6 billion, or $57.58 a share including a special $2-per-share cash dividend that the combined firm would pay Caremark shareholders after the deal closes.

Hostile bid from St. Louis

Express Scripts Inc., the nation's third-largest PBM, made a hostile bid to buy Caremark on Dec. 18. Caremark's board of directors rejected it earlier this month, but Express is hoping Caremark's shareholders will overrule their own board.

The Express offer still faces several hurdles, including a federal antitrust review tied to concerns about the market share a combined Express-Caremark would have.

The initial Express offer was much higher than CVS', but that difference has narrowed in recent days with fluctuations in stock prices. Based on Friday's closing prices, its offer was worth $24.6 billion, or $57.69 a share — only 11 cents higher than CVS' bid with the $2 dividend included.

In a statement, Express Scripts said it "has made a superior proposal to acquire Caremark. We urge Caremark stockholders to vote down the CVS acquisition."

Tribune Board Panel To Meet On Auction (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

A special committee of Tribune Co.'s board overseeing an auction of the company is to meet with its advisers Saturday, three days after receiving three proposals, according to people familiar with the situation. The full board is also expected to meet, possibly to vote on the recommendation of the special committee. A Tribune spokesman declined to comment on the schedule.

None of the proposals offers what Tribune is looking for: a premium for the entire company, which owns newspapers such as the Los Angeles Times and TV stations.

It is unlikely that the special committee will recommend any of the offers in their current form, said a person familiar with the situation. The committee is likely to try to negotiate better terms on each of the offers, or might reject them out of hand. The company may decide to spin off its TV stations or take on added debt to fund a dividend on its own.

Meanwhile, Tribune is negotiating with Gannett Co. to sell two of its papers in Connecticut, the Stamford Advocate and Greenwich Time.

DOJ_NMG_0119951

Patent Trial Near, Bristol-Myers Counts On Resilience (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

LAWRENCEVILLE, N.J., Jan. 19 — Bristol-Myers Squibb staggered, but the drug maker has remained on its feet.

That is the view of the company's interim chief executive, James M. Cornelius, who on Friday compared the company's struggle with a generic competitor to a boxing competition.

"A less resilient, less solid management and employee base would have crumbled under a billion-dollar hit," Mr. Cornelius said during an interview at a company office here. "We took a body blow, but we didn't go down for the count."

Mr. Cornelius said the damage from last summer's market onslaught by a generic copy of Bristol-Myers's blockbuster drug Plavix, a blood thinner, would exceed $1 billion, but the company had "more or less" already made up the money.

The financial details of that comeback, he said, will be revealed next Thursday when the company releases its fourth-quarter results.

The blow was dealt last summer by the Canadian company Apotex, which sold its Plavix imitator for only three weeks in August, before a federal judge ordered a halt. But during that period an estimated six-month supply of generic Plavix flooded the United States market.

The episode followed bungled efforts to settle a patent dispute with Apotex. And it eventually cost the Bristol-Myers chief executive at the time, Peter R. Dolan, his job.

Apotex has hardly gone away, though. Even as Mr. Cornelius expressed optimism yesterday about the company's future, lawyers were making final preparations to begin a trial Monday in federal court in Manhattan. There, Bristol-Myers and its marketing partner, the French company Sanofi-Aventis, will defend the Plavix patent against the Apotex challenge.

The trial's outcome will be critical for Bristol-Myers, which derives nearly a third of its revenue from Plavix. The drug's 2005 sales in this country were $3.8 billion and its use is growing. Worldwide sales of Plavix exceeded $6 billion in 2005, making it the second-largest drug, behind Lipitor from Pfizer.

In a four-week trial where much of the testimony is expected to involve scientific minutiae, Bristol-Myers and Sanofi will be asking Judge Sidney H. Stein to uphold their Plavix patent.

"Starting Monday is an important historic event for this company," Mr. Cornelius said, adding that the company was so optimistic about its chances of winning the case that it is proceeding to break ground on a $750 million biologic drug plant in Devens, Mass.

Bristol-Myers plans to give more details of its 2006 performance, including how it has compensated for the lost Plavix sales, on Thursday. The company has been predicting that earnings for the year will wind up at 97 cents a share.

"I don't think we're going to disappoint anybody," said Mr. Cornelius, who is in some ways Bristol-Myers' accidental chief executive.

Nearly a year ago, after a long career at the drug maker Eli Lilly and then a stint as chairman and interim chief executive of the device maker Guidant, Mr. Cornelius thought he had engineered an early retirement from the pressured environment of big corporations.

After closing the $27 billion sale of Guidant to Boston Scientific, following an exhaustive takeover battle with Johnson & Johnson, Mr. Cornelius had planned to settle into a new life dominated by charity volunteering, long stretches at his second home in Maui and avid support for the Indianapolis Colts.

An Indianapolis resident, he owns Colts season tickets on the 42-yard line.

But Mr. Cornelius, who is 63, said he "parachuted in, a somewhat reluctant volunteer" to take the reins of Bristol-Myers in September after Mr. Dolan's ouster. Mr. Cornelius had served on the Bristol-Myers Squibb board.

Since then, the company's board has continued a search for a permanent replacement for Mr. Dolan — Mr. Cornelius said he was not interested in the job — and also has been exploring a sale or merger of the $52 billion company.

Even as the patent trial begins, the company is the target of a federal investigation focusing on whether it violated federal antitrust laws in its attempt earlier last year to settle the litigation with Apotex.

When those settlement talks unraveled, Apotex flooded the United States market with its generic version of the drug before Judge Stein ordered distribution to stop, ruling that it was likely that the Plavix patent would be upheld.

Despite the judge's ruling, Apotex had already shipped enough of its version of the drug that prescriptions for Plavix plunged 32 percent in the third quarter.

The stock took a hit, too. Bristol-Myers shares, which had traded at nearly $26 in July, fell to just above $20 in August. The stock has since recovered, closing Friday at $26.63 — a level that Mr. Cornelius said was partly a result of the company's strong pipeline of new products.

Mr. Cornelius said yesterday that the market for blood thinners was still working through the remaining inventory of Apotex's drug, clopidogrel bisulfate, but that more than half of prescriptions were now being filled with the Bristol-Myers product, and its share was growing steadily.

The trial also comes at an important time for United States patent law, in which courts lately have generally favored innovator companies. Meanwhile, a Supreme Court ruling is expected this year on a patent case, KSR International v. Teleflex Inc., involving automotive gas pedals.

The key issue in that case — the question of what constitutes an "obvious" and, hence, invalid patent — could have a bearing on the Plavix patent.

Among other arguments, Apotex has claimed that the formula for Plavix would have been obvious to a scientist, based on an older patent that expired in 2003. Judge Stein had rejected that argument during preliminary proceedings.

"If KSR raises the bar for nonobviousness, Judge Stein may need to rethink his conclusion that the Plavix patent is not obvious," said C. Scott Hemphill, an associate professor of law at Columbia University.

Mr. Cornelius said the company had other options if Apotex won the Plavix case. "If we lose we have a backup plan that changes the nature of everything we do, but we don't plan on losing," he said.

Instead, he said, he sees 2007 as the beginning of a new era for the company, which recently signed a $1.35 billion deal with AstraZeneca to jointly develop two diabetes compounds. The company is also entertaining the idea of finding partners for some of its other products in the development pipeline, he said.

"When I first joined Eli Lilly, everybody said, 'I hope Lilly can someday be like Bristol-Myers Squibb,' " Mr. Cornelius said, acknowledging that Bristol-Myers was no longer the industry role model. "I'd like to get it back there. That's the target — '07 is going to be the beginning of that."

Suit By Record Companies Against XM Going To Trial (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press

AP, January 20, 2007

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 -- A lawsuit in which record companies allege XM Satellite Radio Holdings is cheating them by letting consumers store songs can proceed toward trial, a judge ruled Friday after finding merit to the companies' claims.

U.S. District Judge Deborah A. Batts made the finding in a case brought by Atlantic Recording, BMG Music, Capitol Records and other music distribution companies against the licensed satellite radio broadcaster.

In a lawsuit last year, the companies said XM directly infringes on their exclusive distribution rights by letting consumers record songs onto special receivers marketed as "XM + MP3" players.

XM has argued it is protected from infringement lawsuits by the Audio Home Recording Act of 1992, which permits individuals to record music off the radio for private use. The judge said she did not believe the company was protected in this instance by the act.

In a statement, XM said it remains confident that the lawsuit is without merit and it would prevail.

"At this stage of the proceeding, the court's ruling is required to be based on the false characterizations set forth in the plaintiffs' complaint. The real facts strongly support our view that the lawsuit is barred by the Audio Home Recording Act. We look forward to making our case in court," XM said.

Messages for comment left with lawyers on both sides were not immediately returned.

In refusing to toss out the lawsuit, the judge noted that the record companies consent to XM's use of their copyrighted material solely for the purposes of providing a digital satellite broadcasting service.

She said XM operates like traditional radio broadcast providers that cannot offer an interactive service, publish programming schedules prior to broadcast and play songs from an artist more often than specified within a three-hour period. But by broadcasting and storing copyrighted music for later recording by the consumer, the judge said, XM is both a broadcaster and a distributor, yet only paying to be a broadcaster.

"The record companies sufficiently allege that serving as a music distributor to XM + MP3 users gives XM added commercial benefit as a satellite radio broadcaster," Batts said.

Although XM argued in court papers that an XM + MP3 player is much like a traditional radio-cassette player, the judge said "it is not."

"It is manifestly apparent that the use of a radio-cassette player to record songs played over free radio does not threaten the market for copyrighted works as does the use of a recorder which stores songs from private radio broadcasts on a subscription fee basis," she said.

XM shares fell 73 cents, or 4.4 percent, to $15.72 on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0119953

ENVIRONMENT:

Judge Orders Review Of Salamander Status (FINDLAW/AP)

By Terence Chea, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A federal judge on Friday ruled that the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service illegally rejected a petition by environmentalists to give protected status to two salamander species that live in old-growth forests in California and Oregon.

U.S. District Judge William Alsup ordered the agency to consider listing the Siskiyou Mountains and Scott Bar salamanders as threatened or endangered species.

The San Francisco-based judge said the service's decision last year to deny the petition was "arbitrary and capricious." Alsup gave the agency until March 23 to decide whether to conduct a more in-depth analysis of the salamanders' status.

If the two species are granted protected status, the U.S. Forest Service would be required to make sure that logging operations do not harm the salamanders or their habitat.

Both salamanders are about five inches long, colored black with speckles, and have no lungs, instead breathing through their skin. They live on rocky slopes under the canopy of old-growth trees in the Siskiyou Mountains and Klamath River basin in northern California and southern Oregon.

The Fish and Wildlife Service will comply with Judge Alsup's order, said agency spokeswoman Alexandra Pitts.

Environmentalists who filed the original petition in April 2004 were pleased with Friday's decision.

"We're delighted that they're going to be considered for protection," said Noah Greenwald, a biologist with the Center for Biological Diversity, one of five environmental groups that sued the service.

Minerals Chief Defends Response To Lease Problem (BILLGAZ)

By Noelle Straub, Gazette Washington Bureau

Billings Gazette, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON - Minerals Management Service Director Johnnie Burton defended herself Friday against charges by some lawmakers that she should have acted earlier upon hearing of a mistake in oil and gas drilling leases that could cost the government billions of dollars.

Deep-water leases signed in 1998 and 1999 during the Clinton administration omitted a clause triggering royalty payments if energy prices rose over a certain amount. Officials say they raised the matter with Burton in early 2004, although she does not remember it, a report by the Interior Department's inspector general found.

"I am now being held responsible for not remembering a passing mention of an issue in 2004, and for not doing anything to remedy a mistake made by the Clinton administration when, in fact, I wrote every company in June 2006 asking them if we could agree to an amendment to their leases," Burton wrote in a letter to the editor of the Casper (Wyo.) Star-Tribune.

"Unfortunately, only six of them agreed to an amendment," she added. "I cannot force anyone to change a valid lease signed by a representative of the U.S. government eight years after the fact, or had I acted in 2004, five years after the fact."

The error in the leases has cost the government about $1 billion in revenue and if not fixed could cost $10 billion.

The inspector general found that MMS officials made a conscious decision to omit the language from the leases, but that the choice was simply a mistake and was not malicious. Officials decided to leave out the language in the mistaken belief that another regulation, the Royalty Relief Act, automatically covered it.

Burton testified before a House committee in September that she first learned about the issue in late 2005 or early 2006. But a former associate director said he was sure he had briefed Burton on the issue in early 2004, the inspector general's report said. Burton said that if she was informed then, she "may have simply dismissed the fact as a nonissue since she knew the application of price thresholds was discretionary," the report said. "She said she did not remember putting a great deal of thought into the matter," the report said. "She speculated that she was probably told of the mistake in conjunction with being informed that (the solicitor's office) had opined that nothing could be legally done to remedy the issue."

Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., asked why Burton wasn't moved to another position, given those findings. Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calif., who sits on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, suggested Burton should resign if she learned of the problems earlier than she told Congress. Issa last year chaired the subcommittee that investigated the leases and heard Burton's testimony.

Burton was appointed director in 2002. She noted that the problem was first discovered in 2000, the last year of the Clinton administration, but nothing was done about it at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0119954

In 2000, some energy companies brought the matter to the attention of lower-level MMS employees in the Gulf of Mexico region and asked for clarification. But those employees for some reason did not report the matter to any higher-ups, the inspector general found. In 2004, when oil prices rose steeply, the issue came up again at the agency.

Some "casual discussions" took place then, but centered only on the fact that the solicitor's office had already made a decision on the issue and nothing could be done, Inspector General Earl Devaney said at a Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee hearing.

A more substantial discussion involving higher-ups or even the Justice Department should have taken place but did not, he said.

Addressing what happened in 2004, Burton said some companies asked the administrator of the offshore program and his staff whether royalties were due on the leases.

"The staff asked the department's attorneys for advice," Burton said. "The advice was clear: the leases did not require payment until the royalty-free volume had been produced, market price notwithstanding. The leases were valid; there was no legal question."

"Apparently the administrator of the program told his staff in an e-mail that he had advised me of this issue in 2004," she added. "There is no e-mail from me or to me on this issue. I absolutely do not remember this being mentioned to me at that time."

After being told about the issue in late 2005 or early 2006, Burton asked the inspector general in March of 2006 to investigate.

"The inspector general concluded there was a bureaucratic mistake omitting the thresholds and in the process told me there were e-mails that implied someone mentioned the issue to me in 2004," Burton said. "I stated I did not remember."

Burton said she is "gratified by the kind comments" of Wyoming members of Congress on her behalf. Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., strongly defended Burton at the Senate hearing, saying she has done a "great job" and didn't deserve the criticism.

He faulted the inspector general's report for the focus on Burton. Thomas wondered why the report didn't use such harsh language about the Clinton administration officials who made the blunder as it did about current officials.

The report said the mishandling of the leases stemmed from a "jaw-dropping example of bureaucratic bungling" and a "shockingly cavalier management approach." Asked about those phrases by Thomas, Devaney said he was not referring to Burton but rather to actions by MMS officials both in 2000 and 2004.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Chief Likes New Facility (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

Mueller calls the L.A. area's Joint Regional Intelligence Center, opened last summer to help fight terrorism, a model for federal and local cooperation.

The Los Angeles area's new counter-terrorism center drew high marks Friday from FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, who toured the high-tech facility in Norwalk and pronounced it a model for federal and local cooperation.

The Joint Regional Intelligence Center opened six months ago as a co-venture of the FBI, Los Angeles Police Department, Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department and other local law enforcement agencies as a hub for information gathering, analysis and sharing.

With 30 similar centers having opened or in the works in other parts of the country, Mueller said the use of cutting-edge technology and intelligence sharing by police officers on the streets of Southern California sets a good example and gives him confidence about efforts to head off terrorism here.

"It's a model for the rest of the country," Mueller said. "With the contribution of first responders and the law enforcement intelligence component, it's the type of fusion you need to prevent terrorist attacks and to follow up on any threats of any terrorist attacks."

Mueller said the center is tangible proof of improved cooperation among agencies in the post-9/11 era. "It enhances our partnership with the Los Angeles Police Department and Los Angeles [County] Sheriff's Department," he said. "They are doing a great job."

Mueller was accompanied on the tour and briefing by L.A. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton, who are lobbying federal officials to expand sharing of federal crime databases with agencies in Southern California.

The mayor called the center "the crown jewel of our effort to address counter-terrorism and homeland security here in Los Angeles."

About 30 analysts from federal and local law enforcement agencies work at the center, which has received about 500 tips from the public and other sources since opening in July.

Asked whether the center has foiled any terrorist plots since opening, Bratton said, "I can't speak to the terrorism issue with specificity other than the fact that since it's been up and running, there have been no major or significant incidents of concern."

Bratton said the effort to combat terrorism is part of a larger cooperative venture to have agencies share crime data. Officials from the LAPD and Sheriff's Department met Thursday with representatives of dozens of police departments in the county about pooling data through a computer system called CopLink. The system is already in use by the LAPD and Sheriff's Department.

That system would link all the disparate law enforcement databases to allow analysts at the center and police investigators to call up information from anywhere in the county, including the names of people arrested, cited or interviewed by officers or thought to be involved in crimes.

"It will be helpful to deal with not only terrorism concerns, but also crime concerns," Bratton said. "It will be a cornerstone of the local gang initiative we just announced. We will have the ability for the first time for agencies throughout the county to put information into the same file."

The police chief said he talked to Mueller on Friday about the desire of local law enforcement to connect CopLink to a federal crime database called Links.

"It would give us access to federal intelligence files, criminal and terrorism-related, so we would then have the most comprehensive set of intelligence files in the country," Bratton said.

The chief said he plans a trip to Washington, D.C., to follow up his talks with Mueller on gaining access to the federal database.

*

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

NY Court: FBI May Have Coerced Filmmaker (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-An effort by the FBI and federal prosecutors to remove a short fictional film about a military takeover of New York City from the Internet may have violated the First Amendment, a federal appeals court said Friday.

But the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan said a lower court was still correct to toss out a lawsuit brought against an FBI agent and a federal prosecutor by a web hosting service operator and Michael Zieper, who wrote, directed and produced the film.

The appeals court said in a written opinion that the FBI agent, Joseph Metzinger, and the assistant U.S. attorney, Lisa Korologos, were immune from the lawsuit because it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer in their position that they were doing anything wrong.

Metzinger and Korologos got involved Nov. 8, 1999, when the New York Police Department faxed information to the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force about the film, "Military Takeover of New York City."

The film includes various shots of Times Square as an unseen narrator who purports to be a military officer briefs other members of the military about plans for a military takeover of Times Square on New Year's Eve 1999.

The appeals court said Metzinger and Korologos were free to ask filmmaker Zieper and Web site operator Mark Wieger to take the film down - but Metzinger went too far when he said that FBI agents were heading to Zieper's home and he could not stop them.

"A reasonable juror could conclude that some of the defendants' actions here did cross the sometimes fine line between an attempt to convince and an attempt to coerce," the appeals court wrote.

While Metzinger spoke in a polite and non-threatening tone, and did not refer to criminal statutes or legal consequences, he never made it clear that Zieper's actions were lawful or that he would not face consequences for making the video public, the court said. It cautioned public officials "to make sure that the totality of their actions do not convey a threat even when their words do not."

Metzinger told Wieger he was worried the film could incite a riot. Wieger blocked web access to the film beginning Nov. 15, 1999, but restored it 11 days later.

Yusill Scribner, a spokeswoman for federal prosecutors in New York, said the government had no comment.

Aden Fine, an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer who represented the plaintiffs, said the decision shows that even if "government officials government officials use a polite tone and don't directly issue threats, they can violate an individual's First Amendment rights."

Pelosi Urges Halt To Prosecution Of Chronicle Writers Letter To Attorney General Also Calls For Federal Shield Law (SFC)

By Zachary Coile, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, January 20, 2007

Washington -- House Speaker Nancy Pelosi added her voice Friday to a growing list of lawmakers urging Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to drop the prosecution of two Chronicle reporters who face 18 months in prison for refusing to name their sources for stories about steroid use in professional sports.

Pelosi, in a three-paragraph letter, called on Gonzales to withdraw the subpoenas of Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada asking them to identify their confidential sources.

Pelosi was seeking to ratchet up the pressure after two top lawmakers -- new Democratic House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers of Michigan and Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, the top Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee -- asked Gonzales in a letter Thursday to rescind the subpoenas.

"I ask that you give favorable consideration to their bipartisan request for relief," Pelosi wrote in her letter to the attorney general. "Freedom of the press is critical for our democracy and for informing our citizens about public policy issues."

The Justice Department did not respond to a request for comment on the letter. But a spokeswoman said Thursday that the agency subpoenas journalists "only when absolutely necessary."

Fainaru-Wada and Williams were ruled in contempt of court in September by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White for refusing to testify to a grand jury investigating who leaked transcripts in the steroid distribution case involving the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative.

White sentenced Fainaru-Wada and Williams to up to 18 months in prison and imposed a $1,000-a-day fine on The Chronicle, but he suspended those penalties pending an appeal.

A panel of the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco is scheduled to hear the case in March.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote articles in 2004 that quoted grand jury testimony of athletes describing their use of substances supplied by the lab known as BALCO.

Pelosi met Thursday with Fainaru-Wada and Chronicle Editor Phil Bronstein in her Capitol Hill office, where she "expressed admiration to the reporters for their stories and for the public service they have done, as well as her concern about some of these prosecutions and that reporters are going to jail," her spokesman Brendan Daly said.

Pelosi has pledged to support a federal media shield law, which would protect journalists in most cases from being forced to disclose their confidential sources. The measure stalled last year in the GOP-led Congress and faces major hurdles even in a Democrat-controlled Congress.

Pelosi insisted she sees the bill as vital to protecting the freedom of the press.

"That's why I have expressed support for a federal shield law, so that the policies and actions of the United States Government seek to protect and preserve that freedom," Pelosi told Gonzales in the letter.

E-mail Zachary Coile at zcoile@sfchronicle.com.

Top Lawmaker Demands Answers From Justice Department (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 20, 2007

The ranking member of a House committee is demanding answers from the Justice Department about recent reports in The New York Sun that intelligence agencies failed to cooperate with FBI investigations into leaks of classified material and that the FBI's files on some leak probes have disappeared.

The top Republican on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, Rep. Thomas Davis of Virginia, said he was troubled by the Sun's report last week that FBI documents showed at least three leak investigations appeared to have been closed after case agents repeatedly complained about a lack of cooperation from the "victim agency."

"The FBI holds itself out as the premiere investigative agency for the United States. As such, I find it hard to believe the FBI closes espionage leak investigations simply because another agency refuses to cooperate," Mr. Davis wrote Friday in a letter to Attorney General Gonzales.

At a press conference last month, President Bush again decried leaks of classified information. "It's an ongoing problem," the president said. "At some point in time, it would be helpful if we can find somebody inside our government who is leaking materials, clearly against the law, that they be held to account."

Mr. Davis wrote, "How can we ensure, as the President requested, those who leak classified information 'be held to account,' if the Department of Justice (DOJ) does not insist on pursuing investigative leads?"

The Sun's report about the alleged non-cooperation with leak probes was based on documents obtained under a federal Freedom of Information Act lawsuit brought by this reporter. The released records were heavily redacted to protect classified information, privacy, and investigative methods, the FBI said.

The Sun reported last month that a declaration filed by the FBI in connection with the Freedom of Information Act lawsuit indicated that 22 of 94 files believed to relate to recent leak investigations were missing from the bureau's file room with no indication of who had removed them.

Mr. Davis asked Mr. Gonzales to provide information on how the chief of the Justice Department's Counterespionage Section, John Dion, responded to the FBI's requests to close the leak investigations. The congressman also asked for details on what happened to the missing files.

A Justice Department spokesman told the Sun last week that Mr. Dion believes agencies generally provide good cooperation with leak probes. Prosecutors declined to discuss ther individual cases in which problems were reported.

Mr. Davis's letter Friday questioning the Justice Department's actions on classified leaks came one day after the congressman joined with the Democratic chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, to complain that prosecutors were being too aggressive in pursuing leaks of secret grand jury testimony in an investigation into steroid use in professional sports. Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters are facing possible jail time for refusing to name their sources in that case.

"At most, the violation at issue is a breach of a court-sanctioned protective order," Messrs. Davis and Conyers wrote in a letter also addressed to Mr. Gonzales. "While the sanctity of a protective order is an important interest, this case is significantly different from others involving a breach of national security, terrorism, or serious criminal conduct."

The two congressmen asked Mr. Gonzales to withdraw the subpoenas to the journalists.

Physician Gets 2-year Prison Sentence (CINPOST)

Cincinnati (OH) Post, January 20, 2007

A Cincinnati doctor was sentenced to two years in prison Friday in connection with drug abuse in pain clinics where he worked.

Dr. Gregory L. Ebner, 55, pleaded guilty in June to money laundering and structuring money transactions illegally. He also faces three years supervised release and a $10,000 fine, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Starting in January 2001, Ebner worked in pain clinics in the southern Ohio towns of Lucasville, Chillicothe, Hanging Rock and Jackson.

A clinic would open for a short time, then move to another location in a nearby town after law enforcement officers started to investigate, prosecutors said.

Ebner worked in the clinics two or three days a week and saw 60 to 70 patients a day, according to federal court records.

He prescribed pain relievers such as Lorcet and Xanax after cursory exams, never checking the height, weight or blood pressure of patients. He never maintained any diagnostic equipment at the clinics.

Patients paid $175 to $200 per visit, with only cash payments allowed, prosecutors said. Patients who asked for refills were charged the same amount, but didn't have to make an office visit.

All patients received prescriptions called into a pharmacy. Many patients signed an agreement to use only the South Shore Pharmacy in South Shore, Ky., across the Ohio river from the clinics.

Ebner admitted his work at the pain clinics was below standards for medical practices, according to the Justice Department.

Ebner split the patient payments with the owner of the pain clinics, William Jewell Jr. Ebner broke the payments into smaller amounts, typically less than $10,000, and deposited them in his personal bank account to avoid reporting requirements.

Ebner took the illegal proceeds and wrote checks for investments, including a down payment on real estate and payment of his home mortgage.

Jewell and Nico Capurro, another Cincinnati doctor who worked in the clinics, were indicted in September on charges of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances.

Capurro, who resigned as Clermont County coroner in 2002 after 20 years in that post, also faces three counts of money laundering and three counts of structuring money transactions. Jewell also faces one count of money laundering.

They have pleaded not guilty to all charges and are free on bail pending trial.

Ebert is to surrender to the Bureau of Prisons on March 19.

DOJ_NMG_0119958

IMMIGRATION:

Labor Groups, Business Seek Immigration Law Overhaul (WP)

By Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Worried that surprise raids are driving away workers who are their lifeblood, businesses are pooling their money and joining unusually broad alliances that include labor unions and civil rights groups to push Congress to overhaul the nation's immigration laws.

The coalition Alliance for Immigration Reform 2007 announced its formation this week, placing the force of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Service Employees International Union and the nation's largest Hispanic civil rights group behind a unified lobbying effort to get a law passed before the politics of the 2008 presidential campaign make a compromise on the contentious issue unworkable.

Pressure has been building on employers and labor as the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency becomes more active. Last month, its agents raided Swift & Co., a participant in a government pilot program that runs Social Security numbers through a federal database. The raids sent hundreds of undocumented immigrants to detention centers and jolted business groups.

"It proved that the current system doesn't work . . . and is failing everybody," R. Bruce Josten, executive vice president of the chamber, said during a conference call Thursday.

Business groups paint a dire picture of a U.S. economy without the country's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants. The National Restaurant Association says jobs in food service are growing one and a half times as fast as the U.S. labor force. And the construction industry needs 250,000 new workers per year to replace its aging workforce, according to Associated Builders and Contractors.

Proponents of a plan to legalize undocumented workers say this year offers an important window. President Bush and the Democratic-controlled Congress have called immigration reform a priority, and the coalition considers a Senate bill last year that provided a path to citizenship for undocumented workers a blueprint for the policy. That legislation stalled in November when the House and Senate could not hash out a compromise.

The table is now set, said Cecilia MuÃ±oz, vice president of the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights group. "Over the course of the last year the policy ideas have really come into focus."

To hold the marriage of business and labor and right- and left-leaning politics together, the coalition's ideal bill would include both a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already here and more visas for temporary workers, said Douglas G. Rivlin, spokesman for the National Immigration Forum, which is a member of the alliance.

The coalition splinters on the details. Labor unions advocate a new kind of visa that would not make the immigration status of temporary workers dependent upon their employers. Business groups want the visa program to be as simple as possible.

In opposition are groups such as the Minutemen, which raised nearly $1 million for its political action committee last year, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. The money was used primarily to back candidates who support building physical barriers to illegal immigration and deporting those who are here illegally.

Several of the candidates that the group supported, including Arizona Republican Randy Graf, lost in November, and the Republican Party in general ceded a large share of the Hispanic vote, a signal to some that tough enforcement policies are not politically popular. The Alliance for Immigration Reform said it has a significant budget and will marshal the coalition's resources to push its message.

"We can keep the heat on the back of the neck of the leadership to get this thing done," the chamber's Josten said.

Congress has not yet begun formally negotiating immigration legislation. Alliance members estimate they will need 70 to 80 percent of the Democrats and 30 to 50 percent of the Republicans in both chambers to get a law passed.

"This is not a Democratic slam dunk, and it's not a Bush slam dunk," Rivlin said. "It's going to take a lot of working together to get things done."

Immigration Stagnation (WP)

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

FOR MOST people living in the United States, the amount of time and money wasted in bureaucratic Washington is a distressing but distant annoyance. For some, however, the inefficiencies cause daily hardship -- and harm U.S. interests in the process.

DOJ_NMG_0119959

Just ask Shmul Kaplan, an 80-year-old amputee and Ukrainian immigrant whom The Post's Darryl Fears wrote about last month. Granted asylum in 1997, Mr. Kaplan has waited -- and waited -- for his naturalization papers to come through. After seven years of patience, he lost his Supplemental Security Income because he did not gain citizenship in time to retain federal benefits. He currently lives on $215 a month for rent and $140 in food stamps. Now lawyers are pursuing a class action lawsuit on behalf of the Shmul Kaplans in this country against a range of federal agencies complicit in delaying their citizenship applications and denying them benefits.

The Post's Spencer S. Hsu reported that U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, a successor to the much-maligned Immigration and Naturalization Service, is overwhelmed and has failed to pursue basic administrative and technical reforms. A recent congressional investigation revealed that immigration officers had lost track of 111,000 files. A report released this month by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general faults Citizenship and Immigration Services as remaining "entrenched in a cycle of continual planning, with limited progress toward achieving its long-term transformation goals."

Despite these difficulties, Homeland Security lists its progress on immigration services as an accomplishment of the past year, pointing out that it has eliminated its backlog of applications, which stood at 3.8 million in 2004. Not so the FBI, which checks the names of those applying for citizenship. If an applicant's name is too similar to that of someone on a federal watch list, the FBI runs a background investigation, a procedure that can take months.

The FBI admits that 100,000 background checks have sat uncompleted for a year or longer. The bureau insists that it is speeding its work and that the immigration agency can tag names for expedited service. There is, it seems, plenty of blame to go around.

America hardly encourages foreigners to enter and live in the country legally when simply processing their naturalization forms can take years. Citizenship and Immigration Services needs to cut its wait times by making a rapid transition to electronic forms and better organizing reform efforts. And the FBI must conduct background checks more efficiently. The roughly 6,000 disabled asylum seekers who, the lawsuit alleges, lost their benefits will be suffering in the meantime.

Bush Comments On Agents Who Shot Suspected Drug Dealer (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — President Bush waded this week into the furor surrounding two former border patrol agents who were each convicted and sentenced to more than a decade in prison in the shooting of a suspected Mexican drug dealer in Texas.

The case has become something of a cause among some advocates for tougher border security, who argue that the agents should be pardoned because they were doing their jobs in 2005 when they fired on the man, an assertion that has been contested by the federal prosecutors overseeing the case.

In an interview with KFOX-TV in El Paso, Mr. Bush was asked on Thursday whether he would consider a pardon for the two former agents, Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who began serving their federal prison sentences of 11 years and 12 years respectively this week.

“There are standards that need to be met in law enforcement, and according to a jury of their peers, these officers violated some standards,” Mr. Bush said. “On this case, people need to take a hard look at the facts, at the evidence that the jury looked at, as well as a judge. And that’s — I will do the same thing.”

“Now, there’s a process for pardons,” he continued. “I mean, it’s got to work its way through a system here in government. But I just want people to take a sober look at the reality. It’s a case, as you said, it’s got a lot of emotions.”

Some interpreted Mr. Bush’s remarks to imply that he would consider a pardon for the two men. But Justice Department officials said on Friday that the two men were ineligible for consideration of a pardon at this time.

Requests for pardons, which are screened by the Justice Department before being considered by the White House, are not considered until at least five years after a petitioner has been convicted or released from jail or prison, according to the department’s guidelines.

A commutation of sentence, which reduces the period of incarceration, is not generally considered for people who are appealing their convictions, the guidelines said.

The two former agents have said they will appeal their convictions.

Johnny Sutton, the United States attorney who oversaw prosecution of the case, , dismissed the idea that the two men were simply doing their jobs or defending themselves. During their trial, the agents said they had scuffled with the suspected drug dealer, who they believed had a gun, before firing at him.

“Nothing could be further from the truth,” Mr. Sutton said in a statement last week, noting that the two men did not report the shooting to their superiors.

DOJ_NMG_0119960

“These agents shot someone who they knew to be unarmed and running away,” Mr. Sutton said. “They destroyed evidence, covered up a crime scene and then filed false reports about what happened. It is shocking that there are people who believe it is O.K. for agents to shoot an unarmed suspect who is running away.”

Hunter Asks Congress To Pardon Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

A California congressman has introduced legislation calling for a congressional pardon for two U.S. Border Patrol agents sent to prison this week for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks as he fled back into Mexico.

Rep. Duncan Hunter also asked that pending any legislative action of the Congressional Pardon for Border Patrol Agents Ramos and Compean Act, that the two agents -- Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28 -- be segregated from the general prison population to ensure their safety.

"The Border Patrol is America's first line of defense against the constant and unrelenting efforts of drug and human smugglers to illegally enter the United States," said the nine-term Republican. "Agents Compean and Ramos fulfilled their responsibilities as Border Patrol agents and rightfully pursued a suspected and fleeing drug smuggler.

"It is irresponsible to punish them with jail time," he said.

The two agents surrendered on Wednesday for shooting drug-smuggling suspect Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila after he refused their orders to halt, abandoned his van along the Rio Grande with 743 pounds of marijuana inside, assaulted Compean, who tried to block his dash into Mexico, and then fled to a waiting van in Mexico.

During the trial, Ramos' attorney, Mary Stillinger, had argued that her client shot in defense of Compean, saying Ramos saw his partner on the ground and that when Aldrete-Davila turned toward the agents Compean believed he was holding a weapon.

She and Maria Ramirez, one of Compean's attorneys, also told the jury that more than half a dozen other Border Patrol agents, including two supervisors, were at the scene of the shooting and did not report anything.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Diane Kanof said during trial that Ramos and Compean violated Aldrete-Davila's civil rights by shooting and that the agents had violated Border Patrol policies by chasing the fleeing suspect.

Aldrete-Davila has said he plans to file a $5 million civil rights lawsuit against the government.

The agents turned themselves over to U.S. marshals at the federal courthouse in El Paso, Texas, to begin 11- and 12-year sentences, respectively. Both were taken to the county jail where they will wait for transportation to their assigned federal prisons. Ramos is expected to serve his time in Mississippi and Compean in Ohio.

"We cannot turn our back on Agents Compean and Ramos or the rest of the men and women proudly serving in the U.S. Border Patrol," Mr. Hunter said. "These two agents deserve our full support and the congressional pardon provided by this legislation."

Ramos, a 10-year Border Patrol veteran and former Agent of the Year nominee, and Compean, a five-year member of the force, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

The conviction came after Aldrete-Davila was found in Mexico by Department of Homeland Security investigators and given immunity by U.S. prosecutors against any drug charges in exchange for his testimony against the agents.

The immunity agreement protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in the United States with drug smuggling.

TAX:

W. Palm Commissioner Resigns (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina And Nancy L. Othón, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 20, 2007

West Palm Beach · City Commissioner James Exline resigned his seat Friday and will be charged with a single count of tax evasion in coming weeks, his attorney said.

Attorney Robert Gershman said Exline failed to report approximately $60,000 in income during the 2004 tax year but would not say where his client got that income.

The Palm Beach County State Attorney's Office is running a grand jury investigation into possible corruption and conflicts of interest among city officials. The charge Exline faces, however, is a federal charge, Gershman said.

DOJ_NMG_0119961

Exline, 42, a former city planner who was first appointed to his seat in 1999, has been cooperating with law enforcement officials for several months and will not face further charges, Gershman said.

"He has been cooperating and has been honest and straightforward, and available to local, state and federal authorities for anything at any time," Gershman said. "The money had no bearing on his official actions as a city commissioner."

The tax evasion charge is punishable by up to five years in prison and $100,000 in fines. Exline will be allowed to surrender when the charge is filed, Gershman said.

"We are well aware West Palm Beach City Commissioner Exline is resigning [Friday]. However, our office is not going to be commenting on whether any charges are likely at this time," U.S. Attorney's Office spokeswoman Alicia Valle said.

Exline is the second city commissioner to resign under a cloud in the past year, and his departure is sure to fuel the distrust residents have expressed in recent months.

Former Commissioner Ray Liberti, 60, pleaded guilty in May to federal charges of mail fraud and obstruction of justice in a case that triggered the wider corruption investigation.

Liberti admitted he used his public office to help two real estate investors press the owners of a West Palm Beach massage parlor and a nightclub into selling their businesses at below-market prices. In return for his help, he received $66,000 in cash and an expensive TAG Heuer watch. He was sentenced in October to 18 months in prison.

Exline delivered his resignation letter to City Manager Edward Mitchell about 4 p.m. Friday. He made no mention of why he was resigning.

"I am thankful to have participated in the growth and redevelopment of the city's neighborhoods and downtown," Exline wrote. "I am certain the positive commission work will continue and the city will flourish."

Exline has a planning business, Urban Land Consulting, in downtown. City officials wiped his biography from the city's Web site within an hour of his resignation. He represented central and northern portions of the city.

He could face prison time or lesser sanctions such as house arrest or probation, Gershman said. Exline has already paid the roughly $18,000 in taxes that he owes, Gershman said.

Although Commissioner Kimberly Mitchell said she had heard Exline's resignation was imminent, she was almost at a loss for words Friday.

"I am just, I'm sad for the city. That's how I feel about it," Mitchell said. "I honestly have no idea what this particular issue revolves around, but I just think for the trust that sits out there -- and that is on shaky ground at best -- this serves as another blow to the people. And that part of it really makes me very sad, as a resident and as somebody who gives my heart and soul and brain to public service."

The state grand jury investigation has been focusing primarily on the city's new $154 million city hall-library complex, City Center, now under construction downtown, as well as other city contracts. A number of city officials, including Mayor Lois Frankel and commissioners, have testified before the grand jury.

Within days of Liberti's charges, Frankel announced she had discovered Liberti was on the payroll of a consulting firm involved in the selection of contractors to build City Center. Frankel said she found that Liberti, beginning in 2003, was paid $5,000 a month and later $8,000 a month for consulting work. The city ended its contract with the consulting firm.

Palm Beach County State Attorney Barry Krischer launched the grand jury investigation a few weeks later. Krischer's spokesman, Michael Edmondson, said the grand jury was expected to finish its work in several weeks.

Frankel said she did not know the circumstances surrounding Exline's unreported income or whether it was connected to his actions in office.

"I would not know. My office talked to the U.S. Attorney's Office that the resignation involves a personal tax matter," Frankel said. "That is what Mr. Exline told me, and that was what we were told."

Commissioner Bill Moss said that as far as he knows, the charge has nothing to do with city business.

"If he was resigning because of something to do with corruption, then I would say, `What's going on here?'" Moss said. "I don't see this affecting the city. I hope we can get back to running the government like we were elected to do."

Exline Resigns Post Under Tax Cloud (PALMBEACHP)

By Thomas R. Collins, Susan Spencer-Wendel , Tony Doris, Palm Beach Post Staff Writers

Palm Beach Post (FL), January 20, 2007

WEST PALM BEACH — Jim Exline resigned from his city commission seat Friday and plans to plead guilty to a tax evasion charge that he said will be filed in the next few weeks by federal prosecutors, with whom he has been cooperating since June.

He could face a sentence ranging from five years in prison and a $100,000 fine all the way down to probation, said his attorney, Robert Gershman.

Exline's departure adds more intrigue to a busy election season in which Mayor Lois Frankel faces former City Commissioner Al Zucaro.

Commissioners will appoint a replacement, who will serve less than a month until voters choose a permanent successor in the March 13 election.

Exline is the second city commissioner to resign in response to federal charges in the past eight months, following Ray Liberti's departure in May.

Exline, 42, said he did not report $60,000 in income earned in 2004, avoiding a payment of $18,000 in taxes.

"I was going through my divorce, and I didn't disclose all my income," the former commissioner said. Neither he nor his attorney would say where that money came from, other than to say, in Gershman's words, that it was "ordinary business income."

Exline agreed to a lengthy interview with The Palm Beach Post on Friday afternoon in order to underscore his cooperation with federal authorities, try to salvage his reputation as a public servant in his hometown and attempt to avoid being lumped with recent public corruption cases involving former Palm Beach County Commissioner Tony Masilotti and Liberti, Exline's former colleague who is now serving a federal prison term.

Dressed casually in an untucked white shirt, blue jeans and brown loafers, Exline said in his attorney's office that he is optimistic he will avoid prison.

"I think the chances are very minimal," he said.

His attorney said, "I do not see the reason to punish him beyond the felony conviction he is already going to obtain."

But Gershman acknowledged the sentence ultimately will be up to a federal judge.

In terms of image, there is much for Exline to overcome. His resignation comes after open criticism and public demands for his resignation from city residents. They said they were troubled over his votes to annex property owned by developer and former Palm Beach County Administrator John Sansbury in 2004. The annexation boosted the property's value at a time when Exline was working as a sales agent for Sansbury's realty firm.

Seven months after the annexation votes, Exline received 100 percent of the commission on a land sale as an agent for Sansbury's firm.

On Friday, Exline said he approached federal prosecutors about the unpaid taxes in June. He said he offered to resign on the spot, but the authorities wanted him to stay in his post while he cooperated with them.

"Jim has made himself available to state and federal investigators for any questions they had," Gershman said. "The authorities were asking questions about anything and everything."

He added, "It was not only limited to the recent headlines," referring to the public corruption cases that have engulfed Palm Beach County since May.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John Kastrenakas declined to comment on Exline.

Exline's first meeting with federal investigators came shortly after it was publicly disclosed, in the last week of May, that a federal grand jury was investigating a land deal involving Masilotti.

But Exline said he did not have any legal concerns other than the tax matter when he talked to federal officials.

"My issue has always been my taxes and not anything else," he said.

On the annexation matter, he said, "I didn't think I did anything wrong."

However, he now wishes he had disclosed his ties to Sansbury at the time of the annexation votes.

"If I look back now, to have been safe I would have disclosed it because I know now more than I knew then," he said. "I had never received any financial benefit, and that was my test."

State ethics officials would not issue a formal opinion because one was never formally requested.

Exline has been involved in a variety of business ventures, including his land planning firm, Urban Land Consulting; a tanning salon in Jupiter he has since sold; and a Rotelli Pizza & Pasta restaurant in Boca Raton that he owns along with his brother-in-law and nephew.

A Rotelli location in the Esperante building in downtown West Palm Beach, also partly owned by Exline, is set to open Tuesday or Wednesday, Exline said.

But he has had financial troubles. He was sued by the credit-card company MBNA for failing to pay more than $37,000 in charges. He blamed the troubles on spending by his ex-wife, Cuban-born Yusdaly Brito Gonzalez, 15 years his junior, from whom he was divorced in 2005.

In the divorce filing, Exline reported three unpaid credit-card balances, including the one with MBNA, totaling $97,593. MBNA is the only company that filed suit in Palm Beach County Circuit Court. The lawsuit was settled for an undisclosed amount.

Exline said he was addressing the other debt as well.

He bought Tan Lines of Jupiter in July 2002 for $20,000 and sold it for $85,000 in March 2005, he said. A divorce filing by Exline, filed about two weeks before the sale, estimated the current fair market value at $25,000 and said the business was losing $931 a month.

As a city commissioner, Exline earned $30,000 a year. Plus, Exline - like the other city commissioners, the mayor and other top city employees - has benefited from a premium health-care plan in which he is reimbursed for all of his out-of-pocket medical expenses, including up to $10,000 a year for dental work.

On Friday, Exline did his best to express hope for his future.

He is excited about the Rotelli restaurant's opening in West Palm Beach. His brother-in-law, Jeffery R. Smith, is the nationwide chain's chief operating officer.

Exline said he would probably have to sell his shares in the Rotelli restaurants once convicted on the tax charges because, with a felony record, he would not be able to hold a beer and wine license.

He hopes to participate in the chain's Rotelli Express concept, in which alcohol is not sold.

Nonetheless, he said, he would remain in West Palm Beach, devote more time to his planning firm and possibly branch out into development.

"I'll do other things. I'll be fine," Exline said. "I'm a very smart, very creative person."

He said he would begin with modest development projects.

"I would like to start doing small retail and small office projects and start from there," he said.

He believes he can attract clients to his planning firm.

"My clients who know me and the people who knew me know I am honest and ethical and I do a good job."

Exline emphasized his years of work for the city. He worked in city hall as a planner from 1988 to 1994. In 1991, he made an unsuccessful run for mayor. He also has served as a member of the Treasure Coast Regional Planning Council and the traffic-planning board, the Metropolitan Planning Organization.

Aside from government work, he also has been a member of the board of the Salvation Army Community Center advisory board, giving guidance to a center serving children and teenagers.

But as a commissioner, Exline lately had found himself under siege. Residents, infuriated by what they saw as ethical transgressions, openly questioned why he was still on the dais and occasionally held up signs in the commission chambers demanding that he leave office.

Other residents, including Denise Smith-Barnes, his opponent in last March's election, described him as an ineffective representative for their district. In recent months, as north-end residents stormed city-hall chambers in public meetings to complain of rampant crime, Exline frequently did not have much to say.

Mayor Lois Frankel said Exline's resignation may bring a measure of relief to city affairs.

"I think that all these allegations, they create a cloud, and I, for one, I'm glad that we get this behind us," she said. "I'm not happy it happened, but there's been so much speculation. I don't know the merit of the speculation."

Exline said the group criticizing him was small.

"I would call them more of an opposition group," he said. "That was the only thing they could come up with - that I wasn't at enough city events."

He credits his help as a commissioner in creating "a new neighborhood downtown," peopled with new residents living in condos. He also says he helped clean up his north-end district, acting as the commission's liaison to a code enforcement task force.

Throughout his time as commissioner, Exline said, he sacrificed work in his planning business, lest he work with clients presenting a conflict of interest.

"Over the years, I've walked away from hundreds of thousands of dollars in planning fees," he said. "And I've never argued about it. It was my choice."

The bottom line, he said, was that he has a lot of basics in life to remain happy about.

"I'm very thankful for what I have," he said. "My friends are behind me. My family's behind me. I've got a good attorney. And I'm thankful."

Scandals Keep Growing (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), January 20, 2007

The unprecedented level of government scandal in Palm Beach County went higher Friday with the forced resignation of West Palm Beach City Commissioner Jim Exline, who faces a federal tax evasion charge over an alleged $60,000 in unreported income from 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0119964

If convicted, Mr. Exline could be sentenced to as many as five years in prison and fined $100,000. He is the second city commissioner to resign because of criminal charges within the past year. Ray Liberti left office in May and is serving time in federal prison after pleading guilty to fraud and obstruction charges.

Federal investigators, including the FBI, also have forced the resignation of ex-County Commissioner Tony Masilotti, who last week pleaded guilty to a corruption charge stemming from a series of land deals in Martin County. He did those deals with falsified documents that The Palm Beach Post uncovered. Two of Masilotti's business associates also face charges, and the federal investigation is continuing. A state grand jury has been investigating allegations of a "pay-to-play" culture within West Palm Beach government for months, and Commissioner Exline's departure adds new interest to that work.

In August, The Post reported a pattern of conflicted interests with Commissioner Exline that included using his position to advance real estate deals for himself and his own business associates. He used his vote as commissioner in 2004 to approve land annexation that benefited Sansbury Realty, where he was licensed as a sales associate. Six months after the vote, company owner John Sansbury paid him a $36,400 commission on the sale of a building a couple of blocks from City Hall. Mr. Exline also has admitted frequenting a Boynton Beach strip club whose owners were convicted as part of federal prostitution, money laundering and arson investigations.

Commissioner Exline's attorney, Robert Gershman, says his client intends to cooperate with authorities. That cooperation should include disclosing pay-to-play dealings that may have occurred in a city where conflicts of interest appear to be part of the culture of doing business. Clearly, federal investigators have no shortage of leads to follow in Palm Beach County. The longer they go after criminal activity by public officials, the better it will be for the public.

Justice Dept. Sues Local Tax Preparer (KZGAZETTE)

By Jane C. Parikh

Kalamazoo Gazette (MI), January 20, 2007

Portage resident Donald A. Gray is being sued by the U.S. Department of Justice for allegedly filing false income-tax returns on behalf of clients, resulting so far in an estimated $1.5 million in tax losses.

Justice department spokesman Andrew Ames said he did not know how many returns that may involve.

Gray is among four Michigan men being sued by the justice department for allegedly filing false income-tax returns for clients. The lawsuits seek to prevent the four men from filing more income-tax returns.

Gray, who lists himself as a certified public accountant in the telephone book, did not return phone calls Friday from the Kalamazoo Gazette seeking comment. The lawsuit against Gray was filed Jan. 16 in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Michigan in Grand Rapids.

It alleges that, ``Since 2004, Gray has been preparing false federal income-tax returns and related forms for customers to fraudulently under-report their income. On the returns he prepares for customers, Gray falsely states that he is a licensed CPA."

The lawsuit said Gray either ``falsely reports that his customer received no income or Gray substantially under-reports his customer's income, and fraudulently claims a refund of all federal taxes withheld from his customer's wages."

There was no immediate word on what would happen to, or what should be done by, individuals whose tax returns were prepared in such a manner.

According to documents, the other area men identified by the Department of Justice as having committed tax fraud are: Charles Conces, of Battle Creek; Peter Eric Hendrickson, of Commerce Township; and Robert L. Mosher, of Cedar Springs.

Justice department officials charge in the lawsuit that Gray is following a scheme promoted by Hendrickson who operates a Web site called losthorizons.com.

Ames declined to answer questions directly related to the lawsuits. He said Friday that since 2001 the justice department has issued about 215 injunctions against tax preparers who file false income-tax returns for clients.

``It's happening all across the country," Ames said. ``The (Internal Revenue Service) conducts audits and reviews, and if (the offense) is serious enough, it's turned over to us."

He said if criminal complaints are brought forth, the IRS would determine the penalties.

In a press release issued by the justice department about Gray's lawsuit, Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the justice department's tax division, said, ``People who prepare fraudulent tax returns expose themselves and their customers to the risk of substantial civil penalties and criminal prosecution."

High Court Considers Tax Authority Case (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119965

WASHINGTON - Foreign countries fighting New York City's effort to collect property taxes will get the chance to make their case to the Supreme Court.

The justices said Friday they will review a lower court ruling allowing the city to sue countries that own property near the United Nations over unpaid taxes.

The city has battled over property taxes for years with countries that house their consulates and diplomatic missions in Manhattan skyscrapers.

Under U.S. treaties, embassies and other diplomatic buildings are generally tax-exempt, but the city claims some countries are refusing to pay taxes on real estate used for non-diplomatic purposes, such as restaurants and apartments.

Two countries sued by the city, India and Mongolia, had argued that sovereign immunity meant they couldn't be sued in U.S. courts.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled last April, affirming a lower-court decision, that federal courts have the power to resolve such disputes.

The city is seeking $16.4 million in unpaid taxes and interest from India and $2.1 million from Mongolia, the Justice Department said in legal papers filed in support of the foreign governments.

New York City has singled out only a few countries with lawsuits. It has failed in attempts to collect taxes from other countries, including Hungary, Libya, Rwanda, Nigeria and Uganda. Turkey settled a lawsuit for $5 million, far less than the city initially said it owed.

A federal law requires the U.S. government to withhold some aid to nations that fail to pay real estate taxes on buildings in New York or Washington, D.C., but only if a U.S. court decides that the debts are valid.

The case is Permanent Mission of India v. New York, 06-134.

IRS May Widen Probe Of Fees On Municipal Investment Contracts (BLOOM)

By Darrell Preston

Bloomberg, January 20, 2007

Jan. 19 (Bloomberg) -- The Internal Revenue Service may widen its examination of municipal bond reinvestment practices amid a U.S. criminal probe of whether financial firms rigged bids on investment contracts bought by local governments, the head of the agency's tax-exempt bond enforcement division said.

The IRS, which has focused its scrutiny on investment contract fees related to housing and non-profit debt, may broaden the scope of its audits to other types of municipal bonds, said Clifford Gannett, director of the IRS's tax-exempt bond enforcement office, in comments yesterday in Washington at a meeting of the Government Finance Officers Association.

IRS investigations have found that improper bidding practices by financial firms for investment contracts with local governments may have deprived the U.S. of money it was owed. The findings prompted the widest antitrust probe of the municipal bond market, where local governments have $2.3 trillion of debt outstanding.

``We're going methodically, there could be more out there," Gannett said.

The Justice Department, in connection with the IRS and Securities and Exchange Commission, is investigating whether bankers and brokers conspired to fix prices on the contracts. U.S. prosecutors in November subpoenaed more than a dozen financial firms and seized documents from three brokers.

Gannett said the 64 employees in his office have been helping with the criminal investigation.

Market Integrity

The IRS allows state and local governments to sell bonds exempt from federal income tax, requiring that municipalities rebate much of the earnings they reap from reinvesting tax- exempt bond proceeds to the Treasury. To ``ensure the integrity of the market," the IRS has a responsibility to seek out those who take advantage of the subsidy, Gannett said.

In 2006, the IRS examined 30 bond financings by charitable groups, mostly for low-income housing, Gannett said. In four, the IRS found no irregularities, he said. The other 26 are in ``various states of development."

Gannett said the IRS has ``seen all kinds of irregularities in bids" on investment contracts and ``mechanisms to pull fees out" and would like to see changes in how firms are awarded the business, such as by increasing the use of electronic bidding. The IRS also plans to look at non-profit corporations that sold tax-exempt bonds and then gave up their non-profit status. Some may still have outstanding tax-exempt bonds, he said.

The IRS isn't limiting its review just to investment contracts and continues to look for other irregularities that may force it to examine the tax-exempt bond status of issues it finds abusive, Gannett said.

Railroads Seek Tax Aid (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

DOJ_NMG_0119966

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The 400 small, often money-losing, railroads that connect isolated farm towns to major rail lines won a minor tax break from Congress in 2004 after strenuous lobbying -- only to see the Internal Revenue Service write rules last September that limited the subsidy so much it was almost worthless.

But the short-line railroad industry, as it's known, is the little industry that could. It quietly got Congress at the end of last year to undo what the IRS had done, a classic example of the lobbying clout a small industry can wield if its pieces are across congressional districts and states from Vermont to Kansas.

Next stop for the short-line railroads: getting Congress to extend the $100 million annual tax break beyond its scheduled expiration at the end of this year.

Some 65 members who endorsed the tax break have retired or were voted out of office. "We have all these new members in Congress who don't know anything about it," says Adam Nordstrom, lobbyist for the American Shortline and Regional Railroad Association, an organization of short-line operators. Mr. Nordstrom also worries about the new pay-as-you-go rules, put forth by Democrats in an effort to tighten deficit spending, will make it harder to get the tax break. "So whatever we get, it would have to be taken out of someone else's hide."

While short-line railroads may be seen as a relic of the past, they are increasingly integrated into the distribution of commodities that cross the country. In 1980, there were about 8,000 miles of short-line track in the U.S., generally with fewer than 350 miles of track and earning less than $40 million in annual revenue. Now there are about 43,000 miles of short-line track.

The growth reflects the tendency of big railroad corporations, which operate about 98,000 miles of track, to shed offshoot lines to concentrate on more profitable, long-haul routes. Short lines are a viable business, but maintaining and upgrading track lines is expensive and that led the industry to look to the government for help.

In a 2004 bill, Congress said the taxpayers would pay 50 cents of every $1 spent on track maintenance and upgrading. The tax credit equaled about $3,500 per mile.

Short lines, on their tax returns, were to use the credit on their tax bills. But since many short-line railroads don't earn enough taxable income to take full advantage of the credit, they began assigning the track maintenance work to related third-party businesses. Essentially the short lines would trade the tax credit to those construction companies that could use them.

Selling tax credits to companies that can use them isn't unheard of, but Congress traditionally writes a provision of any law to explicitly permit them. In this case, Congress, apparently unwittingly, left the provision open for interpretation, according to the IRS.

In September, after 22 months, the IRS finally published rules governing the tax credit. To the industry's surprise, the IRS essentially said short-line railroads that couldn't take full advantage of the credit couldn't give the full value of the tax credit to the other companies. The result: The tax credit was worth only 25 cents for every $1 spent on track upgrades and maintenance for the industry as a whole. The IRS also said the rules would apply retroactively.

But short lines already had completed millions of dollars of track work, and were counting on selling the tax credits to pay for it. Watco Cos., a holding company of 16 short lines fanned across the country, had spent $24 million upgrading 30 miles of track for the Kansas & Oklahoma railroad that connects Wichita, Kan., to the railroad's northwestern outpost in Henderson, Kan. Watco was counting on allowing half of that, $12 million, to go as a tax credit to the third parties who actually did the work, paying them with tax credits instead of cash.

"This was scary," said Ed McKechnie, chief commercial officer at Watco. "We did not have another $12 million."

In October, two weeks after the IRS rules were publicized, the short-line association met in Washington to map out strategy. They instructed their members to calculate how much they had spent so far on track upgrades -- nearly $380 million -- and began cold-calling key members of Congress to stop the IRS.

Big railroad companies pitched in. "We support the tax credit for short lines and we partner with them on their legislative agendas," says Kelly Donley, spokeswoman for the Association of American Railroads, which represents major freight railroads, such as Norfolk Southern Corp. and Burlington Vermont Santa Fe Railway and also Amtrak.

In December, Rep. Jerry Moran (R., Kan.), Rep. Dave Camp (R., Mich.), and Rep. Phil English (R., Pa.) wrote to IRS chief Mark Everson and accused the IRS of overstepping its authority. "The regulations should be withdrawn immediately and retroactively, and no further guidance regarding such arrangements should be issued by the Treasury and the [Internal Revenue] Service until Congress has had an opportunity to address these areas."

The IRS wouldn't comment publicly about the short-line rules it drafted and its interpretation of the 2004 law.

But in the waning days, as Congress hustled to finish before adjourning for the year, Sen. Gordon Smith (R., Ore.) and Sen. Blanche Lincoln, (D., Ark.) led an effort to push the legislation through a change to undo the IRS rule. Short lines now can trade the tax credit -- and get full benefit of the 50% credit -- to any related business that it has an existing business relationship with, often a shipper, to pay for track maintenance or upgrades.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Visit Democrats' Retreat (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Who says bipartisanship is dead? President Bush has accepted an invitation from House Democrats to travel to Williamsburg, Va., in February to speak at their annual issues conference, a move that might have been unthinkable a few short months ago, when Republicans ran Capitol Hill.

Mr. Bush has addressed the Democratic retreat before, in 2001, the first year he was in office. His planned appearance this year, on Feb. 3, was announced by Representative Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic caucus, in an e-mail message to colleagues on Friday.

"I'm happy to announce that President Bush has accepted our invitation to address the conference on Saturday morning," Mr. Emanuel wrote, adding that former President Bill Clinton would also be there.

Mr. Bush's appearance is testimony to the changed climate on Capitol Hill, where Democrats have just pushed six major pieces of legislation through the House, on issues including student loans, Medicare prescription drugs and stem cell research, with some Republican support. A White House spokeswoman said Mr. Bush would deliver a speech to the Democrats and take five questions.

In the months since Democrats won the November midterm elections, members of both parties, and the president, have said they want to work together in a bipartisan way. But with Democrats strongly opposed to Mr. Bush's plan to send additional troops to Iraq, relations between the two sides have not exactly been lovey-dovey in recent days.

On Friday, Speaker Nancy Pelosi accused the president of moving quickly to put the troops "in harm's way" because he knew Democrats would not cut off financing once troops were sent into battle. That prompted a sharp response from Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, who called Ms. Pelosi's comments "poisonous."

Just hours later, Mr. Emanuel sent out his announcement.

Conservatives Slam Bush Policies (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

President Bush's policies, including the Iraq war, have left the country in a "disastrous" state, according to several prominent conservatives.

The leaders, including current and former presidential candidates, outlined their objectives for a revival of conservatism during a panel discussion yesterday hosted by the Free Congress Foundation, a conservative Washington-based advocacy group. The leaders' recommendations, covering economic, military and social policy, would be largely different from those implemented by the Bush administration.

"We disagree on a lot of things," Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, said of Mr. Bush. Mr. Hunter is seeking his party's 2008 presidential nomination on a platform of military expertise and a desire to confront China on economic and trade issues.

"We have a competition which is not free trade, it's not fair trade, it's rigged trade," he said of the China's trade tariffs, which many critics argue have hurt American businesses.

"The state of the union is disastrous," said William Lind, president of the foundation's Center for Cultural Conservatism. "We are fighting and losing two wars, in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Using language that at times mirrored that of liberal critics of Mr. Bush's foreign policy, Mr. Lind said an interventionist U.S. foreign policy is creating, "a hostile relationship with the growing world."

Former presidential candidate Gary Bauer was critical of Mr. Bush for what he described as the president's failure to more deeply inspire Americans after September 11.

"The president made a colossal mistake after 9/11 by simply asking people to shop," said Mr. Bauer, president of the conservative group American Values.

Some panelists did have kind words for the current administration.

Ambassador Henry F. Cooper, director of the Strategic Defense Initiative during the first Bush administration, praised Mr. Bush for backing out of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, which he said stood in the way of an American missile-defense program.

However, Mr. Cooper said he thinks "relatively limited progress has been made," on other issues.

Mr. Hunter also praised what he called Mr. Bush's record on fighting the war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0119968

"He was willing and he was aggressive," he said of the White House's response to the September 11 attacks. "He's kept them off balance."

State Of The Union: The 3 Keys To Bush's Speech: Energy, Immigration And Iran (WSJ)

By Gerald F. Seib

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

President Bush's last few State of the Union addresses have run at about 5,000 words each. He delivers this year's edition Tuesday night, and the White House suggests this one might be a bit shorter. Here's a way to cut through the verbiage even more. Listen especially closely for just three words: energy, immigration and Iran.

This will be the president's seventh State of the Union address, but he has never given one like this before. It will be his first given to a Congress controlled by Democrats. That doesn't change everything, but it changes a lot. Mr. Bush will be trying to lay out an agenda when, in fact, he no longer is in control of Washington's agenda. Democrats in Congress now have as much to say about what gets acted upon, and what is ignored. No longer will the president be able to compel Congress to consider one of his ideas simply by saying so, which was more or less within his power under Republican control.

That argues for more focus on fewer items that have some actual chance of success, and less focus on a wish list of items dear to the president but with little chance of bipartisan support. So you'll hear plenty about balancing the budget, but more interesting is how energy and immigration come into play. White House officials have been signaling that the president plans to aggressively pursue what everyone in Washington euphemistically calls "energy independence." That means reducing America's need for foreign oil.

Until now, Mr. Bush's focus has tended to be increasing domestic energy production, and Democrats' has been decreasing energy use. But both sides increasingly acknowledge that real energy independence requires both, and also requires government action to push alternative fuels. The twin threats of Middle Eastern upheaval and Venezuelan animosity should provide plenty of incentive.

Immigration may be the only issue where the change of power on Capitol Hill has brought Congress closer to the president, not farther away. Mr. Bush's view of immigration reform -- which includes creating a guest-worker program that would allow foreign workers to be temporary and legal, and put some of them on a path toward citizenship -- is a concept embraced more easily by Democrats than by Republicans these days. Mr. Bush's own Republicans are much more focused on simply securing the border to prevent foreigners from arriving in the first place, though the party's poor showing among Hispanics in last fall's election also may have many wondering how wise that position is politically. Take it all together, and there may be room for common ground.

Which leaves foreign policy. Iraq can't be ignored, of course, but Mr. Bush said his piece on that in his recent address to the nation. Odds are he wants this time to prompt the Congress -- and the country -- to start thinking beyond Iraq to what he clearly sees as the next big problem. And that lies next door in Iran.

Salazar Sends Early Message To Bush (DENP)

By Anne C. Mulkern

Denver Post, January 20, 2007

The Democratic-controlled Congress in upcoming months will focus on immigration reform, improving access to college, lowering gas and prescription drug prices, and changing direction in Iraq, Colorado's Ken Salazar said today in his preview address to the State of the Union.

Salazar, D-Colo., gave the speech today in both English and Spanish, the first time that has occurred.

Salazar, who grew up in San Luis Valley, referred to his family when he talked about the need to improve educational opportunities.

"I am a testament to the power of a higher education," he said in the speech. "My parents raised eight children in poor and humble circumstances. ...All of their eight children became the first generation of college graduates in our family. It has transformed our lives. Everyone should have that chance."

Former VP Mondale Says Cheney Cooks Ludicrous Advice (AP)

By Daniel Yee

AP, January 19, 2007

ATHENS, Ga. - Vice President Dick Cheney has bullied federal agencies and given absurd advice about the nation's risk and Iraq, Walter Mondale said Friday, adding that never would have been tolerated when Mondale was vice president.

DOJ_NMG_0119969

"I think that Cheney has stepped way over the line," Mondale said at the opening of a three-day conference about former President Jimmy Carter at the University of Georgia.

Mondale, who served under Carter, said Cheney and his assistants pressured federal agencies as they prepared information for President Bush.

"I think Cheney's been at the center of cooking up farcical estimates of national risks, weapons of mass destruction and the 9/11 connection to Iraq," he said.

That does not serve the president, because he needs facts, Mondale said.

"If I had done as vice president what this vice president has done, Carter would have thrown me out of there," Mondale said. "I don't think he could have tolerated a vice president over there pressuring and pushing other agencies, ordering up different reports than they wanted to send us. I don't think he would have stood for it."

Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for Cheney, had this response to Mondale's comments: "Twice elected to serve with President Bush, the vice president is committed to protecting Americans from those who wish to do us harm." She also cited a September television interview in which Cheney said he would take issue with "any suggestion we've gone beyond where we should have."

Academics credit Carter with expanding the role of the vice presidency during his administration.

As vice president, Mondale served as the president's senior adviser. He held an office in the West Wing of the White House, had private meetings with the president and spoke on behalf of the president before influential groups.

Mondale: Cheney Not Serving Bush Well (UPI)

UPI, January 19, 2007

Walter Mondale, the first U.S. vice president with an office in the West Wing of the White House, says that Dick Cheney has made the office too powerful.

Mondale spoke at a three-day conference at the University of Georgia on the presidency of Jimmy Carter, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported.

He said that Cheney has created "almost a parallel National Security Council that operated almost on its own."

The vice presidency was once a powerless office with the incumbent given ceremonial functions and denied critical information. In one of the more notorious instances, Harry Truman only learned of the existence of the atomic bomb after he succeeded President Franklin Roosevelt who died.

Richard Moe, Mondale's former chief of staff, said that giving the vice president real responsibility was one of Carter's great accomplishments.

Mondale said that Cheney is too much an independent center of power in the Bush administration.

"I think that Cheney has probably been at the center of cooking up all these farcical estimates of national risk, weapons of mass destruction, 9/11's connection with Iraq...and I don't think that serves the president," he said.

Senate Measure Puts Spotlight On Fund-Raising (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Of all the new rules passed in Congress's recent ethics overhauls, the most sweeping is a barely debated provision in a Senate bill passed Thursday night that could alter one of the most time-honored campaign fund-raising practices in Washington.

Rushing to complete its promised reform bill, the Senate adopted a measure that, for the first time, would require registered lobbyists to disclose not only the limited money they can donate to candidates personally but also the tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars they raise from clients and friends and deliver as sheaves of checks — a tradition known as bundling.

If signed into law, the measure could expose a potent tool that lobbyists use to gain access on Capitol Hill and even at the White House. Although currently invisible in campaign finance disclosures, bundling is a pillar of the modern campaign. The ability to deliver an envelope of checks — each one in compliance with the federal limit — is one of the most valuable favors a lobbyist can provide a lawmaker. Bundling is also a major reason incumbents so easily outraise their challengers and so rarely lose their seats.

There are a host of uncertainties about the measure, including whether the House will agree to it. In addition, it is not clear whether lawmakers will shy from using lobbyists to collect money for their campaigns just because the extent of their reliance on lobbyists — and the special interests they represent — will be made more visible.

Still, the measure is causing ripples as interested parties learn details of what the Senate did.

DOJ_NMG_0119970

"It is the most significant provision in the bill," said Marc Elias, a campaign finance lawyer who represents numerous senators. "They have essentially created a new campaign finance regulatory structure."

Since campaign finance laws cap individual contributions at $2,100 per election, or $4,200 for both a primary and a general election, lobbyists who can gather and bundle checks from scores of friends and clients stand out on a campaign team, sometimes earning hero status in a tight race.

"By the nature of what we do, you have to have people helping you to gather contributions," said Senator Mary L. Landrieu, a Louisiana Democrat who voted along with 95 others in favor of the ethics bill. "Otherwise you are raising $10 million or $20 million, $100 at a time."

And lobbyists, who earn their own income selling influence with the White House or Congress, have the most incentive to spend time holding fund-raisers or making calls to gather checks. "It is the capacity for fund-raising that gives lobbyists their power," said Meredith McGeehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center. "It is the currency of power in Washington."

As the money spent on presidential campaigns has swollen, candidates have formalized their networks of bundlers like a network marketing business. President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, for example, rewarded its fund-raisers with names like Pioneers, each of whom bundled at least $100,000, or Rangers, who bundled at least $200,000 apiece. Of the campaign's more than 500 bundlers, Public Citizen, the ethics advocacy group, identified more than 60 prominent lobbyists.

Members of Congress, however, usually prefer not to call attention to their connections on K Street, where many lobbyists have offices. Some lawmakers have especially close ties to just a few lobbyists who play a big role in their fund-raising, and calling attention to those relationships could focus new scrutiny on their votes.

Given the reliance of many lawmakers on lobbyists as fund-raisers, the idea of requiring them to disclose their roles usually meets stiff resistance on Capitol Hill — all of it behind the scenes and almost none of it in public. House passage is far from assured, and its adoption by the Senate by a roll-call vote of 96 to 2 followed some backroom resistance among senators in both parties to allowing the idea to come up for a vote at all.

The Republicans who controlled the Senate last year refused to let it come up. And on Jan. 12, before the details of the proposal had been disclosed, Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat in charge of his party's fund-raising as head of the senatorial campaign committee, used a run-in on the Senate floor to deliver an angry rebuke to the disclosure idea's lead sponsor, Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, several people present or briefed on the confrontation said.

In a subsequent conversation, Mr. Schumer said he worried that the proposal could cramp fund-raising by placing an undue burden on potential bundlers, said aides who were briefed and a lawmaker familiar with their talk, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the nature of the talks.

"Senator Obama has not been the most popular person in our caucus in the last couple of weeks," said a Democratic aide involved in deliberations over the bill. Mr. Obama also this week started a bid for his party's presidential nomination.

Eric Schultz, a spokesman for Mr. Schumer, said the senator quickly supported the bill when he understood it would apply only to lobbyists. Registered lobbyists, of course, are not the only ones who seek to influence legislation, and the Senate measure would not affect other interested parties.

"As often happens when bills are on the floor, rumors swirl about what amendments contain or don't contain and that's what happened here," Mr. Schultz said. "But as soon as Senator Schumer saw the language and what was included, he supported it and in fact urged the Senate Democratic leadership to accept it."

A spokesman for Mr. Obama said the senator was pleased that the Democratic leaders made the legislation a priority but he would not comment on private discussions within the party.

In the House, Republicans quietly deleted a similar proposal, after it had passed in committee, before it could come to a floor vote. But on Friday, the proposal's previous sponsor, Representative Chris Van Hollen of Maryland, now chairman of the House Democrats' re-election committee, and Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, sent a letter to colleagues announcing plans to reintroduce it.

"Hopefully, requiring disclosure will begin to break the nexus between lawmaking and the efforts by lobbyists to enhance their influence by channeling money from special interests," Mr. Van Hollen said in an interview.

He said he saw no conflict with his new role as the House Democrats' chief fund-raiser. "It may make some kinds of fund-raising more difficult, but it will play at least as much on the Republican side as the Democratic side," he said. "From a political perspective, it is probably a wash."

The rules for bundling would require the approval of the House and the signature of the president. Many other elements of the Senate ethics overhaul do not require House approval because they change only Senate rules. But none of the Senate rules will take effect until a House and Senate conference harmonizes their respective rule changes.

Some lawmakers, however, acknowledged that anything addressing bundling was likely to face skepticism in both chambers.

DOJ_NMG_0119971

"I am sick and tired of fund-raising," said Senator Bob Casey, a newly elected Pennsylvania Democrat who voted for the ethics bill. "When you sit in a room for four hours making calls, it kind of has a deadening effect on you."

He added, wryly, "Anything that reduces the amount of time that you are spending fund-raising is good for the country, and it is definitely good for me."

Senate Supports Transparency In Tariff Breaks (WP)

By Joe Stephens

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The Senate joined the House this week by voting to make it easier for the public to track a stealthy form of trade legislation that has delivered hundreds of millions of dollars in tax savings to favored corporations.

As part of a broad ethics overhaul, the Senate voted 96 to 2 on Thursday to require lawmakers to publicly disclose details about tariff suspensions, which allow individual companies to escape paying import taxes on a range of products brought into the United States. The legislation would brand the tariff measures as a type of congressional earmark and would require the same disclosures now mandated for earmarks.

Under the new Senate rules, legislators would be required to disclose when they add a tariff suspension to a larger bill. Senators would have to justify the tax break in writing and name the company that would benefit. The information would have to be posted in a searchable form on the Internet at least two days before Congress votes on the measure.

Lawmakers would be barred from adding tariff suspensions to bills in exchange for another legislator's vote. Lawmakers also would not be allowed to add suspensions that would benefit them, their families, their staffs or their staff members' families.

"It certainly is going to shine a light into the dark recesses of Capitol Hill, where the tariff suspensions have lived for years," said Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "It will be a lot harder to game the system."

Ellis predicted that the changes would intensify pressure for more reform, as increased transparency led to additional questioning.

Tariff reform is a recent addition to the slate of proposed ethics changes in Congress. It surfaced as an issue in September, after a Washington Post investigation showed that the number of suspensions was skyrocketing and that those narrow measures primarily benefited large, foreign-based corporations. The Post showed how companies evaded a $500,000 cap on tariff savings by persuading lawmakers to file multiple bills with tax breaks aimed at the companies' imports. Small domestic companies struggled to keep abreast of proposals that foreign competitors could use to drive them out of business.

"I'm so excited," said Anita Dungey, a small-business owner from Upstate New York. "It's certainly keeping the legislature more accountable, and that's very, very important. It's good for U.S. workers and for U.S. companies."

Dungey said a tariff suspension initiated last year by Wal-Mart threatened to sink her family-owned business, Auburn Leathercrafters, which manufactures and sells dog collars and leashes.

In recent years, lobbyists have crafted most tariff suspensions to benefit just one corporation. Few of the measures identified the company that initiated the legislation. Many did not identify the product involved, instead using codes explained in a telephone-book-size tariff schedule.

That lack of transparency obscured the fact that the largest beneficiaries have been domestic subsidiaries of foreign corporations. In a study by The Post, eight of the 10 companies that stood to benefit most were owned by or affiliated with German and Swiss corporations.

Congressional sponsors of such bills said they are trying to lower consumer prices and create jobs by cutting costs for U.S. manufacturers and retailers. The sponsors said they generally dropped legislation if trade officials found a U.S. company that objected.

Under the Senate bill, the new tariff-suspension restrictions would apply to trade measures that would benefit 10 or fewer companies.

Before Thursday's vote, Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who was vice chairman of the House Republican Conference for the 109th Congress, derided the suspensions as "just good old-fashioned pork."

Senate Passes Ban On Lobbying By Some Spouses (WP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

For much of the past week, the prospects for a ban on lobbying by Senate spouses were uncertain.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) wanted an exemption that excluded current spouses who already are registered to lobby. Sens. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) are among those who have spouses in that category.

DOJ_NMG_0119972

But Thursday night, as the Senate enacted its ethics package, Reid dropped his insistence on a grandfather clause and agreed to an amendment sponsored by Sen. David Vitter (R-La.).

Vitter's amendment bans spouses from lobbying the Senate unless they were registered to lobby for at least one year before their husband or wife was elected. It was approved by unanimous consent.

The ban adopted by the Senate is specific to that chamber, but it still needs House approval before it can become law because it was part of a broader legislative package.

Neither chamber's ethics package deals with brothers, sisters or adult children of lawmakers who might lobby. Those issues might be addressed in a conference committee.

Former senator and presidential nominee Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) would not be affected by the ban because his wife, Elizabeth, was elected after Dole had begun lobbying. But the wives of Conrad and Stevens could be covered by the ban.

New Rules Still Allow Congress Many Perks (WP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

On the Monday that was supposed to start the new Congress's first five-day workweek, Minority Leader John A. Boehner helped persuade his Democratic colleagues to give House members the day off.

The Ohio Republican had his reasons. He was going to see Ohio State compete in the national championship football game in Arizona. Boehner had tickets for the stadium's nosebleed section. Then, Boehner's office said, Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. offered him a bird's-eye seat in one of the company's skyboxes.

In the skybox, Boehner mingled with lobbyists for the media giant, whose vast interests in Congress include broadcast-decency legislation and possible restrictions on its hugely popular MySpace Web site.

The perk for Boehner and the lobbying access for News Corp. are entirely permissible under the new ethics rules Congress imposed on itself this month -- provided Boehner personally reimburses the cost of the skybox ticket, which Boehner's office said he plans to do once the company sends him the bill. The lawmaker can use campaign funds, instead of personal money, to pay his airfare.

"He was there to support his home-state school," Boehner spokesman Brian Kennedy explained.

Voters in the last election demanded a change in Washington's ethics climate. The new Democratic congressional leadership responded with sweeping new prohibitions on gifts and travel from lobbyists, tough new limits on once-cheap corporate jet flights for lawmakers, and new requirements that lawmakers disclose the pet projects they earmark.

But the new rules, the toughest changes since Watergate, still leave lots of room for special interests to curry favor and lawmakers to raise big dollars.

The rules, which differ between the Senate and House, are aimed at some of the most attention-grabbing practices involving special interests. Experts such as Kenneth A. Gross, a lawyer who specializes in ethics and campaign issues, said they are designed to "significantly turn the volume down in terms of extravagance and in terms of what can be done." At the same time, they preserve, with some modification, some traditional practices.

For instance, lawmakers can still go to widely attended events or campaign events and accept freebies such as meals. Nonprofit organizations and universities can still provide lawmakers free travel in many cases. And lawmakers can still offer creative opportunities for special interests to meet with them -- for a price.

Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), the new chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, is offering special interests a chance next month to go skiing and snowmobiling in Big Sky country. All it takes is a $2,000 donation per person or a $5,000 donation from a political action committee, according to a "Save the Date" solicitation his Glacier PAC sent out to lobbyists.

If lobbyists miss the first outing, they can still catch Baucus this summer for fly-fishing or horseback riding at "Camp Baucus," the invitation promises.

"It makes one pause when members of Congress raise one hand to vote on an ethics proposal to limit special interests and with the other hand outstretched behind their back ask for campaign contributions or perks from special interests," said Kent Cooper, a former federal election regulator who studies ethics and political money.

Rules that have been in force in the House and Senate for years say that members of Congress cannot promise an official act for a gift and must avoid the appearance of conflicts of interest. But when those rules apply can be murky, and the new ethics rules do not make it any clearer.

Around the time Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) was selected in November to be the new GOP whip, he flew with a company lobbyist aboard BellSouth's corporate jet from Washington to Jackson, Miss. The senator and lobbyist got to know each other better, discussed religion and talked generally about BellSouth's merger with AT&T that was pending at the Federal

DOJ_NMG_0119973

Communications Commission, company spokesman Bill McCloskey said. The next Sunday, Lott accepted the lobbyist's invitation to go to church together, McCloskey said.

A few weeks later, Lott was the highest-ranking lawmaker to sign a Dec. 8 letter in which 14 senators demanded that the FCC approve the BellSouth-AT&T merger before the end of the holidays. Regulators approved the deal on the eve of New Year's weekend.

McCloskey said there was no connection between the flight and the letter, noting Lott was a longtime supporter of BellSouth, had flown nearly a dozen times aboard its jet since 2001 and had written a letter last fall supporting the merger. That letter came six weeks after another flight Lott took courtesy of BellSouth.

"Lott has supported the merger as good for Mississippi for some time," McCloskey said.

Lott's office did not return repeated calls seeking comment.

For Lott's Nov. 13 trip, he had to pay $1,335, the equivalent of a first-class ticket. The money came from his campaign.

Under their new ethics rules, senators can continue to take corporate jets, but the cost to their campaign will be much higher because the new rules require reimbursement at full charter rates. House members, however, are essentially banned from using corporate jets.

Fact-finding trips paid for by special interests are another practice covered by the new rules, and although they will become less extravagant and less frequent, there will still be plenty of permissible opportunities to take them.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) took his wife, Victoria, with him when he gave a speech in Florence at an event sponsored by New York University, and they were driven around Florence in a car paid for by the school. Kennedy reported that the school paid $1,560 for car service and $257 for a hotel.

Half a dozen House Democrats did not travel quite as far as Kennedy but still took a free post-election trip to Panama City courtesy of the CaribNews Foundation.

The listed purpose of the travel was to attend a business conference, and some lawmakers brought relatives, whose expenses were also paid by the foundation. For instance, new House ethics committee chairwoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) took her sister along, and Reps. David Scott (D-Ga.) and Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) took their wives.

The new ethics rules will continue to allow for trips such as these that are paid by universities or nonprofit organizations that do not have registered Washington lobbyists. The length and costs of trips, however, could be trimmed, said Gross, who thinks that such trips can be valuable to members of congress. "The new rules," he said, "strike a balance, although on the edges, there can be some abuse still."

One area that was not addressed in the new rules was the use of campaign funds that can directly or indirectly benefit lawmakers or their families. Those practices were illustrated most recently by Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) and Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.).

Doolittle drew the scrutiny of federal investigators during the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal when it came out that the congressman's wife was getting paid both by Abramoff and by Doolittle's political action committee for fundraising work around the same time the congressman took actions favorable to Abramoff's clients.

Reports Doolittle filed with the Federal Election Commission through this month show his Superior California Federal Leadership PAC paid his wife's firm nearly $100,000 during the 2006 election cycle, including $4,000 in the weeks after the November election. Doolittle has said he will no longer pay his wife that way.

Likewise, Mollohan reported that in the last two months of 2006 his campaign spent $140,000 on lawyers he had hired to deal with his legal problems. Mollohan was forced to step down from the House ethics committee last year over a federal probe into taxpayer money he steered to a network of nonprofit foundations connected to himself or other insiders.

Real Ethics Reform (WP)

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

THIS BEING a season for celebrating Shakespeare in Washington, perhaps the best way to describe the ethics and lobbying bill that passed the Senate on Thursday is to quote the Bard: "All's Well That Ends Well." The final package is the strongest ethics legislation to emerge from Congress yet. Like the rules changes the House adopted this month, it would bar lawmakers from taking free gifts, meals and entertainment. No longer would lobbyists and private interests be allowed to throw lavish parties honoring lawmakers at political conventions. Travel paid for by private interests would be dramatically curtailed. Lawmakers' cut-rate corporate jet flights would be grounded. The revolving door would be slowed, with lawmakers having to wait two years, not the current one year, before lobbying their former colleagues.

The bill would bring far more transparency to money in Washington: how lawmakers choose to spend it and how it is deployed to influence them. On the spending side, the measure calls for disclosure of an array of earmarked pet projects. On the influence side, lobbyists would not only have to report their own campaign contributions, but they also would have to list the fundraisers they held and the "bundled" contributions they arranged or collected for lawmakers, the real source of their power.

DOJ_NMG_0119974

We've had our doubts about the commitment of Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) to a strong ethics bill; we've had our qualms about his conduct. But Mr. Reid, along with Sens. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), deserves credit for assembling and passing this package. Whether Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) was trying to sabotage passage of the bill when he temporarily blocked a move to end debate, as reformers contend, or whether he was simply trying to demonstrate to the new majority that Senate Republicans can't be muscled aside, what matters is that the measure passed 96 to 2.

As always, there are provisions we wish had been included. It was disappointing that senators voted to strip from the bill a requirement that lobbyists disclose the costs of grass-roots efforts to influence lawmakers. It was unfortunate that backers of an independent Office of Public Integrity to beef up enforcement of ethics rules insisted on a vote on their measure, which lost even more resoundingly than it did last year. As the House studies how to improve the current, inadequate enforcement system, we hope the Senate vote won't be the chamber's last word on some kind of independent enforcement mechanism.

The focus now moves to the House, which adopted new ethics rules but still needs to move on the lobbying changes. Following that, it's important that the resulting conference be held quickly to meld the two bills, not used as a behind-the-scenes vehicle to make quiet but crippling changes.

Reform, Finally, In The Senate (NYT)

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

The Senate has finally passed credible reforms of its shabby ethics code, reining in lawmakers' more egregious quid pro quo dealings with their fund-raising cohorts in the lobbying industry. The Republican minority had second thoughts about how its transparently obstructionist tactics would look to constituents. And an overwhelming majority then approved the first serious anticorruption strictures since the Watergate era, banning gifts, entertainment, travel and other inducements that lobbyists and their employers use in greasing privileged access to lawmakers and their staffs.

The Senate action is particularly praiseworthy for zeroing in on the money-sweet heart of the matter: lobbyists will have to disclose the way they "bundle" multiple corporate donations as campaign sweeteners for grateful lawmakers. Also, senators must henceforth pay full charter rates for the lobbyist-catered corporate jets they have been flying for token fees. And they will have to own up to the purpose and cost of their last-minute "earmarks" — lucrative contracts for favored pleaders that are stealthily approved without debate.

The Senate also voted to end the lavish parties paid for by fawning fat cats to "honor" key politicians at the presidential conventions. And it voted against a growing scandal closer to home, barring spouses of newly elected members from lobbying the Senate. Lawmakers also banned members from secretly negotiating for prized jobs in industries too often under their official purview.

These are strong measures, and Harry Reid, the majority leader, deserves credit for prevailing with a bipartisan approach despite his lobbyist-friendly instincts. Unfortunately, the Senate again failed to create an independent anticorruption monitor to reach beyond the clubby traditions that have masked abusers. Mr. Reid should join House Speaker Nancy Pelosi in pursuing this needed measure.

It was heartening to see that the bill was toughened, not undercut, by amendments from two Democrats and a Republican. Notably absent from the infighting was John McCain of Arizona, a past advocate for reform who may be too busy placating G.O.P. powers for his expected bid for the presidency. The Senate did well enough without him.

Senator's Condition Improves (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Senator Tim Johnson is taking part in three hours of physical, occupational and speech therapy every day, and his tracheotomy tube has been removed, doctors at George Washington University Hospital said. Mr. Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat, suffered a brain hemorrhage more than a month ago. He is doing strengthening exercises to gain mobility on his right side, said Dr. Philip Marion, head of rehabilitation at the hospital.

"100-Hour" Agenda Is Completed (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119975

Democrats completed their six-bill, 100-hour legislative agenda Thursday night, with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) proclaiming, "This was only the beginning."

The last of the "Six for '06" bills that Democrats promised voters in the fall passed about 87 hours after the 110th Congress opened Jan. 4.

The Democrats' clock, which counted only the time spent directly on the six bills, showed that 42 hours and 15 minutes had elapsed when the roll call ended on the last bill, energy legislation that would reimpose billions in fees, royalties and taxes on the oil industry.

Republicans complained that the bills were hammered through after Democrats reneged on a campaign promise to let the opposition offer amendments and help shape legislation.

"Many of the flawed 100-hours bills either face an uphill battle in the Senate or are destined for a veto pen," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Pelosi dismissed the complaints. "It was about keeping our promise, not about adhering to some process," she said.

House Votes To Reshape Page Board (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The House yesterday unanimously voted to overhaul the board supervising its teenage pages, responding to a scandal that helped Democrats win control of Congress.

The vote was 416 to 0 to expand the membership of the House Page Board, whose Republican chairman never told two board colleagues that he had been warned that then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) was a "ticking time bomb."

Foley became acquainted with the pages, high school students who run errands for lawmakers, while they worked in Congress and kept in touch after they left. He sent e-mails that House officials deemed "over-friendly." Others were sent sexually explicit instant messages.

Foley resigned Sept. 29 in the wake of news reports of his conduct.

The expanded board now includes a former page and the parent of a current or former page. The eight-member body will include four House members -- two from each party -- as well as the clerk of the House and the sergeant-at-arms, who are permanent members.

The page board also would meet regularly under the legislation.

Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), a board member, said the equal party representation "takes it out of the political realm," adding: "There's no way there should be a partisan upper hand when talking about the governance of the page board."

House Approves Reform Of Page Board (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, January 19, 2007

Following close scrutiny and criticism of its page program, the House on Friday approved changes to the Page Board to prevent a repeat of the kind of scandal that led to Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) resignation.

Foley stepped down in September after inappropriate messages he had sent to a former page were brought to light. A House ethics committee investigation of the matter criticized the handling of early indications that Foley acted improperly, but absolved all lawmakers and staff of ethics violations.

The bill, which passed 416-0, changes the composition of the House Page Board, which had consisted of two members of the majority party and one of the minority party. Now, the board will include a second member of the minority, a parent of a current or former page, and a former page. The former page on the board can be neither a member of Congress nor the parent of a page.

The legislation also requires the Page Board meet "regularly," based on a schedule determined by the House Speaker and the minority leader.

House Votes To Expand Board Overseeing Teen Pages (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — Four months after the congressional page scandal rocked Capitol Hill and helped dash Republican hopes for holding their majorities in Congress, the House voted unanimously Friday to expand the board that oversees the teenage interns and require that it meet regularly.

DOJ_NMG_0119976

The House voted 416 to 0 to reorganize the House Page Board so that it has two congressional members from each party, the House clerk, the sergeant at arms, one parent of a page and one former page.

The eight-member board will be responsible for oversight of the roughly 70 pages — usually 16-year-olds who spend a year running errands for members of Congress and their staffs while attending school in the nation's capital.

Passage of the measure, aimed at protecting a venerable program more than a century old, was the last item Democrats wanted to check off on a list of priorities for their first weeks in power. Their agenda was aimed at demonstrating their responsiveness to the ire that voters showed in November.

The page scandal began in late September, when it came to light that then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had written sexually explicit instant messages to several former male pages. Foley, who had also served as chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, quickly resigned, but the revelations snowballed as reporters tracked down former pages and outraged parents.

Before it was over, the scandal embroiled then-House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) in questions about his oversight of the program, and whether Foley had been protected by a coterie of high-ranking GOP officials who failed to rein him in.

The House Ethics Committee investigated the Foley case and released its findings in December. It said that as former House clerk, Jeff Trandahl had warned Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), then chairman of the page board, that Foley was a "ticking time bomb" who had been confronted repeatedly about his conduct. Shimkus did not call a meeting of the page board, and according to the committee's report, he told a colleague "he believed he had done the right thing in 2005 based on the information he had" when he told Foley not to contact one of the pages again.

The ethics panel found "a significant number of instances where members, officers or employees failed to exercise appropriate diligence and oversight."

But the committee said that none had violated any House rules and recommended that no one be disciplined.

Exit polls from the 2006 election showed that 49% of voters cast their ballots out of concern for the war in Iraq, but 25% cited "moral issues."

During Friday's debate, several members expressed anger at Shimkus for not taking a more proactive approach.

"The board must not only be free of partisanship, but must function so all of the members have access" to allegations of misconduct, said House Administration Committee Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Carson).

Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), a page board member who was not told of the concerns about Foley, will remain on the reconstituted board.

"This legislation balances the partisan makeup of the page board," Capito said. "I believe this provision is important symbolically because it demonstrates that nothing the page board does in acting to keep children safe is partisan."

Measure Offers Norton More Voting Power (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

A senior House Democrat announced yesterday the party will introduce a measure next week that would allow D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton to vote on amendments on the floor of the chamber.

The D.C. delegate is allowed to vote only in House committees. Norton (D) has been fighting for a bill that would grant the District one full voting member in the House, and Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) announced yesterday a campaign to support that measure.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the House majority leader, announced yesterday that the chamber will vote Wednesday on a rule change that would grant the voting power to Norton and other non-state delegates. A similar measure was passed by the Democratic-controlled House in 1993, but it was rolled back by Republicans who took control two years later.

Norton said yesterday that she was grateful for Hoyer's move but that it wasn't enough and could even confuse supporters of broader voting powers for the District.

When she was given the vote on amendments in 1993, "it was a great leap forward," she said. "Today, of course, it would be a terrible setback to concentrate" on the more limited voting powers.

Norton spoke hours after Fenty (D) announced a "people's march" on Congress in April to press for full representation for the District. He also said he would call on volunteers to join a Feb. 15 lobbying day on Capitol Hill to push for action on the voting rights bill.

Fenty, who was sworn into office Jan. 2, has called voting rights "the city's Number One priority." The popular mayor has jumped on the issue, lobbying congressional representatives and joining Norton in meeting with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to urge her support.

DOJ_NMG_0119977

But Norton clashed openly with Fenty at his news conference yesterday, saying the voting rights bill she reintroduced recently faces a crucial period in the next two months, and a large march shouldn't wait until April.

"Any action of D.C. on behalf of this bill has to happen in February and early March," Norton told the news conference. By April, she said, the House will be tied up with a raft of defense and appropriations bills.

The news conference reflected tensions between two of the city's top elected officials. Norton said she had not been informed of the date for the march -- April 16, Emancipation Day -- until she arrived at yesterday's event. Members of her staff said later that they had been told the exact date but mentioned only the month to Norton.

Most of the D.C. Council appeared with Fenty to express support for the campaign for voting rights. Also present were Hilary O. Shelton, director of the NAACP's Washington bureau, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), co-sponsor of the D.C vote bill.

"We want everyone on Emancipation Day to be talking about the fact D.C. has got to have full voting rights," Fenty said, announcing the march down Pennsylvania Avenue.

Emancipation Day marks the day -- April 16, 1862 -- that President Abraham Lincoln signed an act freeing more than 3,100 slaves in the District of Columbia. The District made the day an official city holiday in 2005.

Norton thanked Fenty for his support but said April is too late to mobilize citizens. And she said the lobbying day in February isn't enough.

"A zillion groups come up to lobby," she said. The bill "will get attention from Congress when they see those citizens" in the streets.

Fenty then indicated he might switch course and turn the lobbying day into a mass event.

"We're going to make that as big as humanly possible," he said.

Mayoral aides and D.C. vote supporters said they were dismayed by Norton's public disagreement with Fenty. The mayor and Norton met after the news conference to iron out their differences and agreed to work together on the events, Norton said.

The bill co-sponsored by Norton and Davis would add two seats to the House -- one for the District, which is overwhelmingly Democratic, and one for heavily Republican Utah.

The measure was approved by one House committee in the last Congress, but it did not reach the floor for a vote.

Supporters say the bipartisan bill offers the city its best hope in years of getting a representative with full voting rights in the House. Opponents have questioned whether it is constitutional. And some people have said it does not go far enough because it would not give the District voting representation in the Senate.

The rule change to be introduced Wednesday would allow Norton and the other delegates to vote in the committee of the whole, which handles most major House votes -- except on the final passage of legislation.

The added voting power would have an important caveat, though: If the delegates cast the deciding votes, other legislators could disregard the decision and request a new vote, without the delegates' participation.

House Likely To Give Norton A Vote (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer yesterday said the chamber will consider a resolution next week to allow D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton to vote on changes to proposed legislation.

"The purpose is our democracy," Mr. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said on the House floor yesterday.

Democrats, now in the majority, likely have the votes to pass such a rule change when it comes up Wednesday.

Republican leaders, who for more than a decade have not allowed Mrs. Norton a vote, complained that Mr. Hoyer's speech was the "first notice" they had been given about the upcoming vote, which would require majority approval for passage.

Mrs. Norton said she is pleased with the plan and hopes it will inspire more changes. She said the small step pales in comparison with her priority of achieving full voting rights for the District.

"I think it's a good thing to do," said Mrs. Norton, a Democrat. "I suppose you could say it will hold me over till I get the whole vote."

If the measure is approved, Mrs. Norton would be able to add amendments and vote on legislation, except when it is before the House for final passage. Other members could request a new vote without Mrs. Norton's ballot if she casts a deciding vote.

Mrs. Norton, serving her ninth term in Congress, had similar privileges during the Democratic-controlled 103rd Congress. However, the Republican majority withdrew them in 1995.

The D.C. delegate said she was disappointed that congressional leaders did not just include the vote in the rules package adopted by the House earlier this year.

She also said her more pressing goal is to push for passage of the D.C. voting rights bill, which she hopes will be marked up next month and come to the House floor for a vote in March.

The rules change "was a big step forward in 1993," Mrs. Norton said. "If that was what we were left with this year, it would be a big step backward."

The voting rights bill -- originally introduced in May by Mrs. Norton and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican -- would give one vote to the District, which is predominantly Democratic, and another to Utah, a mostly Republican state.

Mrs. Norton and Mr. Davis reintroduced the measure in the new Democratic-controlled Congress after the previous Republican-controlled Congress adjourned without bringing the bill to a vote.

Both Mr. Hoyer and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, have expressed support for giving the District a full vote in Congress.

Hoyer spokeswoman Stacey Farnen-Bernards said the change in rules is "not a substitute for the D.C. vote."

Davis spokesman Brian McNicoll said the congressman has supported the committee vote for Mrs. Norton since 2000, but he reiterated that the ultimate goal is for the District to have a full vote in Congress.

"Our focus is the whole enchilada, to get [Mrs. Norton] a vote in Congress," Mr. McNicoll said. "This certainly could get these guys in the habit of voting for this."

The rules change would also allow votes for delegates from the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa and Puerto Rico, and has sparked some debate on the House floor.

Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, said the move was "controversial" in the 1990s and wondered whether the purpose of the change was simply to add four Democratic votes on the House floor.

"The majority is in the majority. Four of these five delegates are on the majority's side," Mr. Blunt said.

Meanwhile, D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and other voting rights advocates yesterday announced several initiatives aimed at achieving full congressional voting rights.

Advocates released a copy of a letter sent yesterday to Mrs. Pelosi asking for early congressional action on the Norton-Davis bill. Plans are also in the works for voting rights volunteers to lobby members of Congress on Feb. 15.

Mr. Fenty is also planning a voting rights march from Freedom Plaza to the Capitol on April 16.

In D.C., Perry Builds Bridges With Texas Dems (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — Republican Gov. Rick Perry and Texas' 13 U.S. House Democrats sought to bury the hatchet Friday after years of chilly relations and mistrust aggravated by the redistricting battle that forced five Democrats from Congress in 2004.

Perry slipped quietly onto Capitol Hill for a breakfast meeting with the Texas Democrats, a first-of-its-kind summit that was not listed on his public schedule or mentioned beforehand by the congressional offices.

The Democrats emerged saying they had a chance to air their gripes with Perry and brief him on legislative priorities that could benefit from teamwork, such as improving the state Children's Health Insurance Program and increasing highway funding and higher-education grants.

"It was the first time for me in over a decade that I've had a reasonable word with the governor," Rep. Gene Green, D-Houston, said after the breakfast in the office of Rep. Solomon Ortiz of Corpus Christi.

"He got an earful," Ortiz, dean of the delegation, said.

Before the meeting, Perry defused one major irritant by terminating the state's controversial contracts with two Republican lobbying firms in Washington.

The Democrats had said hiring outside lobbyists was a waste of taxpayer money considering they are elected to represent the state's interests.

"I'm glad the governor felt the heat or saw the light," Green said.

Still, feelings remained raw about Perry's support of the unusual mid-decade redistricting engineered for the 2004 elections by then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land.

"Texas will pay a serious price in the years ahead" without the experience of the veteran Democratic lawmakers who lost their election bids, Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Waco, told Perry.

With no redistricting, Edwards said, Texans would now be chairing the Homeland Security, Agriculture and Rules committees.

The governor assured the members that he will not attempt to redraw district lines again before the end of the decade, said Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-El Paso.

Perry, who met Friday with Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt and the Republican Governors Association, was unavailable for comment, spokesman Robert Black said.

Perry "is not looking back," Black said. "Others can — the governor is not going to."

Rep. Nick Lampson, swept out of office after the redistricting only to claim DeLay's old seat this year, welcomed Perry's overture to the Democrats, saying his prior relationship with him was "nonexistent."

Lampson said he told Perry, "You must build relationships and friendships and through that you can begin to look beyond personalities and do the things that are right for Texas."

As for the Democrats' complaint that Perry has frozen them out during his time in office, Black said: "All I can say is if the men and women of the Democratic congressional delegation think that's been lacking, then the governor's effort today, I hope, was an opportunity to restore" closer ties.

The governor will meet today in Dallas with the delegation's Republican members.

Returning gestureOrtiz said the Democrats will do some fence-mending of their own on a trip to Austin in the next few months to meet with state legislators,

Black said that last week the governor's office notified the Federalist Group and Cassidy & Associates, which receive monthly payments from the state of $10,000 and $15,000 respectively, that their contracts were being terminated Feb. 11.

The contracts were doubly irritating to the Democrats because the lobbying firms donated money to GOP candidates challenging Democratic congressional incumbents.

"It was almost like they were just turning money over to our opponents," Green said. "That just leaves a bad taste in my mouth."

During the fall gubernatorial campaign, Perry challenger Carole Keeton Strayhorn criticized the governor for hiring the lobbyists, who had ties to DeLay and to disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Perry's termination of the contracts is acknowledgment of the fact that Democrats have reclaimed power on Capitol Hill, Black said.

"We recognize that things have changed in Washington and we are going to change as well," Black said. The governor is contemplating going in "new directions," he added, and he declined to rule out the possibility that the state might hire lobbying firms with better connections to congressional Democrats.

Stem Cell Policy Hampering Research, NIH Official Says (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

The National Institutes of Health official overseeing the implementation of President Bush's embryonic stem cell policy yesterday suggested that the controversial program is delaying cures, an unusually blunt assessment for an executive branch official.

In prepared Senate testimony, Story Landis, director of the NIH's National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke and interim chair of the agency's stem cell task force, closely mirrored previous testimony from other NIH officials, who have for years been careful not to criticize the Bush policy directly, even though that policy has infuriated many scientists because of the limits it places on embryo cell work.

But under questioning, Landis spoke more plainly. When Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) asked her how the policy was affecting medical research, she said, "We are missing out on possible breakthroughs." The ability to work on newly derived stem cell colonies -- precluded from federal funding under the Bush plan -- "would be incredibly important," she added.

Landis also declared that "science works best when scientists can pursue all avenues of research. If the cure for Parkinson's disease or juvenile diabetes lay behind one of four doors, wouldn't you want the option to open all four doors at once instead of one door?"

Those and related comments left at least some at the hearing wondering whether a Democratic majority in Congress had emboldened the NIH.

But NIH spokesman John Burklow denied that the agency is getting uppity. Landis's testimony "reflects her scientific opinion," he said.

The House passed a bill this month that would loosen Bush's restrictions, and the Senate is poised to do so in February. Bush has promised to veto the bill.

The Ballad Of Bushie And Flashy (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119980

George Bush may have lost his swagger, but Harry Flashman hasn't.

Maybe the president presiding over a quicksand empire got a vicarious thrill out of the fictional Victorian brigadier general who roamed from Chillianwalla to Isandlwana to Abyssinia at the height of the British Empire, always making conquests in love and war despite his cowardly, caddish behavior.

In our continuing odyssey of discovery through the president's reading list, we learned that he perused two of George MacDonald Fraser's Flashman books, "Flashman at the Charge" and "Flash for Freedom."

There are those who are skeptical of the president's souped-up reading list, a result of a book-reading contest with Karl Rove.

"I don't think he understands the world," Jay Rockefeller, the new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, told The Times's Mark Mazzetti. "I don't think he's particularly curious about the world. I don't think he reads like he says he does. Every time he's read something he tells you about it."

I just wish W. had read more about the perils of empire before he naïvely dived into one. Mr. Fraser agrees that W. should have read the original "Flashman" before invading Afghanistan. It could have given him invaluable, if politically incorrect, insights that might have helped in the effort to catch Osama at Tora Bora and in the new push to stop the Taliban slouching toward Kandahar.

On a recent visit to Afghanistan, Robert Gates told nervous military commanders that he was open to sending more troops to thwart the Taliban from regrouping. Congressman John McHugh, who just returned from a trip to Afghanistan with Hillary Clinton and Evan Bayh, said that everyone they talked to had warned "that when the snows melt in the mountains, it will bring a new onslaught from Al Qaeda and the Taliban ... one that directly threatens not just the Karzai presidency, but threatens Afghanistan itself, and logically, it follows, threatens our investment in blood and treasure."

"Flashman" is based on a devastating British defeat during one of their wars in Afghanistan. After invading Kabul in 1839 and setting up an unpopular puppet shah, the British trekked through the snowy mountains to Jalalabad. Of more than 16,000 troops and camp followers, only one doctor survived; the rest were picked off in ambushes by Afghan warriors.

The lesson is that Afghanistan is a no man's land that can't be tamed by gringos. The British Empire, on which the sun never set, never succeeded in occupying Afghanistan even as it engaged in the Great Game with the Russians for influence there. It was terra incognita and terra fuggedaboutit.

"You could never forget that in Afghanistan you are walking a knife-edge the whole time," Harry Flashman notes, adding that, like himself, the Afghans could be "cruel and bloodthirsty," turning on you with no warning.

Mr. Fraser echoed those sentiments when I tracked him down at his home on the Isle of Man. "No one has ever succeeded in invading Afghanistan," the octogenarian who fought in Burma in World War II boomed with a trace of Scottish accent.

"The Afghans are extraordinary fighters, tough and resourceful and cruel, and they know their business inside out," he said. "On their own territory, they're unbeatable. They love fighting and dealing with invaders. It's almost a game to them. The country is Death Valley 10 times over. You see them on television in their robes with their weapons and that's all. The American and British troops are loaded with rubbishy equipment.

"Eventually, I suppose, we'll get out of Iraq and pretend it's been a success when it's just a mess. ... "Afghanistan is slightly different. You cannot ever win. When you consider the Russians put in more than 100,000 troops and couldn't do it. There's only one way to deal with the Afghans, and that's to buy them."

Mr. Fraser recites the end of Kipling's "The Ballad of the King's Mercy":

Abdhur Rahman, the Durani Chief, of him is the story told,
He has opened his mouth to the North and the South,
They have stuffed his mouth
with gold ...
and sweet his favours are ...
from Balkh to Kandahar.

"It wouldn't do Bush any harm to read Kipling," he concluded before signing off.

Sex And The Single-Minded (NYT)

By Stacy Schiff

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

How to get a job in Washington, that balmy, bipartisan town: Direct an organization that opposes contraception on the grounds that it is "demeaning to women." Compare premarital sex to heroin addiction. Advertise a link between breast cancer and abortion — a link that was refuted in 1997. Rant against sex ed. And hatch a loony theory about hormones.

DOJ_NMG_0119981

You're a shoo-in, and if your name is Eric Keroack you're in your second month as deputy assistant secretary for population affairs at the Department of Health and Human Services. Dr. Keroack, a 46-year-old Massachusetts ob-gyn, today oversees the $280 million Title X program, the only federal program "designed to provide access to contraceptive supplies and information to all who want and need them, with priority given to low-income persons."

It's not a job that plays to Dr. Keroack's talents, which happen to be prodigious. In the PowerPoint presentation that has cemented his reputation, he makes the case that premarital sex suppresses the hormone oxytocin, thereby impairing one's ability to forge a successful long-term relationship. If forced to mince words you might call this fanciful or speculative. Otherwise you'd call it wacko. "Really, really scary" and "utterly hilarious" were the first two reactions I heard from scientists.

Each of us owes a rather critical debt to oxytocin. It's what moves a new mother to comfort and nurse a squalling baby rather than to toss it from the window, as common sense might dictate. It is — you knew your husband was missing something — the hormone of intimacy. (No, you can't buy supplements across the border. And yes, OxyContin is something different. Rush Limbaugh was not working on his bonding instincts.)

Louann Brizendine, a neuropsychiatrist at the University of California, San Francisco, calls oxytocin the Glinda the Good Witch of her field. It is the drug of trust and partnership and attachment, commonly known by their street name: love. Oxytocin mellows, elates, and throws you into a mental fog. Rats prefer it to cocaine. While the rush at childbirth is particularly dramatic, the hormone swells with physical and emotional bonding of all kinds.

"Surge" has not always been a dirty word.

But no one has had as much good, clean fun with oxytocin as Dr. Keroack, for whom it is "God's superglue." Extrapolating in part from research with prairie voles, which are monogamous, he postulates that oxytocin cannot survive too much sex, at least with multiple partners, at least prior to marriage. By way of demonstration he proposes the duct tape test: you need only an adhesive and a hairy arm. The tape represents the brain. Press it down. Now reapply. See what happens? Less sticky, right? Concludes Keroack: "Basically, you will end up damaging your brain's ability to use the oxytocin system as a chemical mechanism that serves to help you successfully bond in future relationships." Don't ask about his illustrations. They are offensive.

Keroack presents this as gospel truth, though the scientists on whose research he bases his theory balk. One called it a wild leap. "A bungee jump without a cord," suggested another expert. Dr. Brizendine had a less kind word for it. She adds that while premarital sex cannot ruin your oxytocin response, it has been shown — in the absence of options — to ruin your life. Something tells me that Dr. Keroack is not planning a 34th anniversary bash on Monday for Roe v. Wade.

I know what you're thinking: if Dr. Keroack can write stuff this outlandish he's spelling his name wrong. As the other Kerouac said — arguably with a firmer grasp of neurochemistry — "I had nothing to offer anybody but my own confusion." Dr. Keroack may want to borrow the disclaimer that prefaces Michael Crichton's newest best-seller: "This novel is fiction, except for the parts that aren't." It takes an agenda rather than a medical degree to engage in this kind of science. Or an imagination.

In all fairness, Dr. Keroack has long been a little clumsy as an analogist. In a 2001 letter to the Massachusetts Legislature he explained the logic of performing sonograms on women considering abortion: "Even Midas lets you look at your old muffler before they advise you to change it."

There are many ways to define demeaning.

The Biggest Man On Campus (NYT)

By James F. Hollifield

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WHEN I was a graduate student at Duke in 1981, the university was faced with a difficult decision: Should it accept the papers of its law school alumnus, Richard M. Nixon, and build a library and museum named for one of the most controversial presidents in American history? Some within the university said that to accept the papers would be to embrace a failed president who resigned in disgrace to avoid impeachment. Others argued that the documents would be a treasure trove for future scholars seeking to understand what happened during the turbulent years of the Nixon presidency.

At the time I had the luxury of watching this drama unfold from the sidelines. Today I do not. As the director of a center for political studies at Southern Methodist University, I was invited to sit on an academic planning committee for the George W. Bush presidential library. By agreeing to serve on this committee, I took a stand in favor of Southern Methodist University's bid for the library, in part because I think Duke made a mistake in not accepting the Nixon library.

George W. Bush — like Harry Truman, Richard Nixon, Lyndon Johnson and Jimmy Carter in their day — is a controversial president for difficult times. But we must put partisanship aside and strive for historical perspective. We must consider the importance of having presidential libraries to help generations of scholars understand the times in which we live, and to inform future policy debates.

DOJ_NMG_0119982

Whether one supports or opposes the Bush policies, there is no question that they have been momentous for the country and the world. Precisely because of the controversial nature of this presidency, the question of how George W. Bush made his decisions begs for scholarly research and discourse. The library will be a gold mine for scholars, and its location on a university campus symbolizes the need for study.

At Duke more than 20 years ago and at Southern Methodist today, opponents of such libraries have said that by building a presidential library and creating schools or institutes, a university compromises its values and endorses the policies of the president whose papers it accepts. I do not think this is the case. It is legitimate for anyone to criticize the president and his policies, but it is presumptuous for us as scholars to say that we know in advance and with certainty what the legacy of a sitting president will be.

Campuses are good places to situate presidential libraries because universities are vital to the American marketplace of ideas, and they are bulwarks of our free society. They can serve as repositories of archives from which we will learn and grow as a nation. But the faculty is a university's heart and soul, and faculty members are not disconnected from the politics of the moment.

As bad as the situation may seem today, back in 1971, when the University of Texas dedicated a library and school named for Lyndon Johnson, the country was in even greater turmoil. A storm of controversy raged over the Johnson papers. But I think the University of Texas made the right decision to accept the papers and build the library and school.

Southern Methodist University should do the same. Yes, former presidents are interested in polishing their legacies, and universities must be careful to remain nonpartisan and protect freedom of inquiry. But we must also take the long view, and that means building institutions that will serve generations to come, giving historians the chance to do their work.

Archives Of Spin (NYT)

By Benjamin Hufbauer

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

SINCE Franklin D. Roosevelt dedicated the first federal presidential library — actually an archive and history museum — in 1941, each president has had a hand in developing his own memorial. The National Archives and Records Administration now oversees 11 presidential libraries that draw about two million tourists and thousands of scholars each year.

The uproar over President Bush's plans to store his papers at Southern Methodist University has drawn new attention to the role of our system of presidential libraries. It is a system facing at least six challenges that need to be addressed by Congress, current and former presidents, host universities and the American public.

First, according to the Office of Presidential Libraries, it will take up to 100 years for the papers and records at the recent presidential libraries to be processed, primarily because of an explosion in the number of records created by the executive branch. The Roosevelt Library has 17 million pages of documents, while the Clinton Library has more than 76 million, but the number of archivists has not kept pace.

A wait of 100 years is unacceptable. To be able to learn from our history, scholars, journalists and the public need access to a majority of records in presidential libraries within 20 years after a president leaves office. To meet this challenge, the newer libraries must add a substantial number of archivists, as well as new processing protocols and systems.

Second, we should insist on historical accuracy, completeness and balance in the museums in presidential libraries. Although the federal government's Office of Presidential Libraries states that the museum exhibits in presidential libraries should be accurate, historical amnesia is common in relation to a president's mistakes and controversial policies. For example, the museum in the Reagan Library does not mention the Iran-contra scandal.

The exhibits in newer presidential libraries often amount to little more than extended campaign commercials in museum form, because the former president and his supporters essentially control the content. If a president wants a museum of political propaganda, let him make that plain by not asking the federal government to administer it, but instead raising the large endowment needed to run it as a private memorial.

Since 99 percent of visitors to presidential libraries are there for the museum exhibits, this is an important issue. The exhibitions in older libraries usually improve after the president dies and the power of his supporters slowly wanes, but it should not take 20 to 50 years to get historically accurate displays in taxpayer-supported museums.

The Office of Presidential Libraries, however, bows to presidents' wishes for whitewashed museums. Congress should pass appropriate legislation on this issue. Each museum should be evaluated in a non-partisan fashion by a group of historians, and then changes should be made to ensure that the public gets the quality of information expected from a branch of the National Archives.

Third, the fund-raising for presidential libraries needs to be made transparent. Starting with Roosevelt, presidents have raised money from private sources and then turned their libraries over to be administered by the federal government. Currently donations are unregulated, and donors — whether individuals, corporations or even foreign governments — can remain anonymous. These donors can potentially wield real influence over a sitting president, without the knowledge of the public. Congress should require the disclosure of the identities of large donors and of the amounts involved.

DOJ_NMG_0119983

Fourth, only a few libraries have strong educational programs. The Truman Library, for one, has developed an innovative program for middle and high school students called the White House Decision Center. The Decision Center recreates some areas of the West Wing, where students play the roles of President Truman, his advisers and members of his cabinet while dealing with a variety of historical crises. The Decision Center curriculum meets state and national standards for social studies, sharpening students' skills in cooperative group work, problem solving, and communication, while teaching them history using copies of primary documents from the library's archive. Libraries and Congress should find the private and public funds to develop other educational programs with serious historical content.

Fifth, presidential policy institutes associated with universities should be subject to academic oversight. This oversight should involve the appointment of a significant number of people from a variety of departments from the sponsoring university to the institute's governing board. The administration of the institute should be designed so that the university and the institute both gain from the association.

Finally, President Bush's 2001 executive order limiting access to the records in presidential library archives needs to be overturned. This order allows current and former presidents to block the release of materials from their presidential libraries for any reason, even because they are politically damaging. Records that might compromise national security are already protected from release by other laws and statutes, so this directive is clearly about political expediency.

President Bush's order is contrary to the spirit and letter of the laws that previously governed presidential libraries. Although so far only a small number of records have been blocked from release, the potential for the abuse of power exists. Congress should overturn this executive order.

Presidents are not required to have presidential libraries. Since Watergate, presidential records are not owned by each president but by the nation; a president could simply hand over his or her records to the National Archives. But if a president chooses to have a library, it is up to Congress, current and former presidents, host universities and the public to ensure that each library operates in the public interest.

At their best, presidential libraries are vital institutions that help us learn from our history. But if we give in to the worst impulses of presidents and their supporters, these libraries risk becoming temples of political propaganda.

OTHER NEWS:

Shares Close Mixed As Earnings Reports Fail To Inspire (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Shares closed narrowly mixed yesterday after profit reports and forecasts from companies like I.B.M. and General Electric left investors unimpressed.

Profit concerns have unnerved investors who are already skittish about whether stocks will continue the upward movement from last year.

"I think we're at an extremely pivotal psychological level," said T. J. Marta, economic strategist at RBC Capital Markets.

Earnings and economic figures support the Federal Reserve's notion that any decline in the economy will be soft and gradual, although Mr. Marta contended that a "fly-by" was a possibility.

The Fed is unlikely to lower short-term interest rates if the economy continues at a steady clip or if it begins to accelerate again. The central bank has left interest rates unchanged at its last four meetings after a string of 17 consecutive increases that began in 2004.

Last year, investors propelled stocks sharply higher partly on the widely held view that the Fed would cut rates perhaps as early as the first half of 2007.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed down 2.40 points, at 12,565.53. Broader stock indicators were higher. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 4.13 points, to 1,430.50, and the Nasdaq was up 8.10 points, at 2,451.31.

For the week, the Dow industrials rose 0.08 percent, while the S.& P. fell 0.02 percent, and the Nasdaq lost 2.1 percent.

Bonds fell as stocks tried to further their gains. The benchmark 10-year Treasury bonds was down 8/32, to 9826/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, rose to 4.78 percent, from 4.74 percent.

Oil settled up $1.51 at $51.99 a barrel. The increase follows sharp declines in recent sessions and could signal that investors are eager to buy oil to cover previous commitments as they head into the weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0119984

Though the mood on Wall Street might have soured somewhat in the new year, consumers appear to have remained decidedly upbeat. Consumer sentiment, as tracked by the University of Michigan's survey, showed a preliminary reading of 98.0 for January compared with 91.7 in December. It is the highest showing since January 2004.

Since the start of this year, investors have been looking for reasons for a continuation of last year's sharp gains in stock prices.

The tepid gains this year reflect concerns over interest rates and the Fed's next move as well as whether profit growth will remain strong enough to push stocks upward.

Yesterday, I.B.M. fell $3.28, to $96.17 after the company's better-than-expected fourth-quarter profit met with little enthusiasm from investors. Part of the profit increase was a result of changes in the company's tax rates.

Alcoa helped offset some of the weakness in the Dow industrials. Alcoa, the world's largest aluminum maker, rose $1.10, or 3.6 percent, to $31.40, after it said it would repurchase up to 10 percent of outstanding shares and increased its annual dividend to 68 cents from 60 cents.

General Electric slid $1.05, or 2.8 percent, to $36.95 after its first-quarter forecast disappointed some investors. G.E. also said it planned to restate financial results from 2001 through 2005 and the first three quarters of 2006 to adjust its accounting for some debt.

Citigroup , the investment bank, rose 11 cents, to $54.50, after posting a 26 percent drop in its fourth-quarter profit.

Fortress Sets Range for I.P.O.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 (Dow Jones/AP) — Underwriters on Friday set the terms for the initial public offering of the Fortress Investment Group at 34.29 million Class A common shares with an estimated price range of $16.50 to $18.50 each.

In early November, Fortress Investment filed for an offering of up to $750 million in Class A stock but did not detail the terms.

Fortress said it would be the first global alternative asset manager listed on the New York Stock Exchange. It has about $29.7 billion in assets under management.

All of the shares will be offered by the company, and none of the company's five principals will sell shares in the offering, according to the prospectus filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

After the offering, the principals — Wesley Edens, Peter Briger, Robert Kauffman, Randal Nardone and Michael Novograwill — will hold 77.7 percent of the voting power of the stock, according to the S.E.C. filing.

After The Dow's Record Run, Large Stocks May Be Tiring (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

After 25 record closes for the Dow Jones Industrial Average since Oct. 3, some Wall Street pros see the Dow's 8% rise since then as evidence that big-name stocks are best-suited to weather slowing U.S. economic growth.

But despite a record in the just-completed week, the increments are getting smaller. Tuesday's record close of 12582.59 was just 0.2% over its previous high-water mark. Friday, the Dow slipped 2.40 points, nearly unchanged in percentage terms, to 12565.53, up 0.1% for the week and up 0.8% this year.

Could that mean the latest bull market is running out of steam?

Garrett See, a trader at TransMarket Group who buys and sells futures contracts tied to the Dow, says the blue-chip average could move higher in the short run.

But he predicts it will be in the red by the end of the second quarter, continuing on to finish below 12000 on the year, which would be a decline of more than 3.5% for the year.

"I think a lot of the recent move up has been people getting in too late," says Mr. See, who is skeptical of Wall Street predictions of steady-but-modest economic growth this year.

A 3.3% drop in shares of International Business Machines, the biggest component in the price-weighted Dow, pushed the average lower Friday. General Electric, off 2.8%, was also among the average's biggest decliners. Both companies announced fourth-quarter earnings that exceeded analysts' expectations, but investors seemed to have bet on the big profits early rather than waiting for the actual announcements.

Stocks were also hurt by a jump in crude-oil prices, spurred by forecasts of colder weather in the Northeast, which will likely increase demand for heating oil and kerosene.

Crude futures for February delivery jumped $1.51, or 3%, to $51.99 a barrel, off 1.9% for the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0119985

Other stock-market measures fared better than the Dow. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 0.3%, or 4.13 points, to 1430.50 Friday and was nearly flat in percentage terms on the week. The technology-focused Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.3%, or 8.10, to 2451.31, off 2.1% on the week.

One measure of momentum in the broad market is sending mixed signals, says Ed Clissold, an analyst at Ned Davis Research in Venice, Fla. He notes that 207 stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange were trading at 12-month highs before Friday's market open. That is less than a third of the recent peak of 632 stocks in December 2003.

Higher readings are generally bullish for the market, Mr. Clissold says, because they indicate economic conditions are so favorable that an array of companies are benefiting. Still, he says the current total isn't low enough to be a reason to panic.

Others are more upbeat. Analysts at research firm Thomson Financial note that only two of the 30 Dow components have gotten more expensive relative to their expected earnings for the coming 12 months since the average was at its past peak in January 2000.

In other words, the market is pretty cheap at the moment, which leaves a lot of room for investors to bid shares higher.

Using similar reasoning, Elizabeth Weymouth, global-investment specialist at J.P. Morgan Private Bank, says her firm expects stocks like those in the Dow and S&P 500 to post modest gains of less than 10% this year. Despite the Dow's three-day pullback in the just-ended week, she said her firm is still advising clients to switch out of small companies and into big-name stocks.

"We do expect a market correction at some point," said Ms. Weymouth. "But overall, the conditions are still pretty favorable."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed1; bond prices fell2. The 10-year note fell 6/32, pushing the yield up to 4.773%. The 30-year bond fell 8/32 to yield 4.862%.

The dollar rose.3 The dollar rose to 121.23 yen from 121.21 yen. The euro slipped to $1.2963 from $1.2965.

Chilly Weather Sparks Crude-Oil Rally (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar, Jeanine Prezioso

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

Energy futures rallied sharply Friday as crude-oil futures posted their biggest one-day gain in nearly three months and natural gas futures reached a one-month high, boosted by forecasts of continued cold weather.

The February crude contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange settled $1.51 a barrel higher at $51.99 after trading as low as $50.12 in overnight trading. The gain was the biggest in both percentage and dollar terms since Oct. 25. February natural gas settled 56.2 cents higher at $6.886 a million British thermal units, the highest closing price since Dec. 19, 2006, when front-month futures settled at $7.083/MMBtu.

Cold weather arrived in the Northeast this week for the first time this winter, with forecasters calling for continued below-normal temperatures through much of the region, which accounts for 80% of the nation's heating-oil consumption.

Unseasonably warm temperatures in December and much of January crimped heating-oil demand in the region and sent prices sharply lower.

"The weather is a big factor because it is going to increase demand for distillate fuels [such as heating oil] at the very moment production is dropping," said Peter Beutel, president of trading-advisory firm Cameron Hanover in New Canaan, Conn.

Traders and analysts said the gas market has been waiting on colder weather to break out of the range it has been trading in all week, between $6.20/MMBtu and $6.80/MMBtu.

Speculative traders who expected prices to drop as winter made a late arrival with a 20% surplus of gas in storage were left covering short positions ahead of a price increase.

"The market rallied partly on the weather, but it was mostly technical covering" by traders with short positions, or bets on falling prices, said Mike Guido, head of commodity research at Société Générale in New York.

Both private and government forecasts predict temperatures will be below average in February, and with Thursday's larger-than-expected storage withdrawal, gas-market participants think demand could be higher than anticipated.

Despite Friday's rally, crude futures finished the week about 2% lower, and analysts said the recent downward trend in prices is far from over.

Dollar Little Changed; Rate Cut Looks Unlikely (WSJ)

By Dan Molinski

The Wall Street Journal, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119986

The dollar was little changed against the yen and euro Friday after a strong U.S. consumer-confidence survey kept expectations for any rate change from the Federal Reserve low.

In a knee-jerk response to the data, the dollar climbed to 121.49 yen, just a few ticks below a four-year high of 121.60 yen that it reached earlier this past week. The euro briefly fell to as low as $1.2914.

"The [University of Michigan consumer confidence] report beat expectations pretty convincingly," said Tim Mazanec, senior currency strategist at Investors Bank & Trust. "It's looking less and less like the Fed might cut rates anytime soon."

But the dollar's knee-jerk gains were erased later in the session as investors were again leery of stretching the dollar too far. The euro against the dollar had been stuck between $1.29 and $1.30 for most of the week.

Late Friday, the euro stood at $1.2963 from $1.2965 Thursday. The dollar stood at 121.23 yen from 121.21 yen late Thursday, while the euro was flat at 157.15 yen. The dollar has posted strong gains so far this year after a series of economic reports erased expectations the Fed would cut interest rates near term to spur more growth. Now, the rally appears to have run out of steam.

Interest-rate futures contracts Friday were pricing in a 16% chance of a Fed rate cut to 5.0% from the current 5.25% in the first quarter.

Trade Deficit Stubbornly Defies The Dollar's Slide (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter, Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Jessica Heyman's breakfast in Paris last month was nothing out of the ordinary: a modest repast of eggs, coffee and a side salad with her husband, Jonathan Podwil, at the popular Café de Flore. But the bill was memorable — 46 euros, or about $60, at the current exchange rate. Five years ago, when the dollar was strong, the same bill would have amounted to $42.

The sticker shock provided a powerful incentive to remain frugal the rest of the vacation. "We ate a lot of bread," Ms. Heyman said.

Shocking tourists into counting every penny, and getting Americans back home to spend less on costly imports, is part of what a weaker dollar is supposed to do to help pare America's outsize trade deficit, according to economic textbooks.

But, so far, the dollar's slide has not helped enough. Although the dollar has lost a lot of ground against many of the world's major currencies — including the euro, the British pound and the Canadian dollar — the nation's trade imbalance with the world has continued to rise, reaching $702 billion in the first 11 months of 2006, on track to easily outstrip the $717 billion of 2005 and set another record.

Officially, the United States government does not welcome the dollar's weakness. "A strong dollar is clearly in our interest," the Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., said last month.

But many economists say that the Bush administration is satisfied with the dollar's fall against the euro and some other currencies, counting on the decline to help improve the competitiveness of American manufacturers in global markets.

For several reasons, however, that may not happen anytime soon — even if the dollar continues to weaken against European currencies. For one thing, the dollar has not fallen much against the currencies of some crucial trading partners, including China and Japan. Critically, the value of China's yuan against the dollar has been carefully managed by Beijing so that it does not increase much more than 5 percent annually against the dollar. That is a reason China alone ran up a $214 billion surplus in its trade of goods with the United States from January to November last year.

Many foreign suppliers, moreover, are willing to absorb the impact of a declining dollar on their profit margins rather than pass it on to consumers as higher prices. That gives Americans less of an incentive to shift away from imports.

In the end, for the United States to begin to balance its trade, American consumers must spend less, while foreign consumers would have to buy a lot more.

"My U.S. colleagues tend to believe that exchange rates can carry out this adjustment painlessly which I, looking from the outside, find hard to believe," said Thomas Mayer, chief European economist at Deutsche Bank in London. "You would need to have unrealistically large changes in exchange rates to overcome that gap."

Free market economists argue that the deficit does not really matter — it is mostly a benign side effect of America's faster economic growth and its appeal as a destination for foreign investment. Trade imbalances are nothing to worry about, these economists say, reflecting private transactions that just happen to occur across borders.

Still, with the deficit now in excess of 5 percent of the nation's gross domestic product, many other economists worry that the foreign debt needed to finance the growing imbalance is accumulating at an unsustainable pace.

To some extent, a weaker dollar has bolstered American exports to strong-currency nations. America's inflation-adjusted deficit in trading goods and services with the European Union declined by about 1 percent in the first three quarters of last year compared with the 2005 period, to about $84 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0119987

And American producers are seeing some benefits. California wineries, for example, have shown double-digit sales growth in Canada every year since 2002, when the dollar started its fall against the Canadian dollar.

"There's a real price threshold of 10 Canadian dollars a bottle," said Joseph Rollo, director of the international department at the Wine Institute, the lobby group for California wineries. "A few years ago it was very difficult for California wineries to make that level. Now it's a lot easier."

The cheap dollar is also allowing some American companies to enter foreign markets for the first time. Phoenix Closures, a manufacturer of bottle caps in Naperville, Ill., exports very few of its caps to Europe. But a few months ago, it unexpectedly picked up a German client. "I assume these guys are getting a fairly large price reduction coming to us," said Bert Miller, president of the company.

The opposite side of Ms. Heyman's expensive breakfast in Paris is that America is now a bargain destination for Europeans.

"It was always too expensive for me to go to the States, but now it's a good time," said Sotirios Polytimis, 29, an architecture student in Berlin. "With the same money, I can do more in New York: buy drinks, see the night life, go shopping."

Some American companies that compete with foreign suppliers domestically have also benefited. "We are gobbling up market share," said Marty Staff, chief executive of JA Apparel, which makes Joseph Abboud suits and sports jackets at a plant in New Bedford, Mass. "Our products are as good as the European products, but for a lot less money."

Still, the shifting currency has moved far too little to alter entrenched habits.

"The intractability of consumer behavior is the key to the mystery," said Cliff Waldman, economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, a research group for American producers. "About half of the United States' deficit problem with Europe is the difference between the behavior of the European consumer, which is moribund, and the behavior of the American consumer, who never stops."

These days, a lot of foreign things do look ridiculously expensive to American eyes: the $4.15 Big Mac in Paris; the $16.50 ticket to see a movie at the multiplex in Leicester Square in London; $5.89 for a heavily taxed gallon of gas in Frankfurt.

But Europe remains irresistible. American purchases of travel services from European Union countries totaled $17.7 billion in the first three quarters of last year, almost 1 percent more than in the period in 2005, after inflation, and about 20 percent more than in the period in 2003.

The number of German tourists visiting the United States this winter is down approximately 20 percent compared with last year, according to TUI, the largest European tour operator. Robin Zimmermann, a spokesman for TUI, said Germans were favoring destinations in Southeast Asia, where currencies had also fallen against the euro.

Martin N. Baily, former chief economic adviser to President Bill Clinton, remains optimistic that the decline in the dollar will ultimately turn the United States' current-account deficit around. "I think we are poised for a gradual reduction," Mr. Baily said. "We are at a point where exports are starting to grow faster than imports."

Currency adjustments can take time to feed through into trade patterns. In fact, a slide in the dollar could initially worsen the nation's trade balance, as the price in dollars of imports would increase immediately while it could take time for American consumers to switch to domestic products.

But new factors arising from the increased globalization of production seem to be making the trade adjustment particularly slow. For instance, by moving more production out of Europe, into dollar-pegged regions like China and elsewhere in Asia, European companies have created natural hedges against a strong euro.

"With globalization, we now have a large network of plants all over the world," said Anton Börner, president of BFA, an association of German wholesalers and exporters based in Berlin. "So we are not as affected by changes in a single currency."

Hugo Boss, one of Joseph Abboud's main competitors, is based in the southern German town of Metzingen. But it also stitches garments at a factory in Cleveland and buys raw materials from Asia, where most of its transactions are in dollars or dollar-linked currencies.

Sales of Boss suits and accessories rose 14 percent in Europe in the third quarter of 2006, but 17 percent in the United States, in volume terms. The company said it had not felt much of an impact from the strong euro.

"If the dollar stays in a reasonable range, say between $1.10 and $1.50, it will not affect us that much," said Bruno E. Sälzer, the chairman of Boss. "If it were to go to $1.60 or $1.70, that would mean there are bigger economic problems than just the exchange rate."

With Asian production now a big part of the equation for manufacturers all over the world, even big increases in the yuan and other Asian currencies would probably do little to shift output without causing major economic disruptions.

The People's Bank of China is holding about $1.01 trillion in reserves, the vast majority in dollars, which it has amassed as part of its strategy to keep the yuan from appreciating against the American currency to ensure Chinese products remain competitive in the United States market.

DOJ_NMG_0119988

But even though Asian central banks are diversifying their holdings slightly, any big withdrawal from the Treasury market that slowed the flood of credit that has helped keep American interest rates low could harm the Chinese as well as Americans.

"With China," said Mr. Waldman, the manufacturing economist, "the capacity for trade imbalances to adjust is minimal."

Martinez Takes Over As Leader Of RNC (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida, who arrived in the United States as a teenage Cuban refugee, took his party's helm yesterday as general chairman of the Republican National Committee, vowing to reach out to minority voters and restore "the principles that have made us great."

Martinez was handpicked for the job by President Bush, and his ascendance was not without controversy. A small group of conservative RNC members had announced their opposition to the first-term senator because they viewed him as overly tolerant of illegal immigration.

But to many Republicans, Martinez represented a fresh face for the party, a first-generation American whose background and congenial personality could widen GOP appeal to vast new voter groups. Martinez called for greater tolerance for all groups during his inaugural address yesterday.

"To be the party of the future means that we also have to be a party that opens the door wide open so that all Americans feel welcome," he said.

Martinez said that as a Cuban American, "it was easy for me to understand that the Republican Party, the party of Ronald Reagan, was a party for us," because the two sides shared a strong opposition to the communist rule of Fidel Castro.

"I want to make sure that we take that message to the broader Hispanic community, to the African American community, and to all communities that may never have believed that Republican ideals spoke to them," Martinez said.

Martinez said he was encouraged that the 2008 Democratic field is likely to include a woman, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York; an African American, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois; and a Hispanic, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

"I do think that speaks to the evolution of American politics to be more inclusive, and I'm a part of that," said Martinez, who noted the strong showing of Michael S. Steele, the African American GOP candidate in last year's Maryland Senate race. "Both parties have taken a quantum leap," he said.

Outgoing chairman Ken Mehlman said that Martinez would "spread our message far and wide, to those like me who have been Republicans from the beginning and to the newest converts."

Martinez will share the top RNC job with Mike Duncan, a longtime party operative who will serve as chairman, overseeing day-to-day campaign, organizational and fundraising operations. It is an unusual arrangement, engineered in part by Bush, who recruited Martinez for a new general chairman post.

In an interview, Martinez said his immediate concern is lifting the gloomy mood that has gripped the party since it lost control of Congress in November. In recent weeks, the news has grown worse for Republicans, as conditions in Iraq worsen and Bush presses ahead with a controversial plan to increase U.S. troop levels.

"Its spirits are a little down," Martinez said of the GOP. "That is going to be my first order of business, to try to rekindle a little bit of fire. It's time for renewal."

The best tonic, he said, is for Republicans to turn to some of the core conservative principles that rallied the party during Reagan's day, from making government more efficient to promoting volunteerism.

"People want practical solutions to everyday problems," Martinez said. "That's part of what our party has to get back to being focused on."

Martinez was sent to the United States by his parents in 1962 as part of a Catholic Church effort to relocate 14,000 Cuban children. His parents thought the separation would be temporary. But because of the Cuban Missile Crisis, "they were unable to leave and my return was unthinkable," Martinez explained. He lived with two Florida families for a total of four years, working and attending school while he waited for his parents to escape. When they finally arrived in Florida, he told RNC members, he had saved enough to buy the family a car and had lined up a job for his father, a veterinarian.

After stints as Bush's housing secretary, chairman of Orange County, Fla., and a personal injury lawyer, Martinez was elected to the Senate in 2004. He still speaks English with a slight accent and said he believes that his Florida roots give him an important edge, given the state's ethnic diversity and political mix. "We are a microcosm of the country," he said.

Martinez is sympathetic to his state's bid to move up its presidential primary date so that it follows the New Hampshire primary. The idea is contentious within the party, because it could turn the Sunshine State into a potentially decisive battleground, but Martinez said he would not intervene when the Florida legislature considers the change in March.

DOJ_NMG_0119989

RNC Elects Martinez As Head (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

Sen. Mel Martinez was selected yesterday as the general chairman of the Republican National Committee, despite some members' public objections and considerable private grumbling.

The RNC leadership, loyal to President Bush and his choice for general chairman, used parliamentary procedures to end a brief floor skirmish over Mr. Martinez's election -- outmaneuvering members who opposed the creation of the new position and the nomination of the Florida senator to fill it.

Some members said publicly and privately that the senator from Florida would make RNC fundraising more difficult because he supports what critics say is Mr. Bush's desire to grant amnesty to illegal aliens.

"I do not support amnesty for illegal aliens," Mr. Martinez, a naturalized citizen who fled communist Cuba as a boy, insisted in an interview with The Washington Times after his election. "I do support strong border enforcement, and absolutely I support the rule of law [when it comes to] illegal aliens here."

Mr. Martinez was elected in a voice vote, instead of the secret ballot that opponents had sought.

"Senator Martinez will help our party effectively communicate the Republican message of hope and opportunity for all Americans," Mr. Bush said after Mr. Martinez's election.

Several outspoken opponents of Mr. Martinez made some effort at conciliation after the vote.

"While we disagree with Senator Martinez's support of amnesty for people who are in this country illegally, we must still look for the best ways to secure our border, keep our homeland safe and enforce our laws," said Texas Republican Chairman Tina Benkiser, who had voted against the creation of the general chairman's office and the senator's nomination.

"On issues we do agree on such as lowering our taxes, protecting our families, creating a strong economy and reforming our government, we look forward to his leadership," she said.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, in a luncheon address to the 168-member RNC, said that after Republicans lost the majority in Congress in November's midterm elections, "Mel Martinez is the one Republican senator left I can refer to as 'Mr. Chairman.' "

Before yesterday's vote, North Dakota RNC member Curly Haugland, one of the opponents of creating a general chairmanship, offered the written opinion of an accredited professional parliamentarian that the move violated RNC rules. The rules governing the RNC, adopted at the 2004 Republican National Convention, call only for an elected chairman and co-chairman.

The wheels came off Mr. Haugland's drive to use Roberts Rules of Parliamentary Procedure and the RNC's own rules to have a secret ballot on the creation of a general chairman when Robert M. "Mike" Duncan, the newly elected day-to-day RNC chairman, quickly called for a voice vote.

While the vast majority of members voiced public satisfaction with the outcome, Mr. Haugland told The Times afterward: "They didn't follow the rules or the opinion of the independent certified parliamentarian. The breach of rules continues."

Mr. Duncan said his job as chairman "is not to make policy or headlines but to win elections," while Mr. Martinez "will be the voice of the party."

He said the November elections were a sobering reminder to Republicans that "we can't be arrogant or dismiss the message the voters sent us" on Iraq, domestic spending and scandals within the party's ranks.

The RNC annual meeting at the Grand Hyatt Hotel also issued what some said amounted to a rebuke of Arizona Sen. John McCain, a chief proponent of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law that Congress passed and Mr. Bush signed before the 2004 elections.

On Thursday, the committee passed a resolution -- authored by Indiana RNC member James Bopp Jr. and others -- condemning the 2002 passage of the McCain-supported bill, which restricts what political parties can do in conjunction with their own candidates for federal office. Its passage spawned the creation of so-called 527 groups often dominated by wealthy donors.

The RNC resolution urges Congress to deregulate campaign financing instead of further complicating it by attempting to solve unintended consequences with new regulations.

"I don't think it's a repudiation of McCain," said Michigan RNC member Chuck Yob, whose son works for Mr. McCain's unofficial presidential nomination campaign organization. "Even McCain feels the 527s need to be brought under the saddle."

State Aims For Feb. 5 Primary To Boost Clout (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0119990

SACRAMENTO — With Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's backing, state lawmakers from both parties are moving rapidly to make California a player in choosing the nation's next president by holding the state's primary four months earlier.

A bipartisan group of state senators introduced legislation Friday to change the 2008 presidential primary from June 3 to Feb. 5. Another bill was introduced by an Assembly Republican on Thursday, the day after Schwarzenegger declared that moving up the primary date would make California "relevant" nationally and was "something to shoot for."

The February date — the earliest the state can choose under national party rules — would place California at the beginning of the election season, right after four states that have secured the most privileged spots in January for their Democratic caucuses or primaries: Iowa (Jan. 14), Nevada (Jan. 19), New Hampshire (Jan. 22) and South Carolina (Jan. 29). The Republican calendar has Iowa and New Hampshire first, with the rest of the schedule in flux.

Contenders, who now bypass California except to raise money, would be forced to establish real presences here.

The huge cost of competing in California — estimated by one veteran strategist to be $6 million to $8 million per candidate — would probably require all contenders to accelerate their fundraising and possibly give an edge to those candidates who have already amassed sizable war chests, such as Sens. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.), according to operatives in both parties.

Republican moderates such as former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, who might face opposition in Southern states for their liberal views on social issues, could benefit from the change.

"If California can succeed in moving up its primary, this truly is an earthquake in presidential national politics and the tremors will be felt through all 49 states," said Robert Zimmerman, a Democratic National Committee member from New York and presidential fundraiser.

Elevating the clout of California's primary could change the dynamics of the race. It could push to the forefront issues such as immigration and global warming that might be more important and emotional here than in other areas of the country. But the daunting cost of competing here might also end up forcing candidates who did not win in the first primaries out of the race even earlier than in the past, strategists said.

Schwarzenegger and legislative leaders agree on the importance of an early primary, which they hope will make the presidential contenders pay attention to California and give it the political influence in Washington that they believe the most populous state deserves.

"I mean, right now, think about it: We are the No. 1 state in the union, we're the No. 1 place in the world, and yet we are kind of an afterthought when it comes to presidential campaigns," Schwarzenegger told the Sacramento Press Club at a luncheon Wednesday.

An earlier primary could heighten the king-making power of the state's most visible politicians, including Schwarzenegger and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, with presidential candidates vying for their support. That attention, though, could complicate relationships by pressuring leaders to choose sides and alienate other members of their parties.

The Democratic and GOP leaders of the state Assembly predicted in separate interviews Friday that the move, which leaders have been negotiating privately with Schwarzenegger, would pass with little trouble.

"We're serious about this, so we're doing it right," said Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles). "It makes us major players, and it allows us to put California on the federal map and the national agenda."

The Republican Assembly leader, Michael Villines of Clovis, agreed. "I don't think anything stands in our way," he said. "Have you heard of anyone who's against it? I haven't."

Beyond the first four states, most other primary dates are not yet established.

Two other large states, Florida and Michigan, are also talking about moving up their primaries, and the Democratic National Committee is setting rules to award more influence to states that don't try to front-load the primary calendar.

Nuñez and Senate President Don Perata (D-Oakland) sought to try to blunt such efforts by sending a letter Friday to Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

"We ask the committee to instead adopt rules ensuring that California's Democrats have a timely and meaningful opportunity to participate in choosing our party's standard-bearer in 2008," they wrote Dean, who was traveling and could not be reached for comment Friday evening.

Matthew Dowd, a GOP consultant who has advised both President Bush and Schwarzenegger, said he doubted there would be much resistance.

"The national parties don't really care except where Iowa and New Hampshire are," he said.

California's flirtation with presidential prominence has been turbulent.

The state moved all its primaries up to March for the 2004 election, but by then Sen. John F. Kerry had already effectively won the nomination. State candidates rebelled at the change, which lengthened the campaign season, and lawmakers pushed it back to June.

DOJ_NMG_0119991

But the new plan would advance only the presidential primary, not the state primaries. Schwarzenegger and legislative leaders are also talking about placing on that February ballot propositions to try to remove politics from the way election districts are drawn, and to alter term limits for state lawmakers. That latter change is a priority for Nuñez, who otherwise will be forced out of the Assembly in 2008.

Negotiators said another key element remains undecided: whether the winner of the California primary would receive all the state's delegates or whether they would be meted out in proportion to the number of voters won.

Ken Khachigian, a veteran Republican strategist from California, said a winner-take-all primary "would certainly take any second-tier candidate who hit the California lotto, and would just explode them into the front tier. You can win New Hampshire like McCain … and still get whacked elsewhere."

Conservative Core Seeks A Contender (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

For decades, the conservative movement has been the animating force of the Republican Party, providing the ideas and energy that catapulted candidates to the GOP presidential nomination and, often, the White House.

But as conservatives survey the 2008 field — and, particularly, the early Republican front-runners — many are despairing. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani have all broken with conservative orthodoxy at one time or another. Many activists have neither forgiven nor forgotten.

"There's absolutely no contender that is a bona fide conservative," said K.B. Forbes, who has worked for a number of conservative candidates and causes since the 1990s. "We have insiders, squishes and moderates running for president."

The candidate closest to the heart of social conservatives, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, plans to formally launch his White House bid today with a speech in Topeka. But even those who admire Brownback, and especially his Senate leadership opposing abortion, same-sex marriage and stem-cell research, question the viability of his candidacy.

"Brownback has to prove he can win," said Richard Land, head of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, the nation's largest Protestant denomination.

Land sees different problems for the three leading GOP hopefuls. "Most social conservatives at present are uncomfortable with McCain," he said. "They're appalled by Giuliani." As for Romney, Land said, "He has to convince social conservatives he's become one of them."

It's a striking state of affairs, given the ascendance of the conservative movement since 1964. Although he was crushed in the general election that year, Arizona's Barry Goldwater wrested the Republican Party from its Midwest and Eastern roots, starting a realignment that eventually turned the GOP into the party of Ronald Reagan, the Sunbelt and the South.

The absence of a purebred conservative candidate this time, at least among the early leaders, is partly happenstance. Favorites such as Vice President Dick Cheney and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush have chosen not to run. Former Sen. George Allen of Virginia, who was positioning himself as heir to the Reagan mantle, was defeated for reelection in perhaps the biggest upset of 2006, as was ex-Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, a hero to many evangelicals.

But some believe more is at work. They blame the failings of the GOP-run Congress, which dimmed several rising stars and sank the presidential ambitions of one conservative favorite, former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. Beyond that, some see indications that, after 40-plus years, the conservative movement has reached a turning point. They cite growing tensions between economic and religious conservatives, as well as fallout from the war in Iraq, which a growing number of Republicans consider a mistake.

Craig Shirley, a Reagan biographer who has spent years in the conservative trenches, said the GOP has veered badly off course, running up record deficits, pursuing a Wilsonian foreign policy — "making the world safe for democracy" — and becoming overly intrusive in people's private lives, whether intervening in the Terri Schiavo right-to-die case or seeking to ban gambling on the Internet.

"The conservative movement was never about government virtue," said Shirley, who suggested Republicans may be destined for a time in the wilderness unless the party returns to its core principles of limited government and a more pragmatic foreign policy.

Others disagree.

"Each of these guys is jostling each other, McCain, Giuliani and Romney, to be dead center of where Reagan was. No one is competing to run as the Nixon Republican, or the Rockefeller Republican," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, which asks every presidential candidate to sign a pledge vowing never to raise taxes. So far, Brownback and Romney have taken the pledge, the latter after declining to do so while Massachusetts governor.

DOJ_NMG_0119992

"Strong national defense, individual freedom and responsibility, traditional moral values — the ideas are still there," said Lee Edwards, a conservative scholar at the Heritage Foundation in Washington. "Still relevant. Still resonant."

But even Edwards conceded that many conservatives "are sort of holding back a little bit" before committing to any of the Republicans running. "We still have to wait and see what positions they do take," Edwards said.

Sensing opportunity, several candidates with strong conservative credentials — if not the name recognition or fundraising potential of a McCain, Giuliani or Romney — are looking to enter the Republican race. Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is expected to make an announcement by the end of the month. Former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore has formed an exploratory committee. Former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, who also served as secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, has as well. So has Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado, a crusader against illegal immigration. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who excites friends and foes like few other politicians, has said he might enter the race in the fall.

Meantime, the front-running candidates are ceding nothing in the fight for conservative backing — even if it sometimes requires a sharp right-hand turn.

McCain, whose 2000 rivalry with President Bush lingered long after, has become one of the president's strongest supporters in Iraq and eased his opposition to tax cuts he once deemed excessive. He has signed up conservative activists in Iowa and South Carolina, states he lost in 2000 and, most conspicuously, reached out to religious conservatives — including the Rev. Jerry Falwell — whom he once dubbed "agents of intolerance."

Romney, who said he favored abortion rights when he ran for governor in 2002, now describes himself as "firmly pro-life." After once casting himself as a strong supporter of gay rights, Romney has become an outspoken foe of same-sex marriage.

Giuliani, who has favored legal abortion, gay rights and certain gun controls, is expected to stress leadership over ideology if he decides to run.

But many activists remain to be convinced. McCain's support for a friendlier immigration policy continues to rankle — the National Review dubbed him "Amnesty John" — as does the campaign-finance law he championed. Earlier this week, Christian leader James Dobson said he would not support McCain under any circumstance. The senator, who has a solid anti-abortion record but opposes a federal ban on same-sex marriage, said he would like to talk.

Land, of the Southern Baptist Convention, suggested that conservatives would eventually support the GOP nominee. "Social conservatives understand in their bones, in their genetic structure, that what's at stake in [2008] is probably the Supreme Court for the rest of their lifetimes," Land said. "I don't see social conservatives sitting this one out."

But Forbes is not so sure. "We really learned our lesson with Schwarzenegger," said Forbes, who worked on Bill Simon's 2002 campaign for California governor. "The Republicans wanted to win at any cost. They elected someone who claimed to be a conservative and look what you've got — a governor who's talking about state-controlled healthcare."

3 From The Bush Advertising Team Join McCain's '08 Advisers (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19 — Senator John McCain of Arizona has enlisted strategists from President Bush's advertising team to work on the senator's nascent drive for the Republican presidential nomination, aides with his campaign exploratory committee said Friday.

Mr. McCain's aides said he was hiring those three strategists — Russ Schriefer, Stuart Stevens and Fred Davis — as part of a continuing accumulation of campaign advisers.

Mr. Schriefer and Mr. Stevens, partners at a consulting firm based in Washington, helped produce some of the most hard-charging advertisements of Mr. Bush's 2000 and 2004 campaigns.

Among their commercials in 2004 was one featuring Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the Democratic nominee, saying that he did vote for an $87 billion war appropriation "before I voted against it." Another had video of Mr. Kerry windsurfing back and forth, an image reflecting the Bush campaign's accusation that he was a flip-flopper.

Mr. Davis, based in California, has worked on commercials including those in the 2004 campaign in which Mr. Bush and the first lady spoke directly into the camera in the White House residence.

Richardson To Explore Presidential Bid (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson intends to say Sunday that he is taking the first step toward the Democratic presidential nomination, several officials with knowledge of his plans said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0119993

The former congressman, U.N. ambassador and Energy Department secretary is hoping his extensive resume will fuel an insurgent campaign to become the nation's first Hispanic president. He plans to announce Sunday that he will soon file the papers to create a presidential exploratory committee, the officials said.

Sen. Dodd Not To Run For Re-Election In 2010, Uses PAC To Buy NH And IA Voter Files (CQPOL)

CQ Politics, January 19, 2007

Sen. Christopher Dodd, through his counsel, has sent a letter to the Federal Election Commission stating he "is no longer a candidate in the 2010 election for the United States Senate in Connecticut."

This letter helps set the stage for his Senate campaign committee, Friends of Chris Dodd, to declare it has excess funds and transfer the funds to his presidential campaign committee, Chris Dodd for President Inc. His Senate campaign committee reported $1,855,961 cash-on-hand as of 9/30. This amount will probably change with financial activity during the fourth quarter of 2006. His year-end report is due by 1/31/07.

In addition to his Senate and presidential campaign committees, Sen. Dodd also has a leadership PAC, Citizens for Hope Responsibility Independence & Service PAC (CHRIS PAC). The PAC reported $167,526 cash-on-hand as of 11/27/06. However, this is after spending $1,198,998 during the 2005-2006 cycle.

The PAC disbursements in 2005-2006 included contributions totaling $134,500 into New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina.

Iowa $42,500 - The PAC gave a total of $11,000 to three federal candidates in Iowa. The PAC gave $31,500 to seven state candidate or party accounts.

New Hampshire $60,500 - The PAC gave a total of $10,000 to two federal candidates in New Hampshire. The PAC gave $50,500 to one state party account.

South Carolina $31,500 - The PAC gave a total of $1,000 to two federal candidates in South Carolina. The PAC gave $30,500 to twenty-nine state candidate or party accounts.

In addition, the PAC paid the Iowa Democratic Party $50,000 on 9/13/06 for a "voter file." It also paid the New Hampshire Democratic State Committee $50,000 on 9/7/06 for a "voter file."

Can Voters Picture Good Mormons As Good Leaders? (DMN)

By Jeffrey Weiss

The Dallas Morning News, January 20, 2007

On a national level, the question has never been more politically important: Does being Mormon matter?

When Nevada Democrat Harry Reid took his seat this month as U.S. Senate majority leader, he became the highest-ranking federal elected official ever from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. And former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's all-but-official run for the Republican presidential nomination has also raised the profile of his church.

So does it matter to voters that they're Mormons? Maybe, the experts say.

Distinctively Mormon values could have policy implications on issues including abortion, welfare, gay marriage and the role of federal judges. In addition to Mr. Reid, four other senators and 10 U.S. House members identify themselves as Mormons.

Also Online

Evangelicals: Voters may not go for Romney

The Mormon Church is generally against abortion, in favor of traditional families and supportive of patriotism. But the Latter-day Saints get to those positions using a different theology from that of other churches – and those differences could affect the way Mormon politicians govern.

That's not to say that observant Mormons run in political lockstep any more than members of any other faith.

Mr. Reid, left of center, and Mr. Romney, increasingly right of center, both credit their church with setting their values.

"Without the direction of the church, I would have been without a compass," Mr. Reid wrote for a book published in 2001.

But even among themselves, Mormons can read their compasses differently. For instance, Mormons are taught to avoid coffee and tea. But Mr. Romney has a coffeepot for his staff, a spokesman said. Mr. Reid does not. Both men declined through spokesmen to answer questions from The Dallas Morning News about specific aspects of Mormon theology.

Mr. Reid's spokesman said the senator's church "teaches him values that cross party lines – care for those in need, look out for our fellow man and do what is right."

Mr. Romney's spokesman said the former governor "is a person of strong faith, and his faith helps guide his values."

Church not involved

DOJ_NMG_0119994

The LDS church is officially and emphatically not involved in partisan politics. But Mr. Reid and Mr. Romney are well aware of church teachings and how they could apply to public policy, said Ronald Scott, a Boston journalist working on a book about Mr. Romney.

"You have guys who have grown up thinking and talking like theologians," said Mr. Scott, a distant cousin of Mr. Romney's.

The two leaders came to their church by radically different routes.

Mr. Reid has written that he grew up in Searchlight, a rowdy Nevada mining town with no church and "13 bordellos." He converted in college.

Mr. Romney comes from a family that's been Mormon for generations. (He's the son of George Romney, the former Michigan governor and a contender for the 1968 GOP presidential nomination.) He has held several church positions, including stake president – something like a regional bishop.

So how are Mormon values different from, say, Baptist or Catholic values? Differences are rooted in Mormon history.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is an American-born faith, started in the 19th century by a New Yorker named Joseph Smith. God, Mr. Smith said, had instructed a small group of Israelites to head west about 2,600 years ago – a boat trip all the way to what is now America. They built a mighty civilization and were visited by Jesus after his resurrection.

The civilization collapsed four centuries after Jesus' visit, but the sacred texts of its prophets were saved on golden plates. In 1823, the church teaches, an angel revealed the plates to Mr. Smith. He is said to have translated the plates and used the text to reconstitute God's only true church, beginning with six members.(Polygamy, accepted in the church's early days, was officially renounced in 1890.)

Mr. Smith's followers consider the Book of Mormon, named after an angel, to be as sacred as the Bible. And they believe that Mr. Smith and his successors – current church president is Gordon B. Hinckley – are "prophets, seers and revelators" through whom God can issue new revelations.

'Continuing revelation'

This notion of "continuing revelation" distinguishes Mormon practice. When the pope, by comparison, speaks "infallibly," he's explaining what he says Catholic teachings have always been. A Mormon president, on the other hand, may claim a prophesy that results in significant doctrinal changes. Such was the case with Spencer W. Kimball's revelation in 1978 that transformed official church policy toward blacks, allowing them full membership in the church.So what if Mr. Hinckley or a successor declared that God said America should outlaw spinach or invade Australia? Would "good Mormon" elected officials feel compelled to obey?

In mid-2005, as talk of a run for presidency started to percolate, a spokesman for then-Gov. Romney addressed the question of obedience to Mormon leadership:

The spokesman told The Boston Globe that Mr. Romney's "obligation is to fulfill his duty of office, and that would take precedence over anything. "

Some Mormon experts say a revelation directed at Mormon politicians is possible but exceedingly unlikely. In the past, revelations haven't directly addressed American public policy. And before a new revelation is official, the president's two closest advisers and a "Quorum of the Twelve Apostles" are expected to confirm it. So it's nigh on impossible for one leader to claim a radical new word from the Almighty. And while individual Mormons are expected to confirm their belief in the new teaching, they are also obligated by their faith to evaluate it for themselves.

"The only way you can know for sure is if you have a personal revelation," said Boyd Petersen, a professor of Mormon studies at Utah Valley State College.

Where they stand

Continuing revelation is not the only distinctively LDS belief that could have political implications. Some other examples:

· Abortion

Mormon theology calls for exemptions from an absolute ban – when the pregnancy results from rape or incest; a doctor decides that the mother's health is in serious jeopardy; or a doctor determines that the fetus has severe defects that will not allow the baby to survive beyond birth.

Mr. Reid generally opposes abortion but is in favor of the exceptions for rape, incest and the health of the mother. Mr. Romney said last year that he would sign a bill outlawing abortion, even in cases of rape or incest.

· The origin of the government.

Mormons are taught that the essential structure of the U.S. government was divinely inspired. This belief could influence attitudes toward possible constitutional amendments or the selection of federal judges.

· Gay rights.

Mormons are taught that each soul has an intrinsic gender and had it in a life before birth. "Gender is an essential characteristic of individual premortal, mortal, and eternal identity and purpose." And that identity, Mormons are taught, was never gay.The church supports a constitutional amendment defining marriage as being between one man and one woman. Mr. Reid opposes the amendment; Mr. Romney supports it.

DOJ_NMG_0119995

· Gender roles.

In an ideal family, the church teaches, men are "to provide the necessities of life and protection for their families. Mothers are primarily responsible for the nurture of their children."

Legislation about gender pay equivalency, day care programs and family leave could be affected by this teaching.

"The bottom line for church leaders is to endorse whatever public policies that they perceive will favor traditional marriage, family and children," said Armand Mauss, former president of the Mormon History Association and a visiting scholar at California's Claremont Graduate School of Religion.

But fear of challenges to the traditional family, more than specific theology, may better explain Mormon political stands on gender roles, he said.

· Welfare.

Church teachings pull in two directions. On the one hand, LDS members are taught to be self-sufficient – to the point of having a year's worth of supplies in storage.

On the other hand, Mormons are taught to help the needy – without even asking why the person is in need.

Mr. Scott, the Boston journalist, said a universal health insurance program that Mr. Romney championed in Massachusetts is "quintessentially Mormon."

Other politicians have said their religion was important without drawing explicit connections to public policy. In a 2000 debate, George W. Bush identified Jesus Christ as his favorite political philosopher. But the president, like Mr. Reid and Mr. Romney, has demurred at explaining exactly how religious beliefs affect his governance.

Perhaps Mormon politicians will take their cue from Brigham Young, who led the church after Mr. Smith was assassinated in 1844.

Mr. Young offered a Mormon motto in one of his famous sermons:

"'To mind your own business,' " he said, "incorporates the whole duty of man."

Pennsylvania Governor Pushes Health Plan (NYT)

By Sean D. Hamill

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

PITTSBURGH, Jan. 19 — Gov. Edward G. Rendell arrived here Friday to rally support for his plan not only to extend health insurance coverage to the state's 760,000 uninsured adults, but also to cut billions of dollars in heath care costs and ban smoking in restaurants, bars and workplaces.

Mr. Rendell said the plan would require 47 changes to state law and regulations. It follows efforts in several other states to offer some version of universal health coverage.

Though Pennsylvania has one of the lowest uninsured rates in the nation — about 7 percent, compared with 20 percent in California — Mr. Rendell said the proposal was crucial because "the system is near collapse."

At a meeting with business and civic leaders at the private Duquesne Club downtown, Mr. Rendell pointed to a chart indicating that health care costs grew 75 percent in the state over the past seven years, while wages rose 13 percent and inflation increased 17 percent.

"We can't go through another seven years of that," he said.

Mr. Rendell did not provide any cost estimates for the plan, but said that it relied on federal money, some redirected state money and a group of new taxes, including a 10-cent-per-pack increase in the cigarette tax and a fee on businesses that do not offer insurance to their employees. (A law approved last year is intended to extend health insurance to the state's 150,000 uninsured children.)

The governor's proposal also contains measures intended to make health care more efficient. One is an effort to reduce hospital-acquired infections, estimated to cost billions of dollars every year.

Though Mr. Rendell had previously said he would sign a bill authorizing a "single-payer system" whereby the state would be the insurer for the uninsured, nothing like that is in his proposal.

During his other stop Friday, at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center, he said such a plan would be "inordinately expensive" and ultimately "untenable to the legislature."

Mr. Rendell's proposal differs in significant ways from recent state-sponsored health care packages in California and Massachusetts.

Both those states require individual participation, but, under Mr. Rendell's plan, Pennsylvania would not.

DOJ_NMG_0119996

In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, wants the Legislature to approve health insurance coverage for illegal immigrants. But Mr. Rendell, a Democrat, said he did not try to provide coverage for Pennsylvania's estimated 150,000 illegal immigrants because Republicans in the legislature had said they would not back it.

Lawmakers of both parties have expressed support for some parts of Mr. Rendell's proposal, but passage of the entire plan is likely to be difficult. Among the reasons are that Republicans control the State Senate.

Towns Tame Taxes By Keeping Children Out (WT/BLOOM)

By Bob Ivry

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

New Jersey towns have figured out a way to sidestep the highest property taxes in the U.S.

Keep children out.

Educating a child in New Jersey costs an average of $12,567 a year, the most in the nation and more than double the property tax parents typically pay. So local governments have hit upon a way to expand the tax base without the expense of higher enrollment: age-restricted housing.

New Jersey developers have responded by building an estimated one-fifth of the country's adults-only housing, making the state the leader in a national trend spurred by baby boomers seeking new homes after their children move out.

In New Jersey, where schools can command two-thirds of a municipal budget and state officials have failed to provide tax relief, building communities that don't allow children has as much to do with reducing taxes as it does with serving older home buyers.

"It's frustration on the part of some communities," said New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine, a Democrat. "The real problem is we have too much reliance on property taxes in how we finance public education."

Nationwide, 2.8 million households were part of age-restricted communities in 2005, up 29 percent from 2001. The number in New Jersey grew 37 percent in the same period. More than half the housing units started in the state in the past two years have excluded children, according to data compiled by the New Jersey Builders Association.

In one New Jersey town, Monroe Township, population 28,000, half the housing units are limited to senior citizens.

As many as 95,000 such units will be built in the U.S. in 2007, according to an estimate by the National Association of Home Builders. New Jersey developers will build about 20,000 of them.

Exclusionary zoning is legal in the U.S. A 1998 exemption to the federal Fair Housing Act allows age restrictions if homes in a development are intended solely for residents age 62 and older, or if 80 percent of the units are occupied by one person who is at least 55.

New Jersey towns support their school systems mostly with property tax revenue, pushing the average tab to $5,153 in 2004, the highest in the U.S. New Jersey residents are older than in most states -- 12.5 percent are 65 and older, compared with the 12.1 percent average in the U.S.

Some home builders see age-restriction housing as protection against the wider housing slump. The National Association of Homebuilders estimates that profit from age-restricted housing was $1.2 billion in 2006.

For Pulte Homes Inc., the largest U.S. home builder by market value, 39 percent of its homes sold in 2005 had age restrictions, up from 33 percent in 2004, said spokeswoman Caryn Klebba. In 2001, the Bloomfield Hills, Mich., company was selling homes in 15 age-restricted communities in seven states, Miss Klebba said.

Today, Pulte has 56 such developments in 20 states, with eight more scheduled to open in 2007.

"Age-restricted housing is growing more than the general housing market," said Ara Hovnanian, chief executive officer of Hovnanian Enterprises Inc., New Jersey's largest home builder.

The Red Bank, N.J., company will have 16 adults-only developments on the market this year.

The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled last month that towns could condemn land for open space under eminent domain laws to stop development that might result in "overcrowded schools." That put children on a par with pollution and traffic congestion as valid reasons for seizing property.

"Exclusionary zoning is most prevalent in New Jersey, but it's pervasive in a lot of parts of the country, especially in the Northeast, where there isn't a lot of land to build on," said Robert Puentes, a fellow with the Brookings Institution's Metropolitan Policy Program in the District. "With property tax being such a big issue now, it's much more front and center."

Still, elected officials are reluctant to link age-restricted development to taxes, mindful that voters may view them as being anti-child.

"It's a backroom taboo thing that everybody talks about but nobody talks about," said Douglas Steinhardt, mayor of Lopatcong Township, which limits new housing to two bedrooms.

Lopatcong's zoning restriction is intended as a density-control measure and "not to keep kids out," Mr. Steinhardt said.

DOJ_NMG_0119997

Age-restricted housing does help reduce property taxes, according to the state Department of Community Affairs. In Monroe Township, which has 8,878 age-restricted units, the most in the state, the property tax averaged $4,327 in 2004, the latest year statistics are available. That was 16 percent lower than the rest of Middlesex County and 22 percent less than the state average.

In comparison, South Brunswick, Monroe Township's neighbor, has just 731 units of age-restricted housing and an average property tax of $5,782.

"The unbalance that age-restricted housing brings is going to be a disaster for the state in the long run," said Lakewood Township Mayor Ray Coles. "New Jersey seems to be looking for ways to turn families away."

Other mayors, including Scott Rumana of Wayne, reject the idea that exclusionary zoning saves money, because having more senior citizens pushes up emergency response costs.

Developers, which can make more money building unrestricted housing, sometimes find it's more difficult to get those plans approved, said Patrick O'Keefe, chief executive officer of the New Jersey Builders Association.

"It's almost a prerequisite that a project pass the child-exclusion test before a planning board will consider it," Mr. O'Keefe said.

In Peapack-Gladstone, population 2,465, the land-use board twice denied Dennis Townsend permission to build 18 multimillion-dollar homes on 13 acres across a dirt road from his Hamilton Farm Golf Club.

On a tour of the land, Mr. Townsend, chairman of Townsend Capital LLC of Towson, Md., pointed to the woods behind his proposed lots, where Peapack-Gladstone recently approved 55 duplexes a stone's throw from where he wants to build. The duplexes will be age-restricted.

Targeting Wal-Mart Again (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WHAT DO Johns Hopkins University, Northrop Grumman Corp., Giant Food Inc. and Wal-Mart have in common?

Answer: They are the four biggest private employers in Maryland. Yet last January, when the Maryland General Assembly passed its Fair Share Health Care Fund Act, requiring companies with more than 10,000 Maryland employees to spend at least 8% of their total payroll on workers' health insurance costs, it did something interesting. Though all four qualified under the law, legislators ensured that only one — Wal-Mart, the super-villain of documentary films, watchdog websites and countless news investigations — would have to obey it.

This week, the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld an industry group's challenge to the Maryland law, saying that it is preempted by the 1974 ERISA Act, a federal law that sets minimum standards for employee benefits plans. Although the court made a kind reference to Maryland's "noble purpose" (in trying to offload some of its swelling health coverage costs), it made clear that Wal-Mart faced substantial losses.

The Fair Share Act could hardly have been more clear in its intent to punish Wal-Mart specifically, and unfairly. The act was passed — over the veto of then-Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich — in an atmosphere of widespread public revulsion at the retailer's practices of discouraging unions and stinginess with benefits. Similar laws are on the books or under consideration in New York and Minnesota; and the super-retailer has certainly received its share of targeted legislative grief from city councils all over Southern California. But the Maryland law was so blatantly targeted at Wal-Mart as to amount to a "bill of attainder" — a legislative act pronouncing a person guilty of a crime. Such acts are prohibited by the Constitution.

Californians, who are digesting the opening course of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's healthcare overhaul, should take a special interest in the outcome of this case. Schwarzenegger's proposed mandate that employers devote at least 4% of payroll to health coverage is far less onerous than the Maryland law (the typical California employer already pays about 8% of payroll to health coverage). But the fate of the Fair Share Act demonstrates how easy it is for a statewide experiment to run afoul of federal regulations, even if that experiment is about solving a problem rather than aiming public opprobrium at a popular target.

China Shows Assertiveness In Weapons Test (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 19 — China's apparent success in destroying one of its own orbiting satellites with a ballistic missile signals that its rising military intends to contest American supremacy in space, a realm many here consider increasingly crucial to national security.

The test of an antisatellite weapon last week, which Beijing declined to confirm or deny Friday despite widespread news coverage and diplomatic inquiries, was perceived by East Asia experts as China's most provocative military action since it testfired missiles off the coast of Taiwan more than a decade ago.

DOJ_NMG_0119998

Unlike in the Taiwan exercise, the message this time was directed mainly at the United States, the sole superpower in space.

With lengthy white papers, energetic diplomacy and generous aid policies, Chinese officials have taken pains in recent years to present their country as a new kind of global power that, unlike the United States, has only good will toward other nations.

But some analysts say the test shows that the reality is more complex. China has surging national wealth, legitimate security concerns and an opaque military bureaucracy that may belie the government's promise of a "peaceful rise."

"This is the other face of China, the hard power side that they usually keep well hidden," said Chong-Pin Lin, an expert on China's military in Taiwan. "They talk more about peace and diplomacy, but the push to develop lethal, high-tech capabilities has not slowed down at all."

Japan, South Korea and Australia are among the countries in the region that pressed China to explain the test, which if real would make it the third power, after the United States and the Soviet Union, to shoot down an object in space.

China's Foreign and Defense Ministries declined to comment on reports of the test, which were based on United States intelligence data. Liu Jianchao, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, would say only that China opposed using weapons in space. "China will not participate in any kind of arms race in outer space," he told [a news organization].

China's silence on the test underscores how much its rapidly modernizing military — perhaps especially the Second Artillery forces, in charge of its ballistic missile program — remains isolated and secretive, answering only to President Hu Jintao, who heads the military as well as the ruling Communist Party.

Having a weapon that can disable or destroy satellites is considered a component of China's unofficial doctrine of asymmetrical warfare. China's army strategists have written that the military intends to use relatively inexpensive but highly disruptive technologies to impede the better-equipped and better-trained American forces in the event of an armed conflict — over Taiwan, for example.

The Pentagon makes extensive use of satellites for military communications, intelligence and missile guidance, and some Chinese experts have argued that damaging its space-based satellite infrastructure could hobble American forces.

Yet while China's research and development of such weapons has been well known, the apparent decision to test-fire an antisatellite weapon came as a surprise to many analysts.

"If this is fully corroborated, it is a very significant event that is likely to recast relations between the United States and China," said Allan Behm, a former official in Australia's Defense Ministry. "This was a very sophisticated thing to do, and the willingness to do it means that we're seeing a different level of threat."

China's military expenditures have been growing at nearly a double-digit pace, even after adjusting for inflation, for 15 years. China has begun to deploy sophisticated submarines, aircraft and antiship missiles that the Pentagon says could have offensive uses.

Yet with a few notable exceptions, Beijing has avoided sharp provocations that could prompt the United States or Japan to focus more on what some officials in each country regard as a potential threat.

Chinese leaders emphasize that they are preoccupied with domestic challenges and intend to focus their energy and resources on economic development, a policy they say depends heavily on cross-border investment, open trade and friendly foreign relations.

The country has denied that it intends to develop space weapons and sharply criticized the United States for experimenting with a space-based missile defense system. It forged a coalition of Asian countries to jointly develop peaceful space-based technologies.

Last month it published and heavily promoted a white paper on military strategy that emphasized its view that space must remain weapon-free. "China is unflinching in taking the road of peaceful development and always maintains that outer space is the common wealth of mankind," the paper said.

Some of such talk amounts to little more than propaganda. But Jonathan Pollack, a China specialist at the Naval War College in Newport, R.I., says the Chinese military does in fact act cautiously when it comes to improving its strategic capabilities, like long-range missiles and nuclear weapons, to avoid causing alarm in the United States.

"They have talked about antisatellite weapons," he said. "But we have always thought that the threat was ambiguous and that China probably wanted it that way. So what was the calculation to go ahead with an actual test?"

Some analysts suggested that one possible motivation was to prod the Bush administration to negotiate a treaty to ban space weapons. Russia and China have advocated such a treaty, but President Bush rejected those calls when he authorized a policy that seeks to preserve "freedom of action" in space.

Chinese officials have warned that an arms race could ensue if Washington did not change course.

DOJ_NMG_0119999

At a United Nations conference in Vienna last June on uses of space, a Chinese Foreign Ministry official, Tang Guoqiang, called the policies of "certain nations" disconcerting.

"Outer space is the common heritage of mankind, and weaponization of outer space is bound to trigger off an arms race, thus rendering outer space a new arena for military confrontation," he said, according to an official transcript of his remarks.

Even so, Mr. Pollack, of the Naval War College, said that if China hoped that demonstrating a new weapon of this kind would prompt a positive response in Washington, they most likely miscalculated.

"Very frankly, many people in Washington will find that this validates the view of a China threat," Mr. Pollack said. "It could well end up backfiring and forcing the U.S. to take new steps to counter China."

Other analysts said the test might have more to do with proving a technology under development for many years than a cold-war-style negotiating tactic.

China maintains a minimal nuclear arsenal that could inflict enough damage on an enemy to guard against any pre-emptive strike, these analysts said. But the increasing sophistication of American missile interceptors, which are linked to satellite surveillance, threatens the viability of China's limited nuclear arsenal, some in Beijing have argued.

That may have prompted the Second Artillery to show that it had the means to protect fixed missile sites and ensure China's retaliatory capacity by showing that it could take out American satellites.

At the annual military fair in Zhuhai, held in November, the Guangdong-based newspaper Information Times and several other state-run media outlets carried a short interview with an unidentified military official boasting that China had "already completely ensured that it has second-strike capability." The analyst said China could protect its retaliatory forces because it could destroy satellites in space.

American officials have also noted the development. This month, Lt. Gen. Michael Mapes of the Army testified before Congress that China and Russia were working on systems to hit American satellites with lasers or missiles. And over the summer, the director of the National Reconnaissance Office, Donald M. Kerr, told reporters that the Chinese had used a ground-based laser to "paint," or illuminate, an American satellite, a possible first step to using lasers to destroy satellites.

"China is becoming more assertive in just about every military field," said Mr. Behm, the Australian expert. "It is not going to concede that the U.S. can be the hegemon in space forever."

U.S. Presses China On Anti-satellite Test (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration demanded again Friday that China explain why it conducted a test of its growing anti-satellite capability last week, successfully destroying an obsolete orbiter in a move that alarmed many U.S. allies and brought diplomatic protests.

The United States, Canada, Australia and Japan have questioned China's motives in launching a ground-based missile that destroyed one of its aging weather satellites about 500 miles above Earth.

Beijing has declined to confirm the test but has said it supports the peaceful use of space. U.S. officials said no country should conduct tests that advance the potential for wars in space or result in explosions that create large areas of debris hazardous to other satellites.

"We know the Chinese have conducted this test," said Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman. "We certainly want to hear from them in a more detailed way exactly what their intentions are…. We don't want to see a situation where there is any militarization of space."

U.S. officials are seeking talks with their Chinese counterparts. Though some experts are calling for an expanded dialogue, more hawkish observers say the U.S. needs to take a tougher line.

State Department officials met with officials from the Chinese Embassy on Tuesday, and diplomats in Beijing met with Chinese officials Wednesday. Casey said one of the questions the test raised was whether this was a one-time incident or part of a broader initiative.

The U.S. has conducted similar tests to shoot down satellites, but the last was in 1985. America and the Soviet Union abandoned the tests over concerns about the debris they generated.

"Countries throughout the world are dependent on space-based technologies — you know, weather satellites, communication satellites and other devices," Casey said.

The Chinese missile test was unsurprising given the U.S. position on the militarization of space and this country's military capabilities, said Michael Swaine, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

"There needs to be a sustained discussion between the U.S., China and other space-faring nations about how space can be used," Swaine said.

DOJ_NMG_0120000

Other experts were skeptical about how much a dialogue with China would yield.

"Talking is swell, but don't expect to get anything from it," said James Andrew Lewis, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Other skeptics, such as John J. Tkacik Jr. of the Heritage Foundation's Asian Studies Center, have argued that China has rebuffed U.S. attempts to negotiate over space. The U.S., Tkacik said, should tell China there will be consequences for missile launches. The leverage America has, he said, is bilateral trade.

China's Anti-satellite Missile Test Criticised (FT)

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

China on Friday denied provoking a space arms race following international condemnation of its successful test of an anti-satellite weapon, the first such test by any country in two decades.

The US, Japan, Britain and Australia criticised Beijing for testing an anti-satellite system without warning by destroying a weather satellite in space orbit with a ballistic missile.

Japanese officials were among the first to react to the test. "We are concerned about it firstly from the point of view of peaceful use of space, and secondly from the safety perspective," said Yasuhisa Shiozaki, Japan's chief cabinet secretary.

A Chinese foreign ministry spokesman said on Friday he was not aware of any such test, but that whatever had happened, other countries did not have "any reason" to be concerned about China's space programme.

"The principled position of the Chinese government is that we stand for the peaceful use of space," said spokesman Liu Jianchao. "We are against the introduction of weapons into space."

A Bush administration official said the Chinese had conducted three other tests between September 2004 and February 2006. Another senior administration official said the earlier missile launches were "mostly successful" but were intended to test parts of the anti-satellite system before conducting a final test.

Asked whether the UK was concerned about the ramifications for world peace, a spokesman for Tony Blair, the British prime minister, said: "We believe this [test] does not contravene international law."

The US and former Soviet Union stopped testing kinetic anti-satellite weapons – which destroy targets by the force of impact – in the 1980s, partly out of concern over the effect of space debris on their satellites.

China and Russia in recent years have encouraged the US to enter negotiations about creating an international treaty that would ban the use of weapons in space. But Washington has argued that there was no need for a treaty because there were no weapons in space.

Some analysts said the Chinese move might have been designed to pressure the US to sign an agreement. Others said China might have decided to proceed because of a US policy that it would not allow other countries to restrict its activities in space.

Report by Demetri Sevastopulo in Washington, Mure Dickie in Beijing, Jean Eaglesham in London, Mariko Sanchanta in Tokyo and Neil Buckley in Moscow

China Tries To Reassure The World On Space Missile "Aimed At Peace" (LONT)

By Jane Macartney, Richard Beeston, Tim Reid

Times of London, January 20, 2007

China signalled yesterday that its first missile strike against an orbiting satellite was intended to force the US into talks aimed at abolishing weapons in space.

As it faced an international chorus of protest against its test — the first such launch for 20 years — its officials insisted that they wanted space to be free of weapons.

"As the Chinese Government, our principle stand is to promote the peaceful use of space," a Foreign Ministry spokesman said. "We oppose the militarisation of space. In the past, in the present and in the future, we are opposed to any arms race in space. Of this everyone can be confident."

The reassurances failed to placate jittery Asian neighbours and Western powers, which fear that the surprise Chinese muscle-flexing is part of a campaign to raise its global military posture while raising the spectre of a space arms race.

China is the first country since 1985 to destroy a satellite in space and only the third — after America and the former Soviet Union — to master so-called Star Wars technology. The clear message is that if China can shoot down its own orbiter it could also attack satellites operated by other nations.

Beijing has increased defence spending by 10 per cent every year since 1990. Last year spending rose nearly 15 per cent to $35.5 billion (£18 billion). Experts believe that the true figure is far higher, in part because the official budget does not include military development costs.

DOJ_NMG_0120001

Yesterday Britain and Japan added their voices to the growing criticism, which has included the US, Australia, South Korea and Canada. A Downing Street spokesman said that Britain was concerned about the impact of debris caused by the destruction of the satellite and the secretive manner in which the test had been carried out. A formal protest was made this week to the Chinese by the British Embassy in Beijing.

Alexander Downer, the Australian Foreign Minister, said that China's new-found capacity to shoot down satellites was "not consistent with ... the traditional Chinese position of opposition to the militarisation of outer space".

Washington's response will be crucial in determining what happens next: an arms race in space or an agreement to limit the use of Star Wars technology. American analysts said that the test had exposed the "soft underbelly" of America's national security apparatus, because most of the Pentagon's spy satellites orbit at a similar height to the weather satellite destroyed by the Chinese test.

White House critics said that the Chinese test was a result of President Bush's aggressive unilateralism, this time in his space policy. Last year the US expressly ignored Chinese and Russian calls for a global ban on the development of space weapons. Instead, a new policy preserved America's right to develop military space technology, while "dissuading" others.

Edward Markey, a Democrat congressman, said that President Bush should initiate an international agreement "to ban the development, testing and deployment of space weapons and anti-satellite systems".

But Jeffrey Kueter, president of the George C. Marshall Institute, said that the Chinese move should spur the Bush Administration to develop new space defence systems.

"We now know for certain that China has the direct capability to destroy satellites in space and the indirect capability to deny their use," he said.

Chinese analysts said that they doubted the action would damage China's relations with the US. Shi Yinhong, of the School of International Studies, said: "Every big power, if it wants to maintain its status as a big power, will get into the field of space."

Chinese Space Test Raises US Suspicions (FT)

By Mure Dickie, Stephen Fidler, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

China's test this month of an anti-satellite weapon, which Washington says was used to destroy an ageing Chinese satellite, is likely to carry a cost for Beijing, according to military analysts.

It is sure to raise further US suspicions about Beijing's intentions, heightened by previous launches in the past three years. Between September 2004 and February 2006, a US official said, China launched three rockets capable of destroying a satellite.

A senior US official said the Chinese had developed an anti-satellite system in which they had a "great deal of confidence" and which could "conceivably degrade or cripple key [US] systems". He said the weapon was based on an existing system that could be deployed with little warning.

The development appears to be the latest example of China surprising the US over the extent of its military capabilities.

The Pentagon last year warned that China was "pursuing" anti-satellite systems but concluded that they could only destroy or disable satellites using nuclear-armed missiles, which could carry "many risks".

The US is sensitive to any potential threat to its space-based systems, as shown by Washington's complaint that the development and testing of such weapons is "in-consistent with the spirit" of Sino-US civil co-operation in space.

In the absence of any Chinese public statement, the motivation for the test remains unclear.

"China is committed to military modernisation and if it wants to modernise its military then it has to develop some limited space capability," said Shi Yinhong, a professor of international politics at Beijing's Renmin University.

Andrew Brookes of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, said: "China has a big space launch programme and they're talking about going to the moon. It may simply be a military department competing for its budget share by demonstrating its capability."

The senior US official said Beijing probably wanted to test its capabilities while demonstrating the progress it had made to the US.

Whatever the motivation, the consequences may be significant.

The US military is heavily dependent on satellites for surveillance, intelligence gathering, weapons guidance and communications.

While the Chinese test successfully demonstrated a technology that the US and the Soviet Union mastered more than two decades ago, it is likely to increase pressure from hawks in Washington for the US to spend more on the defence of its space assets.

DOJ_NMG_0120002

That might include pressure to base defensive weapons in space – for example so-called space mines. However, A 2004 report from the Federation of American Scientists -concluded that the US could equally well use a number of -alternative defensive approaches that would avoid basing weapons in space.

The test is likely to bring calls from another direction too: that it is time for an international treaty to stop the use of space for military purposes. China and Russia have been pushing the US to agree to a pact banning the deployment or use of weapons in space.

The US responded that a treaty was unnecessary because no country was deploying or using weapons in space. The senior administration official yesterday said the US did not agree with the way China defined space weapons. "They want to define arms in space very broadly to include ballistic missile defence," he said. "That is not the way it is going to go."

Some analysts said the equation had now changed. "We just got our arms race," said Jeffrey Lewis, an arms control expert at Harvard University.

"The US has refused to engage in negotiations and this may be why the Chinese did this," said Theresa Hitchens, an expert on space militarisation at the Center for Defense Information.

The US and Soviet Union stopped testing kinetic anti-satellite weapons in the 1980s, partly because they were concerned about the physical impact of space debris on their own satellites, and partly due to the potential ramifications for the nuclear balance. Both sides feared that the destruction of a satellite by space junk could cause the other to conclude that a nuclear attack was about to occur.

Military analysts say China has been worried by the possible US deployment of space-based weapons such as "rods from God" – hyper-velocity bundles of tungsten bars that would destroy earth-based targets.

But Mr Lewis says China has misread the US political landscape, saying the White House would use the test to argue that China was not serious about preventing an arms race in space.

While the US has not used an anti-satellite weapon for two decades, it has continued to work on them. Congress is funding the kinetic energy anti-satellite programme started during the Reagan years and the air force is thought to be developing weapons using lasers and microwaves that could obliterate satellites with minimal debris.

The US space policy unveiled last year asserts the right to deny access to space to anyone deemed "hostile to US interests".

"Compared with traditional US space policy, the hegemonic flavour of the new version is less disguised and betrays an intense determination to exercise control over space," wrote Teng Jianqun, deputy head of the China Arms -Control and Disarmament Association.

China's first satellite kill, however, will make it harder for it to claim the moral high ground on the demilitarisation of space.

China's Muscle Flex In Space (NYT)

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

China spread alarm and consternation among space powers when it destroyed one of its own satellites last week with a missile fired from the ground, thus becoming the first nation in more than two decades to successfully test an antisatellite weapon. This aggressive show of force puts a wide range of United States military and intelligence satellites at risk and holds the danger of starting an arms race in space. Too bad the Bush administration's own bellicose attitudes — and adamant refusal to consider an arms control treaty for space — give it scant standing to chastise the Chinese. The administration needs to reverse course promptly and join in talks aimed at banning further tests or use of antisatellite weapons.

The Chinese test, which Beijing has not acknowledged but was tracked by intelligence agencies, destroyed an aging communications satellite some 500 miles above the Earth. The missile smashed the satellite into hundreds of pieces large enough to pose a danger for a decade or more to spacecraft or satellites that pass through the debris.

The Chinese have now demonstrated that — should they ever choose — they could destroy essential American satellites used to conduct military reconnaissance, spot nuclear tests and direct smart weapons. A top intelligence official told reporters last August that China had used a ground-based laser to illuminate an American satellite. That could signal a nascent effort to develop a way to blind satellites or to guide a missile to a target in space.

The Bush administration has been flexing its own muscles in space. A national space policy issued in October declared that "freedom of action in space is as important to the United States as air power and sea power." It asserted a need to deter others from interfering with America's right to operate in space. The policy did not address whether Washington would place weapons in space — as some in the Pentagon have been urging — but the administration continues to oppose any restrictions.

Surely it would make military and diplomatic sense to pursue the opposite course and seek to ban all tests and any use of antisatellite weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0120003

The United States and the Soviet Union successfully tested such weapons decades ago and have no overriding need to develop better versions, although the United States is clearly trying. China's success in matching the feat reportedly came after three earlier tests failed, so the Chinese could only benefit from additional testing. The United States, with many more satellites in orbit than any other power and a military that has become increasingly dependent on satellites, has the most to lose from an unbridled space arms race.

Some experts suggest that China's latest test is intended to prod the United States to join serious negotiations. The way to counter China or any other potentially belligerent space power is through an arms control treaty, not a new arms race in space.

China Sets Off A New Round Of Star Wars (FT)

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

A means of modern warfare the world had complacently come to see as at least informally off the table is now very firmly back on it – or, rather, scattered as metallic debris across miles of outer space.

China, in an alarming exhibition of its military muscle, has fired a ground-based ballistic missile into space to destroy one of its own weather satellites, hitting a 4 sq ft box at 530 miles and bringing to a dramatic end a two decades-long moratorium on the testing of weapons in space. Good shooting, yes, but is it good politics?

This experiment has drawn widespread condemnation. The US clearly sees it as part of an effort by China to develop anti-satellite capability that could threaten its extensive space assets. The Chinese test may or may not lead to a new arms race in space. But it will certainly strengthen the hand of hawks in Washington who regard Chinese power as a strategic threat to the US. Yet there is a long history behind this incident – and the leadership in Beijing is not known for foolhardy or precipitate action.

The last extensive use of anti-satellite weapons was by the US and former Soviet Union in the 1980s. The cold war slowly raged, heated up in 1983 by President Ronald Reagan with his Strategic Defence Initiative – the infamous Star Wars speech in which he announced plans to develop the capability to destroy missiles from space.

Those tests nonetheless ceased in 1985, not least because they created an uncontrollable fall-out of debris that threatened the network of satellites ever more densely carpeting the sky.

Both Moscow and Beijing subsequently made efforts to take space out of the military equation. The US, with a military budget able to outspend almost the rest of the planet put together, was simply not interested.

To the extent that it bothered to explain its position, Washington argued that the demilitarisation of space would be impossible to verify: a self-serving argument similar to the Bush administration's reasoning for opposing the verification protocol of the Biological Weapons Convention.

In the past year, however, two developments may have rattled Beijing. First, the US nuclear co-operation agreement with nuclear-armed India is the clearest indication yet of Washington's wish to build up a counterweight to China in Asia and the Pacific. But second, last summer the Bush administration came out with a new policy asserting that the US regarded space as important a dimension for the nation's security as air or sea power. It may have been no coincidence that, within weeks, China ruffled American feathers by using a ground-based laser to illuminate a US satellite – and highlight its own reach into space.

The US is so dependent on satellites for surveillance, observation of the "battlespace", communications and defence against any incoming missiles (or son of Star Wars) that it has reason to feel alarmed. The National Security Council on Friday called China's test "inconsistent with the spirit of co-operation that both countries aspire to in the civil space area".

Ideally, that remark would translate into a realisation that hyperpower exceptionalism – America's sense of entitlement to rights it concedes to no ally, let alone competitor – comes at a cost. But the risk is that this episode will instead translate into a new surge of defence spending that will delight the arms industry but do nothing to enhance international security.

N Korea Claims Progress In US Talks (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

Efforts to make progress on the North Korean nuclear stand-off received a rare boost on Friday when Pyongyang said it had reached "certain agreement" during discussions with US diplomats this week.

Christopher Hill, the chief US nuclear negotiator, arrived in Seoul Friday and noted "very useful discussions" had been held but said he did not know to what "agreement" North Korea was referring.

However, the gulf between Washington and Pyongyang remains so wide that the mere fact they talked this week was viewed as a sign of progress.

Mr Hill and Kim Kye-gwan, North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator, held unprecedented bilateral talks in Berlin this week to discuss their considerable differences in opinion over Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions.

DOJ_NMG_0120004

The chief US negotiator has reportedly offered Pyongyang a package of energy and economic aid and security guarantees if it agrees to abandon its nuclear weapons programme.

On Monday, bilateral talks on the US financial crackdown on North Korea – between US Treasury officials and North Korean financial authorities – are due to open, and the next round of six-party nuclear talks could resume early next month.

"We paid attention to the direct dialogue held by the [North] and the US in a bid to settle knotty problems in resolving the nuclear issue," the North Korean foreign ministry said in a statement published by the official Korean Central News Agency Friday.

The talks were held "in a positive and sincere atmosphere and a certain agreement was reached there," it said.

"What we now have to do is to see how those [Berlin] discussions can be folded into the six-party process, whether those discussions can help lead to some progress in Beijing," Mr Hill said. He will visit Tokyo and Beijing this weekend to hold further talks.

South Korea's Yonhap News on Friday reported that the next round of nuclear talks could begin on February 5.

The last round, held in Beijing in December after a year's hiatus, were bogged down by the disagreement over Washington's accusation in September 2005 that North Korean companies were counterfeiting US dollar and laundering money.

The crackdown has effectively frozen North Korea's ability to earn hard currency and has led analysts to suggest Washington is more interested in squeezing North Korea than talking to it.

The Bush administration has refused to enter into bilateral negotiations with Kim Jong-il's regime – something Pyongyang has long called for – and insists that this week's one-on-one talks do not constitute a change in that policy.

"We're not going outside the six-party framework to bilateralise our discussions with the North Koreans," Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, said in Berlin this week.

N.Korea: Deal Reached In U.S. Nuke Talks (AP)

By Burt Herman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

North Korea said it reached an agreement with the U.S. during talks this week on its nuclear program, and the top U.S. nuclear envoy expressed optimism Friday that progress could be made when wider arms negotiations reconvene.

North Korea's Foreign Ministry said three days of talks in Berlin between U.S. envoy Christopher Hill and North Korea's main nuclear negotiator Kim Kye Gwan had been held "in a positive and sincere atmosphere and a certain agreement was reached there." No further details were given.

Washington, however, played down talk of an agreement.

"I think it's premature to say there is an agreement — premature to say the least," deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino said Friday.

Hill said the talks laid the foundation for progress when six-nation nuclear negotiations resume and that he had agreed with his North Korean counterpart "on a number of issues." He declined to elaborate.

"I am pretty convinced that we have the basis for a good session of the six-party talks," Hill told reporters in Seoul after meeting South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-soon and nuclear envoy Chun Yung-woo.

The last round of six-nation talks in Beijing in December — two months after the North conducted its first-ever nuclear test in October — ended without any breakthroughs.

The negotiating countries, which include South Korea, the U.S., Japan, China and Russia, had been seeking to outline how to implement a September 2005 agreement in which the North pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

But North Korea refused to discuss its arms program and again demanded the U.S. lift its blacklisting of a Macau bank. The U.S. had accused the bank of being complicit in the communist country's alleged counterfeiting and money laundering, leading the bank to freeze North Korean assets worth about $24 million.

The North did not directly mention the financial dispute in its statement Friday, but said progress was made in overcoming obstacles to the six-nation talks.

"We paid attention to the direct dialogue held by the (North) and the U.S. in a bid to settle knotty problems in resolving the nuclear issue," the North's ministry said in the statement, released by the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

A South Korean news report said the six-nation arms talks could resume early next month due to progress made at the Germany meetings. Yonhap news agency, citing an unnamed diplomat in Seoul, said Thursday there is a high possibility the talks would resume in Beijing the week of Feb. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0120005

On arriving in Seoul earlier Friday, Hill said he hoped six-nation talks would be held again before the Lunar New Year holiday celebrated across Asia that falls this year on Feb. 18. "It's up to the Chinese (hosts) but I would think we'll have a six-party meeting pretty soon," he said.

The U.S. is holding separate negotiations with North Korea on the financial dispute, but the last session that was held alongside the nuclear talks in December made no progress.

___

Associated Press reporters Kwang-tae Kim and Bo-mi Lim contributed to this report.

U.S. Says U.N. Agency Aided N. Korea (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

The United States accused a U.N. agency of funneling millions of dollars in cash aid to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and questioned if the funds had been used for other activities including nuclear weapons development, U.S. officials said Friday.

U.S. deputy ambassador Mark Wallace charged that the U.N. Development Program in North Korea operated "in blatant violation of U.N. rules" for years. He demanded an immediate outside audit, focusing on concerns that Pyongyang converted development funds "to its own illicit purposes."

The program, known as UNDP, said the use of cash for its operations in North Korea "in difficult circumstances" was approved by its executive board. Following the U.N. imposition of sanctions against North Korea in October for conducting a nuclear test, UNDP said it was taking measures to prevent "unintended consequences" of the program's activities.

UNDP Associate Administrator Ad Melkert disputed allegations that the agency violated U.N. rules, insisting it followed UNDP financial rules. Nonetheless, he said that by March 1, all hard currency payments to the government, national partners, local staff and suppliers would be replaced by payments in North Korean won.

The North Korean won is not a hard currency that can be easily used to buy luxury goods or weapons parts — but Melkert stressed that the only place to buy the local currency was from the country's central bank.

Neither the U.S. nor UNDP would give a figure of how much money was involved, but Melkert said it wasn't hundreds of millions of dollars. In a Jan. 5 letter to Wallace, he said, from 2001 to 2005, UNDP spent an average of $2.3 million annually on both program and administration, including approximately $100,000 annually on local salaries.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon called for an urgent "external inquiry" into U.N. funds and programs around the globe, U.N. spokeswoman Michele Montas said. Many of the agencies — like UNDP — operate semi-independently and have their own boards.

Montas said the external audits will cover all funds and programs including the U.N. Children's Fund, the U.N. refugee agency, the World Food Program and the World Health Organization.

An exchange of letters between Wallace and senior UNDP officials goes back to November and was first reported by the Wall Street Journal.

U.S. officials said they first received indications there might be some irregularities in UNDP's North Korea program in the second half of 2006, and raised concerns that the cash might be misused, possibly for Pyongyang's nuclear program.

A Jan. 4 letter from Wallace to UNDP Administrator Kemal Dervis raised "U.S. concerns that UNDP has transferred hard currency directly to the regime of Kim Jong Il."

Wallace's harshest letter, dated Jan. 16, said that after examining several of the agency's internal audits, the U.S. concluded that UNDP's local staff is dominated by North Korean government employees who have managed the agency's programs and finances in violation of UNDP rules.

He cited three other violations of U.N. rules — the government's insistence that UNDP pay cash to North Korean government suppliers, and UNDP's failure to oversee projects it funds in the country or to audit its programs.

"The UNDP program has laudable goals of providing assistance to the North Korean peoples," said Wallace, who focuses on U.N. management issues. "Unfortunately, because of the actions of the DPRK (North Korean) government and the complicity of UNDP, at least since 1998, the UNDP DPRK program has been systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime — rather than the people of North Korea."

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro Wolff said the United States is still seeking answers and doesn't know the extent of the problem, or how much money was involved.

"It simply boggles the imagination that they simply dole out cash without controls," he said.

UNDP's Melkert said the agency was operating in North Korea in an environment reminiscent of the Cold War when many communist bloc countries selected staff employed by U.N. agencies, which often operated under severe financial and travel restrictions.

"Around 1999, there were many concerns expressed by internal auditors," Melkert told a news conference. "We've seen a gradual tendency of a diminishing number of issues brought to the attention of management by the (internal) auditors, but some very tough issues remain and those are the issues that we have addressed now."

In addition to ending cash payments, he said, UNDP will discontinue government recruitment of national staff "and we will put the right monitoring and audits in place addressing the issue of national execution."

US Claims N Korea Syphoned Millions From UN Project (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

Lax controls in the United Nations Development Programme may have led to millions of dollars of currency being funnelled to North Korea, according to US officials.

In a letter sent to the UN agency this week Washington said that "at least since 1998 the UNDP [North Korea] programme has been systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime – rather than the people of North Korea".

"The programme has for years operated in blatant violation of UN rules...Importantly, UNDP apparently has failed to bring the widespread violation of UNDP rules...to the attention of the UNDP executive board," the letter said.

As of 1999, it said, there were 29 UNDP projects in North Korea with a total budget of $28m.

While US officials say they are not clear on the full extent or nature of the problem, the findings echo the UN's oil-for-food programme scandal, in which the Iraqi regime raised $1.8bn dollars in defiance of international sanctions.

The complaint comes amid allegations by UNDP insiders that procedures are not fully followed in the multi-billion dollar programme. UNDP executive board members are expected to call at a meeting next week for more transparency.

US officials say they have confidence that Ban Ki-moon, the new secretary-general who comes from South Korea, is intent on rooting out UN mismanagement. Mr Ban recently called on the US not to withhold funding from the world body.

But Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, the ranking Republican member of the US House Foreign Affairs Committee, called the findings "yet another example of the abuses made possible by the lack of accountability within the UN system".

"It is clear that the measures that have been taken to date are woefully inadequate. Only through outside pressure can meaningful change be ensured. I and other members are determined to apply that pressure in this Congress."

In a statement issued on Friday, the UNDP said its operations in North Korea (DPRK) were "in full compliance with the decisions of the member states on UNDP Executive Board and with resolutions passed recently by the UN Security Council".

"The Executive Board directly approved financial regulations on the basis of which authority was delegated to the Resident Co-ordinator in DPRK." But it said it would seek guidance at next week's meeting "on conducting a full independent and external audit of the current programme".

According to the US's January 16 letter, sent to Ad Melkert, associate administrator, UNDP's North Korean staff is dominated by government officials, who had "performed financial and programme managerial core functions in violation of UNDP rules".

The UNDP has been led since mid-2005 by Kemal Dervis, but much of the period in question was under the leadership of Mark Malloch Brown, who went on to become the UN's chief-of-staff and, later, its deputy secretary-general.

Embattled U.N. Agency Alters Aid To N. Korea (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Development Program (UNDP), which is under fire for sending millions of dollars to North Korea that it is unable to monitor, yesterday announced new operating procedures in an attempt to stave off opposition from the United States.

The UNDP said it will no longer pay North Korean suppliers and employees in hard currency after March 1, and will no longer allow the North Korean government to hire its in-country staff.

It also said it will put into place improved monitoring and auditing of funds.

The changes were prompted after Washington demanded a full audit of UNDP operations in North Korea, which is subject to U.S. economic sanctions for making nuclear weapons, money laundering and purported acts of terrorism.

The UNDP in North Korea "has for years operated in blatant violation of U.N. rules, served as a steady and large source of hard currency and other resources for the [North Korean] government with minimal or no assurance that UNDP funds and resources are utilized for legitimate development activities," wrote Mark Wallace, a management and budget analyst at the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, in a recent letter to UNDP Administrator Kemal Dervis.

DOJ_NMG_0120007

Washington fears some of the estimated tens of millions of dollars in the program that were exchanged through the country's central bank have been siphoned off by the regime to help make atomic bombs.

Ad Melkert, the UNDP associate administrator, told reporters yesterday that he had no assurance that UNDP funds had not been diverted by the regime into it's nuclear program.

But he urged reporters "not to put words in my mouth."

Mr. Melkert was unable to say exactly how much money had been spent in recent years by the UNDP and other U.N. agencies in the hermit country, which allows few foreigners to enter.

In the past two years, however, he said the UNDP had spent between $4 million and $6 million, less than the $22 million that had been budgeted, in large part because of the difficulty of monitoring approved programs.

The disclosure cast new doubts on the ability of the United Nations to function transparently in deeply repressive societies.

Moreover, management lapses in the humanitarian program appear to echo those in the oil-for-food program, which allowed Saddam Hussein and his close associates to pocket as much as $2 billion from companies doing business with the United Nations in Iraq.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon yesterday demanded "an urgent, systemwide and external inquiry into all activities done around the globe by the U.N. funds and programs" after the irregularities were first reported in the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Wallace, in correspondence to UNDP quoted in the Journal, estimated that the program had spent tens of millions since 1999 on dozens of programs to improve public health, agriculture and human development.

The Journal cited one source saying that up to $100 million had been spent by U.N. programs in North Korea since 1998.

UNDP is the lead U.N. agency in North Korea, coordinating work by UNICEF, the World Food Program, the U.N. Population Fund and other programs.

U.N. officials have long acknowledged difficulties in monitoring programs in repressive countries.

The subject is likely to dominate the annual UNDP Executive Committee meeting, which is convening in New York next week.

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the ranking Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, urged the UNDP to immediately suspend its North Korean efforts.

"The UNDP's so-called 'nationally executed programs' in North Korea do not meet even minimal standards of transparency," she said.

"[North Korean leader] Kim Jong-il has been very clear about his 'military first' policy of national development. As far as anyone knows, he is using this money to pay for his nuclear weapons program instead of feeding his people."

Mr. Melkert said that it is important for international relief agencies to maintain a presence in North Korea, despite the difficulties of working there, to better respond to emergencies such as famines and floods.

"You can't just come in when you don't have any infrastructure whatsoever," he said.

U.S. Suspicious Of Aid To North Korea (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — Concerned that North Korea may be siphoning millions of dollars in U.N. money for illicit purposes, the United States is demanding that the U.N. Development Program in North Korea be revamped and submit to external audits.

In response to the U.S. pressure, the UNDP will halt the transfer of hard currency to the government, local staff and vendors by March 1 and will stop reimbursing North Korean government officials' travel to the U.N. after next week.

The UNDP will also insist that Pyongyang stop selecting and controlling the agency's local staff, Ad Melkert, the program's associate administrator, said Friday.

The U.N. Development Program has been in North Korea since 1995, overseeing projects in agriculture and the environment. This United Nations presence has provided food, work and pay for people surviving in near-famine conditions.

Some U.S. officials — chief among them John R. Bolton, former ambassador to the U.N. — have argued that the world should let the North Korean regime collapse, even though that would cause a flood of refugees into China and South Korea.

However, U.N. agencies, including UNICEF, the World Food Program and the U.N. Population Fund, are active in the isolated country — and all probably face similar problems in doing their work.

Because the North Korean financial system is not set up to handle purchasing orders, checks or credit, the U.N. Development Program pays most of its expenses in bundles of euros, including rent. That practice is contrary to rules, but administrators felt that they could more closely follow money flows by putting payments directly in people's hands, rather than allowing Pyongyang to convert them to local currency and then distribute them, spokesman David Morrison said.

DOJ_NMG_0120008

But a series of internal audits by the accounting firm KPMG found lax controls and failure by international staffers to visit UNDP projects, raising questions about whether the U.N. funds were used as intended.

A Jan. 16 letter from Mark Wallace, the U.S. official overseeing U.N. management and reform, lauds the program's goals but says the U.S. is concerned that at least since 1998 the program has been "systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime — rather than the people of North Korea."

Wallace's letter to UNDP chief Kemal Dervis also says the program "has for years operated in blatant violation of U.N. rules [and] served as a steady and large source of hard currency and other resources for the North Korean government with minimal or no assurance that UNDP funds and resources are utilized for legitimate development activities."

The issue is expected to dominate the UNDP's executive board meeting next week, where a proposal of a $17.9-million budget for North Korea for the next three years will be on the table. Board members are already aware of the difficulty of executing projects in the country: Of the $22 million budgeted for the last two years, less than $3 million worth of projects was completed, Melkert said.

Top on the list of concerns is that foreign currency enables Pyongyang to bolster its nuclear weapons program. The U.S. has frozen North Korean funds overseas, and banned dealings in dollars with the regime as punishment for its alleged counter feiting of U.S. currency.

Washington also charges that Pyongyang traffics in drugs and provides illicit help for other countries' missile and nuclear weapons programs.

U.S. officials Friday said it was too early to suggest any deal had been made in three days of talks with North Korea in Berlin.

North Korea's official news agency had quoted negotiator Kim Kye Gwan as saying "a certain agreement" had been reached with U.S. envoy Christopher Hill and signaling that talks may have included ways to reconcile differences over U.S. sanctions against foreign banks doing business with North Korea.

North Korea has refused to negotiate the future of its nuclear weapons program until the sanctions are lifted.

U.N. To Audit Its Activities After Reports On North Korea Program (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 19 — Ban Ki-moon, the new secretary general, called Friday for outside examination of all United Nations activities after a published report that the United Nations Development Program in North Korea was making unaccountable payments in hard currency to local staff members and the North Korean government.

Mr. Ban sought “an urgent, systemwide and external inquiry into all activities done around the globe by the U.N. funds and programs.”

His prompt action, taken after a morning meeting with the program’s associate administrator, Ad Melkert, appeared to be an effort to head off the kind of problems that his predecessor, Kofi Annan, faced after muddled United Nations responses to reports of scandals.

“We are very pleased with the new team’s reaction,” said Richard A. Grenell, the spokesman for the American Mission. Mr. Ban, the former foreign minister of South Korea, began his five-year term on Jan. 1.

Complaints about the United Nations activities in North Korea were raised over the past month by the United States Mission in a series of letters to directors of the program and were made public on Friday on the op-ed page of The Wall Street Journal.

In the latest letter, dated Tuesday, Mark D. Wallace, the deputy United States ambassador for management, said that the United Nations Development Program’s operation had been “systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime rather than the people of North Korea.”

Mr. Wallace said that the local staff of the development program was dominated by employees of the repressive government, that the United Nations had failed to conduct proper on-site audits and depended instead on “sham” ones by the North Korean government, and that all payments were made at the government’s demand in hard currency — dollars or euros — rather than the won, the national currency.

“Simply put,” Mr. Wallace wrote, “in the absence of real audits and site visits, it is impossible for U.N.D.P. to verify whether or not any of the funds paid to the D.P.R.K. for supposed use in U.N.D.P. programs have actually been used for bona fide development purposes or if the D.P.R.K. has converted such funds for its own illicit purposes.” North Korea is officially called the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea and sometimes referred to by its initials.

Mr. Melkert, the associate administrator, said that the program had spent $2 million to $3 million in North Korea annually in the past two years.

DOJ_NMG_0120009

He said it would cease making hard currency payments to the government, local vendors and individuals as of March 1 and would also start hiring local staff members in North Korea the way it does elsewhere, by its own choice and on merit.

Even making payments in the won currency will not stop a flow of hard currency to the government, however, because the United Nations will have to buy the won from the central bank, he noted.

“The question — and it is an entirely legitimate one — comes down to whether you want to operate as the U.N. in a country like North Korea,” Mr. Melkert said.

He said that he welcomed the call for external auditing of his agency’s activities. Currently they are examined in internal audits, which are then given to the United Nations auditing board, which decides what to transmit to the General Assembly.

Asked about the American charge that funds might have been diverted to illicit ends, he said, “The audits have not given any reason for suspicion about money not being used for the purposes meant. Still, in order to make sure that there are no misperceptions or unintended consequences, we are supportive of an external independent audit.”

It was not clear how quickly or effectively Mr. Ban could impose his order across the range of United Nations agencies, many of which have differing auditing procedures and over which he does not have direct budget authority.

“It’s worldwide; it’s not going to be done overnight,” said Michèle Montas, his spokeswoman.

U.N. To Examine Relief Agencies' Pay In N. Korea (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

U.S. Charges That Workers' Salaries Go to Rulers

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 19 -- U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon on Friday ordered a broad inquiry into the financial practices of most of the United Nations' chief relief agencies, after a U.S. charge that the world body was inadvertently channeling foreign currency into the hands of North Korea's rulers.

Mark D. Wallace, the U.S. representative to the United Nations for management and reform, accused the U.N. Development Program in a letter Tuesday of violating rules by hiring North Korean government officials to carry out most of its work and by paying salaries in cash into an account controlled by the Pyongyang leadership. He called for an independent "forensic" audit of its operations in North Korea, citing concern that the U.N. payments could be diverted to unnamed illicit activities.

Development program officials denied they had violated U.N. rules and noted that it is impossible to work in a totalitarian state such as North Korea without pumping foreign currency into the economy. They said all U.N. agencies are required to pay their local staff through a government paymaster.

But the development agency's associate administrator, Ad Melkert, announced on Friday that the agency will halt all cash payments for its North Korean workers by March 1. He also echoed U.S. calls for an outside investigation, saying "a full, independent external audit is in order to make sure that we really understand what it means to work in a country like North Korea." Development program officials said they are also ending the practice of allowing the North Korean government to recruit local staff.

The U.N. development agency employs four international workers and 16 North Koreans in a program that costs $2 million to $3 million a year, including $100,000 in local salaries. The workers carry out activities such as delivering food or giving advice on trade activities.

Some U.N. officials said the United States is unfairly targeting the development program, noting that two other U.N. agencies headed by U.S. political appointees -- the U.N. Children's Fund and the World Food Program -- had engaged in similar practices in North Korea. One senior U.N. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the report was viewed by many at the world body as an effort to discredit Mark Malloch Brown, a former U.N. Development Program administrator. Malloch Brown, who later served as chief of staff to then-Secretary General Kofi Annan, frequently criticized John R. Bolton, then-U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. "This is payback," the official said.

Wallace, a political appointee who served as Bolton's top adviser on U.N. reform, began questioning development program officials about their North Korea efforts in mid-December. He said the program "has been systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong Il regime -- rather than the people of North Korea." The program, he added, has "for years operated in blatant violation of U.N. rules [and] served as a steady and large source of hard currency" for the government.

He also raised concern about the United Nations' payment of nearly $12,000 to fly a North Korean official in business class to New York to attend a meeting of the development program's board of directors. Melkert later assured Wallace that the agency would no longer "reimburse government officials travel or other costs for attending board meetings."

The contents of his letter were first reported by Fox News and the Wall Street Journal's opinion page.

During the Cold War, the United Nations routinely relied on handpicked Soviet bloc officials to carry out relief work and paid their salaries directly to the government. The United Nations continued that practice in China, Vietnam and Cuba until recently.

"We used people that were provided by the government for all support staff" in North Korea, said Catherine Bertini, a former executive director of the World Food Program. "That was not the only country. It was also done in China."

But the practice is being phased out everywhere but North Korea. "The essential way North Korea operates has not changed," Melkert said.

A Product Of The U.N. System (NYT)

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

Benon Sevan no longer works for the United Nations. But his indictment on federal corruption charges stemming from his long maladministration of the Iraqi oil-for-food program points to a continuing problem in the U.N. appointments system that Secretary General Ban Ki-moon needs to tackle without further delay.

Three successive secretaries general chose Mr. Sevan for a series of important jobs, despite his decidedly mixed performance. He is a typical product of a system in which who you know and where you come from count far more than merit or vision.

Mr. Sevan, a Cypriot, is accused, together with Ephraim Nadler, an Egyptian-born American citizen, of taking kickbacks from an Egyptian oil trader to help him win Iraqi oil contracts. Mr. Nadler happens to be a relative of Boutros Boutros-Ghali, the former secretary general. And Mr. Boutros-Ghali happens to have been one of the key promoters of Mr. Sevan's United Nations career.

The legal question of Mr. Sevan's guilt or innocence cannot be properly resolved unless he returns to this country for trial. He may choose not to, since he faces a possible 50-year jail sentence. Some of the charges in the indictment are backed up by the scathing findings of the earlier Volcker commission investigation of the oil-for-food scandal.

There is plenty of blame to go round. The program actually succeeded in its main aim of helping to shield innocent Iraqis from the pain of prolonged international sanctions against Saddam Hussein's regime. But Security Council members, including the United States, failed to monitor its administration diligently and deliberately winked at Iraqi oil smuggling that benefited American allies.

But eliminating the dirty little bargains that have always characterized international diplomacy will be a lot harder than reforming the United Nations' dysfunctional personnel system. That system's multiple failings, of which this is only the best-known example, has badly hurt the United Nations' credibility and effectiveness and handed a ready stick to its many enemies.

Mr. Ban has repeatedly talked about reforming this disastrous personnel system. But his early appointments show little sign of actually doing so. Mr. Sevan's indictment should be a reminder of why Mr. Ban needs to do better.

Israel Sends Promised $100 Million To Abbas (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 19 -- Israel released $100 million in tax revenue Friday to Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, fulfilling Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's pledge last month to do so.

Olmert agreed to transfer the money in a meeting with Abbas, a relative moderate, as a way of strengthening his position in a political struggle with the rival Hamas movement. Israel continues to hold more than $400 million in sales and customs revenue that it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority under an agreement reached as part of the 1993 Oslo accords.

Israel stopped making the monthly tax transfers after Hamas won parliamentary elections a year ago, giving it day-to-day control of the Palestinian Authority. The radical Islamic movement does not recognize Israel, and the international aid boycott that followed its election has crippled the Palestinian government.

The $100 million is equal to about two months of tax transfers, and falls short of covering one month of the Palestinian Authority's payroll. It is being transferred directly to accounts controlled by Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president and a leader of the Fatah movement, to avoid the Hamas-run Finance Ministry.

Olmert also pledged to eliminate some of the hundreds of checkpoints and obstacles to movement in the West Bank, some of which have been removed in recent days.

Meanwhile, Israel said Friday that it had halted plans to build a new West Bank settlement, the Associated Press reported.

Israel Unfreezes $100M Before Summit (AP)

By Steve Weizman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120011

Israel said Friday it had paid $100 million in frozen tax funds to the Palestinians and rescinded a contentious decision for a new West Bank settlement, strengthening the hand of moderate President Mahmoud Abbas ahead of crucial weekend talks in Damascus with his Hamas rivals.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office said the payment, the first such transfer since the militant Islamic Hamas won control of the Palestinian government in March 2006, was made Thursday night.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz, meanwhile, ordered plans for the Maskiot settlement frozen indefinitely "in order to look carefully at the implications," ministry officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

Israel drew international condemnation with its announcement last month that it had approved the construction of Maskiot to house those settlers removed from the Gaza Strip in Israel's 2005 pullout. It was the first new West Bank settlement officially approved since the early 1990s, when Israel promised to halt such construction as part of interim peace accords.

Israel has been trying to boost Abbas in his struggle with Hamas, which rejects the existence of a Jewish state in an Islamic Middle East. However, such efforts can backfire, as Palestinians of all stripes try to distance themselves from the Israelis.

In a development expected to further fan Arab anger, the 10-year-old daughter of a Palestinian peace activist, critically wounded by Israeli security forces during a demonstration earlier in the week, died of her injuries in a Jerusalem hospital Friday.

Abir Aramin's father, Bassam Aramin, was among the founders of Combatants for Peace, a group of former Israeli and Palestinian fighters who work for a peaceful resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. He said his daughter's death did not alter his commitment to work for peace.

"I'm going to continue in this role and not give up," he said.

Abbas is to travel to Syria on Saturday for talks with Hamas chief Khaled Mashaal, aiming at forging a coalition government and ending a punishing international aid boycott. Talks have sputtered for months amid clashes between each side's loyalists, which have killed 35 people, but the fact that the two leaders were meeting hinted that an agreement might be finally at hand.

Abbas said Friday if the latest round of talks fails, he will call early elections, but acknowledged that Hamas could emerge the victor once again.

"We say either there is a (unity) government or elections," he said after a meeting with European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana in the West Bank town of Ramallah. "Elections don't mean we want to throw Hamas into the sea. It has been elected and can be elected again."

The financial transfer to Abbas was part of tax money Israel collects for the Palestinian Authority by mutual agreement. Israel halted payments when Hamas won parliamentary elections and set up its Cabinet.

Abbas aide Saeb Erekat welcomed the payment, but said it still only represented about 25 percent of Palestinian revenues Israel is holding.

"We need it badly, and we consider this a step in the right direction, hoping that the whole lot of money withheld will be transferred to the Palestinian Authority," he said.

Israel, the United States and the EU define Hamas as a terrorist group because of its suicide bombings against Israelis in the past decade, which have killed hundreds. Since the group took office, the international community has frozen foreign aid that kept the Palestinian Authority afloat since it was created in 1994.

An official in Olmert's office said the funds transferred Thursday were paid directly to Abbas for use in humanitarian efforts and to boost his security force. The official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the decision had not yet been announced, said Israel was satisfied by assurances that the money would not go to the Hamas-controlled Finance Ministry.

The scheduled Abbas-Mashaal meeting would be their first in years. Abbas' Fatah and Hamas are bitter enemies — their efforts to form a unity government must overcome deep ideological and political divides.

Only the hardships caused by the aid cutoff have pushed them together, forcing them to look for formulas both could live with — while satisfying Western demands that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous peace accords. So far, Hamas has refused.

In Gaza, the Popular Resistance Committees, a small local militant group linked to last year's abduction of an Israeli soldier, said it intended to carry out more kidnappings to pressure Israel for the release of what it said were at least 144 bodies of Palestinians killed by the Israeli army and buried around Israel.

"Kidnapping soldiers will be an effective way," said Abu Mujahed, a spokesman for the group, adding that seizing the bodies of dead soldiers to trade for the Palestinian remains was also an option.

The PRC is one of three militant groups that tunneled into Israel and captured Cpl. Gilad Shalit in a June 25 raid near the Gaza Strip. Shalit has not been seen since then, but he is believed to be alive, and Egypt has been trying to broker his release in exchange for Palestinians held in Israeli prisons.

Israel Releases $100 Million Withheld From Palestinians (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0120012

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 19 — Israel transferred $100 million in Palestinian tax revenues to the office of the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, as part of a plan to bolster him and keep money out of the hands of the Hamas government, Israeli officials said Friday.

The money is intended to meet needs for food, medicine and other basic expenses but not to pay the overdue salaries of Palestinian government workers, according to Israeli officials.

It was transferred "to a special account to ensure the money does not reach the Hamas government and cannot be used for perpetrating terror against Israel," according to a statement from the office of Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert.

Israel collects more than $50 million a month in taxes and customs money on behalf of the Palestinians under an arrangement dating from the 1990s, when the two sides were holding peace negotiations.

However, Israel began withholding the money after Hamas won the Palestinian elections a year ago, gaining control of the cabinet and legislature. Israel has not said precisely how much money it has withheld, but it is believed to be over $500 million.

At a meeting last month, Mr. Olmert agreed to hand over $100 million as part of a package of moves designed to help Mr. Abbas in his power struggle with Hamas. Israel also has removed some West Bank roadblocks, but Palestinians say they still face many obstacles when they seek to travel.

Palestinians say that the money belongs to their government and that it is not up to Israel to dictate how it should be spent. "Israel can say whatever it wants," said Muhammad Dahlan, a Palestinian legislator and a leading member of Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement. "This is our money."

Israel has not said whether it would release more money in the future. Before Israel began withholding the money last year, it was sent to the Palestinian Finance Ministry.

Also on Friday, Defense Minister Amir Peretz of Israel suspended the establishment of a Jewish settlement in the West Bank.

When Mr. Peretz said on Dec. 26 that he had approved the Maskiot settlement in the Jordan Valley, it provoked sharp criticism by the Palestinians, as well as American concern.

Mr. Peretz ordered a "freeze in the plans for Maskiot in order to evaluate them thoroughly," his office said in a statement. The plans called for the construction of about 30 homes for settlers to be built on an old army base.

Israel has more than 100 formal settlements in the West Bank and many informal ones. Israel pledged to stop building new settlements in the 1990s, and the so-called road map, the stalled Mideast peace plan introduced in 2003, calls for Israel to freeze settlement activity.

Still, the population of the Israeli settlements on West Bank is increasing by more than 10,000 a year, and is now more than 250,000. The figure does not include residents of East Jerusalem, which Israel captured in the 1967 war and later annexed.

In another development, Mr. Abbas is traveling to Syria, where he will hold talks with President Bashar al-Assad. He will also be looking for a solution to the deadlock between his Fatah movement and Hamas, the two main Palestinian factions.

The factions have been trying, without success, to form a national unity government for months, while gunmen from the two groups have periodically battled in the streets.

Mr. Abbas's envoys have been holding talks with Hamas leaders in Damascus, the Syrian capital, including Hamas's exiled political chief, Khaled Mashal. Palestinian officials say a meeting between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Mashal is possible, though not certain.

In remarks on Friday, Mr. Abbas said again that the Palestinians should establish a government that would be acceptable to the international community, or hold new elections. "It is very clear how to get a national unity government that can break the siege," he said in the West Bank city of Ramallah after playing host to the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana.

A 10-year-old Palestinian girl, Abir Aramin, died Friday from wounds sustained when she was hit by fire from the Israeli border police on Tuesday in the West Bank town of Anata, near Jerusalem, Palestinian witnesses and relatives said. Abir and her classmates were on recess from school when the Israeli forces fired on stone-throwing Palestinians with rubber bullets and stun grenades, according to the Palestinians.

Abir was hit in the head and collapsed, the Palestinians said. The border police said they were investigating the report.

Israel Releases Palestinian Funds (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials said Friday that they had transferred $100 million in withheld revenues to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0120013

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert agreed to the move during a meeting with Abbas last month. Israel began withholding about $50 million monthly in taxes and customs duties last year after the militant Hamas movement took control of the Palestinian government following elections.

Israel described the transfer as part of an effort to bolster the weakened Abbas, a relative moderate from Hamas' main rival, Fatah. The $100 million represents less than one-third of the money Israel has collected on behalf of the Palestinian Authority and refuses to relinquish.

Israeli officials said the money was being channeled to Abbas' office rather than to any ministry of the Palestinian Authority in order to maintain an aid embargo against Hamas, which Israel and much of the West consider a terrorist group.

"The money is not to go to the Hamas-controlled government. The money is to support the Palestinian people, and [Abbas] will be distributing it," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

Palestinian officials said the funds would help pay companies that supply hospitals, schools and farms.

The transfer, one of several modest concessions promised by Olmert during the Dec. 23 summit, could help the Palestinian leader in his political standoff with Hamas.

Despite months of negotiations, Fatah and Hamas haven't agreed on terms of a power-sharing arrangement that would break the Western aid embargo.

Abbas is expected to meet today in Damascus, Syria, with Khaled Meshaal, the exiled Hamas political leader, amid fresh efforts to break the months-long impasse.

Abbas previously declared talks at a dead end, saying he would call early elections for the presidency and parliament. But mediators have continued trying to coax the two sides into agreeing on a joint government under terms that could satisfy the West.

Mohammed Dahlan, an Abbas confidant, said Friday that the president might meet with Meshaal but would not engage in negotiations. Abbas said Friday that he would proceed with elections if the latest efforts failed.

Past talks snagged over the distribution of ministerial posts and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel. Western nations demand that the government accept the Jewish state's right to exist, renounce violence and agree to abide by past Israeli-Palestinian accords.

Meshaal is considered more strident than some of his Hamas counterparts in the Gaza Strip and has torpedoed past proposals. He also holds veto power over a proposed prisoner swap under which Israel would free jailed Palestinians in return for the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was captured by Hamas militants in June.

In other developments Friday, Israeli officials said Defense Minister Amir Peretz had frozen plans for construction of new housing for Jewish settlers in the West Bank. The plans for up to 100 homes at a former base, called Maskiot, drew wide international criticism and protests from Palestinian officials and Israeli peace advocates.

Critics said the project would violate Israel's vow to freeze settlement activity under the U.S.-backed peace blueprint known as the road map. Israeli officials said Maskiot was approved more than 20 years ago.

The community, near the Jordanian border, would initially house settlers evicted from the Gaza Strip during Israel's unilateral withdrawal in 2005.

Security officials said Peretz ordered the freeze two weeks ago to further study the matter. He is locked in a struggle for control of the Labor Party.

Jimmy Carter's Jewish Problem (WP)

By Deborah Lipstadt

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

It is hard to criticize an icon. Jimmy Carter's humanitarian work has saved countless lives. Yet his life has also been shaped by the Bible, where the Hebrew prophets taught us to speak truth to power. So I write.

Carter's book "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid," while exceptionally sensitive to Palestinian suffering, ignores a legacy of mistreatment, expulsion and murder committed against Jews. It trivializes the murder of Israelis. Now, facing a storm of criticism, he has relied on anti-Semitic stereotypes in defense.

One cannot ignore the Holocaust's impact on Jewish identity and the history of the Middle East conflict. When an Ahmadinejad or Hamas threatens to destroy Israel, Jews have historical precedent to believe them. Jimmy Carter either does not understand this or considers it irrelevant.

His book, which dwells on the Palestinian refugee experience, makes two fleeting references to the Holocaust. The book contains a detailed chronology of major developments necessary for the reader to understand the current situation in the Middle East. Remarkably, there is nothing listed between 1939 and 1947. Nitpickers might say that the Holocaust did not happen in the region. However, this event sealed in the minds of almost all the world's people then the need for the Jewish people to have a

DOJ_NMG_0120014

Jewish state in their ancestral homeland. Carter never discusses the Jewish refugees who were prevented from entering Palestine before and after the war. One of Israel's first acts upon declaring statehood was to send ships to take those people "home."

A guiding principle of Israel is that never again will persecuted Jews be left with no place to go. Israel's ideal of Jewish refuge is enshrined in laws that grant immediate citizenship to any Jew who requests it. A Jew, for purposes of this law, is anyone who, had that person lived in Nazi Germany, would have been stripped of citizenship by the Nuremberg Laws.

Compare Carter's approach with that of Rashid Khalidi, head of Columbia University's Middle East Institute and a professor of Arab studies there. His recent book "The Iron Cage" contains more than a dozen references to the seminal place the Holocaust and anti-Semitism hold in the Israeli worldview. This from a Palestinian who does not cast himself as an evenhanded negotiator.

In contrast, by almost ignoring the Holocaust, Carter gives inadvertent comfort to those who deny its importance or even its historical reality, in part because it helps them deny Israel's right to exist. This from the president who signed the legislation creating the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Carter's minimization of the Holocaust is compounded by his recent behavior. On MSNBC in December, he described conditions for Palestinians as "one of the worst examples of human rights deprivation" in the world. When the interviewer asked "Worse than Rwanda?" Carter said that he did not want to discuss the "ancient history" of Rwanda.

To give Carter the benefit of the doubt, let's say that he meant an ongoing crisis. Is the Palestinians' situation equivalent to Darfur, which our own government has branded genocide?

Carter has repeatedly fallen back -- possibly unconsciously -- on traditional anti-Semitic canards. In the Los Angeles Times last month, he declared it"politically suicide" for a politician to advocate a "balanced position" on the crisis. On Al-Jazeera TV, he dismissed the critique of his book by declaring that "most of the condemnations of my book came from Jewish-American organizations." Jeffrey Goldberg, who lambasted the book in The Post last month, writes for the New Yorker. Ethan Bronner, who in the New York Times called the book "a distortion," is the Times' deputy foreign editor. Slate's Michael Kinsley declared it "moronic." Dennis Ross, who was chief negotiator on the conflict in the administrations of George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, described the book as a rewriting and misrepresentation of history. Alan Dershowitz teaches at Harvard and Ken Stein at Emory. Both have criticized the book. Because of the book's inaccuracies and imbalance and Carter's subsequent behavior, 14 members of the Carter Center's Board of Councilors have resigned -- many in anguish because they so respect Carter's other work. All are Jews. Does that invalidate their criticism -- and mine -- or render us representatives of Jewish organizations?

On CNN, Carter bemoaned the "tremendous intimidation in our country that has silenced" the media. Carter has appeared on C-SPAN, "Larry King Live" and "Meet the Press," among many shows. When a caller to C-SPAN accused Carter of anti-Semitism, the host cut him off. Who's being silenced?

Perhaps unused to being criticized, Carter reflexively fell back on this kind of innuendo about Jewish control of the media and government. Even if unconscious, such stereotyping from a man of his stature is noteworthy. When David Duke spouts it, I yawn. When Jimmy Carter does, I shudder.

Others can enumerate the many factual errors in this book. A man who has done much good and who wants to bring peace has not only failed to move the process forward but has given refuge to scoundrels.

The writer teaches at Emory University. Her latest book is "History on Trial: My Day in Court With David Irving."

An Enigmatic Wild Card In Lebanon's High-Stakes Politics (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

IN this land of divisive politics and sectarian tension, few have embraced controversy quite the way the Christian leader Gen. Michel Aoun has.

Currently, General Aoun is one of the leaders of the opposition demonstrations that have overtaken Beirut and have threatened to bring down the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora. But this gambit is just the latest in a decades-long series of political surprises and controversies that have made him a political wild card here, breaking all the rules of Lebanese politics while charging the country's political debate.

To his supporters, he is a Lebanese de Gaulle seeking to unite a fractious country and rebuild trust in its institutions. To his critics, he is a divisive megalomaniac willing to stop at nothing to become Lebanon's president.

Some accuse him, a Christian, of splitting Christians in Lebanon into rival camps, further weakening them, while others blame him for abetting Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Shiite militia. But most of all, many say, General Aoun has embraced a populist agenda for personal gain.

DOJ_NMG_0120015

General Aoun, as always, is unfazed by the critics. “You could say I brought Lebanese politics back to life,” General Aoun, 71, said in his home atop the hills overlooking Beirut. “Until now, politics here has been moribund.”

General Aoun’s Free Patriotic Movement, Hezbollah and a handful of smaller groups began their protests on Dec. 1, accusing Mr. Siniora of corruption that has left the country tens of billions in debt, and saying that the current government is not representative of Lebanon’s new realities.

The opposition wants Mr. Siniora either to step down or to broaden his cabinet to allow them greater say and even a veto power, but Mr. Siniora has rebuffed the demands, and insists he will not step down. Government officials accuse the opposition of pursuing an Iranian-Syrian agenda.

The irony of General Aoun, who has spent much of his life fighting Syrian domination of Lebanon, joining hands with Hezbollah, with its close ties to Syria, is not lost on his opponents, nor on followers in protests against the government. But such about-faces are nothing new to him.

TWO decades ago General Aoun rose to prominence as the head of the Christian-led Lebanese Army, taking on the Christian militias and the Syrians. He was appointed Lebanon’s interim prime minister in a caretaker government and waged a fierce revolt against Syrian forces, before being bombed out of the presidential palace and into exile in France in 1990. Keeping to his word, he did not return to Lebanon until the last Syrian soldier had left the country.

General Aoun defends his ties to Hezbollah, saying the alliance will ward off Syria rather than allow it to return to Lebanon. He adds that he had always pledged that he would seek friendly relations with Syria once it ceased to be an occupier. But many accuse him of trying to ride the wave of Hezbollah’s popularity after the war last summer in order to win the presidency when the pro-Syrian President Émile Lahoud’s term ends later this year. The 34-day war was widely seen here as a victory for Hezbollah.

General Aoun makes no secret of his hope to become president, a role reserved for Christians in Lebanon’s complex sectarian political system. But many doubt whether he would make the best compromise candidate, one who would effectively smooth over tensions once the latest crisis of sit-ins and boycotts ends.

“Of course, I want to be president,” he said. “At first I was not that interested, but because there was so much stubbornness against me and because things got difficult, I am now intent on becoming president. I have the backing and popularity to do it.” He has drawn his supporter base from the Christian middle class, which sees itself losing ground to Lebanon’s other sects.

Unlike many in Lebanon’s political stratum, General Aoun comes from humble origins, having been born into a poor Maronite family in Haret Hreik, which became a Hezbollah stronghold in Beirut’s southern suburbs in the 1980s. His supporters play up that background, saying that it equips him to tackle issues like corruption, gerrymandering and inclusion in Lebanese politics.

“For us, he represents sovereignty and dignity,” said Gebran Bassil, a longtime member of General Aoun’s Free Patriotic Movement who is also married to the general’s daughter. “The general is not part of the corrupt system here, which is why the politicians are so much against him.”

Nayla Mouawad, Lebanon’s minister of social affairs, said she was struck by General Aoun’s ability to distill politics into slogans when she first met him in the mid-1980s, but long ago caught on to his oversize ambition. “He clearly wanted to be president,” she said, noting that she once warned her husband, René, who was assassinated in 1989, to be wary of General Aoun’s intentions. “I told my husband that when he gets it into his head to be president, be careful.”

FEW, however, expected the alliance with Hezbollah, a group that, on the surface, appears diametrically opposed to the Free Patriotic Movement’s goals.

Backed by Iran, Hezbollah is the sole remaining armed militia in Lebanon; General Aoun is the champion of a strong state and an opponent of militias. General Aoun rails against foreign interference in Lebanon, but Hezbollah is almost completely financed by Iran.

General Aoun notes that the alliance should not be treated any differently than one between Hezbollah and the governing coalition that helped them garner numerous seats in the 2005 elections.

Still, the alliance surprised General Aoun’s supporters as much as his opponents.

“Remember, Hezbollah was the devil a year and a half ago as far as we were concerned,” Mr. Bassil said. “We were the only side that had had no dialogue with them.”

Last year, General Aoun approached Hezbollah’s leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, and said he still intended to strip Hezbollah of its weapons, but only after the group’s main complaints with Israel and with the government were answered.

“It’s not like I love Hezbollah,” General Aoun said in an interview. “I am not trying to defend Hezbollah as much as I am trying to find a solution with them, because a clash with them would ruin us.”

That honesty, Hezbollah officials say, engendered trust in General Aoun. “It created a sense of trust between Shiites and Christians,” said Ghaleb Abu Zeinab, a member of Hezbollah’s politburo. “We don’t want to establish an Islamic republic, we want diplomatic and normal relations with Syria, and we want a consensual democracy and so does the Free Patriotic Movement."

DOJ_NMG_0120016

Some analysts credit the alliance with helping stabilize conditions in Lebanon after the war, as well as helping to change Hezbollah's focus from regional issues to local ones.

"It helped show Hezbollah's real position and its understanding of Lebanon," Mr. Abu Zeinab said. "It helped the party appear as a more Lebanese party than it used to before."

After years of playing third seat to Sunnis and Christians, Lebanon's Shiites have increasingly demanded a greater say in government, one proportional to their numbers. General Aoun had seized on that change, analysts agree.

Still, even his supporters are often uncomfortable with the alliance, and with the lack of progress of the demonstrations so far.

"If I was in their place I might not feel comfortable with how things are going either," General Aoun said. "But I have infrared — even infragreen. I can see what is ahead of me tomorrow, and I will eventually clarify things for them."

Outspoken Editor Is Slain In Turkey (WP/AP)

By Benjamin Harvey

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

ISTANBUL, Jan. 19 -- Hrant Dink, the most prominent voice of Turkey's shrinking Armenian community, a man who stood trial for speaking out against the mass killings of Armenians by Turks, was shot and killed in broad daylight Friday at the entrance to his newspaper's offices.

Just hours after a gunman shot the journalist twice in the head, thousands marched down the bustling street where he was slain, carrying posters of Dink and shouting slogans in favor of free expression.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan twice addressed the country to condemn the killing and vowed to capture those responsible. Late Friday, Istanbul's governor announced that three people had been arrested, CNN-Turk TV reported, without giving further details.

Many Turks assumed that the shooting was politically motivated, a reaction to Dink's public statements that the mass killings of Armenians during and after World War I constituted genocide. Nationalists see such statements as insults to the honor of Turks and as threats to national unity.

In Turkey, people speak freely at their own peril despite generations of Western-looking reformers. The Committee to Protect Journalists said that in the past 15 years, "18 Turkish journalists have been killed for their work, many of them murdered, making it the eighth deadliest country in the world for journalists."

Dink, 52, was one of dozens of journalists, writers and academics who have been tried for expressing themselves, most under Article 301 of the penal code, which criminalizes insults to Turkey, its government or the national character.

In a rare conviction, Dink was found guilty in October 2005 of trying to influence the judiciary after his newspaper ran stories criticizing Article 301. He was given a six-month suspended sentence.

Dink, a Turkish citizen of Armenian descent who edited the bilingual Turkish-Armenian newspaper Agos, apparently sensed his life was in danger.

"My computer's memory is loaded with sentences full of anger and threats," Dink wrote Jan. 10 in his last newspaper column. "I am just like a pigeon. . . . I look around to my left and right, in front and behind me as much as it does. My head is just as active."

Dink, who is survived by his wife, Rakel, and their three children, was charming, soft-spoken and eloquent. He was respected and beloved by many Turks who disagreed with his views but admired his courage in stating them.

He was hated by just as many.

In the past few years, Turks had come to know Dink well, mostly because of the highly publicized legal cases opened against him, in which he faced jail time for talking of genocide.

In late 2005, Turks saw Dink lose his composure, crying on national television as he discussed his latest court case and what it was like to live among people who hated him and what he stood for.

"I'm living together with Turks in this country," he said in an October interview as he contemplated his trial. "I don't think I could live with an identity of having insulted them in this country. . . . If I am unable to come up with a positive result, it will be honorable for me to leave this country."

Turkey's relationship with its Armenian community has long been fraught with tension, controversy and painful memories of a brutal past. Much of Turkey's once-sizable Armenian population was killed or driven out beginning around 1915 in what an increasing number of countries are recognizing as the first genocide of the 20th century.

DOJ_NMG_0120017

Turks vehemently deny that their ancestors committed genocide, however, and saying so is deemed tantamount to treason. In the 1970s and '80s, tensions were further inflamed as Armenians seeking revenge killed dozens of Turkish diplomats .

Turkey, which is 99 percent Muslim, and Armenia, which claims to be the first country to have officially adopted Christianity, share a border. But it is closed, and the two countries have no formal diplomatic relations.

The Washington-based Armenian Assembly of America issued a statement Friday calling Dink "one of the most prominent Armenian voices in Turkey."

"Hrant Dink was a man of principle, convictions and courage, and the Armenian community mourns him worldwide as a loss for humanity," the group's executive director, Bryan Ardouny, said in an interview.

Ardouny, who had met Dink in October when he addressed the Armenian-American Bar Association, described the slain journalist as an "outspoken activist who was a living bridge between Armenians and Turks in Turkey, a country where 70,000 Armenians still live and remain vulnerable and unprotected even 92 years after the Armenian genocide."

Journalist Killed By Gunman In Istanbul (FT)

By Vincent Boland

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

A prominent newspaper editor and leading figure in one of Turkey's most painful historical debates - the massacre of Armenians during the collapse of the Ottoman empire - was shot dead on Friday.

Hrant Dink, 53, was shot three times in the head outside the office of his weekly newspaper Agos in Istanbul. He died almost immediately. His murder brought swift condemnation from the prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who despatched the interior and justice ministers to the city as an investigation got under way.

Mr Dink was a Turkish citizen of Armenian descent and had played a leading role in breaking a taboo in Turkey where debate on the fate of the Armenians had for years been an untouchable subject. He was widely credited with trying to bring Turks and Armenians together but had been given a suspended prison sentence in 2005 for allegedly insulting the Turkish state.

Armenians say the deaths of up to 1.5m Armenian citizens of the Ottoman empire were a deliberate genocide by the empire's rulers beginning in 1915. Turkey denies genocide and insists that hundreds of thousands of both Turks and Armenians died as a result of war, famine, ethnic cleansing and disease in that turbulent period.

Mr Dink's murder could have serious repercussions for Turkey in Washington. Both houses of the US Congress are due to debate a motion in the next few weeks that would recognise the Armenian massacre as genocide. Turkey is fighting a rearguard diplomatic action to prevent this and the White House has indicated that it would not approve such a motion. But the atmosphere in which the debate takes place will be clouded by Friday's events.

There was a heavy police presence in Istanbul last night as Mr Dink's friends gathered outside the office of his newspaper. Mr Erdogan said the murder was ''an attack on all of us'' and appealed for calm. Two men were under arrest last night in connection with the murder.

Mr Dink's murder will also have a big impact domestically. It is an election year in Turkey and all political parties are beginning to position themselves to capture the nationalist vote, which represents a sizeable portion of the electorate. Ultranationalists have succeeded many times in shutting off debate on the Armenian issue including academic debates at universities.

Most Turks are not aware of the fate of the Armenians because Turkish school history textbooks make no reference to it. But a debate has emerged in the past two years with Mr Dink as one of its most prominent proponents. Yet it remains the most sensitive issue in Turkey's 20th century history. The republic was created from the ruins of the Ottoman empire in 1923.

Mr Dink was known to have received many death threats in recent years but is understood to have refused police protection.

Journalist Slain In Turkey (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson, Yesim Borg

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

ISTANBUL, TURKEY — An outspoken journalist who repeatedly clashed with Turkish authorities here over recognition of the early 20th century slaughter of Armenians was shot to death Friday afternoon on a busy downtown street.

Hrant Dink, who as editor of a Turkish Armenian newspaper was the leading voice for his ethnic community, was killed a week after he wrote about threats from unknown forces who he said regarded him as "an enemy of the Turks."

DOJ_NMG_0120018

Hundreds of people marched Friday evening from Istanbul's central Taksim Square to the offices of Dink's Agos weekly newspaper, near the spot on a sidewalk where he was shot in the head. They held candles and posters with his picture; a somber silence was interrupted periodically with applause and chants for "the brotherhood of peoples."

Istanbul Gov. Muammer Guler said late Friday that three people had been detained in connection with the shooting, but no additional details were released.

The slaying is likely to further darken Turkey's reputation for repressing critics of the government and for tightly controlling how its turbulent past is portrayed.

Dink, 52, was part of an elite group of writers and thinkers, including Nobel literature laureate Orhan Pamuk and novelist Elif Shafak, who have been tried on charges of insulting their country's "Turkishness" under a controversial and ambiguous law promoted by hard-line nationalists.

While most, including Pamuk, were cleared, Dink was convicted in 2005 for writing articles that criticized the law and explored questions of Turkish and Armenian identity. He was sentenced to a six-month term, which was suspended.

Last year, an Istanbul court opened a new case against him after he told a foreign news agency that the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of Armenians by Ottoman Turks before and during World War I was a genocide.

"Of course I say it was genocide," Dink had said. "With these events you see the disappearance of a people who lived on these lands for 4,000 years."

Turkey maintains that the deaths and expulsions that Armenians say claimed 1.5 million victims at the end of the Ottoman Empire were part of a civil conflict in which both Christian Armenians and Muslim Turks were killed.

Dink helped promote a conference of academics in 2005 who gathered here to examine the era's mass killings. The government attempted to block the conference, and the justice minister accused participants of "stabbing Turkey in the back."

On Friday, however, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan was among the first to condemn Dink's "traitorous" and "disgraceful" slaying.

"Bullets have been fired at free thought and our democratic life," Erdogan said at a news conference. He urged calm.

European governments, Washington and intellectuals across the globe also deplored the killing.

"We are horrified," Larry Siems, an official with the international writers association PEN, said in a statement. "Hrant Dink was one of the heroes of the nonviolent movement for freedom of expression in Turkey, … one of the most significant human rights movements of our time."

U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said, "We certainly are concerned any time someone who has been very outspoken in their views is made to pay a price simply for their ability to speak their mind."

Turkish television Friday showed copies of letters containing death threats that Dink said he had received in the last year. He said his pleas for official protection went unanswered.

"We will silence you in a way that you will never speak again," one of the letters said.

Writing in his weekly column Jan. 10, Dink said his computer was full of "lines containing threats and rage.

"It is clear that those who try to alienate me, weaken me and leave me defenseless have been successful," he wrote. "They managed to form a group, with a serious number of people who see me as someone who 'insults Turkishness' with the dirty and wrong information they have been funneling to society."

His friends and colleagues say Dink cherished his Armenian ethnicity but remained loyal to his Turkish nation. His cause was freedom of expression and an honest confrontation of the past, they say.

Armenian Editor Is Slain In Turkey (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

ISTANBUL, Jan. 19 —A prominent newspaper editor, columnist and voice for Turkey's ethnic Armenians who was prosecuted for challenging the official Turkish version of the 1915 Armenian genocide, was shot dead as he left his office on a busy street in central Istanbul on Friday.

Television images showed the editor, Hrant Dink, lying on the crowded sidewalk covered with a white sheet outside the office of his bilingual Turkish-Armenian weekly, Agos. Officials said they detained three suspects. Investigators were monitoring surveillance tapes from nearby shops.

Mr. Dink, 53, a Turk of Armenian descent, often provoked widespread anger in Turkey for his comments on the genocide — which Turkey denies, saying the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Armenians resulted from hunger and other suffering in World War I. He also angered some ethnic Armenians for opposing their demand that Turkey recognize the genocide as a condition of entry to the European Union. He viewed entry into the Union as the clearest route to strengthening democracy in Turkey.

DOJ_NMG_0120019

In recent articles, Mr. Dink (pronounced deenk) described increasing death threats against him. "I do not know how real these threats are," he wrote, "but what's really unbearable is the psychological torture that I'm living in, like a pigeon, turning my head up and down, left and right, my head quickly rotating."

Reaction to the daylight shooting, both here and abroad, was swift and deep. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan condemned the shooting as a direct attack on Turkey's peace and stability. "A bullet was fired at freedom of thought and democratic life in Turkey," he said in a nationally broadcast news conference. "Once again, dark hands have chosen our country and spilled blood in Istanbul to achieve their dark goals."

In an unusual show of anger and regret, the prime minister's remarks were echoed by the head of the armed forces, the president and other officials. The Armenian patriarch in Istanbul, Archbishop Mesrob Mutafyan, declared 15 days of mourning for the small Armenian, Christian population of Turkey.

Several thousand people marched from Mr. Dink's office to Taksim Square on Friday evening to protest the killing. People held pictures of Mr. Dink, decorated his office door with flowers, waved black flags and chanted, "Shoulder to shoulder against fascism," and, "We are all Hrant; we are all Armenians."

European officials and human rights groups also expressed horror and called on Turkey to do more to protect free expression.

Mr. Dink was one of a number of intellectuals convicted under Article 301 of the Turkish Penal Code, which penalizes remarks against the state or the Turkish identity. It been harshly criticized by the European Union as a violation of freedom of expression, as Turkey moves toward membership.

Turkey has been changing some laws to try to meet the European Union's membership criteria, but faced a setback last month when ministers in Brussels decided to freeze talks on 8 of 35 areas of discussion because of Turkey's refusal to open its airports and seaports to Cyprus, a member of the Union.

Among the crowd that gathered Friday night, the common fear was that this assassination would be added to the list of unsolved murders. "This is an attack against our democracy," said Ayhan Aydin, an international financial consultant, who worked on the same street on which Mr. Dink was shot.

"We're here to show that sensible people wish this assassination to be clarified and want the perpetrators to be brought to justice," Mr. Aydin said, standing in the crowd. "We all fear that this insane attack might be swept under the carpet once it gets too complicated to resolve, like other murders did."

Turkey's ambition to become a European Union member requires further democratization and a better functioning legal system. The group has been particularly critical of Article 301.

Derya Sazak of the Milliyet newspaper said of the law, "This legal system brings forward the culture of hatred and lynching, in which Hrant became an open target. The murderers always go after the moderate voices, which Turkey needs the most."

Mr. Dink, a father of three, founded Agos in 1996. The bilingual community newspaper has a weekly circulation of 5,000.

Haluk Sahin, a columnist for the Radikal newspaper, a strong supporter of Mr. Dink's legal struggles, said Turkey had been hit in the heart.

"Those who wanted to harm Turkey couldn't have chosen a better target," Mr. Sahin said. "As opposed to other killings in the past, Turkish public reaction against this murder will show us where Turkey stands in the world."

Insurgents Attack Palace In Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 19 — Insurgents blasted Somalia's presidential palace with heavy explosives on Friday night, Somali officials said, but it appeared that no one was hurt.

It was the first time since Somalia's transitional government took control of Mogadishu, the capital, three weeks ago that the palace had come under attack.

Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, said 5 to 10 insurgents had detonated the explosives, possibly mortars, near the palace walls and then ran away.

"We don't know who they were," Mr. Hassan said. "But I think it is safe to say they were people not satisfied with the government."

The explosions set off an intense gun battle, witnesses said, with government troops spraying machine-gun fire into the dark streets around the palace, which is perched on a hill overlooking much of Mogadishu.

Insurgent attacks on Somalia's government forces seem to be intensifying. Last month, the transitional government, with the help of several thousand Ethiopian troops, routed Islamist forces that had controlled much of Somalia. The Islamists have vowed to regroup, and many members of the larger clans in Mogadishu still support them.

DOJ_NMG_0120020

Somalia's government concedes that it does not have the resources to maintain security in the capital, and Somali officials are urging international peacekeepers to arrive soon.

Ethiopia's prime minister, Meles Zenawi, told the BBC on Friday that he would withdraw the first Ethiopian troops "in the next few days."

African Union diplomats on Friday discussed a plan to send 7,700 African peacekeepers to Somalia for a six-month mission that would eventually be taken over by the United Nations. So far, only Uganda has stepped forward. Lawmakers from Uganda's governing party on Thursday approved the deployment of 1,500 troops and now Uganda's full Parliament must approve the decision.

"As Africans, we feel it is our duty to run to the rescue of any of our brothers in trouble," said Harry Bakowa, a governing party member, according to The Associated Press.

African Union Experts To Discuss Somalia (AP)

By Les Neuhaus, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 20, 2007

More than a decade after the U.S. and U.N. pulled failed peacekeeping missions out of Somalia, African governments are under growing pressure to mount a new intervention in one of the continent's most violent and unstable nations.

The continent's leaders may have a tough time succeeding, however, judging from past peacekeeping missions and the African-led force currently deployed to maintain security in Darfur, which has been beset by numerous problems.

Somalia has had no real peace since 1991, when warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and turned their guns on each other, plunging the Horn of Africa country into chaos.

A conservative Islamic movement brought some stability after it seized much of southern Somalia last year, but the group's hold on the country was short-lived. Ethiopian and Somali troops routed the movement's fighters in a lightning-quick campaign that began in late December.

Now Ethiopia is anxious to withdraw its troops, and many fear they may leave behind a power vacuum that could spawn yet more bloodshed.

Warlords agreed earlier this month to disarm and join a new army, but the peace is fragile. On Friday night, unidentified gunmen fired mortars at the presidential palace in Mogadishu, sparking a firefight with government forces. A government spokesman said no one inside the presidential compound was injured in the attack.

The U.N., U.S. and European Union have all called for the rapid deployment of African troops to prevent the country from slipping back into anarchy.

In Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, an African Union assessment team on Friday recommended deploying about 8,000 African peacekeepers for a six-month mission that would eventually be taken over by the United Nations. But significant obstacles stand in the way before the force can be deployed.

The African Union force would likely be charged with protecting the government and training Somali militiamen who would make up a new, national army. But Peter Takirambudde, director of New York-based Human Rights Watch's Africa program, said problems could arise due to the lack of time to prepare for a mission and Somalia's long history of brutal clan warfare.

That sentiment is reflected by a general reluctance on the part of African governments to provide troops to what could be a dangerous mission in a country notorious for the botched U.S. and U.N. operations in the early 1990s. No nation has publicly pledged soldiers except Uganda, whose promised 1,500 soldiers could only be dispatched if its parliament approves.

African nations also say they don't have many troops to spare because of their large contributions to U.N. missions elsewhere on the continent and worldwide.

In addition, any Somalia mission will require substantial logistic and financial support. Bearing the financial burden alone may also be prompting reluctance among African countries, although the U.S. and the European Union have already promised $33 million for the mission.

Another obstacle is the African Union's lack of experience in running peacekeeping missions. The group's current 7,000-strong peacekeeping venture in Sudan's war-wracked Darfur has been plagued by logistic troubles and criticized for not doing enough to protect civilians. Commanders say they simply don't have enough equipment, vehicles, helicopters and planes to do the job.

Other regional peacekeeping missions have had better results in the past, albeit with the support of the U.N.

A West African peace force called ECOMOG led by Nigerian troops restored Sierra Leone's government to power in the mid-1990s after it had been ousted by a rebel junta. War started again several years later, prompting U.N. intervention backed by British firepower that finally ended the war in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0120021

A South African-led U.N. peacekeeping force in Burundi helped bring an end to a 12-year civil war dating back to 1993, though fighting continued outside the capital throughout their deployment.

In Ivory Coast, French and U.N. peacekeepers managed to prevent the government and rebels from engaging in an all-out war. The 18,000-member U.N. force currently deployed to Congo — the largest peacekeeping mission in the world — has also struggled to contain militiamen, but has kept a lid on wider violence in that country.

Takirambudde said the trend in Africa is toward all-African interventions, in part because the continent is perceived as having little strategic value to the rest of the world.

Senegal's army spokesman, Col. Antoine Wardini, said African governments had the will to carry out such missions. But logistics and funding will pose problems for the foreseeable future.

"They don't have enough means to conduct operations far away from their homeland," Wardini said of African troops. "But we do want to solve the conflicts on our continent. We have to be involved, because it's our business."

___

Dakar-based West Africa bureau chief Todd Pitman has covered Africa for more than a decade. Associated Press writers Les Neuhaus in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, and Mohamed Sheikh Nor in Mogadishu, Somalia, contributed to this report.

Blair Aide Arrested In Honors Probe (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, January 20, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 19 -- Police on Friday arrested an aide to Prime Minister Tony Blair as part of a continuing criminal investigation into whether his Labor Party traded seats in the House of Lords and other government honors for cash.

Ruth Turner, Blair's director of government relations, was arrested at her home in connection with alleged offenses under a 1925 law that prohibits the selling of government honors and titles and "also on suspicion of perverting the course of justice," a police statement said. Turner was interviewed in a London police station and released on bail, police said.

"I absolutely refute any allegations of wrongdoing of any nature whatsoever," she said in a statement.

Turner is the fourth person arrested in the investigation concerning seats in the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament. So far no one has been charged.

Turner's arrest brings the investigation closer to Blair and suggests police believe there has been an attempt to cover up information. Blair issued a statement saying that Turner had "the highest integrity" and that he "continued to have complete confidence" in her.

Last month, when Scotland Yard detectives spoke with him, Blair became the first sitting prime minister to be questioned in a criminal inquiry. But he was not interviewed "under caution," a British legal term that is applied to people who are viewed as suspects. He was therefore being treated as a witness.

Under British law, political parties must disclose the source of donations, but they do not have to declare the source of loans. The Labor Party has said it received $27 million in loans and therefore did not have to disclose the identities of the lenders. Investigations have found that some of those who gave the party loans were recommended for seats in the House of Lords.

Blair has denied that seats in the legislature and other honors were for sale.

Police have also interviewed members of the opposition Conservative Party, including former leader Michael Howard.

"It's pretty serious," said Tony Travers, a government specialist at the London School of Economics. "All three of the major political parties are desperate for money," he said, and the police are looking at whether rich people were tapped for cash "in the expectation that they would be put into the House of Lords, our equivalent of the Senate."

Travers said it was notable that Conservative Party leaders are not criticizing Labor in the scandal, or vice versa. This is a sign, he said, that they all may be caught up in it.

"This remains a cross-party investigation," Scotland Yard said in a statement issued Friday.

But because Blair is in office and once promised voters to be "purer than pure" on issues of ethics, he is taking the brunt of the scandal and it has further eroded his standing, which is already suffering from his support of the deeply unpopular war in Iraq. He has said he will step down as prime minister this year.

The others arrested to date are Michael Levy, a friend of Blair's and special envoy to the Middle East; Christopher Evans, an entrepreneur and major party donor; and Des Smith, a government adviser.

Senior Aide To Blair Is Arrested In Graft Inquiry (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120022

LONDON, Jan. 19 — The police arrested and questioned a senior aide to Prime Minister Tony Blair on Friday in what seemed to be a widening inquiry into allegations that political leaders had traded high honors for campaign contributions made as loans.

The aide, Ruth Turner, is the director of government relations in the prime minister's office at 10 Downing Street and, in a statement, denied "wrongdoing of any nature whatsoever."

Mr. Blair said he had "complete confidence" in Ms. Turner, 36, who was appointed as a special adviser in 2005. She is one of the officials who control access to Mr. Blair.

"Ruth is a person of the highest integrity for whom I have great regard," the prime minister said.

However, a police statement said that Ms. Turner had been questioned not just in connection with the honors inquiry, but also "on suspicion of perverting the course of justice." Under British law, that often means that someone has failed to cooperate with or has frustrated an investigation. The police statement seemed to suggest that the inquiry was breaking new ground, and it drew questions from opposition politicians about a possible cover-up. The police said this "new development" would require investigators to extend their inquiries.

Since last year, Mr. Blair has been embroiled in questions about campaign financing before the May 2005 national election. The police are investigating whether people who made loans to the ruling Labor Party did so in return for promises that they would be appointed to the House of Lords. The amount of the loans and other contributions was equivalent to $27 million.

Mr. Blair himself was questioned by investigators last month, adding to the potential stains on his record as he sought to mold a legacy after almost 10 years in office. When he took power in 1997, he promised voters that Labor would enshrine a commitment to corruption-free administration. He has said that he will step down later this year but has not given a date.

In Parliament, Edward Davey of the Liberal Democrats — the smaller of the two main opposition parties — said the "sorry saga" of the police inquiry showed that "the Blair government is in its dog days, increasingly mired in sleaze."

The inquiry was started after a complaint by a Scottish Nationalist member of Parliament, Angus MacNeil, who said Friday: "Water is now lapping around Blair's neck. The investigation is now right inside the door of No. 10," referring to the prime minister's office address.

The police said that Ms. Turner was arrested at her home in London early Friday and was released to allow time for further inquiries without charges being brought against her.

In her statement, issued by Mr. Blair's office, Ms. Turner said: "I have already given the police two lengthy interviews and made it clear to them that I was happy to speak to them at any stage. I have been completely open with the police throughout, and will continue to cooperate with them fully."

A spokeswoman for the prime minister said Ms. Turner remained in her post.

While many people, including Mr. Blair, have been questioned in the inquiry as potential witnesses, only four people have been arrested, including Ms. Turner and Mr. Blair's main fund-raiser, Lord Levy.

Blair Aide Arrested In Honors-for-sale Probe (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

LONDON (AP) -- An aide to Prime Minister Tony Blair was arrested yesterday in the investigation into whether political honors, such as seats in the House of Lords and knighthoods, were traded for cash.

Ruth Turner, Mr. Blair's director of government relations, was questioned on suspicion of being involved in the sale of honors -- illegal under British law -- and perverting the course of justice, police said.

Miss Turner, 36, is the first member of Mr. Blair's Downing Street staff to be arrested and the fourth person to be detained by police in their investigation. All four are on bail while inquiries continue, police said.

"I absolutely refute any allegations of wrongdoing of any nature whatsoever," Miss Turner said in a statement released by Mr. Blair's office.

Mr. Blair was interviewed by detectives last month, becoming the first serving prime minister interviewed in a criminal inquiry. However, he was not interviewed "under caution," meaning it is unlikely he is a suspect.

In a statement, police said Miss Turner, who has worked at Mr. Blair's office since 2004, was arrested at home.

Mr. Blair expressed confidence in the aide, who has not been charged. "Ruth is a person of the highest integrity for whom I have great regard," he said.

A police spokesman declined to confirm whether computers or documents had been seized from Downing Street.

Police are investigating claims that honors were given to people who loaned money to Mr. Blair's Labor Party. Police have also interviewed Conservative Party officials.

Mr. Blair has acknowledged some supporters who offered loans were later nominated for honors, but has insisted that he did nothing wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0120023

He told police the backers were nominated for House of Lords seats under criteria allowing party leaders to put forward a small number of candidates in reward for their service to a political party -- rather than the general public, his spokesman said.

Election Could Decide Serbia's Role In Europe (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, January 20, 2007

BELGRADE, Serbia, Jan. 19 — While six years of democracy in Serbia have given its people ample opportunities to vote — in four presidential elections, two parliamentary elections and a nationwide referendum — many complain that the country has seen little change.

Serbia remains isolated from the European Union while most of its former Eastern bloc neighbors — Hungary to the north and most recently Romania and Bulgaria to the east — have become members.

Western governments are hoping, though, that parliamentary elections to be held Sunday will make a difference by uniting Serbia's notoriously divided democratic bloc and by preventing the ultranationalist Serbian Radical Party from consolidating its position as the largest group in Parliament.

The election's timing is particularly crucial. The parties that form the next government will be faced with the possible loss of Kosovo, the province that has been controlled by the United Nations since 1999 and whose Albanian majority is seeking independence.

Martti Ahtisaari, a former president of Finland who is overseeing talks on the future of Kosovo, is expected to unveil his proposals for a settlement soon after the election.

Since the fall of Slobodan Milosevic in 2000, successive governments have failed to substantially improve Serbia's ties with the West. The stumbling block has remained the surrender of war crimes suspects to the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in The Hague.

Last May, talks that were supposed to help forge closer ties with the European Union were suspended after the government of the Serbian prime minister, Vojislav Kostunica, a moderate nationalist, failed to locate Gen. Ratko Mladic — the former commander of the Bosnian Serb Army and one of the most notorious of the fugitives — after repeated deadlines set by the regional organization.

The ultranationalists are widely expected to receive the largest number of votes over all, but the outcome of the election will probably depend on the success of the party led by Boris Tadic, the Serbian president and a supporter of closer ties with Europe.

In recent polls, Mr. Tadic's Democratic Party narrowly trails the Radical Party. Behind them is Mr. Kostunica's coalition, led by the Serbian Democratic Party.

There has been a substantial amount of diplomatic and political pressure from abroad to encourage the Democratic Party and the Serbian Democratic Party to work together and seriously consider forming a coalition government.

On Thursday, Gerhard Schröder, the former German chancellor, appeared at a Democratic Party rally alongside Mr. Tadic, calling him "the one who can ensure a European future for Serbia."

On Wednesday, the United States Senate passed a resolution expressing its support for Serbia's democratic forces.

"This is really a turning point," said Pierre Mirel, a European Commission envoy who visited Belgrade this week. "The time has come to embark the country on a different relationship with the E.U."

Chavez Says Ailing Castro "Battling For His Life" (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 20, 2007

RIO DE JANEIRO (AP) -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said yesterday that Fidel Castro is "battling for his life" and said he spoke with the Cuban leader for nearly half an hour several days ago.

Mr. Chavez compared Mr. Castro's attempt to recover from an unspecified medical condition to efforts in the 1950s, when Mr. Castro was a guerrilla in Cuba's eastern mountains fighting the government he would eventually overthrow.

"Fidel is in the Sierra Maestra again, battling for his life," Mr. Chavez said after attending a summit of South American leaders in Rio.

Mr. Castro, 80, has not been seen in public since shortly before July 31, when he announced he was temporarily stepping aside while he recovered from an operation.

He provisionally ceded power to his brother Raul, the 75-year-old defense minister.

Mr. Castro's medical condition is a state secret, but Cuban authorities deny he suffers from terminal cancer, as U.S. intelligence officials have claimed.

The El Pais newspaper in Spain reported Wednesday that Mr. Castro told surgeons not to perform a colostomy last year, opting instead for a course of surgery that produced a complication that left the Cuban leader in far worse condition.

DOJ_NMG_0120024

After removing an inflamed piece of Mr. Castro's large intestine in an operation last year, doctors connected the remainder directly to his rectum, rather than attaching a colostomy bag, El Pais said, quoting two medical sources at Madrid's Gregorio Maranon hospital. The operation failed when a suture burst.

"The Cuban dictator and his advisers are the ones who decided on the surgical technique that has led to the complications," the paper said.

While the newspaper article did not name the sources, one of the journalists who wrote it told the Associated Press that both were doctors at the hospital.

Chavez: Castro "Fighting For His Life," Progressing Slowly (CNN)

CNN.com, January 19, 2007

RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil (CNN) -- Cuban leader Fidel Castro is "fighting for his life," Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said in a speech to the state legislature in Rio de Janeiro.

Chavez, who said he spoke to Castro a few days ago by telephone, compared Castro's battle against a serious intestinal illness with the Cuban leader's time in the island's mountains heading the revolution against the Fulgencio Batista government.

"Fidel is again in the Sierra Maestra again," Chavez said Friday. "He's fighting for his life. We don't know; we want him to recover, and he continues progressing, although slowly."

Noting Castro's age, Chavez said that "he said it himself: the machine that they have to fix is 80 years old."

"He is going through a difficult situation," he said.

Castro has not been seen in public since before July 31, when he relinquished power to his brother Raul so that he could undergo intestinal surgery. The Cuban government has maintained secrecy about his condition.

Earlier this week, the Spanish newspaper El Pais quoted unnamed medical sources saying Castro was in grave condition. But a Spanish surgeon who visited Castro in December -- and works at the same hospital as the sources -- said those reports were based on rumors and that Castro's condition shows "some progressive improvement."

"The only truthful parts of the newspaper's reports are the name of the patient, that he has been operated on, and that he has had complications. The rest is rumors," the surgeon, Dr. Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, told CNN in an exclusive interview.

He declined to go into specifics on Castro's health, or to discuss El Pais' reports point-by-point, but he said they "are not in line with reality, are not truthful and not real."

El Pais, one of Spain's largest and most reliable papers, reported Tuesday that two sources at the hospital in Madrid, Spain, told its reporters that Castro had suffered complications after three failed surgeries.

El Pais reported that Castro suffered from diverticulitis, an inflammation of sacs on the large intestine that can rupture and cause bleeding. The infection spread to the tissue on the walls of the abdomen, a condition called peritonitis.

The infections, the paper said, have impeded the healing process. On Wednesday, El Pais reported, citing sources, that Castro himself personally made a decision to undergo a type of operation that subsequently went wrong instead of a more routine surgery.

Mercosur Set To Delay Expansion Plans (FT)

By Richard Lapper, Jonathan Wheatley

Financial Times, January 20, 2007

Mercosur was on Friday expected to delay a controversial decision on expansion that would have strengthened the influence of Hugo Chávez, Venezuela's radical president, within the five-member trading bloc.

At a two-day presidential summit in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil had supported moves to give full membership of Mercosur to Bolivia, whose leftwing government is allied with Venezuela.

However, the proposal met with resistance from Argentina, as well as from the two smaller members of Mercosur, Uruguay and Paraguay, and has been put on hold pending the considerations of a working group which will meet over the next six to twelve months.

The development has added to multiple strains within the group. As early as next week, the US expects to sign a trade and investment framework with Uruguay. A full trade agreement would seem to be incompatible with continued Mercosur membership.

Venezuela itself became a full member of Mercosur last year after surprisingly little discussion in the group. On Thursday, Mr Chávez said that he was “decontaminating” the bloc of “neo-liberalism”.

In December Mr Chávez, a firm of opponent of President George W. Bush, began a new six-year term after winning a landslide election victory. Two weeks ago he announced sweeping nationalisation of his country's oil and utility industries. And more recently, members of the Venezuelan legislature - which is monopolised by Mr Chávez's supporters, after opponents boycotted an earlier poll - gave the Venezuelan leader new powers to rule by decree.

DOJ_NMG_0120025

Mr Chávez is pushing a number of ambitious schemes to advance integration in the region, including the establishment of a Bank of the South, designed as an alternative source of finance to the International Monetary Fund and other existing multilateral organisations. On Thursday Brazil and Venezuela signed an agreement to co-operate on the building of a giant pipeline that would carry Venezuelan hydrocarbons to markets in the south of the region.

The dispute over full membership status for Bolivia - like four other Andean countries, Bolivia is currently an associate member - is centred on proposed exemptions from the group's common external tariff regime. Since Bolivia's average tariff rates are lower, membership would mean it would have to increase levels of trade protection. Mercosur has previously resisted attempts by both Paraguay and Uruguay for greater flexibility about the application of these arrangements.

Congress And Foreign Policy Don't Mix (LAT)

By George Weigel

The Los Angeles Times, January 20, 2007

BY AUGUST 1950, Secretary of State Dean Acheson had taken all he could stand from those congressional critics whom he privately dismissed as "the primitives." So when Nebraska Sen. Kenneth Wherry leaned across a hearing table and wagged a finger, Acheson blew up. He leaped to his feet and demanded that Wherry not "shake his dirty finger in my face." Wherry said he'd do as he pleased. "By God, you won't," Acheson hollered — and prepared to land a haymaker until restrained by State Department legal counsel Adrian Fisher, a former college football player.

I couldn't help thinking of that scene from Walter Isaacson and Evan Thomas' multi-biography, "The Wise Men," last week. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is, one suspects, far too polite to respond Acheson-style to the indignities she absorbed during her first appearance before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. But would anyone have blamed her if, in response to Chuck Hagel's ambitions or Barbara Boxer's personal nastiness, she had said something like this:

"Look, senators, there are real consequences to our 'ending the war' in Iraq, as the new speaker of the House has put it — rather glibly, if I may say. Those consequences include a bloodbath, chaos throughout the Mideast and perhaps the emergence of an apocalyptic maniac in Tehran as the regional hegemonist. Do you think that would play well in Omaha? Or Sacramento? I don't. In any event, I've got important things to do, and they don't include sitting here acting like my mother's pin cushion. I'll be back when you're ready to get serious. Impeach me if you like. They pay a lot better at Stanford."

The recent sound bites out of Congress, and the anti-surge resolution introduced in the Senate on Wednesday, may be comforting to Democratic partisans and Republicans who've bailed out on President Bush. And no doubt the administration made serious mistakes in Iraq after the major combat phase of the war ended. Yet one can make the case (though Republicans seem curiously reluctant to) that the November election led to genuine soul-searching in the executive branch. A new secretary of Defense is in office; Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, a man with a proven record in Iraq, will be the new military commander there; and the president has offered a new strategy for success. Since assembling on Jan. 4, Congress, however, seems stuck on last fall's script.

Modern history suggests that Congress is a particularly blunt — and not terribly effective — instrument for making foreign policy. Congressional skepticism and partisanship drove the United States back into isolationism after World War I, which probably made World War II more likely. The House of Representatives came close to dismantling the Army just four months before Pearl Harbor, passing by only one vote the bill that kept draftees in the service for more than just 12 months.

President Eisenhower had a hard time persuading a Republican Congress to provide funds adequate for waging the Cold War. On the one hand, Congress wrote a blank check for the executive branch with the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution. On the other, it encroached on the executive's sphere of responsibility by embracing the nuclear freeze movement in the 1980s.

Strategic myopia seems institutional. House members on a short electoral leash, and the many senators who imagine themselves president in an era of ever-shortening election cycles, are not well positioned to think in terms of long-term strategies or to fit appropriate tactics to those strategies.

Congress is a necessary and useful check on executive arrogance and a good barometer of the public's mood, to which any thoughtful president must attend. Still, in the midst of a global war against jihadism that's going poorly on one front — Iraq — it's disheartening to see senators grandstanding when genuine inquiry is required. It is also worrisome to watch the ethics committees ramping up, the usual Washington prelude to policy differences being turned into attacks on the integrity of individuals (or worse, criminalized).

Congress can do better than this. This Congress must do better, given the magnitude and complexity of the issues involved in a multi-front contest with global jihadism that has nonmilitary as well as military dimensions.

George Weigel Is A Senior Fellow Of Washington's Ethics And Public Policy Center.

DOJ_NMG_0120026

DOJ_NMG_0120027